From that time forward she lived among the Lisu people, faithfully ministering to the addicts and preaching the gospel of Christ. Sadly, in 1959, she was attacked and killed while walking in the jungle alone. Years later it was discovered that a witch doctor bribed an opium addict to commit the murder.

Despite this heinous crime, the work among the Lisu people continued. A church was built not far from where she was killed.

Han, Chul-la (1924– ). Korean professor and mission advocate. Born in Pyongyang province in North Korea, he was educated at Seoul National University, Westminster Theological Seminary, and Union Theological Seminary in Virginia. He also did graduate studies at the Ecumenical Institute in Geneva, Earlangen University, and Westminster College in England. Han is president (1982–98) and professor of systematic theology at the Asian Center for Theological Studies and Mission (ACTS) in Seoul, Korea, which was founded in 1974. Prior to coming to ACTS, he was the dean of the Graduate School of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary (Tong Hap) in Seoul (1964-74).

His significant contributions to the churches in Korea and Asia are twofold. First, he has developed evangelical theological education in both Korea and Asia. One of the well-respected evangelical theologians in Korea and an ordained Presbyterian minister in the Presbyterian Church of Korea (Tong Hap), he has trained thousands of Korean pastors, parish church organizational leaders, and theologians as well as hundreds of other Asian, African, and South American students who studied at ACTS. Second, he is a mission-minded theologian who has promoted "the evangelization of Asia" through his ACTS ministry and trained many Korean missionaries to serve overseas.

Han has written numerous books and articles, but is best known for Asian Christian Thought (1990).

Han, Kyung-Chik (1902– ). Korean pastor and mission advocate. Han is pastor emeritus of the Young Nak Presbyterian Church (Tong Hap denomination) in Seoul, Korea, which he started with twenty-seven North Korean refugees before the Korean War. This church now has 60,000 members and is the largest Presbyterian church in the world.

When the Communists took over North Korea right after World War II, Han was pastoring in North Pyongyang province of North Korea. He and other church leaders organized the Christian Socialist Democratic Party in September 1945, but he had to flee to South Korea to avoid communist persecution. He became one of the best known pastors in South Korea for his vision for evangelism, missions, education, and social concern. Over a thirty-year period, his Young Nak church has started more than 350 churches and sent out missionaries to serve in 21 countries. He is the only Korean pastor who received the prestigious Templeton Award in 1993.

He was educated at Soong Sil (Union Christian) College in Pyongyang, North Korea, Emory College in Kansas, and Princeton Theological Seminary. He has served as a board member for many Christian institutes and organizations.

Harris, William Wade (1865–1929). Liberian evangelist and missionary in West Africa. Known as Prophet Harris, he was a Liberian (Grebo/Kru) Anglican catechist. Jailed twice in Liberia for anti-government activity, during his second imprisonment he had a vision of the angel Gabriel calling him to be "a prophet, to preach a gospel of repentance, to destroy 'fetish' worship, and to baptize those who obeyed." In 1913, he began preaching in Côte d'Ivoire (Ivory Coast) and Gold Coast (Ghana) that Jesus Christ must reign, and that Harris was his prophet. He proclaimed a political vision that would bring all nations under the earthly rule of Jesus. Colonial authorities were condemned as “Satan.” Harris preached belief in one God, destruction of fetishes, observance of Sunday as a day of rest, and prohibition of adultery and alcohol. He stressed the “incomparable importance” of the Word of God.

Harris told those he baptized to build churches and wait for teachers who would come and give them fuller instruction. An estimated 100,000 Ivorians believed before French authorities deported Harris in 1915.

In 1923, a missionary of the English Methodist Society found 45,000 people faithful to Harris's teaching. In Ghana, Wesleyans increased sevenfold between 1912 and 1929, largely through the preaching of Harris. He continued preaching in Liberia until his death in 1929.

Haygood was actively involved at the Clopton Boarding School for Girls and eventually merged it with Mary Lambuth School at Soochow. Throughout all her endeavors, she stressed teacher training. She raised up an army of teachers and imparted to them the same passion for teaching.

Her greatest achievement was the opening of McTyeire, a high school for girls and home and training school for new women missionaries to China. The school opened in March 1892 and became the most prominent private girls’ high school in the Shanghai region.

After a long furlough in Atlanta, Haygood returned to China in 1896 and became the director of the Woman’s Board for the entire Shanghai region. Despite her overwhelming administrative duties, she renewed an interest in evangelism by establishing two Bible schools for women at Soochow and Sungkiang.

Haystack Meeting. The first American mission board to spread the gospel outside the United States was the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS (ABCFM). The impetus to found this society came from a group of students at Andover Theological Seminary. The leader of this group was SAMUEL MILLS, who, touched by the Second Great Awakening in New England, had received a call to missions and gone for training to Williams College in Massachusetts. Here several like-minded students, among them Luther Rice, joined with him to form the Society of Brethren, a group that met in a grove of maples near the campus for prayer and discussion about missions. One day going to their time of prayer, they were caught in a violent thunderstorm and took refuge in a nearby haystack. After an intense time of prayer, they took a pledge to devote their lives to missionary service.

After their graduation from Williams College, several of these students went to Andover Seminary, where they were joined by ADONIRAM JUDSON from Brown, Samuel Newell from Harvard, and Samuel Nott Jr. from Union College. They formed a Society of Inquiry on the Subject of Missions and in June 1810 appeared before the General Assembly of Congregational Churches, where they offered themselves for missionary service. This led to the formation of the ABCFM, with themselves as the first appointees.

Health Care and Missions. In the 1970s it became clear that the traditional pattern of health care delivery in medical missions, that of medical institutions staffed by trained medical professionals, was inadequate. Institutions were unable to cure the number of sick who came and had done little to improve the health of the majority of people in the communities they served. A variety of global health agencies and Christian groups addressed this issue, with significant leadership for the Christian community coming from the Christian Medical Commission in Geneva. Historic mission involvement in schools, agriculture, and church planting—as well as hospitals and clinics—reflected a genuine, though often unarticulated, concern for social and economic transformation as well as for spiritual development. The legacy of the 1970s was to focus attention on community participation in health care, the responsibility of governments in health care, the relationship between health and development, training personnel for primary care, using appropriate technology in health care, and providing essential affordable drugs.

The World Health Organization definition of health includes physical, mental, and social well-being, but the biblical concept of SHALOM moves beyond that, encompassing the welfare, health, and prosperity of both the person and persons-in-community. Around the globe there have emerged many models of integrated holistic ministry that promote health. They are diversely sponsored by mission agencies, churches, development agencies, grassroots organizations, and combinations of those groups.

Model Programs. Parachurch organizations, such as the Luke Society and Campus Crusade for Christ, have made significant contributions in the area of Christian health ministries. The Luke Society, working in the Ashanti province of Ghana since 1989, founded twenty-two community health centers with trained workers as part of a larger program that also included evangelism, church planting, and income-generation projects. Community Health Evangelism, originally a program of Life Ministry Africa (Campus Crusade for Christ), was conceived to help the church meet both the physical and spiritual needs of the people. Community health evangelists teach health workers, who in turn train others in disease prevention, health promotion, and how to have an abundant Christian life through a personal relationship with Christ.

Traditional mission agencies working in partnership with local churches have developed strong programs as well. In the Republic of Congo, the Vanga Evangelical Hospital under the leadership of Dan Fountain developed in three decades from a rural hospital with two dispensaries to a 300-bed referral hospital with five physicians and a network of 50 primary health care centers, working in partnership with the Baptist Church of Western Zaire. There has been a significant impact on morbidity and mortality in its catchment area of 200,000 people.

The flexible, community-oriented initiatives, which began in the 1970s, have proliferated in subsequent years. Documentation of these initiatives has been undertaken by MARC, a division of World Vision International, in a series of publications by Ted Yamamori and colleagues entitled Serving with the Poor in Africa, Serving with the Poor in Asia, and Serving with the Poor in Latin America, making engaging reading on Christian social transformation, integrated development, and health care that ministers to both physical and spiritual needs.

The Heathen. In missions, the term “heathen” refers to “those who have never heard the good news that God offers sinful humanity divine forgiveness on the ground of the substitutionary death of Christ” (Henry, Through No Fault of Their Own, p. 246). The scriptural development of the term “heathen” centers around the words “Gentiles,” “nations,” and “peoples.” The primary Hebrew words are goy and ‘am. The primary Greek words are ethnos and laos.

The scriptural emphasis behind the term “heathen” is rooted in the doctrine of the sinful state of the human race. Jesus taught that slavery to sin leads to self-centeredness (Matt. 5:47), indulgence in self-centered materialistic and temporal pursuits (Matt. 6:32), abuse of relational responsibilities (Matt. 20:25), and misunderstanding of true prayer (Matt. 6:7). The apostle Paul affirmed this doctrine in a very systematic way (Rom. 1:18–3:20).

God’s desire to reach all nations is clearly embedded in his covenant with Abraham (Gen. 12:1–3). The chosen nation was to be God’s instrument to reach the heathen. While Israel was to be set apart from all nations (Lev. 11:43–47), it was also to be a kingdom of priests to represent the true God to the nations (Exod. 19:6). Christ reiterated God’s desire to reach the world when he gave his final commission to his disciples (Matt. 28:18–20).

Scripture presents Christ as the light of the world and its only hope (John 8:12) The Book of Acts gives the historical outworking of God giving the Holy Spirit (Acts 10:48), his Word (Acts 11:1), repentance (Acts 11:18), faith (Acts 14:27), and conversion (Acts 15:13) to the Gentiles. Today God is calling Gentiles or heathen (Rom. 9:24), and taking from among them a people for his name (Acts 15:14). One day the fullness of the Gentiles will be complete, which speaks of the total number that God will save (Rom. 11:25).

The apostle Paul's response to the heathen's spiritual condition is reflected in his desire to preach the gospel where it had never been preached (Rom. 15:20–21). While all Christians are not called to be pioneer missionaries, all are called to live distinct lives (Eph. 4:17; 1 Thess. 4:5), and to obey Christ's command to disciple the nations (Matt. 28:18–20).

The classical answer to the persistent question of the spiritual state of one who has never heard the gospel is found in the early chapters of Romans. The answer is that God has spoken to all people through creation (Rom. 1:19–20; cf. Ps. 19:1–6). The revelation of God's moral law is also written on every person's conscience (Rom. 2:14–15). All persons will be judged according to the light they have received (Rom. 2:11–12). Such revelation is said to leave the heathen with no excuse (Rom. 1:20). The pattern given in Romans is a pattern of rejecting God's revelation in creation and conscience.

A recent flurry of articles and books address the issue of the heathen. Some argue that since many evangelicals make room for the salvation of infants, is not there a case for salvation of heathen apart from explicit faith in Christ? Of course, it must be noted that the infant is not guilty of volitionally rejecting General Revelation in the same way that the heathen are.

Some argue for a Universalism that states all will be saved. The supposed scriptural basis is rooted in God's universal desire (1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Peter 3:9), his universal provision (John 12:32), and the future universal acknowledgment of Christ (Phil. 2:9–11). The clear biblical teaching on judgment, the necessity of personal faith in Christ, and the separation of the lost and the saved appear to clearly negate this teaching that has been espoused by such ancients as Origen, who saw hell as remedial and the threat of an eternal hell as only hortatory. The related question of the nature and duration of divine punishment is outside the scope of this present article (see Annihilation).

There are a number of theories that do not embrace universalism but do espouse a wider hope (see also Pluralism). They tend to give some hope to the heathen by giving various ways that one might be saved without explicit faith in Christ. Some theorize that God will expose everyone to the gospel after they die. There appears to be no clear evidence for this position. The "spirits in prison" in 1 Peter 3:18 are probably best taken as angelic beings and the "dead" in 1 Peter 4:6 probably refers to martyred Christians who heard the gospel while they were alive.

Another theory is that the sincere seeker can be saved even apart from faith in Christ. Is it true that "God cares about the direction of the heart and not the content of theology" (Pinnock, A Wideness in God's Mercy, p. 158)? Roman Catholic theology, according to Catholic II, teaches that those who are guiltlessly ignorant of Christ's gospel and sincerely seek God can achieve eternal salvation. Cornelius is used as an illustration of this theory. Acts 10:35 does teach that Gentiles such as Cornelius are suitable candidates for salvation, but Acts 11:14 says he was not saved until he heard the gospel.

The theory that God will save those who respond to general revelation of creation and conscience is set forth by Justin Martyr, Chrysostom, Zwingli, Wesley, Augustus Strong, and more recently by Clark Pinnock. In one of John Stott's earlier writings he called the issue of those who have never heard a "perplexing problem." He also encouraged the Christian not to "preoccupy oneself with such speculative questions" (Stott, Christian Counterculture, p. 196). Jesus encouraged us to focus not on speculation but on our responsibility (Luke 13:23–24).

The emphasis in Scripture is on the necessity of human agents to bring the gospel to a lost world (Rom. 10:14–15). Scripture gives only one clear way to escape God's judgment and that is through faith in Christ. The heathen are responsible to God based on general revelation. There is a provision for all people's salvation in Christ. The church's responsibility is to declare this message to all. The Christian is not to be arrogant but rather to honor all people (1 Peter 2:17). However, there is no greater honor one gives to another than humbly sharing Jesus, the light and hope of the world.

McQuillkin considers any theory that gives hope to the unevangelized as dangerous (McQuillkin, The Great Omission, p. 50). Nash states his similar concerns regarding any theory that espouses that the preaching of Christ is not necessary for salvation (Nash, Is Jesus the Only Saviour? p. 126). Kantzer is probably correct in stating that "God does not want us to spend enormous amounts of time investigating things about which we can do absolutely nothing" (Kantzer, Through No Fault of Their Own, pp. 14–15). We do know that God will enable and reward every effort to reach the heathen with the gospel. We also know that our just God can never do anything that is not perfectly righteous. It is probably better, as Phillips says, to err on the side of safety than gamble on speculative leniency (Phillips, 154).

Hell. Place of God's final retributive punishment for the wicked. In the Old Testament souls of the dead face a shadowy existence in Sheol (Job 10:21; Ps. 88:12; Isa. 14:10; Eccles. 9:10). Since death is not God's original intent but results from the fall, the Old Testament confidently awaits God's demonstration of his lordship by raising the righteous to life (Gen. 2–3; Pss. 16:10, 49:15; Isa. 25:8; Hos. 13:14). Occasionally it suggests a future retribution for the wicked (Pss. 21:10; 34:15–16, 140:11; Dan. 12:2; Mal. 3:18–4:2). Jesus further develops this framework, teaching that at the final judgment, Satan, his demons, and the wicked will be thrown into hell, bringing an end to evil's free ways (Matt. 25:41). His standard term for hell is Gehenna, referring to the valley of Hinnom outside Jerusalem, a place notorious for evil deeds and God's fiery judgment (Jer. 7:31ff.; Isa. 30:33; 66:24).

The Biblical View of Hell. Jesus is most responsible for defining the biblical concept of hell, which includes the following integral features.

Place of Irretrievable Bondage. The wicked are imprisoned in a “furnace” (Matt. 13:42, 50), a “lake of fire” (Rev. 20:10, 14–15; 21:8), a “prison” (Matt. 5:22–26; 18:34–35; Judg 6) and so separated from the righteous (Luke 16:26).

Place of Retribution. Jesus’ image of fire portrays God’s searing holiness exacting retribution for evil deeds (Luke 17:29–30). Here the wicked are punished and “paid back with harm for the harm they have done” (2 Peter 2:3; Matt. 16:27; Jude 7; Rev. 14:9–11).

Penalties of Loss. The grave’s maggots (Mark 9:48; Isa. 14:11) and darkness (Matt. 8:12; Ps. 88:12) were common images of a ruined and despairing existence without hope, and thus separated from God’s loving presence (Matt. 25:30).

Penalties of Torment. The pictures of “gnashing teeth,” “beatings,” and “fire” suggest that hell’s punishment includes physical affliction (Matt 13:42; Mark 9:48–49; Luke 12:47). Since these images are often at odds with each other—darkness and fire, or never-dying worms in an unquenchable fire—they should not be interpreted literally but as metaphors for punishment.

Degrees of Punishment. Punishment varies so that those who were “entrusted with much” are more responsible (Luke 12:48).

Hell Exists Forever. Jesus’ picture of hell as a place where “the fire is never put out” (Mark 9:48) reflects what Scripture clearly states elsewhere: punishment is “forever and ever” (Rev. 20:10; 14:11; Matt 25:46).

Justice and Hell. Hell answers the perennial cry for justice. The Holocaust and ethnic cleansing haunt us with the question, “When will the wicked be judged?” These pangs of morality reflect the way God made us as accountable to him, the Moral Judge of the cosmos (Rom. 2:15–16). Scripture’s ultimate answer to the problem of evil is that God, the holy Judge of all the earth, calls every human to account on the Day of Judgment for his or her life (Matt. 25:30; Pss. 31:18; Rom. 2:6–11). Hell is the horrific and tragic place where God will pay back the wicked for their evils and reestablish his righteous rule even over the reprobate (Matt. 25:41; Ps. 88:12; Isa. 25:8; Hos. 13:14). Occasionally it suggests a future retribution for the wicked (Pss. 21:10; 34:15–16, 140:11; Dan. 12:2; Mal. 3:18–4:2). Jesus further develops this framework, teaching that at the final judgment, Satan, his demons, and the wicked will be thrown into hell, bringing an end to evil’s free ways (Matt. 25:41). ject forever the creature he loves? Note that this question elevates humanity as God's highest good! But God is self-sufficient; his goodness and love are completely grounded in himself (Acts 17:25). Humanity exists to glorify God (Ps. 73:24–26; 1 Cor. 10:31; Col. 1:16). Because God's goodness is self-grounded, anything contrary to his will is evil and retribution reflects God's goodness. In view of Jesus' own concept of hell, universalism attacks his character. For it must treat Jesus as ignorant of God's moral character or as intentionally misleading his hearers.

Not only does universalism dispute God's revelation in Jesus Christ, its insistence that God's eternal pursuit will bring everyone to salvation undermines the moral seriousness of our present life. By contrast Jesus stresses the urgency of a decision in the present life (Matt. 25:13; Mark 13:32–37) precisely because God's gracious offer is not eternal (Matt. 25:41). This present life is decisive for our future (Heb. 9:27). Moreover, universalism's view that those who die outside of Christ are not lost eliminates the need for evangelism. Historically universalism has subverted mission institutions into becoming merely social and political agencies.

Annihilationism. Annihilationists acknowledge the necessity for retribution, but insist that the wicked are obliterated by God's wrath and not punished forever and ever. The punishment due for sin is the crucial issue. Scripture's answer focuses on Christ's death. At the cross God in Christ became our substitute to bear the punishment for our sins so as “to be just and the one who justifies the man who has faith in Jesus” (2 Cor. 5:21; Rom. 3:21–26; 1 Peter 2:24). The fact that only God the Judge, the “Lord of glory himself” (1 Cor. 2:8), could pay the penalty due us, suggests that the penalty for sin against the Infinite is infinite. Annihilationism fails to take seriously the infinite penalty that God in Jesus Christ paid for us. Moreover, hell marks the gravity of humanity's rebellion. Diminishing hell means the horrific nature of sin begins to be lost.

Conclusion. Many questions remain. While Scripture does not answer all our questions, we know that the Lord of all the earth will do right (Gen. 18:25). Just as Christ cried over Jerusalem's fate (Luke 19:41), we can only speak of God's final damning punishment with tears as we respond to a lost world as did our Savior, who humbled himself to our condition, suffered, and died for the wicked. This destiny should impel the church to follow Christ in sacrificially proclaiming the gospel in word and deed to the lost.

TIMOTHY R. PHILLIPS

Henotheism. The term “henotheism,” from the Greek henos (one) and theos (god), was introduced into the study of religion by F. Max Müller, and refers to the practice of worshiping one particular deity without necessarily denying the reality of other gods. Müller observed that in the Vedas, the oldest Indian religious literature, deities are invoked by a variety of names, but that to the particular supplicant each god is for that person or group the real divinity, absolute and supreme. Throughout Hindu religion, there is the tendency for various groups to give special place and devotion to specific deities—Shiva, Brahma, Vishnu—without necessarily denying the reality of other deities. A biblical example of henotheistic practice might be found in Canaanite religion, such as the example of the Philistines, who regarded Dagon as their superior deity while also recognizing the power of Yahweh when they captured the ark (1 Sam. 4).

Although distinct from them, the concept of henotheism overlaps to some extent with other categories for the study of religion, such as monotheism (belief in one God, excluding the very possibility of other gods), polytheism (belief in a plurality of gods), and monolatry (the exclusive worship of a deity by a certain social group). Furthermore, discussions of henotheism have frequently been plagued by rather dubious assumptions of the allegedly evolutionary development of human religion. The challenge for Christian missions is to encourage people to move from henotheistic tendencies to a full acceptance of the biblical God as the only God and Creator, who forbids the worship or acknowledgment of any other deities.

Herman of Alaska (1756–1837). Russian Orthodox missionary to Alaska. Herman was one of ten Russian Orthodox monks who took part in the first Christian mission to Alaska in 1794. He remained there for forty-three years, faithfully serving the Alaskan natives and proclaiming the gospel of Christ.

Herman was born in a little town outside Moscow. At the age of sixteen, he entered the monastery. Although he never envisioned the life of a missionary, after twenty years in the monastery he volunteered to join the first overseas mission team of the Russian Church. They arrived in Kodiak, Alaska, on September 24, 1794.

The mission thrived during the first five years despite great obstacles from Russian explorers and hunters. The missionaries baptized more than seven thousand people and established a strong foundation for the new church. Over a short period of time, however, three of the original missionaries drowned at sea, a fourth was martyred, and another five returned to Russia. Herman remained alone.

For the remaining thirty-eight years of his life, he continued to preach and protect the indigenous peoples from Russian traders. Herman’s legacy best represents the Orthodox Church’s understanding of “passive missions,” where holy people preach the gospel more with their life than with their actual words.

Hermeutics. Science, art, and spiritual act of interpreting the Scriptures. Presupposed is the view that the Bible is the inspired, inerrant Word of God (see INERRANCY). There is not just an author of the biblical books but a divine Author communicating eternal truth through the human authors. The basic dilemma in interpretation is the author-text-reader problem. An author writes a text with an embedded message. A reader studies the text in order to “understand” it, but what access do readers have to the author’s intended meaning? In the case of the Bible, the authors have been dead over two millennia, and the cultures within which the Bible was written no longer exist. Is it possible to understand and contextualize the Bible in a set of cultures so far removed from the original setting? That is the basic problem.

Philosophical and literary developments, from Freud to Heidegger, Gadamer to Derrida, led to the dominant movement of the 1990s, POSTMODERNISM. In the philosophical arena, it is deconstruction; in the literary field, it is reader–response criticism; in the religious sector it is radical PLURALISM and UNIVERSALISM; in culture it is tolerance and relativism. In each of its guises postmodernism means the rejection of absolute TRUTH and the replacement of God with socio-historical forces as the determinisitic forces in society. Truth is as you make it, and the only arbiter is culture or the needs of the group.

There is an answer. There is one final proof of absolute truth; and while it is grounded in rational evidence (see Osborne, ch. 1), it must in the end be accepted by faith: the Bible is the Word of God. In his Word, God has spoken, and all truth is linked to that one distinct fact. On the hermeneutical side, there are many arguments on behalf of the viability, indeed the necessity, of seeking the author’s intended meaning of the text. First, God is behind it and expects the reader to ascertain and then obey his message, not some reader-oriented perspective. There is an ethical responsibility demanded of all readers to let the text guide their understanding to its meaning. This is especially true of the Bible, for authors often (see Paul’s use of the rhetorical question in Romans) try to clear up any possible misunderstanding on the part of the reader. Thiselton argues (1992, 611–19) that if there was no intended meaning in the biblical text, it would lose its transforming function. It is certainly true that scholars continually debate and often fail to agree on the meaning of a particular text, but that does not mean there is no correct meaning. In fact, the ability of communities of readers to challenge each other’s interpretations draws the student back to the text and produces a greater openness to its meaning. Our preunderstanding (views inherited from tradition and community) has enormous influence but does not have to determine our understanding. The hermeneutical process elucidated below can enable us to go beyond the interpretation mandated by our Reformed or Anabaptist or dispensational background and let the text guide us to its own meaning.
Hermeneutical Principles. There are two primary aspects to interpretation theory, which might be labeled meaning and significance (drawing from Hirsch). However, these are not distinct but part of a single process. Still, meaning refers to the search for the author’s original message, and significance to the contextualization of the message for the various cultural contexts of the current age. There are three primary components of meaning—context, exegesis, and biblical theology. There are two components of significance—systematic theology and contextualization. All of these interact in the process of moving from text to context.

The Meaning of the Text. The context of a text is the literary world surrounding it. In other words, what does it add to the surrounding context? One of the major hermeneutical axioms is the realization that no word, sentence, or paragraph has meaning apart from a context. “Take out the trash” means something different if it is embedded in an editorial choice for removing a section of an article or a domestic choice for placing the garbage on the curb. So the first step is to note what kind of literary context surrounds a passage.

The exegetical task has four aspects—grammar, semantics, syntax, and backgrounds (see also Exegesis). Grammar studies the building blocks of language, noting how the words in a sentence relate to one another in communicating their meaning. For instance, consider the phrase “the love of God.” Does it mean “God’s love,” “divine love,” “love from God,” “God loves me,” “I love God,” or “the church’s community love that God makes possible”? All are viable, and only the larger context can decide. The tense or mood of the verb, the case of the noun, the place of prepositions or participles, all are determinative for interpreting a passage properly. Grammar is not inconsequential but essential in hermeneutics. Of course, there are questions, such as in the current debate on traditional versus aspect theory in studying the tense of the verb. However, in the end these enhance rather than obscure grammatical knowledge. The important thing to remember is that every grammatical option makes possible a different translation.

Semantics is closely connected to grammar. The meaning of a particular term is dependent on the impact of the surrounding words in the sentence. The key again is context. No term has meaning in and of itself but draws its meaning from the larger communication unit in which it is embedded. There are three rules to follow: (1) determine the semantic range of the term; (2) allow the context to choose which of the meaning possibilities best fits the passage; (3) study the semantic field (the different terms or phrases that could have been used to communicate that meaning) to deepen the understanding of its use in the context. Note Philippians 2:7 as an example. The thrust of ἐκένωσεν (“emptied”) has been debated for centuries, and the “kenotic school” developed from the belief that Jesus “emptied himself” of his divinity at his incarnation. However, it has been realized recently that the verb only means “emptied” when it is transitive, that is, when the contents that have been “emptied” are mentioned. When it is intransitive, as here, it means “to make yourself low” or “humble yourself.”

Syntax does not refer just to grammar but to a broader concept—tracing the interrelationships in the passage to determine the meaning of the whole. This is critical in order to counter the major failure of most commentaries—centering upon isolated words and phrases without developing the meaning of the whole. It must always be kept in mind that the structure of the whole always determines the meaning of the parts and that the value of any particular statement is entirely in its contribution to the whole message. For instance, Gospel pericopes are part of a larger pattern called “story time,” namely, the developing message of the Gospel as a whole. In Mark the feeding of the five thousand and the walking on the water are a single story, concluding with the startling “their hearts were hardened.” Yet they are also part of a larger unit, 6:30–8:21, centering on discipleship failure surrounding the two feeding miracles (6:30–44, 8:1–10, with the message “God will provide”) and contrasting the failure of the disciples with the faith of the “little people” (7:24–37). Each episode in this section of Mark contributes to this basic message.

Finally, background analysis traces the shared assumptions between the author and original readers regarding the customs and culture behind the text. There are two approaches—social description, in which we study the text in terms of the sociological details that help us understand it more deeply; and sociological interpretation, in which we apply current models to re-create the social dynamics that led to the creation of the text. The problem with the latter is that it tends to be speculative and reductionistic. We must allow the text to drive our theory and not force our theory upon the text. Therefore, social description is far more helpful. In this we study parallels in the intertestamental world of Judaism, Qumran, and the Hellenistic world that fit the situation behind the text (see also INTERTESTAMENTAL STUDIES). We consider geographical, material, everyday life, or religious customs and their impact on interpreting the text.

Biblical theology studies the developing theological message of the text by tracing the primary themes of the book as they emerge from the text. This is determined by allowing the themes to emerge and interact with one another as one examines the developing text. For instance, there are two major themes in the Book of Revelation (the sovereignty of God and the perseverance of the saints) with several subthemes (the unity of God and the Lamb, the conflict with Satan, the eschaton, etc.). One determines this by studying the interdependence of these themes through the progressive unfolding of the book. Biblical theology emerges from the exegetical analysis of individual passages and then the collation of the theological themes emerging from the passages first in terms of individual books, then in authors, then in the Testaments, and finally in the Bible as a whole.

The Significance of the Text. It must be stressed that this is not a separate aspect of hermeneutics but is part of the meaning of the text. Readers do not artificially determine the objective meaning of the text and only then contextualize that meaning for today. The very exegetical questions we ask come from the modern context. However, it is still a helpful metaphor to think in terms of meaning and significance.

Systematic Theology (ST) is actually a contextualization of biblical theology (BT) in light of the models provided by the history of dogma. There are four components of theological formulation—Scripture, tradition, community, and experience. Scripture, particularly BT, provides the content of ST. The other three together make up our preunderstanding, the set of beliefs we bring to the task. We make theological decisions on the basis of the ecclesiastical tradition we have accepted and the particular formulation of that system in our particular church community. The question is how much influence our inherited system has on us as we rework our beliefs in light of the scriptural data. Theoretically, our preunderstanding should be influential but not decisive; it should be brought to the surface and placed on the examining table to be reworked on the basis of the biblical data. This process will take several steps: the Bible will first be studied inductively to discover all the passages that address the issue. Each passage will be exegeted and the theological message determined. The texts will next be collated on the basis of the aspect of the issue addressed by each, and a preliminary model of the doctrine as it emerges from the biblical teaching will be constructed. The understanding of the doctrine through history will then be consulted, and the model will be reworked in light of that data so that a covering model for today can be erected. This model is heuristic, continually reconsidered in light of the biblical data.

Contextualization in essence refers to the cross-cultural application and communication of biblical and theological truths. The true goal of hermeneutics is not the learned essay but the sermon, not the commentary but the missiological adaptation of Christianity in the diverse cultures of the world. Biblical truth is meant not just to be studied but more to be applied in life-changing ways. It must be practical and not just academic. This began with the Bible itself, as the early church moved from a Jewish to a Hellenistic-Jewish to a Hellenistic cultural base. In each new cultural center, from South Galatia (Galatians) to North Galatia (1 Peter) to the province of Asia (Ephesians, Revelation), a new set of cultural problems emerged, and Christianity had to be recontextualized. This dynamic process must be carefully controlled, as all too easily the culture rather than the Word of God can become the determining factor. If the Bible is indeed the Word of God, it must provide the content for all contextualization. In a dynamic equivalence approach, whenever the receptor culture controls the process, relativism and syncretism result. At the same time, however, the form that this content will take is determined by the cultural context. Form and content provide the matrix of contextualization. The Bible is the norm, but the current culture provides the arena within which the biblical truths are reformulated. We must allow the divine truths to adapt to those aspects of culture that we might call redemptive analogies but at the same time challenge and transform those aspects that are contrary to Scripture. We need to exegete the culture as carefully as we do the Bible, and to understand the people anthropologically and sociologically very deeply as we contextualize, lest we misapply the Word to our world.

Hesselgrave, David (1924– ). American missiologist and missionary to Japan. Born in Wisconsin, Hesselgrave trusted Christ as a boy. God called him to pastoral ministry, then missions, the preparation of missionaries, and guidance of the missionary enterprise.

Married to Gertrude in 1944, he prepared for ministry at Trinity Seminary and at the University of Minnesota. There he earned a B.A. in philosophy, M.A. in speech, and Ph.D. in rhetoric emphasizing cross-cultural communication. He was ordained by the Evangelical Free Church of America with whom he served five years in a pastorate and twelve years (1950–62) in Japan.

After returning to the United States, he joined the faculty of Trinity Evangelical Divinity School (TEDS) in 1965, inaugurating the School of World Missions and Evangelism and the doctoral

A significant contribution in addition to 10 books and 140 articles on missions was the calling of several missions consultations. These brought together biblical scholars, theologians, and missiologists. Hesselgrave has always been concerned to keep the missions movement grounded in Scripture and sound theology, emphasizing this through teaching and lecturing worldwide and through active membership in several professional societies (e.g., AMERICAN SOCIETY OF MISSIONAL AND THEOLOGICAL SOCIETY), and the directorship of the EVANGELICAL MISSIONAL SOCIETY from 1991 to 1992.

Hewat, Elizabeth G. K. (1897–1968). Scottish missionary to China. Born in Scotland, she was one of four daughters of the renowned historian and minister Kirkwood Hewat of Prestwick, Ayrshire. In 1926 she was one of the few women to graduate from Edinburgh University with a double degree in history and philosophy.

During her years at Edinburgh, she was on staff at St. Colm’s, the Women’s Missionary College. Afterwards, she joined her sister, Helen, in China, where they engaged in medical missionary work for several years.

Out of that experience came the material for her Ph.D. thesis in which she compared Hebrew and Chinese wisdom literature. She returned to Scotland and became assistant at the North Mission Church in Edinburgh.

After six months, Hewat left Edinburgh and took up the post of professor of history at Wilson College, Bombay. She stayed in that position for twenty years, from 1935 to 1955. During that time, she taught Scripture at the Women Student’s Hostel and became an elder in the United Church of North India.

When she returned to Scotland, she was a strong advocate of the opening of both eldership and the ministry of the Church of Scotland to women. With her credentials and achievements, there is little doubt that she made a lasting impact both on the mission field and in the Church of Scotland.

KATHY McREYNOLDS

Heyling, Peter (1607/8–52). German pioneer missionary theologian in Ethiopia. A native of the Hanseatic city of Lübeck in Germany, Heyling studied law and theology in Paris (1628–32) and was influenced by Huigh Groot (1583–1645). Together with some fellow students from Lübeck he made a decision to “reawaken the ruined churches of the Orient to a genuine evangelical life.” After a stay in Egypt for one year, where he lived in monasteries in the desert to learn the Coptic and Arabic languages, he reached Ethiopia in 1634. Here, he became an influential minister, teacher, and doctor at the court of King Fâsilidas (1632–67). Eagerly he also attempted to bring about a reforming renewal in Coptic Christianity. This resulted not only in unproductive christological disputes, but also in an Amharic translation of the New Testament. John’s Gospel, in particular, was widely distributed. He is also said to have compiled a collection of legislation taken from Roman and civil law. According to an unsecured tradition Heyling was extradited from the country and died in Suaqin (Sudan, at the Red Sea) as a martyr. His missionary work left its traces in the Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus (founded in 1959).

Hicks, Tommy (1909–73). American missionary evangelist. Little is known of Hicks’ background except that he was from Lancaster, California, and served as a Baptist minister prior to becoming Pentecostal. As an independent evangelist in the healing movement of the 1950s and 1960s, his crusades were sponsored by the Full Gospel Business Men’s Fellowship International.

Hicks held meetings in the United States and many foreign countries, but his claim to fame came from his meetings in Buenos Aires, Argentina. At the invitation of Assemblies of God missionaries and pastors from twelve denominations, his “Salvation-Healing Campaign” lasted from April to June 1954. The crowds grew so large that the meetings were moved from the Atlanta to the Hurucan stadium with the blessing of Juan Peron; there, nightly attendance exceeded 110,000. Driven by reports of dramatic healings and conversions, the aggregate attendance reached 2 million. As the largest evangelical gathering in Argentine history at the time, it resulted in significant Pentecostal and evangelical church growth.

Hicks’ overseas ministry continued but not without controversy over his lifestyle and fundraising methods. His books include, among others, Capturing the Nations in the Name of the Lord (1956) and Millions Found Christ (1956), the latter his account of the Buenos Aires campaign.

Higginbottom, Sam

Higginbottom, Sam (1874–1958). English agricultural educator and missionary in India. Higginbottom worked tirelessly at improving agricultural productivity in India. Raised in England, he moved to Boston, Massachusetts, for studies at Amherst College, Princeton, and Ohio State University. Responding to a strong call to missionary service, he left for India under the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions in 1903. The following year he married Jane E. Cody in Bombay, India; they later had six children.

After six years of teaching at Allahabad Christian College, Higginbottom became convinced of the need to minister to the Indian people through agriculture. In 1911 he founded the Allahabad Agricultural Institute, where research and experimental methods were used to adapt modern techniques to the particularities of Indian farming. The Institute met with great success, and grew to become India's finest agricultural college. Higginbottom also succeeded in attracting a great deal of financial assistance and trained personnel to the Institute. He taught and ministered in Allahabad until his retirement in 1944. Higginbottom served on many Indian governmental boards concerned with rural affairs. He received the Kaiser-I-Hind Gold Medal in 1924 in addition to five honorary doctorates from universities in the United States.

Hill, David (1840–96). English missionary to China. Arriving in Shanghai in 1865 following the downfall of the Taiping revolution, David Hill prepared himself for evangelistic ministry with the Wesleyan Mission in the Hubei Province. Son of a wealthy alderman of Yorkshire in England, Hill was a self-supporting missionary who aspired to live a relatively ascetic celibate life, one which many considered exceptional and saintly. This he did to be free to preach to the widest range of Chinese people.

Believing prayer to be the mightiest tool of mission strategy, Hill maintained spiritual disciplines, including extensive daily intercession. He advocated missionary prayer unions in England, later promoted and established lay missions in China, and became known as a biblically styled apostle to the Chinese. Over thirty years his mission strategies changed from a singular emphasis on preaching in country circuits to a multifaceted plan, including medical work, schools, publishing, and charity.

Involved in famine relief in Shanxi province in 1878 and 1879, Hill from that time on dressed in Chinese attire and developed extensive ministries to the poor. From 1885 he was chairman of the Wesleyan Central China Mission, and in 1890 was designated the English president of the General Missionary Conference. He died from typhus contracted while distributing funds for the poor entrusted to him by mandarins.

Hinderer, Anna (Martin) (1827–70). English pioneer missionary to Nigeria. Born in Norfolk, she lost her mother early and was largely brought up in the home of the Anglican rector of Lowestoft, where she assisted in work in the parish. In October 1852 she married David Hinderer, a German clergyman serving under the Church Missionary Society in Yoruba country (Nigeria), and they sailed almost immediately for Lagos.

Hinderer, originally at Abeokuta, near the coast, had started work at Ibadan, farther inland, and they traveled there early in 1853. Accommodation was primitive; they were both frequently ill, but Anna at once began to visit the town, and soon had a school in her home. Childless herself, she became a mother to many. After leave (1856–58) they found their Yoruba assistants had carried on well, and there were many baptisms. But in 1860 an ongoing feud between two sections of the Yoruba people came to a head, and for the next five years they lived in a state of siege. Not until April 1865 were they relieved and able to visit Britain again. They returned to Ibadan at the end of 1866 and found the work progressing well, but their health was worse and in 1869 they were forced to leave. David Hinderer resigned from the CMS and took a parish at Martham, Norfolk, where Anna died in June 1870.

The memoir her husband compiled has kept her memory fresh. She represents the sacrificial band of wives without whose help the new communities of Christians could not have developed.

Hindu, Hinduism. “Hindu” is a term originally used by Muslim conquerors of India to refer to the indigenous peoples of North India whom they subjected in the second millennium A.D. Later “Hinduism” came to be used by British colonizers for the religion of these Hindus without initially realizing how diverse and distinct the religious communities among the Hindus were. Today, both terms are used popularly by both Hindus and others to refer to their religious life, but at best these terms serve only to distinguish Hindus from other religious groups such as Muslims and Christians. “Hinduism” is useful only generally to refer to a cluster of mutually distinct beliefs and related practices ranging from animism to Tantric occultism to polytheism and impersonal monism. These typically have warrant in Hindu texts which provide a rich treasury of symbols that are understood, combined, and used very differently. Though there is no unified religious entity that corresponds to the term “Hinduism,” one can speak intelligently of Hindu traditions. What follows is a description of the history and development of those traditions.

Vedic Texts. Most Hindu traditions draw selectively upon a body of authoritative religious texts called Vedas which were written down in the 1500–300 B.C. period by the priests of warlike and nomadic Aryans from Eastern Europe who conquered and settled in the Indus River Valley of present-day Pakistan. These texts in four parts (Samhitas, Brahmanas, Aranyakas, and Upanishads) express their early beliefs and practices (Rig Veda) as well as later changes that occurred as they interpreted and modified traditional sacrifices to the deities and speculated about the primary source of life and experience (Brahman). The Vedas are known as shruti (that which is heard) to distinguish from later literature, also authoritative to many, called smriti (that which is remembered). Examples of smriti include some or all of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata.

The Vedas give evidence of an enduring Brahman priestly class assisted by other ritualists who made offerings to deities who inhabited earth, sky, and deep space. Some of these deities continue today to be addressed in worship such as Agni and Soma. Vedic Rudra is known today as Siva who rules in the home or the temple and is exalted in either the home or the temple and is exalted. Popular deities such as Vishnu, Krishna, Rama, Shiva each have

Hindu, Hinduism

Karma is the belief that every act, thought, and attitude has its consequences for good or bad either in this life, the life to come, or both. This law is inexorable in that it affects all persons and cannot be set aside or its operation countered. Reincarnation and karma emerge as enduring notions for Hindus and are basic in revised forms in many other Indian religious communities such as Jains, Buddhists, and Sikhs.

Shastras. The Shastras are additional supplemental literature seen as authoritative though not all are universally recognized by Hindus. The epics of the Mahabharata and the Ramayana were probably composed some time at the end of the Vedic period and narrate myths and legends, some with possible historical footings. The Ramayana is a favorite for its story of Rama who seeks to recover his wife Sita from Ravana, the demon king of (Sri) Lanka. With the kindly help of the monkey deity Hanuman, Sita is rescued; the couple are reunited and serve as models of the ideal Hindu couple. The Mahabharata, larger than the Ramayana at well over 90,000 stanzas of 32 syllables each, contains the Bhagavad Gita (Song of God) whose impact on Hindu traditions is profound and, other than the Vedas, probably unequalled.

The Bhagavad Gita tells the story of relatives who find themselves in opposing armies on a battlefield in north India. The dilemma of the Pandava warrior, Arjuna, is similar to that of cousins in the American Civil War who faced one another across the firing line. Arjuna’s servant-cum-chariot driver reasons with him that it is required of a warrior to do his duty and leave the consequences aside. This reflects a widely held view, reinforced in later Hindu literature, that the way to liberation is to perform socially required acts without attachment to their merits and consequences. Karma in the Bhagavad Gita has as one of its notions the idea that acts done with detachment do not have bad effects. Arjuna is finally convinced he should do his duty but the text shifts the reader’s attention from the battle issue to a startling revelation that the chariot driver is in reality Krishna, the Supreme Lord and God of the universe. His message to Arjuna and the reader is that liberation (moksha) is possible by the grace of Krishna for those who worship him in self-surrender. Thus the Bhagavad Gita, which conjoins several religious themes, subordinates them all to the doctrine of bhakti (devoted surrender).

Bhakti. For most Hindus, bhakti (devotion or surrender to a personal deity) is a daily experience in either the home or the temple and is expressed as puja (worship, adoration) in song, prayer, flowers, incense, fruit, and money before a symbol or image of the deity. Popular deities such as Vishnu, Krishna, Rama, Shiva each have wives and mounts such as a bull (Shiva) to transport them. Stories of their lives and exploits are told in Puranas (Old Stories) which were written from A.D. 500–1500. Bhakti is considered of two kinds, perfect and imperfect. Perfect bhakti is when the devotee worships the deity selflessly and without ulterior motives. This is thought to be impossible without the aid of a guru (spiritual guide) who may himself be regarded as an avatar (descent) of the deity. Further, the grace of the deity is necessary for such pure devotion. Imperfect bhakti entails worship that is mixed with personal petitions and requests. Bhakti has inspired a rich body of music and hymns in the vernacular languages of India. Bhajans (hymns sings) and kirtans (musical performances) are an essential part of bhakti piety. Historic temples for major deities are found in such cities as Calcutta (Kali), Puri (Vishnu, Jagannath), Mathura (Krishna), and Madurai (Minakshi, Shiva). Deities have sometimes been combined into a single form and name as in the case of Trimurthi, which combines Vishnu, Shiva, and Brahma. Many deities have fascinating biographies and mythologies. Krishna is known in the Bhagavad Gita as Supreme Deity but in the Puranas as mischievous prankster and womanizer. Vishnu has ten avatars, including the Buddha and Krishna. Siva is known for his fierce demeanor against opponents as well as his generative powers symbolized by the lingam (stone phallic shaft). Shiva’s wife Parvati (also Durga, Uma, Kali) has her own following centering in a widely celebrated festival called Durga Puja. Many Hindus worship more than one of the many regional and pan-India deities with no sense of impropriety or contradiction since each has special qualities and appeal.

Hindu Religious Thought. While the alleged 330,000,000 gods of India defy easy classification and comprehensive study, Hindu thinkers have systematized in logical and defensible terms the meaning they derive from their religious literature. Thus, Hindu thinkers and their followers established unique positions, debated their merits with each other, and further competed with highly refined proposals of others such as Buddhists and Jains. There are many significant religious systems among which are Advaita Vedanta, Vishishtadvaita, Dvaita, Yoga, Carvaka.

Advaita Vedanta was proposed by Shankara (A.D. 788–820) to resolve unsystematic Upanishadic passages that affirmed views of both theism and monism. Advaita (non-dual) Vedanta is one of several Vedantic systems, each of which claims to authentically interpret the last book of the Vedas and to identify the goal toward which they point (Vedanta). Based upon one of the major themes of the Upanishads, Shankara regarded highest reality (Nirguna Brahman) as nondual, without attributes, and impersonal which, through maya (occult power) the universe was mysteriously created. The misinformed ignorantly (avidya) take Brahman as a personal deity (Isvara, Saguna Brahman) which is a useful position until one discovers highest reality. Shankara thus accommodates bhakti while pointing seekers beyond it to the higher goal of moksha (liberation) through an intuitive and unmediated apprehension of reality, thus ending samsara (the rounds of birth and death due to reincarnation). Moksha is the unitary experience by which the soul is made one with Brahman much as a drop of water is dropped into the ocean.

Vishishtadvaita (qualified non-dualism) was Ramanuja’s (A.D. 1017–1073) rejection of Advaita and constitutes a defense of bhakti since he refused to take Brahman as the soul of the world and the world as the body of Brahman. Liberation was possible by meditation and the grace of the deity, thus ending samsara. The soul, like fish in water, is enveloped in and totally surrounded by the deity but not identical to Brahman as in Shankara.

Dvaita (dualism) is the third of these above Vedantic positions and as proposed by Madhva (thirteenth century) takes the position that the correct synthesis of shruti and smriti is that highest reality (Vishnu, Narayana), the material world, and innumerable souls are all independent realities. Thus, the central problem of all Hindu thinkers which is to solve the relation between identity/the one and difference/the many is resolved by affirming a difference among five eternally distinct realities: Brahman and souls, Brahman and world, world and souls, souls and souls, and the finite objects of the world themselves. Brahman is thus absolutely independent though it sustains a relationship with other entities not as cause but as source since the qualities found in other entities in limited ways are found perfectly in Brahman. Souls at liberation remain distinct, contrary to Ramanuja who taught that they become indistinguishable in their purity. Madhva is unique in Hindu thought by teaching that heretics and sinners who reject his truth will suffer in hell eternally. The usual notion is that hell is not an irreversible state but given time and good karma one can escape it through the operation of samsara.

Yoga is based upon the Yoga Sutra of Patanjali (second century B.C.). Though the meditative techniques and postures of yoga have in the past and present been adopted to reach very diverse religious goals, Patanjali used it to achieve a distinct religious aim: distinguish within oneself pu-Hindu New Religious Movements. In nineteenth-century India a variety of forces led to the emergence of new Hindu groups. The Brahma Samaj (Theistic Society, 1828), a Hindu social and religious reform movement, sought to end offensive Hindu practices such as widow burning (sati) and temple prostitution (deva-dasi). The Arya Samaj (Society of Aryans), established in 1875, supported some reforms but reacted defensively by claiming the superiority of the Hindu tradition. The Ramakrishna Mission seeks today to advance Hindu social and religious concerns through its many chapters located throughout the subcontinent and the world. The Vedanta Society, now found in many cities of Europe and America, traces its origins to the charismatic efforts of Swami Vivekananda, who effectively represented Hindu beliefs at the 1893 Chicago World’s Parliament of Religions.

With the countercultural movement of the 1960s Hindu beliefs, practices, and groups began further advances in the Western world. Strengthened by increased immigration from India, Hindu temples and organizations flourished. Swami Bhaktivendanta Prabupada began to attract celebrities in New York City in the 1960s, leading to the establishing of the Krishna Consciousness Society based upon the teachings of the Bhagavad Gita. Transcendental meditation, with origins in the Hindu thought of Maharishi Maheshyogi, sought to mainstream meditation and mantra through marketing the “science of creative intelligence.” Other gurus such as Bhagavan Rajneesh and Sai Baba gained followers. Hindu texts, meditative practices, and rituals have been a deep well from which diverse New Age thought has drawn. However, as seen by many Hindus on the subcontinent itself, these represent less than an authentic continuation of Hindu traditions. But Hindu thought has a history of adapting to the changing religious landscape, which is precisely what is observed at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

service came via a letter from the Moravian board asking that she go to Greenland to wed a young missionary who was seeking a godly wife. Having determined that this was the call of God, she took to the stormy and ice-laden seas in March 1895, to meet her future husband.

Arriving with only the clothing on her back, Hansina met and married Johannes Hinz. Over the next year, Hansina served her husband and the people with a generous and loving heart. This service was short-lived, however, as she fell ill after the birth of their daughter and died eight days later. While her contribution was limited in duration, Hansina’s life is a testimony of “that right missionary stuff” that relies completely on the grace and strength of God and goes where he wills in order to win victories in the most remote and seemingly unhopeful fields.

WENDY S. LARSON

Hispanic Evangelical Theologies. The Iberian Christianization of the Americas after 1492 was carried on as part of the military conquest, within the frame of a political theology inherited from the medieval schools and the COUNTER-REFORMATION. Missionaries allied with secular power were able to coerce the people they were evangelizing instead of persuading them. A feudal social order, justified by theological discourse, was transplanted to the Americas. So the first original theological work in the continent was the critical missiology of the Dominican Bartolomé de las Casas and of Jesuit José de Acosta. The latter’s book De procuranda indorum salute is a theological reflection about the best way to evangelize the indigenous peoples.

After independence from Spain (1810–24) Protestant missionaries who carried out Bible distribution and evangelism through the nineteenth century had an evangelical pietist outlook. Their basic Protestant tenets were strengthened by the debate with established Catholicism and, because of the declining Christendom situation in which they worked, Christology became the first privileged theme demanded by their missionary theology. The work of four generations may be recognized.

First were the Pioneers, basically missionar-ies. A lasting contribution because of his contextual frame and evangelistic thrust came from Scottish Presbyterian John Alexander Mackay (1889–1983). A missiological exploration around the theme of Christ in Latin American culture was the central concern in his classic work The Other Spanish Christ (1933). He analyzed the popular images of Jesus as either an infant child in his big mother’s arms or a bleeding victim and concluded that it was basically a docetic Christ. Mackay’s missiological agenda was designed as an evangelical response at the top of which was Christology, an effort to proclaim the Jesus of the Gospels in a contextual way, and to stress Jesus as the resurrected Lord and the consequent ethical demands of faith in him.

Next was the generation of Founders, Latin American evangelical thinkers such as Gonzalo Báez-Camargo and Alberto Rembao whose works were journalistic and homiletical in style but embodied a rich biblical Christology, emphasizing the humanity of Jesus Christ.

After World War II a new generation of Ecumenical Thinkers developed. They participated in the growing ecumenical movement and were influenced by European and American mainline Protestantism. Men such as Emilio Castro, Mortimer Arias, and José Míquez Bonino were influenced theologically by Karl Barth but never lost the evangelical thrust received from previous generations. Their reflection focused on the mission of the church in a changing continent. When liberation theologies developed within Catholicism, these theologians adopted it with a measure of criticism but they did not make any specific Protestant contribution to the debate. Their influence was limited to mainline churches, the smaller and less evangelistic within Latin American Protestantism.

Within the social tensions of the 1960s, Protestantism in Latin America became sharply divided and within the more conservative camp rose a new generation of Evangelical Thinkers. Their work developed within the frame of evangelistic and missionary conferences such as the Bogota Congress on Evangelism (CLADE I, 1969) in which the first steps were taken to found the Latin American Theological Fraternity in 1970. Thus theological work has had a basically missiological agenda.

Evangelical theologians worked first in a critical task, which included an ongoing debate with the liberation theologies that dominated the theological scenario in the 1970s and 1980s. A systematic critical approach was developed by Andrew Kirk, Emilio A. Núñez, and Samuel Escobar. Daniel Schipani gathered several other contributions in a collective volume from an Anabaptist perspective. What is distinctive of the evangelical stance is an emphasis on the primacy of biblical authority in theological method and the demand to keep evangelistic activity at the center of the mission of the church. Their critical task has also included a consistent debate against the theological assumptions of Church Growth missiology (see also CHURCH GROWTH MOVEMENT).

The constructive task of this generation has been the development of a theology of mission that expresses the dynamic reality and the missionary thrust of the Latin American Evangelical churches, in order to provide a solid biblical basis for new contextual patterns of evangelism and discipleship. They have worked on the assumption that commitment to biblical authority is more than paying lip service to it. Rather it requires a fresh exploration into the depths of the biblical text, with the questions raised by the Latin American context, not limiting itself to the area of soteriology but to fresh explorations into a biblically based social ethics.

An example of this twofold approach is found in the work of Rene Padilla that offers a missiological reflection based on detailed exegesis of the biblical text. He takes liberation themes but works with them, incorporating the missionary thrust and the evangelistic passion of the evangelical perspective. Valdir Steuernagel works in the development of a more systematic missiology. Orlando Costas' approach was less polemical against liberation theologies, and more pragmatic about Church Growth missiology, in a continuous dialogue with missiology and ecclesiology from ecumenical theologians. Along similar lines Guillermo Cook has worked in ecclesiology. A growing number of Pentecostal theologians such as Norberto Saracco and Ricardo Gondim are contributing to the ongoing reflection.

The themes and style of this Latin American evangelical theology are related to the daily pastoral and evangelistic practice of these thinkers more than to the demands of academic debate in the European or North American settings. The urgency of the questions is also determined by the need for a radical departure from the Constantinian pattern of a missionary enterprise that relied on military power, economic conquest, and technological prowess, and in its stead a fresh look at the biblical pattern for mission. Their search coincided with the rediscovery of the Johannine pattern for mission to which John Stott contributed since the World Congress on Evangelism (Berlin Congress 1966). This explains also the contribution of Latin Americans such as Samuel Escobar and René Padilla to the theological work of the Lausanne Movement after 1974. Other foci for their global dialogue have been the Theological Commission of the World Evangelical Fellowship and the International Fellowship of Evangelical Mission Theologians (INFEMIT). In the case of Latin America most of the contributors to this dialogue have come from the Latin American Theological Fraternity. A new and important expression of Hispanic theologies comes from the Hispanic minority in the United States. Outstanding theological work has been done in historical theology by Justo L. González and in spirituality and social ethics by Eldin Villafláne.

History of Missions

History of Missions. The Apostolic Age. The story of how the followers of a first-century itinerant Jewish preacher spread his message of God's kingdom to the entire world is amazing. The initial conquest of the Roman Empire and the subsequent planting of the Christian church around the earth were the result of the witness of countless believers. A great number of these missionaries are known, but there is an even greater number whose names are unknown to subsequent generations. This lack of a complete history forces us to recognize that God empowered ordinary believers to carry out the missionary task. While Jesus limited his ministry to the areas of Judea and Galilee, with occasional forays into non-Jewish territory, he gave his disciples specific instructions to be his witnesses in “Jerusalem, Judea, Samaria and even to the remotest parts of the earth” (Acts 1:8). The Acts of the Apostles is organized along that plan, with the gospel emanating in an ever-increasing circle. With the coming of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, the gospel was preached in Jerusalem to Jews and proselytes “from every nation under heaven” (Acts 2:5).

The first persecution that dispersed the church after the stoning of Stephen (Acts 7) resulted in the scattering of the believers throughout Judea, Samaria (Acts 8:1), Phoenicia, Cyprois, and Antioch (Acts 11:19–20). It is noteworthy that the movement commanded by Jesus to disciple the nations only commenced with persecution. This theme of God’s using what seemed like tragic events to propagate the gospel is repeated throughout history. The bringing of the gospel to the Samaritans bridged two major hurdles, religion and culture. The first recorded preaching to Gentiles is Peter’s interaction with Cornelius (Acts 10). Some of those who were scattered because of persecution went to Antioch, where they shared the message with Gentiles (Acts 11:20). Since these Gentile converts were not proselytes, it is not strange that the disciples were first called Christians in Antioch to distinguish them from a sect of Judaism (Acts 11:26). The missionary journeys of Paul originated from this church, the Holy Spirit directing the sending of Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13:2ff.), indicating where Paul and his team were forbidden to preach the gospel (Acts 16:6–10). At the end of Acts Paul is in Rome preaching Christ unhindered while awaiting the disposition of the charges against him.

The early expansion of the church is a paradigm for understanding how the gospel traveled around the world in the succeeding two millennia. Under the Pax Romana the gospel spread rapidly in the major centers of commerce and government. Even during Jesus’ ministry, the gospel had penetrated government circles (cf. Luke 8:3, where Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod’s steward, is numbered among the circle that traveled with Jesus). Paul can write from Rome that the reason for his imprisonment is well known in the palace (Phil. 1:13). This interest in Christianity by the ruling authorities is indicative of the interaction that the gospel would have throughout history. Up through the twentieth century, the conversion of a ruler often meant gaining at least the nominal adherence of that ruler’s subjects to Christianity. The close connection between the ruler’s religion and the subjects’ adherence is particularly pronounced through to the sixteenth century in Europe, and it is always common in close knit societies.

The interaction of the gospel with commerce is something that is seen in Acts and has been repeated in various periods of missionary work. At times the gospel was bad for business (Acts 16:19; 19:23ff.). The commercial motive drove the sponsors of both Catholic and Protestant missions. Another theme that is repeated is the interaction of the gospel with other religions. The main rivals of the Christian faith in the first century were the mystery religions; elements of these religions addressed similar questions answered in the Christian gospel. There was a spiritual hunger that the gospel could meet. However, the pagan religions did not give in easily, necessitating Power Encounters such as those in Acts (e.g. 6:8; 8:9ff.; 13:6ff.; 16:16ff.)

The First 500 Years. As we do not know the identity of the disciples who first preached to the Gentiles in Antioch, so we do not know who first preached the gospel in Rome. But Paul found believers there to welcome him. The earliest converts were most likely from the lower classes. However, during the persecution under the emperor Domitian (c. A.D. 96), a cousin of the emperor was put to death and his wife banished because of “sacrilege,” the usual charge against Christians. Some take this as an indication of the penetration of the gospel to the highest reaches of society. At the end of the first century and throughout the second century, severe persecutions arose against Christians because of their refusal to pay homage to the Roman gods. Their loyalty to Christ alone as God earned them the name atheists since they would not acknowledge the Roman pantheon of deities. Justin Martyr (c. 100–165) was one of the early apologists who sought to defend the Christian faith against misrepresentation. By the year 251, there is an estimate of the Christian population in Rome numbering thirty thousand. The persecution did not eliminate the church, as the clear testimony of the martyrs often bore eloquent witness to the reality of the Christian faith. Because of their courageous witness, Tertullian (c. 160/70–c. 215/20) could write that the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church (see also Martyrdom).

The gospel entered Egypt at an early date, though again the original missionaries are not known. Alexandria became a major Christian center with teachers like Clement (c. 150–215) and Origen (c. 185–254) holding firmly to the biblical revelation but also recognizing Greek philosophy as a preparation for the gospel. This is the first example of discerning the seeds of a pre-gospel understanding in a people’s culture as a forerunner to evangelization. The results of both the Alexandrian model and applications of the same principle throughout the history of the church have been debated. The danger of Syncretism is ever present in such formulations.

Christianity spread quickly across Roman North Africa among the educated colonial classes. These were the first Latin-speaking churches in the world. There was some use of the Punic language, brought by the Phoenicians who had colonized Carthage, but it is not clear that the church ever penetrated to the Berber vernacular of the villages and nomads. By not using the heart language of the peasant population, it was assured that these groups would turn to Islam in the seventh century. The major lesson learned from the experience in North Africa is that the church needs to penetrate the common language of the people. While the church in this area produced outstanding theologians, including the key figure in Western theology, Augustine of Hippo, the theological formulations did not stop the rapid spread of Islam.

The Donatist controversy, which revolved around what was to be the church’s stand toward those who deny the faith during times of persecution, further weakened the church of North Africa. Nevertheless, from a missiological perspective it is sobering to note the absence of Christianity today in what had been an influential center.

The earliest Christian kingdom was Edessa, which was one of the sources for the spread of the gospel in Armenia, the second Christian kingdom. Tradition tells of the visit of the apostle Thomas to India. Such a voyage would have been possible; Roman coins found in India indicate a trading pattern. The Mar Thoma (St. Thomas) Christians regard their origin in the ministry of the apostle. The church certainly was in India in the first centuries of the Christian era.

The conversion of the emperor Constantine dramatically changed the picture for the developing church. From a persecuted minority, the church became legal and then socially acceptable. The peace of the church from external persecution provided the opportunity to solve its theological disputes, a process in which the emperors from Constantine on took part. The trinitarian and christological disputes gave rise to what are sometimes called the Oriental Eastern churches, which adopted a doctrinal stance different from the Chalcedonian formulas. These churches were missionary centers, with the Nestorian Mission movement reaching into China.

Even before Christianity became recognized as the official religion of the Roman Empire (A.D. 333), the gospel had penetrated the western and northern provinces of the empire. Irenaeus (c. 130–c. 200), bishop of Lyons, writes of using Celtic as well as Latin in the church, which signifies the presence of the church among the less educated population. When Christianity became the religion of the empire, more direct assaults could be made against paganism. However, the gain in legitimacy was at the expense of an increasing nominalism. Monasticism was in part a reaction to the lower standard of Christianity.

Patrick (c. 389–461) was captured by Irish raiders from his home in England as a youth. After six years, he escaped and entered a monastery in France. Persistent visions led him to return to Ireland at the age of forty-three, where he labored until his death. When he began his work, Ireland was nearly entirely pagan but by the time he died, Ireland was largely Christian. Later Celtic monks would be responsible for evangelizing large parts of Europe (see Celtic Missionary Movement).

One of the turning points in Europe was the baptism of Clovis, king of the Franks. He had married (in 493) a Christian princess, Clotilda of Burgundy, who did her best to convert him. Clovis vowed if the Christian God would help him defeat his enemies, the Alemanni, he would convert. On Christmas day 496 he was baptized along with three thousand of his soldiers. Other rulers had converted, but Clovis was the first to accept, to the extent he understood, the Catholic faith instead of Arianism.

The Dark Ages, 500–1000. The classical world was passing. The barbarians pouring out of the Central European plain overran western Europe. The Vikings raided as far as Constantinople and terrorized Britain and northern Europe. Centers of learning were special targets because they were wealthy, yet even the horrors of these encounters presented an opportunity for the gospel.

These five hundred years were the time when the church attempted to tame the barbarians and make their conversion more than nominal. The three key factors in this period were royal patronage, martyrdom, and monasticism (see also Monastic Movement).

Another challenge to Christendom came from Arabia, where Muhammad gathered his followers and provided them with a sense of unity and mission. They swept over Christian lands and within a hundred years of Muhammad's death, all of North Africa and most of Spain, as well as Palestine and Syria were under Muslim control. Checked for the first time by Charlemagne at Tours in 732, Muslims still sacked Rome in 846. Sicily was a Muslim country by 902. Finally in 1453, Constantinople itself fell to the Muslims, ending over a thousand years of primacy in Christendom.

Yet in spite of perilous times, the church continued to be found in new places. Irish missionaries established monasteries on the rugged Scottish coast and evangelized Britain. At the same time a mission was sent by Pope Gregory the Great to the Anglo-Saxons who had supplanted the native Britons. In 596 Augustine and a party of monks made their way to Kent, where Ethelbert (c. 560–616) was king. He had married Bertha, a Christian princess from Gaul and by the end of the year, Ethelbert and ten thousand Saxons were baptized. The Celtic missionaries had slightly different customs which had been preserved in their more isolated settings. While these differences seem insignificant to modern readers, it raised the question that reappears in other ages: Who has the right to resolve differences? In the end Rome prevailed, which set a pattern that endured until the Reformation.

The advance of the church was not without compromise, exemplified by Pope Gregory, who advised his missionaries to reconsecrate the pagan temples, destroying only the idols in them. Likewise, pagan festivals were remade into Christian holy days and traditional religious customs baptized as Christian symbols. The origins of the Christmas tree, the Yule log, and even the traditional date of Christmas are examples of this Accommodation.

There were Power Encounters between the missionaries and the indigenous people. Boniface, apostle to the Germans, felled the sacred oak of Thor in Hesse. The gospel made a slow, steady advance through Europe, though it is doubtful that the pagan influences were ever fully rooted out, surfacing again in folk stories of trolls and fairies, with syncretism affecting church life. Some peoples were more resistant to the gospel and many monks were martyred.

The schism between the church in the eastern and western halves of the Roman Empire was not official until the bull of excommunication of 1054 and even then it was only the hierarchies that were excommunicated. However, the drift can be detected earlier in the different theological foci that were developing. The importance for missions is that the eastern church did not insist on the same linguistic unity that the western church did. It is significant that Ulphilas (c. 311–383), the missionary bishop who translated the Bible for the Goths, was consecrated at Constantinople, though his Arianism keeps him from being claimed by the Eastern Orthodox. In the eighth century when Cyril and Methodius undertook missionary work among the Slavic-speaking Moravians, they were opposed by missionaries connected with the pope because of their translation work. The three principles that these two brothers from Thessalonica put forward were the use of the vernacular in worship, the employment of indigenous clergy, and the eventual selfhood of the church. They traveled to Rome, where they were able to celebrate the Slavonic liturgy in the pope’s presence. However, when Methodius returned to Moravia as a bishop, he faced opposition and eventual expulsion. Their disciples spread throughout the Slavic lands, giving rise to the circumstances that led to the conversion of Vladimir in 988. Prince Vladimir, who was descended from Vikings, used his authority to force his followers into the fold of the church, thereby setting one of the patterns for successive rulers of Russia. In spite of its beginnings, the church in Russia has endured for more than a thousand years, at times under repressive rulers who tried to control it.

The Medieval World, 1000–1500. As the Christian church entered its second millennium, it was a mainly European phenomenon. Vestiges of the ancient churches existed in Muslim-controlled territory, the church had a foothold in India and Ethiopia, but the Nestorian work in China had been suppressed. The Scandinavian peoples were initially resistant to the gospel, but by the late twelfth century, the church had been planted in the Nordic lands. The paganism that had been the religion was hard to suppress and still carries on in Nordic folklore.

The Crusades are perhaps the least likely vehicle for missionary expansion in the history of the church. Conceived as an attempt to wrest control of the Holy Land from the Muslims, the military adventures spanned two hundred years and resulted in thousands of lives lost. The attempt to use force to convert unbelievers, while it had a seven-hundred-year tradition in the church, was a failure, in part because the Crusaders found it easier to kill the infidels than reason with them. The attempts to witness to Muslims by the humble Francis of Assisi (1181–1226) and the scholarly Raymond Lull (c. 1235–1315) are bright spots on an otherwise bleak landscape. Lull was martyred in North Africa. Francis managed to preach before the Sultan of Egypt, who is reported to have said, “If I meet any more Christians like you I will become one myself.” The lasting legacy of the Crusades is enmity between Muslims and Christians that exists to this day.

The rumored existence of a Christian kingdom to the east of the Muslim-dominated lands prompted speculation. Several expeditions were undertaken to the Mongols, with varying degrees of success. The Christian kingdom was not found. However, the Mongols who ruled Central Asia threatened the Muslim Empire, capturing and destroying Baghdad in 1258 and reaching Damascus two years later. The Nestorian church enjoyed a favorable position under the Mongols it had not known before. But in the end the Mongols came under the Muslim culture and the opportunity was lost to bring them into the realm of the church.

The Age of Discovery, 1500–1600. The Crusades fueled a desire to reach the East by circumventing the lands under Muslim control. Voyages of exploration were undertaken to reach the East Indies to secure a trade route for the spices of the East and to attempt to find allies in the continuing crusade against Islam. Prince Henry the Navigator (1394–1460) had sent crews down the coast of Africa. Christopher Columbus tried to reach the East by sailing west and desired to bring the benefits of Christianity as well as securing lands and riches for his patron, Isabella, queen of Spain. In 1493, to settle a dispute between two Catholic sovereigns, the pope divided the world between the nations of Spain and Portugal with the commission to bring the true faith to the lands that they conquered. All the lands west of the line were to belong to Spain, those to the east to Portugal. When the line was moved to the west a year later, Brazil came under Portugal. The conquest of the New World was accomplished with considerable violence by the conquistadors. Some of the missionaries to Spanish America became vocal champions of the Indians. The best known was Bartholomew de Las Casas (1474–1566), who petitioned the Spanish throne for fair treatment of the Indians. Pedro Claver (1581–1654), a Jesuit, devoted his life to ministering to the African slaves brought to work the plantations. It is said he baptized over three hundred thousand slaves.

When in 1534 Ignatius of Loyola gathered with his six friends to form the Jesuits, a potent missionary force was launched. This new order was subject to the pope and devoted to the re-conversion of heretics and the conversion of pagans to the Catholic faith. By 1640 Jesuit missionaries had been in most of the then known world. One of the original six, Francis Xavier, was not only to become a famous Catholic missionary, but arguably one of the greatest missionaries of all time. Xavier first worked among the illiterate fisherfolk in India, but news of the potential for evangelism in Japan led him there. One of Xavier’s lasting contributions to missionary thinking arose out his experience in Japan. His previous ministry among low-caste people did not prepare him for the advanced culture and traditions of the Japanese. Rather than tear down everything in the culture, Xavier sought to refine and re-create elements of tradition. In some ways, this is an extension of the policy carried out during the evangelization of Europe when pagan customs were incorporated into the faith. It was to have great consequences and some controversy in the missionaries who followed Xavier.

Another great innovative Catholic missionary was Matteo Ricci (1552–1610), who labored in China. An expert clockmaker, he presented clocks as gifts to the Chinese and when the clocks needed to be wound he used the opportunity to preach. He dressed as a Confucian scholar and allowed his converts to observe the rites that honored Confucius and the family. Ricci’s principle was to make the gospel as acceptable as possible to the Chinese and, judging by the number of converts of high rank, he was successful. The question of accommodation, however easy to enunciate, is extremely difficult to practice without compromising the gospel.

Roman Catholic Missions, 1600 to 1800. The advantages of the Padroado, which divided the world between Spain and Portugal, meant that the missionaries could count on support, if not overly generous, from the colonial authorities. But it broke down because Portugal, whose population at the time was around one million, could not fulfill the missionary mandate. Thus in 1622 Pope Gregory XV established the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith to assume the missionary task. Francesco Ingoli, the first head of the Propaganda, was a remarkable missionary statesman. Ingoli pushed for the rapid development of indigenous clergy and the freeing of Christian work from colonial attachments. In 1659 the Propaganda issued instructions to the vicars apostolic (heads of missionary regions) not to attempt to change customs of indigenous peoples unless these practices were distinctly non-Christian. “What could be more absurd than to transport France, Spain, Italy or some other European country to China.”

In India Robert de Nobili (1577–1656) followed the methods of Ricci by adapting his method of presentation to Brahman customs. While he gained some success with the upper castes, he faced opposition from other European missionaries who accused him of theological compromise. It was only when the lower castes were the target of missionary work that what might be termed a Mass Movement occurred.

With the decline of Spain and Portugal, France became the great Roman Catholic missionary source. French expeditions had priests with them who journeyed with the explorers into the interior of North America, establishing missions among the indigenous populations. In France a nun of the Ursuline order, Mary of the Incarnation, had a vision of missionary work in Canada. Arriving in Montreal in 1639, the first six members of the order were the forerunners of the considerable involvement of nuns in missionary work. In Paraguay Jesuits established self-sufficient villages or reductiones in which they gathered their Indian converts. These were places of safety to protect the converts from hostile tribes and the colonial slave traders. While the church was the center of the community life, from the standpoint of expansion of the church, the work among the Guarani was a failure because while the Jesuits conducted their mission for more than a century, they brought no candidate for the priesthood forward from the Indians.

The second half of the eighteenth century saw the eclipse of Roman Catholic missions. Among the reasons for this change was the evolving political situation with Protestant nations becoming world powers. In some countries a reaction against Christianity set in and many missionaries were martyred. The final blow was the suppression of the Jesuits by Pope Clement XIV in 1773. The loss of their missionaries and influence was at that time irreplaceable.

Eastern Orthodox Missions. After the Great Schism (1054), the histories of the Western and Eastern branches of Christianity drifted even farther apart. The Tartar invasion was the crucible that forged the Russian nation but it also hindered evangelism. However, there were notable missionary heroes of the Orthodox Church, all of whom shared the same concern for the Bible and liturgy to be in the language of the people. Stephen of Perm (1340–96) evangelized the Zyrians, reducing their language to writing. Makarius Gloukarev (1792–1847) worked in the Altai Mountains, incorporating education and health care into his missionary work and being one of the first to see the ministry of women. Nicholas Illiminiski (1821–91) was a linguist who became a brilliant missionary strategist. While he was never a missionary in the traditional sense, he discovered that the use of Arabic script was reinforcing the Tartars’ allegiance to Islam rather than instructing them in Christianity. Illiminiski reduced the Tartar language to writing using Russian script and promoted the use of vernacular languages to teach Christian truth. Innocent Veniaminov (1797–1878) answered the missionary call to Russian Alaska, planting the church among the Aleuts. He also adopted the use of the vernacular and was proficient in navigating his kayak around his island parish. After his wife died, he became a monk, taking the name Innocent, and was made a missionary bishop for the vast territory of Siberia. He ended his service to the Church by occupying the highest office, metropolitan of Moscow. One of the missionaries that he influenced was Nicolaus Kasatkin (1836–1912), who pioneered the Orthodox Church in Japan. Kasatkin's method of making each believer responsible to teach another person mobilized the Japanese.

The common elements in these examples were the use of the vernacular and the creation of an indigenous clergy.

The Beginnings of Protestant Missions. At the time of the Protestant Reformation, the countries that embraced the Reformation were not the world’s dominant powers. Furthermore, internal squabbles as well as pressure from the Catholic Church made missions impossible. The response of the Reformers was to teach that the obligation for missionary work had ceased with the apostles (see also REFORMATION AND MISSION). There were notable exceptions, such as Justinian von Welz (1621–68), who advocated missionary work. When Holland became a world power, chaplains were sent to its colonies. However, any missionary effort was to come after their primary task of meeting the needs of the colonists.

The discovery of America prompted a new interest in reaching the Native American population. The charter of the colony of Massachusetts included the statement that the principal purpose of the plantation was to convert the natives to Christianity. The first successful attempt was by John Eliot (1604–90), who learned the language of the Pequots and organized his converts into “Praying Towns” so they could live Christian lives. He is remembered for his Bible translation into the Indian language. David Brainerd (1718–47), a close friend of Jonathan Edwards, also labored among the Indians. When he died, exhausted by his labors, he left behind a diary that influenced both William Carey and Henry Martyn.

The European missionary enterprise had its start in the movement known as Pietism. Pia Desideria written by Philip Jakob Spener outlined the necessity for personal conversion, holiness, fellowship, and witness. As the movement grew in the churches, King Frederick IV of Denmark decided that he should send missionaries to his tiny colony of Tranquebar. He turned to the center of Pietism in Halle in Germany for recruits. August Hermann Francke (1663–1727) selected two men, Bartholomaeus Ziegenbalg and Henry Plüschau, who arrived on the field in 1706, the first non-Roman Catholic missionaries in India. Ziegenbalg (1683–1719), with no precedence to guide him, unerringly made the right choices and the best of missionary work followed the principles he laid down for Bible translation, an accurate understanding of local culture, definite and personal conversion, and development of indigenous clergy as quickly as possible. He saw the potential of using education to spread the gospel because Christians must be able to read the Word of God.

Another missionary leader influenced by Pietism was Count Nicolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf, who had welcomed the Unity of the Brethren who had been exiled from Moravia to settle on his estate at Herrnhut. Hearing that the Danish mission to Greenland would likely be abandoned, he proposed that the Moravians undertake the mission. August 21, 1732, is celebrated by the Moravian churches as the beginning of their missionary work. In addition to the work in Greenland, the Moravians sent missionaries to the West Indies and Surinam (see also MORAVIAN MISSIONS).

The Great Century of Missions. The explosion in Protestant missions coincided with the European mastery of speed in the form of the steam engine. As the European powers scrambled to carve out colonies in the rest of the world, so missionary interest in the spiritual welfare of these peoples increased. The voyages of Captain Cook stirred William Carey, whose An Enquiry into the Obligations of Christians to use Means for the Conversion of Heathens (1792) was a stirring call to missions. Carey challenged the generally accepted theological notions that the missionary mandate had ceased. Carey (1761–1834) was a shoemaker and schoolteacher. A self-taught man, he is sometimes referred to as “the father of modern missions.” This is not accurate, as Carey knew about the work of previous missionaries. However, Carey’s importance was as a forerunner in the English-speaking world which has produced in the time since Carey the overwhelming majority of Protestant missionaries. Landing in India in 1793, he worked as a plantation manager for five years. With the arrival of more Baptist missionaries in 1799, the missionary work progressed.

Carey was persuaded to join Joshua Marshman (1768–1837), a schoolteacher, and William Ward (1769–1823), a printer, in establishing a station at the Danish enclave of Serampore, sixteen miles from Calcutta. They established a Baptist church and engaged in preaching tours. Their great work... was in translation. In thirty years, six whole Bibles, twenty-three complete New Testaments, as well as Bible portions in ten additional languages were printed. They were students of Indian culture, with Ward publishing a book on Hindu culture in 1811.

While the Serampore Trio had education as one of their goals, it was Alexander Duff (1806–78) who opened the first English-speaking institution of higher education in India. Duff’s aims were both educational and evangelistic and while he only saw thirty-three converts in eighteen years, these were solid conversions. Duff’s methods were widely copied in other areas.

Adoniram Judson (1788–1850) was the pioneer in Burma (Myanmar). Ann Hazeltine Judson (1789–1826) was one of the first missionary heroines, literally keeping her husband alive during his captivity in the Anglo-Burmese war. Judson’s work lived on in his translation of the Bible into Burmese. But a greater legacy was to be found in one of his converts, Ko Tha Byu, who brought the gospel to his own Karen people. The Karens had a tradition of a Creator God whom they had displeased because of their sin. The gospel told them of a Savior who paid the price of their sin. A mass movement occurred among the Karens.

By no means the first missionary to Africa, David Livingstone (1813–73) is known for his explorations and opposition to the slavery. Son-in-law to Robert Moffat (1795–1883), who served for forty-eight years among the Tswana people of Southern Africa, Livingstone was not content to stay in one place. Beckoned on by “the smoke of a thousand villages” that had never heard the gospel, he explored the interior. It was his conviction that only as Africa became Christian and developed economically could the horrors of the slave trade be stopped.

Christianity’s entrance into China was with the accompaniment of commercial interests. The first Protestant missionary in China was Robert Morrison (1782–1834). He arrived when it was illegal for missionaries to preach the gospel and was compelled to live in hiding. However, his fluency in Chinese was so great that he became a translator for the East India Company. The trade in tea was causing an imbalance of payments for the British as the Chinese demanded silver for their tea. The answer for the British, who controlled the areas that produced opium, was to force China to allow trade in the narcotic. Two opium wars opened China to trade and allowed the residence of foreigners in China and transferred Hong Kong to Britain. Karl F. A. Gutzlaff (1803–51) envisioned a grand strategy for evangelizing the interior of China by employing native agents as colporteurs (see Colportage) and evangelists. Unfortunately, his agents were not always trustworthy and did not carry out the missionary work for which they were paid. However, Gütznonmissionary origin. Their doctrines are typically a mixture of traditional African cultures and the biblical revelation. These indigenized forms of Christianity engaged the concerns of the people and provided an answer to a population transitioning to the pressures of the modern world (see AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCH MOVEMENT).

The twentieth century was also marked by a worldwide charismatic phenomenon, that grew out of the Holiness movement. This renewal, which resulted in the formation of Pentecostal denominations, provided a fresh impetus for mission work. The outbreak of charismatic activity in the older traditional denominations has prompted a new interest in spreading a gospel of faith deeply influenced by the writings of ROLAND HAVENS to be part of the first Church Growth movement. Hodges' name is synonymous with missiology done from a Pentecostal perspective. His classic work, The Indigenous Church, published in 1953, was the first booklength volume on missiology published by a Pentecostal.

Hodges received missionary appointment as an Assemblies of God missionary in 1935. He spent his missionary career in Central America working primarily in Nicaragua and El Salvador. Hodges' work. He edited the findings of that commission, published as Re-thinking Missions (1932), and wrote the chapter on "General Principles." This chapter proved quite controversial because Hocking wrote that every religion contains a germ of religious truth and that world religions and Christianity should stimulate each other in religious growth.

Hocking's views prompted Hendrik Kraemer to write The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World in rebuttal. In later years Hocking tried to clarify his views on the relationship of Christianity to world religions in his books, Living Religions and a World Faith (1940) and The Coming World Civilization (1956). In these books he stated that he believed Christianity was the best suited to be the world religion.

In these books he stated that he believed Christianity was the best suited to be the world religion.

father served as a missionary. At the age of eighteen, he attended missionary training school in Oegstgeest in the Netherlands followed by doctoral studies at the State University of Utrecht (1936–41). His goals of finishing his dissertation and serving as a missionary in Indonesia were interrupted by World War II. In 1940, he married and, though appointed as a missionary, had to wait out the war to travel to his assignment. In the meantime, he served the Dutch resistance movement. In 1945 he arrived in Indonesia, but, to his lasting disappointment, ill health forced his return to Holland in 1946.

Hoekenjijk is remembered as an ecumenical theologian who made proposals with a secularizing focus in the 1950s and 1960s. He opposed centering our view of God’s work in the world through the church (“ecclesiocentrism” or “church-ism”), instead postulating that we should focus on the secular world as the place of God’s action. He did this by calling for a shift in focus from the church to a world in need of SHALOM. He did not think that the church was unimportant, but rather that it was only an instrument of God instead of the focus of God’s attention.

Holiness. In Scripture, the term “holiness” most commonly derives from the Hebrew word qadash or the Greek word hagios. The issue of holiness, however, must begin with understanding the holy God who determines the standard for holiness. The concept of holiness is to be developed via the self-revelation of God’s character and nature (see DIVINE ATTRIBUTES OF GOD). In conveying the idea of holiness in missions, it must be supposed that some cultures may not think of moral and ethical issues by the norms assumed by the missionary (see ETHICS) and therefore the concept of holiness must be introduced by understanding and imitating the holiness of God. It is for this reason Peter reminds the church of the same responsibility which Israel had, that is, all of God’s people are to be like God in holiness: “You shall be holy for I am holy” (1 Peter 1:16; Lev. 11:44).

In the New Testament, the Greek hagios occurs more than 200 times and has as its basic meaning “separation.” A cognate word, hagiazó, used 25 times in the New Testament, often means to purify or to cleanse. This can be seen in the Old Testament qadash as well. Israel is told to be holy because God is holy, and they were therefore to separate from the practices and attitudes of the Canaanite people around them. Thus it must be assumed that the basic concept behind holiness is separation from those things which God has determined to be impure or those things which God has separated out for his own use. In Scripture, a great variety of items can be holy: cities (Matt. 4:5); ground (Acts 7:33); buildings (1 Kings 8:6–11); created beings (Mark 8:38); humans (2 Peter 1:32); the law (Rom. 7:12); and bodies of believers (Rom. 12:1). It would appear that any object, place, person, or act can be holy when used in the purpose of God.

Holiness is also a quality of character. It implies a disposition and attitude toward those things consistent with the nature of God. Believers are commanded to be holy like God himself (1 Peter 1:15) and therefore holiness is the norm for standard of conduct. Holiness, however, must never be confused with religiousness or self-righteousness.

In mission, the focus on holiness has two equally significant dimensions. On the one hand, missionaries must protect themselves from impurities which will affect the way they are seen by the people who are being reached. Since the missionaries represent God to the people to whom they are ministering, lifestyle and attitude are to be compatible with God. This may require special sensitivity toward particularly offensive practices in each culture.

A significant danger for missionaries is that one must be careful that the holiness presented is according to God’s definition and character and not according to one’s own culturally conditioned assumptions (see GUILT). Jesus shocked his generation by being a “friend of sinners” (Matt. 11:19). This judgment against him was based upon culturally defined religious values and not by God’s heart and will for lost people. Jesus kept himself pure from immorality and did not sin in any fashion, but he also kept himself pure from the religious hypocrisy of his day.

The second dimension of missiological holiness is separation from cultural influences in the field of service. There are always dangers related to striving for acceptance by the people to whom one is ministering, especially in a foreign culture (see EXTENT OF MISSIONARY IDENTIFICATION). Missionaries are trained and conditioned to be culturally relevant. This could possibly lead to unknowingly compromising the holy standards of God in order to be admitted into the new community. God’s standards and character must always be in focus and the missionary must be able to evaluate each situation to guard God’s holiness. The highest goal is not to be accepted by the new culture, but to correctly demonstrate God’s holy character to those who must understand God’s message of sin and salvation.

MISSIONS.

See to ble without the former. The Hebrew word closest are not the same, although the latter is impossiand “holy” (Greek 3:16) are quoted using it. The English “wholly” (1 Thess. 5:23). Jesus (John 7:23) and Peter (Acts 3:16), John (9:34), James (1:4), and Paul (1 Thess. 5:23). Jesus (John 7:23) and Peter (Acts 3:16) are quoted using it. The English “wholly” and “holy” (Greek hagios), frequently confused, are not the same, although the latter is impossible. The Hebrew word closest to holos is possibly shalom.

Biblical holism is based on Christ’s lordship over every part of life—where people who are in right relationship with God and one another (relationship), are responsibly managing the resources entrusted by him (stewardship), in ways that show that those resources belong to God (ownership).

Sin also affects life holistically: relationships are broken, stewardship is affected, and God’s ownership is ignored or usurped (Gen. 3:1–10). Every part of life shows the pain of the fall (Gen. 3:14–24). Redemption is about reversing the effects of the fall; it is multidimensional (Isa. 42:6–7).

God called the community of Israel to a shalom life (Mic. 6:8) that G. E. Wright sees as a paradigm or model for the holistic kingdom living of the New Testament community. The promises of a redeemed humanity and a new heaven and earth (Rom. 8:18–23; Rev. 21:1–5) reflect God’s desire for the ultimate wholeness in the creation. If God acts holistically from Genesis to Revelation, dare we do less than that?

Mission is then no longer seen in terms of priorities, but as parts of a whole. “The scope of the gospel is the same as the scope of sin and its effects. Because sin is holistic, it is imperative that the gospel be holistic” (Athyal).

We discover three dimensions of the whole gospel: words proclaim the truth of God (the traditional focus of evangelicals); signs proclaim the power of God (most loved by Pentecostals and charismatics); and deeds proclaim the love of God (a strength of liberals and social activists). Each is a part of the Good News, but the gospel is not fully proclaimed until all three dimensions are experienced and understood; it is “both the truth and love and the power of God” (Hathaway).

Any of the three dimensions is an appropriate starting point for mission: word is for those who need to know, deed is for those who need to have, sign is for those who need to experience the power of God. Since we live in a world full of unwanted words, the starting point is often deed or sign. Both deed and sign need explaining; in this way the Word that brings faith is received (Rom. 10:17).

There is room for all the gifts of the Spirit in holistic mission. The best missionary teams are groups of diversely gifted people representing the three dimensions of mission. “The Christian community is to be a sign of the kingdom in which evangelism, social action and the Spirit are present and inseparably related” (McAlpine).

As a result, a new focus is needed in training. This focus involves an orientation to kingdom wholeness, giving as much weight to sign and deed as to Word.

Finally, biblical holism in mission is a call to re-hearing Scripture in community, putting process before program, people before structure, context before tradition, and having a commitment to continual learning. Wherever this is happening people are entering the kingdom of Christ.

Holistic Mission. Holistic mission is concerned with ministry to the whole person through the transforming power of the gospel. While holistic mission affirms the functional uniqueness of evangelism and social responsibility, it views them as inseparable from the ministry of the kingdom of God. Therefore, holistic mission is the intentional integration of building the church and transforming society.

Scriptural Foundation. Holistic mission begins with creation in perfect harmony under the lordship of God (Gen. 1–2) and humans in relationship with their Creator as stewards of his creation (Gen. 1:27–30). The entry of sin and consequent judgment affected every aspect of creation (Gen. 3; Rom. 3:23; 6:23), yet God did not abandon humankind but sought to redeem them by calling out a people for himself (Gen. 12:1–3; Exod. 15:2–13). His people were to be an obedient and holy nation (Exod. 19:5–6), living as stewards of the land he gave them (Deut. 4:1–8, 32–40), so that in obedience they might “enjoy long life” (Deut. 6:1–3). The law prescribed the theological, social, and economic dimensions of God’s rule, symbolized by the Hebrew word SHALOM (Mal. 2:5).

The record of God’s people is one of struggle and failure to maintain their allegiance, resulting in judgment (2 Kings 17:7–20; 2 Chron. 36:15–19). During this period, the prophets denounced Israel for her sins (Isa. 5:1–7; Amos...
2:6–16), calling her to live according to God’s will (Jer. 22:3–5; Hos. 6:6; Mic. 6:8). The failure that resulted in judgment also held the promise that a redeemer would come who would establish the kingdom characterized by shalom (Isa. 2:4; 9:6–7; 42:1–4; Jer. 31:31–34).

Throughout his ministry, Jesus announced the kingdom (Mark 1:15; Luke 16:16). As the fulfillment of the prophetic hope, Jesus brought shalom (Luke 1:32–33, 79; 2:14), which includes reconciliation with God through repentance (Matt. 4:16) leading to salvation (John 1:1–18; 3:16) and transformed relationships (Matt. 5–7; Luke 6; John 13:34–35). In establishing the kingdom, Jesus reclaimed that which was lost in the fall (Matt. 13:31–33) and called his followers to do the same (John 20:21). The church, as the community of God’s redeemed people (Matt. 18:20; Rom. 12:5–8; 1 Cor. 12; Eph. 4:1–16; 1 Peter 4:10–11), is called to fulfill the mission of Christ in creation (Eph. 1:20–23; 3:9–10).

Holistic mission is the commitment to all that the church is called to do, which includes the GREAT COMMISSION (Matt. 28:18–20) and the GREAT COMMANDMENT (Matt. 22:37–40).

Critical Issues. Central to the concerns of holistic mission is the relationship between evangelism and social responsibility. The contemporary concern arose out of the fundamentalist and liberal movements of the early twentieth century. The liberal movement moved toward a conciliar way of salvation and made evangelism the primary emphasis of the MISSIONARY TASK.

Evangelical concern over the relationship between evangelism and social concern has contributed to the multiplication of specialized organizations. This dichotomy has been reflected in the traditional evangelical missions emphases on evangelism and church planting despite their widespread involvement in education, health, and development. Growing out of the concerns for social needs, evangelical relief and development organizations have multiplied. Unlike traditional missions, the relief and development groups have concentrated on physical and social needs, cooperating with other groups in their efforts (see also DEVELOPMENT).

In the past two decades a shift has occurred, which is evident by comparing the Lausanne Covenant (1974) with the Manila Manifesto (1989). Both documents focus on evangelism, yet the latter emphasizes the issue of the whole gospel, demonstrating the wide acceptance of social concern as an integral part of the Good News of Christ.

Current literature is exploring the biblical nature of transformation, the effects of differing worldviews, and the church’s role in development. The internationalization of missions (see GLOBALIZATION) and the increased cooperation among organizations have functionally expanded the view of the church’s role in the world and the necessity for a greater understanding of holistic mission.

Hollenweger, Walter Jacob (1927– ). Swiss theologian, missiologist, and dramatist. Born in Antwerp into a Swiss family, Hollenweger was raised in Zurich. Though she was Swiss Reformed, his mother attended the Swiss Pentecostal Mission, where Hollenweger met his future wife. In 1948–49 he attended the International Bible Training Institute at Leamington Spa, England. A successful Pentecostal pastor and evangelist, he saw his congregation increase from 300 to 1,500 members, but left in 1958 because he disagreed with the narrow teachings of the denomination. Following theological studies at the University of Zurich, he was ordained in the Swiss Reformed Church.

In 1965 Hollenweger was appointed secretary of evangelism for the WCC, and in 1966 received a Th.D. from the University of Zurich for his survey of the worldwide Pentecostal movement. In 1971 he became the first occupant of the chair of mission studies at the University of Birmingham and the Selly Oak Colleges. His approach to theology combined critical thinking with narrative forms from oral cultures, which included theological stories, plays, and musicals. Considered a world authority on the Pentecostal movement and intercultural theology, Hollenweger created and coedited the series Studies in the Intercultural History of Christianity. With numerous books and articles to his credit, he devoted his retirement to writing theological plays and musicals.

Holy Spirit. The Spirit of God appears in Scripture from creation (Gen. 1:2) to re-creation (Rev. 22:17); from the Old Covenant (Exod. 31:3) to the New Covenant (Acts 2:1–4; Titus 3:5); and, wherever he appears he is the creative, dynamic life force of the Triune God. Who he is and how he functions becomes progressively known in the unfolding of salvation history. Throughout salvation history the Spirit empowers the people of God in making God known and experienced. The New Testament makes clear his deity and co-equality with the Father and Son (Matt. 28:19; Eph. 4:4–6).

The word ruah appears some 377 times in the Old Testament and can refer to breath, wind, or spirit while the word pneuma appears some 387 times in the New Testament and can be translated by the same words. Approximately 350 times these words refer to the Holy Spirit with slightly less than 100 of these occurring in the Old Testament. The Holy Spirit is especially prominent at redemptive and revelational moments. He gives skill in building the tabernacle (Exod. 31:1–5); inspires national and prophetic leaders (Num. 11:24–26; 1 Sam. 16:13; Ezek. 2:2); anoints Jesus for his mission (Luke 4:18); and empowers the apostles in proclamation of the gospel to Jews and Gentiles (Acts 2:14–21; 13:1–4).

The Spirit of God in the Old Testament. The Spirit makes his presence manifest during Israel's movement into nationhood, in clarifying and applying the Law, and in all parts of the New Testament. The Holy Spirit is especially prominent at redemptive and revelational moments. He gives skill in building the tabernacle (Exod. 31:1–5); inspires national and prophetic leaders (Num. 11:24–26; 1 Sam. 16:13; Ezek. 2:2); anoints Jesus for his mission (Luke 4:18); and empowers the apostles in proclamation of the gospel to Jews and Gentiles (Acts 2:14–21; 13:1–4).

The Spirit of God in the Old Testament. The Spirit makes his presence manifest during Israel's movement into nationhood, in clarifying and applying the Law, and as the promised Spirit who will empower God's Messiah and make the New Covenant possible.

God's command that Israel build a tabernacle brings forth the Spirit's creativity and power for skill in workmanship and wisdom in interpreting and applying the Law (Exod. 31:3; Num. 11:16). The Spirit is actively involved as Israel attains nationhood. The Spirit of the Lord came upon Othniel, Gideon, Jephthah, and Samson, enabling them to deliver Israel from the oppression of the nations (Judg. 3:10; 6:34; 11:29; 14:19). The Spirit of the Lord came upon Saul with power and he prophesied (1 Sam. 10:5–11). The Spirit later humidifies him when Saul strips off his clothes and prophesies (1 Sam. 19:23–24). The Spirit came upon David with power (1 Sam. 16:13). When David sins he pleads: “Do not . . . take your Holy Spirit from me” (Ps. 51:11).

The prophets are keenly aware of the role of the Spirit as they call Israel to holiness. But the prophets are especially sensitive to the Spirit's work during the age to come of which they often prophesy. The Servant of the Lord, who will usher in this age, will be filled with the Spirit to accomplish a worldwide mission (Isa. 11:1: 42:1; 61:1). The Spirit will give God's people a new heart and empower them (Ezek. 18:31; 36:26; Joel 2:28–32).

The Holy Spirit as the Missionary Spirit. Mission as glorifying God through reconciliation places the Spirit at the center of salvation history. The statement that “the Spirit of the Lord came upon David in power” (1 Sam. 16:13) clarifies David's statement to Goliath: “I'll strike you down and cut off your head . . . the whole world will know that there is a God in Israel” (1 Sam. 17:46).

The Spirit comes upon, falls on, clothes, and enables judges, prophets, and kings to lead, war, prophesy, and make God known to the world. The new age will be characterized by God's empowering presence through the Spirit. The Messiah, the apostles, and all post-Pentecost disciples are people of the Spirit. While the entire New Testament is Spirit-imprinted, John, Paul, and Luke have the most profound pneumatology.

John: The Spirit as Jesus' Presence. Without question John's pneumatology is the most complicated, rich, and exact of all the Gospel accounts.
In John's theology the Holy Spirit is the "other"
Jesus (14:16–17, 26). The Holy Spirit will replace Jesus, giving an even greater sense of God's presence, teaching the disciples and giving them divine illumination (16:4–15).

While John's pneumatology informs mission, three passages in particular provide a clear view of the relationship of the Spirit and mission.
John the Baptist sees Jesus anointed for mission during his baptism and God reveals to him that Jesus will be known as "he who baptizes with the Spirit" (1:33). When giving the apostles the GREAT COMMISSION, Jesus "breathed on them," and said, "Receive the Holy Spirit" (20:22). Just as God breathed into Adam the breath of life, so Jesus breathes on his disciples. The most detailed outline of the Spirit's ministry in the lives of those hearing the gospel is outlined by John in 16:8–11.
The Spirit "will convict the world of guilt in regard to sin and righteousness and judgment."

These three themes—sin, righteousness, and judgment—find a significant place in John.
John's designation of the source of this conviction as the world indicates the mission application of this passage.

Paul: The Spirit as the Eschatological Gift. Paul is the theologian of the Holy Spirit. His letters are saturated with references to the Holy Spirit. Most of Paul's 145 uses of pneuma refer to the Holy Spirit. Paul uses the name Holy Spirit about sixteen times. His favorite word is Spirit, leading to some doubt on how best to translate some of his references. For example, the NVV translators see the Holy Spirit in Romans 1:4 and 2:29, but the majority of the NRSV translators see spirit here.

For Paul the Spirit is God's eschatological gift, who cannot be understood apart from the Good News. The Spirit initiates a person into Christ through regeneration (Titus 3:5), seals the person until the day of redemption (Eph. 1:13), assures the Christian of family life (Rom. 8:14), and enablesthe Christian to live the Christian life (Gal.
5:16, 22, 25). The church is the temple of the Holy Spirit, receives gifts from the Holy Spirit
(1 Cor. 12), and makes Jews and Gentiles one body (Eph. 2:19–22).

But some find Paul's rich theology of the Spirit incomplete or inadequate on mission. Why does Paul say so little about the Spirit's missionary role? Is the Spirit a missionary Spirit for Paul?
Paul's call and commission comes from a revelation (Gal. 1:16). Paul's theological center can be found in eschatology. For Paul this new age has dawned through the resurrection of Christ and Paul's conversion and call to mission, coming apocalyptically through his post-Easter experience with the risen Jesus, cannot be distinguished (Gal. 1:11–17). Paul's personal call to mission cannot be traced to the Spirit, but the Spirit is an eschatological gift, who longs for the conversion of the Gentiles (Rom. 15:8–22). Paul emphasizes the power of the Holy Spirit in his mission (1 Thess. 1:5–6). It is the Holy Spirit's power manifested by signs and wonders that confirms his apostleship and authenticates his mission (2 Cor. 12:12). The Holy Spirit gives gifts to every Christian, enabling each to minister for God (1 Cor. 12:7).

Luke: The Spirit as the Missionary Spirit. Whatever other contributions Luke makes, he is a mis-missionary theologian and the centerpiece of his missionary theology is the Holy Spirit. Luke's focus on the Holy Spirit as the missionary Spirit begins with the announcement of John's birth to Zechariah (1:13–16). While the full manifestation of the Holy Spirit awaits Pentecost, an unprecedented outburst of charismatic activity occurs at the birth and launching of Jesus' mission.
Zechariah, Elizabeth, John the Baptist, Simeon, and Jesus are all filled with the Holy Spirit (1:41, 67; 2:26–27). Mary, Zechariah, Simeon, and Anna manifest the presence of the Holy Spirit by prophetic activity (1:45, 67; 2:28–32, 38).

In Jesus' life "the Holy Spirit descended on him in bodily form" as he was praying after his baptism (3:21–22). He returns from the Jordan "full of the Spirit" and "was led by the Spirit in the desert," (4:1). After defeating the devil and defining the nature of his mission, he "returned to Galilee in the power of the Spirit" (4:14). In the synagogue of Nazareth, Jesus took the scroll of Isaiah and read these words: "The Spirit of the Lord is on me, because he has anointed me to prophesy, leading people to "call upon the name of the Lord" (Acts 2:17–18, 21).

Concluding his mission through death and resurrection, Jesus commands his disciples to remain in Jerusalem for the empowering they would need to fulfill his worldwide mission (24:49; Acts 1:4–5, 8). Pentecost comes ten days after Jesus' ascension with mighty signs from heaven, enabling all those present to witness powerfully and persuasively. Peter's words from Joel emphasize the eschatological nature of this outpouring. The Holy Spirit has now been poured out on all of God's people, giving them the ability to prophesy, leading people to "call upon the name of the Lord" (Acts 2:17–18, 21).

The Holy Spirit is the missionary Spirit, sent from the Father by the exalted Jesus, empowering the church in fulfilling God's intention that the gospel become a universal message, with Jews and Gentiles embracing the Good News.
The Spirit leads the mission at every point, empowering the witnesses and directing them in preaching the gospel to those who have never heard, enabling them with signs and wonders.

Conclusion. Scripture is clear and emphatic:
The Holy Spirit is God the missionary Spirit. He Holy Spirit

broods over emptiness and formlessness. Whether in the life of Israel, Jesus, or the church, the Spirit empowers the people of God in proclaiming and witnessing to the nations. He is the eschatological gift of God, enabling Christians to experience the “already” of the kingdom of God while living in the present evil age. The Spirit constantly motivates and empowers the church in reaching the unreached.

Home Missions. The distinction between home and foreign missions is primarily that of distance and travel. Unfortunately, the distinction too often involved philosophy, qualifications, finances, and sense of importance. For these reasons, missions in America has had an interesting past and now has a most intriguing future.

For the first two hundred years, most home mission activity in the United States was directed toward Native Americans and black slaves. In the early 1800s, Bible societies began printing and distributing tracts in rural and frontier regions. Sunday schools and new churches were begun in these same rural and frontier areas by both denominational and independent organizations. Later in that century rescue missions, missions for lumberjacks, Jewish missions, missions to Catholics, ministry in Appalachia, orphanages, hospitals, nursing homes, and other single focused missions came on the scene. The Great Depression and World War II brought major changes to society in general and to the cause of Christian missions in particular. Following the war, an explosion of activity on behalf of foreign missions and a lesser but significant thrust for home missions occurred.

With the building of tract houses, the phenomenon of totally new communities coming into being overnight underscored the need for churches in such communities. Congregations faced the difficult decision whether to stay, move, or help new churches become established. Churches that chose to stay in their old urban communities were forced to operate their programs with fewer people and less resources. Congregations which voted to move lost some of the faithful and their giving, and had to deal with the difficulty of breaking established emotional ties and setting down roots in a new community. Local churches, denominations, and independent organizations began concentrated programs for starting new churches. Unfortunately, these programs were confined primarily to white, middle-class, English-speaking communities.

As home missions took on new life with the challenge of starting congregations in the suburbs, the downside was that a whole new mission field was created in the cities. With so many people leaving the urban centers, churches that remained dwindled in size until many closed their doors and others became shadows of the past.

Even as the vacuum of evangelical witness increased in size, the urban mission field was growing and changing. Houses and apartments that previously held one family of five or six people became home for three or four families with twenty or more people. The sounds of different languages were heard. Cultural interests and practices changed. Old businesses relocated, with new and different businesses replacing them. While new life was burgeoning in the community, church buildings stood dark and empty.

Other changes in home missions taking place during the postwar era included growing ministries such as college/university, high school, and Christian camping. At the same time, two factors reduced or eliminated many social programs which had been part of home missions. These were (1) the increasingly stringent governmental regulations on such subjects as child care, serving of food, and medical care and (2) government programs providing for these same needs.

Three major challenges face home missions in the United States for the twenty-first century. The first is to make the church inclusive. The world has come to our doorstep, with immigrants bringing a great diversity of languages, cultural, social, and religious practices. In addition, many of the poor and disenfranchised of our society do not feel welcome and in fact are not welcome in many of churches. Congregations need to break their present comfort zones to allow the church to be biblically inclusive.

The second challenge is for the church to be creative in adopting ways to reach changing communities. Gated communities prevent initial contacts with people and then control the sale and use of all property. Churches are seen as outsiders and are often not welcome. Self-contained high-rise communities present similar challenges. Gentrification produces new communities within cities and is responsible for dramatically increased property costs. Where property is difficult to acquire or too expensive, house churches and cell churches may become necessary. In contrast to these growing areas, people are leaving small towns and rural America, re-
Home schooling. Home education has a rich heritage and is an expression of the historical practice of home- and family-centered learning. Five World War II leaders were schooled at home: Franklin Roosevelt, Winston Churchill, Konrad Adenauer, Douglas MacArthur, and George Patton. Many Western missionary children in the modern missions era have been home-schooled. A whole generation of missionary children grew up under the Calvert School correspondence course.

Home schooling currently takes a variety of forms: correspondence education through an established correspondence course, home school as a satellite of a day school or residence school, in-home tutors, home education under the supervision of a traveling teacher who chooses the curriculum and evaluates the students on a regular basis, cooperative home schooling among various families, and home-based education that is parent-designed and -led.

Some missionary families educate their children at home due to a lack of financially or geographically accessible alternatives. Other parents home school a child because of the particular needs and personality of that child. For others the decision to home school is based on a commitment to an educational philosophy; many homeschooling parents share the belief that the education of children is primarily the responsibility and right of parents. (Mary Hood described four educational philosophies that can motivate home schooling—essentialism, progressivism, perennialism, and existentialism.) Since no single schooling option is best for all families, for all children, or even for all stages in a given child’s life, home schooling will not be ideal for every family.

Home schooling, however, offers some distinct advantages, including the following: the individualized instruction can take into account a pupil’s learning styles and interests; self-directed learning is encouraged; learning takes place in a secure environment; there is more adult–child interaction than in a large classroom; the flexible schedule can take advantage of the richness of the unique learning environment; the student can have an opportunity to become bilingual and bicultural and to know and appreciate people of the local culture; the child can be involved in ministry along with the parents; family closeness is facilitated and enhanced; the young person tends to be less peer-dependent and less susceptible to peer pressure; in a multinational mission the instruction can be conducted in the family’s native language.

In the majority of research studies the educational learning outcome of home-schooled children has been found to be highly positive. Ray, in a study of 4,600 children in the United States, found that home-educated children averaged at or above the 80th percentile on standardized achievement tests in all academic subject areas: language, mathematics, reading, listening, science, and social studies. Home-educated learners have also generally been found to do well in measures of social and emotional adjustment.

ELIZABETH S. BREWSTER

Homiletics. The term “homiletics” is derived from homily (i.e., a sermon), from the Greek homilia, meaning conversation or instruction. Homiletics is the field of theological training dealing with the preparation and presentation of sermons.

The intent of the discipline of homiletics is not just to train preachers, but to prepare them to be as effective in their presentation as possible. Thus, the proper and creative linking of biblical interpretation, writing and speaking skills, and even “body language” is necessary.

Homiletics is an important skill on the mission field. However, it is further complicated by the need to deliver the sermon with cross-cultural awareness and, often, in a language or dialect other than that normally spoken by the preacher.

If anything, skill in homiletics is becoming even more crucial as media technology becomes ever more sophisticated, yet, at the same time, available to the masses. The expectation of being entertained and the shortening attention span make it difficult to reach and impact the mass audience that desperately needs to hear the gospel message and related biblical truth that can transform lives.

In the midst of an increasingly secular society, it may seem to some that homiletics and preaching are outmoded. However, Jesus himself indicates that homiletics and mission will continue hand-in-hand until the end of the age: “This gospel of the kingdom will be preached in the whole world as a testimony to all nations, and then the end will come” (Matt. 24:14).

So, there can be no question that preaching must take place in connection with mission. John the Baptist was involved in such preaching (Matt. 3:1), as was Jesus (4:17). The explosive birth of the church at Pentecost is the direct effect of Peter’s preaching (Acts 2:14–41). The overflow of Paul’s preaching and teaching in Ephesus spread to the entire Roman province of Asia (southwestern Turkey today; Acts 19:8–10).

The apostle to the nations clarifies the cruciality of preaching by asking, “How can they believe in the one in whom they have not heard? And how can they hear without someone preaching to them?” (Rom. 10:14). It stands to reason, then, that, if the whole world is to hear about Jesus before the end of the age, a virtual army of workers must be sent out into the harvest (Matt. 9:37–38). The training of such workers must include at least basic homiletics.

In spite of the clearcut necessity of preaching and doing so effectively, potential concerns exist in regard to homiletics. For example, from the earliest chapters of rhetoric and oratory, there has been the tendency for golden-tongued speakers to manipulate audiences. By sheer eloquence, or attractiveness, it is not uncommon for a communicator to mold his or her hearers to draw conclusions or take action that is, in a very real sense, against their will. Similarly, the stirring of emotions in seeking a specific audience reaction is frequently manipulative.

Such manipulative behavior cannot be justified, even in the name of the GREAT COMMISSION—so frequently manipulative. Emotions in seeking a specific audience reaction can be laudatory or pious-sounding the end, it does not justify the means. Preachers involved in the missiological enterprise need to hear and heed the apostle Paul’s ringing rebuke of rhetorical slickness and manipulation to the Corinthian church, which was apparently quite susceptible to such skills: “When I came to you, brothers, I did not come with eloquence or superior wisdom as I proclaimed to you the testimony about God. For I resolved to know nothing while I was with you except Jesus Christ and him crucified. . . . My message and my preaching were not with wise and persuasive words, but with a demonstration of the Spirit’s power, so that your faith might not rest on men’s wisdom, but on God’s power” (1 Cor. 2:1–5).

A related tendency in regard to homiletical training is seen in Paul’s words. There is a subtle temptation to trust in communication technique, even for those who are committed to the gospel and the divine design of global mission.

However, it is clear scripturally that it is the Holy Spirit that convicts a lost and dying world of its sinfulness and need for redemption (John 16:7–11). It is the Spirit that gives spiritual freedom (2 Cor. 3:17). That being the case, it becomes clear that the preacher testifies as a teammate of the Holy Spirit (John 15:26–27), whose witness is primary and decisive.

Another significant concern of mission in regard to homiletics has to do with what has been called “putting the cookies on the lower shelf.” This refers to speaking with simplicity and clarity. Just as it is very common for preachers to add unnecessary complexity to their presentations of the gospel, there is the opposite tendency to oversimplify. It should be remembered, though, that there is a bedrock historical basis for the gospel (1 Cor. 15:1–5) that is true (and, hence, must be articulated and believed) or “our preaching is useless and so is your faith” (v. 14).

There is a related tendency in cross-cultural mission that can short-circuit the gospel message. In attempting to find common ground between the missionary’s cultural background and the culture of the hearer, it is entirely possible to grasp for a “lowest common denominator” that overgeneralizes or distorts the gospel. This is not to discount the kind of cultural key provided by the “peace child” understanding of Don Richardson, or similar examples (see REDEEMPTIVE ANALOGIES). It is only to caution that CONTEXTUALIZATION of the gospel taken too far can blur the timeless gospel in favor of a supposed timely culture-friendly message.

Beyond all these important considerations of technique and strategy, there is still the factor of faithfulness. As Paul admonished his younger associate Timothy, homiletical skill will not always be appreciated by those who need to hear and respond to the gospel: “Preach the Word; be prepared in season and out of season; correct, rebuke and encourage with great patience and careful instruction. For the time will come when men will not put up with sound doctrine” (2 Tim. 4:2–3). Even in the face of such utterly discouraging results, the homiletical practitioner is urged to tenaciously pursue the goal of the Great Commission by continuing to “do the work of an evangelist” (v. 5).

Homogeneous Unit Principle. The homogeneous unit principle is a derivative of one of the more significant advances in missiological think-ning over the past century: Donald A. McGavran’s people movement theory (see Church Growth Movement and People Movements). McGavran’s most frequently cited statement of the homogeneous principle is: “People like to become Christians without crossing racial, linguistic, or class barriers” (McGavran, 1970, 163). McGavran argued that conversion should occur with a minimum of social dislocation. The homogeneous unit principle has become perhaps the most controversial of all church growth principles because some critics have interpreted it as having racist or classist overtones. Nothing could have been further from McGavran’s mind, however. The homogeneous unit principle is a serious attempt to respect the dignity of individuals and the social units to which they belong, and to encourage their decisions for Christ to be religious decisions rather than social decisions. McGavran said, “It may be taken as axiomatic that whenever becoming a Christian is considered a racial rather than a religious decision, there the growth of the church will be exceedingly slow. As the church faces the evangelization of the world, perhaps its main problem is how to present Christ so that unbelievers can truly follow him without traitor-ously leaving their kindred” (ibid., 155). And in a related statement, he added, “The great obstacles to conversion are social, not theological. Great turning of Muslims and Hindus can be expected as soon as ways are found for them to become Christian without renouncing their loved ones, which seem to them to be a betrayal” (ibid., 156).

A more contemporary term for the homogeneous unit principle is “the people approach to world evangelization.” It is now widely recognized and accepted as a primary starting point for missiological strategy. Ralph D. Winter, while still a member of Donald McGavran’s original faculty in the Fuller Seminary School of World Mission, gave the concept worldwide ex-posure through his plenary address at the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelism (1974).
When the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization was subsequently formed, its Strategy Working Group, led by C. Peter Wagner and Edward R. Dayton, published a series of annual directories called Unreached Peoples. The AD 2000 and Beyond Movement was initiated in 1989, instituting an Unreached Peoples Track as one of its principal building blocks. The Joshua Project 2000 of the AD 2000 Movement has compiled a list of 1,739 significantly large unreached people groups as primary targets for world evangelization. The AD 2000 motto, “A church for every people and the gospel for every person by the year 2000,” is rooted in the homogeneous unit perspective.

What is a homogeneous unit? McGavran’s brief definition is: “The homogeneous unit is simply a section of society in which all the members have some characteristics in common” (ibid., 69). A more precise definition was later forged through discussions among missiologists over the years, and now it is generally accepted, using the term “people group” instead of “homogeneous unit”:
“A people group is a significantly large sociological grouping of individuals who perceive them-se lves to have a common affinity for one another.
From the viewpoint of evangelization, this is the largest possible group within which the gospel can spread without encountering barriers of understanding or acceptance.” The “common affinity” can be based on any combination of culture, language, religion, economics, ethnicity, residence, occupation, class, caste, life situation, or other significant characteristics which provide ties which bind the individuals in the group together (see also Peoples, People Groups).

The homogeneous unit principle assumes that the focus and presentation of the gospel which has reaped an evangelistic harvest in a given peo-group might not have the same effect on other people groups, not because of the theological core of the gospel message, but because of irrelevant cultural trappings often attached to the gospel message by missionaries. Missionaries untrained in cultural anthropology tend to imagine that churches planted in any culture will look and sound and act like their own churches. The disastrous results of such cultural nearsightedness are extensively chronicled in missiological history. Many cases are recorded in which the gospel presented by white American missionaries has been rejected by those of other people groups because the nationals’ culture was denigrated and ridiculed rather than respected. In the minds of some of the nationals, the missionary was asking them to become Americans, for example, in order to become Christians. The application of the homogeneous principle to correct and prevent such cases is a facet of Contextualization.
Although there are differences of opinion about degrees and certain forms of contextualization, the principle itself is accepted as an axiom of contemporary missiology.

Honda, Koji

Honda, Koji (1912– ). Japanese evangelist. Koji Honda grew up in a small town in Fukui Prefecture. Overcoming parental opposition, he was baptized when seventeen and in 1934 enrolled at the Kansai Bible School. During World War II his spiritual convictions often brought him into conflict with the authorities. In 1944 he was drafted into the military. After the war Honda supported his family for a while as a cobbler. In 1946 it was possible to return to the ministry, and a tent erected in the midst of the rubble of Kobe served as a meeting place. In 1947 churches in America supplied a Quonset hut. This was the beginning of the Kobe Central Church, which grew rapidly under Honda’s leadership. In 1956 God used missionaries and his Word to challenge Honda to become an evangelist. The same year the Honda crusades began. In 1966 the Hondas with their six children moved to Tokyo and the Honda crusade became the Japan Gospel Crusade. In 1967 Honda joined other church leaders to establish the Evangelism-in-Depth Movement (Sodoin Dendo) and served on the executive committee of Billy Graham’s Tokyo crusade. When Graham returned for crusades in 1980 and 1994, Honda was elected chairman and honorary chairman respectively.

Honda has played leading roles in many Christian organizations, among them the Pacific Broadcasting Association, Ochanomizu Christian Center, the Association of Evangelists, and the Association of Para-Ministries. In international relations, Honda has played a major role in bringing about reconciliation between the Christians of Korea and Japan.

There is good reason for describing Honda as the Billy Graham of Japan. Honda has conducted over forty crusades during the past forty years; he has proclaimed Christ before 1.4 million Japanese people. In 1968 he was invited to join the Cuban crusade as a consultant. In 1970 he went to Yokohama at clan expense and erected a Quonset hut. This was the beginning of the Kobe Central Church, which grew rapidly under his leadership. began ministry in San Pedro Sula in 1921. The Evangelical and Reformed Church of Honduras emerged from that work. In 1931, the Moravians extended their work with the Miskito Indians from Nicaragua into Honduras.

In 1937, the first Assemblies of God missionaries entered from nearby El Salvador. Then, in 1940, indigenous Pentecostal churches sought the support of the Assemblies of God in the United States to reinforce their work. Subsequently, other Pentecostal groups have entered the country, the most numerous of which is the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee).

Because of the isolation caused by mountainous terrain, Comity agreements continued to be observed until after World War II, when many new evangelical missions entered Honduras. Early progress was slow, but then accelerated dramatically after 1970. Massive outreach through evangelism, Scripture distribution, literature, and radio replaced earlier dependence on educational and medical ministries. Natural disasters as well as migrations and social upheavals occasioned both by the Honduran–El Salvador 100-hour “futbol” war in 1969 and subsequent guerrilla activity in Nicaragua have increased receptivity. Currently about 10 percent of the population is affiliated with an evangelical church.

Although most of the work has been naturalized, paternalism, poverty, denominational competition, and illiteracy have retarded the development of mature leadership. Amerindian ministries have been fruitful, though limited. Most Hondurans are mestizos, and most Indians have somewhat assimilated into the Latin culture. However, some indigenous groups such as the Miskito, Garifuna, Suma, and Tol have retained their cultural identity to a large extent. Outreach to Arabs, Chinese, and other ethnic minorities is limited or nonexistent. However, cross-cultural mission vision is growing.

Honesty. The issue of honesty and mission calls for a critical look at two sets of relationships. First of all, it needs to be understood in the relationships involving the missionary, the mission, and the donor. Second, it needs to be understood in the relationship between the missionary and the host culture.

In today's missions, when the amount of financial support available for a particular ministry or project is often tied proportionately to the level of productivity, what is communicated to donors or potential donors about the ministry's level of success or failure may prove to be the deciding factor in whether the support, and possibly the ministry, is continued or not. Under such circumstances, honesty in communication becomes a very important factor between the missionary and his or her mission and donors and also between the mission and its donors. Honesty becomes an issue of Christian conscience in being straightforward in these relationships, and it becomes an issue of faith in our sovereign Lord who is in complete control and who is building his church. Missionaries must always remember that they cannot serve God and mammon, regardless of the noble reasons for trying.

As in many such issues, the understanding of honesty will vary from culture to culture. Therefore it is very important that the missionary be sensitive to the cultural definitions and to the standards of honesty in culture. In order to do this, the missionary must have a clear understanding of this issue within the three cultural horizons of missions: the biblical culture, his or her own culture, and the host culture. In the study of Scripture, the missionary will gain a Christian ethic with a biblical understanding of honesty. This may not be as easy as it seems when one considers God's blessing of the Hebrew midwives for lying to Pharaoh about the Hebrew women giving birth in Exodus 1:15–21; or of God caring for Rahab because she lied to protect the two spies as seen in Joshua 6:25. With this biblical understanding of honesty, the missionary must judge his or her own culture. The missionary may find that he or she is laboring under misconceptions of true honesty.

Having done this, cross-cultural missionaries are able to look more fairly at the host culture. The missionary must be able to answer cultural questions related to honesty such as ownership of property or work ethic or what is considered polite. They must gain an understanding of community and of what is considered proper within the host culture. Every culture has an understanding of what is honest and what is dishonest. The missionary must always let Scripture be the judge of whether that understanding is correct or incorrect. As the Holy Spirit sharpens the conscience of the people and as the Scriptures form them of their cultural inconsistencies, they will develop a more biblical understanding of honesty (as well as other moral issues) and their application of it. In this way the culture will move toward a Christian culture in context, rather than a missionary culture.

Hong Kong (Est. 2000 pop.: 5,968,000; 1,061 sq. km. [410 sq. mi.]). Since Hong Kong became a British colony in 1842, there has been a never-ending influx of missionaries from European, American, and Asian nations. In addition to preaching and establishing churches, there have been several outstanding missionaries who also served as the cultural bridges between China and the West. James Legge was a distinguished translator of Chinese Classics. Karl Ludvig Reichelt (1877–1952) was likewise a well respected student of Chinese Mahayana Buddhism. He constituted interfaith dialogue at the Tao Fung Shan Ecumenical Center. More important, many missionaries and Chinese Christians were founders and collaborators of a variety of social institutions. Christian schools constitute the largest share of Hong Kong's educational system, and missionary participation in education can be traced to the first decade of British rule. The Hong Kong Chinese Christian Churches Union and the Hong Kong Christian Council, instituted in 1915 and 1954, respectively, were developed to enable better communication among different denominations and to support mission work. The Billy Graham crusades in Hong Kong in 1975 and 1990 stand as examples of collaboration among denominations and Christian organizations.

In addition to such efforts, there are a number of Christian organizations that carry out their mission by meeting the immediate needs of the community. The rehabilitation of narcotic addicts, such as Jackie Pullinger's programs and the Wu Oi Fellowship, deserve special mention.

Hong Kong has played a vital role in Christian missions to China. Between August 22 and September 4, 1843, missionaries to China from several denominations met to improve the translation of the Bible. Although its role as a Chinese Bible printing center was temporarily superseded by other Chinese cities like Shanghai, Hong Kong resumed its importance after the Communists took over China in 1949. In addition to Bible translation, missionaries and Chinese Christians extended their work in Guangdong province, through which a strong reinforcement for Christian missions between Hong Kong and China became possible. The earliest example was in the 1860s, when the London Missionary Society Hong Kong Mission established its outstations in Boluo and Foshan. These stations, in turn, became sources of converts, support personnel, and pastors. As a result, the To Tsai Church, the Chinese congregation of the London Missionary Society in Hong Kong, achieved independence in 1886.

Between the late 1940s and 1950s, a large number of missionaries, Chinese Christians, and Chinese church leaders moved to Hong Kong, resulting in a significant growth in both number and quality of converts. Leung Siu-choh (1889–1967), once the leader of the YMCA in Guangdong and Shanghai, became the first chairman of the Church of Christ in China Hong Kong Council when it registered with the Hong Kong government in 1957. Another noteworthy page was marked in the history of missions in Hong Kong in 1974, when the Chinese Coordination Center of World Evangelism was inaugurated. Not only did it affirm the role of Hong Kong as a center for Christian missions in China, but it also extended its commitment to other Chinese communities abroad.

With the return of Hong Kong to the People's Republic of China, many questions about the future remain unanswered. The ongoing commitment of Hong Kong's churches to Christ, however, will play a pivotal role in the continuing advance of the gospel in China.

Hoover, James Matthew (1872–1935). American missionary to Malaysia. On March 13, 1899, following God’s prompting after nine years of elementary schoolwork, Hoover applied for and was accepted to serve as a Methodist teacher-missionary in contemporary Malaysia. He arrived in Penang, Malay, on September 9. In 1903, he was transferred to Sibu, Sarawak, where he worked with the Foochow Chinese Colony. This colony had been established for Chinese émigrés, many of them Christians escaping from the Boxer Rebellion. He helped them settle along the lush Rejang River and worked tirelessly on their behalf. Known as “Tuan Hoover of Borneo,” over the course of his ministry he planted more than forty churches and helped thousands gain a new opportunity for life.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Hoover, Willis Collins (1856–1936). American missionary to Chile. Born in Freeport, Illinois, he studied medicine. Not wishing to pursue a medical career, he volunteered to work under Methodist William Taylor in Chile. In 1902, Hoover became pastor of the church in Valparaiso.

Early on, he expressed interest in the manifestations of the Holy Spirit and Pentecostal revivals. After a conference several board members were challenged to “repent and get right with God [even] if it takes all night” (Hollenweger, 172). Several did, and then initiated all-night prayer vigils every Saturday, during which Pentecostal manifestations of the Spirit were witnessed. The Methodists were not pleased, objecting to such practices as “antimethodist.” This led to a heresy trial in which Hoover was found guilty of teaching false doctrines, specifically concerning charismatic manifestations of the Holy Spirit. Hoover lost Methodist support and income but stayed at the request of his congregation. The controversy led to the formation of the Methodist Pentecostal Church (IMP), which Hollenweger calls the “first theologically and financially self sufficient church in the Third World” (169). The IMP and a later splinter group, the Evangelical Pentecostal Church, are today the largest non-Catholic denominations in Chile.

Hope. The expectation engendered by faith in God's promises of salvation provides part of the theological foundation of mission, and helps define its nature, message, means, goal, and motivation. In the Old Testament, the hope is in God as Creator, who in the face of human disobedience retains his purpose for creation (Gen. 8:22), makes his promise for all the nations (Gen. 12:3), and chooses Israel to be blessed and to be a blessing, as reflected in the Davidic covenant (2 Sam. 7:19) and Solomon's prayer (1 Kings 8:43, 60). The prophetic outlook (e.g., Isa. 11:10; Zech. 8:22–23) is of a future great ingathering of the Gentiles to join with Israel in her promised inheritance.

The New Testament takes up such promises (e.g., Matt. 8:11–12; Luke 2:30–32), which become the foundation of the command to disciple “all the nations” (i.e., Gentiles as well as the Jews, Matt. 28:19–20). This is connected with the rule of God, the complete restoration of all creation.

The coming of the Spirit (Acts 2) is a sign of the last days and of the new messianic people, which includes believing Samaritans (Acts 8:17) and Gentiles (Acts 10:44–46; Gal. 3:2; 4:6), without their having to become Jewish (cf. Acts 15). The hope of Jew and Gentile alike, as forgiven sinners who rejoice in suffering in this age (Rom. 5:1–5), is Christ's coming in glory at the resurrection (Phil. 2:11; 1 Thess. 1:10; etc.). Paul sees himself as called to the realization of this hope for the Gentiles (Rom. 1:5; 15:12; Gal. 2:7); Peter, for the Jews. Peter places the same stress on the hope (Acts 2:34–35; 1 Peter 1:3–5).

The nature of mission must therefore include the communication of the message, which includes and holds out this hope to all who will turn in faith to the Lord, for his coming will bring in the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 15:22–24). The immediate goal of mission is beseeching all to receive the reconciliation achieved in Christ. By this they become already the “new creation” (2 Cor. 5:17), which is also the future hope. The goal also includes their being gathered as the church. Further, the goal is that the glory of God will be revealed in the fulfillment of his promises to all the nations. The motivation therefore includes this hope of the glory of God. The means of mission will include not only the ministry of the Word, but also the fruit of the Spirit, evident in deeds of compassion and in the life of the church. This, with all that it entails by way of social concern and involvement, is sign and evidence of the full realization to come, if it is clearly associated with the message and the church.

The postmillennial and amillennial hopes have been associated with a comprehensive missionary approach in modern times, for which conversion to Christ has always been the indispensable aim, as also for the premillennial hope. The latter tended to avoid the method of planting Christian institutions in foreign mission fields, without, however, rejecting social concern, until this century. When the hope stresses the betterment of conditions in this present world only, as in realized or in existentialist eschatology, then the emphasis is on sociopolitical action.

In 1884 he joined the China Inland Mission. After initial language training in Shanghai in 1885 Hoste was sent to the southern part of Shanxi province, working there under the first CIM-ordained Chinese pastor, Pastor Hsi (d. 1896). Working among young churches and the opium refuges established by Hsi, Hoste became known for his willing submission to Hsi and his personal disciplines in prayer and cultural adaptation. These experiences formed the basis for the missiological convictions in Hoste's later career as an administrator. In 1893 he married Hudson Taylor's niece, Gertrude Broomhall (d. 1944), and so naturally became closer to the director, whom he referred to as “Uncle.” Hoste was made acting director in 1900, and became the second director in 1902.

If Hudson Taylor was the charismatic leader of CIM, then Dixon Hoste was the institutionalizing genius. During his directorate the number of CIM missionaries rose from 780 to 1,360, Chinese churches from 364 to over 1,200, “outstations” from below 400 to over 2,200, and yearly baptisms from 1,700 to 7,500. Hoste was an insightful analyst of human character, a reliable source in judging missionary leadership, a consistent advocate for indigenizing the Chinese church leadership, and a model of intercessory prayer. Hoste survived Japanese internment beginning in 1943, dying in 1946 after returning to England.

Household Responsibilities. How does the ministry-burdened person balance outreach and basic living necessities? Historically, most mis-ionaries, husband and wife or single, were expected to be full-time servants of the Lord. Today more missionary parents have the option to home school or to educate their children in the towns or situations where they live. It is more common to find only one parent in full-time ministry while the other parent cares for the children and household chores.

The standard at which a missionary chooses to live greatly impacts the household responsibilities. The missionary who chooses to live more or less at a Western standard in a developing economy may spend more time in acquiring and maintaining possessions. Missionaries who choose to live with fewer possessions may relate better economically to surrounding nationals but may spend much more time in providing for themselves than if they had more modern conveniences (see also EXTENT OF MISSIONARY IDENTIFICATION).

Ministry goals also impact household responsibilities. The missionary who focuses on translation, health care needs, school teaching, or other institutional ministries may have complete ministry contact outside the home. The institutional missionary’s home might be their refuge or occasionally a place for minimal outside contact.

But the missionary focusing on evangelism, church planting, and leadership training may, as part of normal household responsibilities, need to have a very open home. It is not the possessions, or lack thereof, that create an effective church planter or evangelist. Rather, it is the attitude toward spending time with nationals. If household work or possessions get in the way of spending time with nationals, ministry will be negatively impacted. The most effective evangelistic and church planting/discipling missionaries tend to have an ability to keep household chores and responsibilities to a minimum, while balancing ministry from the home and visits outside the home. Balance, openness, love and caring are much more important ingredients than the actual amount of time spent on household responsibilities.

Huey, Mary Alice (1877–1960). American mis-ionary to China. Born in Jefferson County, Alabama, she was educated at Judson College and in 1904 became one of the first students at the training school for women at Louisville, Kentucky (later known as the Woman’s Missionary Union Training School).

In 1907 she heard God’s call to the mission field. Later that year she was appointed by the FOREIGN MISSION BOARD OF THE SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION to serve in Laichow, China.

Huey became the principal and Bible teacher at a girls’ school and diligently worked with the Laichow women and children for nearly twenty years. In 1926 she returned to the United States for a brief period of time to care for her ailing parents.
In 1932 she returned to China to carry on her work. However, her efforts were cut short when circumstances surrounding World War II forced her to leave Laichow in 1940. But these trials did not discourage her—nor did they diminish her missionary zeal.

In 1941 Huey transferred to the Hawaiian Mission at Honolulu, where she carried on evangelistic work until she retired in 1946. Through all circumstances, she proved herself to be a competent leader and dedicated missionary.

Human Condition in World Religions. Common to most religions is the notion that human beings—and, in many cases, the cosmos at large—suffer from some kind of undesirable condition. Violence, murders, and wars; natural disasters such as earthquakes and floods; the inability of people to get along with each other; illness and death; a sense of anxiety and alienation—all of these indicate that something is seriously amiss in our world. A sense of longing for the transcendent suggests a reality beyond the world of ordinary experience, and religions characteristically hold that our ultimate well-being is linked to this transcendent realm.

However, in spite of these common themes the various religions offer quite different diagnoses of the human predicament. Monotheistic religions generally regard the problem in terms of an unsatisfactory relationship between God the Creator and his creatures. Central to Christianity, for example, is the idea of Sin as deliberate rejection of God and his righteous ways. The biblical view of sin must be understood with reference to a holy and righteous God to whom human beings are morally accountable. Sin includes not only individual acts that transgress God’s righteous standard but also a condition or state of rebellion against God, resulting in alienation from God. The original sin of Adam and Eve resulted in a condition of sinfulness that has been passed on to all humanity (see also FALL OF HUMANKIND). The suffering and evils we experience are all due ultimately to sin and its tragic consequences.

JUDAISM, rooted in the Hebrew Scriptures, has focused extensively on the PROBLEM OF EVIL and suffering. Although it acknowledges the heart of the problem as human moral failure in committing sins against God, Judaism generally does not share Christianity’s belief in original sin and total depravity. Rather, a more optimistic view of human nature stresses original virtue and the capacity, with God’s gracious help, of working toward progressive moral development.

ISLAM holds that human beings have erred by straying from the right path of obedience to Allah. But sin in Islam is more a weakness or deficiency in human character rather than the radical corruption of human nature. People are subject to temptation from Iblis (the devil), but it is within their power to resist and remain faithful to Allah. The suffering and trials we encounter in this life are regarded not only as punishment for individual sins but also as Allah’s way of testing the sincerity and faithfulness of his followers.

Quite different views of the human predicament are found in religious traditions originating in the Indian subcontinent. Here the problem is samsara, the wearisome and repetitive cycle of rebirths through which one transmigrates in accordance with karma. Birth leads inevitably to death. Death in turn inevitably results in rebirth in another body, and it is the impersonal cosmic law of karma that determines the conditions of each existence. HINDUISM, BUDDHISM, and JAINISM, although differing in certain key respects, all accept the framework of samsara and karma, and thus the religious goal came to be identified with liberation from samsara by rendering ineffective the principle of karma.

In spite of this common framework, however, various traditions within Hinduism and Buddhism give different views on the nature of the problem. Often the root problem is identified with ignorance (avidya), or holding false views about reality resulting in samsara. But even here various differences emerge. In Advaita Vedanta Hinduism samsara arises from and is rooted in false views about the nature of Brahman and the relation of the self to Brahman; in Theravada Buddhism, by contrast, it is the false belief in an enduring, substantial self (atman) which, when combined with desire and craving, results in suffering and rebirth. Buddhism identifies the human predicament with the claim that all existence is characterized by pervasive suffering, dissatisfaction, and impermanence.

In Chinese religious traditions, or at least non-Buddhist traditions, the human predicament is not understood in terms of the cycle of rebirths so much as failure to attain the proper balance and harmony within the social nexus, which in turn is patterned after the cosmic harmony of Heaven and the Tao. Proper alignment and harmony—within the person, the familial and social contexts, the realm of ancestors and spirits, nature, and the cosmos at large—result in human flourishing. Disharmony on any level can result in the suffering and problems encountered in ordinary life. TAOISM in particular emphasizes balance and proper alignment with the Tao, the Way or eternal principle immanent within the cosmos. Problems in society are due to the imposition of artificial constraints that prohibit the free expression of life in accordance with the Tao. CONFUCIANISM, by contrast, has been concerned with cultivating proper relationships and order within society based on virtue and moral character. With Mencius, and later Chu Hsi, Confucianism has emphasized the inherent goodness of human nature; evil results from corrupt external influences. On a popular folk level, the reality of the spirit world and the importance of proper alignment with spiritual powers is indicated by widespread practices of divination, ancestral rites, and recognition of a vast array of deities, spirits, and demons that can influence life in this world for good or ill.
Human Condition in World Religions

Animistic traditions and primal religions, which do not make a sharp distinction between the world of ordinary experience and a transcendent spiritual world, attribute problems in everyday life such as illness, death, natural disasters, wars, and infertility to various spiritual powers believed to be capable of impacting affairs in this life. Thus, great care is taken to maintain proper rituals through which the many ancestors, demons, spirits, and gods who hold such power can be appeased.

The recognition that something is profoundly wrong with the way things are can be a point of contact between the Christian gospel and followers of other traditions. Augustine captured this sense of alienation well in his statement at the beginning of the Confessions: “You [God] have made us for yourself, and our hearts are restless and will find no rest until they rest in you.”

Human Rights. It is commonly accepted in modern Western thought that human beings, by definition, are entitled to basic human rights. There are several presuppositions in this world-view: the inviolability of each person as a person; the right to freedom from restrictions of one’s rights; the equality of each person in dignity and law; and the right to participate in decisions that affect one’s life and livelihood.

Though both Luther and Calvin played significant parts in the development of the notion of fundamental dignity and freedom, the contemporary commitment to human rights is mostly the result of a momentum that has built up since the seventeenth century, when people became sick of the years of religious and ideological intolerance that followed the Reformation.

People lost respect for any rhetorical authority imposed by those who represented either church or state. They began to insist that reason, experiment, and the inherent dignity of the human being should be the arbiters of all truth. Between 1689 and 1789 the West saw these presuppositions and rationalizations enshrined in national declarations of human rights in England, the U.S., and France.

Western culture now seems fully committed to adopting this overall perspective.

Such a development, however, was only possible in a culture that had grown out of a Judeo-Christian tradition. Therefore in many cultures there is no comparable commitment. In a real sense, Christian mission is the parent of the human rights movement. There are several biblical principles that have profoundly influenced Western societies in this context: The Bible teaches that all of humanity is made in God’s image; the incarnation and passion of Jesus demonstrate the value of each person to God; God challenges us to work for a society characterized by righteousness, justice, and peace; he commands us to care for the weak and disadvantaged in society; Jesus calls us to love even those whom we might consider enemies.

This modern commitment to the dignity of every human being has influenced the theology and PRAXIS of mission to a great extent. Many Christians ask: “Surely loving our fellow human beings involves defending their basic dignity under God?” Mission is therefore seen as a participation in the struggles of life alongside the oppressed. If we are distant or afraid, then we lose the credibility of the gospel message of Jesus, who gave his life for the poor and oppressed.

Other Christians believe that this commitment to “rights” is essentially a humanistic endeavor; reflecting a worldview that is at odds with the gospel. People should be giving themselves to God, trusting in his goodness for their lives. Mission is therefore seen as a participation in helping people to trust God that their focus shifts from their daily needs to their eternal destiny. Evangelism, with the hope of conversion, is the proper aim of mission, as they see it.

It would not be an exaggeration to say that a critical issue in modern missiology is precisely the dialogue between these two views.

Humankind, Doctrine of. The Bible gives clear teaching on humankind’s origin, nature, and destiny (Gen. 1–2; Ps. 8; Acts 17:16–31; Rev. 5:9; 7:9; 20:1–6). Humans are the result of a direct act of divine creation in which God declares they have been made in his image (Gen. 1:26–27). The IMAGE OF GOD involves humans relating to the earth as vice-regents, just as God is sovereign over the entire universe; relating to God as chil-
Humankind, Doctrine of

Humankind, in filial fellowship, expressing a family likeness in righteousness, holiness, and integrity (Ferguson, 1988, 329). Humankind’s position in creation is unique, a “little lower than the angels,” yet with dominion and stewardship of all the rest of creation (Ps. 8).

From one human being God created every culture of humans to dwell on the face of the earth in a harmonious patchwork of cultural diversity (Gen. 1:28; Deut. 32:8; Acts 17:26). Humankind in its origin is one, from one set of human parents, and that unity is more basic to the Scriptures’ understanding of humankind than the equally God-ordained cultural diversity.

Though after the fall and flood God left humans in cultures to go their own ways and did not punish them in each generation for their waywardness, still they are responsible to him, for he did not leave himself without a witness to his divine nature, power, and goodness (Acts 14:15–17; Rom. 1:19–20). His desire was always for humankind to seek him, find him, thank him, and worship him (Acts 17:27; Rom. 1:21). But because of sin, all humankind’s religiosity is only blind groping and an ignorant, rebellious substitution of idolatry for the worship of the one true God (Acts 17:27–30; Rom. 1:21–32). So extensive have the effects of the fall been, that, left to themselves, humans do not seek God (Rom. 3:9–20) (see also FALL OF HUMANKIND).

Humankind’s destiny is twofold. Those human beings, some from every tribe, language, people, and culture, to whom Christ has applied salvation from sin and who have responded in faith to the saving good news, will enjoy an eternity at the end of time in the glorious presence of their Savior (Rev. 5:9). Those who continue, without repentance, in their blind rebellion against the one true God will experience the eternal punishment that such sin requires (Matt. 25:41, 46; Rev. 20:15).

The biblical teaching on humankind challenges the WORLDVIEWS molded by the WORLD RELIGIONS. While Islam does follow the Genesis creation account in its understanding of the origins of the human race (Koran 15:29, 32:9; 38:72), the monisms of Hinduism and Buddhism, and the interpenetration of matter and spirit in Chinese thinking do not. Their systems cannot accommodate a Creator God who stands over against his creation, particularly its crown: human beings.

Christian teaching uniquely espouses a personal relationship between God and human beings made in his image. Human beings’ position as vice-regents and stewards of all creation, with which Islam strongly concurs, stands against the passivity, the harmonious fitting into nature, which Eastern religions encourage.

The concepts of the image of God in humans and the basic unity of humankind provide a fruitful perspective for WITNESS. If all fallen human beings have the faint glimmers of the “family likeness,” then as Paul at Lystra, the witness can appeal to common humanity as a means to overcome the ignorant rebellion of non-Christian religions (Acts 14:15). If what humans have in common is more basic than what divides them, then thoroughgoing cultural relativism as a barrier against CROSS-CULTURAL COMMUNICATION of the gospel is effectively dismantled. At the same time, if God’s original design was for the earth to be filled with humankind living in a harmonious patchwork of diverse cultures, then ETHNOCENTRISM is effectively dealt with.

Today there is a call from inside and outside evangelicalism to somehow qualify the exclusive claims of Christ as unique Savior, who must be particularly, explicitly owned as Savior and Lord by those who would be saved. But Scripture is unequivocal. Jesus is the only way salvation is accomplished (John 14:6; Acts 4:12). Explicit faith in him is the only way it is applied to humans (Rom. 10:13–17) (see also UNIQUENESS OF CHRIST).

Two passages capture the key concepts of biblical anthropology in their interrelationships (Gen. 2:7; 6:17). “And the Lord God formed man from the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living being [nepheš—soul] . . . every creature [kalbasar—all flesh] that has the breath [ruach—spirit] of life in it.” Because of the range of meaning of the terms and their juxtaposition in various passages, there is an ongoing debate about whether the biblical view of the constituent elements of a human being is trichotomous (body, soul, spirit, 1 Thess. 5:23) or dichotomous (body and soul or spirit). If Genesis 2:7 and 6:17 may be taken as guides, together with other Scriptures, then the dichotomous approach seems best. Humans have a material component: flesh (a body) and spirit (an immaterial component). The soul refers to the whole person, though in various relationships.

The biblical teaching on the material component has both a positive and a negative aspect. Positively, though taken from the dust and in frailty returning to dust, a human’s body is part of a good creation (Gen. 1:31; Isa. 40:6). Indeed, it is destined for resurrection as a glorified spiritual body (1 Cor. 15:44). Negatively, since the fall, the flesh, the body of death, has been the seat of the sin principle, which works its will out through the misuse of the body’s appetites, the lusts of the flesh (Rom. 7:14, 18, 24; Gal. 5:16–24).

The immaterial or animating component of our constitution is spirit (Heb. ruach; Gk. pneuma). In the Bible the vocabulary can refer to breath (Gen. 6:17); the vital powers that sustain a person alive (45:26–27); and an aspect of the inner life, whether a disposition (Job 21:4; Ezek. 3:14) or the seat of cognition (Exod. 28:3) and will (Num. 14:24; Isa. 29:24). Scripture knows of nonhuman spirits, incorporeal, intelligent, feeling beings. Normally, this designates members of...
Humankind, Doctrine of the demonic hierarchy (Luke 4:33; Acts 19:12–16). It can speak of a human's spirit, not only as that dimension of the person that relates to God (Rom. 8:16; cf. 1:9). The Scriptures also use it to refer to a human's mode of existence in a disembodied state, whether in this life (2 Cor. 12:12; cf. 1 Cor. 5:3; Col. 2:5) or after death in the intermediate state (Eccles. 12:7; Luke 24:37–39; 2 Cor. 5:1–5; Heb. 12:23).

The biblical terminology for soul (Heb. nephesh, Gk. psyche) participates in much of the same range of meaning as spirit, but with some significant differences. Soul can refer to breath (Ps. 107:5) and life (Gen. 9:5) or seat of life (Mark 8:35), but it does so in an extensive way. The term embraces the whole person, either in the sense of physical existence (Matt. 6:25; Luke 12:19; John 10:11; Acts 2:27); or being a living being (Gen. 2:7); or individuality as a self (Ps. 7:2), even to the human with powers of reason, emotion, and will (Col. 3:23; 1 Thess. 2:8; Heb. 6:19). Although Scripture first and foremost views the human being as a unity, it presents every person as having a spirit, in or which animates, a physical body. But it describes each of us as a soul.

It is true that soul sometimes refers to the inner person, both in terms of desires and inclinations (Prov. 23:2; Jer. 2:24), including religious ones (Deut. 6:5). Humans relate to God and experience final salvation or condemnation. Does this mean that the Scriptures also participate in Greek thought, seeing humans as possessing an immortal soul? The biblical evidence as a whole points in another direction, having to do with eschatological and soteriological matters in which the soul stands for the person and any immortality is contingent, dependent on God who sustains persons in Eternal Life.

Biblical anthropology also challenges other religious worldviews. Since Islam builds its understanding on the same Genesis passages, it participates in the same radical distinction between the material and nonmaterial in humans as Christianity does. It equates the concepts of “soul” and “spirit” and differs from biblical teaching only in its view of the effects of the fall on the human race: the guilt is imputed to Satan, the sanctions and consequences to humankind.

Hindu thought from one standpoint views the atman (soul) as a distinct entity being reincarnated from life to life according to accumulated karma. From another, however, it participates in a monistic subjective ontology: all is soul. The macrocosm of paratanatman (the universe in its true essence as Supreme Soul) is viewed as essentially identical with the microcosm of atman in the individual. True enlightenment and release come when persons lose their identity in the universal consciousness (Supreme Soul) and are united with it in universal Bliss. Biblical thought challenges this monism as idolatry: deification of the human soul. It presents a solution to the problem of sin and suffering that is holistic, life-affirming, fully satisfying for the whole self.

In Buddhist thought the ontological soul is nonsubstantial and illusory. The most troublesome, but, when properly understood, most promising statement according to Buddha is “I have no soul.” The trouble comes from realizing the soul does not exist. The liberation comes from realizing that “I” also does not exist. The embracing of radical nonexistence is Buddhism’s way of dealing with the pain of illusory reality. Christians have hope for Buddhists for they declare that pain can be reckoned with, if we embrace an ontology with a transcendent, gracious, Creator God at the center guaranteeing the reality of and basic goodness of created existence. He created humans in his image as living souls, with the purpose that they relate to him forever in love and worship.

Animistic thought posits a world full of souls, understanding the world within the framework of immanent power. The vital principle inhabits whatever moves and lives. For humans there is an internal soul, soul-substance, which animates the body and temporarily resides in vital centers or products related to them (saliva, sweat, blood, sperm, tears). This is not a distinct entity, but an animating power made known through functional props (heart, brain), images (shadow, ghost), symbols (name, character sign), or its activities. There is an external soul, powers of the soul located outside the body. Here animists speak of the ability to leave the body and the fact of animal (totem) and human (shadow) doubles. Souls whether malevolent or benevolent may be manipulated, and must be appeased.

Chinese thought participates in this animistic thinking through its conception of the interpenetration of the material and nonmaterial aspects of the human. By linking the two souls of humans, po (spirit of the physical nature) and hun (a person's vital force: consciousness, intelligence), with the two essential components of the universe, yin and yang, the former acquire the same quality of interpenetration as the latter have. The vital force principle, chi, endows some with pure po and others with an admixture of evil. By education, the soul becomes an increasingly refined vital force that mediates between the human world and the spiritual realm. With “soul force” humans can be in touch with the dead and the highest spiritual realm: heaven. The soul helps the human achieve harmony with nature and to enter communion with the universe.

Biblical teaching, while concurring with the reality of the spiritual realm, presents a much simpler and unified view than animism does. By seeing humans as being a soul with body and spirit, made in God’s image with dominion over creation, the fear engendered by a false enchantment of reality through multiple souls, inhabiting multiple phenomena, may be overcome. Again biblical teaching has good news for Chinese thought. Humans are not under an ontological bondage to evil, which is inextricably mixed with the good in the soul. Rather, there are such distinctions between the Creator and the creature, humans made in God's image, yet fallen, that salvation can be achieved through the Creator God's atoning sacrifice of his Son. True harmony is reconciliation with God the Creator in Christ.

Hungary (Est. 2000 pop.: 9,940,000; 93,032 sq. km. [35,920 sq. mi.]). The life and witness of the Hungarian churches, including their missionary vision and activity, have inevitably been affected by the political and social condition of the nation. From 1951 to 1989 communist domination meant that all foreign mission activity was impossible. However, unlike some other Central and Eastern European countries, which were also under Soviet control, Hungary had a longer history of precommunist mission activity, and memories of this survived even during the worst years of the Cold War. In fact, through a kind of anomaly a representative of the Leprosy Mission continued to operate in Hungary for the whole of that time! During the same time, there was evangelical work among students, originally of an unofficial nature, but officially registered even before the demise of Soviet domination. Together, these ministries fostered missionary interest, prayer, and concern among Christian students. In at least some of the churches today there is the beginning of a genuine missionary movement.

The fascinating history of the Hungarian Protestant missionary movement from 1756 until 1951, especially in the Reformed and Lutheran churches, has been chronicled by Anne Marie Kool, who heads up a Protestant Institute for Mission Studies in Budapest. She shows how such diverse factors as the presence of the Czech Brethren bishop Jan Amos Comenius in Hungary in the seventeenth century, the Moravian influence in the eighteenth, revival impulses and the presence in Budapest of the Scottish Mission in the nineteenth, and the Student Volunteer Movement and Christian Endeavor at the turn of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, all contributed to the missionary movement in Reformed and Lutheran circles before the First World War, between the two Wars, and up to 1951. Hungarian missionaries worked among Jews and Muslims in the Balkans, as well as in Africa, China, Indonesia, and elsewhere. The numbers were never large, but had the communist period not cut it short it could have grown and developed significantly. Kool is currently involved in developing missionary interest anew in churches and among theological students in Hungary. Missionary interest in Baptist, Methodist, Brethren, and Pentecostal churches suffered similarly under Marxist rule but is also recovering and being developed with help and encouragement from Western Christian agencies.

Hunger. In accepting the presidency of the United States in 1960, John Kennedy stated, “We have the capacity to solve the problem of hunger in the world. What we need is the will.” Decades later the problem still exists.

What Is Hunger? There are five types of hunger: Undernutrition is where people have consumed insufficient food over an extended period of time. Malnutrition is caused by not enough nutrients in the food consumed. Some people also suffer from malabsorption when their bodies are unable to utilize the food eaten, often due to the presence of intestinal parasites. Seasonal hunger occurs in some rural communities where the food supply runs out before the next harvest is gathered. Finally, famine occurs when crops fail and food runs out.

Who Are the Hungry? The United Nations calculates that there are up to one billion hungry people in the world, approximately 20 percent of the total population. Up to 35,000 of these die each day from hunger and poverty-related causes, three-quarters of them children. Most of these people live in tropical countries with high populations or low and variable rainfall. According to Susan George, the hungry are people in poor countries, where governments have not made food for all a priority, mostly in rural areas, among the lower social classes, especially women and female children, and newborns and fetuses.

The Hunger Cycle. Hunger especially impacts children. In infancy many children are born underweight to overworked, underfed mothers. During childhood they ingest inadequate quantities or quality of food. In adolescence they are poor learners with low energy levels and during adulthood they usually earn only low wages, have little capital, and survive on an inadequate diet.

Myths about Hunger. Some believe that, like the poor, the hungry will always be with us. Myths about hunger include:
Hunger

1. There is not enough food. Actually there is plenty of food. It is more a problem of distribution and purchasing power.
2. Nature causes hunger. This is sometimes true but most hunger is due to human actions.
3. There are too many people in the world. Scientists suggest the world could grow enough food for up to fifteen billion people.
4. More food aid will solve the problem. It is more important to support local production and pay adequate prices for farmers’ crops.
5. Large farms are more productive. No, except for a few crops. Small owner-operated, labor-intensive farms will feed more people.

Solutions to Hunger. The hunger project suggests four actions must be taken. First, eliminating hunger must become a priority. Second, population growth should be slowed through the education and empowerment of women. Third, environmentally sustainable, appropriate food-growing technologies should be pursued. Fourth, more power and profit should be channeled into farmers’ hands. These actions will benefit everyone, rich and poor, well-fed and hungry.

The Bible and Hunger. The Bible describes hunger often—for example, in Egypt and the Negev wilderness, for David and his men and Jerusalem under siege. David (Ps. 146:7) and Mary (Luke 1:53) declare that God feeds the hungry, and we must also, for feeding the hungry is a mark of true religion (Isa. 58:7) and is to be extended even to enemies (Rom. 12:20). It is a factor in the judgment (Matt. 25:35–44). In the context of a hungry world Christians must respond to the immediate needs of malnourished or starving people and seek to change the structures which cause hunger.

Hunt, John (1812–48). English missionary to Fiji. Born in Hykeham Moor near Lincoln, England, he had very limited schooling and worked as a farm laborer. Following his conversion at age seventeen he became a Methodist local preacher. Largely self-educated, he went to Hoxton Theological Institution in 1835, developing considerable abilities in theology, Greek, and Hebrew. He married Hannah Summers and in 1838 they went to Fiji. The Fijian mission was still in its pioneering period and faced considerable opposition. Hunt, first at Somosomo and then at Viwa from 1842, made a notable contribution to the acceptance of Christianity through his translation work. He combined Methodist hymns with the use of Fijian chants for tunes. His translation of the New Testament, completed in 1847, helped standardize the Fijian language. He became the mission’s chairman in 1842. In the face of continuing opposition he drove himself, physically weakening his health but winning the admiration of friends and enemies alike for his saintliness. He was noted for his preaching, the centrality he gave to worship, his encouragement of revival, and the training he gave to Fijian teachers. His Letters on Entire Sanctification (1853) were an expression of his lifelong search for personal holiness.

Hyde, John (1865–1912). American man of prayer and missionary to India. Born in a Presbyterian minister's family, Hyde's call to mission work was confirmed while at McCormick Seminary after a night of prayer. He sailed for India in 1892.

Prayer was the defining quality of Hyde's life, initiated in response to a disturbing letter he read en route to India. In India, a scarcity of results eventually led him to an immersion in prayer. He invested thirty days and nights in prayer in preparation for the first Sialkot Convention, organized in the fall of 1904 to refresh missionaries and national workers spiritually. The success of these world-renowned conventions was attributed largely to Hyde's prayer. Later biographers appropriately dubbed him "The Apostle of Prayer."

Hyde displayed a tenacious desire to reach people for Christ. His prayer, "O God, give me souls or I die," inspired missionaries around the world. Through prayer in 1908 God gave him the goal of seeing one person per day come to Christ. This number rose to four per day by 1910.

After the 1910 Sialkot Convention, a doctor told Hyde to give up his exhausting prayer schedule or he would die within six months. Hyde chose prayer. His health failing, he left India in 1911. Once home, an operation to ease his severe headaches revealed cancer, to which he succumbed on February 17, 1912.

Ibiam, (Sir Francis) Akanu (1906–55). Nigerian medical missionary and church leader. Ibiam was the first African student at the University of St. Andrews (Scotland) medical school (1927–35), then a missionary doctor in Nigeria with the Church of Scotland. He founded the Abiriba hospital (1936).

He was an educational leader, becoming principal of the Hope Waddel Training Institute. Knighted by the British government in 1951, he was later appointed governor of his home region. He chose to stay with his Ibo people during the Biafran war, renouncing his knighthood and acting as a roving ambassador to gain aid. Following exile, he was honorably restored to Nigerian public life, becoming active in reconstruction and reconciliation efforts.

His own distinguished service gave weight to his criticism of missionaries as he observed them in mid-century. He felt they were “guardians of white supremacy” who did not “visit the homes of African Christians, much less the homes of non-Christians.” Despite resentment at his comments, he was elected one of the six presidents of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1961. Ibiam also served as President of the Christian Council of Nigeria, the All Africa Conference of Churches, established the SCM (Student Christian Movement) in Nigeria, was a founder of the Bible Society of Nigeria, and chaired the council of the United Bible Societies. He became a respected traditional ruler, Eze Ogo Isiala I of Unwana and Osuji of Uburu.

Iceland (Est. 2000 pop.: 282,000; 103,000 sq. km. [39,768 sq. mi.]). The Republic of Iceland is a large volcanic island in the North Atlantic. It is famous for its Viking founders (A.D. 874) and the world’s oldest parliament, the Althing (A.D. 930). While the first inhabitants of Iceland may have been Irish monks around 740, the Lutheran Church is officially recognized as the state church, with 95 percent of Icelanders claiming membership. The year 2000 marks one thousand years of Christianity. However, the majority of Icelanders are nominally Christian with little vision for missions; less than 10 percent regularly attend church. Prosperity, secularism, occultism, and New Age philosophies are working together to dechristianize Iceland. Currently, seven agencies have sent fourteen missionaries to Iceland, while only a handful of Icelandic missionaries are serving overseas.

Ideologies. The term “ideology,” derived from the Greek idea and logos, literally means “knowledge or science of ideas.” In a general sense ideology refers to a particular set of ideas or beliefs that distinguish a given group or perspective. In modern times the term has assumed various pejorative connotations and is used to refer to a collection of beliefs and values held by a particular group for certain “hidden” motives or for other than purely epistemic reasons. Thus ideologies are typically regarded as sets of ideas used by particular groups in support of certain economic, political, or social agendas. With K. Marx and F. Engels the term took on a specific meaning, referring to a set of beliefs presented as objective whereas in actuality they merely reflect the material conditions of society and the interests of the ruling classes. Thus the dominant ideas of any era not only reflect the views of the ruling classes but also serve their interests. More recently, the Frankfurt School, associated with J. Habermas, has developed the notion of ideology as a set of ideas and communicative structures inherently distorted by power relations.

Some examples of modern ideologies include political liberalism, Marxism, democratic socialism, nationalism, and fascism. Political liberalism, as found in the writings of Locke, Rousseau, Mill, and Rawls, teaches that personal liberty is a fundamental good and that the ideal society is one in which individual liberty will be maximized. Intrinsic to liberalism is confidence in individual autonomy and the right of the individual to think for himself or herself. This, in turn, tends to make the liberal very suspicious of any claims to absolute authority, including any claims to religious authority rooted in God and the Bible. Christian mission, which is based on belief in the authority of Scripture and a divine mandate to make disciples of Jesus Christ of all nations, will characteristically be viewed by liberalism as a direct threat to individual liberty through the imposition of some divine mandate for society.

MARXISM (as developed by Marx, Engels, and Lenin) is an economic theory advocating the ownership of all property by the community as a whole. Intrinsic to Marxism is confidence in the basic goodness and productivity of human beings as well as a denial of the existence of God. Thus Christianity's belief in human depravity and the sovereignty of God will be met with staunch resistance, since such religious beliefs are perceived to be serving the interests of the dominant classes by suppressing the lower classes and obstructing the progress of communism.

Democratic socialism, although similar to Marxism in some respects, is a theory of what is wrong with society and how these ills can be remedied through production and distribution by society as a whole rather than through private individuals. Contrary to this, the Bible advocates (notwithstanding some misinterpretations of Acts 2) responsible stewardship of property by the individual. Christianity is perceived as the sponsor of capitalism in spite of the fact that historically Christianity has existed in virtually all forms of society and is nonpolitical in its biblical form.

NATIONALISM is the belief that a nation exists more in terms of a given group of people than in terms of political boundaries, and that a nation's peculiar interests and security are more important than international interests and welfare. The primary virtues thus are patriotism and pride in a given nation's customs, language, or traits. In view of such attitudes as these, the Christian mission may be perceived (and historically this has unfortunately sometimes been the case) as an attempt to colonize and subjugate others in the name of a foreign religion.

Fascism stands in contrast to liberalism in its denial of the value of individual freedom. It is a system of government in which there is a rigid one-party dictatorship characterized by forcible suppression of anything that opposes it, such as unions, other political parties, and minority groups. Fascism is closely related to Nazism, but fascism originated in Italy in 1922 and Adolf Hitler later incorporated much of its ideology. These forces were defeated in World War II, but some extremist groups that are fascist in nature still exist. Their glorification of war, racist sentiments, and despotic tendencies are in direct conflict with evangelical Christianity, which is biblically required to avoid war if possible, to be indifferent to race and ethnic origin, and to respect incumbent governments regardless of their nature.

Conservatism in its purest form is the rejection of ideology. Whereas ideology is concerned with the rethinking of political and social systems, conservatism (as its name implies) seeks to conserve or maintain what it regards as good in the past and to uphold tradition. In this sense, biblical, evangelical Christianity is "conservative," for it consists in preserving intact the apostolic message from one generation to another.

If ideologies oppose the Christian mission it is in part because in the past some forms of Christianity forgot their true mission and took on political ambitions or at least unwittingly served in aiding political causes by exporting aspects of foreign cultures. This poses an obstacle that Christian mission must overcome through disassociation as it seeks to make disciples of all nations.

WILLIAM H. BAKER

Idolatry. Idolatry is a major concern in both the Old and New Testaments. In the Old Testament alone there are twelve different words relating to idols or idolaters. In the New Testament, idol (eido— or one of its cognates) is used almost thirty times. Under the old covenant, idolatry was strictly forbidden (Exod. 20: 4–5; Lev. 26:1; Deut. 5:8–9) and in the new, believers are warned to avoid any participation with the practices associated with idol worship (1 Cor. 8:7–12; 10:7; 1 John 5:21).

According to some historians, idolatry had its origin in the ancient kingdom of Babylon. This would seem logical in that it is the area of one of the oldest civilizations in recorded history. However, idolatry is instinctive in the heart of fallen people (Rom. 1:21–23) and could probably be assumed to have existed long before recorded civilization. There were at least two major forms of idolatry in the ancient Near East which influenced Israel: the worship of false gods through images and ceremony; and the false worship of the true God by means of images and pagan-influenced ceremony.

The basic concept behind idolatry is assigning divine attributes to some power other than the true God. Images are used as representations of the force or personality being worshiped and often reflect the divine attribute most coveted by the worshiper. For this reason, in paganism, multiple gods are represented because it is inconceivable that one being could possess all of the forces and mysteries witnessed by humans.

Israel, like all of fallen humanity, fell into idolatry because they sought a god with whom they could identify. The true God of Israel was invisible, mysterious, transcendent, and required behavior consistent with his own nature. Idols could be seen, designed to meet human expectations, and manipulated. They were morally weak like the humans who served them. Thus, the natural instinct was to gravitate toward that which was more consistent with human ideas and standards. The divine self-revelation given to Israel was so far beyond human design and concepts that Israel was easily seduced by the pagan ideas and religions which surrounded them.

Likewise, New Testament believers, most of whom had come from pagan lifestyles before their conversion, would be prone to return to the comforts of the familiar and humanly conceived. New Testament writers often warned of the dangers of the surrounding new religious systems which practiced idolatry in many forms. Paul implied that idolatry was more than just having an image before which to bow. In Ephesians 5:5, he stated that a covetous man is an idolater. Covetousness is the improper desire of some material object or place of power. In this sense, materialism can be identified as idolatry. Many Christians who would scoff at the idea of bowing before a statue or image are none the less prone to covet material goods. It is not uncommon to hear of Christians who have replaced dedication to God with the pursuit of money, career, entertainment, or other things of only temporal value.

For missionaries, idolatry can come in two forms. On the one hand, they will confront cultures (especially Hindu and Buddhist cultures) which openly participate in idol worship through images and ceremonies. Learning to communicate the invisible, transcendent, omnipotent, and sovereign God to those who are conditioned to relate to hundreds of deities is a significant challenge. It must be remembered that these missionaries do not have the luxury of the Old Testament prophets who lived in theocratic Israel. They cannot march into these foreign lands and chop down idols. They must convey the true and living God in a manner consistent with the New Testament commission.

The other form of idolatry may come from within their own hearts. Missionaries often sacrifice material goods, family, comforts, and human securities. In this sacrificial lifestyle, the temptation to become covetous or to substitute God’s work for more humanistic ideals of living is a serious enticement. Looking to medical doctors, savings accounts, or human advice in place of looking to God is idolatry. It needs to be remembered that God may use any of these human tools to bless and encourage his servants but they are no substitute for God himself.

Ignatius of Loyola (c. 1491–1556). Spanish founder of the Jesuits. Born in the Basque region of Spain, until 1521 he pursued a military career but during convalescence from a wound he was converted to Christ through reading devotional books. His resolve to change his life led him to write the Spiritual Exercises, a program designed to produce mastery of the will. A pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 1523 was intended to become a permanent mission to the Muslims of the Middle East and North Africa, but Christians in the area deterred him. He returned to study at the universities of Barcelona, Alcala, Salamanca, and Paris, at each place introducing students to the Spiritual Exercises. In 1540 he and six companions received papal permission to found The Society of Jesus. Ignatius trained his Jesuits for social service and missionary work, with special emphasis given to the establishment of educational institutions.

From 1547 until his death, he oversaw the expansion of the order throughout Europe, Asia, and the Americas. His Constitutions of the Society of Jesus outlined the educational philosophy of the order; it is still used in its original form today. The combination of spiritual devotion, academic rigor, and missionary fervor that came to characterize the Jesuits has been inspirational to Catholics and Protestants alike.

Illiteracy. It has been the contention of modern missions that people need to read the Bible. As a result, literacy programs have played a major part in Christian mission, and in some places literacy has been a requirement for baptism and church membership.

In spite of enormous efforts, both by Christian groups and by secular and government agencies, present literacy figures are rather startling. About 1.3 billion people are termed illiterates, but because many of those who enter school before they have fully acquired reading skills, many are functionally illiterate. It is estimated that less than half the world’s population are readers. Among some groups, in particular the poor and the outcast, literacy levels are as low as 1 percent. In some developing countries, women are illiterate and most girls are not in school.

It has been pointed out that only about 5 percent of Christ’s audiences were literate, and that in New Testament times people were evangelized and leaders were trained without a written Bible. Such achievements would seem impossible today given the modern world’s devotion to the printed text.

The need today is twofold. First, we need to encourage literacy programs so that as many as possible will learn to read and write. Power is associated with the printed page. The task is becoming increasingly difficult as people would rather watch television or listen to the radio. Second, we need to develop alternatives to print media. The fact is that hundreds of millions living today will never learn to read. We need to communicate the gospel to them in a form that is appropriate, and for most that means oral communication. The STORY-TELLING tradition among many people is as it was in New Testament times, well suited to communicating the Scriptures to those who cannot read.

Image of God. “Imaging God” means showing God’s attributes in actions and attitudes, words and works. God designed humans to fellowship with him, obey him, administer for him, and imitate him, including procreating more images, naming, prophesying, and influencing for righteousness. Thus work of all types, “secular” and “sacred,” images God, especially when energized with the Spirit’s loving power that brings all things into submission to Christ (Ps. 8:4–6; Col. 1:15–20).

God created humans as his images or “royal representatives” to glorify him. “Image” implies an audience, so imaging God was in itself a missionary endeavor: God assigned his royal priestly representatives to spread out and subdue the earth, including all the wilderness outside the Garden and the rebellious creature who would tempt the new couple to sin (Rom. 16:19–20).

God instituted the family as imaging procreation and organization, relating creatively and ruling beneficently. From the very beginning God designed individuals and families to glorify him as ambassadors, royal priests and prophets, “missionaries.” The only thing that changed through time under Israel and then via the GREAT COMMISSION was the specificity of the message God’s people were to take to the world. The core message has always been “follow the true God like we do, and let us show you the way.”

Image as a Missionary Polemic against Idolatry. This missionary message directly conflicted with the message of the images of other nations. Images from wood, clay, and metal conveyed the message, “worship our gods.” The creation account displays the superiority of persons as God’s living images over Baal’s lifeless images. Worshipping God with manufactured idols was futile (Exod. 20:4–5). The polemical intent of Genesis 1:26–28 may be paraphrased: People make images of Baal. Can you show me an image Baal has made of himself? God made humans as images of himself, so far superior to images of Baal as God himself is superior to Baal! Individually and corporately, in words and works, we show what God is like. This is our responsibility. Don’t reduce your beautiful complexity to a statue! How can an idol ever replace you: living, breathing, walking, talking, authoritative representatives of our God?!

The polemical continues in Genesis 5:1–3, when God’s image procreates in its own image—what image of Baal can do that? And in Genesis 9:6 the Lord states his justice in a manner the surrounding nations could easily understand: “If you attack the image, you attack God.” When asked to summarize righteousness, Christ essentially asserts the converse, “If you love the image, you love God” (Matt. 22:37–40; 1 John 4:20–21).

The biblical basis of civil government rests on the foundation that we each represent God to one another. Every person continuously images God in basic minimal ways: God’s breath blows through our being; God’s life flows in our blood; God’s light shines in our eyes. Every person must be treated with dignity as valuable to God. From the preborn to the terminally ill, from the profoundly handicapped to the profoundly rebellious, every person images God and may not be violated with impunity (James 3:9; see also PERSON, PERSONHOOD).

The prophets expand this polemic, insisting that individually and corporately Israel is God’s image, welded together by God’s strength, held upright by his power, decorated by his glory, enlivened by his Spirit-breath. When the nations bow before their images seeking guidance and power; their images remain silent. But when the nations listen to believers (God’s living images), through those royal representatives God guides the nations and promises to bless their obedience to his Word with the protection and provision, fecundity and fertility their gods fail to provide them (Isa. 40:18–31; 41:7–10; 41:22–42:1; 57:13–16; Jer. 16:18; Hab. 2:17–19).

Israel images God as children image their parents (e.g., Exod. 4:22; Deut. 32:5–6, 15–20). Israel glorifies God as a missionary to the nations in the same way a good servant accurately represents (glorifies) his or her master (Isa. 44:21–26; 49:3–6). On the other hand, when Israelites worship the images of the nations’ gods, they become like those images. The prophets describe an Israel which had become like the idols she worshiped: deaf, dumb, and unclean. Eventually God will cleanse Israel of the idols, removing hearts of stone, and breathing his Spirit into them: a recreation of Adam, a renewal of God’s image (Ezek. 36:25–27; cf. Ps. 115).

Transformed into the Image. Today the church images God corporately and individually, as God’s Spirit transforms believers into Christ’s image. Moses implied that a person fully images God by keeping God’s Law (e.g., Deut. 13:17; 14:2). In the New Testament, Christ “is the true image” (2 Cor. 4:4), in part because he perfectly kept the Law. We all are created “as Gods image,” for the purpose of representing God by fulfilling the Law of Christ.

Because the Spirit writes the Law in our hearts, we have the opportunity to represent God in a more complete way than could persons prior to the New Covenant (Eph. 4:23–24; 2 Cor. 4:1–6). Believers become God’s images more fully by Christ’s righteousness judicially applied to us and by the Spirit’s empowering us to live out Christ’s righteousness. In this way we display God’s glory shining through our holy love (2 Cor. 3:18; Eph. 3:10).

Being conformed to the image of Christ is inherently evangelistic and missionary (Phil. 1:27–2:16). As we act more every day like a child of our Father; a brother of our Lord, our family resemblance works itself out in all relationships, all activities, undergirding and enabling our witness.

Children Image Parents. Imitating God, Adam and Eve procreated a son in their own likeness, as their image (Gen. 5:1–3; Luke 3:38). Children represent their parents by being like them in many ways: physical appearance, values, and will. Believers carry on this responsibility by speaking and acting on God’s behalf, sharing his goals and values, mirroring his mighty abilities (Isa. 43:6–7). Our goal is to represent our loving Father perfectly (Matt. 5:45, 48). Our Lord repeatedly said that to look at him was to look at his Father; to honor him was to honor his Father (John 5:19–27; 14:9). Hebrews emphasizes the parent-child relationship as central to the concept of image: “The Son is the radiance of God’s glory and the exact representation of his being” (Heb. 1:2–5; 2:6–13). In loving actions we honor our Father; in unrighteous actions we dishonor him by grotesque caricature (1 John 4:12, 20). Persons who behave in an anti-Christ manner may be labeled “children of your father the devil” (John 8:44).

Corporate Representation. We image God by functioning together as men and women (Gen. 1:27–28; 1 Cor. 11:7). Every individual represents God at some level, but corporately we image more fully and clearly. A single man and woman working in godly cooperation with one another more fully represent God than either working alone. The two married and parenting godly offspring represent God even more fully. A gathering of godly individuals and families into God’s Family, Christ’s Body and Bride, shows a watching universe even more fully and clearly what God is like (1 Cor. 12:27; Eph. 3:6, 9–11; 5:1ff.; Rev. 22:17).

Immanence of God. The immanence of God is more than a theological dogma. It is a biblical reality which affects one’s view of natural phenomena, human events, and perspectives on value and responsibilities. Immanence primarily deals with God’s presence and activity within the realm of the created world and human activity. Particularly for mission efforts in a context of traditionally pantheistic cultures, the missionary must be cautious in expressing God’s immanence. However, this must be done without excluding the Lord of the universe from personal involvement with his created order.

Beginning with Genesis 1:2, “the Spirit of God was hovering over the waters,” Scripture emphasizes the Creator’s intimate connection with his creation. Genesis 2:7 demonstrates that his connection with the creature made in his own image is even more intimate. God infused his very breath into humankind to make humans to be living creatures unlike any other creature in God’s created system.

Unlike PANTHEISM, which teaches that everything is God or a part of God, or what Tillich called PANENTHEISM, meaning that God is not everything but is in everything (God is not a tree, but is in the tree), immanence is the view that creation is distinct from God and always dependent upon God. God is above his creation (transcendent to it) yet constantly involved with it. In Jeremiah 23:23–24, God declares that he is near to his creature and that he fills the heavens and earth. God’s immanence flows out of his permutation of the created universe. His knowledge and his power saturate the entire creation, but his essence is not contained in the material world. Thus the mission of the church involves participation with God in compassion and care of God’s creation.

In some cultures, the pantheistic view of God will confuse many and the Christian view must be clear in separating the material creation from the essence of God. Missionaries have confronted this problem for decades, but there is a new form which influences even Western societies. Some believe that God's presence is within nature, including human nature, and therefore being an extreme environmentalist or active social revolutionary can be seen as worshiping God. Whereas some of these causes may be noble and demonstrate a respect for God's creation, it is incorrect to assume that God's presence is in the material world. There must be a distinction between God at work in and through nature, and God being in nature.

In relation to the human race, the immanence of God teaches that he is actively involved with and near to his fallen creatures, “having determined their appointed times and the boundaries of their habitation, that they should seek God, if perhaps they might grope for him and find him, though he is not far from each of us” (Acts 17:26–27). The human race is dependent upon God and intuitively senses God's essence in the universe, "for in him we live and move and exist" (Acts 17:27; Rom. 1:19–21). Thus, one asset to missions is the reality that God is ever present with his servants and all his creatures made in his image. For this reason, classical Christian mission has always stood for early preservation and improvement of human life.

A message to the world in this age of environmental concerns and promotion of human rights is that God is truly concerned about these same issues (Matt. 6:26–30; 9:35–36; 10:29). God is a God who works through the natural world to provide for his creation (Matt. 5:45). The missionary must never make this truth the focus of mission to the point of confusing the gospel, but must show the world that God is near and concerned.

SEE ALSO Divine Attributes of God.

Immutability of God. Immutability refers to the unchangeableness of God. God claims this quality for himself, “For I, the LORD, do not change . . .” (Mal. 3:6). This truth does not, however, imply that God is a stagnant being frozen in an inflexible pose. The unchangeableness has to do with God’s character, essence, goals, and promises. For those who have learned of God in one culture, it may be important to understand this truth when moving into another environment where one encounters different understandings of the divine. God is the same regardless of the environment in which we may find ourselves.

Though God cannot change in character, he is changeable in replication or willingness to respond to a proper response to his Word. Jonah 3:4 records the words of God’s prophet: “yet forty days and Nineveh will be overthrown.” The prophet was saying what God had already declared, and he was confident that Nineveh would be destroyed. Yet, in verse 10, we are told that when God saw the repentance of the people, “God relented concerning the calamity which he had declared he would bring upon them.” God often works within contingencies and is “changeable” when circumstances are altered to comply with his conditions.

The divine constancy of God is both quantitative (he cannot increase in any attribute) and qualitative (he cannot improve in any area). God, in his attributes, nature, or promises, does not experience any sense of modification or variance. For the minister in a cross-cultural situation, it is important to keep this focus while attempting to communicate God’s truth. God cannot be altered to suit a particular ethnic group, generation, or race. God is God regardless of the cultural biases of any target group. For many Americans, the idea of a God who will judge and condemn the unregenerate was too primitive; thus, many liberal theologians created the conceptions of the Old Testament god who was warlike and bloody and the New Testament god who was loving and giving. Such theology is not biblical—the Lord who loved enough to die is the same God who created the worlds (John 1:1–14), and that God has not changed in his essence or attitude toward sin and judgment.

Being immutable does not imply that God does not understand and work within sequential events and logical order to bring about his plans. Within his constant program, he works through progressive revelation and in differing contexts having unique features. What may appear to be a change from a human perspective is no more than the next phase of the continuum of his redemptive plan, which when viewed biblically is consistent with his nature and revealed will.

A key verse in understanding the immutability of God and its practical application is found in James 1:17: “with whom there is no variation, or shifting shadow.” This verse addresses God’s goodness in bestowing gifts to his creatures and is intended to give comfort to believers who are facing trials (vv. 12–17). Regardless of the circumstances, because God has been, is, and always will be a bestower of good things, one may have confidence in him. The assurance of the believer that God will fulfill his promises and complete the salvation he has promised is based upon the immutability of God. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who has not forgotten the remnant and who will fulfill all the covenant promises, will keep his word because he does not change in the things he has promised. The prophet Malachi proclaims God’s own claim to the nation of Israel: “For I, the LORD, do not change; therefore you, O sons of Jacob, are not consumed.” The context goes on to point out that Israel had failed to honor God’s word and did not obey him. But God did not destroy them because he had made a covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and he will honor it. If God were to alter his character, his attributes, or his promises, then there would be no assurance of his promises. He is immutable and therefore trustworthy.

In-Service Education. Efforts by mission agencies, training schools, and churches to provide inservice education for their missionaries are poorly documented. Even so, the scattered information which is available reveals some encouraging trends.

Cooperative models are beginning to emerge. AVANTE mission in Brazil is combining its resources with those of missions schools and churches into an extended training program which begins with initial orientation and field experience, continues through advanced missiological studies, and culminates in a supervised term of service in a team situation in another country (Neuza Itioka in Taylor, ed., 111–20). North American agencies and schools are beginning to work together in helping missionaries to pursue a substantial portion of a master’s degree on the field.

Some in-service efforts are consciously adopting adult education methods (Brewer). A PRAXIS model which integrates new learnings with life experience is being employed. Times and places are flexible. Formal, nonformal, and informal delivery modes are all used. Missionaries are encouraged to pursue their individual goals within cooperative learning communities.

Agencies, churches, and schools are increasingly realizing that in-service education continues beyond the first term and home assignment. Ministries change and expand. Transfers to new geographical locations occur. Children no longer require full-time care (Taylor, 9, 10). Even retirement does not lessen the missionary’s educational needs.

A growing concern for the care and spiritual formation of missionaries can also be discerned. At least one agency offers a “mental health check-up” to returning missionaries. Mental health professional and mission leaders in the United States and Canada are convening conferences to explore issues related to missionary care (see Member Care).

Many church pastors are visiting fields to provide counseling and spiritual encouragement for their missionaries. Churches are also helping with funds for study programs, books, and journals. Others are initiating missiological dialogues with missionaries on e-mail. A few larger churches are offering their own courses and seminars for missionaries.

The explosion of resources for in-service education has also been encouraging. On Home Assignment, and often on the field as well, missionaries are being helped to network with formal study options in seminars, graduate schools, and universities; with nonformal opportunities at seminars, conferences, and institutes; and with informal possibilities through the resources of libraries, book stores, newspapers, radio, and television. In addition, computer technology is increasingly making bibliographic databases, independent study courses, missiological forums, and other resources available through CD-ROMs, the internet, and the World Wide Web.

In the midst of these encouraging trends, there are causes for concern: the gap between prefield orientation programs and the missionary’s initial field experience is sometimes wide and deep; continuing education can be haphazard, rather than planned and purposeful; the resources of national churches are seldom used effectively.

Missionaries are far more than human resources to be developed for missions. They are persons created in God’s image, growing in Christ-likeness, and infinitely more valuable than any task they may perform. When all is said and done, in-service education is ongoing disci-

Incarnational Mission. The dramatic opening of John's Gospel is foundational for understanding the meaning and implications of "incarnational mission." "In the beginning was the Word," the apostle wrote, "and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. . . . And the Word became flesh and lived among us . . ." (1:1, 14). The fuller context of the passage suggests that in Jesus, God identified thoroughly with humankind, and that God came in Jesus for the express purpose of disclosing not only God's love but also God's salvific intent for the world (3:16–17).

However the Gospel writer may have understood the nature of Jesus, the church has steadfastly regarded the incarnation to mean that God was "enfleshed" in Jesus. All the Gospels bear witness to the fact that Jesus was born in a specific time and place, into a particular culture, and that he lived, matured, worked, ministered, and died as a human being. In Jesus—who came to be called "the Christ" or the Messiah—God was thereby revealed as love, self-giving love, love vulnerable to the exigencies of human life including the assault of evil and death. Yet evil was not victorious. It was instead inexorably defeated in Christ's death and resurrection. God became a human being to redeem all humankind from the destructive power of sin and to reconcile and transform the whole of creation.

Belief in the incarnation raises profound questions about the nature of God and about the nature of Jesus Christ. Yet, from the earliest attempts to grapple with and understand who Jesus was, the incarnation—God's assuming humanness—has been pivotal in comprehending the Christian faith. The earliest church councils discussed, debated, and concluded that the "God was in Christ" affirmation (2 Cor. 5:19) means that Jesus was fully human and fully divine. Explications (or the theology) of the incarnation are found not only in Scripture, but also in a succession of creeds. Three branches of Christianity, especially the Orthodox, as well as Roman Catholic and Anglo-Catholic, customarily give more attention and emphasis to the doctrine of the incarnation than do Protestants. In fact, some evangelical theologies tend to accentuate the divinity of Christ so disproportionately that the ultimate result is a kind of Christological docetism in which the human nature of Jesus is virtually eliminated or is little more than a facade for his divinity. Maintaining theological balance has never been easy, as any comprehensive survey of the history of theology reveals. Yet when either the divinity or the humanity of Jesus is over-emblished, the outcome is a distortion of the nature of Jesus as represented in the New Testament. Mainstream Christianity has been unwilling to relinquish either the divine or the human nature of Jesus, though some theologians have given more attention to the meaning of the incarnation than others. Grassroots believers, meanwhile, appear to be satisfied to confess that in Jesus Christ God was uniquely revealed in history, and that in Jesus Christ the divine intent for humanity was definitively imaged. That there is mystery here no one denies. As Archbishop William Temple put it, anyone who professes to understand the relationship of the divine to the human in Jesus Christ simply demonstrates that he or she has failed to understand the significance of the incarnation (p. 139).

To refer to the incarnation as mystery, however, is not to suggest that it is "beyond us" or a kind of theological icon. Quite the contrary. As Donald Baillie said, the mystery will always be mystery, but the mystery is lessened once we realize that believing in the incarnation means accepting a paradox "which can to some small measure be understood in the light of the 'paradox of grace’" (p. 131). For the incarnation was not and is not primarily a doctrine. It was and is an event. It was a life lived, and it is a life to be lived. “He was made what we are,” declared Irenaeus, “that He might make us what He is Himself” (Adv. Haer., Bk. v. Pref. cited by Baillie, ibid.). Thus Paul could make the staggering claim, “For me to live is Christ” (Phil. 2:21). So committed was the apostle to the Christ who summoned, transformed, and “missioned” him, and so determined was Paul to communicate the same good news Jesus fleshed-out, that he could say, “I have been crucified with Christ, and it is no longer I who live, but it is Christ who lives in me” (Gal. 2:19–20). In these words believers find the most significant implication of the incarnation, namely, that Jesus Christ can be fleshed out in the lives of those who follow in Jesus’ steps (1 Peter 2:21). In essence, therefore, this is the mission of Jesus’ followers, to walk in Jesus’ steps.

Common in Catholic theological tradition is the idea that the incarnation of Christ is the link between God and the institutional church, or, even more specifically, it is the link between God and the sacraments by which believers become “partakers of Christ.” It is a short step, therefore, from seeing the Sacraments administered by the church as means of grace to regarding the plantatio ecclesiae as extending the incarnation.

In 1838, with the publication of his Kingdom of Christ, British theologian Frederick D. Maurice went beyond the conventional Anglo-Catholic understanding of the incarnation by positing specific social and political implications. In a sense, Maurice anticipated the approach to the life of Jesus developed by many liberation theologians during the last quarter of the twentieth century. For in terms of the social and political significance of the incarnation, it has been the liberation theologians who expounded the relationship of the incarnation in the world today. Jesus, they underscore, was born in a religio-political context of suffering, oppression, and injustice. He was counted not among the rich or the powerful but rather among the common, the nondescript folk from the hill country of Galilee. To inaugurate his mission, nonetheless, Jesus made an astonishing association: “The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me to bring good news to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim release to the captives and recovery of sight to the blind, to let the oppressed go free, [and] to proclaim the year of the Lord’s favor” (Luke 4:18–19).

His mission, as he described it, was to liberate the impoverished, the imprisoned, the sightless, and the oppressed. As it turned out, it was these kinds of people who became Jesus’ principal followers—the poor, the sick, the disabled, the despised, the marginalized, and the alienated—women, tax collectors, prostitutes, and others whom society scorned. Moreover, it was from these that Jesus chose his disciples whom he declared were “the salt of the earth” and the “light of the world” (Matt. 5:13, 14).

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, Latin American liberation theologians, following the lead of the Second Vatican Council, began asking what the incarnation of Jesus implied in a world beset with injustice, hatred, poverty, exploitation, premature death, and hopelessness. Though their response to the question incited intense debate—and more resistance than support from “officialdom”—the basic question they asked still resonated: Where is Jesus today? In a world in which the suffering, oppression, and injustice are evident, Jesus still remains. He was born in a religious-political context of suffering, oppression, and injustice. He was not counted among the powerful but rather among the common, the nondenominational folk, the “humble and lowly.”

In the Second Vatican Council, this was stated explicitly in the Declaration on the Church in the Modern World, Lumen Gentium (1965): “The Church must live in the world as a sign of Christ, as a living witness to his love and his justice, in order to be an instrument of salvation for the world and of the advance of the kingdom of God.” Furthermore, the Incarnation of Jesus is the central event of salvation history. As such, it is the basis of all theologies of the Christian faith, including theologies of mission.

Incarnation. Incarnation means a process of relating the Christian faith to the cultures in which the church is encountered. Incarnation, as a theological construct, is not a new idea but one that has been articulated by many Christian thinkers over the centuries. Theologians such as Jesus, the apostles, and the early church fathers all spoke about the Incarnation. However, in recent years, the concept of Incarnation has been renewed and redefined in the context of the contemporary world. Incarnation means that the Christian faith is not a static, static entity but rather a dynamic, living reality. It is a process that involves the ongoing relationship of the Christian faith to the cultures in which the church is encountered.

unifies the culture, transforming and remaking it so as to bring about “a new creation.”

Just as contextualization went beyond adaptation, so inculturation goes beyond accommodation. Rather than translating the concepts of the gospel in a new cultural setting by outsiders, it refers to the insiders of the culture integrating at the root of their culture the values, ideals, teachings, and orientation of the gospel and church tradition (see Luzbetak, 1988, 82–83).

While the general sense of inculturation so closely parallels contextualization that Protestants have little trouble with it, the emphasis on church tradition as parallel to the gospel in authority is a point of contention for Protestants who do not ascribe the same authority to church tradition as Catholic teaching does.

Independent Charismatic Missionaries. Charismatics, those Christians emphasizing the use of spiritual gifts, have been active in world mission for centuries but their specific contribution in the twentieth century came in three major waves. The first wave came with the formation of Pentecostal denominations, such as the Assemblies of God, at the beginning of the century (see The Pentecostal Movement). The second wave were charismatics who remained in mainline denominations, such as Anglicans, Lutherans, Presbyterians, Catholics, Methodists, and Baptists. Today, large numbers of missionaries from these two waves serve in nearly every country of the world.

The third wave are the independent charismatics who have formed their own churches and quasi-denominations. The first of these arose in Africa as prophets, pastors, and evangelists who broke off from existing traditions. These movements were normally evangelistic, so they supported a large number of evangelists and missionaries. Evangelists, preaching the gospel among their own people, were the most numerous but African indigenous missionaries, those who went to preach the gospel among other peoples and languages, were a significant force and today represent some six thousand cross-cultural missionaries.

Another significant independent charismatic movement is the Chinese House Church Movement. However, most of the Christian workers from this tradition are not cross-cultural missionaries, but pastors, teachers, and evangelists among the majority Han Chinese.

The bulk of the independent charismatic missionary force is sent out from the Western world. At least thirty thousand are sent out from churches in the West. Most of these are sent directly from their churches or through emerging quasi-agencies. Unfortunately, the vast majority have found the most fertile soil among Christians of other traditions, especially among Roman Catholics and Protestants in Latin America and sub-Saharan Africa, as well as, more recently, among the Orthodox in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. Nonetheless, today’s fifty thousand independent charismatic missionaries represent one of the fastest-growing segments of the global missionary force and are likely to contribute new and innovative approaches to world mission well into the twenty-first century.

Independent Nondenominational Mission Agencies. Being similar to “independent, nondenominational colleges,” the strength and weakness of an independent, nondenominational mission agency is that it does not depend for its existence or its priorities upon the outcome of the majority vote of any denomination or churchwide consensus, but rather upon the usually stricter scrutiny of supporters who take a special interest in its mission.

These characteristics are quite visible in the area of global Christian mission activity. For most of Christian history “missionary outreach” has rarely been the result of either local or denominational communities of believers making a decision as a whole to reach out in mission. Rather, minority enthusiasts within such communities have taken organized initiatives without waiting for a 51 percent majority vote of the entire group, be it local or denominational.

We can think of the case of William Carey as a classical example of a mission endeavor lacking the majority vote of an ecclesiastical body. His board was a highly committed minority or subgroup of his Baptist friends who only much later were backed by a denomination. By contrast, his student followers in Massachusetts—the young men in the so-called Haystack Prayer Meeting—were able with the help of some seminary professors to get official ecclesiastical encouragement to form the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, which then went on for quite a few years to function as the first major “interdenominational” mission in America. But because it was officially tied to a specific denomination it eventually became exclusively denominational and its work today is minimal. By contrast, the young men who organized the World Mission Prayer League within the Lutheran sphere never did get official denominational... backing, although they tried, but the WMPL is thriving to this day.

Minority initiatives have resulted in deeply dedicated people going out individually, like Samuel Zwemer, or in an organized team, often at great personal risk. This is not merely a modern phenomenon. The Celtic Peregrini, who were one of the most powerful forces for the taming of Europe, the Roman Catholic Orders, and the early Protestant missionary societies such as the Society for the Proclamation of the Gospel, the London Missionary Society, or the Church Mission Society were all minority initiatives. Until about 1870 mission organizations almost never resulted from the central initiative of ecclesiastical structures.

In America, where the concept of a “denomination” was first developed (implying that more than one church tradition can be legitimate), dozens of “nondenominational” mission thrusts took place long before the idea gained favor within the denominations themselves to establish foreign mission departments or boards. But around 1870 missions for a brief but important period became a denominational priority. Virtually every self-respecting denomination in America felt the tug as a denomination to become involved in its own name in world mission efforts. The same thing happened later in the century with the newer, small, strictly evangelical denominations.

The idea of official denominational initiative became so strong that soon it was widely assumed that denominational mission boards were not only the best way to go but the only theologically legitimate methodology of mission. What about the older well-respected “nondenominational” boards like the London Missionary Society (in England) and the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions? They had been serving valiantly for over fifty years. By 1870 these two began to discover that their denominational sources withdrew as denomination after denomination began to establish its own mission board. Denominational leaders quite often suggested—maybe even demanded—that their members no longer support “nondenominational” (or “interdenominational”) missions.

Thus, when the Foreign Mission Conference of North America (FMCNA) was formed in 1891, most of the board secretaries who met together were by that date denominational mission secretaries. By that time the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, for example, was no longer an interdenominational agency but simply the denominational board of the Congregational (eventually the United Church of Christ) tradition. That is, all other denominations had pulled out. Not only that, but the FMCNA would gradually ease out the few interdenominational boards that had attended its meetings. The China Inland Mission (now the Overseas Missionary Fellowship) was welcome to participate in the early period of the FMCNA, but there came a time when only strictly denominational boards were allowed a vote. By 1917 in America it behooved the interdenominational missions to form their own association, called the Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association (IFMA).

Meanwhile, the FMCNA went on through various mutations to become the Division of Overseas Ministries of the National Churches of Christ in the USA, while the IFMA, holding on tightly to its interdenominational character, gave reason for the appearance in 1945 of the EFMA (by 1995 called the Evangelical Fellowship of Mission Agencies) which specifically included the newer, generally smaller, and distinctively evangelical denominational mission boards of the member denominations of the National Association of Evangelicals.

The 1890s, however, was a period of great enthusiasm for global involvement in America, and consequently denomination-wide consensus in mission effort was reasonable and relatively easy. Because the Civil War had killed so many men in a key age bracket, women took over farms, businesses, banks, and founded what would later become elite women’s colleges like Wellesley and Bryn Mawr. Their efforts led to the formation of the highly mission-minded youth movement, Christian Endeavor, which is still the world’s largest Christian youth movement, and which in turn fueled the Student Foreign Mission movement, whose followers eventually moved into denominational leadership, greatly expanding denominational missions. By 1925 three-quarters of all American missionaries were sent out by the mission boards of what we think of today as the older denominations.

Unfortunately, the denominational boards of the major denominations found that while they had been successful in branding the interdenominational mission societies as second-class citizens, they were unable successfully to maintain their own steam as the interests of the majority of their members gradually turned elsewhere. Dozens of newer denominations, such as the Mission Covenant (now Evangelical Covenant), the Assemblies of God, and the Baptist General Conference tended to pick up the slack, but even greater compensatory growth came from the older interdenominational agencies, mostly in the IFMA, as well as completely independent agencies like Wycliffe Bible Translators. Three of the five agencies in the original group forming the IFMA—the China Inland Mission (now Overseas Missionary Fellowship), the Sudan Interior Mission (now Society for International Ministries International, working all over the world), and the Africa Inland Mission, International—became large and competent organizamissions, each with thousands of churches on the field as fruit of their labor.

By 1970 the involvement of older denominations in mission had shrunk back from 75 percent of all American missionaries (in 1925) to less than 5 percent. By the end of the century the larger part of the foreign mission burden was again carried by organizations supported by the “mission minority” which runs throughout virtually all denominations as well as independent congregations.

Granted, the first half of the twentieth century was dominated by the mission boards of denominations, and their contribution around the world is still a major gift to the global church. But the second half of the century, following the Second World War, saw a return to dominance by mission agencies not dependent on the majority of any one denomination.

Thus, the interdenominational or nondenominational mission boards have sprung up to make major contributions and continue to be significant mission structures. What would have happened if Wycliffe Bible Translators had not emerged to rally the troops to the difficult task of Bible Translation? By the end of the twentieth century few denominations showed either the interest or the expertise to make strong contributions in Pioneer Mission Work. By that time they were mainly content to focus on the relationships and well-being of their own overseas constituencies.

It seems on the face of it quite logical for there to be “interdenominational” colleges, seminaries, Bible societies, publishers, and mission agencies. What if the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association had bowed to the questionable ethnocultural case against Christian organizations not directly controlled by local or denominational church structures? Churches have found it possible to cooperate at the top level in the National Council of Churches and the National Association of Evangelicals, but those organizations have never functioned as “ecumenically” as the marvelous tapestry of collaboration by the agencies we see on the mission fields.

For example, once the World Council of Churches swallowed up the International Missionary Council, this allowed no room in that body at the global level for either the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association or Wycliffe Bible Translators (or any of the hundred agencies of the IFMA).

Worse still, in many of the strongly evangelical churches in the so-called mission lands the idea that only denominational structures are legitimate has gravely delayed the sponsoring of missionary activity by the overseas churches. In a replay of the American experience we once again find minority, interdenominational initiatives leading the way against the current of opinion.

Note the case of the two largest non-Western mission agencies: the Evangelical Missionary Society in Nigeria is the result of the work of an interdenominational board, SIM International; while the Friends Missionary Prayer Band in India derived from a “Daily Vacation Bible School” movement that was interdenominational.

India (Est. 2000 pop.: 1,022,021,000; 3,287,590 sq. km. [1,269,339 sq. mi.]). India’s inhabitants represent one-sixth of the people of the world and a population equal to that of all the countries of the continents of Africa and South America combined.

There was a thriving civilization in northwest India as early as 2500 B.C. which paralleled the ancient civilizations of Mesopotamia and Egypt. Aryans moved into India in the middle of the second millennium B.C. After the periods of the Maurya and Gupta empires and centuries of conflicts among many smaller kingdoms, the Mughal empire was established by the middle of the sixteenth century A.D.

European interest in India began with the coming of the Portuguese in the fifteenth century. By 1858 the British Crown took control of India. After many decades of largely nonviolent struggle for independence, India became a free country on August 15, 1947. Mahatma M. K. Gandhi and Jawaharlal Nehru were the two most influential leaders in this process.

India has remained a secular country. It upholds democracy and socialism, and in its foreign policy nonalignment. It has waged two wars with Pakistan and one with China over border disputes. There continues to be intense local struggles on religious and regional issues especially in Kashmir, Punjab, and northwest India. It is often a coalition of political parties that rules both the central and the state governments. What is amazing is that in spite of great diversities of races, cultures, languages, and religions, India remains relatively unified.

There are no legal restrictions in gospel work in the country as its Constitution grants freedom “to profess, practice, and propagate” any religion. Yet, there is strong opposition from militant Hinduism and often discriminatory actions of local officials which discourage evangelistic activity and conversion to Christ.

India’s People. The people of India belong primarily to the Aryan and Dravidian races, though roughly five thousand ethnolinguistic people groups have been identified. There are fifteen official languages in addition to English (taught in of religious and cultural life. An estimated 15 percent of India's population is Muslim, with about 12 percent belonging to Islam, which was introduced in India in the eighth century A.D. According to a report in 2021, about 80 percent of the population in the Indian state of Kerala is Muslim, with the state having the highest Muslim population in the country. Other religions include Sikhism, founded in the fifteenth century A.D., with about 2 percent of the population, and Buddhism, which began in India in the sixth century B.C., with about 1 percent of the population. Hinduism is the most widely practiced religion in India, with about 80 percent of the population identifying as Hindu. Christianity is practiced by about 2 percent of the population, with the largest Christian denominations being the Roman Catholic Church and the Indian Orthodox Church. The Church of South India, a major Anglican body, also has a significant presence. Other religions include Islam, Sikhism, Buddhism, Jainism, and Parsiism. The country is also home to a significant number of people who identify as non-religious or are not affiliated with any particular faith.

The religious landscape of India is characterized by a complex mix of indigenous religions and influence from various external sources. Hinduism, with its rich traditions and diverse forms, continues to be the dominant religious force in the country, while the Islamic and Christian religions have also gained a significant following. Other religions, such as Sikhism, Jainism, and Parsiism, have also made their presence felt, especially in regions where they have a strong historical and cultural connection. The religious diversity of India is a result of the country's historical trajectory, which has been marked by periods of migration, invasion, and cultural exchange. This has resulted in a rich tapestry of religious traditions and practices that have evolved over centuries.

The religious landscape of India has also been shaped by the country's political and social upheavals. The British colonial rule, which lasted from the mid-eighteenth century to the mid-twentieth century, had a significant impact on the religious landscape of India. The colonial authorities sought to reinforce the power of the Brahmin caste by promoting Hinduism and suppressing other religions. This led to the creation of the Hindu nationalist movement, which continues to be a significant force in Indian politics.

India's religious diversity has also been a source of both strength and weakness. While the country's religious diversity has helped to foster a sense of national identity, it has also led to tensions and conflicts. Religious intolerance and violence have been a recurring theme in Indian politics, with incidents of communal violence occurring from time to time. However, the Indian government has taken steps to address these issues, and efforts are being made to promote interfaith harmony and understanding.

In conclusion, the religious landscape of India is a complex and diverse one, characterized by a rich tradition of indigenous religions and influence from various external sources. The country's religious diversity has helped to foster a sense of national identity, but it has also led to tensions and conflicts. Efforts are being made to address these issues, and the Indian government is working to promote interfaith harmony and understanding.

Indian Evangelical Mission (IEM). Founded in 1965 as the indigenous missionary agency of the Evangelical Fellowship of India, the Indian Evangelical Mission grew from 5 missionaries in 1968 to 41 in 1976. In 1978, there were 88 missionaries in the field, a number that increased to 151 in 1987 and 310 in 1992. Missionaries under appointment roughly doubled every five years. By 1997 there were 430 missionaries and 15 overseas associate missionaries serving among 68 people groups at 87 mission stations. About 95 percent of all financial support comes from within India; most of it raised by honorary area secretaries through prayer groups.

Candidates are recruited through national and state missionary conventions and promotional meetings in churches. Those selected are sent to the Training Institute at Dharmapuri in Tamil Nadu. Courses include linguistics, anthropology, evangelism, religions, village health care, bookkeeping, and other practical skills. The first year is probationary for all missionaries. The IEM engages in evangelism, teaching, medical ministry, and church planting. In addition to overseeing tribal children’s hostels and various development projects, the IEM is translating the Bible into 11 languages.

Indian Mission Boards and Agencies. Thousands of Indian missionaries are presently serving under some two hundred indigenous mission organizations. Indigenous Christian missions are not new to the Indian context. Early indigenous agencies still active include the Mar Thoma Syrian Evangelistic Association (organized in 1888), the Indian Missionary Society of Tirunelveli (1903), and the National Missionary Society (1906). The India Missions Association (IMA), created in 1977 to coordinate the activities of the various indigenous missions, in 1994 claimed 75 members and 11,000 Indian missionaries. The Indian Evangelical Team (IET) was the largest, with 1,032 pioneer missionaries in fourteen states. Many other mission organizations are not members of IMA. It is difficult to ascertain the number. A 1992 study identified 275 agencies engaged in cross-cultural and other direct missionary activity. An index included 103 agencies, 76 of which listed pioneer evangelism. Tamil Nadu has the largest number of mission headquarters, followed by Kerala and Andhra, Pradesh.

What precisely is an indigenous Indian mission? Definitions vary, but Indian mission boards and agencies may be delineated in terms of missionary work that is rooted in the Indian churches and has an Indian identity. They are not a copy or continuation of the foreign missions that worked in India over the past two centuries, but are a genuine expression of the missionary spirit of Indian churches and Christians.

India has two main types of mission boards. One is church-based and denominational. Examples include the Mission Board of the Presbyterian Church of North East India, the Zoram Baptist Mission of Mizoram, the Nagaland Missionary Movement, the Mar Thoma Syrian Evangelistic Association, and the various diocesan mission boards. This pattern prevails in northeast India. The other is the nondenominational or interdenominational mission. Examples include the National Missionary Society, INDIAN EVANGELICAL MISSION, FRIENDS MISSIONARY PRAYER BAND, and various independent agencies. This pattern predominates in the south. Yet this is only part of the picture.

Mission is not the exclusive domain of the mission societies. Churches and denominations themselves are also vehicles for missionary outreach. This is especially true of the rapidly expanding Pentecostal movement in India. At Madras the New Life Assembly of God sends and supports its own missionaries to other parts of India. In another instance an entire new field has been opened by missionaries sent from one local congregation at Chrompet, Madras, which also functions as a mission society (GEMS—Gospel Echoing Missionary Society). Further, independent workers have had an important role in penetrating new areas and establishing Pentecostal churches and agencies.

Roman Catholic missionary orders have not been included in most studies of indigenous missions, probably because little distinction is made between indigenous orders and those of non-Indian origins. The latter are thoroughly indigenous in personnel and management. The Catholic contribution is in fact enormous.

Indianized international Protestant agencies include Inter-Serve (India), Operation Mobilization, and Youth With a Mission. Various specialized social ministries—drug rehabilitation, education, literature, medicine, projects with youth, the poor, the destitute, and slums—also form part of the missionary edge of the Indian churches.

Indigenization. In the broadest sense, indigenization is a term describing the “translatability” of the universal Christian faith into the forms and symbols of the particular cultures of the world. Still widely accepted among evangelicals, the word validates all human languages and cultures before God as legitimate paths for understanding his divine meanings.

Indigenization provided the freedom for the Greek translators of the Hebrew Old Testament (the Septuagint) to take a word like theos from the idolatrous world of polytheism and use it to describe the only Creator of heaven and earth, the God (theos) and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Indigenization enabled first-century Christian Jews in Gentile-dominated Antioch to cross a massive cultural barrier and begin preaching to the Greeks (Walls, 1996, 17). They knew that their time-honored word Christ would mean little to their neighbors. So they used another name to identify their Messiah in this new cultural setting: “the Lord Jesus” (Acts 11:20).

The same process of indigenization allowed freedom for the emerging churches of the world to wrestle with infusing traditional cultural and social practices with new Christian meaning. Patterns of worship and music, of initiation, marriage, and funeral rites, even of church structure and leadership could be adapted or transformed by the gospel.

The Boundaries of Indigenization. Indigenization is born out of the tension created by two realities. One is the recognition that Christians bring with their faith the particulars of their culture and social group and best appropriate that faith in terms of those particulars. The other is the recognition that this new Christian faith brings with it a universalizing factor that extends the Christian community past the particular borders of culture and group.

Indigenization as a process asks, How can the church be a universal, global Christian community and also a particular community, shaped within its own culture and society? How can the gospel flower be planted in new soil without also planting the foreign flower pot?

Working within these boundaries is not easy. How do the churches keep the balance between freedom to develop on their own path and allegiance to the transcultural gospel uniting all the churches? What should be the relation of a Christian church to its non-Christian past? When does indigenization in the name of Christian liberty slip into over-indigenization or SYNCRETISM? When does hesitation over indigenization slip into legalism and traditionalism?

Toward a Biblical Framework. The legitimacy of this process flows from the “accommodations of God himself” (Battles, 1977, 19–38). Revelation itself comes with a sensitivity to the time, place, culture, and literary genres of its receptors but never with capitulation to error. There is a history to special revelation; the condescending Father communicates truth to us in a form suited to our particular human situations (see BIBLE; Vos, 1948, 11–27).

Out of the reservoir of ancient Near Eastern metaphors God paints himself as the divine warrior (Exod. 15:1–3) come to deliver his people from Egypt. He reshapes the treaty language of the ancient Hittite codes from their polytheistic connections to draw a picture of the covenant made between Creator and creature, Redeemer and redeemed (Exod. 20:1–17). He encloses his eternal Word in the limiting wrappings of the Hebrew language, his own coming in the God-man Jesus Christ, the Word of God incarnate as a first-century Palestinian Jew.

In the fullness and power of his Holy Spirit he breaks through that Hebrew sociocultural world to proclaim Christ both across and within the global borders of cultural diversities and linguistic expressions (Acts 1:8). Pentecost transforms the Babel curse of diversity into global blessing; we are called to be all things to all people in order to save some at any cost (1 Cor. 9:23). The world’s cultures become home where the gospel takes root. And the gospel becomes the leaven in which those cultures are judged, transformed, and liberated.

The Rocky Road of Indigenization. This apocalyptic balance did not always appear in the centuries that follow. Within the Roman Catholic Church, ACCOMMODATION grew as a middle ground of gradualism. The imperfections of the pagan world of nature were to be supplemented by the perfections of grace. Thus, in the seventh century Pope Gregory the Great advised Augustine, his evangelist laboring in England, “to destroy the idols, but the temples themselves are to be sprinkled with holy water; altars set up, and relics enclosed in them.”

Later Jesuit experiments particularly in China moved in a similar direction. Matteo Ricci saw the Chinese homage to Confucius and to the ancestors as ritual expressions of gratitude not inimical to the Christian faith. He “found in Confucius the natural theology, the preparatio evangelica, of China as his theological training had given him this for the West in Aristotle” (Allen, 1960, 39).

In Europe observers often matched Jesuit enthusiasm. The philosopher Leibnitz could argue, “I almost think it necessary that Chinese missionaries should be sent to us to teach us the...
Indigenization

aim and practice of natural theology, as we send missionaries to them to instruct them in revealed religion.”

In the face of mounting opposition by the Dominicans, confusion, and misunderstanding, in 1744, the papacy said enough was enough. Such experiments in accommodation were condemned and Roman Catholic missionary churches found themselves required to reflect in every detail the Catholic customs of the moment. Not until 1938 was that ban lifted. And not until the years following the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) did Roman Catholic missiology seek to reclaim and correct features of the accommodation model in what is now called Inculturation (Luzbetak, 1988, 82–83).

Protestant models in the nineteenth century promised more freedom but often practiced a similar reluctance toward indigenization. There were many reasons for the hesitancy: a long history of Ethnocentrism that identified things Christian with the superiority of things Western; the shaping role played by the missionary “outsider” in the receptor culture; the sense that the “native church” was still too immature to be “let go”; the emerging national churches’ own identification of the shape of Christianity with its European models.

The promotion of the “indigenous church formula” (see Indigenous Churches) in the latter half of the nineteenth century began to break through these patterns. Developed by the missionary community to identify the emerging church, the “three-self” understanding of the church as self-governing, self-propagating, and self-supporting became a stepping stone to other questions that would expand into the twentieth century.

The indigenous church began to ask, What were the implications of selfhood beyond the “three-sells”? Could the local church possess all three sells and still look and sound “foreign”? The recall of foreign missionaries during World War II and the breaking up of Western Colonialism gave the global church the long promised freedom to press these questions.

Indigenization became the slogan word under which such questions were asked. How could the church now be itself, responsible to the Lord and to its own cultural world (Beyerhaus and Lefever, 1964)? How could the church now planted on six continents be a viable, prophetic force in its own culture, reflecting the full power of the gospel in every part of its social context?

Since the 1970s the term Contextualization has also been used to include these discussions and to add other topics. What of the self-theologizing of the global church? Indigenization is being seen as more than what is happening on “the mission field out there.” It is a reflection process that does not exempt the West from self-analysis. Indigenization/contextualization now places the burden of initiative and responsibility “squarely on Christians in the local context” (Taber, 1991, 177).

Indigenous American Religions. It is somewhat difficult to apply the term “religion” to the indigenous peoples of America. Some Native American peoples have neither the word nor the concept of religion in their language. For them the entire life experience is an integrated set of belief and behavior that includes everything that is physical, social, emotional, cultural, political, material, non-material, spiritual, secular, supernatural, and mystical.

Also, it must be pointed out that there is no single dominant religion among Native Americans. Each group has a religious tradition that is unique to its own heritage. Native Americans do, however, share certain common religious characteristics. Some of these are to live in harmony with nature and the universe; respect for “Mother Earth”; belief in spirits; the practice of communicating with the powers of nature; shamanism; ritualism; and creation stories.

A large number of American Indians are involved today in practicing and adhering to the religious traditions of their ancestors. Also, it is to be noted that in Native American communities all across America there is a revived interest on the part of many to return to the heritage and traditions of their fathers and grandfathers.

The intrusion of outside religious concepts and practices have had an impact on many of the tribal traditions, causing considerable opposition and/or change. There are at least four major influences today that are affecting the religious thinking and practice of American Indians. These are: pan-Indianism; the New Age Movement; The Native American Church; and Christianity.

Although the term “pan-Indian” has a considerably broader definition, it is used here specifically to describe the practice of an Indian from one group borrowing and adopting the religious beliefs and practices from another Indian that were not necessarily a part of his/her own group’s tradition. This phenomenon occurs frequently at pow wows where Native Americans are dressed in “traditional,” fancy-dance, or grass dance and jingle dress costumes that are not particularly a part of their own tribal tradition. For many Indians the pow wow is much more a social event than a religious one, but for some participating...
Indigenous Churches.

The term “indigenous” comes from biology and indicates a plant or animal native to an area. Missiologists adopted the word and used it to refer to churches that reflect the cultural distinctives of their ethnolinguistic group. The missionary effort to establish indigenous churches is an effort to plant churches that fit naturally into their environment and to avoid planting churches that replicate Western patterns. Missionary efforts to establish indigenous churches are attempts to do missions as the apostle Paul did. A brief recital of Paul’s missionary methods demonstrates this fact. Paul served as an itinerant missionary, never staying more than three years in any city. Paul’s approach to evangelizing regions was to plant churches in cities from which the gospel would permeate the surrounding areas. He never appealed to the churches in Antioch or Jerusalem for funds with which to support the new churches. Rather, he expected the churches to support themselves. Paul appointed and trained elders to lead all the churches he planted. He gave the churches over to the care of the Holy Spirit, but he also visited them and wrote to them periodically.

Henry Venn (1796–1873) of the Church Missionary Society and Rufus Anderson (1796–1880) of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions first used the term “indigenous church” in the mid-nineteenth century. They both wrote about the necessity of planting “three-self” churches—churches that would be self-supporting, self-governing, and self-propagating (Venn used the term “self-extending”). They exhorted missionaries to establish churches that could support themselves, govern themselves, and carry out a program of evangelism and missions. They cautioned missionaries about becoming absorbed in pastoring and maintaining churches, insisting that the missionary’s primary task must be planting new churches that would be “self-reliant” and “purely native.” They instructed their missionaries to train national pastors and hand the care of the churches over to them at the earliest opportunity. Venn coupled the concept of indigenous churches with euthanasia in missions. By euthanasia he meant that missionaries should plant churches, train leaders, and then move on to new, unevangelized regions. Henry Venn believed that missionaries should always be temporary workers, not permanent fixtures.

JOHN L. NEVIUS (1829–93), a Presbyterian missionary to China, built on Venn and Anderson’s indigenous principles in his classic work, Planting and Development of Missionary Churches. Nevius developed a set of principles that came to be called “The NEVIUS PLAN”: (1) Christians should continue to live in their neighborhoods and pursue their occupations, being self-supporting and witnessing to their co-workers and neighbors. (2) Missions should only develop programs and institutions that the national church desired and could support. (3) The national churches should call out and support their own pastors. (4) Churches should be built in the native style with money and materials given by the church members. (5) Intensive biblical and doctrinal instruction should be provided for church leaders every year. In his writings Nevius criticized the heavily subsidized work that most missions carried on in China. Nevius’s principles had little impact in China, but when the American Presbyterians began their work in Korea, the new missionaries invited Nevius to advise them. They adopted his plan and enjoyed great success.

ROLAND ALLEN (1868–1947), an Anglican priest, served as a missionary in China with the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts from 1892 until 1904. Like Nevius, he criticized the methods employed by most missions in China. He wrote several books, but expressed his philosophy of indigenous missions in Missionary Methods: St. Paul’s or Ours? (1912) and The Spontaneous Expansion of the Church (1927).

Allen emphasized the role of the Holy Spirit in missions and encouraged missionaries to work in itinerant church planting, trusting the Holy Spirit to develop the churches. Allen’s main principles are these: (1) All permanent teaching must be intelligible and so easily understood that those who receive it can retain it, use it, and pass it on. (2) All organizations should be set up in a way that national Christians can maintain them. (3) Church finances should be provided and controlled by the local church members. (4) Christians should be taught to provide pastoral care for each other. (5) Missionaries should give national believers the authority to exercise spiritual gifts freely and at once. Allen’s principles have influenced many twentieth-century missiologists, most prominently DONALD MCGAVRAN.

MELVIN HODGES (1909–86), a missionary and mission administrator with the Assemblies of God, wrote The Indigenous Church (1953). Widely used in missions courses, this book expressed the ideas of Venn, Anderson, Nevius, and Allen in an updated, popular format. Hodges acknowledged the difficulty missionaries experience in changing a field from a subsidy approach to an indigenous approach. He also emphasized training national workers and giving them responsibility for the care of the churches, freeing the missionaries to concentrate on starting new churches.

In his book, Verdict Theology in Missionary Theory, ALAN TIPPETT (1911–88) updated the three-self formula of Henry Venn. Tippett served on the faculty of the School of World Mission at Fuller Seminary and was a member of Donald McGavran’s inner circle. The writings of Tippett, McGavran, and others show that the CHURCH GROWTH MOVEMENT accepted and built on the work of the earlier proponents of indigenous missions.

In Verdict Theology Tippett proposed a sixfold description of an indigenous church: (1) Self-image. The church sees itself as being independent from the mission, serving as Christ’s church in its locality. (2) Self-functioning. The church is capable of carrying on all the normal functions of a church—worship, Christian education, and so on. (3) Self-determining. This means the church can and does make its own decisions. The local churches do not depend on the mission to make their decisions for them. Tippett echoes Venn in saying that the mission has to die for the church to be born. (4) Self-supporting. The church carries its own financial burdens and finances its own service projects. (5) Self-propagation. The national church sees itself as responsible for carrying out the GREAT COMMISSION. The church gives itself wholeheartedly to evangelism and missions. (6) Self-giving. An indigenous church knows the social needs of its community and endeavors to minister to those needs.

Tippett summarizes his understanding of the indigenous church with this definition: “When the indigenous people of a community think of the Lord as their own, not a foreign Christ; when they do things as unto the Lord, meeting the cultural needs around them, worshipping in patterns they understand; when their congregations function in participation in a body which is structurally indigenous; then you have an indigenous church” (136).

In recent years some missiologists have suggested adding a seventh mark to Tippett’s list—self-theologizing. They believe a truly indigenous church will develop its own theology, expressed in culturally appropriate ways. These theologies would affirm the central doctrines of the Christian faith, but they would express them using metaphors and concepts that reflect their own unique cultures.

Missionaries who seek to establish indigenous churches should keep these principles in mind as they begin their work: (1) Missionaries should plant churches with the goal in mind. This means that the desired outcome—an indigenous church—should influence the methods employed. (2) There will always be a dynamic tension between supracultural doctrines and variable cultural traits. (3) Church planters should expect the churches to support themselves from the beginning. (4) Bible study groups should be encouraged to make basic decisions even before they organize as churches. (5) Missionaries should encourage new congregations to evangelize their communities and seek opportunities to begin new churches. (6) Missionaries should always use reproducible methods of evangelism, teaching, preaching, and leadership. (7) Missionaries should give priority to developing nations to serve as church leaders. (8) Missionaries should view themselves as temporary church planters rather than permanent pastors. (9) Missionaries should resist the temptation to establish institutions and wait for the national church to take the initiative. (10) Missionaries must allow the national churches to develop theologies and practices that are biblical yet appropriate in their cultural settings.

Individualism and Collectivism. A minority of the world’s peoples live in cultures where individual interest (individualism) prevails over group interest (collectivism). Individualism is strong in the United States, Canada, Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Italy, and Western European societies. Collectivism dominates elsewhere. However, even in predominantly collectivist nations exposure to Western individualist-oriented media may shift urban groups toward individualism.

Individualism assumes that a person is the essential unit of society; collectivism assumes that a group is the basic unit. Ties between individuals are loose in an individualist society, but in a collectivist society people are woven into a cohesive unit to which they give lifelong loyalty.

A person has significance in a collectivist society only as a member of a group. In contrast, one person in an individualist culture has significance that is expressed through individual choices and actions with only secondary reference to the group.

The “group” in a collectivist society may be the extended family, the work group, caste, or entire tribe. Whatever the particular group, its survival is paramount. Group goals control social behavior, and loyalty to that group is fixed. Loyalty means the sharing of resources, whether for living expenses or for special group efforts. It is expressed and reinforced in obligatory participation in funerals, weddings, and other ritual occasions as well as in group crises.

On the other hand in an individualist society, the group is used to achieve individual objectives. There is a loose loyalty to the group, which may be disavowed if individual preferences seem to be better served elsewhere. Sharing of resources is not expected, since individuals are responsible for meeting their own needs and desires. Participation in ritual occasions is expected, but not compulsory, to maintain good standing in the group.

Variation along this individualism—collectivism continuum is perhaps the single most significant dimension of culture differences. It is related to major differences in cultural values and patterns, social systems, morality, religion, and economic development.

Leadership and Change. In a collectivist society the leader often “embodies” the characteristics of the group. The group identifies with the leader, so that the character, beliefs, wealth, and power of the leader are seen as an expression of the group. When the leader changes, the group changes.

Change in a collectivist society may also come when a large part of the group changes, catalyzing change in the remainder of the group. Decision is reached by consensus rather than by voting, which is the sum of individual choices (see DECISION-MAKING). Group opinion is dominant, and personal opinions either do not exist or are not tolerated. The person who does not speak or act in harmony with group opinion is considered to have a bad character.

To understand an individualist culture, study of individual beliefs and values gives the best picture. Leaders may reflect opinions and beliefs of a majority of members in an individualist society, but their authority rests on gaining or losing support of individual members. The leader’s view does not necessarily express the views of the society as a whole.

Authoritarian behavior is more acceptable in collectivist cultures, and a greater social distance exists between leaders and those they lead. In contrast, individualists are most comfortable in horizontal relationships with minimal social distance between employer and employee, or leaders and group members. Individualists will seek to reduce social distance, often only reluctantly recognizing vertical relationships, while collectivists are more likely to increase social distance and reinforce a higher status for leaders (vertical relationships).

Cooperation and Confrontation. Within the in-group of a collectivist society, cooperation is extensive. Confrontation is unacceptable. Members will often mediate any conflict within the group that threatens group stability and harmony. Any perceived threat to the group’s existence is dealt with severely by the power of the group, rejecting the person or cause of the threat. Loss of group membership is similar to being made a non-person without rights or essential support for survival.

In an individualist society, individuals compete with and confront other individuals. Status is achieved through individual accomplishments, rather than by group membership. Confrontation is encouraged to achieve understanding and clarify the rights and limits of individuals. Group membership is relatively unimportant, allowing great freedom for a variety of individual choices.

Communication. Collectivist societies utilize their total context for communication—including space, time, body motion, objects, taste and smell, touch—giving a strong emotional content to acts of communication. The verbal content is of less importance and silence can be satisfying. Group togetherness is of greater importance than anything that might be spoken.

In comparison, individualist societies are highly verbal, avoiding silence as empty, even hostile. Content must be specifically stated because the group’s relative unimportance makes communicating through the context much less certain.

Inter-group Relationships. Relationships with outsider groups are primarily competitive in collectivist cultures, even confrontational and often marked by distrust and hostility. Support of the in-group is considered necessary in dealing with outsiders, an “us against them” approach. The factionalism that fragments some nations originates in the collectivist cultures of their many constituent groups and tribes.

The individualist is expected, in contrast, to be able to function independently. Children are taught to observe, think, and act by themselves. Depending on others is considered a weakness, reducing the need for a strong supportive group. Outsiders are not normally treated with suspicion simply because the distinction between insider and outsider is much less important. Consequently, cooperation with other groups is relatively easy if that cooperation is seen to benefit individual members.

Values. Harmony, family relationships, equality in use of wealth, and modesty are high-values in collectivist societies. The possibility of bringing shame to the group is a strong control on behavior. The shame is in others knowing, not in the action itself. It is very important to meet the expectations of others, thus maintaining “face.” Education concentrates on preparation to be a good group member, so it emphasizes tradition, rote memory, and the ability to quote respected scholars.

Freedom, self-fulfillment, recognition, honesty, and distribution of wealth according to individual effort are high values among individualists. Rather than group-centered shame, the individual feels individual guilt when standards are violated. Education is valued when it enables individuals to cope with demands, be productive, and maximize individual abilities.

Business Dealings. Among collectivists, personal relationships are essential. Business is conducted by first establishing a social relationship, then proceeding to details of the task, and the exchange of goods, services, and money. Legal contracts are secondary to knowing the groups involved and establishing rapport and trust. Management focuses on groups as the basic unit.

In comparison, individualist societies approach social and business relationships in an impersonal, factual manner that centers on the task to be accomplished. Knowing and liking among the participants is secondary to agreements carefully drafted to specify each party’s obligations. Business is primarily controlled by law; personal relationships are secondary. Management focuses on individuals as the basic unit. Rewards are distributed according to the work completed, independently of personal relationships. To act otherwise is considered unfair and even dishonest.

Some Implications for Missions. Contemporary evangelical missions have predominantly originated in individualist societies, and gone to collectivist societies. Differing assumptions and expectations have led to frequent misunderstandings and antagonism. The continuing resistance of some people groups to the Christian message may well be a serious consequence.

Individualist-oriented missionaries have expected individual acceptance of the gospel, overlooking the value of a favorable group response before individuals are discipled. Antagonism and resistance often come from a perceived threat to stability and security of the group. Anything that would fragment the group is not acceptable, allowing no place for individual choice where survival of the group is thought to be involved. An individual who responds apart from group ap-
In a collectivist society, the pastor and church authorities are much more likely to be authoritarian, with considerable social distance between themselves and their congregations. Selection of leadership often depends more on group affiliation than on objective criteria, coming through discussion and agreement rather than election. Following the biblical pattern to become servant-leaders is a major challenge within a collectivist society.

Indonesia (Ext. 2000 pop.: 212,731,000; 1,904,569 sq. km. [735,354 sq. mi.]). Independent since 1945, Indonesia's population spans some 3,000 islands and is of great ethnolinguistic diversity. The largest groups are the Javanese (38.7%), the Sundanese (15.9%), and the Madurese (6.4%). Government statistics show Muslims at 87 percent, Christians at 9.6 percent (church statistics at 12.5%), Hindus at 1.9 percent, and tribal religiousists at one percent. Professing Christians are about three-to-one Protestant (regional and ethnolinguistically based churches plus many others, including Pentecostal) to Roman Catholic.

Portuguese trading posts in the Moluccas, Sulawesi, and East Timor brought Christianity to their immediate vicinities in the sixteenth century. The work mainly of FRANCIS XAVIER and other Jesuits and Dominicans from 1562 resulted in thousands of baptisms and not a few martyrdoms.

Dutch trading incursion from 1590 ended further Roman Catholic work for two hundred years, except in Flores (and Portuguese Timor). Against the background of the Netherlands attaining freedom from Spanish and Portuguese domination, though still at war with both powers, the Dutch East India Company took over the Portuguese territories, resulting in the Catholic converts having to become Protestants.

Some of the early pastors sent out by the Company were also zealous and effective missionaries. However, they were few, and subordinate to the Company, whose commercial interests did not coincide with evangelism. Moreover, apart from the sub-Christian behavior of many of the Company's employees, there was another critical lack: the failure to instruct the Indonesian church members and church leaders, or appoint more than three indigenous pastors in the two hundred years of the Company's rule. The number of baptized had gone from 40,000 in 1600 to only 55,000 by 1800.

The new government of the Indies turned the existing regional Protestant groups into state churches. This made the ministers virtually civil servants of the religiously "neutral" government and crippled outreach. Nevertheless the Pietist revival in the Netherlands and elsewhere and the resurgence of Reformed doctrine made the nineteenth century one of effective evangelism and laid the foundation of the church as it is now.

There were three groups of churches that resulted: the state churches, people-movement churches, and minority churches. Outstanding among state church efforts was the work of the Moravian-influenced Joseph Kam, sent by the Netherlands Missionary Society in 1814. He worked with the church of the Moluccas, reaching out to Minahasa and West Timor.

Notable of the people-movement churches was the German LUDWIG NÖMMENSEN, who led the planting of the church in North Sumatra from 1861. This work became a people-movement, and by 1917 the Batak church numbered 180,000.

The minority East Java Christian Church was begun in defiance of the government of the Indies, and was initially torn by polar-opposite attitudes toward Javanese culture. It had reached a middle way by the time the government permitted the Netherlands Missionary Society to send J. E. Jellesma (1851) to assist in its development and outreach.

From the turn of the nineteenth century the government was more supportive of missionary work, which it saw as advantageous to itself. When the Japanese invaded in 1942, however, the churches found themselves in a newly hostile environment and many Christians suffered. On the positive side, the churches were suddenly self-standing.

Christians (and missionaries) supported Indonesian independence from the Netherlands after World War II. The repression of suspected communist sympathizers following the attempted overthrow of the government in 1965 led to thousands joining the church, especially in Java.

The Roman Catholic work, after a fall-off in effort during the eighteenth century, was renewed and became effective again after 1850, when the government of the Indies gave more freedom to missions. They moved into every region. Like the Protestants, however, they were prohibited from working in strongly Muslim areas, and were not supposed to overlap with Protestant areas.
Indonesia

Since the incorporation of East (Portuguese) Timor in 1975 (then mostly tribal religionist) the small minority of Roman Catholics there has become the large majority, and a small percentage has become Protestant.

In Irian Jaya people-movements have brought most of the 275 tribes to Christianity, about a quarter of the Christians being Roman Catholic. About 10 percent still remain tribal religionists, and coastal immigrants comprise the 17 percent who are Muslims in the region.

The problem of Gospel and Culture, present from the beginning, continues in all three groups of churches: How far can the gospel shed its Western garb, and how far can it then be joined to the culture of a people to be evangelized? Syncretism, or at least dual-religion, exists widely.

Although Christians are a minority and subject to the impact on their areas of transmigration, Muslims feel like a minority over against Christians in the spheres of education, newspapers, and hospitals, and so press for more influence and status. Christians easily overreact, and so far they have engaged in little dialogue with Muslims.

The dynamism of the Indonesian churches could well lead to effective outreach beyond their own country. In a small way the Batak Protestant Church has already done this (in West Malaysia).

Inerrancy. Along with “verbal” and “plenary,” both “inerrant” and “infallible” are terms the church has employed to indicate the divine truth and authority of the Bible. Each term carries a slightly different connotation. Verbal emphasizes that every word of Scripture is divinely authored and therefore carries God’s authority; plenary notes that the divine authority is full and complete; infallible, that Scripture is incapable of mistake; and inerrant, that Scripture never wanders from the divine truth.

In the ancient church Irenaeus and Augustine represented the position of the churches of their day and handed this view on to the medieval and modern church (see the extensive list of citations in William Lee; Inspiration, Appendix G). At the time of the Reformation, the inerrancy of Scripture was embedded in the teaching of the Council of Trent (1545–63) and reaffirmed in the first Vatican Council (1869–70).

Luther and Calvin followed Augustine in defense of scriptural inerrancy. In the early Protestant confessions the emphasis lay on the full authority of Scripture, but this rested on the divine authorship and inerrant truth of Scripture. For Luther this is evident in his unequivocal endorsement of Augustine’s doctrine of scriptural inerrancy (“Holy Scripture cannot err”—Luther, Luthers Deutsche Schriften, XXVII, 33); and from the fact that he found it necessary to expunge the Book of James from the canon of Scripture because he believed he had found an error in it (see the introduction to his Commentary on Genesis written in 1545 just before his death; and William Barclay, The Letters of James and Peter). Similarly Calvin charged Servetus with holding to a geographical error in the Bible, and the charge was dropped only when Servetus claimed not to have written or been responsible for that statement.

Wesley argued that if we found but one error in the Bible, we could never trust it as the Word of God (see Works of John Wesley, 8:45–46).

In holding to inerrancy the church has with rare exceptions argued that the method by which God secured an infallible Bible was certainly not dictation (in spite of the charges made by their opponents). If the Latin word dictare was employed to refer to Scripture (so Calvin, for example), the point was explicitly made (as by Calvin) that this was not a literal dictation. Human authors of Scripture reflected their own personality and employed their own vocabulary (see, for example, Luke 1:1–4 and John 20:30, 31).

The case for biblical infallibility has always rested firmly on the teaching of our Lord and of the Scripture itself about its divine truth. How, after all, could finite humans know the Bible was infallible as to heavenly reality and the prophetic future? If Jesus Christ is truly divine, then he is our divine Lord; and we must trust him in all he taught, including what he taught about the infallible authority of Holy Scripture (see, for example, Matt. 5:17–21; 19:3–9; Mark 7:6ff.; Luke 16:17; 24:25, 44, 45; and John 10:34, 35). Likewise, if we accept the divine commission of the prophets and apostles to speak the Word of God, we cannot consistently reject their authority when they teach the necessity of believing and obeying Scripture (see, for example, Ps. 19 and 119, especially vv. 60 and 160–168; 1 Cor. 2; 2 Peter 1:19–21; and 2 Tim. 14–17).

In recent years, though rarely in earlier centuries, some evangelicals have defended a limited infallibility or limited inerrancy of Scripture. Usually this takes the form of limiting scriptural infallibility to its ethical or theological teaching. Naturally we must not take every scriptural instruction given to an individual or a group in a specific situation as necessarily a divine command to be obeyed in the same way in all circumstances (see also Hermeneutics). What is right in one instance may be quite wrong in a very different context. Inerrancy should not be understood as an excuse to take texts out of context. Yet all Scripture is profitable for every child of God, and God never commands and expects us to do what is truly wrong in the specific situation he addresses (see Gen. 22:2; 12).
Neither does the Bible speak in scientific language. Nor does it seek to provide us with a neutral scientific history of Israel or of the life and teaching of our Lord. Nor does the Bible always speak in precise and exact language. Nor does the New Testament invariably quote the Old Testament the way a twentieth-century biblical scholar would exegete the Scripture in a university classroom. But, when properly understood, it always tells the truth; and it never teaches what, as a matter of fact, is not so.

Finally, it must be noted that the contemporary theological battleground over Scripture has shifted significantly in the latter half of the twentieth century. In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries the threat to biblical authority came from the disciplines of history, biblical criticism, and natural science. Not so today! The issue evangelicals most acutely face today is not, “Is the Bible objectively true?” More frequently it is likely to be, “Is objective nonrelative truth possible for finite human beings?” All Truth is relative, so it is argued; and I as a human being can possess only truth relative to me. And truth for me, as John Dewey and early pragmatists argued, is only what I as an individual hold to be true to enable me to adjust more comfortably to my environment.

While there are humbling lessons we need to learn from such relativists, Augustine, and before him, Aristotle, gave us an appropriate answer to such a position. To say one knows nothing is a fundamental nonsensical contradiction. If someone claims that he or she really does not know whether or not he or she exists, we can wash our hands of such a being and walk away realizing that such a being is functioning only as an animal, not as a human person. Such a view is as devastating to basic Christianity and to the essential gospel as it is to the inerrality of Scripture. And that is where the consistent evangelical wishes to stand.

Basic Christianity, the fundamental Christian gospel, the Lordship of Jesus Christ, and the divine authority and infallible truth of Holy Scripture—all hold together in a unity of truth. Trusting Scripture follows irresistibly from trusting Jesus Christ as Lord.

Information Technology. With the dramatic growth in the worldwide use of the Internet, using the tools of information technology (IT) is routine today. IT here refers to electronic computing and communication systems employing digital technology, which started with the digital computer in the late 1940s and developed into computer-based internetworking by the 1970s.

In 1960, Joseph E. Grimes used a computer to do language analysis in Bible translation work in Mexico. Other mission specialists also used computers to analyze sociological and church statistics and other data in studying religious movements and church growth trends. David B. Barrett, a missionary to Kenya doing graduate studies in New York, used a computer to analyze the data he and others had collected on more than six thousand African independent church and renewal movements (see African-Initiated Church Movement). Results were used in Barrett’s 1968 book, Schism and Renewal in Africa. Also in 1968, data from the survey of mission agencies in North America were entered into a computer under the direction of Edward R. Dayton and camera-ready pages generated for the North America Protestant Ministries Overseas Directory.

In 1974, information on unreached peoples was gathered from seventy-three countries for the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelism. This was stored on a computer from which an Unreached Peoples Directory was printed and distributed to Congress participants as a work-in-progress to be refined and expanded. Data about the languages of the world published in the Ethnologue by Wycliffe Bible Translators were placed on a computer so subsequent editions could be more easily updated and analyzed.

With the proliferation and the growing capacity of personal computers and networks, IT supported activities in missions have become widespread. Bible translators continue to enhance specialized software used on portable computers to speed the work of translation. Electronic mail is used for instant communication in many parts of the world by missionaries, national workers, mission executives, and those supporting missionaries. Mission information about unreached peoples and other aspects of missions is available on various Internet Web sites. One can link to many of these from the Global Mapping International Web address (www.gmi.org) or the Wheaton College Missions Department address (www.wheaton.edu/missions).

The Internet’s electronic mail and conferencing capabilities also provide a way for those concerned about various people groups to share information and ideas in an open networking mode. One of the most popular of these is the Brigada Network (www.brigada.org) with more than six thousand participants receiving the weekly Brigada Today newsletter as well as being involved in related online conferences of their specific missions interest.
Information Technology

The Internet can also expand and extend participation in mission conferences and other mission-related activities. During InterVarsity’s 1996 Urbana world mission convention for students, background information and daily summaries appeared on the Web, including audio and video segments, for those who were not among the 19,300 onsite delegates. This has been continued to help a new generation of students anticipate the triennial convention in 2000 (www.urbana.org).

Initiation Rites. These communal rituals, which are RITES OF PASSAGE, mark changes in social status or position which an individual undergoes by passing through culturally recognized life phases. Rites are generally connected with pregnancy and childbirth, transition from puberty to adulthood, betrothal, marriage, death and funerals, and in some societies associated with formal training of craftspersons (or professionals), religious specialists, and warfare. Initiation rites are the process by which individuals are made to be, and taught to function as, recognized members of society. These rites constitute some of the most significant educational experiences in the life of an individual by dramatizing and reinforcing the values of a given society as the initiate internalizes the knowledge, feelings, and aspirations of the social system. They serve to establish the function of the individual in his or her responsibility to the whole society and the society to the individual. The rites help achieve competence and the psychological growth necessary for healthy human functioning as well as safeguarding the cultural system.

In each case the rites involve three stages: (1) separation—the person is removed from normal routine and sometimes also regular social associates; (2) liminal period—the in-between stage where physical and symbolic rituals are taken to extinguish the old status; during this stage there may be physical hardship, such as circumcision, incision, and/or other physical scarification, and the transmission of rules, goals, activities, folklore, values, beliefs, and so on; (3) incorporation—the public acknowledgment of the new status. Ceremonial recognition of the changed social status legitimizes the permanently altered status with all its rights and obligations to the larger society.

The attendant rituals reflect a symbolic enactment of death and rebirth. The physical distress (frequently physical mutilations) of the initiation rites makes a difference between the old and the new life. Thus male or female (clitoridectomy) circumcision is quite common. The more painful the ritual, the more a person values the new status. There may be universal symbolism to genital operations—a ritual slaying with a rebirth into a new status. The bloodletting is an attempt to initiate, and thus participate in life-creating powers, quite common in FOLK RELIGION. Initiation rites are often associated with Third World rites which seem to place greater emphasis on the formal recognition of physiological and social changes, rituals which Western societies have supposedly outgrown. This is not so. There may be no single set of ceremonies marking transitions, only a confusion of rites which mark greater independence. However, note the customs or rites which accompany pregnancy, birth, christening/baptism, coming of age, marriage, and death/funerals in the West. Because some rites also have educational functions in which the initiate must learn and demonstrate knowledge and skills consistent with the behavior appropriate to the new status graduation ceremonies from educational institutions, religious ordinations, military bootcamp, entry into new professions, and so on, serve the same purpose.

Institutionalization. “The development of orderly, stable, socially integrating forms and structures out of unstable, loosely patterned or merely technical types of action” (Broom and Selznick, 1968, 215). A dynamic process that continually changes over time, institutionalization involves at least four processes within a social group, such as a church or mission. Each process can be measured along a continuum.

The formalization process involves roles within the organization. These roles usually begin as voluntary, nonformalized roles in a newer mission and proceed to more structured and formalized roles in an established mission. The final stage in this institutional process is ossification. In the process, efficiency is increased, but ability to change becomes more difficult.

In the beginning everyone in a new mission is equal and all are focused on the primary purpose. There is little organized authority, but soon participants and leaders see the need for self-maintenance, a structure to maintain the mission vision and purpose. Often a constitution is adopted and purpose becomes clearer when structure supports that purpose. A danger is that the mission might become an end in itself no longer focused on the original purpose. Extreme institutionalization leads to processes and methods taking precedence over the original purpose.

A group’s social base usually begins with people brought together by a common cause or through a charismatic leader. At one end of the continuum the social criteria for membership in the group are minimal. Gradually, criteria proceed from flexibility to stability, and finally to criteria that are rigidly proscribed at the other end of a continuum. At this end, rigidity may result in a “we–they” confrontational style.

Positive Aspects of Institutionalization. Stability is necessary for the functioning of efficient and flexible organizations. Uninstitutionalized organizations, being unfocused and unwieldy, require much time and energy to function. Formalization brings greater efficiency while maintaining flexibility, as long as formalization does not become too rigid.

Groups, including mission groups, tend to decline over a period of time. Institutional structures and processes can aid in an organization's long-term survival. Institutionalization can bring order out of chaos. Using the organization's structure as a means to an end, having members who enlist new members in the group's cause, strong and renewed leadership, and a specific purpose that challenges the members are all factors in the long-term survival and balanced institutionalization of a mission organization.

Some degree of structure is necessary to purposefully plan and expedite a given task. This is most readily seen in the hundreds of plans developed over the twentieth century to fulfill the Great Commission. The purpose must be seen as having value if people are to be drawn to its accomplishment. For missions and churches, both the purpose and the procedure to accomplish the purpose should have Scripture-based value.

Attaining a group's purposes requires mobilization of human and material resources. Institutional processes show the need for continual development of Leadershio. The institutional process deals with leaders who are faithful to the group's purpose and direct their efforts to its accomplishment.

Organizational structure is a product of institutionalization. Besides the benefits already mentioned, predictability is an important feature. Knowing what to expect and being able to predict events contribute to a person's comfort with and support of an organization, especially in cultures that do not allow for ambiguity.

Negative Aspects of Institutionalization. Structure replaces purpose when the group has turned totally inward and has lost its vision and purpose. The mission's structure has become an end in itself. Parkinson notes, “Work expands to fill the time available for its completion. . . . The number of officials and quantity of work are not related to each other at all. . . . Administrators are more or less bound to multiply” (1957, 11, 12, 15).

Transference is the process whereby the seeds of death in the institutionalization process are transferred to other missions or churches. Because social structures are organic in nature, the factors that cause the demise of one organization can be commuted to related organizations.

Resources, time, personnel, and material are expended on minor issues that do not contribute to the group's stated purpose. Huge amounts of time in discussion and funds may go into a trivial project having little to do with the group's stated purpose. War stories of church committee battles over the proposed color of the sanctuary carpet exemplify the result of lost balance.

The process of institutionalization may continue past the stability stage, causing the mission to become rigid and inflexible. Inflexibility causes an organization to lose its ability to objectively evaluate itself.

When a mission begins to die it may be due to excessive emphasis upon programs rather than focusing on the people. Missions which have maintained the same membership for long periods of time, where people know each other well, may end up focusing on programs rather than people. Extreme institutionalization, with its inward focus, often ignores new people and their potential.

Normally, we think of too much structure as the problem but inadequate structure can also be a problem. “The most fundamental function of institutions is probably to protect the individual from having to make too many choices” (P. Berger, 1976, 187). Too little institutional structure can be the cause of instability.

Conclusion. Institutionalization is a process that can contribute to or detract from a mission's vision and purpose. Negatively, the final stages of the process of institutionalization lead to rigidity, distraction from the purpose, deterioration in the leadership processes, and death. Rightly implemented, processes of institutionalization in mission can lead to fulfilled purpose, efficiency, flexibility, and dynamic leadership. The mission in which institutional structure focuses on purpose and people, promotes leadership renewal, and encourages membership participation will find the group's purposes enhanced.

Interagency Cooperation. While the days of mission agencies acting as lone rangers continue to diminish, there is still progress to be made. A number of external factors will continue the push toward cooperation: the dwindling number of full-time missionaries; the increase of short-termers; churches doing their own selecting, training, sending, and mentoring; the diminishing appreciation for denominations; ministry overlap between agencies (reduplicating support personnel); the difficulty of fundraising for workers and agency maintenance. More by necessity than design, interagency cooperation provides a solution for survival and ministry.

Interagency cooperation includes a number of risks for those who wish to participate. Agency boards, leaders, and personnel will worry about a number of issues: Will they lose the agency’s distinctive for existence? Will the agency’s mission statement and core values be compromised? How can the different philosophies of ministry be unified? Should they? If certain positions in the agency are no longer necessary, what happens to those who filled them? What energy costs will be necessary to maintain productive cooperation? Who funds what? And of deeper concern, will their agency die?

The trust factor figures large in interagency cooperation. To offset some of the above concerns, courting should precede the wedding contract. When they eventually say, “I do,” they say “yes” to commitment, character, a common vision, costs, cooperation, and communication over concerns, and “no” to competition and comparison.

The rewards of interagency cooperation must move beyond survival. And they can. From the perspective of agency personnel, the pooling of personnel and finances can meet their needs from recruitment to retirement much more adequately. From the perspective of ministry projects and programs, interagency cooperation can expand the kingdom of God in ways no single agency can. Some of these efforts may be short-term, some long-term. But all processes should be driven by the unity–diversity of the participants, thereby glorifying the creative God behind them.

Intercultural Communication. Interaction among people of diverse cultures. Since cultures have different symbols, different contexts, different social rules, and different expectations, development of shared understanding is often exceedingly difficult. Thorough study of communication patterns to identify these differences and adapt to them is the foundation of effective Cross-Cultural Ministry.

Intercultural communication is distinct from cross-cultural communication, which compares a particular behavior or behaviors in differing cultures. International communication deals with comparative mass media communication in different nations and to communication between nations. Global communication is a term usually limited to the technology and transfer of information without regard to national borders.

Two general categories of communication models, mechanistic and humanistic, are useful to more fully understand the dominant, but differing, approaches to intercultural communication, Mechanistic Models. Mechanistic models are most clearly seen in the development of “information theory” used in telephones, computers, and related devices. The behavioristic perspective (from behavioristic psychology) stresses stimulus and response. The transmissive model (Berlo and DeVito) suggests ten components of communication: source, encoding, message, channel, noise, receiver, decoding, receiver response, feedback, and context.

Use of a mechanistic model has led to emphasis on sending out a message without great attention to who is actually receiving and comprehending the message. It has also stimulated development of electronic translation units that are said to make intercultural communication possible. Equivalent words from one language are given in a second language. Applied to intercultural communication, a mechanistic model frequently overlooks significant areas, such as cultural assumptions, context, and experience. Though frequently followed in intercultural ministry, mechanistic approaches to communication have little, if any, biblical support as a pattern for either evangelism or discipling.

Humanistic Models. Humanistic models emphasize the human element in communication. The transactional view of communication recognizes that knowledge of the receiver or listener is part of shaping the message form. Communication is seen as sharing. Symbols are used to stimulate the formation of meaning in another person, and consequently the sharing of meaning through a context-sensitive process. The interactional approach recognizes the reciprocal nature of communication, in which a circle that includes feedback and alteration represents the communication process. Both the transactional and interactional views of communication are consistent with biblically based Incarnational Mission. A Christian view of communication must also recognize the presence and work of the Holy Spirit in the communicative process.

Most humanistic models developed in the Western world assume that the sharing of information is the primary aim of communication. However, East Asian societies that are deeply influenced by Confucianism (China, Korea, Japan especially) view communication as primarily to establish and maintain harmony. Balance and harmony in human relationships are the basis of society. Interpersonal communication is guided by social rules specific for each situation, depending on age, status, and intimacy. Thus, communication is an “infinite interpretive process” (Jandt, 1995, 29) where everyone concerned seeks to develop and maintain a social relationship. Communication is a way to seek consensus, not essentially to transmit information. Difficulties in intercultural communication will arise from the fundamentally different purposes in communicating between East and West, as well as from the more obvious differences in style, context, and vocabulary.

Communication and Culture. Is communication synonymous with culture, or an aspect of culture? Culture is a code we learn and share, and learning and sharing require communication. Every act and every cultural pattern involve communication. It is not possible to know a culture without knowing its communication, and communication can only be understood by knowing the culture involved. If culture existed without communication, culture would be unknowable. Communication, on the other hand, functions only as an expression of culture. Culture and communication are inseparable. This fundamental level is implicit to communication. It is a part of being alive, of being in any kind of community.

Communication arts focuses on specific communication modes such as graphic and fine arts, drama, music, journalism, and literature. Specific ways a particular mode (communication art) is developed depends on the purpose and cultural context. This is explicit or utilitarian communication, a skill to be acquired and used for particular purposes.

Problems in intercultural communication occur at both implicit and explicit levels of communication. It is difficult implicitly because of differing assumptions about God, humanity, the world, and the nature of reality as well as different values and different experiences. When these differences are ignored, assuming similarity instead of difference, communication across cultural boundaries will be ineffective or even negative in its effects.

Eastern Perspectives. The Eastern perspective on communication is historically based on the goal of achieving harmony between humanity and nature. Through communication the individual seeks to rise above personal interests to become one with the “universal essence” by use of ritual, meditation, and myth. Today’s patterns of communication used in Eastern nations as different as communist China, Japan, and Korea derive from this common background. Kincaid and Cushman point out three characteristics shared by Eastern social and political systems: (1) subordination of the individual to a strong hierarchical authority, (2) a subjugation maintained by a symbolic perception of harmony, and (3) a belief that events have meaning as evidences of universal principles. An Eastern view of communication emphasizes the implicit aspect.

Western Perspectives. By contrast, the Western perspective on communication emphasized its role in establishing and maintaining individual political, social, and economic freedom. Communication is used to manipulate circumstances and people so that personal goals can be achieved. Communication is utilized to reach personal or group goals, the explicit or utilitarian approach.

Intercultural communication is difficult at the explicit or utilitarian level because of language difference, nonverbal misinterpretations, and personal attitudes. These problems can be identified and overcome, but mature understanding may still not be achieved. Effective intercultural communication demands recognizing and overcoming difficulties at both the explicit and implicit levels.

Signal or Symbol System. Twelve systems of signals are used by every culture. In fact, almost all of human communication occurs by use of one or more of the twelve systems: verbal (or spoken language), written, numeric, pictorial, artificial (three-dimensional representations and objects), audio (including silence), kinesic (what has been called “body language”), optical (light and color), tactile (touch), spatial (the use of space), temporal (time), and olfactory (taste and smell).

Even though the same signal systems are used in every culture, the many significant differences in their usage make clarity of understanding between members of different cultures difficult to achieve. One culture may emphasize the importance of the verbal (the spoken word), while another emphasizes the unspoken use of body language, the kinesic system. Another culture may have highly developed pictorial communication, while still another has an intricate system of communication involving numbers. The individual signals may have totally different signification in different cultures, for example, a gesture may mean approval in one culture and be considered obscene in another or a word may indicate appreciation in one setting but rejection in a different culture. Effective intercultural communication at the explicit-utilitarian level demands learning both the relative importance of the various signal systems in different cultures as well as learning the meaning intended by various signals.

In summary, intercultural communication is a process depending on increasing involvement of the parties seeking to communicate. Only through involvement can both implicit and explicit communication contribute to shared understanding. Such involvement is demonstrated in the life of Christ, who became flesh and lived among us (John 1:14). It is also the pattern for missionary service (John 17:18). Paul clearly modeled this kind of intercultural communication as he explains in 1 Corinthians 9:19–23.

Intercultural Competency. To live and work effectively interculturally, a person must engage in CULTURAL LEARNING with the goal of becoming effective in the broad range of behaviors that are part of becoming competent in any culture. Since the members of a culture have a whole lifetime in which to learn its inner workings and complexities, an intercultural worker will never have the competency of someone born in that culture. Yet, with careful and intentional learning, a missionary can master a broad range of skills required for effective COMMUNICATION, interpersonal relationships, and continuous learning in a ministry setting.

The goal of intercultural competency is to gain sufficient understanding of the broad range of required cultural behaviors so that one is sensitized to intercultural tensions, aware of cultural expectations and practices, and continually learning the finer points of communication in each area of cultural practice.

There are seven distinctive areas in which a cross-cultural worker should seek to achieve competence in any culture.

Language Fluency. The mastery of a language of a culture is essential to effective communication. Intercultural workers should master the grammatical structures of the local language, and vocabulary in all the areas of communication that are essential to their work.

Understanding the Rules of Labor and Exchange. Every culture has adopted economic practices and values that govern the organization of labor and exchange within a community. Since all intercultural workers are involved in some form of labor and exchange relationships with people in the community, understanding their rules and values with regard to work are essential for effective intercultural service.

Understanding Authority Relations in Family and Community. Every community defines structures to govern relationships between individuals and groups. The intercultural worker should seek to understand the rules and roles that are significant in family and community structures, and know how these are practiced by members in the indigenous community.

Mastering the Basics of Conflict Resolution. Conflict is inevitable in any kind of community. Every community also has its basic assumptions and requirements for conflict resolution. An intercultural worker cannot hope to be effective unless she or he masters the patterns of conflict resolution that are practiced within the local community.

Understanding Basic Values and Personality. The bringing up of children is one of the most important activities in any culture. Through this process adults impart to children the basic values that are essential in the cultural setting, and channel the unique personalities of children into proper cultural behaviors. Understanding this process of shaping children into mature adults is crucial for competency in a culture (see ENCULTURATION). Learning the values that parents impart to their children and the process through which they channel unique personalities into appropriate adult behavior is crucial for effective cultural learning.

Understanding Beliefs and Worldview. All human beings actively reflect on their cultural experience and articulate the meaning of these experiences in their beliefs and WORLDVIEW. Once an intercultural worker has a good working knowledge of the language, and has acquired competencies in the other aspects of culture above, then exploration of beliefs and worldview is essential to gaining a whole picture of culture.

Effective Communication and Contextualization of Work and Ministry. The desired outcome of intercultural competency is effective communication in every area of culture. The goal of cultural competency is to contextualize work and ministry in the cultural system that is known and practiced by people in the local community. The intercultural worker must intentionally frame communication and ministry within the cultural systems available to local cultural participants. This requires that intercultural workers rethink what they do and how they do it, and reframe it into the language, economic, social, and value systems of the local culture.

Many missiologists define cultural competency with reference to incarnational ministry (see INCARNATIONAL MISSION). The example for incarnational ministry is the Lord Jesus Christ. In Philippians 2:6–7, Paul speaks of Jesus as being “in very nature God,” yet not clinging to that identity, but “taking the very nature of a servant, being made in human likeness.” Lingenfelter and Mayers (1986, p. 15) characterize Jesus as a “200% person.” They then draw the analogy that the intercultural missionary must become at least a 150% person—ideally, retaining their own cultural identity at least at the level of 75%, and yet adding a new identity of 75% of the culture in...

which they serve. The challenge of incarnational ministry is becoming more than we are, and learning and incorporating the culture of our hosts into our lives, and participating effectively in ministry within their cultural context. Yet incarnational ministry is not enough. As Christians we are engaged in lives of pilgrimage; as Peter says, “as aliens and strangers in the world, . . . live such good lives among the pagans that, though they may accuse you of doing wrong, they may see your good deeds and glorify God on the day that He visits us” (1 Peter 2:11–12).

Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association of North America (IFMA). In March of 1917, Paul Groef, a Wall Street broker and member of the board of the South Africa General Mission, called together leaders of key faith missions for the purpose of strengthening effectiveness and outreach. Representatives of the South Africa General Mission (now Africa Evangelical Fellowship), The China Inland Mission (now Overseas Missionary Fellowship or OMF International), the Central American Mission (CAM International), and the Africa Inland Mission organized the Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association (IFMA) to enable missions leaders to get together for prayer, fellowship, and the exchange of ideas and information. The other charter members were the Sudan Interior Mission (now the Society for International Missions), the Inland South America Missionary Union (South America Indian Mission), and the Women’s Union Missionary Society of America.

From the 1920s to the 1950s, roughly ten new agencies were added to the IFMA each decade. From the 1950s to the 1980s, the number increased to fifteen per decade. From 1981 to 1991, the number jumped by thirty-five members. Current membership comprises over one hundred agencies, representing over ten thousand missionaries sent from North America. Another five thousand from other countries are affiliated with the member agencies.

Mission agencies can maintain one of four levels of relationship with the IFMA: (1) Association is reserved for member agencies, with membership requirements including agreement with the basic historical fundamentals of conservative evangelical Christianity and with the IFMA Confession of Faith. Additionally, member agencies are expected to maintain a noncharismatic orientation. (2) Cooperation is the level of relationship for all nonmember groups which share the IFMA doctrinal and operational commitment. (3) Fellowship is maintained with evangelical groups whose doctrinal or operational stances make cooperation difficult. (4) Communication is maintained with groups whose doctrinal stances (such as the inclusivism of the World Council of Churches) make fellowship impossible.

Nondenominational, interdenominational, or independent missions have been popularly called Faith Missions because their financial structures are based on prayer and trust in God to supply financial needs. There is no guaranteed salary for missionaries in faith missions. Most member missions have adopted the principle of “full information without solicitation.” While some IFMA members do solicit funds, the IFMA requires of them active faith in God for the provision of needs without strong fund solicitation.

The primary concern of the original founding members of IFMA (e.g., SUD, AIM, CIM) was the unreached inland peoples. Throughout IFMA history, member agencies have been innovative in their efforts to evangelize the Hidden Peoples of the world; they have pioneered and specialized in such ministries as education, medicine, radio and television, gospel recording, Bible translation, and aviation. The IFMA has focused internally on the need for closer cooperation of the nondenominational mission agencies in these endeavors and externally on presenting a unified front against the encroachment of various forms of theological liberalism.

The first full-time executive officer of IFMA, John Percy, was elected to the office of general secretary in 1956. He was succeeded by Edwin Frizen Jr. in 1963, who was in turn succeeded by John Orme in 1991. The official board has no administrative authority over member missions, but does elect fifteen board members for the purposes of accreditation, networking for special projects, and coordination between churches, schools, and mission agencies.

Among member agencies, the direction of the work in the field is done from the field, not by home directorates or executive staff. Thus individual missionaries have not only a voice, but also a vote in the organization and conduct of mission affairs. In some agencies the missionaries themselves elect the general director and other officers. In others, the board of directors elects the general director.

Nondenominational missions characteristically have been open to cooperation with like-minded evangelical missions. In a number of instances, cooperation has led to mergers. Every three years the IFMA meets with the Evangelical Fellowship of Mission Agencies (EFMA) in a joint leadership gathering. The two associations jointly sponsor the annual IFMA/EFMA Personnel Seminar. From 1964 to 1997, the two associations cosponsored the Evangelical Missions Quarterly...
Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association of North America (IFMA)

and Pulse. In 1966, they cosponsored the Congress on the Church’s Worldwide Mission. Through the executive director of IFMA, communication and relationships are also maintained with the National Association of Evangelicals (NAE), the World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF), and other major entities working in world evangelization.

Through their history, the IFMA members have considered both husband and wife as full missionaries. This is in contrast with some boards that have appointed only the husband as a missionary. Among IFMA mission agencies, single women have pioneered in many ministries, including evangelism and church planting.

Headquartered in Wheaton, Illinois, the IFMA supplies personnel staffs with the know-how for missionary recruitment, selection, and professional development, and business and financial staffs with refresher seminars in management, taxes, and accounting. Other offerings include conferences and small group seminars that enhance leadership and management skills as well as forums enabling mission leadership to stay abreast of world issues and current theological and missiological trends.

International Association for Mission Studies (IAMS). This association describes itself as “an international, interconfessional, and interdisciplinary professional society for the scholarly study of Christian witness and its impact in the world.” Olav Myklebust in Norway first proposed such an organization in 1951. After preliminary meetings of European and North American missiologists in Birmingham, England, in 1968, and Oslo, Norway, in 1970, the IAMS was inaugurated in 1972 at Driebergen, The Netherlands. In 1996, when its ninth international conference met in Buenos Aires, Argentina, the association had 465 individual members and 75 corporate members, of which approximately 200 were from Asia, Africa, Latin America, and the Pacific region.

Stated objectives of the association are “to promote the scholarly study of theological, historical and practical questions relating to mission; to disseminate information concerning mission among all those engaged in such studies and among the general public, and to publish the results of biblical research; to relate studies in mission to studies in theological and other disciplines; to promote fellowship, cooperation and mutual assistance in mission studies; to organize international conferences of missiologists; to encourage the creation of centers of research; and to stimulate publications in missiology.” The IAMS journal, Mission Studies, is sent to all members and other subscribers twice each year. The association also sponsors four study projects that are carried on by work groups: biblical studies and mission; documentation, archives, and bibliography; healing and mission; and patristics and mission. The IAMS is not a sending or promotion agency, but an association for the study of mission. Its major achievement has been to create a global network for the advancement of scholarship among individuals, organizations, and centers engaged in the study of world mission and Christianity in the non-Western world. Offices of the general secretariat are in Hamburg, Germany.

International Conferences for Itinerant Evangelists (Amsterdam 1983, 1986). An amazing step of faith on the part of Billy Graham, the conference for itinerant evangelists was fully sponsored and well organized by hundreds within the circle of the evangelistic association that bears his name. Graham, however, was not at all sure of the outcome of a conference designed solely to minister to the coming generation of itinerant evangelists worldwide. When it was first conceived, no one was even certain of their numbers, much less how to contact them. Werner Burklin, the German executive of Youth for Christ, was assigned the task of tracking them down by visiting numerous countries and interviewing all sorts of church leaders—always with the request for information on promising young evangelists, women as well as men, who would be most likely to profit from such a gathering. At first, the response was slow, but it gathered momentum and in the end 3,827 came from 133 countries, largely (70 percent) from the non-Western world. More than half were without formal training, and for the majority the conference was their first exposure to evangelists from other countries. It was later discovered that there were at least 10,000 such itinerant workers serving throughout the world.

At the opening session Graham, while promising to avoid heavy theology, set forth four specific goals for the individual confeerees: (1) maintenance of the purity of the gospel; (2) adherence to biblical ethics in home life, personal morality, and financial accounting; (3) cooperation with local churches; and (4) effectiveness in giving evangelistic invitations. From July 12 to 21, 1983, there were two plenary sessions daily, and a myriad of workshops. One warning was blunt: “Avoid
International Fellowship of Evangelical Students (IFES)

In response to the strongly felt needs of their constituencies, most ICETE associations began with, or early developed, accreditation schemes to facilitate academic recognition for their member schools. Most also developed a range of support services, and promoted contact and cooperation among member schools. Most ICETE associations have also embraced nonformal and extension theological education. ICETE itself adopted the “Manifesto on the Renewal of Evangelical Theological Education” (1983, 1990) to encourage fresh approaches. A principal achievement of ICETE since its inception has been the lively intercontinental dialogue fostered through a sequence of international consultations: Hoddesdon, England (1980); Chongoni, Malawi (1981); Seoul (1982); Wheaton (1983); Katsdara, Cyprus (1984); Unterweissbach, Germany (1987); Wheaton (1989); London (1991); Bangkok (1993); and Sopley, England (1996). The papers of several of these gatherings are published in an ICETE monograph series, Evangelical Theological Education Today.

Evangelical schools in Africa first established an alliance in 1966 under the acronym AEBICAM. In 1970 the Asia Theological Association was formed, and in 1973 what is now the Caribbean Evangelical Theological Association was founded. In 1976 AEBICAM was superseded by the Accrediting Council for Theological Education in Africa (ACTEA), and in 1979 the European Evangelical Accrediting Association was established. In March 1980 these bodies joined with the older (1947) Accrediting Association of Bible Colleges (North America) to form ICETE. Subsequently ICETE has been joined by the South Pacific Association of Bible Colleges (founded 1969) and the Association for Evangelical Theological Education in Latin America (AETAL; founded in 1992 as the successor to AETTE, which was founded in 1968). The first general secretary of ICETE was Paul Bowers from ACTEA. He was succeeded by Robert Youngblood, who was in turn followed by Roger Kemp of Australia.

International Fellowship of Evangelical Students (IFES). The International Fellowship of Evangelical Students was founded in August 1947 at the Phillips Brooks House in Harvard University. Representatives of ten countries (Australia, Britain, Canada, China, France, Holland, being self-appointed gurus, sent by nobody and accountable to nobody.” Since the sixth Assembly of the World Council of Churches was meeting almost concurrently in Vancouver, Graham’s closing address pointedly called on WCC leaders to renew their commitment to biblical evangelism and world mission. Then he turned to the Amsterdam delegates and stressed the indispensables to effective evangelism: a robust prayer life and an unrelenting devotion to Bible study. He confessed that the greatest failure in his life was that he had “spoken too much, studied too little.”

Having been forced to turn away some 6,000 possible participants at Amsterdam ’83, the capacity for Amsterdam ’86 was expanded to include 8,160 evangelists and 2,000 other participants. They came from 173 countries, more than any other conference in history at that time. Simultaneous translation was made available in 25 languages, enabled by a team of 112 translators. The primary purpose of Amsterdam ’86 was “to encourage, to equip, and to motivate the evangelists of the world” (CT, 1986, 41). In light of the goal, it was appropriate that 78 percent of the participants came from Two-Thirds World countries. The total conference cost was $21 million, paid for by contributions raised through the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association. In the late 1990s, the BGEA began planning for a final Amsterdam Conference to take place in August of 2000 with an estimated budget of some $35 million.

International Council for Evangelical Theological Education (ICETE). In a little noticed phenomenon of modern global Christianity, in most parts of the Two-Thirds World the evangelical theological schools have taken the initiative to link themselves in vigorous indigenously directed alliances. Such alliances first began to emerge in the 1960s and early 1970s. In 1980 these continental movements organized themselves into a global federation, now known as the International Council for Evangelical Theological Education (ICETE, formerly ICAA). ICETE functions under the auspices of the World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF). Its constituency includes continental alliances of theological institutions representing all major regions of the world.
International Fellowship of Evangelical Students (IFES)

New Zealand, Norway, Switzerland, United States) committed themselves to creating a network of indigenous university student movements that would have the primary purpose of “seeking to awaken and deepen personal faith in the Lord Jesus Christ and to further evangelistic work among students throughout the world.” To help accomplish this, the IFES stated their desire to strengthen existing national evangelical student groups and provide for fellowship through international conferences on a regional and worldwide basis.

As of 1996, the IFES had expanded to 134 countries with another 36 countries identified for pioneering work in the future. Most of the remaining countries are in the Islamic world of North Africa, the Fertile Crescent, and the Republics in Central Asia. There are more than three hundred thousand students worldwide that are associated with IFES, with the largest student movement being the Nigerian (NIFES) movement with more than thirty thousand students involved in their discipleship and evangelistic ministries.

Because the IFES is committed to indigenous national leadership, a key strategy is the development of national staff workers in each country. As of the 1995 quadrennial World Assembly of the IFES only 27 countries of the 134 did not have some national staff workers. These developing student movements are frequently assisted in their ministry by staff from other countries until they can support their own staff personnel.

The IFES also seeks to strengthen its movements through intentional training strategies, literature, and media resources. Regional training personnel are appointed to serve various language and geographical groupings through specific training conferences for both staff and student leaders. Publishing houses and the development of national authors for Bible studies and books are major dimensions of a strategic and growing literature ministry.

Perhaps the most significant emphasis within the IFES is the ever present pioneering and missionary endeavors. The North American URBANA missions conference sponsored by IFES member movements, InterVarsity USA and InterVarsity Canada, has challenged nearly 200,000 delegates during its triennial conventions with the call of God to the world mission of the church. Similar conventions have taken place in Taiwan, Nigeria, Kenya, India, and Australia. These conventions not only raise missionary concerns and vision for the delegates but they provide opportunities for evangelical missionary agencies and church groups to work together in helping college and university students find their role in world missions.

Because student groups within the IFES carry out their ministry among the top educational institutions within their countries, their influence is often very significant among future national leaders in government, business, and the professions. Since students in IFES movements are given opportunities to develop their own spiritual leadership gifts while in school they are also well equipped to provide leadership within their own church context and frequently become leaders of other missionary endeavors as well.

The first elected leader (general secretary) for the IFES was the Australian C. Stacey Woods, who served for twenty-eight years in that capacity. He was followed by Chua Wee Hien from Singapore until 1991. The current general secretary is Lindsay Brown from Wales. The IFES office is located in Harrow, England.

International Missionary Council (IMC). The International Missionary Council was an outgrowth of the World Mission Conference at Edinburgh in 1910. Organized in 1921 under the leadership of John R. Mott, Joseph H. Oldham, and A. L. Warnshuis, its purpose was to encourage and assist churches and mission societies in their missionary task, understood as sharing with people everywhere the transforming power of the gospel of Jesus Christ. It hoped to bring about united efforts wherever possible.

Its membership consisted mainly of national and regional interdenominational mission organizations, such as the Committee of German Evangelical Missions and the Foreign Mission Conference of North America. It encouraged the development of national Christian councils in Asia, Africa, and Latin America, in which the churches eventually played a stronger role than the mission organizations. Thus the churches became the centers for planning, rather than the mission structures. It eventually grew to include thirty-eight such councils. The IMC saw itself as a center of information and consultation, thought, and study, holding conferences where the results of research could be shared. It also published the International Review of Missions.

At its first meeting in Jerusalem in 1928, half of the 231 delegates came from Asia, Africa, and Latin America. Some called it the first truly global meeting in history. Its message was basically optimistic despite growing secularism. Theological divergence was evident as the concern for social issues caused some anxiety among conservatives, but its final word was “Our message is Jesus Christ. He is the revelation of what God is and what man through Him may become. In Him we find God incarnate.” Seeking to move beyond paternalism, Jerusalem recognized the equality of the “younger churches,” a term then coming into use. It also established an international committee on the Christian approach to the Jews.

The 1938 meeting brought 471 delegates, including 77 women, from 70 nations, to TAMBARAM, India, near Madras. A major issue was the relationship of Christianity to non-Christian religions. HENDRIK KRAEMER wrote his preparatory volume, The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World, stressing discontinuity between Christianity and other faiths against those who saw value in non-Christian religions as a preparation for the gospel. Resisting some calls for SYNCRETISM, the World Council of Churches reaffirmed the authority of Scripture and the truth and grace of God in Jesus Christ. Other issues addressed were the need to improve the preparation of leadership for the younger churches, and the challenges of communism, nationalism, and secularism. During World War II, the IMC did a magnificent job of gathering resources to care for orphaned European missions in various parts of Asia and Africa, cut off from their homelands and support, making possible their continued ministry. The WHITBY, Ontario meeting in 1947 was an opportunity for the renewal of fellowship after the war and called all churches to rediscover the nature of their obedience in proclaiming the gospel to a broken and revolutionary world. The slogan “Partners in Obedience” was adopted; it was intended to symbolize the full equality of older and younger churches, to overcome paternalism and dependency, and stress unity.

At WILLINGEN, Germany, in 1952, new theological winds were blowing amidst growing pessimism about the church and its mission in a revolutionary age. The question was asked, What was to be the nature of the missionary obligation of the church as many traditional mission fields were closing and the churches in the West were increasingly aware of the role of churches in mission?

At the 1958 GHANA meeting the Theological Education Fund was launched to upgrade institutions in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. But the most important issue was the decision to merge with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC). JOHN MACKAY and others believed the merger would put mission at the very heart of the WCC. Others, especially MAX WARREN of the CHURCH MISSION SOCIETY, spoke strongly against it. He said that while mission calls for almost infinite flexibility and a readiness to take initiative, official bodies have great hesitancy about taking risks. Thus he predicted that the voluntary principle that was so important in missions would be lost with the merger. But WCC leaders promised that mission and evangelism would be central to its life and work. Consequently, in 1961 the IMC became the COMMISSION ON WORLD MISSION AND EVANGELISM (CWME) of the World Council of Churches. Its stated purpose was “to further the proclamation to the whole world of the gospel of Jesus Christ to the end that all men may believe and be saved.”

However, for reasons having to do both with structure and theology, the CWME disappeared in the 1990s, becoming a subunit in Programme Unit No. 2 (Churches in Mission, Health, Education, and Witness) of the WCC. The CWME, the successor to the IMC, no longer exists as a separate entity.

Interpersonal Communication. Though communication may be intrapersonal (talking to oneself), it is usually interpersonal communication (communication between persons) that we refer to when we speak of “communication.” Whether the communication is between members of the same family or between those of different language communities (INTERCULTURAL COMMUNICATION), it always involves persons and thus is interpersonal. Even public communication, such as lectures or sermons, can be seen as interpersonal, since they consist of a large number of one-to-one (i.e., speaker to each listener) interactions. Though communication via electronic or print media is not usually seen as interpersonal, there are important interpersonal aspects to these forms as well, especially if the receptors know the communicator(s) personally.

Since EUGENE NIDA first introduced the concept into missiology in Message and Mission (1960, rev. ed. 1990), it has been customary in missiological circles to speak of communicational interaction as consisting of a source or communicator conveying a message to one or more receptors. This is often referred to as the S-M-R theory of communication. The key insights brought by this perspective concern the place of the receptor in the communication process.

All interpersonal communication involves gaps between people and the techniques used to bridge those gaps. Traditional approaches to communication have tended to focus attention either on the source of messages or on the vehicles used to convey them. The primary vehicle, of course, is LANGUAGE, and much attention has been devoted to the place of language in the communication process, as if words contained the meanings peo-
Interpersonal Communication

People attempt to communicate. But, as Berlo and others have demonstrated, meanings reside neither in the external world nor in language or other vehicles we use in the communication process. Though we can pass messages from person to person, meanings reside only in persons, never in the vehicles used to convey the messages. Meanings are created by receptors on the basis of their perceptions of what the communicator intends by the messages he or she is sending.

What goes on within the receptor(s) mind is, therefore, the most important part of any communicational interaction. Once the communicator has spoken or written a message, it is up to the receptor(s) to interpret the meaning. And this interpretation is done on the basis of the receptor's own understandings, whether or not these correspond with the understanding of the source. This fact creates difficulties in interpersonal communication, even between people who live in the same culture and speak the same language. It is, however, complicated greatly when the source and the receptor(s) are from different cultures. For people's patterns of perception and interpretation are strongly affected by their culture. Intercultural communication is a form of interpersonal communication, for it always involves one or more communicators attempting to convey messages to one or more receptors from another culture.

This understanding of communication has enormous implications for the communication of the gospel and the contextualization of Christianity. It means that we need first to learn as much as possible about how our receptors are perceiving the messages we are attempting to communicate. Then we need to do our best to formulate our messages in such a way that the receptors can perceive and interpret what we are saying accurately and reconstruct the meanings appropriately. Failures in this area have led to heretical understandings of Christian doctrines even though the missionaries were orthodox and doing their best to speak the truth.

Missionary history is full of examples of messages that were spoken accurately in terms of the communicator's perspective but were perceived inaccurately by the receptors. When missionaries to India, for example, invited people to be "born again," they were not heard accurately by people who are seeking to escape from the endless cycle of rebirth. Nor are those in Asia for whom the number "four" is taboo attracted to a message that focuses on "four spiritual laws." Latin American Christo-Paganism, Melanesian Cargo Cults, many African-initiated Church Movement doctrines, and a plethora of other aberrant forms of Christianity are the products of receptor understandings of missionary messages that did not correspond with what was intended by the communicators.

On the other hand, exciting People Movements have often resulted when messages of God's love and power have been presented in ways that were accurately interpreted by the receptors from within their frame of reference.

Interserve. Interserve is an international, interdenominational, and evangelical association of mission boards in a dozen sending countries that was founded in 1852. It emerged from the concern of some visionaries Victorian women in London for the oppressed women in India. They founded The Indian Female Normal School and Instruction Society, with a vision: "If we can give the women of India the power to read, and the Book to read, God will bless his word." In 1873, at a time when there were only two qualified female doctors in England, they extended the work to include medical as well as literacy work in the zenanas (enclosed female quarters in India), and the name was changed to the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission. For many years it remained an entirely women's mission to women (men were admitted to ZBMM only in 1950) and registered remarkable achievements.

In a century and a half it has grown to encompass four hundred cross-cultural missionaries from many nations. It entered Nepal in 1954, Pakistan in 1958, and is now working in sixteen countries stretching from North Africa to Bangladesh and northward to the Central Asian Republics and eastward to China and Mongolia. The society became internationally structured in 1967 with its headquarters no longer in London, but in Delhi and later in Cyprus, and with national sending councils as far apart as Ireland and Korea. In India, the first "receiving" country now became a "sending" country, the wheel has come full circle.

Though originally a medical mission, and from 1957 known as the Bible and Medical Missionary Fellowship (BMMF), the society has become a general mission including not only doctors, nurses, and paramedics, but also teachers, engineers, foresters, administrators, children's workers, theologians, pastors, and those working among the handicapped and underprivileged. For this reason another name change, from BMMF to Interserve (short for International Service Fellowship), took place in 1987.

The society does not start its own churches or form a denomination from among those converted through its ministry. It works with and through other churches in the area or helps pioneer new congregations where none exist, but always in cooperation with others. It has been a pioneer in forming multi-mission “umbrella” consortias for work in many areas, including the United Mission to Nepal (UMN) in 1954, the International Assistance Mission (IAM) in Afghanistan in 1966, HEED (Health, Education and Economic Development) in Bangladesh in 1974, and Joint Christian services (JCS) in Mongolia in 1994.

Interserve was one of the first missions to inaugurate a short-term volunteer program in 1969, now successfully adopted by many missions. It was considered an “expensive soft option” when first introduced and likely to divert people from serious long-term commitment. Many who go overseas, however, use it as a test run before making a longer commitment. Believing that mission must serve all six continents not just “from the West to the rest,” the society adopted a policy of mission in its home-based countries, particularly among ethnic minorities. This has been particularly successful in the United Kingdom, where a team of forty mission partners works in the program Ministry to Asians in Britain (MAB), making it the largest team to engage in this ministry to those of other faiths in Britain.

Inter testamental Studies (also Second Temple or Commonwealth Jewish era). Investigation of the period between the Old and New Testaments. Technically the period dates from the destructions of Jerusalem and its temple by the Babylonians in 586 B.C. and by the Romans in A.D. 70. This places the first part of the Post-Exilic period as both the last of the Old Testament era and the beginning of the Second Temple Judaism.

During this time the Hebrews were ruled successively by the Persians, the Greeks under Alexander the Great, Ptolemies (from Egypt), and the Seleucids (from Syria), by their own Macedean or Hasmonean rulers, and finally, beginning in 63 B.C., the Romans. The major sources of information—the Old Testament Apocrypha Pseudepigrapha, the Dead Sea Scrolls, Jewish writers such as the historian Josephus and Philo the philosopher, the New Testament, and Greco-Roman writers—provide data about the historical events, religious beliefs and practices, cultural situation, as well as challenges, sufferings, hopes, and aspirations of the times immediately preceding and contemporary with the New Testament.

With the recent discovery and study of the new data of the period, especially the Dead Sea Scrolls (c. 1947), the investigation of this period has received new information, perspectives, and impetus. Of particular interest is the reinforced understanding of the distinction between this period and that which preceded and followed it, the diverse nature of the Jewish society, faith and culture of the time, the expectation of the imminent arrival of the Final Age (the last period of human history), and the complex elements of nationalism, religion, and culture, that interplayed with each other. Of particular importance were the effects upon Judaism of the various reactions to such crises as the defeat and deportation by the Babylonians, the entrance of Hellenistic (Greek) culture, and Roman domination. One also must note the nature and importance of the Greco-Roman culture, the dominant force of the civilized world at that time.

Cross-cultural missionaries live among peoples they hope to reach for the gospel in order to understand their language, culture, and worldviews and thus be able to communicate accurately with them. Similarly, growing familiarity with the intertestamental world, both Jewish and Greco-Roman, is essential for a better understanding of the New Testament. It is particularly important for the Bible translator who needs to know the culture and society of the biblical world even as he or she seeks to learn those of the people for whom the translation is intended (see Bible Translation).

In seeking to familiarize oneself with the New Testament world it is imperative to be aware of the distinct nature of its faith, institutions, and life. Documents which come from after the New Testament period, “Rabbinic Judaism,” such as the Mishnah, Talmud, Midrashim, should be recognized as later compilations and used only with great care as sources for information about the intertestamental period (this includes the frequently consulted works of Alfred Edersheim).

Modern missiology properly places great emphasis on the challenge of ministry in unfamiliar settings; hence, the importance of cross-cultural contextualization. Intertestamental studies remind us that the deportation of the Hebrews to Babylon in the sixth century B.C. and the confrontation with Hellenistic culture in the fourth century B.C. required the intertestamental Jews to wrestle with the same sort of problems. Early Christianity also faced these issues as it moved from a wholly Jewish environment into the Greco-Roman world. An understanding both of the successes and failures in meeting the cross-cultural challenges in the intertestamental period could be of considerable value for those facing similar issues today.

Invitation. Beginning with God’s “Where are you?” (Gen. 3:9) and ending with “The Spirit and the bride say[ing], Come!” (Rev. 22:17), the Trinitarian God persistently invites those he created to return to their Creator and Redeemer. His invitation comes to people in a multitude of ways, such as dreams, visions, proclamation, calamity, testimony, and ultimately in his very incarnation. He will pursue, chastise, hide, and wait, in order to get a response.

God is an inviting God. Those who respond to his invitation in return invite others. But some are especially called to invite others. He sent Abraham to Canaan and the world. He sent Moses to tell Pharaoh and his court that Yahweh was the living God. He sent the prophets to announce to Israel and the nations that God was just and compassionate. He sent his only Son into the world, making all these invitations possible. He sent his Holy Spirit upon his awaiting disciples, empowering them to invite their families and friends to repent and turn to the living God. He sent his apostles to the nations to invite all peoples to come and feast at his eschatological banquet.

God’s invitation always has specific content. Abraham believed that his seed would be as numerous as the stars in heaven (Gen. 15:6). Israel was to renounce all allegiances to other gods (Exod. 20:1–3; Josh. 24:15). According to Paul, the Christian invitation must explicitly announce that Jesus Christ died and was raised again (1 Cor. 15:1–3). Those who turn to the living God must then declare their allegiance through Christian baptism and obedience (Matt. 28:19).

Although there are continual attempts to state explicitly how one responds to God’s invitation, ultimately, the response remains a mystery. Abraham responded to God’s invitation and obeyed him by leaving his home, land, and family. Ruth would not leave Naomi, declaring her allegiance to Naomi and her God. Paul responded to a vision of the risen Christ by becoming an apostle. While Scripture gives many other examples of individuals and groups responding to God’s invitation, there seems to be a reluctance on the part of the biblical writers to give any clear guidelines on how people should respond. While not detailing the how, John’s Gospel stresses the what. Each respondent is to confess that Jesus is the Christ. Luke gives many case studies of preaching and response in Luke–Acts. The content of the invitation to turn to God is clear; along with specific calls for the listeners to repent and be baptized in the name of Jesus. But, apart from these general statements, there is little information on the response. Sometimes Luke talks about believing and baptism; sometimes he simply says, “they followed” Paul (Acts 2:38ff.; Acts 13:43).

Throughout history, and especially in its Western tradition, the church has often fallen into the trap of giving specific guidelines on how conversion should take place. Methods of issuing God’s invitation and outlining specific steps of response multiplied during the twentieth century. This tendency can be traced in part to a scientific worldview that tends to superimpose method on content and relationships. When this how-to thinking shapes the Christian invitation some of the power and mystery of our relationship to God is lost. The human response to God cannot be shaped by technique. But certainly all responses to God are influenced by culture and tradition.

God, the Creator and Redeemer, is the seeking God. He invites all of humankind to return to him. His invitation extends throughout time and to all the peoples of the earth (Matt. 28:18–20; 2 Peter 3:9).

Iran (Est. 2000 pop.: 74,644,000; 1,648,000 sq. km. [636,293 sq. mi.]). The Islamic Republic of Iran is home to over sixty-five different ethnic groups speaking approximately fifty different languages. About 99 percent of the population profess Islam. The official state religion is the Ithna–Ashariya branch of Shiism, making Iran the world center for Shiite Islam, to which 89 percent of the people adhere.

Only 0.4 percent of the population is affiliated with Christianity. The Orthodox churches are the oldest and largest in Iran. The Armenian Apostolic Church traces its founding back to the first-century apostles Thaddaeus and Bartholomew. The Ancient (Assyrian) Church of the East traces its origin to the era before Nestorius. The Russian Orthodox Church, whose projects in Tehran include a school, library, and club, was established in 1863. The Greeks came to Iran between 1917 and 1936, worshiping originally with the Russian Orthodox until a separate church was established in Tehran in 1943.

Roman Catholic missions began with the Chaldean Catholic Church, which gained its first converts in 1552; today it is the largest of the Catholic churches with about 65 percent of the Catholic population. The Latin Church missionaries arrived in Iran in the 1200s and 1600s, followed by the Armenian Catholic Church, which dates its first venture in Iran to 1605 and now numbers approximately two thousand.

Reformed, Presbyterian, and Congregationalist missionaries of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions (ABCFM), the first Protestant group in Iran, organized the Mission to the Nestorians in 1834. Resistance from the Nestorian Church turned the missionaries’ attention to the Assyrians, who were more willing to convert, resulting in the Evangelical Church (1855). They, along with the Assemblies of God, who were active in 1924 and again in 1966, are the two largest Protestant churches in the country.

There are reports that more Iranians have come to Christ since the Islamic revolution of 1979 than in the years prior to it. All such deviations or defections are liable to persecution, even though constitutional rights are guaranteed for Christians, Zoroastrians, and Jews. Protestant churches tend to be small, and since the end of the war with Iraq, pressure on the evangelical Christians has increased.

GARY LAMB

Iraq (Est. 2000 pop.: 23,753,000; 438,317 sq. km. [169,234 sq. mi.]). In the earliest days of the church, Christian missionaries from Edessa, the crossroads of the old Silk Road east to China and south to Egypt, moved down the Euphrates River. A large Christian population prospered from the second century. Mawiyya, the first Christian Arab queen, was leader of the Tunukh tribe in 373. The whole tribe had become Christian through contact with monks who dwelt in the desert. Around 340 during the persecutions of Shapur II, waves of refugees poured into Iraq from Persia and they moved down the Arab side of the Arab Gulf and established missionary monasteries.

The Nestorian Creed first reached the Arabs through the settled communities in Mesopotamia at about 410 when a Nestorian bishop used Hirta on the east of the Euphrates as his center. Converts, known as the Ibad, spread to the settled Lakhmid nation of al Hira, whose members were fully Christianized by the seventh century. In Mesopotamia, the Nestorian population, though tolerated by the Persians, felt the heavy hand of religious and racial discrimination from the imperial government of the Sassanids. Nestorian theology was condemned by the Council of Chalcedon in 451. The Nestorians provided some of the finest scholars, scientists, and surgeons in the earliest years of their presence. They sent out missionaries from the eighth to fourteenth centuries, who carried the gospel east and south and nearly converted the Mongol nation (see also NESTORIAN MISSIONS). However, they did not manage to evangelize Turkistan and this led to their collapse.

Iraq’s political control is in the hands of the minority Sunni Muslims. Kurdish people make up about 20 percent. The form of socialism in Iraq today is more important than religion. The Constitution of Iraq guarantees complete freedom of religion and worship as well as the legal right to register a change of religion. This has not trickled down to the masses yet. Three percent are Christians and now there are nearly forty groups in twelve denominations.

In 1886 the Archbishop of Canterbury established his mission to the Assyrian population in the north who had suffered greatly at the hands of both Kurds and Turks. In 1891 SAMUEL ZWEMER with James Cantine of the Reformed Church in America chose the southern port city of Basra as their first station and started a school and medical work. They later expanded north to Asmara and then to other parts of Iraq. Toward the end of the twentieth century, films, satellite TV, radio, and tons of Bibles and Christian books shipped in from Jordan were used by the Holy Spirit to encourage a vibrant and revived evangelical movement. Iraq is experiencing an exodus of many of the small Christian minorities from Iraq to all parts of the world. However, a good number of keen young people are studying in seminaries in Jordan and Egypt and have plans to return to Kirkuk, Baghdad, and Basrah. Many of the people displaced after the Gulf War have been converted in Jordan and many of these will return to Iraq. Such events are a harbinger of an expected expansion of the gospel in this land.

GEORGE E. KELSEY

Ireland (Est. 2000 pop.: 3,616,000; 70,284 sq. km. [27,137 sq. mi.]). The Christianity that took root in Ireland in the fifth century owed much to the character of both its messenger and the indigenous people. PATRICK arrived in 432 with a Christian message that did not carry the price of Romanization. The early Celtic church was fiercely independent, eschewed the authoritarian Roman approach, and promoted an incarnational theology in its spirituality and mission (see also CELTIC MISSIONARY MOVEMENT).

With the collapse of the Roman Empire, the Irish church became the guardian and vanguard of the gospel in a fragmented Europe. The exploits of its missionaries and monasteries served to establish the island’s reputation as the land of saints and scholars. Foremost among these early missionaries were Columcille or COLUMBA OF IONA (to Scotland in 557) and COLUMBANUS (to Gaul in 590).

When Columcille died on Iona in 597, Augustine had just arrived in England. Celtic and Roman approaches came into confrontation. In 1170, Henry II authorized the Norman invasion from England, having secured a mandate from Pope Adrian IV, the only English pope! Faced with a weakened Celtic church, Rome’s lordship was finally established in Ireland. Medieval Christendom, as with the CRUSADES, again acted on a coercive model of mission that has left a bitter legacy.

GEORGE E. KELSEY
Ireland

There was no indigenous Reformation in Ireland. Under Henry VIII the government of both church and state became Protestant (Anglican) and loyalty to the Roman church became part of the people’s defiance of their English rulers. Protestantism took root through settlements, especially the seventeenth-century plantation of Ulster from England and Scotland.

Protestant ascendency followed victory in the Glorious Revolution of 1688 and was strengthened by penal laws, which kept non-Anglicans out of government and most positions of influence. Religion and political power were now inseparable.

In the eighteenth century many Protestant Dissenters moved to America. There the Ulster Scots made a significant contribution to the religious life of the New World. The Anglicans turned to evangelizing their Irish Catholic neighbors. Catholic Ireland, concerned with its own survival, had itself played no part in the Roman church’s missionary enterprise since the early medieval period. Emancipation, famine, and revival brought change that would impact the missionary endeavor throughout the nineteenth century.

With emancipation the Catholic Church saw tremendous growth in all kinds of vocations, including the missionary orders. The great famine of 1845–94 produced massive Catholic emigration and the church seriously needed the provision of spiritual support throughout the Irish diaspora. These developments have been well documented, unlike the Protestant missionary endeavor from this period.

The Protestant churches were quick to identify with the missionary movement. Some, like the Irish Presbyterians in India and Manchuria, established their own missionary enterprise. All found it necessary to forge links with denominational missions in the rest of Britain who were quick to form Irish auxiliaries.

Since then thousands of Irish missionaries have contributed to mission throughout the world. The Ulster Revival in 1859 contributed to the unity and growth of evangelicalism in Ireland and a consequent interest in the new faith missions. With the partition of Ireland in 1921 the contribution of the Protestant church has been mainly from Northern Ireland, known for its evangelical vigor. Irish evangelicals have also founded missions such as Samuel Bill (1863–1942), the Qua Iboe Mission in Nigeria (1887) and Amy Carmichael (1867–1951) and the Donnavurv Fellowship in India (1927).

At the end of the twentieth century, churches in both parts of Ireland faced decline. The majority of the population in the Republic of Ireland is under age twenty-five. In Northern Ireland the ongoing conflict has eroded the church’s credibility. Both parts of Ireland face the economic and social deprivation of urban poverty. In the desire to make their witness relevant, Irish churches are increasingly aware of what can be learned from the global church. While there are few Christians from other countries working in Ireland, many who have returned from overseas are now transferring their skills and experience to the task of mission in their home country.

Islam, Muslim. Islam is the largest non-Christian religion in the world. It is the only faith to supplant Christianity in large geographical regions, and has proved the most resistant to Christian missions since its rise in the early seventh century. Although the Arab world remains the heartland, a majority of Muslims lives in Asia—the largest numbers in Indonesia, Bangladesh, Pakistan, India, and Central Asia.

Early Development. Muhammad (A.D. 570–632) was born in Mecca, a commercial and religious center of Arabia, where he reacted against the polytheism and injustices of his day and received what Muslims believe were revelations from God, later recorded in the Quran (“the Recitation”).

The faith that emerged incorporated elements from local Judaism, Christianity, and Arabian monotheism. In addition, much of the pagan pilgrimage to the Ka`bah sanctuary in Mecca was incorporated after the idols of tribal patron deities were removed and only references to Allah (“the god”) remained.

Muslims came to understand their faith as the original revelation that had been given through a series of “prophets,” including Moses and Jesus, and finally through Muhammad, whose revelation corrected any corruptions that had affected Jewish and Christian beliefs and practices.

The “five Pillars” of Muslim practice include first the confession of faith: “There is no god but God, and Muhammad is the apostle of God.” The first half links Muslim and Christian, as the second half divides them. The second, the ritual prayer, borrows its name (salat), ablutions, postures, and much of its content (with the exception of brief references to Muhammad) from Jewish and Christian sources. The original Muslim orientation of prayer was toward Jerusalem like the Jews, before it was directed instead toward Mecca.

The third, almsgiving, is designated by an Aramaic loan word zakat, which the Jewish rabbis used for charitable gifts. Likewise, the fourth, fasting, is indicated by a Judeo-Aramaic loan word,
The practice of abstaining from eating and drinking in the daytime but not at night was a Jewish practice. Apparently the fast originally coincided with the Jewish fast before the Day of Atonement, but then it was changed to replace the pre-Islamic Arab sacred month of Ramadan.

Although the fifth pillar, the yearly pilgrimage to Mecca, was the adoption and reinterpretation of a pagan practice (see also PILGRIMAGES), it incorporates some elements that God used in his schoolhouse for the children of Israel. Its name, hajj, is the same word the Israelites used for a festival in Jerusalem in Psalm 81:4 (3 in English). The circumambulation of the sanctuary replicates the Feast of Tabernacles (cf. Ps. 26:6). The wearing of special garments and the prohibition of the cutting of hair while in a consecrated state follow biblical practices (e.g., Lev. 16:4; Num. 6:5).

Varieties of Expression. Muslims developed a strong sense of community governed by divine law (Shari‘ah), which in both its qur’anic form and subsequent development resembled Jewish oral Torah and rabbinic law. It developed to include all human duties to God and society from religious observances to family, penal, and international law.

An Islamic law developed to guide the outer paths of Muslims duties; mysticism (see SUST, SUFRISM) developed to guide the inner path of piety, with emphasis on the experience and devotional love of God. Being more inclusive in nature, it borrowed freely from Christians and Hindus and others and facilitated the spread of Islam from North Africa to Southeast Asia through a network of orders or brotherhoods. Its expressions range from devotional dimensions of many orthodox (or orthoprax) Muslims, to beliefs and practices of some orders that are removed from formal Islam.

In the latter cases it blends into “folk Islam,” that mixture of indigenous animistic elements into the beliefs and practices of many who consider themselves to be Muslims. This modifies the traditional bridges and barriers to Christian mission among Muslims.

The major division within formal Islam is between the Sunnis (85 percent worldwide; see SUNNI, SUNNISM) and the Shi’is (15 percent worldwide; see SHI’ITE, SHI’ISM). It was occasioned by differences over who should lead the community after the death of Muhammad. The Sunni majority followed the Arabian pattern for choosing a chief: the elders elected a caliph as a political leader. The Shi’ites, reflecting ideas closer to those of divine kingship of the previous empires of West Asia, believed leadership should pass to the senior male of Muhammad’s family, called an imam. He was not only to be a political leader like the Sunni caliph, but also a religious leader as a vehicle of divine guidance.

Various trends have been discernible in the Muslim community up to the present day. One is the adaptionists, who have advocated a process of Islamic acculturation. They include today’s modernists who advocate religious, legal, educational, and social reforms. The second are the conservatives, who feel that the boundaries of legitimate religious interpretation ceased in the ninth century after the four orthodox schools of Sunni law were established.

Finally, there are the fundamentalists, who reject the accretions of Islamic history and seek to return to the fundamentals of the qur’anic and practice of Muhammad (Sunna), believing that they exhibit a pattern of values and law adequate for modern life. They do not reject modern technology but only the secular values that frequently accompany it. Some have radical social programs and others, conservative. Some are militant while others support the status quo. Yet at the threshold of the third millennium many of the expressions of Islam are experiencing resurgence.

Spread. Islam has been spread by both peaceful and militant means. On the one hand, the qur’anic states that there is no compulsion in religion (2:256/257) and enjoins witness in a kind manner (2:143/137; 16:125/126). On the other hand, it calls Muslims to fight against polytheists and hypocrites (9:5, 38–52) and even Jews and Christians until they submit and pay tribute (5:29), after which the latter two are to be protected. A distinction needs to be made between the expansion of military and political power and conversion, which involves spiritual allegiance. The conversion of conquered people, if it occurred, was often a slower process. The adoption of Islam ranged from total conversion, to allegiance for expediency because of its advantages, to forced submission.

One hundred years after Muhammad’s death in 632, the Muslim Arab armies had conquered North Africa, Spain, Syria, and the Persian (Sasanian) Empire. By 870, Islam had become the dominant integrating faith of a vast empire of many cultures extending from North Africa into Central Asia. During this period the basic Sharī‘ah law developed, to which many Muslims have turned, up to the present day.

Between 870 and 1041, various regions of the empire assumed a measure of independence. Islamdom continued to expand partly by military means but more often by trade. Berbers in North Africa became at least nominally converted to Islam and, through their caravan trade across the Sahara, provided the means for Islam’s penetration into black Africa. On the eastern side of the Muslim lands the Muslim Ghaznavids in the Afghan mountains conquered northwestern India.

From 1041 to 1405, the Turkic Seljuqs and Mongols invaded the Islamic lands from Central Asia. The Crusades also took place during this period. Though they have poisoned Muslim attitudes ever since, they were initially a response to the Byzantine emperor’s request for help against the expansion of the Seljuk Turks into Western Anatolia as the Kipchak Turks in the Ukraine had cut off Christian Russia from them.

The Islamic empires continued to expand and consolidate between 1405 and 1683. The Ottomans captured Constantinople and ended the Byzantine Empire but were not able to capture Vienna in 1683. Islam continued to follow the trade routes into Sub-Saharan Africa, especially through traders who were also teachers.

In the subsequent centuries there has been Muslim activism and revival and great biological growth. The major expansion into new areas has been in Africa and the West. In Africa, Islam and Christianity continue to grow rapidly southward by conversion growth at the expense of African Traditional Religions. Islam has become a significant presence in Europe and North America through immigration. In the African American community in the United States where it has grown—sometimes in modified form—it has provided a vehicle of ethnic pride and social betterment.

Contemporary Muslim mission has been organized both to win converts and to counteract Christian missionary efforts. The conferences at the Muslim World League Conference in Mecca in 1974 called for the government takeover of mission hospitals, schools, and orphanages, the banning of Christian literature in Muslim countries, and cutting off financial support from countries allowing missionaries to Muslims. On the other hand, Muslim missionaries are being trained at centers like al-Azhar in Cairo. Saudi Arabia’s King Fahd bin Abdul Aziz Koran Printing Complex is printing millions of Qurans in various languages for free distribution. The Organization of the Islamic Conference has expended billions for Islamic institutions around the world. Other organizations like the Islamic Society of North America include among their goals and those of their member organizations propagating the faith by various means.

Christian Missions. Muslims have been the most resistant faith community to Christian evangelism for a number of reasons (see also Muslim Mission Work). Aside from the spiritual obstacles, the hindrances are first, sociological: group solidarity leads to family and community ostracism and persecution of the convert. The Law of Apostasy can lead to death.

Second, they are theological: since Islam is the only world religion to rise after Christianity, Muslims believe that all that is of value in Christianity is already in Islam, and they commonly hold that the Bible has been corrupted. (The Quran is understood to deny the Trinity and Christ’s incarnation, sonship, and crucifixion.) Third, the obstacles are political: since Islam applies to every area of life including the political, non-Muslims are normally considered second-class citizens whereas Muslims are a majority. Despite the ancient churches in many Muslim lands, Muslims commonly associate Christianity with the West.

Fourth, the frequent association of Christianity with the West has often raised cultural barriers: Western forms of worship and church structure have been utilized without the realization that almost all Muslim forms of worship have been adopted or adapted from Jews and Christians. Finally, the barriers are historical: much of the contact between Muslims and Christians militarily, politically, and religiously has been hostile.

Islamic New Religious Movements. New Religious Movements (NERMs) is not an Islamic term, but like other clearly defined religious traditions, Islam has experienced frequent movements of renewal and innovation. These movements generally push some principal tenet or doctrine of Islam to the outer edges of acceptable interpretation. They most often center on a key figure who claims to have received or embodied new religious insight. Sufi (mystical) Orders have occasionally moved in this direction. Shi’ite Islam, with an inherently strong emphasis on the special spiritual state and insight of the Imams, is particularly productive soil for the growth of Islamic NERMs. Islamic NERMs often develop out of attempts to synthesize orthodox Islam with indigenous ethnic, cultural, and folk religious values and practices.

Often such movements develop so distinctly that they abandon their Islamic identity completely. The Druzes, a closed community of some six hundred thousand persons living in Israel, Lebanon, and Syria, began as a twelfth-century Islamic NERM within the Fatimid Isma’ili sect of Cairo. Druze beliefs are characteristic gnosticism. With the claim of divinity for the founder, its own line of prophets, and distinct sacred literature, the Druzes stand well outside the broad Islamic tent. More recently, a mid-nineteenth-century reform movement of Shi‘ite Islam in Iran developed into the modern Bāṭa‘ī faith. The sect claimed special spiritual status for the founder, Baha’ Ullah, and quickly left behind all traditional Islamic religious identity.

Two of the more significant contemporary movements that maintain an Islamic self-identity are the Ahmadiyyah and The Lost Found Nation of Islam (Black Muslims). The Ahmadiyyah was founded by Mirza Ahmad in late-nineteenth-century India in response to the political, economic, and religious imperialism of the Christian West. Mirza Ahmad developed his own distinct doctrines of Jesus, claimed that contemporary Christianity was the apocalyptic Antichrist, and finally claimed that he was the Mahdi and the Second Coming of Jesus. The Ahmadiyyah adopted aggressive missionary techniques and are stridently anti-Christian. There are approximately 500,000 Ahmadis worldwide, with the greatest strength in Pakistan and West Africa. They view themselves as the true Muslims, but are regarded by the vast majority of Sunni Muslims as heterodox.

Ahmadiyyah missionaries to American inner cities in the 1920s and 1930s had some influence in the emergence of a distinctly African American Islamic NERM, the BLACK MUSLIMS. Elijah Muhammad (Elijah Poole) began the movement in Detroit sometime in the mid-1930s. The movement was primarily a black separatist one with many doctrines and practices that were not only outside Islamic norms, but seem to have little connection to Islam at all. Clergy were termed “ministers” and houses of worship were called “temples” rather than mosques. On the death of Elijah Muhammad in 1975, his son assumed leadership and gradually directed the Nation to abandon most of its eccentrc doctrines and adopt more authentic Islam. Most African American Muslims moved in this direction and the movement has continued to grow, now numbering over one million. Louis Farrakhan led a smaller faction that retained the name “Nation of Islam” and many of its heterodox beliefs. This continuation of the original movement is quite small, numbering under fifty thousand. The Black Muslim movement had some success outside the United States, particularly in Trinidad.

Islamic NERMs continue to arise, but due to the intense social and religious pressure of Islamic societies and occasional political pressure from sympathetic governments, most either remain small and underground, move completely outside the Islamic context, or die out rather quickly.

Israel

a part of God's historical and missiological purpose, and that it will cease from its historical function at the rapture. Before and after this pe-period of history, God's primary dealings were and will be with and through Israel. There are, in ef-eft, two servant peoples of God in this view, both serving within a covenant relationship with God.
Ultimately, though, Israel will come to recognize Jesus as her Messiah.

Contemporary Christian scholarship is faced another version of this view which holds that there are these two peoples of God, but that there are two distinct covenants (see Two-Covenant Theory). According to this position, Israel will never acknowledge Jesus as Messiah, and rightly so, since her way with God is estabished independently of Jesus. This view, which is growing rapidly in certain church quarters, presents a strong challenge to Christian missiology.

To return to what might be considered a consensus about biblical teaching concerning Israel, the choice of Israel was to serve God's purposes for all of his creation and to help bring about the redemption of creation. By definition this made Israel a special people, being God's representative and messenger on earth, and her relationship with God was paradigmatic for the offer of God to all nations. The church carries on this call as the assembly of people, Jewish and non-Jewish, who have welcomed and committed themselves to Jesus of Nazareth as God's unique servant—indeed God's own Son. Christian mission has been founded on the conviction that God's purposes always centered on the coming of the Son of God.

This is what lies behind Paul's anguish in Romans 9–11. The most "natural" person to be in the kingdom of God should be the Jewish person.
There is something especially tragic when the too many of God don't recognize God's greatest gift and challenge to them to go on as the ministers of God's grace to the world.

On the other hand, only Israel can, and does, claim priority over the church in matters of bib-litical theology: Israel asserts that she knew God first, that she produced and preserved the foundational Scriptures of the church, that she learned and passed on the central perspectives and principles that emerge in the New Testament, that she taught the world about the need for the coming Messiah, and that, in short, she is the "mother" of Christianity.

What has happened historically is that in reacting against this claim to priority by Israel, Christians by and large have forgotten that their proper root is nonetheless in Israel; they have been embarrassed at Israel's refusal to acknowl-extend that Jesus is her long-awaited Messiah; they have developed a theology that discards Israel from the plans of God; they have allowed that toology to support a view that saw God's own love for Israel replaced with contempt; they have actively shared in that contempt; and they have finally allowed that attitude to degenerate even further into actual persecution of Jewish people.

Neither Israel nor the church can claim to be identical with the kingdom of God, which is greater than both, and Paul's metaphor of the olive tree (Rom. 11:16–24) shows that Christ is the all-important root of the life and destiny of both. The church's relationship to Israel is sui generis, and both are irrevocably linked within the one missionary movement of God to the world. Christians cannot, therefore, relate to Jewish people in the same way that they do to any other people. The church has no vocation apart from that of Israel and the New Testament has no identity apart from the Old Testament.

Therefore, even in maintaining that the church is distinct from Israel, and that the church is the central agent in God's mission to the world today because of the centrality of Jesus in God's purposes, it remains a major task of missiology to wrestle with the fact that the essential calling and nature of the church cannot contradict that of Israel.

Israel's Role. "Israel" in the Old Testament refers to the patriarch Jacob (Gen. 32:28), to the nation God founded at the exodus from Egypt (Hos.
11:1; Amos 3:1), or to the northern kingdom that split off from Judah after the death of Solomon (1 Kings 12). Here the "role of Israel" will refer to how God's call of the descendants of Jacob to be a holy nation contributed to God's plan for world evangelization.

The Old Testament teaches that God is the Lord of all the earth, not of only one nation. He created all things (Gen. 1; Isa. 40:28) and sustains his world daily (Ps. 104:10–30; cf. Heb. 1:3). As the owner of the earth, the Lord distributed it to all the nations, but he set aside Israel as his own portion (Deut. 32:8–9). This did not mean that Israel was more worthy than any other nation; God's sovereign choice of Israel was based on his promise to Abraham and the patriarchs (Deut. 7:6–8).

How does God's choice of Israel relate to his desire to bring salvation to the world (see Isa. established the covenant at Sinai, he selected Israel to be his "treasured possession . . . a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Exod. 19:3–6).
The covenant with Moses linked with the ABRA-HAMIC COVENANT in that the Lord was ready to es-establish a nation in the land he promised to Abraham (Gen. 15:13–21). The Lord began his work of reconciling the nations by choosing one nation who would be his people, and he would be their God (Exod. 6:7).

Many have debated whether Israel's responsibility to the nations was to be accomplished passively by obedience to the terms of the covenant or actively by spreading the truth of God throughout the world. The designation “kingdom of priests” might seem to imply a more active role, but even Israel's priestly role may be viewed as primarily her obedient service (Exod. 19:5) to the Lord. The nations would see God's acts of justice and mercy in his people and recognize him as the Lord of all the earth (see Deut. 4:5–8; Ps. 98). The prophets stressed Israel's failure to obey the Lord and its consequences for his reputation among the nations. When the Lord drove Israel out of the land, his holy name was profaned among the nations where Israel had gone (Ezek. 36:22). His name will be vindicated when he fulfills his promise to gather all Israel back to the land and give them a “new heart” (Ezek. 36:22–32).

Israel's role in God's plan was not entirely passive, however. First, resident aliens were granted the right to become a part of the covenant community (Exod. 12:48–49). Even those who did not choose to identify with Israel's religion were still to be treated justly and fairly (Exod. 22:21). Ruth, despite her Moabitic background (cf. Deut. 23:3), was incorporated into the people of God (Ruth 4:11–12).

Second, individuals within the nation might find themselves in situations where, like the Israelite slave of Naaman's wife, they could direct others to the source of salvation (2 Kings 5:1–4; 15–19). Some, like the prophet Jonah, were even called to deliver God's message directly on foreign soil (Jonah 1:1–2; cf. 1 Kings 17:8–24).

Third, the prophet Isaiah pointed to the ministry of the “Servant of the Lord” or the Messiah, who would fulfill all that Israel failed to be (42:1–7; 49:1–9; 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12). The Servant was not only to bring Israel back to the Lord and atone for sin through his own death (Isa. 53:6); he was also to be a “light to the nations,” taking the salvation of the Lord “to the ends of the earth” (Isa. 49:6).

The Lord called Israel to be his holy people, representing his name as all the nations of the earth. They failed in that role, but God's plans were not thwarted. His written Word, the Scriptures, came to the world through Israel (see Rom. 3:1–2), and also the living Word of God, Jesus Christ, had his physical origins through that nation (Matt. 1:1–17; Luke 3:23–38).

See also Old Testament Theology of Mission.

Although overt persecution of Protestants (once not uncommon) is decreasing, the public perception of Protestant churches as "sects" or "cults" remains strong. Evangelicals must contend not only with the influence and prestige of the Roman Catholic Church, but also with the increasing influences of secularization and the growing fascination of the occult.

Itinerant Mission. Itinerant mission work is usually done for short periods and rapidly changes its mode of operation. Because of various handicaps, an itinerant missionary likely has a short-term presence in the targeted context and works until interrupted by government intervention or the realization of the mission’s objectives. The roving nature of the work mitigates against establishing institutions and requires focused evangelistic and mission goals.

The apostle Paul engaged in itinerant mission work. He went to specific locations to accomplish the clear objectives of proclaiming the gospel and establishing new churches. He was usually “on the move” and his tasks required him to appoint leaders and then set out for new territories and regions beyond those where he had already worked (Rom. 15:20; 2 Cor. 10:16).

Historically, itinerant types of mission and evangelism result from various sociopolitical restrictions. As migrant Christians rove throughout the world and engage in witnessing, they perform unintentional itinerant mission work. Intentional itinerant mission efforts may result when people migrate into new geographic areas. In the pioneer sections of the United States during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, circuit-riding preachers did itinerant ministries to service areas where there were not enough gospel laborers for the rising population. At the same time, itinerant work was necessary for those opening up frontier missions in the interior sections of Latin America, Africa, and Asia. Pioneering situations normally require self-imposed itinerant mission work because of limited personnel and resources.

Since World War II, new pioneer situations have emerged that are based on political circumstances rather than geographical ones. Independent nations born in the aftermath of the European colonial era established laws regulating foreign nationals in their countries. Often significantly sized population segments or people groups within these countries were historically resistant to Christian influence, especially if it seemed to be controlled by foreign agencies. These governments tended to repeal or restrict visas and residence permits that had been issued to those suspected to be foreign Christian missionaries.

Doing mission in these new types of frontier territories requires utilization of short-term visa options or seeking long-term visas under the auspices of secular humanitarian, disaster relief, or international commercial enterprises (see Creative Access Countries). "Tentmaking" describes the way the apostle Paul supplemented his income while doing itinerant mission work (Acts 20:33–34). Modern tentmakers employ their skills and talents to achieve as permanent a status as possible in politically restricted countries by working for these secular enterprises. Often they draw their livelihood from their secular work, though this is not inherent to the tentmaking concept. Because their visa status is still short-term, the duration of the work is equally short. Itinerant missionaries must achieve their evangelistic, discipling, and church-planting objectives with optimum results in as expeditious a manner as possible.

Jackson, Sheldon (1834–1909). American pioneer missionary and mission organizer to the American West and Alaska. Born to a newly converted Presbyterian family, Jackson came to faith early in life. Graduating from Princeton Seminary, he was ordained in 1858. Rejected from foreign missions for medical reasons, he accepted a home mission assignment at a Choctaw school in Spencer, Oklahoma. After one year he accepted an assignment as a church planter and organizer in Minnesota, where he served, with the exception of a two-month stint among the Union forces in the Civil War, until 1869. His nine years in Minnesota included constant travel and organizational work, a hallmark of his life and ministry.

Taking latitude with the nature of a new assignment which included much of the Rocky Mountain area, Jackson pioneered the work for the Presbyterian Church in Alaska, for which he was called the “Apostle of Alaska.” Over the course of his life he traveled well over one million miles by foot, horse, stagecoach, and ship.

The same spirit that made him tireless in his travels also led to a life of controversy. Serving in dual capacity as a missionary and educational representative of the U.S. government, Jackson faced constant battles in both circles. He is remembered by early biographers for actions which fended off the extinction of indigenous peoples in Alaska through projects such as reindeer importation and planting churches and educational institutions which continue to this day.

Jaeschke, Heinrich Augustus (1817–83). German missionary linguist in India. Jaeschke's forebears migrated from Moravia (the modern Czech Republic). In Herrnhut (lit. “The Lord's Watch”) they maintained their Moravian faith under the protection of Count Zinzendorf.

Jaeschke taught in the boys’ academy in Christiansfeld, Denmark, and was soon preaching in Danish. By 1842 he was teaching languages at the pedagogium at Niesky, Germany (near modern Poland). Besides fluency in German, Danish, and Greek, he soon learned Sanskrit, Persian, Arabic, Hungarian, Bohemian, Polish, and Swedish. He wrote his diary in seven languages.

In 1856 Jaeschke traveled to India to work with Tibetan refugees. He translated most of the New Testament, several books, and tracts into Tibetan. His German-Tibetan and English-Tibetan dictionaries became standard works. The Tibetan grammar in English he prepared was used by numerous missionaries working among the Tibetan people.

Failing health brought Jaeschke back to Germany in 1868. Much of his writing and translation work was completed during his final years in Herrnhut. His Heimgang (lit. “Home going”) occurred in 1883. Jaeschke epitomizes the Moravian focus of missionary effort to downtrodden people. He stands as a brilliant linguist who did not waste his talents but who used them for the glory of God.

Jaffray, Robert (1873–1945). Canadian missionary to China and Indonesia. A missionary strategist and statesman, he used his father's Canadian newspaper experience to develop mission stations. Through his monthly Bible Messenger Jaffray disseminated training materials for Cantonese Christian workers and later produced other colloquial-language versions. While superintending Christian and Missionary Alliance work in the troubled Guangxi province in China, Jaffray also established new mission work in French Indo-China and later in the Dutch East Indies.

Arriving in Guangxi in 1897 Jaffray was soon appointed to Wuzhou city, his missionary base for over thirty years. Convinced that the power of the gospel had no cultural limits, Jaffray sent Christian messengers among primitive tribes as well as civilized peoples. Workers stayed in an area until a church was functioning, and then set up local Bible schools and presses so that Christian life could expand in that cultural setting. By this means an indigenized and independent church quickly developed. This strategy produced startling results in evangelism throughout Guangxi and Indo-China.

In 1931 Jaffray moved to Makassar in the Celebes to open new fields in the East Indies. Here for the first time he employed Chinese workers as foreign missionaries. As in the case of Indo-China, encounters with many peoples including the Dyaak headhunters were accompanied by unusual events of apostolic character. This ministry also grew until the Japanese invasion in 1942, when many missionaries were imprisoned, and Jaffray himself died as a war prisoner in 1945.

LAUREN PFISTER

Jain, Jainism. Jainism is the religion of the Jain community and describes the way of life of those who follow the Jina (spiritual victors), human teachers who have attained infinite knowledge and preach the doctrine of moksha (liberation), also called tirthankaras (builders of the bridge across the road of suffering). One of India’s most ancient non-Vedic traditions, widely regarded as the earliest heterodox offspring of Hinduism, Jainism is often confused with Buddhism with which it bears some superficial similarities. Down through the centuries the Jains, however, have succeeded in maintaining their distinctive identity and the integrity of their belief system and way of life within the highly accommodative climate of Hinduism.

Although the beginnings of Jainism are commonly associated with Vardhamana Mahavira, who lived in the sixth century B.C., the Jain literature does not recognize him as founder or prophet, but as the twenty-fourth tirthankara. Jains today have deified him as the last and greatest savior with ideas of sinlessness and omniscience attributed to him. As a religious movement, Jainism seems to have arisen as a reaction to Brahminical Hinduism, and due to its rejection of the authority of the Vedas, is often perceived as a heresy of Hinduism. The Jaina system is opposed to the idea of God as a supreme personal being. The universe itself is regarded as uncreated and eternal, made up of eternal souls (jivas) and eternal elements (ajivas).

Jainism shares with Hinduism belief in karma (moral retribution) and samsara (transmigration of the soul), although these concepts are interpreted in highly fatalistic terms within the theoretical pessimism integral to the Jaina system. It thus posits a very negative view of life in which humanity is trapped within an essentially painful and evil cycle of human existence. Moksha (liberation) from bondage to this cycle of birth and death is through a process of fourteen stages of spiritual evolution, involving rigid, self-denying ascetic practices. The five great vrata (vows) prescribing these ascetic practices are: not to kill, not to lie, not to steal, to abstain from sexual intercourse, and to renounce all worldly attachments. Ahimsa (nonviolence) is one of the central beliefs and practices of Jainism. This cardinal principle of Jainism received worldwide attention as the essential ethical basis of the Indian movement for national independence as articulated and practiced by its chief architect, Mahatma Gandhi, who was himself deeply influenced by Jain thought and values. The deep reverence for life among the Jain community is reflected in a lifestyle which includes strict vegetarianism and noninvolvement in vocations such as farming, cattle breeding, and the armed forces. Large numbers of them have thus turned to careers in finance, commerce, and banking, making them one of the wealthiest and most influential communities in India.

Although Jainism has a very limited following of about 4.5 million adherents and the vast majority of them live in India, its influence has been powerful and far-reaching. The latter half of the twentieth century witnessed the emergence of an enterprising and influential Jain diaspora in North America, Britain, Africa, and the Far East. The Jain concern for peace, vegetarianism, and the environment contributes to the movement’s universal appeal. The opportunity that Jainism presents for Christian missions is highlighted by the fact that there appears to be no specific Christian ministry directed toward the Jain community to date.

Jamaica (Est. 2000 pop.: 2,543,000; 10,990 sw. km. [4,243 sq. mi.]) While a reported 70 percent of Jamaicans are at least nominally Protestant, the island’s rich cultural texture is reflected in its religious heterogeneity. A largely (93%) Afro-Caribbean society, in David Martin’s opinion, found expression for its inherent diversity in a variety of religious movements. These reflect sig-significant social class differences between the traditional Anglican, Methodist, and Moravian churches and more popular Baptist, Holiness, and Pentecostal groups. Included also are Seventh-Day Adventists, the largest Protestant community, a large Roman Catholic minority (10%), and powerful spiritist movements. The largest of these, the Tastafarians, has a larger following (80,000 adherents)—and a larger political role—than all but the largest Christian denominations.

Japan

Japan (Est. 2000 pop.: 126,472,000; 377,801 sq. km. [145, 869 sq. mi.]). Christian mission, which has made a substantial impact upon Japan, began in 1549 when Jesuit missionary Francis Xavier landed in Kagoshima. In the 450 years since then, generally speaking, Christianity in Japan saw marked growth during transitional periods and exerted considerable influence upon the formation of society. Subsequently, its growth was curtailed when the society gained stability and traditional culture and religious powers began to counter the Christian influence. Furthermore, it has remained a minority religion of foreign origin.

Roman Catholic Mission (1549–1639). Historians often call the 1549–1639 period “the Christian Century of Japan.” This period between Xavier’s arrival and the beginning of the National Seclusion (1639–1854) was turbulent, yet it witnessed the emergence of new national expectations for a unified state, accumulation of capital, rational and scientific thinking, the importance of the individual, and a worldwide vision beyond the national boundary. Christianity satisfied some of these expectations and recorded a remarkable expansion. The number of “Kirishitan” (Christians) was estimated at about 300,000 by the end of the sixteenth century.

Xavier’s initial ministry, which resulted in 2,000 missionaries, was followed by other Jesuit missionaries, and many Christian communities sprang up in Kyushu and Chugoku, as well as in the capital, Kyoto. In 1563 the first Christian baron, Omura Sumitada, received baptism and was followed by half a dozen more barons and many of their subjects, thus adding considerable impetus to the Christian cause. As Christianity became a significant movement, the successive line of leaders aspiring to unite the country, like Oda Nobunaga, Toyotomi Hideyoshi, and Tokugawa Ieyasu, initially showed great interest in the new faith, but they soon began to fear it as a foreign ideology and a disruptive order of organized religion. In 1587 Hideyoshi abruptly issued a decree to expel all missionaries from Japan and finally in 1614, the Tokugawa government proscribed Christianity altogether. Suppression, persecution, and martyrdoms followed. The “Twenty-six Martyrs” of 1597 and the “Great Martyrdom” of 51 Christians in 1622, both in Nagasaki, were but a few examples. The Shimabara Uprising of 1637–38, when about 40,000 were massacred, marked the end of the “Christian Century.”

The Modern Imperial State (1868–1945). The re-introduction of Christianity occurred at the end of the Tokugawa regime when Western powers broke Japan’s seclusion policy and won commercial treaties. One outcome was the presence of foreign residents in Japanese ports, among them pastors and chaplains to serve the religious needs of the expatriates. Notable figures were such missionaries as J. C. Hepburn (Presbyterian), G. H. F. Verbeck (Dutch Reformed), B. T. Petitjean (Catholic), and Nicolai (Russian Orthodox). Hepburn, serving as medical doctor, distinguished himself in the Japanese language and Bible translation and later founded a Christian school. Petitjean of the Paris Foreign Missionary Society met a group of the self-proclaimed Christians in 1865 and this incident led to the so-called rediscovery of about 60,000 “Hidden Christians” (Kakurekirishitan). They had long survived the government sanction and kept the faith of their seventeenth-century forefathers.

The Meiji Restoration of 1868, which restored the political power of the emperor and lifted official sanctions against Christianity in 1873, opened a new era for Christian mission. Both Roman Catholic and Russian Orthodox missions were well organized and successful. In 1912 there were about 66,000 Catholic and 32,000 Orthodox Christians in Japan. On the other hand, Protestant Christianity marked dynamic inroads into Japan and counted nearly 90,000 members in 1913. In its formative stage, many of its Japanese leaders, such as Uemura Masahisa, Uchimura Kanzō, and Nitobe Inazō coming from the former warrior class, were characterized as intellectual, independent, non-denominational, and Bible-oriented. Indeed, the first Protestant church, formed in 1872 by the early converts, was named “the Church of Christ in Japan,” thus avoiding any denominational character of the Western missionaries. Uchimura’s “NON-CHURCH” MOVEMENT (Mukyokai) idea was another unique but extreme example.

While a Christian influence was widely felt upon the society, by far the most noticeable area was that of education. Missionaries and national leaders considered education an effective means of evangelism and schools known as “Mission Schools” flourished. But the rise of nationalism and the religious revival of Confucianism and Shintoism turned the tide. The promulgation of the Constitution (1889) which made Shinto the state religion and the Imperial Rescript of Education (1890) forced Christian schools to reorient their education. A more decisive blow to them was Directive No. 12 of the Education Ministry (1899) which prohibited religious education and worship “even as extracurricular activities” in schools under government accreditation.

Nationalism also challenged Christianity on the issue of the imperial cult of Shintoism as a test of loyalty to the State. Since 1890 the Catholic Church had permitted Christians to participate in patriotic rites at the Shinto shrines and the Protestant churches followed. In 1941 some 30 Protestant churches were forced by the government to form the United Church of Christ in Japan.

After World War II (1945—). The crushing defeat of Japan brought a drastic change in the religious scene, and Christianity experienced a period of resurgence. Shinto ceased to be the state religion, and the new Constitution (1946) guaranteed freedom of religion to all. As General MacArthur of the Occupation authorities called for “1,000 missionaries” U.S. foreign missions of various denominations were established. In 1946 American missions poured their missionaries into Japan. Consequently more than 200 Protestant denominations were forced by the government to form the United Church of Christ in Japan.

Two distinctive features characterized post-World War II Christianity in Japan, namely ecumenism and internationalism. The formation of the World Council of Churches in the Amsterdam Assembly (1948) incited many ecumenical concerns and movements in the mainline Protestant Churches under the National Council of Churches. On the conservative side of Protestantism, evangelical churches in Japan took an active part in the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization (1974) and have since followed its ecumenical guidelines. Roman Catholicism’s Second Vatican Council (1962-65), which faced the challenging issues of the modern world, has influenced the Catholic Church in Japan in such areas as interreligious dialogue and fellowship with Asian churches.

To all appearances, the dawn of the twenty-first century still finds Christianity in Japan in disarray and on the periphery of Japanese society. According to the 1997 Japan Christian Yearbook, the number of Christians was 1,084,737, only 0.862% of the total population. Although Christian influence in Japan goes far beyond the boundaries of the church, the reality surrounding Christianity in Japan is not bright, yet its challenging, as well as promising, future may lie ahead.

Japanese Mission Boards and Societies. Japan’s Christian missionary outreach—surprisingly substantial for a country whose Christian population remains at about 1 percent of the total—can be connected to its historical position in relation to other countries. In the pre–World War II period Japanese Christian missionaries went out to various colonies within the expanding Japanese Empire (e.g., Taiwan) after its 1894–95 victorious war with China, to Korea after its annexation in 1910, then to protectorates granted by the League of Nations after World War I (e.g., parts of Micronesia). In other words, Japanese churches sent missionaries to work within Japanese-controlled domains. The current period of missionary outreach is very much associated with Japan’s postwar economic growth, beginning in the 1960s. The United Church, Overseas Medical Co-operative Service, Holiness Church, and Evangelical Missionary Society spearheaded the earlier postwar efforts. Much of this outreach was to Japanese people living abroad. Currently there is more of an international quality to the missions movement, in terms both of the sending-equipment agencies in Japan and of the places in which the 269 (1993) missionaries from Japan are working. Various international mission boards and societies have offices in Japan (e.g., Wycliffe) for raising up personnel, finances, and prayer support. There are organizations for coordinating communication between mission agencies and throughout the Christian community in Japan. There are interdenominational missionary training centers (e.g., Immanuel Bible Training College in Yokohama), at least one of which is associated with an accredited university (Tokyo Christian University in Chiba). Some boards and societies partner with churches in specific areas (e.g., Africa, the Philippines, Australia). Some focus on ecumenical partnership, while others emphasize social issues such as peace and hunger.

Japanese New Religious Movements. The modern era has seen the emergence of a large number of New Religious Movements in Japan which, although heavily influenced by the traditional Japanese religions, are manifestly different from Shinto, Buddhism, and Confucianism. Development of these new movements falls into three distinct stages: the period of social upheaval during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries following modernization and the Meiji Restoration of 1868; the immediate aftermath of World War II; and the period beginning in the 1970s and continuing to the present.

During the first period new religious movements such as Tenrikyo, Kurozumikyo, and Omotokyo appeared, whose founders tended to be shamanistic figures drawing heavily on the Shinto tradition. Prior to World War II, however, their activities were severely restricted by the Japanese government, which had established Shinto as the state religion with the emperor as the supreme figure. Omotokyo, for example, was heavily persecuted because of its claims that its shamanistic leader, Degushi Onisaburo, was a living god whose authority outranked even the emperor's.

The founders of the new religions that came into prominence after World War II were mostly Buddhist laymen and laywomen who advanced their own novel interpretations of Buddhist teachings. The postwar Japanese Constitution guaranteed complete freedom of religion, providing these Buddhistic offshoots the social space in which to grow. These groups emphasized earthly prosperity based on the ritual of ancestor worship (see ANCESTRAL PRACTICES). Soka Gakkai, one of the most successful of these movements, claims over ten million adherents and exerts considerable political influence.

Japan was undergoing rapid modernization during the first two stages. Japanese society faced significant changes in social values and mores. The new religions addressed the very real concerns of poverty, disease, and social unrest with practical and tangible answers. In the third stage, beginning about 1970, Japanese culture expressed a new fascination with mystical and occult phenomena. Some profound transformations in Japanese society led to these new religious quests.

By 1980 Japan had emerged as a postindustrial society characterized by the revolution in information technology. As the rapid economic growth of the postwar era began to slow down people began to discover that simple acquisition of material goods did not satisfy. Their country, Japan, had achieved the goal of becoming an economic superpower; the Japanese people found they had no clear purpose in life. In an effort to fill the spiritual vacuum many people began to experiment with yoga, mystical meditation, and the Occult. Furthermore, the intense pressures faced by young people as well as adults fostered widespread disillusionment with life. A rigorous and highly competitive educational system, with little sympathy for those less gifted, often left students emotionally spent and empty. Japan's "economic miracle" had been achieved at tremendous cost, as company employees had to spend long hours on the job, usually at the expense of their families and their own health. These conditions produced deep frustrations for everyone—for the men who become known as "workaholic," their wives who were often left alone to raise the family, and the children who tried to cope with new family structures as well as school pressures. Across the social spectrum, then, there was a widespread search for meaning and fulfillment.

The religious movements of this third stage, such as Agonshu, AUM Shinrikyo, and Shuukyo Mahikari Kyodan, tried to fill this spiritual void. Many of these groups combine mystical experience, occult practice, and a pseudoscientific perspective. The most famous movement, AUM Shinrikyo, was founded in 1984 by Shoko Asahara, who imitated the style of a Tibetan guru and attracted many young people with his unique mixture of meditation, mystical experience, and utopian eschatology. In accordance with this unusual eschatology, in March 1995 cult members diffused highly toxic sarin gas into the subways of Tokyo, killing twelve people and injuring six thousand.

Unfortunately the Christian church in Japan has not been particularly effective either in responding to the widespread frustration and sense of spiritual emptiness in contemporary Japanese society or in reaching those involved in new religious movements. Japanese Christians must develop a deeper understanding of Japan's particular social context and its own religious traditions, which are quite different from those of the West.

Javouhey, Anne Marie (1779–1851). French missionary to Africa and Latin America. Born in Jallanges, France, she was a devout Catholic and made it her life mission to care for the poor and to educate children. That ambition moved her beyond church walls into the mission field.

Her journey took her to several religious communities, but she found their way of life incompatible. Finally, Augustine Lestrange, a Cistercian, urged her to found her own congregation.

On that advice, in 1812 Javouhey bought a former Franciscan friary at Cluny and the Congregation of St. Joseph of Cluny was born. She quickly opened a school in Paris. In 1817 she founded a missionary school for native children on the island of Reunion.

In 1828 the French government asked Javouhey to oversee the colonization of Mana in Guyana; in 1834 she was again asked by the French govern-mission to educate six hundred Negro slaves about to be freed.
Javouhey, Anne-Mary

Her dedicated and innovative work in Guyana sparked international interest. In 1843 she left Guyana to further the work of her congregation in other parts of the world. By the time of her death, she had at least nine hundred blue-robed Sisters of St. Joseph all over the globe.

Anne Marie Javouhey's life mission was to minister to the poor and needy. Through that ambition, the world became her mission field.

Jehovah's Witnesses. The Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society (WTBTS), more commonly known as Jehovah's Witnesses (JWs), was founded by Charles Taze Russell in 1884. Headquartered in New York City, it has grown to over 13 million adherents in 232 countries. In 1995 over 5 million active "publishers" (proselytizers) invested 1.15 billion hours witnessing. Growth fluctuates between 5 percent and 7 percent annually, with the greatest gains in predominately Roman Catholic countries and the former Soviet Union. The key to WTBTS growth is the constant emphasis on the imminence of the world's end.

Based on the presupposition that God has always worked through an organization and that WTBTS has been chosen for this age, all other faiths are deemed false religions, soon to be destroyed. The organization, designated "mother," is as essential to spiritual life as God the Father. Although JWs profess to hold to scriptural inerrancy, much of the New Testament is applied solely to the "anointed" class (the 144,000 [Rev. 7:4] who will spend eternity in heaven). The organization alone has authority to interpret Scripture, assigning itself the central role in prophecy.

Primary teachings of WTBTS include an aggressively anti-trinitarian stance, annihilationist position on hell, rejection of all national or religious celebrations, extreme pacifism, refusal of blood transfusions, and the kingdom of God as a divinely instituted government headed by Christ and the organization. Their Christology begins with the creation of Michael the Archangel who incarnated as Jesus of Nazareth, died on a torture stake, rose spiritually, returned to heaven as Michael, and mediates only for the 144,000.

The WTBTS continues to evolve doctrinally in order to avoid problems related to false prophecies and to expedite the transition of leadership from the elderly anointed class to those who will reside on earth forever, "the great crowd."

JWs constantly challenge the church to more effectively teach church history and theology, thereby equipping Christians to respond to those who come bearing a different gospel.

Jerusalem Conference (1928). The 1928 Jerusalem Conference of the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL, the first major meeting of the IMC after its foundation at Lake Mohonk seven years earlier, marked a considerable widening of the missionary agenda. Here missionary agencies sought to respond to the challenges of an increasingly secular and pluralist world, albeit from a thoroughly christological perspective. This is clearly demonstrated by the concerns of the seven sections of the conference: (1) the Christian message in relation to non-Christian systems of thought and life; (2) the relationship between younger and older churches (for the younger churches were swiftly emerging with competent leadership anxious to press their own points of view); (3) religious education; (4) Christian mission in relationship to racial conflict (on which J. H. Oliphant, one of the IMC secretaries, had written four years earlier in Christianity and the Race Problem); (5) Christian mission and industrial difficulties; (6) Christian mission and rural problems; and (7) international missionary cooperation. Through these sections the conference emphasized a strong call to Christian service.

Several new organizations emerged out of the Jerusalem Conference. The Department of Social and Economic Research and Counsel sought to follow up on issues interfacing Christian mission and industry. The International Committee on the Christian Approach to the Jews, a first initiative in DIALOGUE, was founded in 1930; while an American expert on rural problems, K. L. Butterfield, sought by his travels to follow up on issues of rural mission, realizing that the overwhelming majority of humanity lived in rural communities. Farther afield, the Jerusalem Conference helped stimulate evangelistic endeavors such as the Kingdom of God Movement in Japan, and the Five Year Forward Movement in China.

Jesus and Mission

The concept of mission is central to an understanding of Jesus because Jesus and his mission are virtually synonymous. So identified was Jesus with his mission that it became his very life. “My food,” said Jesus, “is to do the will of him who sent me and to finish his work” (John 4:24).

Jesus’ Sense of Calling to Mission. Any discussion of Jesus’ understanding of mission must begin with Jesus’ own profound sense of calling. There is no indication in Scripture that Jesus ever struggled with what he should do with his life or that he tried various options before settling on his chosen path. From the very beginning, he committed himself to the will of God as revealed directly to him and mediated through his reading of the Old Testament. Matthew sees this as operative even before Jesus’ birth in the words of the angel to Joseph, “You are to give him the name Jesus, because he will save his people from their sins” (Matt. 1:21). The only episode recorded in our Gospels from Jesus’ first thirty years shows his early sense of calling. Just before he entered into adult life, Jesus knew what he was to do: “Didn’t you know I had to be in my Father’s house?” (Luke 2:49). At his baptism, Jesus told John it was necessary in order to fulfill all righteousness. That act of acceptance by Jesus of God’s will was ratified by the voice from on High, “This is my Son whom I love; with him I am well pleased,” accompanied by the descent of the Spirit of God (Matt. 3:13–17). After calling four fishermen to ministry, he began his next day in a solitary place, while it was still dark, in prayer. His disciples wondered why he was there and said everyone was looking for him. His reply was, “Let us go somewhere else—to the nearby villages—so I can preach there also. That is why I have come” (Mark 1:35–39). Later he would say, “the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many” (Mark 10:45) and “the Son of Man came to seek and to save what was lost” (Luke 19:10). This sense of calling finds expression in the graphic words of Luke, “as the time approached for him to be taken up to heaven, Jesus resolutely set out [literally, set his face] for Jerusalem” (Luke 9:51). And what sustained Jesus in those last terrible hours on earth was his determination that the will of God be done (Matt. 26:39–44). Jesus’ realization that he was to be the Savior of the world and his sense of calling to that task as the will of God for him is what gave shape to his life and ministry up to the very end.

Elements Shaping Jesus’ Concept of Mission. There is no reasonable way that we can probe the mind of Jesus to determine exactly how this realization took precise shape, but we can look at three elements that went into the idea itself. The first of these is Jesus’ understanding of the nature of God. For Jesus, God is compassionate, merciful, and loving. God is repeatedly called “Heavenly Father” and all that is best in fatherhood is to be found in God. Our Heavenly Father knows our deepest needs and is seeking to meet them (Matt. 6:25–32). And if human fathers, evil as they are, know how to give good gifts to their children, “how much more will your Father in heaven give good gifts to those who ask him!” (Matt. 7:11). The parable of the prodigal son, in which the father is really the key figure, pictures him as never giving up on the lost son and seeing him while still far off and lovingly welcoming him home. This love of God prompted him to send his own Son into the world so that the world might be saved (John 3:16, 17). The theme that God sent the Son is repeatedly emphasized by Jesus in the Gospel of John (5:36; 6:57; 7:29; 8:42; 11:42; 17:3, 8, 21, 23). The very essence of love is to give, God, as love, sent his Son as a gift to the world to provide the gift of salvation to those who would believe. Because Jesus understood God as love and himself as the expression of that love, he saw his mission as being sent by God to be the Savior of the world. So the nature of God as love shaped Jesus’ understanding of his mission as the embodiment of God’s loving purpose on earth.
Jesus and Mission

The second idea that shaped Jesus’ understanding of mission was his identification with the people of Israel. One aspect of God’s original covenant with Israel was that Israel should be a blessing and that all the peoples of the earth should be blessed through her (Gen. 12:2, 3). Although this was interpreted by Israel essentially to mean that Gentiles who desired salvation could attain it by becoming a part of her, there were glimmers of a concept that Israel should go to the other nations taking the message to them. Jonah is an example of that, as is the message of Amos to the surrounding nations (Amos 1:9, 11, 13; 2:1). In large part, however; universal salvation was seen as eschatological, when Israel’s God would be properly acknowledged as supreme over all the earth. It was this point Jesus picked up on in his correlation of eschatology and mission by postulating both a present and a future dimension to the kingdom. Inasmuch as the eschatological reality was present in and through his own earthly ministry, future reality was being brought to bear on the present. The knowledge of God which, in the future, will cover the earth like the waters cover the sea (Hab. 2:14) is now beginning its coverage in the mission of Jesus and will continue in the extension of that mission through his followers. Hence, the task of the church is to reach the ends of the earth and then the end will come when God draws history to a close in his own predetermined way (Matt. 24:14).

An aspect of Jesus’ identification with Israel that is often overemphasized and sometimes misunderstood is his apparent confinement of his earthly mission to Israel alone (Matt. 10:6; 15:24). But this must be seen in the light of his prophetic mission of judgment to Israel. He was offering them their final call that in the mystery of God was to be rejected and from which would come the salvation of the world (Rom. 11:7–10, 25–36). This is seen most clearly in Jesus’ explanation of his parables. Drawing upon Isaiah’s call to make the heart of Israel calloused and their ears dull (Isa. 6:9, 10), Jesus said his teaching was to have this effect also (Matt. 13:10–15).

What he was doing fulfilled Isaiah’s prophecy, but its ultimate fulfillment was to be that blessedness had arrived which the prophets foresaw as eschatological salvation, including the Gentiles (Matt. 13:16, 17). Hence, Jesus could also minister to the Gentiles as well, without any contradiction of his being sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Matt. 15:24).

The third idea that specifically influenced Jesus’ concept of mission was that of the Suffering Servant as found in the Book of Isaiah. There is a collection of prophetic psalms in Isaiah (42:1–7; 49:1–7; 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12; 61:1–3; see also Mark 10:45; Luke 24:26) that speaks of God’s righteous Servant who would bring redemption to the world. These prophecies were partially fulfilled by Israel, who was also God’s servant, but ultimately by Jesus who was to the highest degree both Israel and Servant. The Servant as portrayed by Isaiah was to suffer for the sins of the world, establish justice, provide salvation for the nations, be a light to the Gentiles, give sight to the blind, proclaim the truth, be a covenant to the world, dispense God’s Spirit, make intercession for sinners, and make peace for all people. Here in prophetic word is the mission of Jesus made plain, as he himself knew. When he began his ministry in Galilee, in his hometown of Nazareth, he selected Isaiah 61:1–2 to read in the synagogue. After reading the passage he said, “Today this Scripture is fulfilled in your hearing” (Luke 4:20, 21). The whole of Jesus’ life was lived out in fulfillment of the prophesied mission of God’s Suffering Servant.

Jesus’ fundamental mission on earth was redemptive and revelatory of God’s saving will for the world. He embodied and revealed the loving nature of God that graciously gives. He also took up into himself the covenant made with Israel, fulfilling Israel’s task of mediating God’s salvation to the world and came as God’s specially anointed Servant, the sin-bearer for all.

Jesus’ Mission and His Followers. Jesus knew that the task of mission was not his alone, but was to be transmitted to his followers. In fact, he says it was necessary for him to depart so that they, through the Holy Spirit, could reach their own full potential (John 14:12; 16:7). This inclusion of his followers may be seen in Jesus’ ministry from the very beginning. Jesus’ first formal calling of the future leaders of his movement (Peter; Andrew, James, and John) was specifically to mission—“I will make you fishers of men” (Matt. 4:19). When he finally settled on twelve to represent and lead the group that followed him, he named them “apostles”—those who are sent (Mark 3:14)—emphasizing the nature of their calling. Their ultimate mission was not to stay indefinitely with him, but to go and proclaim the Good News of the kingdom (Luke 9:2). Indeed, the choice of twelve to lead was in itself a statement regarding mission. Jesus was establishing a New Israel and with that a renewed focus on Israel’s place in the history of salvation, the historical mediator of God’s salvation to the world. When the training of the twelve was sufficient, Jesus sent them in his own name (and power) on missions of their own, duplicating his own work (Matt. 10:1–7, 8). That was in Galilee. Later, in Judea, seventy-two were sent out in similar fashion (Luke 10:1). After Jesus’ resurrection, the apostle John epitomizes this concept of mission in Jesus’ own words, “As the Father has sent me, I am sending you” (John 20:21), where a double sense of mission is emphasized. Jesus had been sent by the Father and he sends out his followers to fulfill the mission the Father had given to him. The Gospel story ends in the words of the so-called Great Commission, “Go and make disciples of all nations” (Matt. 28:19).

It would be fair to say that the major focus of Jesus, in his relation to his disciples, was to prepare them for mission. This idea was enunciated over one hundred years ago by A. B. Bruce in The Training of the Twelve, where he saw the whole of Jesus’ life as being directed to that end and more recently by Rainer Riesner in Jesus als Lehrer. The disciples sought to follow Jesus as far as was humanly possible and he set the example for them.

Conclusion. Jesus’ sense of urgent divine mission penetrates the New Testament from beginning to end and ultimately goes back to Jesus himself. He was imbued with a sense of divine calling, he gathered his followers to support him in that mission, he commissioned them to proclaim the good news that he was bringing, he sent them out on preaching missions in his name, he accomplished the task given to him by his Father and left the fledgling church with the formidable task of going into all the world with the gospel, promising to be with them to the end of the age.

Jesus Film. In recent decades the Jesus film has emerged as one of the primary tools for evangelism throughout the world. The film is a two-hour motion picture based on the Gospel of Luke. A vision of Campus Crusade for Christ founder Bill Bright, it was developed in cooperation with the Genesis Project and produced by John Heyman in 1978.

The initial theatrical release was handled by Warner Brothers. Having opened in 2,000 theaters in North America, the Jesus film was soon sold to television cable networks throughout the world. By 1998 it had already been dubbed in more than 450 languages spoken by 85 percent of the world’s population. Another 200 versions were in process. The eventual goal of over 1,000 languages will potentially allow over 98 percent of the world to hear the gospel in their mother tongue.

The Jesus Film Project, a ministry of Campus Crusade for Christ, coordinates showings in more than 220 countries. A variety of methods are used, including 35-millimeter showings in commercial theaters; 16-millimeter showings in rural areas where portable screens, projectors, and generators need to be provided; national, regional, and local television releases; and videocassettes placed in rental shops and libraries or delivered home to home by church workers. Distributed by more than 700 ministries and church agencies, the film has been seen by over one billion people. At showings where an invitation to receive Christ could be offered, 50 million decisions had been indicated by 1997.

The widespread acceptability of the film to the Christian community is probably due to its scriptural base. Jesus speaks no words outside of those found in the Bible. A related factor is the film’s accuracy. Five years of research went into the preparation for the production. More than four hundred scholars evaluated the script. Each scene was filmed as close as possible to the location where the original action took place two thousand years ago. The biblical approach and the selection of the actor to portray Jesus were of primary importance. After scores of screen tests Brian Deacon, a Christian Shakespearean actor from England, was selected for the role of Jesus. All of the remaining actors came from Israel, where the film was made.

The enthusiastic acceptance of the film by so many viewers from such diverse cultures is due to four primary factors. First, the film is a docudrama of first-century Palestine. Many relate to this presentation because they live in that rural type of culture where people still fish and farm for a living. Second, the film reaches people who cannot read. Third, that many people have never seen a film in their own language gives the film a strong impact. Fourth, most non-Westerners are concrete thinkers. They receive Jesus not only because he is the Savior, but because he has power over nature, evil spirits, sickness, and death.

PAUL E. ESHELEMAN

Jew, Judaism. Judaism, the religion of the Jewish people, includes the totality of Jewish life and thought. As a religious civilization Judaism embraces the historic and cultural experience of the Jewish community from earliest times to the present. Judaism has significantly influenced the formation of both Christianity and Islam.

The terms “Hebrew,” “Israelite,” and “Jew” come from the Jewish Scriptures, which Christians read as the Old Testament. God calls the first Jew, Abraham, promising him offspring, land, and blessing (Gen. 12:1–3; see ABRAHAMIC COVENANT). This covenant has universal significance for the nations, and particular relevance to Abraham’s physical descendants. Under Moses, the Hebrews were redeemed from slavery in Egypt and called into a covenant relationship at Sinai that embraced personal and social ethics as a reflection of their spiritual relationship with Yahweh. The election of Israel has a missionary dimension in that Israel is called to be a priestly people and a light to the nations as she bears witness to God.

PAUL E. ESHELEMAN
Jew, Judaism

Biblical Israel’s identity developed in reaction to the idolatry and polytheism of her neighbors. Yet the history of the Jewish people shows how failure to live according to the covenant led to destruction and the loss of the ten northern tribes (722 B.C.). Judah, the remaining tribe, gave its name to the southern kingdom. After the exile (586 B.C.) the term “Jew” (Yehudi) referred to subjects of the Babylonian/Persian province of Judah. Judaism survived in exile and restoration by becoming a religion of the book, the Torah, a concept wider than that of “law,” with a more general sense of “revelation” and “instruction.” Transmission and application of the Torah, especially as found in Pentateuch, were reinforced by the development of the synagogue as an institution for prayer, study, and community life.

By the time of Jesus the Jewish people had fragmented into a variety of groups (Pharisees, Saducees, Zealots, Essenes), with a majority living outside the land of Israel. After the destruction of the temple (A.D. 70) the successors of the Pharisees, the rabbis, had a normative influence on the development of later belief and practice. They codified the laws of the Pentateuch into the Mishnah (“repetition,” c. A.D. 200) and reformulated the religion without direct need of temple, land, or sacrifice. The term “Judaism” (ioudaismos) signifies the self-definition of Jewish groups in their struggle against the influence of Hellenism.

In the period of rabbinic Judaism (A.D. 200–500) Judaism became a religion of the dual Torah, the written and oral law, culminating in the completion (c. A.D. 500) of the Talmud (“teaching”), an extended commentary and discussion of the laws (halachah). The sages distanced the religion from that of the Jewish Christian sects (Ebionites, Nazarenes) by inserting the Birkat Haminim (“Blessing of Heretics”) into the synagogue liturgy (c. A.D. 110), forcing Jewish Christians to identify themselves or withdraw.

In the medieval period the Jewish people developed strategies for survival in the frequently hostile environments of Islam and Christianity (the Crusades). Attempts at conversion led to public disputation over messianic prophecies, such as that between Nachmanides and Paulo Christiani in Spain (1263). Such encounters were often held under duress, and with an agenda of forced conversion. Jewish mysticism (Kabbalah) thrived, with a resurgence of messianic expectation (Shabbetai Zevi 1665).

In the period of emancipation (1700–1900) rationalism and humanism enabled Jews who came out of the ghettos to be actively involved in European society. Thinkers such as Spinoza, Lessing, Marx, Freud, and Einstein, often influenced by their Jewish backgrounds, made significant contributions to secular knowledge. Others distanced themselves in ultraorthodoxy (Hasidism). Reform and Liberal Judaism developed alternative patterns of liturgy, belief, and lifestyle. Patterns of emigration at the beginning of the twentieth century led to increased assimilation. Zionism, a secular nationalism with religious aspects, was motivated by European and Russian anti-Semitism. It became a viable project that resulted in the formation of the state of Israel (1948). Eligibility for citizenship in Israel has been challenged in a number of cases of Jewish believers in Jesus, giving rise in a secular context to the traditional “Who is a Jew?” question.

More than anything else Zionism has provided an antidote for the effects of anti-Semitism (Nazism) and the trauma of the Holocaust. However, the Jewish community today is characterized as much by “post-Holocaust disillusionment” as by a vibrant faith in the God of Israel. From a Christian perspective the creation of the state of Israel (1948) renewed the eschatological hopes of many premillennialists, and the renewed use of Hebrew as a spoken language provided new impetus for literature production and the development of worship resources.

Theology. While Judaism has always avoided creedal formulation, stressing orthopraxy over orthodoxy, the ethical and religious values of Judaism can be summarized in the Ten Commandments and the Thirteen Principles of Faith of Maimonides (1135–1204), which gave Judaism a creedal form in the “Thirteen articles of faith,” combining a biblical theism with Aristotelian philosophy. The identity markers of Sabbath, circumcision, and the food laws (kashrut) have continued to be important distinctive of the Jewish people, as have celebration of the Jewish festivals, especially Passover and the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur). In recent years women have taken a more active role, with the ordination of women rabbis in the Reform and Liberal synagogues, but the traditional model of the woman’s role is still the most common.

Judaism revolves around the core themes of God, Israel, and the Torah, as summarized in the Shema, the confession of faith of Deuteronomy 6:4. A further central topic is that of the land, Eretz Israel. Belief in the coming of the Messiah, while one of Maimonides’ principles, is interpreted in various ways, but generally with the conclusion that Jesus was not the Messiah because he failed to fulfill the required messianic prophecies, though it may be argued that the concept of the Messiah was redefined by Judaism to specifically rule out the radically new formulation of the messianic program given by Jesus. The additional social cost of becoming a Christian has prevented many Jewish people from accepting Jesus with a willing heart. Memories of the medieval forced conversions (Inquisition) make it especially painful for Jewish people to think of “betraying their people” through conversion.
Mission. From its beginnings Christianity has defined itself and its mission in response to its Jewish origins, in proclamation of its Jewish Messiah, Jesus. In the patristic and medieval periods, debates between Jews and Christians on the messianic prophecies were frequent, but they often degenerated into polemics fed by the anti-Judaism (loosely referred to as “anti-Semitism”) derived from a misreading of the New Testament and fed by the institutional aims of the church. With lamentably few exceptions the Jewish people were despised, rejected, and persecuted by the church, and the “teaching of contempt,” the idea that the suffering of the Jews is due to their rejection of Jesus, has continued to feed both religious and secular forms of racial prejudice.

In the light of this some Christians have renounced the call to evangelism, seeing their mission to Israel today as one of support and reconciliation, with dialogue rather than evangelism as the method (see also Jewish Missions). Following the proposal of Franz Rosenzweig that Jesus brought the new covenant for Gentiles (non-Jews) but that Jewish people already have a revelation of God in the Torah, some have adopted a two-covenant theory with a necessary redefinition of Christology, seeing the uniqueness of Christ as an anti-Semitic formulation untenable by Christianity today.

Despite this an increasing number of Jewish people have become believers in Jesus in recent years. Jewish attitudes to Jesus have changed from antipathy to a desire for a “Jewish reclamation of Jesus,” a significant factor in the increasing understanding of the Jewish context of the New Testament and Jesus himself. Also, the efforts at contextualization of the gospel have seen much fruit, as the growing number of messianic synagogues and organizations like Jews for Judaism, the Jewish Missions change accordingly. Moishe Rosen, who went on to found the Jews for Jesus organization, pioneered a new methodology that included (1) the use of contemporary literature oriented to the secular Jewish person; (2) greater visibility and boldness in approach; (3) a heightened contextualization in outreach as Jewish Christians expressed their faith in a Jewish frame of reference.

In response, countermissionary organizations were formed, most notably Jews for Judaism.
Jewish Missions

Though their successes in winning Jews away from Christ were few, they succeeded in creating a climate of hostility toward Jewish missions and messianic Jews. Nevertheless, their efforts for the most part helped focus attention on the issue.

The heart of Jewish missions remains the example and teaching of the New Testament. This core is best encapsulated by the apostle Paul in Romans 1:16 and Romans 9–11. Since 1970, Jewish people have been coming to Christ in record numbers. Today it is estimated that between 0.5 percent and one percent of Jewish people are Christians. Recent happenings of note include the indigenous work being done in Israel by Jewish believers and increased access to Russian Jews with many opportunities to tell the gospel.

RICH ROBINSON

John, Griffith (1831–1912). Welsh missionary to China. A Welsh Congregationalist associated with the London Missionary Society, Griffith John worked for fifty years in Central China, living to see the fall of the Qing dynasty. Noted for stirring preaching and missionary travels into dangerous areas, John also was a prolific writer and notable Bible translator.

Arriving in Shanghai in 1855, John and several other missionaries later had direct contact with ill-fated Taiping leaders. Before the Taiping insurgents were destroyed, John moved into Hankou City of Hubei province in 1861. A courageous itinerant evangelist, he risked his life numerous times in preaching to Chinese crowds and selling Chinese tracts he and others had authored.

In 1875 John experienced a personal spiritual renewal. He later countered vicious anti-Christian pamphleteering by Hunan literati with his own writings, literature distributions, and personal evangelism. He lived to see the opening of that province to numerous stable Chinese congregations. During the 1880s he translated portions of the Bible into Mandarin in a popular literary style. Well known across China for his Chinese pamphlets and books, he received an honorary degree from Edinburgh and a special interview with the famous Chinese statesman, Zhang Zhidong (1837–1909), before returning to England because of a fatal illness.

LAUREN PFISTER

John of Montecorvino (c. 1247–1330). Italian Franciscan missionary to Persia and China. Born in Montecorvino in southern Italy, John was a Franciscan missionary to Persia prior to his path-breaking missionary work in China. In 1270, after the opening of China to trade with the West, the Mongol emperor, Kublai Khan, asked the pope to send a hundred missionaries. Although conflict within the papacy delayed the response to this remarkable request, in 1289 John of Montecorvino started his journey to Peking with a letter from the pope to Kublai Khan. During his journey, John preached for a year in India before traveling up the coast of China and arriving in Peking in 1294. By 1300 he had learned the Chinese language and had established a thriving church. A 1305 letter describing his work caused widespread excitement in the West. In 1307, Pope Clement V named John the archbishop of China and dispatched several bishops to join him.

During his successful thirty-five years of service in China, John translated the New Testament and Psalms into the Mandarin language and gained thousands of converts. His ministry also involved repeated conflicts with the Chinese Nestorian Christians, whose church he did not recognize (see Nestorian Missions). In view of the arduous journey from Europe to China, few European missionaries were able to join him, and the churches he established were destroyed after the emergence of the Ming Dynasty in 1368.

John XXIII (1881–1963). Italian pope and convener of Vatican II. Born in northern Italy, he was ordained in 1904, became a doctor of theology, and served in the Vatican diplomatic corps (1925–53) before becoming cardinal and patriarch of Venice, and then an unexpected choice as pope. The self-styled “pope who keeps pressing on the accelerator” convened the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) to address the church’s strategy in meeting the needs of the modern world. He jarred long-entrenched prejudice against non-Catholic Christians, inviting them to send observers to the Council. He made post-Reformation history by welcoming to the Vatican the archbishop of Canterbury. He capitalized on his earlier sojourns in eastern European capitals by improving relations with communist states and with the Eastern Orthodox Church, and showed himself to have a marked social concern. John’s Journal of a Soul was translated into English in 1965.

But while he sent a breath of fresh air sweeping through conservative circles and initiated dialogues which are still continuing, the pontiff’s tolerance did not take in major changes in his church's basic theological doctrines.

Johnson, Richard (1755–1827). English missionary to Australia. Born in Yorkshire, England, Johnson studied at the Hull Grammar School and the University of Cambridge. He was ordained by the Church of England as a deacon (1783) and priest (1784), and served as a curate in two parishes. The influence of William Wilberforce and John Newton led to Johnson’s appointment in 1787 as chaplain to a convict fleet that was sent to a penal colony in New South Wales (Australia). Although his role was never clearly defined, he ministered to both convicts and British military personnel. As an evangelical Anglican, he sometimes clashed with high church government officials, particularly over the efficacy of attempting to convert the indigenous population. In addition to being the only chaplain for several years, Johnson also functioned as a magistrate and schoolmaster. He left his mark as a pioneer missionary in a very difficult setting. He showed an evangelistic burden and genuine love for the aborigines, even if he was not always sensitive to their culture. Health problems forced Johnson to return to England in 1800. Following curacies in Norfolk and Essex, he finished his career with a seventeen-year stint (1810–27) as rector of the combined parish of St. Antholin’s and St. John the Baptist church in London.

Jonah. The Book of Jonah makes its point through interaction and dialogue between the prophet and the Lord rather than through direct statements of prophecy or theology. It concerns more than simply a prophet who ran from God’s call or the miraculous mass repentence of the city of Nineveh. Certainly it is greater in scope than the miracle of the big fish that swallowed Jonah, even though that incident sometimes attracts more attention from those who study it than even the main theme of the book.

Jonah ran from God’s call, something that was meant to make the reader wonder why he would do it. The answer surprises modern readers: It was because Jonah was afraid that the Ninevites would take the message of judgment seriously and repent (4:1–2). To the original readers, though, Jonah’s line of reasoning may not have seemed strange.

Assyria was the major imperial power of Jonah’s day (approximately the first half of the eighth century B.C.), and it was feared throughout the ancient world. For nearly a century, the Assyrian kings had been sending troops into the northern areas of Syria–Palestine and demanding that the local populations submit to Assyrian sovereignty and pay a heavy tribute. Refusal to do so often resulted in the destruction of cities and even nations, with many cruel acts of terror and havoc that devastated the populations. Knowing this, it does not seem so strange that Jonah at first tried to escape the call of God to preach repentance to such a cruel people. The intensity of Jonah’s feelings becomes clear later when he overtly expressed his anger at God for having mercy on the dreaded enemy, even to the point that he asked the Lord to take his life (4:3).

The irony of Jonah’s bitterness, though, stands out even stronger when the reader considers that the Ninevites were not the only object of the Lord’s mercy. God had previously spared Jonah from the belly of the great fish, and Jonah concluded his prayer of thanksgiving with the words, “Salvation comes from the Lord” (2:9). Jonah could be grateful for his own salvation, but he could not accept that God would grant salvation to his bitterest enemy.

The Lord then tried to show Jonah the incongruities of his viewpoint through the lesson of the vine (4:6–11). Jonah cared about the vine because of how it involved him personally, so wouldn’t it be reasonable for God to be concerned in a personal way about a great city with many innocent people and animals in it (4:11)?

We do not learn Jonah’s opinion about God’s rhetorical question, but our responses to that same question will indicate something about our attitude toward God’s plan to bring his salvation to the ends of the earth. First, are we self-centered in our faith? Are we concerned only about ministry that will have some relationship and benefit to us personally? Will it reach the racial or ethnic group that we identify with? Will it improve our life? Will it avoid our having to express love for a group that we would rather hate? Second, an underlying question is even more pressing: To what extent have we opened our lives to the grace, compassion, and love of God ourselves if we are unwilling to love those who can do nothing for us in return or who have offended us deeply? Ultimately, the Book of Jonah and Jesus’ parable of the unforgiving servant (Matt. 18:23–35) are hauntingly similar.

The human heart is unlike the heart of God. That is the message of the Book of Jonah. Jonah recognized that the Lord is “a gracious and compassionate God, slow to anger and abounding in love, a God who relents from sending calamity” (4:2). But Jonah could not express that same love himself. He knew the gospel and had experienced it for himself, but his heart remained closed to his enemies. He was the reluctant missionary.
Jonah

who preached and saw results (chaps. 1 and 3), but only because God’s Word is effective to accomplish its purpose (Isa. 55:11).

The reader also notices Jonah’s blindness to God’s grace in his own life. In his grace, God has chosen to work through human instruments to carry out his plan for proclaiming the gospel throughout the world. Jonah should have been grateful that God chose to involve him, but he could see no further than the limits of his own provincial outlook.

The example of Jonah calls us to expand our thinking about missions. If Jonah could be effective even in his closed-heartedness, how much more effective he could have been if he had been more open to God’s work of love? To the extent that we see ourselves in the proud and bigoted Jonah, we can begin to appreciate more the miracle that God has been gracious to us. Also we can begin to pray that God will change our hearts so that we will have his heart for the world rather than our own.

THOMAS J. FINLEY

Jones, David (1707–1841). Welsh missionary to Madagascar. Born in Cardiganshire, South Wales, he was educated in his homeland at Neuaddlwyd and Gosport. He was ordained as an Independent in 1817 and appointed by the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY to sail for Madagascar in 1818 with Thomas Bevan, a fellow student. During the initial foray into Madagascar a fever killed most of the party, including Jones’ wife, and seriously weakened his own health. Following recuperation and remarriage in Mauritius, Jones returned to Madagascar in 1821 to establish schools and reduce the Malagasy language to writing. David Griffiths and he developed a phonetic system using Roman characters that allowed the Malagasy to write their own language. Despite resistance to this by some English colonists, Jones persisted in his work and eventually gained many converts. He and his colleagues also successfully translated the Bible into Malagasy. Antiforeign uprisings and persecution forced Jones to furlough in Great Britain in 1830. Later attempts to reestablish his work in Madagascar met with opposition from local rulers. He died in Mauritius following an accident, but the church survived, thanks in part to copies of Jones’ translation of the Bible that were hidden during the intense persecution of the 1830s and 1840s.

JAMES A. PATTERSON

Jonas, Eli Stanley (1884–1973). American missionary to India. Born in Maryland, Jones went to India under the Methodist Missionary Board in 1907. By 1930 his appointment was expanded to “evangelist-at-large for India and the world.” Following his initial service as pastor of an English-speaking congregation in Lucknow and then work among the outcastes, Jones changed his focus to evangelizing the upper-caste intellectuals. It was in this context that he emerged as a leading advocate of indigenizing, or Indianizing, the gospel message. For Jones this involved both de-Westernizing the gospel and immersing it in Indian cultural and philosophical forms and structures. He drew a sharp distinction in his view of evangelism between the message of Christ and the Western institutional church. His first book, The Christ of the Indian Road (1925), expounded the need to present Christ in an Indian setting—to give Christ to India and India to Christ. Two of his notable adaptations for indigenized evangelism were the Round Table philosophical discussions with Indian intellectuals and the establishment of Christian ashrams (adapted from the Hindu communities or “families”). During his missionary career, Jones’ view of evangelism evolved from the individualistic-conversion emphasis of his Wesleyan-Holiness heritage to a blend of individual conversion and the redemption of social, economic, and political structures. Thus, E. Stanley Jones’ missionary legacy is that of an ardent evangelist, a protoliberationist, a vocal ecumenist, and an innovative indigenizer.

Jones, Lina Maude (1890–1979). New Zealand missionary in the Solomon Islands. Born on March 2, 1890, Jones was the daughter of a Methodist fitter and turner who had come to New Zealand from England and based himself in the Railway Workshops in Christchurch. Lina, the fourth of five children and an enthusiastic athlete, was trained as a teacher. In 1923, inspired by a letter from a Methodist missionary read to an Easter Bible Class camp, she volunteered to the Foreign Mission Board of the Methodist Church. She was sent to the Western Solomon Islands where the opinionated and able Australian, John F. Goldie, controlled a mission supervised by New Zealand. Based in Munda and Bilua, in 1924 she began junior classes called “kinda” at Kokeqolo. It was the first provision of general education in the Solomons. She became active in mission administration, and was the first woman to attend the Annual Synod. Strong and determined, conservative in outlook, she was committed to improving conditions for the islanders. The missionaries were evacuated during World War II, and Lina worked in the Foreign Missions Office in Auckland. She returned to the Solomon Islands in 1945, and helped in the translation of the New Testament and a dictionary into Roviana. Retiring to Auckland, New Zealand, in 1950, she worked constantly to increase interest in foreign missions, until her death on June 11, 1979. Within the limits permitted to women in denominational missions she exercised a broad influence.

Jordan (Est. 2000 pop.: 6,407,000; 91,861 sq. km. [35,468 sq. mi.]). The Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan is an Arab nation located in the northwest corner of the Arabian Peninsula. About 6 percent of the land area of Jordan is arable, and more than 90 percent is desert. Village life in Jordan dates from at least 8000 B.C. at Jericho. The area was a frequent invasion route for Assyrians, Egyptians, Babylonians, and Persians. The Ottoman Turks conquered the area in 1517, and imposed a social structure that forms a strong cultural element even today.

More than 96 percent of the population are Arabs. The bulk of the population is descended from Bedouin ancestry. Islam is the state religion, almost entirely Sunni Muslims. The Christians are less than 5 percent, the majority from the Greek Orthodox community.

The history of missions in Jordan is varied. Political divisions have changed and are still changing, thus the beginnings of modern Protestant mission work in Jordan dates back to the time when the area was known as Palestine. Great Britain has played an important political and religious role in the area for over a century. The Anglican Church in 1875. With several thousand followers, he founded the Revival Church, better known as the Six Years’ Party. Missionaries sharply denounced its excesses and nonconformity. Although discredited in 1881 when the prophecy failed, Justus Joseph had contributed to church growth. His activities reflected the struggle of indigenous Christians for leadership in mission churches.

Journals of Mission and Missiology. A wide range of periodical literature reports on and informs of the missionary activity of the Christian Church. Virtually all mission boards and agencies publish newsletters to keep their missionaries and supporters informed of their activities. These newsletters can be found in library collections of related schools or mission libraries (see Mission Libraries.) They are listed in publications such as the Mission Handbook.
Journals of Mission and Missiology

Several bulletins inform the Christian community of newsworthy events and trends related to mission. Mission Frontiers, published by the U.S. Center for World Mission, emphasizes the cutting edge of missionary activity. Pulse, published by the Evangelism and Missions Information Service of the Billy Graham Center, provides articles and news items on topics that impact missionary work. The Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization communicates with the members of its network through LCWE Newsletter. The AD 2025 Global Monitor, produced by Global Evangelization Movement Research in the United States, attempts to measure the progress of world evangelization. The Christian Research Association in the United Kingdom provides a similar service through Quadrant.

The World Council of Churches maintains the oldest English language missiological journal, International Review of Missions. Other major English language journals published by institutions include the International Bulletin of Missionary Research by the Overseas Ministries Study Center (OMSC), Evangelical Missions Quarterly by the Evangelism and Missions Information Service of the Billy Graham Center (EMIS), Exchange by the Interuniversity Institute for Missiological and Ecumenical Research (IIMO), Mission Focus by the Mission Training Center, Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminary, and the Bulletin of the Scottish Institute of Missionary Studies by the Institute. A title which attempts to investigate new trends in world evangelization is the International Journal of Frontier Missions.

Several journals are produced by scholarly societies and reflect the specific perspective of each society. The American Society of Missiology (ASM) produces Missiology. The International Association of Mission Studies (IAMS) publishes Mission Studies. Missionalia is the product of the Southern African Missiological Society (SAMS). Missio Apostolica is the journal of the Lutheran Society of Missiology.

A number of non-English journals are important for mission studies. Norsk Tidsskrift for Missjon is produced by the Egede Institute. Perspectives Missionnaires, the work of several organizations, is published in Switzerland. Svensk Missionstidsskrift is the publication of the Svenska Institutet für Missionsforskning. Zeitschrift für Mission is published by the Deutschen Gesellschaft für Missionswissenschaft and the Basler Mission.

Some denominations report missionary activities in their general publications. This is especially common for younger churches. Advent Christian Witness is the official publication of the Advent Christian General Conference of America. Alliance Life is published by The Christian & Missionary Alliance. The Covenant Companion is produced by the Evangelical Covenant Church. The Evangelical Beacon is published by the Evangelical Free Church of America. Foursquare World Advance is published by the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel. Light & Life is the official publication of the Free Methodist Church of North America. The Messenger is produced by the Evangelical Mennonite Conference.

Several Roman Catholic journals are produced in various parts of the world. Indian Missiological Review is published by the Sacred Heart Theological College in Indore. The Japan Mission Journal is produced at the Orins Institute for Religious Research in Tokyo. The Instituto Español de Misiones Extranjeras (IEME) publishes Misiones Extranjeras in Madrid. Neue Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft = Nouvelle Revue de Science Missionaire is published at the Missionshaus Bethlehem, Immensee, Switzerland. Spiritus, the responsibility of several organizations, is published in Paris. And finally, Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft is the publication of the Internationalen Instituts für missionswissenschaftliche Forschungen (IMF).

There are several related areas of study that are important to missiology. The social sciences, especially Anthropology, provide the background to understand specific cultures. The field of Communication is essential to understand the impact of both written and oral transmission of the gospel message. General education and Christian education in particular have always been vital parts of Christian outreach. Theology began in the context of evangelism and missions, and continues to have an important role as Christianity develops within the diverse cultures of the world. World events and Politics are especially important to understand how local events have impacted missionary activity. World Religions and New Religious Movements provide the religious context for the mission activity of the church. A large number of popular and scholarly periodicals related to these areas of study are available.
Keeping up with the literature of mission studies is a challenge for all missiologists. There are three major ways that journal publications assist the specialist in this task. First, most journals include book review sections complete with a list of books received but not reviewed. Missiology, International Review of Mission, International Bulletin of Missionary Research, Evangelical Missions Quarterly, and Missionalia carry the largest number of reviews. They rely on the community of mission scholars and practitioners to review all of the major works in the field.

A second type of assistance is comprehensive bibliography. Several major journals intentionally provide this service. Missiology and International Review of Mission contain classified annotated bibliographies of new publications in each issue. While Missiology covers only books, other journals include articles in their coverage. Some bibliographies are published as separate titles. Bibliographia Missionaria is an annual published by the Pontifical Missionary Library of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, and Literaturerschau zu Fragen der Weltmission is an annual supplement of the Zeitschrift für Mission.

The third type of guide to the literature indexes current periodicals. Missionalia has long been an important guide to periodical literature. Theology in Context, published in both German and English editions, attempts to provide access to the literature of the Third World. As with all areas of religious studies, the Religion Indexes published by the American Theological Library Association provide the most comprehensive subject index to the literature of mission studies.

KENNETH D. GILL

Joy. A state of mind that accompanies any pleasurable experience. Scripture acknowledges this natural joy as well as a supernatural joy. The latter can be defined as a delight in life that runs deeper than pain or pleasure. This kind of joy is not limited by or tied solely to external circumstances. It is not a fleeting emotion but a quality of life that can be experienced in the midst of a variety of emotions.

Joy is described as a gift of God (Neh. 12:43; Eccles. 5:20; 8:15; Gal. 5:22; 1 Thess. 1:6). It is a natural outcome of fellowship with God (Ps. 16:8–9). It can be experienced in sorrow and trials (Hab. 3:17–19; Rom. 5:3; 2 Cor. 6:10; 1 Peter 1:6).

The joy that God gives is described as great (Jude 24), unspeakable (1 Peter 1:8), continual (1 Thess. 5:16), full (John 16:24), increasing (Isa. 9:3), and eternal (Isa. 51:11; 61:7; John 16:22). It is to be a part of true worship (Ps. 100:2), service (Deut. 28:47), giving (2 Cor. 9:7), prayer (Phil. 1:4), obedience (Isa. 64:5; Luke 19:16; Heb. 13:17), witnessing (Acts 24:10), sacrifice of ourselves for others (Phil. 2:17–18), and our routine activities such as eating and drinking (Eccl. 9:7).

The mission of the church is to lead the nations to the Source of true joy. God is the joy of the whole earth (Ps. 48:2). He is the proper object of all appropriate rejoicing (1 Sam. 2:1) because he is the ultimate source of every good and perfect gift (James 1:17). Just as believers love in response to God’s love for them (1 John 4:19), so they rejoice in God because God rejoices first in doing good to them (cf. Jer. 31:4; Isa. 62:5; Zeph. 3:17).

The church is to present to the world a God of Joy. The tendency of sin leads people to rejoice in the work of their hands (Acts 7:41). True and lasting joy is found by rejoicing in the work of God’s hands. Ultimately only what he does will last for all eternity (Ps. 127:1–2; John 15:5). The truth that joy can be found in God’s person, work, provisions, rule, and presence is to be shared with the world.

A life of joy is a preoccupation with God who alone gives meaning and purpose to all of life and every task and relationship (2 Cor. 3:18). One cannot experience fullness of joy if he or she is preoccupied with security, pleasure, or any other self-interest. All blessings are to lead us back to the ultimate source (James 1:17; cf. Phil. 4:10).

How is the church to carry out its mission so as to reflect joy? Practicing God’s presence (Ps. 16:8–9) and abiding in Christ (John 15:11) are the divine means. This involves the experience of answered prayer (John 16:24) and telling others how to fellowship with God (1 John 1:4). It involves the continual seeking of God’s rule (Matt. 6:33) and Person (Ps. 40:16; 70:4; 105:3) as well as responding to his discipline (Ps. 90:15). It also involves an outlook of faith during trials (Matt. 5:12; 2 Cor. 12:9; Heb. 10:34) as well as a perspective of hope (Rom. 12:12). As one imitates Jesus in loving righteousness and hating lawlessness (Heb. 1:9) joy is a by-product. Fellowship with other believers is an aid to joy (Rom. 12:15; 1 Cor. 12:26) as well as true ministry to others (Prov. 12:20). Suffering need not hinder one’s joy. In fact, suffering for Christ can even be a cause for rejoicing (Acts 5:41).

Our chief joy is to be a vital interest in God’s purposes, program, and presence (Ps. 137:6). Today it is the building of his church (Matt. 16:18). Our chief responsibility is to exalt Christ and let him have the preeminence (John 3:29; Col. 1:18). In Christ the God of joy can be known and enjoyed.

Judgment

Judgment. Even in the postmodern relativistic West, where judgment is repugnant, the chilling details of ethnic cleansing or child abuse haunt us with the questions, “When will the wicked be judged? Will justice ever be established?”

Sin and Justice. Created for God, humanity proclaimed its autonomy. This rebellion against God is the root of human evil and injustice to others (Rom. 1:20–32; 8:7). History is the narrative of human deceit, treachery, and persecution. Perhaps our actions are not so obviously wicked, but are hidden behind false smiles and vain civility. Or maybe we were like those who were unwilling to defend Jesus publicly when the crowd called for his crucifixion. Sins of commission as well as omission have just as deadly repercussions in society. So history prompts the constant refrain, “Where is the God of justice?” (Mal. 2:17).

God made us accountable to himself, the Moral Judge of the cosmos (Rom. 2:15–16). We know wrongs must be righted. Even without considering restitution, we have a sense of what is necessary to begin righting a wrong. The offender should be forced to suffer this wrong in order to recognize the full depth of this injury. That is the purpose of retributive punishment as expressed in the Old Testament law of retaliation: those who injure their neighbor, whatever they have done must be done to them: fracture for fracture, eye for eye, tooth for tooth (Lev. 24:19–20).

The Final Judgment. Scripture’s ultimate answer for evil is that God, the holy Judge of all the earth, will call every human to account for his or her life on the Day of Judgment (Pss. 5:4–6; 31:18; Matt. 12:36; Rom. 2:6–11; 1 Peter 4:5). This life has grave moral significance! Nothing can be hidden from God, not even our secret thoughts (Rom. 2:16). Every deed will be declared, from idle words to the failure to help the hungry (Matt. 16:27; 25:31–46; Rev. 22:12). We all face a future judgment of either exoneration or condemnation, receiving a welcome to heaven or hell (Luke 12:21). We are all obliged to help other believers recognize their sinfulness (Matt. 18:15–17; Gal. 5:26–6:2). When Jesus cautions, “Do not judge, or you too will be judged,” he is not precluding preaching or reproof (Matt. 7:1–4). However correction must be in his name, so that even the admonisher remains subject to his Lord. Believers must never attempt to impose God’s final judgment, but to overcome evil with good (Rom. 12:19–21). For God alone is the holy Judge.

The Christian’s Judgment of Others. The proclamation of God in Jesus Christ necessarily carries judgment against sinners. Furthermore, correction is essential to forming a church where the fellowship of believers self-consciously build up each other into Christ’s body (Eph. 4:16). When preaching is easily turned aside, believers are obliged to help other believers recognize their sinfulness (1 Thess. 5:12; 1 Cor. 11:29–32; Heb. 12:5–17; Rev. 3:17–19). God will not let his people continue in sin without judgment. So failures and persecutions should be catalysts for self-reflection and spiritual growth into Christ’s image (2 Thess. 1:3–5; Col. 3:10). God’s present judgment is not simply directed toward individuals (Rev. 2:5; 3:15–21). Believers need to attend to God’s chastisement of every Christian institution, even the missions movement, so that we learn to embody Christ’s humility (2 Cor. 6:2–11; 1 Cor. 4:9–16).

Judson, Adoniram (1788–1850). American missionary to Myanmar. Born in Malden, Massachusetts, and one of America’s best known missionaries, he and his wife, Ann Hasseltine Judson (1789–1826), sailed for India from Salem, Massachusetts, on February 19, 1812, with the first American foreign missions contingent. Though sponsored by the Congregationalist American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, the Judsons became Baptists while en route to Asia. This decision led to their founding the first mission to Burma (now Myanmar) and the formation of what became the American Baptist Missionary Union to support them and other missionaries.

Gifted linguistically, Judson labored to learn Burmese, a complex language. In 1834 he completed the Burmese Bible and his Dictionary, English and Burmese in 1849. A church was established despite Judson’s horrendous seventeen-month imprisonment, the death of his first wife (1826) and child (1827), the death of Sara Boardman Judson (1845), his second wife, and his own persistent ill health. Returning to America in 1845, Judson advanced the expanding foreign missions movement. In 1846 he married Emily Chubbeck, a novelist, and returned to Burma. On a voyage to
Justice of God

The evangelistic commitment of evangelical missions has continuously stressed the centrality of the cross of Jesus Christ as payment for the penalty for sin. This atoning work satisfies the requirements of the justice of God for eternal life. The Bible reveals, however, that the justice of God encompasses more than the spiritual dimension. His demands extend into the concrete realities of human social existence. For the last several decades this aspect of the justice of God and the relevance of this justice to the worldwide mission of the Christian church has generated vigorous debate within evangelical circles.

Opinions differ over whether social justice issues should be strictly distinguished from the mandate to evangelize the lost and instead be considered by individual Christians subsequent to conversion; whether social action should be understood as providing a bridge to evangelism by presenting opportunities for the verbal proclamation of the gospel of eternal salvation; or lastly, should the concern for social justice be seen as an integral part of the broader mission of the church in the world. In other words, is social justice the by-product of the mission of evangelism, the means toward accomplishing that foremost task of evangelism, or a legitimate goal of mission?

Background to the Debate. Evangelical missions historically have demonstrated an interest in matters of social import. Mission activity, at least to some degree, has been directed at the eradication of personal vices, the establishment of hospitals and orphanages, the promotion of literacy, and the provision of emergency relief from natural disasters. Critics, however, would suggest that these laudable efforts are but gestures of charity, which focus on the individual and ignore the systemic realities that perpetuate social ills. They posit that such endeavors also are limited by a missiological perspective that is condemnatory of society and wary of close contact with a fallen world. Many locate the seedbed of this reticence to engage the larger context in the fundamentalist-modernist controversies of the early part of the twentieth century.

Nevertheless, in some evangelical circles there has been a broadening of the theology of mission over the last fifty years to embrace a more holistic framework (Van Engen; see Holistic Mission). This development represents a recuperation of evangelical roots in, for example, the influence of John Wesley (1703–91) and Methodism on English society, the successful efforts by William Wilberforce (1759–1833) and others to abolish the slave trade in the British Empire, and the two Great Awakenings in the United States in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries which were concerned with improving the moral life of believers and fomenting Christian education and anti-slavery sentiments (see Abolitionist Movement).

This debate concerning the relationship of justice issues to mission can also be placed within a wider global discussion. In the first place, reflection on the topic can be set against the backdrop of the history of missions around the globe. Some missiologists denounce what they consider to be the complicity of mission agencies with the European colonization of the Two-Thirds World and the surfacing of contemporary North Atlantic economic neo-colonial attitudes in mission structures and operation (Costas). More nuanced approaches would suggest a chronological convergence and some ideological affinities of early missions with that colonizing activity and do recognize certain theological limitations. These responses offer a more positive evaluation of pioneer and modern missionary efforts (Escobar and Driver; Scott; Sanneh; Núñez and Taylor).

Second, the relationship between justice and mission has received attention at several international evangelical congresses. An increasing awareness of Christian social responsibility has been encouraged by these gatherings, beginning with Wheaton and Berlin in 1966, through Lausanne (1974) to Manila (1989). The WORLD EVANgelical Fellowship has sponsored various consultations and regional congresses to wrestle with justice. These meetings have witnessed the growing input of theologians from developing countries, who daily face the harsh realities of poverty and war, and of those whom some label “radical” evangelicals (e.g., Ron Sider and Jim Wallis). Several recently published missionology texts underscore the centrality of the justice of God for mission (Scott; Dyrness; Bosch). For certain missionologists this trend is cause for alarm, because the primacy of evangelism is perceived to be under threat. They liken this direction in missiological reflection to some of the theological options taken by the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES since its watershed assembly at Up-psala of 1968 (Beyerhaus).

Foundational Biblical and Theological Themes. The following brief survey establishes that the demand for justice, both spiritual and social, is dear to the heart of God. This allcompassing justice should be central to the mission of the people of God in the world and incarnated within the community of faith. Different missiological positions, of course, will appreciate this mandate in their own particular ways.

The Fall and spread of sin. God announces in the garden that to eat the forbidden fruit will bring death (Gen. 2:16–17). Later revelation indicates that transgression brought spiritual death (Rom. 5:12–21), and the provision of covering the death of an animal (Gen. 3:21) foreshadows the Law’s sacrifices for sin and ultimately the sacrifice of the Lamb of God, Jesus Christ (e.g., Isa. 53:7–13; John 2:9; Heb. 9–10; Rev. 5:6–14). The first human death recorded comes to the idolatry, war, and oppression that serve as the backdrop to this portion of Isaiah.
That Isaianic passage, which describes a messianic jubilee for the nation of Israel, is now given a richer significance, even as Jesus declares its fulfillment. On the one hand, the mention of the poor, prisoners, the sick, and the oppressed anticipates the special targets of his ministry. A closer look at Lucan theology indicates that these terms have spiritual implications, too. His deeds and words are good news to those who are open to God and his Christ (6:20–26), whose bondage can be demonic (4:33–35; 9:1, 37–43; 11:14–28) and their blindness spiritual (1:79; 7:47; 24:47). His person and work exemplify the grace and ex-genies of divine justice, and in his death it finds that, even as sin has both vertical and horizontal dimensions, the justice of God involves every dimension of human existence.

The call of Abram. The divine commitment to the various spheres of justice reflected in Genesis 1–11 serves as the framework for the call of Abraham. Part of this charge is that he be a channel of blessing to the world (Gen. 12:3). This blessing involves worship and confession of the ture God, as well as trusting obedience (e.g., Gen. 12:7–8, 14:18–24, 15:6, 18:17–19; see ABRA-HAMIC COVENANT). The patriarchal accounts in Genesis demonstrate that the notion of blessing has a social dimension grounded in the character of God. For instance, Abraham intercedes for Sodom on the basis of divine justice (Gen. 18:22–32), a justice which demands chasiment, but that is tempered by mercy.

The exodus and Sinai. God responds to the cry of the Israelites in Egypt because of God’s covenant, but action on their behalf also is motivated by compassion for their suffering of cruel infanticide and oppressive labor (Exod. 2:23–25).
While they are miraculously delivered in part to be free to worship the Lord (Exod. 5:3), they are called as well to create a new type of society in the Promised Land. The Law given at Sinai (Exod. 20–40) and presented in the rest of the Pentateuch reveals that God is founding an alternative community with a different kind of spiritual ethos and social ethic. The Lord desires justice among his own people, and their laws are to be a model and testimony to the surrounding nations (Deut. 4:5–8).

The Servant Songs of Isaiah. The themes of salvation and justice are repeated throughout these messianic passages (Isa. 42:1–9; 49:1–13; 50:4–11; 52:13–53:12). The ministry of the Servant will be to establish a reign of righteousness and peace in faithfulness to the God of Israel, a striking antithesis to the idolatry, war, and oppression that serve as the backdrop to this portion of Isaiah.
This hope embraces all the nations of the earth and is secured by the voluntary self-sacrifice of the Servant.

Luke 4:16–20. This inaugural sermon of Jesus’ ministry is based on Isaiah 61:1–2a (and 58:6b).
That Isaianic passage, which describes a messianic jubilee for the nation of Israel, is now given a richer significance, even as Jesus declares its fulfillment. On the one hand, the mention of the poor, prisoners, the sick, and the oppressed anticipates the special targets of his ministry. A propitiation (Rom. 3:25–26; Heb. 2:17; 1 John 2:2, 4:10).

John 20:21. Some propose that the words of Jesus in John 20:21 (cf. John 17:18; Mark 12:28–31 and parallels) should be taken as the commission which defines Christian mission: the life and ministry of Jesus are a paradigm to be imitated (Stott). This perspective does not devalue evangelistic proclamation, which others consider the defining prescription in the other GREAT COMMISSION passages (Matt. 28:18–20; Mark 16:15–18; Luke 24:45–49), but argues rather for a more comprehensive understanding of mission—a holistic vision which would incorporate both the spiritual and social spheres of God’s justice.

Finally, mention should be made of the theme of the KINGDOM OF GOD. The dynamic rule of God in both the spiritual and social spheres of God’s justice. Throughout history he expresses the demand for justice and intervenes to effect it in the various spheres suggested in the preceding survey. The future establishment of a kingdom of justice, in all of its breadth, is an integral part of the biblical hope.

Justification. Justification is primarily a forensic term implying the results of God’s work of declaring his elect to be righteous. The terms justification and righteousness are related in that they are both from the root dikai, having to do with both penalty (or punishment) and justice. Justification is a primary topic in the writings of Paul, who discusses the issue more than any other writer in the New Testament. Paul’s mission was to preach the gospel to the peoples of the earth with a view to their being justified by grace through faith in Jesus Christ (Rom. 1:17).

There is both a generic use of the term justification and a technical use. Basically, the idea of justification is to be set right or to pronounce just. Thus, people may be justified among themselves as in James 2:21, “was not Abraham our father justified by works?” James is not declaring that Abraham was righteous before God because of works, but that from the human perspective, he was shown to be a righteous man (justified) by his works. The works were a result of his faith in God. His faith justified Abraham (Gen. 15:6; Rom. 4:1–3), his works openly demonstrated that faith, and therefore, in the eyes of people he was shown to be righteous (justified, James 2:21; see also, e.g., Deut. 25:1).

There is also a technical sense of the word in theological propositions. This is the forensic or legal declaration of one being declared just before God. Paul is the primary theologian of this doctrine in the New Testament. He begins by pointing out that “the doers of the law shall be justified” (Rom. 2:13). The context is that it was not enough to claim to do the law, one must do the law to be justified before God. He continues his argument by pointing to the condemnation of the whole human race (both Jews who trusted in their ability to do the law, and Gentiles who did not have the law) because “there is none righteous (in God’s sight), . . . none who does good (by God’s standard)” (Rom. 3:10–18). Therefore, “by the works of the law no flesh will be justified in His sight” (Rom. 3:20; Gal. 3:2, 16; 3:11). However, there was one Man who did keep the law, fulfilling its every demand. This law doer was Jesus Christ, the Second Adam, God who became man (Rom. 5:15–19). In this sense, justification is recognition of fulfilling the requirements of the law and is an actualization of justice in declaring him righteous.

Theologically speaking, justification as it applies to other humans must be imputed because it cannot be earned and is not intrinsic to human nature. It is given as a gift to those who believe (Rom. 3:28) and this gift is available only by God’s grace (Rom. 3:24). It is a divine act with a purely legal nature and not an infusion of moral quality into the character of the one justified. As the first Adam sinned and brought condemnation to the human race (Rom. 5:12–14), the second Adam lived righteousness and provides justification for those who trust in him (Rom. 5:18–19). The fact that the Righteous One died in the place of unrighteous humankind (Rom. 5:6–9) provided the way in which God could declare righteous his fallen creatures yet remain righteous in himself. Thus, he is both just and the justifier of the one believing (Rom. 3:26). Thus Paul calls Christians to mission and gospel proclamation. “How can they learn without someone preaching to them? And how can they preach unless they are sent?” (Rom. 10:14–15).

The status of being justified does not in any manner assume that the one justified will cease from sin or that his or her character has become intrinsically righteous. Sinlessness is no more possible after being justified than before. When sin does arise in the life of a believer, the Father will discipline his children (Heb. 12) but it does not affect his or her justification because it was attributed upon faith not works. Paul raises the rhetorical question as to who could bring charges against the elect since “God is the one who justifies” (Rom. 8:33). If God has declared the sinner righteous, no one can bring condemnation to him or her. Justification is based upon the death and resurrection of Jesus and one’s personal faith in that provision (Rom. 5:1, 9; 4:25).

For those carrying the message of justification to the world, the key elements must not be lost. The sin and darkness of the lost is well documented in both Scripture and the human condition. The need of the lost is to understand their insufficiency and God’s gracious provision of justification by grace through faith. The bad news is that all have sinned (Rom. 3:23) and that the wages of that sin is death (Rom. 6:23). The good news (gospel) is that God has provided for sinners by his own grace and righteousness (Rom. 5:8–9). The church seems at times to have forgotten the message of justification and has set out to conform the world to standards they neither understand nor appreciate. It is typical of many Christians to stand back and condemn the lifestyles of the unregenerate and the social evils in the world without understanding that that is all non-Christians know. In this open depravity, the wickedness of humankind has highlighted the helpless condition of fallen humans. This provides a powerful environment for those who have experienced the grace of God to declare the love and provision of God. The Word of God offers a solution to the helplessness of humankind. The mission of the church is to proclaim this opportunity to be set right with God (justification).

Kagawa, Toyohiko (1888–1960). Japanese evangelist and social activist. Born in Japan as the illegitimate son of a nobleman, Kagawa became a Christian through the friendship of two Presbyterian missionary families. As a seminary student in Kobe, he moved into the city’s Shinkawa slum district to live and work with its people. His novellistic account of this experience, Crossing the Death Line (1920), gained him fame.

After completing his B.D. at Princeton Theological Seminary, Kagawa returned to minister at a church in Kobe. He also encouraged the organization of labor unions to meet the needs of Japanese laborers and the formation of farmers’ and consumers’ cooperatives. After the great 1923 Tokyo earthquake, he and his family moved to Tokyo to continue his ministries from there. He carried out evangelistic campaigns, and in 1930 started the Kingdom of God Movement to reach groups that had hitherto been unevangelized.

As Japan entered into military conflict with China in 1931, Kagawa’s pacifism repeatedly got him into trouble with the government. Hostilities with America beginning in 1941 saddened him further. After Japan’s defeat, he declined a role in politics, and despite ill health, continued in his pastorate and kept writing books and articles on the relation of the Christian faith to many topics. Controversies arose over his wartime radio broadcasts and his disparaging comments about Japan’s outcaste community. He carried on with his pastoral and evangelistic work until his death. Often better known abroad than in Japan, his legacy combines ministry, evangelism, and social action, and continues to challenge Christians in many countries.

Kalley, Robert Reid (1809–88). Scottish pioneer missionary in Madeira and Brazil. Born to a wealthy family in Glasgow, Kalley’s agnosticism gave way to conversion in 1834. Initially he was accepted to work with the LMS in China; however, his marriage to Margaret Crawford violated mission policy and he resigned from the society before setting sail. In 1838, he and his wife went instead to Madeira, a Portuguese island in the Atlantic Ocean. His evangelistic strategy there included medical work, school development, and preaching. Many came to Christ, but the island’s Catholic officials, threatened by Kalley’s success, expelled him in 1846.

Some two thousand of those who had come to Christ migrated from Madeira, and over the next several years Kalley visited among them in the Caribbean, the United States, Europe, and the Middle East. He also worked in southern Ireland, Malta, and Lebanon. After the death of his first wife, he remarried (Sarah Wilson) in 1852. The couple later settled in Brazil (1855), where he developed a COLPORTAGE work, compiled a hymnal, planted churches, and worked to establish freedom of religion in the Brazilian Constitution. In 1858, he established Igreja Evangelica Fluminense, considered the oldest Protestant church in Brazil. In 1876 they retired to Edinburgh, where he continued to serve evangelical causes until his death in 1888.

Kane, J. Herbert (1910–92). American missiologist and missionary to China. Born in Canada and later naturalized as an American citizen, Herbert Kane graduated from Moody Bible Institute in 1935. He and his wife Winifred went to China in 1935 with the CHINA INLAND MISSION (CIM). After language study, the Kanes were assigned to Fouyang in Anhui province where they spent most of their missionary career: Under Kane and his missionary and Chinese colleagues Fouyang became one of the most spiritually productive areas of the CIM work. The Kanes remained in China during much of the Japanese occupation, but were finally evacuated in 1945. They returned to China in 1946, but again needed to evacuate in 1950 after nineteen months under communist domination.

After his return from China, Kane received further education (B.A. Barrington College; M.A. Brown University) and then began a career teaching missiology at Barrington College (1951–63), Lancaster Bible College (1963–67), and Trinity Evangelical Divinity School (1967–80). Barrington College conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Humane Letters on him in 1971.

Kane served as president of the AMERICAN SOCIETY OF MISSIOLOGY (1976) and authored over ten books on missions, the most noted being Understanding Christian Missions. These activities and his teaching expertise led his colleagues to describe him as having “an encyclopedic knowledge of missions.”

Kardecism. Kardecism is one of the most important popular religions in Brazil with an estimated 20 million followers, including 7 million regularly involved in spiritistic activities in the nearly three thousand spirit centers all over the nation. The founder of Kardecism was Hippolyte Leon Denizard Rivail. Rivail was born in France on October 3, 1804. After studying in Switzerland under the auspices of Pestalozzi, he returned to Paris and started a primary school, applying Pestalozzi’s pedagogy. After an initial period of investigating the so-called rotating tables phenomenon, which had caused much controversy in the nineteenth century in the United States, he came to have his first spiritistic experiences in his own home. With the participation of his two daughters as mediums he commenced his contacts with the spirit world. The spirit he contacted told Rivail that at his incarnation, he was a druid called Allan Kardec, from which name the term “Kardecism” is derived.

Despite being baptized in the Catholic faith and having been in contact with liberal Protestantism, Kardec was unprepared to deal with and discern the spirits that from then on would be delivering their deceiving messages. On March 25, 1856, while in a trance, he started receiving revelations from a spirit called “The Spirit of Truth,” which claimed to be the fulfillment of John 16:12–13. Kardec was informed that his mission was to be the codifier of the final revelation given by God to humankind. After Moses and Jesus, God has finally sent his Spirit. With the assistance of ten mediums he could receive the messages that came to be part of the Kardecist corpus, including the book of Spirits, the book of the Mediums, and, the most widely known among them, the Gospel according to Allan Kardec.

The main beliefs of Kardecism are the possibility and importance of communicating with the spirits of the dead (necromancy); the belief that by the process of reincarnation each person progresses in the spiritual realm; and the belief that once someone has achieved a higher stage of spiritual development, he or she passes into another spiritual sphere in another world. By practicing charity and accepting suffering as a purging element necessary for spiritual growth, each human being should reach progressively higher stages of maturity—hence the heavy emphasis on good works for the salvation of the soul in Kardecist spiritism. This emphasis is reflected in the numerous orphanages and philanthropic centers all over Brazil. God is seen as a distant being accessible only through his agents, the spirit guides. The Bible has to be correctly interpreted. Jesus is seen as a spirit who has reached the highest position in the development scale. The revelation brought to Kardec by the self-entitled spirit of truth is claimed to be the fulfillment of Jesus’ promises in the Gospel of John. The devil and his demons do not exist. The universe is inhabited by millions of spirits in different stages of spiritual development. By contact between the living and the dead and the process of reincarnation, human beings will finally achieve their salvation. The long journey of spiritual transformation obviously presupposes the existence of good and bad spirits, but this fact is to be understood as a normal situation that reflects the constant evolutive state of this planet and its inhabitants.

Kardecism has a tremendous appeal to the Brazilian people. The daily socioeconomic struggles and the tragedies of life are readily understood by them as an inevitable and necessary product of the karma process of soul development. Also, the overlapping of two worlds, the visible and invisible, implies the presence and interference of good and bad spirits in human life. Through a message that demands a lifestyle of charity combined with interacting with the good spirits of the dead, Kardecists hope to achieve salvation in the sense of spiritual development. Kardecism is an important and growing religious force in Brazilian society, having nominal Catholics as the main source of new followers. The evangelical church in Brazil has so far been the only force to successfully oppose Kardecism’s growing influence.

The church in Brazil as well as missions who serve there face a great challenge in reaching the millions involved in this spiritistic practice. Those seeking to reach Kardecists for Christ should be aware of the distortions in Kardec’s teaching about reincarnation taken from the books of Isaiah, Malachi, and John. More important, however, the church must recognize Kardecists as people who are sincere seekers of truth. Thus, Christians should pay special attention to engaging in pragmatic expressions of love, all of which are to be done in the power of the Holy Spirit girded with a deep prayer commitment for those they are seeking to reach.

Kasatkin, Nicholas (1836–1912). Russian Orthodox missionary to Japan. Kasatkin was born in the Smolensk province of Russia. Graduating at the top of his class, he was urged by his superiors to pursue a life in academia. He chose instead to go as the first Russian Orthodox missionary to Japan, arriving there on June 2, 1861.

The first seven years of ministry proved frustrating as Nicholas struggled with the Japanese language and customs, the xenophobia and persecution of the government, and the failure to baptize even one convert. Things began to change, however, when he baptized three men, including a Shinto priest, in 1868. With these three men as a foundation, the church began to grow. By 1880, the Russian Church elevated Nicholas as bishop of Japan for the almost 5,000 believers he had baptized. Although no other Russian missionaries had come to help, by 1896 the Orthodox Church had grown to over 23,000. By the fiftieth anniversary of his arrival in Japan, the church consisted of 33,017 Christians in 266 communities, 43 clergy, 121 lay preachers, 200 teachers, a seminary with 94 students, and 2 girls’ schools with 80 students.

Together with his astounding accomplishments as a missionary and bishop, his other main contribution was the translation of the entire New Testament and most of the Old Testament, as well as many liturgical services into Japanese.

Kato, Byang Henry (1936–75). Nigerian evangelical church leader. Born in Kwoi, Nigeria, and raised in traditional religion, Kato became a Christian under the influence of a local African teacher. After theological training in Nigeria, he received a B.D. from the University of London in 1966, and was elected general secretary of his denomination, the Evangelical Churches of West Africa. In February 1973 Kato was chosen to head the Association of Evangelicals of Africa (AEA). Nearly three years of whirlwind activity followed, throughout Africa and internationally, including a Th.D. from Dallas Theological Seminary, a major address at the LAUSANNE CONGRESS ON WORLD EVANGELIZATION (1974), election as vice president of the WORLD EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP (WEF), and appointment as chairman of the WEF Theological Commission. All this was suddenly cut short by Kato’s accidental death in December 1975, at the age of thirty-nine.

While Kato spoke and wrote prodigiously, he remains best known for his monograph Theological Pitfalls in Africa, which called for a Christian identity that would be both truly African and truly biblical. Kato’s continental influence stemmed not least from his articulate affirmation of African identity, combined with his evident commitment to a centrist evangelical theology. As the first African to lead the alliance of evangelicals in Africa, Kato infused that community with a vitalizing sense of identity and direction, encouraged relevant theological engagement, and through his vision and wide personal contacts formatively impacted the following generation of African evangelical leadership.

Kazakhstan (Est. 2000 pop.: 17,694,000; 2,717,300 sq. km. [1,049,150 sq. mi.]). Containing massive oil and mineral reserves, Kazakhstan is, geographically, the largest of the Central Asian republics of the former Soviet Union. During Soviet times, Kazakhstan's population was almost evenly divided between Slavic and Turkic peoples, but since independence in 1991 many Slavs have left; ethnic Russians, however, still dominate the north. While most ethnic Kazaks profess nominal allegiance to Islam, the majority are more animistic than Muslim. Evangelical Christians make up less than one percent of the population, and nearly all are Slavic or German, although by the late 1990s there were at least 2,500 known Kazak believers and 16 predominantly Kazak congregations. There is a measure of religious liberty, and many churches have experienced significant growth.

Keller, Mirian Wittich (1889–1953). Canadian missionary to Africa. Born Marian Weller in Parry Sound, Ontario, she graduated from Normal Training School and later from Toronto Business College. After returning home, Keller attended Pentecostal meetings, where she was baptized in the Holy Spirit in 1909. Called to missions, she moved to the United States to attend the Rochester (N.Y.) Bible Training School. There she met Karl Wittich, a Baptist minister; following their marriage in 1913 they went to German East Africa (present-day Tanzania) as independent Pentecostal missionaries. Karl died within months of their arrival; Marian, nonetheless, persevered four more years before going back to Canada. Returning to British East Africa (present-day Kenya), she met and married Otto Keller, an American Pentecostal missionary, in 1918. Together they pioneered the Nyangori Mission Station at Kisumu. By 1923 when they affiliated with the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada (PAOC), they had established twenty-five district schools. When Otto died in 1942, three mission stations had been established with two hundred branch churches and over five hundred national ministers. The pioneering efforts of the Kellers and other PAOC missionaries laid the foundation for the Pentecostal movement in Kenya and in particular the now sizable Pentecostal Assemblies of God, Kenya, with its elementary and secondary school system and ministerial training schools.

Kentigern (c. 518–603). Celtic missionary in Scotland. The grandson of a pagan king, Kentigern was born at Culcross in Scotland and was educated at the monastery there. Around the year 550 he founded the diocese at Glasgow, where he served as bishop. Kentigern was driven from Scotland during the persecution after the fall of the Christian king Rhydderch. He went to Wales, where he founded a monastery at Llanelly and was instrumental in many conversions. When Rhydderch was restored to his throne in 570, Kentigern returned to Scotland, leaving the work in Wales to his assistant Asaph, who became the first bishop of the Welsh see.

During the remainder of his life, Kentigern is said to have established several churches in the kingdom of Strathclyde, founded a college of monks, and sent out numerous missionaries. Known widely in Scotland as Saint Mungo (Celtic for “my dear friend”), Kentigern is the patron saint of Glasgow, where he is reputed to be buried in the Cathedral of Saint Mungo. Although the details of his life were recorded much later in twelfth century hagiographies, it is clear that Kentigern was an energetic evangelist and church planter who did much to establish Celtic Christianity in southwest Scotland.

ALAN SEAMAN

Kenya (Est. 2000 pop.: 32,577,000; 580,367 sq. km. [224,080 sq. mi.]). Kenya’s Christian history began in 1498, when the Portuguese explorer Vasco da Gama landed in the East African coastal city of Mombasa. By the sixteenth century Augustinian friars had carved out a Christian community of nearly six hundred African converts in Mombasa and Malindi. This work was destroyed in 1631 by a resurgent Islam.

The modern history of Christianity in Kenya dates from 1844 with the coming of the CMS missionary J. LUDWIG KRAPF and slightly later J. Rebmann. Building on that foundation were the Methodists (1862), Church of Scotland Mission (1891), and African Inland Mission (1895). The Holy Ghost Fathers arrived in 1883.

The years of COLONIALISM (1896–1963) were a time of growth for the mission-related churches such as the Presbyterian Church of East Africa, the Anglican Church of the Province of Kenya, and the Africa Inland Church, but equally as significant was the emergence of African independent churches. A new emphasis on education of the local population led to the formation of Alliance High School (1962), which in turn led to a flood of similar institutions around the country. Within these schools a conflict arose between missionaries and Kikuyu Christians in 1929 over female circumcision. In the wake of this crisis a number of Kenya’s independent churches were born. By the late 1990s Kenya contained well over two hundred independent churches claiming 11 percent of the population. The African Independent Pentecostal Church and the African Orthodox Church, both centered among the Kikuyu of Central Kenya, constituted the largest of the indigenous churches (see also AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCH MOVEMENT).

In the 1950s yearnings for political independence expressed itself in the Mau Mau rebellion. The Revival Brethren opposed the Mau Mau and brought added vitality to the historic churches in a difficult time. The rebellion alerted both colonial powers and church leaders that the time for African leadership in church and state had arrived. A new emphasis on theological education was one response of the churches to this new political climate.

After independence from Britain in 1963, church growth escalated. The percentage of Christians in Kenya jumped from an estimated 50 percent of the population in the 1960s to approximately 80 percent in the early 1990s, though SYNCRETISM remains a concern. Organizations such as the Evangelical Fellowship of Kenya and the National Council of Churches of Kenya (NCCK) sought to unite churches for evangelism, social action, and political justice. In urban areas like Nairobi (2 million in 1995) new Christian movements of a strong charismatic nature arose in the 1990s to challenge both historic churches and African independent churches.

Keswick Convention. An annual gathering in England begun modestly in the 1870s by evangelicals concerned about their increasing polarization, even bitter controversies, at a time when liberalism and AGNOSTICISM were making serious inroads into their churches. More, they were encouraged by the unexpected national impact of the first (1874) Moody/Sankey revival meetings in London coupled with the public cry for more authenticity in evangelical Christian living. The decision was taken to convene a conference that would seek to “promote Scriptural holiness” under the banner “All One in Christ Jesus.” The underlying conviction of Keswick’s founders was that through the gospel Christ offered his people the possibility of living victoriously by his indwelling presence and power. In their eyes Scripture held out the prospect of Christians’ enjoying unbroken fellowship with God and victory over all known sin. Sin was always possible, but not necessary. The biblical themes that were felt to need wide promotion were personal surrender to Christ and buoyant faith in his Word.

The first gathering took place in 1875 at Keswick in England’s Lake District. From the outset the conventions attracted hundreds despite the sharp criticisms they provoked among some prominent evangelical theologians (“Keswick promotes sinless perfection!”). For twelve years Keswick excluded all reference to missions despite the growing evidence that when young Christians deliberately surrendered themselves to Christ, they increasingly sensed a drawing to missionary service in the world for which he died. Fortunately, when this was officially recognized, a portion of each convention, usually the morning of the closing day, was devoted to missionaries and overseas nationals speaking to “the claim of Christ to his people’s willing service in the cause of the evangelization of the world.” Over the years Keswick’s influence on missions has been enormous, particularly on the STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT and on the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE at Edinburgh (1910).

Through promotion by such prominent Christians as Bishop G. Handley Moule, J. Hudson Taylor, G. Campbell Morgan, Dwight L. Moody, Robert E. Speer, John R. Mott, Arthur T. Pierson, Donald Grey Barnhouse, Billy Graham, and many others, and through the proliferation of conventions throughout the world, Keswick has gained and retained high regard among evangelicals. It began the pattern of sending “missioners to missionaries” to bring them spiritual renewal while on the field; even today Keswick speakers continue to minister regularly in many parts of the world. Current activities include the publishing of annual reports, the radio broadcast of “Keswick Week,” a tape library service for national churches, and a hospitality fund to enable furloughed missionaries and overseas nationals to attend conventions in the United Kingdom. In 1892 Keswick sent out Amy Carmichael, its first missionary, and thereby inaugurated a pattern of supporting workers serving in a wide range of societies overseas. Indeed, for almost a century Keswick represented evangelical ecumenicity at its best, although at present it does not command its former dominant position. This is doubtless due to the emergence of more contemporary renewal movements and to the change in style among evangelicals through the dynamism and growth of the charismatic and “house church” movements, particularly in England.

Keysser, Christian

Keysser, Christian (1877–1961). German missionary to New Guinea. Born in Bavaria, Germany, Keysser attended high school in Nuremberg and the Missionary Institute in Neuendettelsau. In 1899 he sailed for New Guinea, where he was based primarily at the Lutheran mission station in Sattelberg. Keysser remained there for over twenty years as a church planter, linguist, and encourager of indigenous Christian music. At times he also served as a botanist, zoologist, ethnographer, geographer, and explorer. Difficulties with the government in New Guinea caused him to return to Germany in 1920. In his homeland he taught missions at Neuendettelsau, completed a dictionary of the Kate language (1925), earned a Ph.D. at the University of Erlangen (1929), and wrote voluminously on missionary principles and practices. He contributed significantly to the field of missionary anthropology by focusing on the tribal mind in New Guinea and advocating group conversion and discipleship. His ethnic unit approach emphasized that evangelization should bring minimal cultural disruption and should create genuine Christian communities with a burden for missions. Keysser’s missiological theories provoked a wide-ranging debate. On one side was Johannes Hoekendijk, who extensively criticized Keysser. On the other, Donald McGavran openly acknowledged Keysser’s importance for his own thinking about church growth.

Kil, Sun-Joo (1869–1935). Korean revivalist. Kil was born in South Pyung Yang province in North Korea and grew up during a very critical period of Korean history. After Japan defeated China in the Sino-Japanese War (1894–95) over the control of Korea, the Koreans knew that it was a matter of time before Japan would annex Korea. As a young man Kil was very interested in religion, and studied Confucianism and Buddhism extensively. In 1892 he entered the Anguk-Sa Buddhist monastery for three years for prayer and meditation but found no solution to his spiritual longing until he met a missionary named James Lee, who led him to Christ in 1895.

Kil made contributions to the church and the country largely in three areas. First, he was one of the seven graduates of the first graduating class of the Presbyterian Seminary in Pyung Yang. He became the first installed Korean pastor of a Korean church, the historic Chang Tae Hyun Presbyterian Church in Pyung Yang. He led many revival meetings in different parts of the country in spite of his poor eyesight and persecution. He preached over 13,600 times during this thirty-five-year ministry and became one of the key spiritual leaders for the first Great Revival of 1907.

Second, in 1907 he started the early dawn prayer meeting every day for the troubled country and the church. This early dawn prayer meeting in every Korean church has continued until today and has been instrumental in the rapid growth of the Korean church over the years.

Third, he was one of thirty-three Korean patriots who signed the Declaration of Independence on March 1, 1919, in Seoul against the Japanese annexation of Korea and was imprisoned for three years. He died in the pulpit while he was preaching.

Kim, Helen (1899–1968). Korean evangelist and missions advocate. Kim, former president of Ewha University (1939–61), was the best recognized Christian woman educator in Korea in the past generation. After graduating from Ewha University in 1918, she began to teach there and served for the university for fifty years, training thousands of young women with Christian principles. She was the first Korean woman to receive a Ph.D. degree, awarded by Columbia University in New York in 1931. She also served the country as a diplomat for Korea at the United Nations and a roving ambassador for many years. During the Korean War years, President Syngman Rhee asked her to be in charge of administration for the Red Cross and later of the Office of Public Information. She received many honorary awards, including the Ramon Magsayay Award for Public Service (the Philippines), the Certificate of Order of Cultural Merit of the Republic of Korea, the Upper Room Citation for Leadership in World Christian Fellowship, the Order of Diplomatic Merit, First Class for her contribution to educate “more women better.”

Kim was a dynamic spiritual leader with a tremendous emphasis on evangelism, social concern, and missions. After attending the World Student Christian Federation Conference in Peking in 1922, she was used as an instrument to start the KoreanYWCA. In 1961 Ewha University sent three graduates as the first women missionaries to Pakistan. After her retirement, she spent her energy for the evangelization of Korea.

Kim, Joon-Gon (1925– ). Korean evangelist and missions advocate. His Christian testimony during the Korean War has touched many lives around the globe. When he was the chaplain and principal of Soongsil High School (1951–56) in Kwangju City, North Korean communist soldiers captured the city in the summer of 1950 and killed his wife and father in front of his eyes and severely beat him. Later, he led the murderer to Christ.

He has been recognized by the Korean church for organizing a number of mass Christian gatherings in Korea. In 1974 he organized Explo 74 at Youido Plaza in Seoul, August 13–17, when 700,000 people gathered at the opening night to hear Bill Bright. He was also the chairman for the 1980 World Evangelization Crusade August 11–15 with 2.7 million people on August 14. Under his leadership 3,000 Koreans traveled on a short-term mission project in Manila in 1990. When the Global Consultation of World Evangelization ’95 (GCOWE) was held at the Torch Center in Seoul, May 17–26, with 4,000 participants from 185 countries, he served as the chairman of the Korean Preparation Committee.

Under Kim, Campus Crusade has conducted the annual “Jesus Jamboree” for university students during the summer at which over 10,000 young people camp out for spiritual training at the Taechon beach. His Korean staff of over 350 works on different university campuses, and he is known as “the father of Korean Christian student movement.”

He is a man of vision for evangelism, church growth, missions, and social concern. His contribution to the Christian student movement in Korea has inspired many other countries. He received his education from Chosun University, Fuller Theological Seminary, and Chun Buk University.

Kimbangu, Simon, (1889–1951). Zairian Independent church founder. The Church of Jesus Christ on Earth though the Prophet Simon Kimbangu (EJCSK), largest of the several thousand African Initiated Churches, is the result of only three months of public ministry by Simon Kimbangu. A Baptist catechist and evangelist when God called him to a healing ministry, Kimbangu initially resisted and fled from his home to Kinshasa. Through circumstances God drew Kimbangu back to his home area, and in 1921 again called him to heal. This time Kimbangu responded, and was promptly accused of being a sorcerer by a woman he had healed. Changing her mind after hearing his explanation of what had happened, she helped spread the news of what God had done. Within two months people were coming by the thousands, leaving jobs, emptying hospitals, and even bringing bodies of the dead to be raised.

While missionaries on the scene reported few genuine healings, within three months of the initial healing the Belgian authorities were so worried about the crowds that they issued a warrant for Kimbangu’s arrest. Kimbangu eluded them for three months before giving himself up. His initial death sentence was commuted to life imprisonment in part at the urging of missionaries. Kimbangu spent the rest of his life as a model prisoner, dying in 1951. The EJCSK, not officially recognized until 1959, is estimated to be over 5 million strong. It is led by Kimbangu’s youngest son, and is an example of a contextualized denominational framework that missionaries would do well to study.

Kingdom of God

Terminology. No explicit use of the precise phrase “kingdom of God” occurs in the Old Testament, but if one looks at the Old Testament prophets through the teaching of Jesus and the totality of New Testament faith, one finds it is predicted as a future reality (the messianic age) in the ongoing redemptive purpose of God. In contrast, the New Testament uses this term or its equivalent (kingdom of heaven) more than a hundred times. This was the dominant theme in the ministry of Jesus and his use of the term seems to have oscillated between the primary concept of the rule or reign of God and the secondary sense of the realm over which he will exercise this rule (Luke 17:21 and Mark 14:25). Jesus on no occasion intimated that the kingdom actually existed prior to the beginning of his ministry (Luke 16:16). God’s kingship is not unlike his providential care of his total creation: “Dominion belongs to the Lord and he rules over the nations” (Ps. 22:28). But his kingship is also eschatological: “In the time of those kings” (i.e., at a certain juncture in history) “the God of heaven will set up a kingdom that will never be destroyed . . . it will itself endure forever” (Dan. 2:44).

Old Testament History and Eschatology. God’s kingship is identified with Israel, a people with whom he established a covenantal relationship that also involved a redemptive purpose: “All peoples on earth will be blessed through you [Jacob] and your offspring” (Gen. 28:14). Israel is to be “a light to the nations” within the sequence of history, extending the knowledge of God’s salvation “to the ends of the earth” (Isa. 42:6; 49:6). In order that God might accomplish this he promised a New Covenant that guaranteed Israel an imperishable communal existence (Jer. 31:31–37) and a messianic hope that would make possible the realization of her redemptive mission (33:14–22; Isa. 42:1–9). Israel’s obedience in history will be related to the establishment of an eschatological order beyond history—“the age to Israel’s obedience in history will be related to the establishment of an eschatological order beyond history—“the age to immediately thereafter began to call people to submit themselves to his rule. And since Jesus God was now accessible to all those who would taste of the liberating kingdom. This included the forgiveness of sin, peace and acceptance with God, vital linkage with the Holy Spirit, valid insight into the Word of God, and joyous anticipation of “the powers of the coming age” (1 Cor. 2:12–15; Rom. 5:1, 2; 8:1–5, 35–39; Heb. 6:4, 5).

Even so, it is significant that Jesus never defined explicitly the term “kingdom of God.” When he spoke of the kingdom as having “drawn near,” he was affirming that it was an earthly rule order will bring perfection to all creation.

Messianic Hope. This involves three separate and specific strands of prophetic expectation, and all three are related to God’s redemptive purpose for the nations. First, a distinctly earthly kingdom shall arise within history through a “Messiah”—a physical descendant of David who will bring renewal to Israel and to all the world (Isa. 9:6, 7; 11:1–12:7). Second, this kingdom will also come as an abrupt intrusion into history, not unlike an apocalyptic visitation accompanied with cosmic upheaval. The key personage is likewise a “Messiah” and is described as “one like a Son of Man” possessing “authority, glory, and sovereign power.” His kingdom “will never be destroyed.” He will be worshiped by “all peoples, nations, and men of every language,” and will bestow on “the saints of the Most High” this “everlasting kingdom” to be theirs “forever and ever” (Dan. 7:13, 14, 18, 22). The third strand focuses on a Servant of the Lord, neither openly messianic nor evidently supernatural, but one who is an innocent, willing person who vicariously suffers without protest and dies in order to make his people righteous. The Old Testament does not conflate these strands of prophetic revelation, hence an aura of incompleteness characterizes the Old Testament and inevitably arouses anticipation of more to follow (Luke 2:25, 38). But it must never be forgotten that in essence God will visit his people, and his kingdom will not be the result of historical forces, such as human achievement.

New Testament: The Gospels. The ministry of Jesus in the New Testament began in the context of John the Baptist’s renewal movement in Israel. Expectations were aroused by his announcement of the coming of the kingdom and of One who would baptize “with the Holy Spirit and with fire” (Matt. 3:1–12). Then Jesus came forward and publicly identified with Israel through submitting to John’s baptism. During this act of obedience he was both approved by his Father and anointed for ministry by the Holy Spirit (Mark 1:9–11). Almost immediately thereafter the Holy Spirit “sent him out into the desert” to confront and demonstrate his superiority over the devil (1:12, 13). In the months that followed his ministry was virtually identical with that of John; both spoke of the coming kingdom. The Baptist’s imprisonment brought this renewal ministry to an abrupt end. From that time on Jesus went to Galilee and preached: “The time has come. The kingdom of God is near: Repent and believe the good news” (Mark 1:14). By this he was announcing the glorious fact that the kingdom of God was now accessible to all those who would submit themselves to his rule. And since Jesus immediately thereafter began to call people to discipleship and his service (“I will make you fishers of men”), it follows that involvement in the kingdom of God (living under his rule) includes public proclamation and evangelism (Mark 1:16–20). When Jesus returned to Galilee “news about him spread throughout the whole countryside” (Luke 4:14). His earlier renewal ministry in Judea had opened synagogues to him. “Everyone praised him” (v. 15). But when he began to identify himself with the Servant role prophesied by Isaiah and intimated that the gospel of the kingdom was also for non-Israelites, he encountered violent opposition (vv. 16–30). From this time on, whereas the “common people heard him gladly,” the religious leaders became increasingly hostile, a hostility that culminated in his being turned over to the Romans for crucifixion.

The good news of the kingdom that Jesus preached and expounded is admittedly complex, since it represented movement toward the fulfillment of the Old Testament redemptive purpose in “the present age” as well as a radical reinterpretation of that hope with reference to “the age to come.” In the present age, despite their rebellion against God, sinful human beings through repentance to God and surrender to Jesus’ rule, can experience the new birth and enjoy a foretaste of the liberating kingdom. This included the forgiveness of sin, peace and acceptance with God, vital linkage with the Holy Spirit, valid insight into the Word of God, and joyous anticipation of “the powers of the coming age” (1 Cor. 2:12–15; Rom. 5:1, 2; 8:1–5, 35–39; Heb. 6:4, 5).

This note of spiritual conflict must not be regarded lightly. Satan is determined to thwart the progress of the kingdom. Jesus calmly asserts, however, that divine authority and rule have been given him by the Father (Luke 10:32; Matt. 11:27; 28:18). Furthermore, he will exercise this rule until Satan, sin, and death are brought to a complete end (Mark 9:1; 13:26; 14:62 with Luke 11:20–22).

The mystery of Jesus’ person and the spiritual nature of his kingdom were so new and revolutionary that he could only disclose these realities gradually. To most Jews the kingdom of God would come as a stone that would shatter all godless nations (Dan. 2:44). But Jesus did not preach judgment and separation; these were eschatological realities. He came as a sower scattering the “good news of the kingdom” and looking for receptive people. He spoke in parables. These tantalized his hearers and compelled them to come to a full stop, then reflect and ask questions. The more his disciples began to discern who he was, the more they began to understand his teaching. Conversely, the more people resisted him, the more his teaching reduced itself in their minds to “hard sayings” devoid of significance (John 6:60). All they heard were stories, riddles, and paradoxes (Mark 4:11, 12).

The parables speak of the nature, growth, and value of the kingdom, largely under the theme of mission. There are the “growth” parables in which the parable of the sower is so central that Jesus pointed out that failure to understand this parable would render a person unable to understand any parable (Mark 4:13). Then follows a parable of the growth process in the hearts of those who respond to the message of the kingdom (4:26–30). This process eludes understanding and external control. When spiritual maturity begins to manifest itself the parable of the wheat and the weeds brings to the fore a “second sowing” (Matt. 13:36–43) so important that the Lord himself is the only “Sower.” This follows because “the field is the world” and the distribution of his servants in it is a responsibility he grants to no other. This implies a deliberate surrender of oneself to him, a willingness to be sent into the locale and ministry that he has appointed.

The kingdom is like a buried treasure and its acquisition merits any cost or sacrifice (Matt. 13:44–46). Its form is hidden, representing the hiddenness of God, working in the hearts of his people scattered throughout the world. Although insignificant in its beginnings (a mustard seed or bit of leaven), on the day of history’s consummation it will be like a great tree or a bowl of dough—infinitesimal in its beginnings (a mustard seed or bit of leaven), on the day of history’s consummation it will be like a great tree or a bowl of dough (Mark 4:40). It was his death that made the coming apocalyptic kingdom dependent upon what would take place in history. “God did not abandon history; the eschatological kingdom invaded history in Jesus’ life-death-resurrection and continues to work in history through the people of the kingdom” (Matt. 24:14; Mark 13:10; Ladd).

Acts. The resurrection of Jesus gave to his disciples—the believing remnant in Israel—a new sense of their oneness as they received further instruction in the kingdom and awaited its coming (Acts 1:3, 6). Peter’s Pentecost sermon reinterpreted the Old Testament hope by speaking of Jesus’ exaltation, confirming him as “Lord and Messiah” (2:30–36). In the Book of Acts the “signs” of the kingdom are everywhere present: Jesus by his Spirit is in the midst of his people, the gospel is proclaimed, signs and wonders accompany the witness, evil spirits are exorcised, conversions are frequent, and much suffering is experienced as a result of efforts to do God’s will in a world that rebels against him (Matt. 5:10).

Pauline Epistles. Paul builds on Peter’s reinterpretation of Jesus’ messianic reign and describes it as a present relationship (Col. 1:13) and a spiritual experience (Rom. 14:17), as well as an eschatological inheritance (1 Cor. 6:9–11; Eph. 5:5). Jesus “must reign until he has put all his enemies under his feet” and destroy death, “the last enemy” (1 Cor. 15:25, 26). The end will only come “when he hands over the kingdom to God the Father after he has destroyed all dominion, authority and power” (v. 24). His ultimate goal is that “God may be all in all” (v. 28).
Kingdom of God

Revelation. The final revelation of God concerning his kingdom is of its eschatological consummation with the devil finally consigned to the lake of fire (Rev. 20:10). Just prior to this we find reference to the second coming of Christ with its rapid sequence of his total triumph over all his foes, his binding of Satan, the resurrection of his saints, his millennial reign, and the final consummation of human history (19:11–20:15). Rather than detail the elements of this controversial section, the Spirit presses on to the portrayal of God’s ultimate goal: the age to come with its new heaven and new earth, and his redeemed people from all the families, tribes, languages, and peoples at long last seeing his face (21:1–4; 22:1–5).

Kinship. Kinship relations have long been a major part of anthropological study. For kinship (interpersonal) relations and social (intergroup) relations combine with the economic, political, and religious aspects of culture to structure human behavior. The relative importance people from different cultures (kinship, peasant, industrial, and postindustrial) place on these relations will vary widely and impact their behavior.

Despite this diversity, all human relationships can be understood within a framework of identity, status, and role. Identity is specified by the use of a kinship term to designate particular individuals—the term serves as their identity. Status relates to the cultural expectations associated with particular identities—how people expect those so identified to behave. Role is the actual behavior of people with a particular identity; this behavior reflects the basic nature of the relationship. Thus kinship terms define cultural sets of rights and duties that are acted out in real life through specific behavior patterns.

By fitting into relationships with people on the basis of cultural expectations, missionaries serving in a particular society may be able to remove much of the mystery associated with their presence. By adapting to local cultural expectations, outsiders can learn much about appropriate behavior and use that knowledge to build relationships that may serve as a launching pad for communicating the gospel. In kinship societies, with their focus on close egalitarian relationships, outsiders must build intragenerational relationships with members of the society and use that bonding to communicate. In peasant societies relationships are more hierarchical and intergenerational, often resembling a family structure. In industrial societies, which focus on individuals, communication often springs from the interaction between individuals—friends, business associates, people with common interests. Postindustrial societies, with an emphasis on team building, demand complementary skills; each person contributes to the whole, which may be a neighborhood, club, association, or group bound by occupation.

Similarly, an appreciation for the nature of groups within a society can be utilized in presenting the gospel and assisting church growth within a cultural context. Each group has its own criteria for membership. These are often based on kinship (nuclear family, extended family, clan), territory (neighborhood, city, state), economic position (caste, occupation), or language (dialect, tribe). As with kinship relations, each group has an identity (terminologically defined), a status (set of expected behavior patterns), and roles (the actual patterns of the group’s behavior). A group’s understanding of themselves and others—how far the boundaries extend before others are recognized as being outside the group—can be of great assistance to missionaries attempting to discover how many translations of Scripture should be made within a particular region or which groups will interact with a newly founded church.

To build an effective missiological strategy, it is important to determine whether a given society places greater value on individual or group identity. One should also analyze whether the society is tightly or loosely structured. Societies fall into four general categories: (1) authoritarian—individual-oriented and tightly structured; (2) individualist—individual-oriented and loosely structured; (3) hierarchist—group-oriented and tightly structured; and (4) collectivist—group-oriented and loosely structured. Determining the nature of a particular society is vital for sound development and implementation of an evangelistic strategy. Should the approach focus on individuals or whole groups (see Individualism and Collectivism)? And if groups, which ones would make the most appropriate targets, and why? Should Christianity be presented as a means for people to relate more effectively with other groups or as a means of building interpersonal relationships?

An understanding of relationships will also give insight into the nature of leadership patterns within a society. What determines who is to be a leader—a general election, appointment (and by whom?), or a birthright? How is leadership expressed? What are the responsibilities of leaders within the group and beyond? How do leaders actually perform their duties? The framework of identity, status, and role is once again helpful for understanding rights and duties as people exercise leadership. Is leadership the prerogative of an individual, such as a judge, or is it delegated to a group, such as the panchayat.
under an Indian banyan tree or a palaver in Africa? Understanding the leadership patterns within a society is crucial as a church selects a pastor or gives responsibilities to a group of elders. What gives them the right to serve, and what are the implications of following cultural patterns in contrast to ignoring them?

Throughout Scripture there are many patterns of kinship and social interaction as well as expressions of leadership. Therefore we should not argue that there is a biblical pattern since there are many. Rather, Scripture can be brought to bear (both positively and negatively) on the status and roles of individuals and groups within each cultural context. Clearly research in the area of kinship and social structure is important for the introduction of the gospel and its ongoing impact as the church develops and grows.

R. DANIEL SHAW

Kinsolving, Lucien Lee (1862–1929). American missionary to Brazil. Born in Middleburg, Virginia, Kinsolving attended the Episcopal High School of Virginia where his gift for speaking was developed. Upon graduation he accepted appointment to a church school in a wild portion of Kentucky, birthing his vision for mission. After two years at the University of Virginia, he transferred to the Virginia Theological Seminary where he was ordained a deacon in 1889. The seminary sent him during the summers to lead Episcopal churches in Upper Virginia where his earnest preaching crowded the churches with eager congregations.

Stirred by the seminary’s deep interest in Brazil, Kinsolving was ordained and sent through the American Church Missionary Society to Brazil in 1889. Within six months he was conducting services in Portuguese. After his marriage to Alice Brown in 1891, he became rector of the Church of our Savior in Rio Grande do Sul. Eloquent and far-sighted, Kinsolving was a respected leader among the Brazilians. Under his leadership, the Episcopal church became a self-supporting congregation led by an indigenous clergy. Elected to the bishopric by the independent Egreja Episcopal Brasileria, Kinsolving was consecrated in the U.S. and took charge of the Brazil mission in 1899.

Kinsolving was prevented from returning to Brazil after suffering a stroke. He died in 1929 at the age of sixty-six.

Kiribati (Est. 2000 pop.: 87,000; 726 sq. km. [280 sq. mi.]). Located in Oceania, and formerly the Gilbert Islands, Kiribati gained independence from Britain in 1979. The first Protestant missionary, Hiram Bingham of the ABCFM, began work in Abaiaang in 1856. As of 1993, the population was over 97 percent Christian, including 51.5 percent Catholic, 44 percent Protestant, and 2.1 percent marginal Christian groups. It is estimated that evangelicals comprise just over 6 percent. Protestant churches present include Kiribati Protestant (Congregational) Church, Church of God (Cleveland), Seventh-Day Adventist, and Assemblies of God.

Kivebulaya, Apolo (1864–1933). Ugandan pioneer missionary. Apolo Kivebulaya is revered in the Church of Uganda (Anglican) as an example par excellence of the African evangelists who ministered during the colonial period. He was from a rural Baganda family in northwestern Uganda. Kivebulaya spent his younger years in various kinds of military service under the British administration, including pacification efforts into the Toro Kingdom, where afterward he took up residence.

Kivebulaya took the name Apolo when he was baptized by an Anglican missionary in 1895 in Kampala. He resided in Toro and ministered there as a church teacher which included literacy as well as instruction in the catechism. The town of Mboga became his evangelistic headquarters. From there he made excursions across the border into the former Belgian Congo. While continuing this mission he also ministered to the small congregation at Mbogo. His second missionary venture was from 1897 to 1899 to the pygmy people who live in the Ituri forest.

Apolo’s sincere commitment to evangelism is one reason why he never married. Having been ordained a deacon in 1900 and priest in 1903, Apolo Kivebulaya was further honored in 1922 by being appointed to office of canon. In this way the Anglican Church recognized his long and faithful ministry, which was an example for all national evangelists, especially those who extend the gospel beyond the areas of their own ethnic origins.

DEAN S. GILLILAND

Kivengere, Festo

Born in southwestern Uganda, Kivengere came to Christ in January 1935 through the influence of CMS missionaries. He was educated at Mukono Teachers’ College (1936–39), London University Institute of Education (1957–59), and Pittsburgh Theological Seminary (1964–67). After his training at Mukono, he taught and led local evangelistic teams on weekends and through these efforts emerged as a powerful preacher.

In 1945 he responded to a call and went to Tanzania as a tent-maker for thirteen years. In 1962, he started a free-lance evangelistic ministry and traveled widely around the world. In 1971, with Michael Cassidy, he formed Africa Evangelistic Enterprise.

Kivengere was ordained in the Church of Uganda in 1966 and consecrated bishop on May 5, 1972. He was courageous and direct with both church and state issues. He opposed the growing state oppression of the church, his courage being seen in his stance against Ugandan Presidents Amin and Obote for their atrocities. He was the recipient of several of international awards including The International Peace Prize (1977) and The Cross of St. Augustine (Anglican).

Kivengere’s writings include: When God Moves (1973); The Spirit Is Moving (1976); I Love Idi Amin (1977); Revolutionary Love (1983); and Hope for Uganda and the World (1980). He died of leukemia on May 18, 1988, and was given a state funeral in Uganda.

Ko Tha Byu was the first convert to Christianity among the Karen people of Burma (now Myanmar). Born in a village near Bassein in southern Burma, he led a violent life as a young man and, by his own admission, had committed about thirty murders prior to his conversion. Under the influence of ADONIRAM JUDSON, he was dramatically converted and his life transformed.

From 1828 to 1831 Ko Tha Byu accompanied George Boardman, an American Baptist missionary, in his ministry among the Karen people in the villages around Tavoy, in southern Burma. He was baptized by Boardman during this time. Boardman died in 1831, but not before seeing the beginnings of a mass movement among the Karens toward Christianity. Ko Tha Byu continued evangelistic ministry among the Karen villages until his death. He proved to be a highly effective evangelist, carrying the Christian faith into the areas around Rangoon and Bassein. The Karens were largely ANIMISTS (although they did believe in the Creator God and had a story about a fall through which they became alienated from God) and were despised by the Buddhist majority. In some ways they were uniquely prepared for the gospel, and under the ministry of Ko Tha Byu and others hundreds soon came to Christ. By 1856 over 11,000 church members were reported. Ko Tha Byu is revered today as a fiery evangelist and pivotal leader in the mass movement among the Karens to Christianity. A special day in the Karen church calendar honors his memory.

Korea, North (The Democratic People’s Republic of Korea) (Est. 2000 pop.: 25,979,000; 120,538 sq. km. [46,540 sq. mi.]). Korea was partitioned into two sections at the Yalta Conference in 1945. North Korea was to be controlled by the Russians and South Korea by the United States until the time a joint election was held which would unite the divided country. To date, however, this joint election has not taken place. In the meantime North Korea established the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea (DPRK) under communism, while South Korea established the Republic of Korea (ROK). Kim Il-Sung ruled 23 million people in North Korea from its inception until his death on July 8, 1994. He was succeeded by his son, Kim Jung-Il.

The earliest mission efforts in Korea are reported to have been by Koreans who, after visiting China and being exposed to Catholic influences, returned with the gospel to their homes. The first missionary priest to enter Korea was James Choo, a Chinese worker who arrived in 1794. Catholic mission work suffered persecution and martyrdom until the signing of the Korean Treaty with the United States in 1882. Protestant mission work did not begin until 1884 with the arrival of Horace N. Allen. At the time of the communist takeover, however, the church in Korea was the second largest in Asia, eclipsed only by the church in the Philippines, with two-thirds of the total Christian population residing in the north. Prior to 1945, among the Protestant churches, the Presbyterians had the strongest presence, followed by the Methodists, Salvation Army, and Seventh-Day Adventists.

After being established in power, the government in North Korea adopted a policy of gradual extermination of all religions. Although religious freedom was guaranteed in the Constitution, government persecution against the Christian church was so severe that all public churches were closed until 1988, when permission was given to build Bong Soo Church, the first Protestant church to be built in Pyongyang since the inception of North Korea. In 1992 another Protestant church, Ban Sock Church, was erected in memory of Mrs. Kang Ban-Sock’s mother, at the location which she used as the site of a daily dawn prayer meeting. The government also allowed the Roman Catholics to build Chang Choong Catholic Cathedral in Pyongyang. Kang Yang-Sup, Chairman of the North Korean Christian Federation, stated in early 1997 that there were about 520 house churches with 12,000 Protestant Christians and one Roman Catholic cathedral with 800 members in North Korea, though many question the reliability of these statistics.

Though politically divided, North and South Korea are still deeply emotionally and religiously tied. For example, the North Korean Church Reconstruction Department of the Korean Christian Council in South Korea launched a nationwide prayer movement to reconstruct over 2,000 disbanded churches in North Korea by encouraging each local church in South Korea to adopt a disbanded church in the north. Through this adoption the South Korean Christians pray for the restoration of the adopted church in the north and designate portions of their offerings for the reconstruction of that disbanded church until the hoped for reunification between north and south can take place.

Korea, South (Est. 2000 pop.: 47,149,000; 99,263 sq. km. [38,325 sq. mi.]). Since 1970, South Korea has been known as a “nation of economic miracles in Asia” or “a nation of church growth explosion in modern times” and has drawn the attention of many nations of the world. In fact, many church leaders in South Korea believe that the Koreans are a “chosen people” (1 Peter 1:9) for God’s redemptive purpose today.

A tragic partition of Korea at the 38th parallel was drawn by the super powers at the Yalta Conference in 1945. South Korea established the Republic of Korea (ROK) on August 15, 1948 with Dr. Syngman Rhee as the first president. The Korean War, which started on June 25, 1950, when North Korean soldiers invaded South Korea, lasted for over three years and resulted in half a million deaths and millions of casualties. As a result of the war, South Korea became “a beggar nation” of the world. Since the Korean Armistice Agreement was signed to end the war on July 27, 1953, Pammunjon has become the focal point of dialogue between North and South Korea.

After the fall of Syngman Rhee’s government precipitated by the student demonstrations throughout South Korea on April 19, 1960, the country was ruled by three military generals: Park Chung-Hee (1962–79), Chun Doo-Hwan (1980–87), and Ro Tai-Woo (1988–93). The civilian government of President Kim Young-Sam (1993–98) replaced the military regime in 1993.

The rapid economic development in South Korea began at the end of the Vietnam War. The per capita GNP grew explosively over that time, from $105 in 1965 to $10,076 in 1995. This economic growth and resulting prosperity has brought enormous changes in the lifestyle of the people. Sexual revolution, divorce, drugs, and crime are more rampant than before, especially among the younger generation.

The rapid church growth in Korea has been so well known throughout the Christian world that the Korean church has become a model for church growth in other countries. The first American Protestant missionaries came to Korea in 1884; there were approximately 12 million Protestant Christians and 38,000 churches in South Korea in 1997. In Seoul alone there were 6,800 churches in 1995, and 23 out of 50 mega-churches in the world are found in South Korea. In the mid-1970s six new churches were planted in Korea daily. During the Billy Graham Crusade in Seoul in May 1973, more than 1.1 million Christians met together at one time at the Yoido Plaza in Seoul. A still larger crowd of Christians met again for the World Evangelization Crusade in August 1980 in Yoido Plaza.

Many church leaders around the world have asked why the Korean church has grown so much and so rapidly. There are both historical and spiritual factors for the rapid growth of the church. Historically, Korea, which had been colonized by the Japanese Empire for 36 years (1910–45), wished to get her political independence from Japan. The Koreans welcomed the Western powers into Korea to drive out Japanese imperialism. Therefore, the Korean gentry readily accepted Western influences and the Christian message which Western missionaries brought to Korea. The political situation in Korea was just the opposite of that of China where Western powers, including “Western Christianity,” were rejected. Western missionaries in Korea also brought new Western medicine and popularized education by establishing schools for the lower class of people using the simple Korean script rather than the difficult Chinese characters.
Korea, South

There are a number of spiritual factors for the explosive growth of the Korean church: (1) strength of the local church by Spirit-filled and hard-working pastors; (2) strong emphasis of prayer through daily early dawn prayer meetings, all night prayer meetings, and prayer mountains for the spiritual renewal of Christians; (3) grass-roots evangelism organized by the local churches to achieve the "Christianization of Korea"; (4) well-organized cell group Bible studies; (5) abundant supply of Christian workers through theological education; (6) rising number of Korean cross-cultural missionaries; (7) faithful stewardship in tithes and personal service for the church; and (8) innovative contextual expressions of Christian faith to make Christianity be a national religion.

The Korean church hosted the First Asian Missions Congress in August 1991 in Seoul with 1,300 participants from all over Asia, and the Global Consultation on World Evangelization (GCOWE 95) with 4,000 participants at the Torch Center in Seoul in May 1995. These missions meetings enlarged the vision of the Korean church for world evangelization, particularly for the evangelization of the Unreached Peoples in 10/40 Window countries of the world. The number of Korean missionaries has sharply increased since 1979, when there were 93 missionaries, to 1996 with an estimated 4,402 missionaries working in 138 nations (see also Korean Mission Boards and Agencies). The prayer target of the Korean church is to send 10,000 Korean missionaries (including 1,000 second-generation Korean missionaries sent out by over 3,000 Korean churches in North America) by A.D. 2000.

Bong Rin Ro

Korean Mission Boards and Societies. The story of church growth in Korea has been well known throughout the world, but its missionary work has not been as widely reported. From the beginning, the Korean church has been a missionary church, particularly since the Presbyterian Church in Korea was set up as a self-governing, independent church in 1907. In 1909, Suk-Jin Han was sent to Japan, and three ordained missionaries were sent to Shantung, China in 1913 (Rhodes, 1934, 392–95): Taio Ro Park, Pyung-Soon Sa, and Young-Hoon Kim. Also, the Korean church did the work of missions in such places as Siberia, Hawaii, Mexico, Mongolia, Manchuria, and America, working with both the Korean diaspora and the nationals, in spite of losing their sovereignty, language, and names and suffering severe persecution under Japanese Colonial Rule (1907–45). From 1902 to 1945, the Korean church sent a total of 120 missionaries.

The contemporary face of the Korean church and its involvement in missions has gone through a drastic change from those early days. The Korean War (1950–53) divided Korea and the strength of Korean Christianity moved from North to South. Samuel I. Kim has noted that from 1953 to 1976 there were a total of 234 missionaries sent from South Korea, working in Thailand, Taiwan, Japan, Vietnam, Hong Kong, Indonesia, Pakistan, Nepal, Ethiopia, Okinawa, Brazil, Mexico, Argentina, Brunei, and America (1976, 124). But it was not until the early 1980s that there was an explosive increase in the number of Korean Christians sent as missionaries. The Antioch News documents the explosion of numerical growth of Korean missionaries sent by denominations, local churches, and para-church and mission organizations (excluding those sent to America; Kim, 1998, 6). The numbers increased from 323 in 1982, to 1,645 in 1990, 3,272 in 1994, and 5,804 in 1998.

With this rapid growth has come the dilemma of how Koreans can most effectively be trained and enabled to work with other missionaries for the kingdom and the task of world evangelization.

Issues of Concern and the Korean Missionary Effort. There is no doubt that Korean Christians have a strong evangelistic spirit. They want to plant churches and do missions. But too often their understanding of missions is limited to "soul saving" and the ministry of the Word. Korean missionaries need a better balance of both the ministries of the Word and deed, without making a sharp separation between the two. But to do this requires that Koreans think again about the place of God in missions, or the theology of missions.

Second, with the explosion of growth in numbers of Korean missionaries since the early 1980s, too many missionaries have been sent without being properly selected or trained. There is an urgent need to give immediate attention to this deficiency in working with missionary candidates, moving them from their monocultural background to being cross-cultural people.

Third, it is sad to see how the abundance of finances has kept many Korean Christians from a childlike dependence on God in their ministry and from cooperating with other missionaries, denominations, and churches in their missionary efforts. Korean missionaries tend to use their finances to recruit nationals and new converts to work together in evangelizing and planting churches. However, they may do so at the cost of corrupting these “innocent” people, a reality observed earlier by John L. Nevius in China and more recently seen in the Philippines.

Finally, the early Korean missionaries cooperated and worked together with the Western missionaries and the host churches as partners. Presently, however, there are a growing number of Korean missionaries who work independently with little or no consultation with other missionaries and national churches in their location of ministry. Missionaries of all nations need each other, and Korean missionaries in particular must learn (or perhaps relearn) to partner and to work cooperatively for the kingdom.

The Korean church, as a missionary church, can make great and unique contributions to the missionary movement of the church in the twenty-first century if it can solve these dilemmas.

Kraemer, Hendrik (1888–1965). Dutch ecumenical leader, missiologist, and missionary to Indonesia. Born in the Netherlands, Kraemer lost both parents by the age of twelve and was raised in an orphanage. Through independent Bible study he experienced a personal conversion to Christ, and at sixteen decided to become a missionary. After study in Egypt, he served with the Dutch Bible Society in Indonesia.

Kraemer returned to accept a position at the University of Leiden (1937–47). During this period he was very active in Dutch church life, to the point of being a hostage under the Nazi occupation. Later he became the first director of the Ecumenical Institute in Bossey (near Geneva). After his retirement he was guest lecturer at Union Theological Seminary in New York for a year (1956–57).

Kraemer is remembered both as a pioneer with a vision and as a scholar. His book Christian Message in a Non-Christian World had profound influence on twentieth-century missiology. Although he was a true scholar in the fields of Eastern languages, Islam, and the history of religions, his legacy is as a missionary and a missionary theologian whose awareness of the problematic nature of present and future Christian missions and interfaith dialogue was sharper and far more advanced than that of his contemporaries.

Krapf, Johann Ludwig (1810–81). German pioneer missionary in Ethiopia and Kenya. Born and educated in the German village of Derendingen, Krapf joined the Church Missionary Society (CMS) in 1838 after spending a brief period as a Lutheran pastor. His first assignment was in Ethiopia (Abyssinia). Fascinated by the Galla (Oromo) tribe of southern Ethiopia, he called them the Germans of East Africa. His controversial support of British intervention in Ethiopia led to his departure in 1843. In that same year Krapf married. After he and his wife Rosine were refused admittance into Ethiopia in 1844, they sought to reenter East Africa through the gateway of Mombasa. Soon after receiving permission from the sultan of Zanzibar to begin work among the non-Muslim tribes of the coast, tragedy struck with the death of his wife and newborn child. Krapf persevered and concentrated his energies on the study of Swahili.

In 1846 Johannes Rebmann arrived and assisted Krapf in establishing the first CMS station in what is now Kenya. Krapf envisioned this center at Rabai, among the Giriama, as the first link in a chain of mission stations that would reach across Africa and connect with the West African Christian communities of Freetown, Badagri, and Abeokuta. Pursuing this vision, Krapf explored the interior of East Africa into the geographical heart of Tanzania and Kenya. His reports of snowcapped mountains on the equator were met with derision in Europe.

Following a furlough in 1850, Krapf returned to Rabai, but ill health forced his permanent return to Germany in 1853. Though he later visited East Africa briefly in 1861 (to help Thomas Wakefield establish a Methodist station at Ribe, north of Mombasa) and in 1867 joined Robert Napier’s punitive expedition to Ethiopia as an interpreter; his missionary work in East Africa was over. A brilliant linguist who published a Swahili New Testament, grammar, and dictionary, Krapf is best remembered for his book Travels, Researches and Missionary Labors in Eastern Africa (1860), which is the principal source for his life and work.

Krishna Pillai, H. A. (1827–1900). Indian contextualizer and poet. Born in a village near Palayamcottai in South India, he was raised in an orthodox Vaishnavite family. He strictly observed the caste rituals, was thoroughly versed in Vaishnavite literature, learned Sanskrit, and studied Tamil prose. By age eighteen he had memorized major portions of the Ramayana.

Appointed Tamil pandit in the Mission College at Sawyarpuram in 1852, Krishna Pillai for the first time came in close contact with Christians and began to read the Bible. Previously he had opposed Christianity. On March 29, 1858, he “trusted Christ alone.” In his own words, “on that very day the old signs on my forehead were cleared off. The laws of jati (caste) . . . I snapped.” He was baptized on April 18, 1858.

Krishna Pillai was a gifted poet. He adapted Hindu myths and symbols to communicate the biblical concept of God’s salvation through Christ. His epic poem “Rakshanya Yathirigam” (comparable to Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress) expresses the Christian faith in classic Tamil form.

Krishna Pillai brought to the service of Christ his deep knowledge of the Hintrue background and of the great Tamil culture in which he had grown up. His published Tamil works include The Pilgrimage of Salvation (epic), The Joy of Salvation (a collection of prayers), and The Assurance of the Religion of Salvation (a Christian apologetic).

Kropf, Albert (1822–1910). German missionary to South Africa. Born in Potsdam in 1822, he decided to become a missionary due to the influence of Pietists’ literature and preaching. He studied at the Berlin Mission’s seminary and in 1845 took an assignment at its station Bethel in British Kafraria (now Ciskei) in the Eastern Cape. He ministered among the Xhosa for sixty-one years, was superintendent of the Berlin Mission’s Kafraria synod for forty-three of these, and also pastored a congregation of German settlers in Stutterheim for many years. He translated the entire Bible, a hymn book, Luther’s Shorter Catechism, and other works in Xhosa, penned a major anthropological treatise in 1889 which is an indispensable historical source on the Xhosa, and a decade later produced the Kaffir-English Dictionary, which remained for decades the standard Xhosa dictionary. A determined and uncompromising confessionalist Lutheran, Kropf demanded careful instruction of potential Christians before baptism and intense catechizing and preparation for confirmation, and so the number of converts was not many.

Kumm, Isobel (1902–57). Canadian missionary to China and Thailand. Perched on steep mountains extending from Tibet into southwestern China, Isobel Kuhn spent her mature life with her family in missionary outreach to the Lisu tribespeople in Yunnan province. Her gift of writing poignant spiritual lessons from candid illustrations describing the impoverished Lisu, their Christian culture, and their sacrificial lives greatly influenced evangelical audiences in the 1950s.

An English literature student before conversion, the Canadian Kuhn attended Moody Bible Institute before traveling to China with the China Inland Mission (now Overseas Missionary Fellowship). She learned Chinese before trekking over dangerous mountain paths to the Salween valley Lisu villages in 1934.

Following the precedence of J. O. Frazer, the Kuhns always sent out trained Lisu evangelists and Bible teachers first into new areas to secure spiritual footholds. In this way the Lisu Christians quickly indigenized their faith. Lisu peoples in Burma (now Myanmar) and Thailand were also reached by this means, the latter field becoming the Kuhns’ home after the 1949 Maoist revolution in China. Before dying of cancer Kuhn wrote extensively about the Lisu, not living to see the full Lisu Bible published in 1962.

Kumm, Karl Wilhelm (1874–1930). German-born British missionary to Egypt and founder of Sudan United Mission. Karl Kumm was one of the great faith mission pioneers in the interior of Africa. His first wife Lucy (d. 1906), daughter of Fanny and Grattan Guinness, had followed her mother in using her literary talent to further the cause of the “regions beyond” (Congo, South America, India). Karl, born in the (former English) German territory of Hannover, attended the East London Training Institute and joined the North Africa Mission in 1898 to work in Egypt, where he married Lucy in 1900. The Kumms took up Grattan Guinness’ vision to reach the Sudan Belt stretching from Dakar to Khartoum, founding the Sudan Pioneer Mission, based in Eisenach, Germany. After disagreements they moved to Britain and started the Sudan United Mission in 1904 to reach the Sudan Belt from Nigeria. The SUM became one of the largest faith missions, with the unusual feature of combining interdenominational and denominational branches. Twelve churches resulting from the SUM in Nigeria, Cameroon, Chad, and Sudan count more than 3 million members. Kumm es-

Kuwait (Est. 2000 pop.: 1,818,000; 17,818 sq. km [6,880 sq. mi.]). Home to no indigenous Christian community after the Arab conquest of the seventh century, Kuwait was one of the cities visited by the important twentieth-century North American missionary to Muslims, SAMUEL MARINUS ZWEMER (1867–1952), of the Dutch Reformed Church in the United States, and his wife Amy Wilkes (d. 1939). Under auspices of the Arabian Mission, they first entered Kuwait in 1903. They visited on other occasions. In 1949 Zwemer spoke in Kuwait at the sixtieth anniversary of the society. He went on to other cities in the region. After a visit to the graves of missionaries and their children, Zwemer observed, “If we should hold our peace, these very stones would cry out for evangelization of Arabia!”

Subsequently, development of the region’s oil fields has attracted large numbers of Christian immigrants to Kuwait and the other Persian Gulf principalities. Eastern rite Catholics (Maronites, Melkites, Chaldeans, and others) compose the largest single Christian community, followed by various Orthodox bodies and non-Chalcedonian Christians, including Armenians and Indian Mar Thoma. After Iraq’s invasion of Kuwait in 1990, many were expelled. At the time of writing, exact figures of their strength are unavailable; Christians may number over 100,000, or just over 5 percent of Kuwait’s estimated 1.8 million people.

Constitutionally, Kuwait guarantees religious freedom. By implicit agreement with the Kuwaiti authorities, the Christian churches make no overt attempt to convert Muslims. Christians exercise influence through the Council of Churches of Kuwait, founded in 1960, and private schools, seven of which are under Christian management.

PAUL R. DEKAR

Kuyper, Abraham (1837–1920). Dutch theologian and political leader who influenced missiological reflection. Kuyper’s multifaceted life was a major influence in the political and ecclesiastical life of the Netherlands. During his first pastorate in Beesd, he moved from the theological liberalism of his university training to an orthodox Calvinism. In 1880 he founded the Free University of Amsterdam to be a center of higher education, especially for the clergy, and to be true to conservative Calvinism. He founded the Reformed Free Church of the Netherlands in 1886 and developed a Dutch neo-Calvinism. Kuyper maintained that divine sovereignty must be exercised over three realms—state, society, and church. His promotion of a “Christian democracy” immersed him in the political life of Holland, first as a member of Parliament and then as prime minister from 1901 to 1905. The Kuyperian model of integrating divine sovereignty over the three realms can be seen, for example, when as a member of Parliament he demanded, as both a statesman and a churchman, that Holland christianize its colonial holding, the Dutch West Indies, through the promotion of Christian missions, churches, and Christian schools. As a result, mission schools multiplied and Christians sought, with a measure of success, to compel the government to provide greater opportunity for missionaries and to apply the principles of the faith to the administration of the colonies.

Kyrgyzstan (Est. 2000 pop.: 5,143,000; 198,500 sq. km. [76,641 sq. mi.]). Kyrgyzstan is a mountainous Central Asian republic of the former Soviet Union, bordering China. While nearly three-quarters of the population is of Turkic origin, a sizable but shrinking Slavic minority remains. Although most Kyrgyz claim nominal allegiance to Sunni Islam, the folk Islam they practice has strongly animistic overtones. Evangelicals make up less than 0.25 percent of the population, the overwhelming majority being Slavs and Germans. Growing numbers of Kyrgyz have been coming to Christ, however, resulting in the establishment of several ethnic Kyrgyz congregations. Religious liberty has been declining, making evangelism increasingly difficult and necessitating creative strategies.

Land, Land Reform, Land Rights. The subject of land is an underrated issue in mission; it is hardly mentioned in textbooks and is largely ignored in training courses.

Historically, missionaries from the West often associated with the powerful and privileged in order to get permission to stay in a country. This agreement was often conditioned by an expectation of noninvolvement in questions of power and land ownership. The colonial mentality of missions in the early part of the twentieth century meant that missionaries were more identified with the conquerors and exploiters than the struggling classes. In the words of Desmond Tutu of South Africa: “Before the missionaries came they had the Bible and we had the land. They said ‘Let us pray,’ and when we opened our eyes, we had the Bible and they had the land!”

Many missions purchased land for cathedrals and churches, schools, hostels, and hospitals as the physical base to reach people. Missionary compounds, by contrast, have often been places of privacy and protection that conflict with a genuinely incarnational ministry. The need for land as a base for mission consumes energy and money. The complexities of foreigners buying land, with payoffs to power holders and traditional owners, established patterns for later dealings. Regular payments for maintenance and labor can reinforce the perception that missionary groups are powerful and patronizing.

This perception affects how the gospel is received. Land ownership by missions can contribute to a mentality that isolates national Christians from the common life of their community; to become a Christian is thus to become an alien. And when the mission passes ownership of their land to the national church, this may become a millstone around the neck, the opposite to the experience of the early church (Acts 4:34–35).

In contrast to the relative wealth of traditional missions, millions of landless people have little time to consider the gospel in their daily struggle to survive. About one out of every five human beings in the world lives in the city in significant poverty. These people are internally displaced or refugees because of regional, racial, and religious conflict, natural calamity, or the effects of industrial development, the Green Revolution, and urbanization.

One of the happiest experiences in the Old Testament was the equitable division of land within Israel, to be passed down the family line in perpetuity (Num. 26:52-56; 33:54; Ezek. 47:14). Several biblical ethicists suggest that a key human right God desires is for every household not to be permanently deprived of land.

Few evangelicals have a gospel that would resolve conflict between warring factions or resettle the homeless after a major disaster. Fewer express Good News to the poor by confronting the injustices of wealthy landowners and huge agribusiness that make peasant farmers or freeholders into day laborers on what was once their own land. Niall O’Brien calls this “land reform in reverse.”

Evangelical missions have not given sufficient attention to issues of justice and righteousness as they pertain to questions about land. This is especially urgent since land reform efforts continue to fail because of the obstruction of powerful, vested interests. Even where missionary agriculturalists have made an impact working with farmers to reclaim marginalized land, the incentive to do this is restricted by the awareness that too much improvement may draw fresh interference from the rich.

Landless people in the cities are a greater challenge. They live in vulnerable places along expressways, river banks, and canals, where the “haves” would not reside. Resettlement is rarely satisfactory because it takes the urban poor away from the locations in the city where they survive on what the wealthy discard.

One recent hopeful shift in mission is the movement toward incarnation, the willingness of evangelical Christian groups to live in urban slums and shanty towns. Serving the poor by identifying in their daily struggle has brought hope that people on the margins of life can meet a Jesus who is not...
Language. Learned system of arbitrary symbols (verbal or manual) used by a society to communicate and to express their identity. Language is distinctly human; animal communication systems are typically random sounds (bird calls) or set analogs (the dance of bees). Language is acquired through interaction with other people, but is based on what appear to be innate patterns in the human brain.

Language is marked by structure and pattern. Language consists of units within layers of larger units. Each language employs a small subset of the total possible sounds and combinations of sounds to create words which follow a relatively small number of phrase and clause patterns, yet is capable of expressing an infinite set of utterances. These patterns facilitate communication between speakers of the language and can aid outsiders seeking to learn a second language.

The ability to use language is common among all people and can be seen as one aspect of being created in God’s image. People use language to convey, receive, and record information. Language also encodes the physical environment (Gen. 2:19) and social culture, providing important insights for mission workers. Language differences can be used to include or exclude others. Humans have typically used these distinctions for ungodly purposes (Judg. 12:5–6; 2 Kings 18:26–28; Matt. 26:73). Genesis 11 illustrates how even language unity can be misused. In Acts 2 God miraculously overcame language barriers, setting a pattern of using language as a missionary tool.

God used language in creation (Gen. 1), sent the Word to live as a human (John 1), and empowers his Word to change lives (Heb. 4:12). God revealed himself through human language and repeatedly commissioned written records of his words (Exod. 17:14; Deut. 6:9; Jer. 30:2). He inspired the authors of Scripture to preserve his message in three particular languages (Hebrew, Aramaic, Koine Greek). That God saw fit to use languages as different from each other as Hebrew and Greek demonstrates the innate ability of human language to express the essence of God’s revelation. While no human words can fully describe God, God used ordinary languages to describe himself. God’s use of Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek appears to have less to do with the wonders of those particular languages than with the fact that the audience he wanted to address understood them. When people understood more than one language, God chose the language of hearth and home over that of the classroom and book learning (Acts 26:14), the language of the homeland over the language of formal religion (Acts 2:5–12). The Scriptures provide numerous instructions on the godly use of language (Exod. 20:16; Josh. 1:8; 1 Tim. 4:12–13).

There are over 6,500 distinct languages spoken in the world today, with countless more dialects of these languages. Paul used several languages in his ministry (Acts 21:37–22:1). Missionaries still need to overcome language barriers to communicate the gospel. Agencies such as the Summer Institute of Linguistics focus on the study of language and provide training to help missionaries learn and analyze languages.

Language Schools. Language schools have performed a great service to the missionary cause, facilitating many new missionaries’ acquisition of language (see SECOND LANGUAGE ACQUISITION).

Some smaller schools primarily offer access to trained tutors. Larger schools provide teachers, a curriculum, a means of evaluation of progress, and a camaraderie in the learning among the students.

In evaluating a language school, the new missionary can take into account the learning philosophy of the school, the curriculum, the training and experience of teachers, the teachers’ patience and attitudes, the medium of instruction, the class size, the learning ethos, the emphasis placed on conversation and communication, the attention given to culture learning and involvement, the location of the school, the dialect being taught, the dialect commonly used in the locality of the school, the expected outcomes, the reputation of the school, the flexibility in dealing with differences in ability levels and learning styles of students, the training given to learners to enable them to continue learning independently after completion of the course, the intensity (number of contact hours, length, and extent) of the course, and the cost (tuition, books, living expenses, transportation).

In order to achieve the greatest benefit from the course, students must remain fully engaged in the learning process both in and out of the classroom. This engagement includes active participation in the classroom, willingness to try, willingness to be corrected for mistakes, discipline, and ample investment of time and energy. In addition, the learner should also regularly spend time outside the classroom relating to people in the language group. By daily involvement in the community, listening to people, and talking with them, the learner will reinforce the things learned in the classroom and make them his or her own. Immersion in the language and culture can be further enhanced by living with a local family who speak the language in their home.

The new mission's careful attention to language learning will lay a foundation for effectiveness in ministry for years to come.

Laos (Est. 2000 pop.: 5,602,000; 236,800 sq. km. [91,429 sq. mi.]). Bordered by Thailand, Cambodia, Vietnam, China, and Myanmar, Laos is comprised of four major ethnolinguistic groups (Ethnologue lists ninety-two distinct languages). While animistic beliefs are widespread across the population, Theravada Buddhism (59%) and traditional religions (33%) dominate the overall religious adherence of the people, with Christians numbering less than 2 percent of the population. After the Communists took over with Vietnamese help in 1975, more than 10 percent fled the country to Thailand. Many of those have since emigrated to North America, Europe, Australia, or New Zealand. This former French colony (1890 to 1953) is currently governed by a single-party communist regime, the Lao People's Revolutionary Party.

Recent historical events include the killing of more than 2 million by the Khmer Rouge government under Pol Pot's leadership. As much as two-thirds of the church fled or was martyred (including more than 90% of the trained leadership). Many more have lost their faith. Even though economic restrictions have been eased somewhat in recent years, political control remains tight and the church is closely monitored. In spite of the economic liberalization begun in 1986, the country remains one of the world's poorest, with an estimated annual income per person in 1993 of roughly $295 (though growing at almost 5% per year).

The first missionary to reach Laos was Jean deLeria, a Jesuit, who came from Cambodia in 1642. He was forced to leave after five years of work and no results. Unsuccessful attempts were made again in 1683 and 1866, but it was not until 1878 that a mission was developed in the northwest part of the country. It ended when twelve priests were martyred in 1884. From then until 1940, missionaries came from neighboring Thailand and worked in the south along the Mekong River. In 1950, owing to a general lack of success, attention was given over to tribal peoples in the mountains.

The first Protestant missionary to reach Laos was Daniel MacGilvary, a Presbyterian who made itinerant evangelistic trips from Thailand. Gabriel Contesse of the Swiss Brethren was the first Protestant missionary to settle in Laos, arriving in 1902 and concentrating his efforts in the south. After initial attempts at widespread evangelization, he and his successors changed their focus to literature development and translating the Bible into Lao, which was completed in 1932. G. Edward Roffe of The Christian and Missionary Alliance arrived in 1929, focusing his efforts largely in the north. A dramatic people movement took place there in 1950 when a thousand Meo, a northern hill people, came to Christ over a period of several weeks. This laid the foundation for what became the Evangelical Church of Laos, the largest Protestant denomination in the country. OMF missionaries arrived in 1957 and worked alongside the Swiss Brethren. Though Protestants generally have had limited success among the majority Lao people, they have seen results from working with the refugees who were forced to flee in the face of the genocidal persecution of the mid-1970s.

Las Casas, Bartholomew de (1474–1566). Spanish missionary to Latin America. The son of a merchant who had traveled on Columbus's second voyage, Las Casas himself arrived in the Caribbean in 1502 and after a return to Spain and further studies, was ordained in 1507. Initially serving as an encomendero (recipient of a grant which gave control over Indians who were to provide labor and goods in exchange for protection and religious instruction) in Spain’s colonial encomienda system, a conversion experience in August of 1514 led him to work for reform. Freeing his own slaves, he returned to Spain in 1515 to advocate for the Indians. He then launched a lifetime of attempts to initiate projects which would foster peaceful colonization, with varying success. He joined the Dominican Order in 1523.

His projects mostly met with opposition and failure, but his powerful and fertile writings were far more successful and the chief source of lasting influence. His thinking shaped the papal bull Sublimis Deus (1537), which recognized the Indians as rational beings with the same rights as Europeans. He also played a key role in the development and passing of a set of laws in 1542 which, among other things, limited the power of the encomenderos and prohibited slavery of the indigenes.

After retirement and final return to Spain in 1547, Las Casas engaged in major debates with Juan Ginés de Sepúlveda over the legitimacy of the Spanish conquests in the New World (1550–51). One of his most significant contributions was in developing the discussion on what would become the contemporary concept of HUMAN RIGHTS.

Latin America. This continent must be studied in light of its unique geography, historical development, peoples, religions, and cultures, as well as its current, changing social environment. Only from that perspective can one fully understand the Latin spiritual mosaic, in particular; its vibrant evangelical Christianity. Latin America is very diverse, with each country displaying its own unique features.

Geography and Population. Latin America (Spanish- and Portuguese-speaking) is composed of nineteen nations, having 15 percent of the world's land mass and about 8 percent of the global population. Starting with Mexico's northern border, one travels 7,000 miles down to the bottom tip of Chile, just north of Antarctica, and at its widest 3,200 miles from Peru's Pacific coast eastward through Brazil to the Atlantic. Two of the nineteen countries are found in the Caribbean (Cuba and the Dominican Republic), while the other island nations enjoy their different heritages—English, French, and African. Puerto Rico is a North American Commonwealth island, and while it shares many historical, religious, and cultural values with the other nations it must be studied within its own Caribbean and U.S. realities. On the northern flank of South America are two nations that identify more with the CARIBBEAN—Suriname, Guyana, and the French colony, Guyane.

The races and peoples within each country are also very diverse. The original tribal peoples whom the Europeans met over 500 years ago still compose a significant percentage of the population. Called "Indians" (so named by mistake, because Columbus concluded erroneously that he had arrived in India) pre-Columbian (before Columbus) peoples are found primarily in Mexico (11% of 102 million people), Guatemala (50% of 12.2 million), Peru (45% of 26 million), Ecuador (21% of 12.6 million), Bolivia (55% of 8.3 million), and Chile (9% of 15.3 million). The black people (originally coming as African slaves and later as Caribbean immigrants) form a significant percentage of Latin America, particularly in the Caribbean and in a "black ribbon" on the Pacific Ocean coast, as well as in Brazil (6% black and 38% mulatto). People of pure European and Asian blood live in all the nations. However, most of the population is a mixture of the races, called "mestizos."

Over 160 million Brazilians speak Portuguese, a result of the colonization by Portugal. Most of the remainder of 312 million people in the other eighteen nations speak Spanish, either as mother or trade tongue. But millions of Latin American pre-Columbian peoples also speak their historic language.

Latin America's population is growing at the annual rate of 1.8 percent per year, and will double in 38 years. By the year 2010 it is projected to have some 589 million people and by the year 2025 the estimate surges to 691. In 1997, 72 percent of the continent was considered urban; 34 percent under the ages of 15 years and only 5 percent over age 65. It is helpful to compare Latin America's annual GNP of $3,310 to that of the less developed world ($1,120), the more developed world ($19,310), and the entire world ($4,920).

A Historical Panorama. Modern Latin America must be understood from the perspective of its particular history and its four major time segments: (1) pre-Columbian times (ancient past to 1492); (2) the conquest and colonization (1492–1821); (3) the genesis and crisis of the new nations (1821–1930); and (4) the modern period (1930–92).

The demarcation date for the mutual discovery is 1492, when the Latin/European history begins in this newly discovered (for the Europeans) world. Evidence points to a crossing of the Bering straits some time prior to 20,000 B.C., and gradually the population moved down the continent. Vast civilizations had come and gone by the time Columbus landed, but in 1492 three major ones remained: the Aztecs in Central Mexico, the Maya in southern Mexico and Guatemala, and the Inca in the Andean region. Estimates of the Indian population in 1492 range widely between 15 million to an unrealistic 100 million.

The colonial history produced a mixed legacy. On the positive side the Europeans brought a system of education; they introduced new technology; they transferred two major languages—Spanish and Portuguese; they “evangelized” bringing a new religion—Roman Catholic Christianity; they introduced an entire social structure to organize and expand Spanish culture and society. On the negative side, the Spanish have been criticized severely for social and cultural evils inherent in the conquest and colonization. Europeans delivered diseases against which the Indians were defenseless and which killed millions, and brutal slave labor wiped out uncounted numbers. Early on there was a battle to determine whether these “primitive peoples” had souls or not. If not, then they were a higher level of animals for slave work. In Mexico alone, one estimate states that the Indian population dropped from 16,871,408 to 1,069,255 between 1532 and 1608. A few valiant priests defended the Indians, such as Bartolomew de Las Casas, who battled until the Indians were declared to be human. Unfortunately, this humanity did not extend to Africans, who were then imported as slaves to work the colonial economy.

Following independence from both Spain (between 1820 and 1821) and Portugal (independence in 1822; with Brazil becoming a federal republic in 1889), the new nations struggled for viability and political/economic development from 1824 to 1880. It was relatively easy to defeat Spain and gain autonomy, but nearly impossible to organize and administrate stable republics. The map was redrawn, but the nations were in crisis, with political foundations unprepared for Western democracy. Into that leadership/power vacuum emerged the dictators, who took personal charge of their nations from the early nineteenth century even into the mid-twentieth century.

The 1880–1930 period was marked by relative peace and limited national development, with social positivism experiments (Brazil and Mexico are case studies) with its “scientific technocracy.” National infrastructure was developed, the armies grew stronger, and central governmental control extended. During this period the controversial role of the United States emerged as the Western Hemisphere’s superpower—generating an ongoing love–hate relationship between Latin America and the United States.

The modern period, starting in 1930, gradually increased social and political stability. During the 1960s and 1970s the right-wing military controlled most of the nations, with democracy fading even as violence and poverty increased. Fundamental political and economic structures did not begin to change substantially until the late 1980s and into the 1990s. By 1995, all but one country (Cuba) had voted for some form of democratically elected government. The 1990 collapse of Russian and European Marxism robbed the intellectual left of socialist/Marxist political models, which contributed to the 1990 electoral defeat of the Nicaraguan Sandinistas. Peace accords have been signed in El Salvador and Guatemala, and political stability has even opened space for former Marxists to run for and win public office.

Much faith continues to be placed in the hands of the new political technocrats, the market economy, privatization, microeconomic development, and growing stability of trade agreements within Latin America as well as with the United States and Pacific Rim nations. The military have currently retreated to their barracks. But dark signs loom over the continent: endemic corruption, the violent drug industry, political systems drastically needing overhaul, the uncontrolled growth of poverty, the breakdown of the family, and the fragmentation of fragile human social systems. The privatization of former state industries is creating immediate high unemployment, as are the cuts in traditional social programs and services. New liberationists and leftist intellectuals severely criticize the extremes of this “neo-liberalism.”

The Spiritual Mosaic. Latin America is historically and nominally Roman Catholic and Rome still considers Latin America within its religious world, which in 1900 was almost entirely Catholic. The continent has a general concept of God and the Bible, of the Virgin Mary, and of Jesus Christ (particularly his passion story). With certain notable exceptions, such as Uruguay and Argentina, Latin America is God-conscious and favorable to Christianity in the broad sense of the word.

However, probing deeper into the worldview, most Latins are presuppositionally spiritistic. This is particularly true of the pre-Columbian peoples, who for centuries worshiped their nature gods. Even with nominal conversion to Catholicism, their basic worldview is spirit-controlled. Africa-originated spiritism is widespread, but in particular most visible in the Macumba and Umbanda cults of Brazil (see also Latin American New Religious Movements). Some 35% of Brazilians are active spiritists, and partial practitioners raise that population to 60%. Whether they come from the lowest social class or the movie stars or leading politicians, spiritism attracts Brazilians. Anyone in Latin American Christian ministry must understand this worldview and be equipped to minister in the context of Power Encounter—both evil and Triune God-provided.

Another aspect of the cultural and spiritual mosaic is the continental spirit of “Indianism,” currently on a continental rise. On the positive ledger, it celebrates the God-given values and cultures of these pre-Columbian peoples, recognizing their ethnic riches as well as their economic and political power in partial counteraction to centuries of abuse. Yet there are warning signs also, particularly the revival of traditional spiritism and pre-Columbian nature-worshipping religions.

Contemporary Latin Catholicism reveals a broad diversity of streams: the historic, traditional sacramentalist, hierarchy-ruled, in some nations allied with the oligarchy; a progressive wing with socialist to Marxist sympathies, attempting to articulate a new theology of liberation; a biblical studies circle that has generated solid Scripture resources; the charismatic "renewed" Catholics (many drawn back into Catholic mysticism but others still related to charismatic evangelicals); the large majority of Catholics who would practice some form of popular religiosity, converging traditions, personal emotions, and syncretistic folk religious practices; nominal Catholics who are simply that because of family tradition but the underlying value system is secular. Many evangelicals have interfaced with the more biblical and charismatic sectors. Liberation theology was primarily conceived, birthed, and given life within Latin Catholicism, generating a vast amount of publications and influencing global theology. Since the collapse of Russian and European Marxism, liberation theology is a movement seeking new articulation. Evangelicals would be wrong to dismiss it, for as long as a majority of people live in poverty, Christians of all stripes will attempt to speak for the poor.

Latin Catholic leaders are grappling with the new rules on an open religious playing field, a new experience for them. While Catholicism in Europe and North America has lively religious pluralism, this is not yet the case in Latin America. Pope John Paul II has made twelve trips to the region, has labeled evangelicals as "sects," and has challenged his Church to affirm Catholic doctrine and reevangelize the continent.

The Evangelicals. The Protestant gospel arrived in Latin America in five movements. The first wave came with the new settlers in the early nineteenth century from northern Europe: Germany, Holland, France, and Britain. A short-lived Lutheran Welser colony settled in Venezuela from 1528 to 1546, and French Huguenots tried to establish from 1555 to 1557 a Brazilian base. These colonists brought their Protestant faith, but largely kept it to themselves, and tended to worship in their European language within the immigrant and trade communities. Even some "Protestant pirates" got involved and helped settle what became the three Guianas. Early in the nineteenth century Moravians immigrated to this New World and established churches and communities. We honor the great Bible colporteurs, such as James Diego Thomson, Joseph Monguariadino, and Francisco Penzotti, agents of the British and American Bible Societies, for their unique ministry, which for some meant Martyrdom.

The second wave began in the early to mid-nineteenth century, when the major denominations from Britain and the United States established churches and educational/social institutions throughout the continent. During this period the Latin political context was changing, the religious influence of Spain diminishing, and commerce with England and northern Europe growing stronger. All of this favored a new religious opening, though in some countries persecution was experienced.

Europeans focused primarily on the Southern Cone nations, but the United States denominations spread throughout the region. Early on the Comity agreements guided territorial expansion. Churches were established in every country. However, some of these denominations gradually developed a primary social and educational emphasis, and today these historic denominations represent classic Latin Protestantism, but their churches are not growing.

The third wave came with the arrival of North American and European Faith Missions. Even D. L. Moody and Ira Sankey ministered in Mexico City in 1894. These new societies sent thousands of cross-cultural missionaries with evangelistic and church-planting passion as early as 1890; Bible institutes were started to train pastors and evangelists; Christian radio and publishing ministries expanded. The churches grew with vibrancy in almost every nation, and today they represent the majority of non-Pentecostal/charismatic evangelicals on the continent.

The fourth wave came shortly after the Azusa Street Revival (1906), for inherent in that Spirit movement was its empowered commitment to world evangelization with new distinctives. Pentecostal denominations arrived and grew, and some of the historic churches were swept into these new movements—Chilean Methodists split and the Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile was formed. Every Pentecostal denomination in the United States established its Latin counterpart, although some of them may now be larger than the "parent" body. In Brazil alone there are over 15 million affiliated with the Assemblies of God.

Today we witness the fifth wave of Latin American evangelical, autochthonous churches. A good number are massive, but most are smaller in size. They are autonomous, contextualizing theology and missiology, with most forming their own national and international denominations. It might be safe to estimate that they represent 30 percent of all Latin evangelical churches. In Mexico City they represent 55 percent of the churches, in Lima 37 percent, and in Guatemala 25 percent of all churches. Mostly independent Neo-Pentecostal (charismatic) churches, they are generally led by strong centralizing leaders who have emerged from the ranks of committed laity. The focus is on emotional, celebratory worship and preaching, with a strong emphasis on evangelism and church planting even beyond national borders. They have been charged with being a Protestant version of Latin popular religiosity. Undoubtedly, they challenge all other variants of Latin evangelicalism.

Growth in Numbers. How much have Latin American evangelical-Protestant churches grown in recent years? One measure comes from comparing data in the 1993 edition of Patrick Johnstone’s Operation World with those from the 1986 edition. But it is impossible to justify all terms and statistics. Essentially the Protestant churches have grown from a total community of roughly 50,000 in 1900 to an estimated 64 million in 1997 (see also Núñez and Taylor).

Data from 1993 reveal the diversity of evangelical strength in these 19 nations, with numbers in percentage of total population: Argentina, 7.5 percent; Bolivia, 8.5 percent; Brazil, 18.9 percent; Chile, 27.1 percent; Colombia, 3.4 percent; Costa Rica, 9.8 percent; Cuba, 2.7 percent; Dominican Republic, 5.8 percent; Ecuador, 3.7 percent; El Salvador, 20.8 percent; Guatemala, 22.1 percent; Honduras, 10.1 percent; Mexico, 5.1 percent; Nicaragua, 16.3 percent; Panama, 16.1 percent; Paraguay, 5.5 percent; Peru, 6.8 percent; Uruguay, 3.5 percent; Venezuela, 5.1 percent. For the continent the total is 11.1 percent. Using the 1997 population total of 472 million, the estimated 15 percent of evangelicals generates a force of some 64 million believers.

A measured guess suggests there are some 300,000 evangelical churches in Latin America. Perhaps only 25 percent of them have a formally trained pastor-leader. Some 75 percent of the churches are Pentecostal-charismatic, and 25 percent non-Pentecostal/charismatic. But churches of both categories are growing as long as they evangelize actively. The largest percentages of evangelical populations are found in Guatemala, Chile, Brazil, and El Salvador; the lowest in Mexico, Colombia, Cuba, Ecuador, Uruguay, and Paraguay.

Some Clarifying Items Regarding Religious Terminology. In Latin America the words “Protestant” and “evangelical” are generally used interchangeably, with preference for the latter. The terms “Pentecostal” and “charismatic” sometimes describe the same reality, but at other times “Pentecostal” is used more of the older denominations, like Assemblies of God or Church of God. “Charismatic” has a broad use that runs from Spirit-filled Catholics to independent churches of Pentecostal persuasion. Perhaps 75 percent of all Latin evangelicals would consider themselves charismatic or Pentecostal. But all Latin charismatics consider themselves also “evangélicos!” The concept of “renewal” or of a “renewed church” seems to apply to the charismatic theology and practice that is moving through non-Pentecostal denominations—such as Baptist, Methodist, Brethren, and independent non-Pentecostal. It is fair to state that Latin evangelical churches characterized as “practicing supernaturalists” are the ones demonstrating growth and vibrancy. Their worship is strong, utilizing the spectrum of instruments, with words and music now primarily written by Latins.

Whither Latin American Evangelicals? This is a unique continent-wide moment for Latin evangelicals, attempting to speak for transcendental absolutes in a world of relativism, political neoliberalism, philosophical postmodernism, and moral deconstructionism. While Latin evangelical leaders rejoice in their numerical growth, they also express profound concern about its health, citing shallow ethical depth, the moral relativism, the emphasis on emotional celebration more than authentic community, and the growth of biblical illiteracy in both pew and pulpit with devalued biblical study and exposition. Here is a series of issues in dialectical tension that will mark the future of Latin evangelicals.

First, the battle between profound renewal and maturity versus nominalism and cultural evangelicalism. Numerical growth is thrilling to many, encouraging to all, even though statistics are imprecise. But the hard questions must be asked: “What is church?” “What is growth?” “What about the problem of ‘former evangelicals’?” Internal weaknesses and open heresies—from other regions as well as Latin species—seep into the churches and sap their vitality. The churches must face head-on the crisis of the disintegrating Latin family structure and articulate better answers in light of urbanization and modern lifestyles. The Spirit of God must renew stagnant evangelical churches. Studies in Costa Rica and Chile have documented the disturbing percentage of “former evangelicals.” Some have returned to the Catholic fold and others have moved into privatized religion or even nonbelief.

Second, the struggle between evangelical mutual acceptance and interdependency versus isolationism and critical divisionism. A limited sense of unity in the Latin churches is manifested locally, nationally, and continentally. Whether subtle or open, it pits Pentecostal against Pentecostal, charismatic against charismatic, Pentecostal against charismatic, and non-Pentecostal versus charismatic, non-Pentecostal against non-Pentecostal, traditional denomination against Third Wave church. CONELA (The World Evangelical Fellowship related regional body) has the potential to unite evangelicals on a continental basis, but it awaits visionary leadership that understands the nature and influence of national and regional fellowships and will provide crucial services to the churches. Meanwhile, a few national movements will increasingly and effectively impact their nations.
Latin America

Third, the tension between relevancy and biblical contextualization versus the superspiritualization of the faith. A hermeneutical struggle is found in every Christian community: How is Scripture to be applied and experienced in a radically changing Latin American society? Christians must be equipped to face the insidious enemies filtering in through secularism (the rejection of a theistic point of reference); materialism (consumer society and massive debt); modernity (glorification of technology and “progress”); and now the surprisingly rapid invasion of postmodernity with its deconstructionist influences (questioning of technology and “progress,” the newer religious pluralism, rejection of transcendental truth).

Latin theological leaders, pastors, and those preparing for ministry must be equipped for the challenge of ongoing contextualization in light of historical needs and the new ideological face of Latin America. The Latin American Theological Fraternity has done a valiant job in this area. All leaders and believers must be equipped to confront the evil powers of the occult, so openly and influentially influencing the entire spectrum of society.

Fourth is the effective equipping of leadership for ministry versus informal volunteerism. Most Latin formal educational delivery systems are costly to create, fund, staff, and produce graduates. They do have their strategic place but need serious self-examination. Few formal institutions offer program degrees beyond the master’s degree. Most Latins travel to the United States or Europe for doctoral study. In this critical time for the Latin churches, women and men with the highest credentials and strongest gift mix are needed. Formal schools serve a very small segment of church needs, and in the gap more and more smaller programs or training alternatives are emerging. There are two major entry points to ministry in Latin America; one coming through formal theological study and the other emerging “on the march” of regular lay ministry. How these two currents relate to and influence each other in the future will profoundly shape the Latin churches.

The fifth tension is the involvement in the crises of society and political governance versus forms of spiritualized isolationism. For decades evangelicals eschewed political involvement as part of the devil’s work. This has radically changed, with a number of evangelicals now in the political arena. But the jury is mixed on this involvement, for some Christian politicians have sold their integrity and yet crassly serve their denominational interests. Some Latins want to establish evangelical parties, though these have no hope of winning elections. Too many evangelicals in politics are naive, have been manipulated, or lost their spiritual convictions while in power. In part this has come from the absence of spiritual accountability as well as inadequate pastoral ministry to public servants.

Sixth is the polarized polemics between Catholics and evangelicals versus mutual respect. Catholic leaders know they are losing influence and space in Latin America, and this has created an internal crisis for the hierarchy. The Roman Church is adjusting to the new religious pluralism. And some evangelicals still suffer from the ghetto mentality of a persecuted minority. But the fact is that evangelicals are still being persecuted for their faith, whether the Chamula Indians of southern Mexico (religious persecution) or the Quechua believers in Peru (political persecution). The spiritual/social value called hispanidad (which identifies Latins intrinsically as Catholics) has created other conflicts on the continent.

North Europeans and North Americans must not confuse their Catholicism with that of Latin America. There are two different models, and to impose experience and expectations of the first upon Latin evangelicals is wrong.

Seventh is the tension between monocultural evangelization versus cross-cultural mission, whether national or international, continental or intercontinental. The number of evangelical churches with cross-cultural vision is still low. This must change as they are challenged biblically and then mobilized to broader mission. In Latin America, church-based missions will continue to carry the day, but leaders must break old molds and attitudes. Missiological literature must be developed by Latin writers and theologians, as well as by the practitioners.

Latin-driven movements and organizations, such as COMIBAM (Cooperation of Missions of Iberoamerica), must be supported as they mobilize beyond emotionalism and create the imperative missions infrastructure for the movement to be truly visible and viable. This challenge focuses on three areas: the precandidate phase of screening, primarily by the local church; the prefield training (informal and formal) phase; and the field ministry phase, which requires adequate supervision, shepherding, and strategizing.

Eighth, and finally, is the spirit of interdependent partnership versus control and neopaternalism by expatriate organizations. Many international organizations have vested interests in Latin America, whether they be funding bodies, denominations, parachurch organizations, or foreign mission agencies. Control must pass to Latin grassroots, and decisions must be made by those directly affected by the decisions. On the continent more and more expatriate missionaries serve under Latin leadership. Expatriate missionaries from all nations continue to be welcomed, provided they come with the genuine spirit of servanthood and serve where they are truly needed in light of global missiological priorities. The fact is that many international mis-mission organizations are searching for their identity and role in Latin America today, particularly with the emphasis on the non-Latin unevangelized nations and people groups.

Summarizing. Latin America is a multihued continent facing an uncertain future in the global and borderless economy. Its God-given vast natural and human resources have yet to be developed and wisely utilized, although political conditions are healthier today than ever before. National, regional, and continental development will take place as genuine political reform is institutionalized in a way that truly grapples with the causes and characteristics of an ever-prevalent poverty and social crises. Within this textured context we find the evangelical churches and leadership facing unique challenges, and empowered by the Spirit they will impact their world.

Latin American Mission Boards and Societies.

Very early after the arrival of evangelicals in Latin America a missionary impulse among Latin Americans took them as missionaries to remote areas of their countries as well as to other countries and continents. The roots of missionary work in pietist and revivalist movements emphasized the priesthood of all believers and created structures that facilitated it, in open contrast to the priest-centered life of predominant Roman Catholicism. There are records of spontaneous missionary activity of Chileans from the Methodist Pentecostal revival of 1911, going as missionaries to Argentina beginning in 1925. Argentinean Baptists sent Maximo Fernández as a missionary to start work in Paraguay in 1919. Puerto Rican Baptists sent Santiago Soto-Fontánez as a missionary to El Salvador, and Eduardo Carlos Pereyra from Brazil crusaded for the cause of missions among Presbyterians in his country. These cases are examples of two missionary patterns that originated in Latin America. First, the migration pattern to and from neighboring countries became a vehicle used by tentmakers as a way of carrying on missionary work. This has developed significantly in recent years, when for political or economic reasons thousands of Latin Americans have emigrated to North America, Europe, and Australia, or have gone as technicians and professionals to work in the Muslim world. There are thousands of evangelicals from Latin America working in Japan, many of whom get involved as missionary volunteers in that country. Second, organized denominational mission boards following the model of North American missions developed especially in Argentina, Puerto Rico, Mexico, and Brazil. Mainly denominations that were financially strong and well organized have managed to continue this model.

After World War II, a large number of conservative evangelical faith missions came to Latin America and some of them created a third pattern for the channeling of missionary vocations among Latin Americans. Organizations such as the Latin America Mission, Wycliffe Bible Translators, Operation Mobilization, and Youth with a Mission incorporated Latin Americans into their international mission force, generally relying on North American or European funds and leadership. Student movements associated with the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students (IFES) pioneered missionary conventions to challenge students to become involved in missions in their own countries or abroad. The First Latin American Missionary Congress gathered five hundred university students and graduates from all over Latin America in Curitiba, Brazil, in January 1976. Sponsored by the IFES related Alianza Bíblica Universitaria do Brasil (Inter University of Brazil), this congress produced the “Declaração de Curitiba” (a missiological manifesto) and several of the participants volunteered for missionary service in rural Latin America, Angola, and Italy. Operation Mobilization was also active in providing vision and missionary education to Latin American young people, recruiting selected volunteers for work and travel in the ships Doulos and Logos. Mexican university graduates related to these movements started “Proyecto Magreb,” later on “PM International,” to reach the Muslim world from a base in Spain. In July 1987, several organizations and individuals sponsored COMIBAM in São Paulo, Brazil. COMIBAM and the Latin American Theological Fraternity are working successfully to bring missiological components into theological education. Even churches and countries that went through critical days because of political violence have been the source of a missionary thrust such as AMEN (Evangelical Association for Mission to the Nations) in Peru, an indigenous faith mission that sent missionaries to England and France in the 1970s and used “Kerygma”—a folk music team—to generate interest and funds for their venture. Indigenous sending agencies have also developed in Costa Rica and Guatemala. In this fourth pattern, leadership, funding, and management is entirely in Latin American hands though.
Latin American Mission Boards and Societies

funds may also be raised from churches planted by its missionaries in North America and Europe. There are an increasing number of Latin American missionaries going to Spain either to work there or to use it as a base and training ground to prepare missionaries to Muslim countries of North Africa and Central Asia. Research completed in late 1977 shows a total of four hundred Latin American mission sending agencies and approximately four thousand missionaries.

In recent years Roman Catholics have intensified the promotion of missionary vocations through Missionary Congresses that meet every other year. This has been coordinated by DEMIS, the Missions Department of the Conference of Latin American Bishops (CELAM). Among Catholic missiologists there is concern because while almost 50 percent of the Catholics of the world live in Latin America, only 2 percent of their total missionary force comes from that region. The Comboni order from Italy has been the most active in missionary education and promotion. Some of the problems of channeling missionary fervor into action that Protestants face are solved among Catholics through the traditional missionary orders such as Jesuits, Franciscans, and Dominicans. These are truly international in membership, leadership, and fund raising, and facilitate the inclusion of Latin Americans in their ranks, in order to do missionary work in other parts of the world.

Latin American New Religious Movements. Across Latin America widely diverse religious groups have proliferated over the past century. In addition to the significant growth of evangelical and Pentecostal forms of Christianity, there has also been substantial non-Christian or syncretistic religious renewal in three forms: (1) the resurgence in popularity of indigenous religions, (2) the incursion of North American cults into Latin contexts (e.g., MORMONS and JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES), and (3) the rise of syncretistic spiritualist groups. It is the final form which is most important in terms of NEW RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS in Latin America, encompassing the greatest number of people and ranging from Afro-Cuban Abakua and Santería to Brazilian KARDECISM and Umbanda. There are parallel movements in the Caribbean such as Trinidadian Shango, Haitian Voodoo (or vodun), and Jamaican Rastafarianism (see CARIBBEAN NEW RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS). Typical of each is the amalgamation of beliefs and practices from indigenous American, African, and European spiritistic belief systems.

The African Influence. Though pervasive among the spiritistic groups, in many cases the African influence on Latin American religion is subtle and African rites and symbols are usually combined with other belief systems. The disruption brought about by the slave trade, the trauma of abuse, and the lack of written religious doctrinal systems resulted in many of the African populations dislocated into Latin contexts borrowing from other cultures and adding new religious practices as a means of dealing with their overwhelming and tragic circumstances. So it comes as no surprise that in the new world, both Christian (Protestant and Roman Catholic) and indigenous American religious practices would to varying degrees be amalgamated with their own, seen in such systems as Kardecism and Santería and the pervasiveness of mediums, shamans, and priests across the various groups.

On a country by country basis, by far the greatest impact of African religion is found in Brazil. The earliest Afro-Brazilian movements to be identified were the Candomblé in the northeast and the Macumba in the southeast. More recently groups known as Xangó, Tambor de Mina, and Nagó in the northeast, and Pajelança, Catimbó, and Batuque in the northeastern and central regions have been described. All exhibit particular cultural traditions which indicate that they started with African slaves brought into local settings. Details of the origin and development of the Afro derived groups are typically scarce but they have some elements in common. Cultic rituals are performed at centers named after West African deities. There is typically a hierarchical structure with an “overseer” who has authority over the others. mediums consecrated to the deities offer assistance to those who need help from the deity. This help sometimes involves POSSESSION PHENOMENA and rituals. Finally, animal sacrifices are performed in some of the groups.

Examples of Significant Spiritistic Movements. While a large number of the newer spiritistic religious movements exist in Latin America, four may be noted as examples: Abakua, Santería, Candomblé, and Umbanda (the latter two under the umbrella term Macumba). In most of these groups the members consider themselves Christians. Their syncretistic approach allows them to keep their feet planted in two worlds: Christian teachings meet their ultimate concerns, while spiritistic practices are geared to meet the daily realities of life (both achieving success and warding off disasters).

Abakua is one of four main African-derived Cuban movements (others are Santería, Mayombe, and Regla de Arara). It originated in 1834 and is named after its founder. Adherents follow patterns of secret societies, with two main branches (one of which excludes Caucasians from membership). Elements derived from Yoruban tradition include possession dances; Christian elements include crucifixes and pictures of Christ and Mary. Abakua influence has spread through Cuban emigration to Miami and New York City. Santería (or Lucumí) originated in Cuba and has spread widely among Hispanic populations in Miami, New York, and Los Angeles. It is yet another example of the blend of Christianity and West African religions, along with recognition of a supreme being which embraces belief in a multitude of lower saints or spirits who interact with humans. Santería is well known for its emphasis on magic. Rhythmic drumming, possession phenomena, divination, and animal sacrifices characterize the religious ceremonies.

Macumba is a cover term used for two Brazilian spiritistic movements, Candomblé and Umbanda. Both can trace their origin from African slaves brought into Brazil in the 1550s. Candomblé is the largest of the Macumba cults, a secretive combination of Yoruban religious tradition, Roman Catholicism, and European culture. Patterned in fashion similar to many Latin American movements, Candomblé includes lengthy initiation rites involving animal sacrifice, possession phenomena, and appeals to the spirits (orixa) for protection and retribution against one’s enemies. It is especially prominent in the Brazilian state of Bahia.

Umbanda is the most widespread form of spiritism and has its largest membership in Brazil. It arose in Rio de Janeiro in the 1920s and spread quickly throughout the country. There is no official organization to join and most Umbandists consider themselves members of the Roman Catholic Church in good standing. Catholic saints are given the names of African deities so an outsider cannot know if an adherent is praying to the saint or the African deity. The movement is actively opposed by the Church.

Missiological Implications. Since many of the followers of Latin American spiritistic religious movements consider themselves Christians, reaching them for Christ is a complex process. Helping them see the implications of Christ’s lordship over the spirit realm and finding new ways to deal with oppressive circumstances in life is difficult at best, and simplistic solutions which deny the power of their spiritistic practices will only continue to keep such practices underground. The sensitive missionary will work to understand the role of the spiritistic practices in meeting the social, physical, emotional, and religious needs of the adherents. As a result, he or she will attend not only to issues of ulti- macy but also to the pragmatic issues of daily living in helping believers engage Christ’s power over all areas of life.

Latourette, Kenneth Scott (1884–1968). American church historian of global Christianity and missionary to China. Born in Oregon City, Oregon, Latourette received his B.A. and Ph.D. from Yale University. While at Yale he joined the Student Volunteer Movement and the Yale Mission, to which he committed himself for missionary service in China. He served in China from 1910 until 1912, at which time he was invalided home. After teaching at Reed College and Denison College, Latourette returned to Yale in 1921, succeeding H. P. Beach as the D. Willis James Professor of Missions. He served Yale over the next thirty-two years, retiring in 1953.

Among his many professional activities Latourette served as president of the American Society of Church History, the American Historical Association, the American Baptist Convention, and the Association for Asian Studies. Additionally, he was an active participant in ecumenical affairs.

Latourette’s greatest legacy was a single idea, controversial at the time, that Christianity was a multicultural global movement continuing to grow and expand in the midst of the secularism of the modern world. Latourette was a pioneer of a truly global approach to church history. He sought to develop his ideas in a series of publications. His three hundred articles and thirty books, including two multivolume histories, established Latourette as one of the most prolific church and mission historians of the twentieth century.

Laubach, Frank Charles (1884–1970). American literacy pioneer and missionary to the Philippines. Born on September 2, 1884, in Benton, Pennsylvania, Laubach was baptized as a Methodist at age ten. He was educated at Princeton University and Union Theological Seminary, and in 1915 graduated from Columbia University with a Ph.D. in sociology. Ordained as a Congregationalist minister, Laubach then served as a missionary to the Philippines from 1915 to 1931. In 1929 he experienced a spiritual commitment which led to a keen interest in evangelizing the Islamic Moro people of Mindanao.

Laubach is best known for his pioneering work in literacy, which involves a technique he developed while working among the Moros in 1930. The Laubach literacy method uses simple illustrated charts that associate sounds with phonetic symbols, primers to encourage facility in reading, and an “each one teach one” approach to develop indigenous instructors. During the remainder of his life, Laubach made yearly tours that eventually provided literate materials for 235 languages in over one hundred countries. He established a nonprofit organization, Laubach Literacy, Inc., and authored thirty-five books. Throughout his career, Laubach continued to focus on literacy as a means for evangelism among the vast number of illiterates, whom he termed “the silent billion.”

Lausanne Congress II on World Evangelization (Manila, 1989). Three thousand five hundred and eighty-six church and mission leaders from 190 countries gathered in Manila, the Philippines, in July 1989, for Lausanne II, the second International Congress on World Evangelization convened by the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization. Compared to Lausanne I, participants at Manila tended to be younger (over half were under forty-five years of age) and included more women (25 percent). For most participants, it was their first international congress.

However, many of the fundamental issues discussed at Lausanne I were also discussed at Lausanne II. For example, reaching the poor; internationalization of cross-cultural ministries; universalism in a pluralistic society; the nature of the gospel and social concern.

Lausanne II was strongly influenced by politics in China and Russia in ways that were not present at Lausanne I. Seventy Russians and other leaders from Central Europe were full of optimism about the work of the gospel in their countries. On the other hand, the Chinese delegates were represented by a section of empty chairs. At the last minute, China had refused papers for 300 pastors to visit Manila. Lausanne II produced a declaration on the “Beijing Massacre.”

Another strong emphasis at Lausanne II was the presence of the “AD 2000 Movement,” leaders of which predicted that 50 national “AD 2000 Plans” would emerge from the congress, and 100 such plans by 1995. At the same time, congress participants discussed the hurdles standing in the way of world evangelization: lack of workers, lack of prayer, government pressures, war, suffering, poverty, traditional religions, illiteracy, and animism.

There were 53 major speeches and 450 workshops on the program, plus countless video presentations. In addition to plenary sessions, there were 90 special interest tracks, plus country and regional meetings. Participants were asked to sign “The Manila Manifesto” at the conclusion of the congress. This document largely reflected the earlier Lausanne I document, “The Lausanne Covenant.”

Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization (1974). The First International Congress on World Evangelization convened in Lausanne, Switzerland, in July 1974. For ten days, 2,430 participants and 570 observers from 150 countries studied, discussed, and fellowshipped around the church’s evangelistic and missionary mandate. Invitations were extended on the basis of seven for every one million Protestants in the country, plus two for every ten million unreached people in the country. For example, India received seventy invitations in the first category and 150 in the second. The United States had by far the largest representation (more than 500), plus innumerable American missionaries representing countries where they worked.

The Congress Convoking Committee included 168 men and 5 women from 70 countries. Each country had its own national advisory committee to select participants. They were approved by the Congress Planning Committee, made up of 28 men and one woman from 17 countries (10 of them from the U.S.). Officially invited visitors in-

Lausanne Movement. The Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization (LCWE) was organized following the LAUSANNE CONGRESS ON WORLD EVANGELIZATION in Lausanne, Switzerland, in 1974. It is an international movement committed to encouraging Christians and churches everywhere to pray, study, plan, and work together for the evangelization of the world.

The congress in Lausanne was called by American evangelist BILLY GRAHAM. Some 2,300 Christian leaders from 150 nations, representing a wide cross-section of denominational affiliations, attended the congress. The congress produced an influential document, “The Lausanne Covenant,” and authorized the Lausanne Continuation Committee to continue the work begun at the congress. This committee became the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization. Subsequently, LCWE convened another consultation in Pattaya, Thailand, in 1980, and held “Lausanne II” in Manila in 1989.

LCWE believes that: (1) cooperation and sharing are better than competition; (2) the whole gospel includes demonstration by deeds as well as proclamation by words; (3) biblical theology and mission strategy must be consistent; (4) its own neutrality creates space for all evangelicals to work together, regardless of their church or faith tradition.

LCWE is a volunteer network of individuals and groups that affirm “The Lausanne Covenant,” and are committed to support the work of world evangelization, wherever it is done in a way that is true to the Bible. Its network includes some thirty committees in different countries and regions of the world. It is supported financially by people in its network, and by the gifts of those who believe in its work.

LCWE organizes small international consultations on subjects that are critical to completing the task of world evangelization. More than thirty such consultations have brought together key people to achieve an approach that is both biblical and strategic. More than fifty regional, national, and international conferences have been held in response to expressed needs.

Publications have included a number of papers and books on subjects pertinent to world evangelization, as well as a quarterly magazine, World Evangelization (now discontinued), which includes news and analyses of current issues arising for those who want to make Christ known to the world. Making Christ Known, Historic Mission Documents from the Lausanne Movement, 1974–1989, edited by John Stott, was published in 1997.

More recently, LCWE sees itself as the “Barnabas factor” in the church. As such, it encourages churches to (1) trust new and younger leaders; (2) undertake work among people different from themselves; and (3) stay with people who have different ideas until they find each other in a new way.

The long-term staying factor in the movement has been “The Lausanne Covenant.” It has been translated into more than twenty languages. It has been adopted by hundreds of churches and parachurch agencies as their basis of operations and cooperation. It has led to the formation of a number of national and regional movements in Europe, Asia, Australia, Africa, North America, and Latin America. It has stimulated many cooperative movements, mostly ad hoc, short-term, and noncompetitive. It has spun off related movements such as the Lausanne Consultation on Jewish Evangelism and the Chinese Coordinating Committee for World Evangelization. It has been the basis for a variety of consultations,
Lausanne Movement

the findings of which have been published as “Lausanne Occasional Papers.”

The issues addressed by the covenant in 1974 are still very much alive in the world of church and missions at the end of the century. For example: (1) the relationship of evangelism and social concern; (2) unity, diversity, and cooperation among Christians; (3) the uniqueness of Christ; (4) the validity of missions; (5) the work of the Holy Spirit in evangelism; (6) religious liberty and human rights; (7) the relationship of the gospel to culture.

LCWE’s organizational structure is made up of what it calls “the current partners of the Lausanne Movement.” This international grassroots committee includes members from Argentina, Asia, Australia, Bulgaria, Canada, Denmark, England, Estonia, Europe, Finland, France, Germany, Italy, Kenya, Korea, the Netherlands, Nigeria, Norway, Scotland, Spain, Sweden, the United States, and Wales.

International structures include the Chinese Coordinating Committee for World Evangelization, the Health and Healing Network, the Jewish Committee, and the Tentmakers Exchange. Special interest members include the Intercession Working group, the Theology and Strategy Working Group, and groups focusing on disabled people, women, strategic evangelism partnerships, research, tentmakers, and information technology (www.lausanne.org).

Lavigerie, Charles Martial Allemand (1825–92). French cardinal, founder of the White Fathers, and missionary to Africa. Lavigerie was ordained as a priest in 1849 and took two doctorates (1850 and 1853) before teaching at the Sorbonne. While there he also accepted the direction of the Oeuvre des Ecoles d’Orient. His travels in that capacity providing disaster relief in Lebanon and Syria in 1860 solidified in him a heart for missionary work. On November 11, 1866, while serving as bishop of Nancy, Lavigerie dreamed he was in a strange land with dark-skinned people speaking a language he did not understand. One week later he received a request to allow his name to be submitted for the vacant archbishopric of Algiers. He agreed, was appointed to the post, and installed in 1867. Immediately he instituted a policy of the regeneration of Africa by Africans. His African work was characterized by vision, energy, and drive. In 1868 he founded the White Fathers and in 1869 the Missionary Sisters of Our Lady of Africa as missionary societies to carry out his African vision. He was elevated to the position of cardinal in 1882, and given the title archbishop of Carthage and primate of Africa in 1884. In this capacity he waged a vigorous international campaign against slavery until his death on November 26, 1892.

Law, Legal Thought. If we think of law broadly as those binding expectations or rules which govern behavior within a particular society, then it is clear that every society has some notion of law. Without it society could not exist. Such regulations might be explicit and codified in written form, as in many Western societies, or they might be implicit and passed on as oral tradition, as in many non-Western societies.

Further cultural differences concern the understanding of the nature of law itself. As in many Western societies, law might be regarded as an expression of an objective, universal norm which applies to everyone, including all government officials (e.g., even the king was subject to the Persian law in Esther 8:8). In many non-Western cultures the law is understood in less objectivist ways, so that the law becomes a tool which the ruler can use and manipulate to enforce his or her will upon the people.

Not only must the missionary understand how moral and legal norms are understood and enforced within a particular culture, but he or she must also understand the biblical-theological concepts associated with law. Many terms with strong legal implications are used in Scripture—covenant, law, testament, sin, redemption, reconciliation, atonement, righteousness, judge, court, engagement, marriage, adoption, succession, endorsement, and doctrines in Western theology have been influenced by Roman jurisprudence. Thus some understanding of the ideals of Roman jurisprudence is necessary for grasping biblical theology.

Problems of understanding can arise when biblical concepts are communicated in cultures which lack the basic assumptions behind certain biblical terms. For example, the biblical notion of “covenant” is problematic in some Asian Buddhist cultures, in which love is understood in terms of a warm but quite ambiguous relationship. The covenant of salvation may be misunderstood in terms of the religious commandments of Buddhism, and the love of God may be thought of as a kind of Buddhist magnanimity or benevolence. Similar problems attend the judicial elements of the concepts of sin and salvation.

It is important that as part of their cross-cultural preparation missionaries include the study of comparative law and legal thought. Based upon this, and with a good understanding of biblical teachings, missionaries can explore creative ways of communicating the truth about God’s law in particular cultural contexts.

KUNIO SAKURAI
Leadership

The history of Christian missions is replete with examples of key people appointed by God to carry the gospel to the unreached. It is natural to look for these people in any given period and to consider their leadership as normative. However, the study of leadership in missions has revealed a number of patterns of leadership that go beyond the role of an individual person or group. Leadership is a process in which leaders influence followers in given contexts to achieve the purposes to which they were called. The unique aspect of leadership and mission is the nature of their interaction under the guidance of the Holy Spirit in understanding and obedience to the Missio Dei.

History. Beginning with the apostolic leadership at Pentecost (Acts 2), God has raised up people to lead his work “to the ends of the earth” (Acts 1:8). With authority delegated by the Lord Jesus Christ (Matt. 28:18), the first missions were loosely organized bands, both apostolic and lay, driven by a deep commitment to Jesus and a lifestyle that stood in contrast to the decaying culture around them. Although there are notable examples of individual leaders, no formal leadership structures existed apart from those of the growing church.

With the emergence of monasticism (see Monastic Movement) in the fourth century, the majority of missionaries came from the ranks of devout monastics following the patterns of leadership established in the monasteries. Characteristic of these missionaries was their strict vows and obedience, which spread by establishing new monasteries, the dominant form of missions through the seventeenth century. By the eighteenth century, the Protestant Reformation had given birth to new patterns of leadership in mission, including a return to an emphasis on the role of laity. Four major types of leadership characterized the emerging Protestant missions:

Lawes, William George (1839–1907). English pioneer missionary to Niue and Papua New Guinea. Born in Aldermaston, Berkshire, England, Lawes attended a village school. After studies at Bedford College he was ordained a Congregational minister in 1860. He married Fanny Wickham in 1860 and in 1861 they went to Niue, where he developed centralized political structures, started a training institution, and contributed to the translation of the New Testament. He was joined in 1868 by his brother Frank, who worked at Niue until 1910. After furlough (1872–74), Lawes went to Port Moresby in Papua, where he was the first European resident missionary on the mainland. He worked closely with his colleague and friend James Chalmers in extending the mission, although teaching and translation increasingly occupied him. In 1882 he began training Papuans as teachers and in 1894 established the Vatorata Training College. An able linguist, he championed the use of the Motu language and completed the translation of the New Testament. He was joined in 1890. He opposed colonization and reluctantly assisted the British annexation in order to protect Papuans against exploitation. Glasgow University awarded him an honorary D.D. in 1895 and he was a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society. He retired to Australia in 1906.

Allan K. Davidson

Lawes, Robert (1851–1934). Scottish missionary to Malawi. Born in Aberdeen and apprenticed to his cabinetmaker father; his aim to follow in David Livingstone’s footsteps led to successful study in arts, theology, and medicine, and ordination in the United Presbyterian Church. Ordained in 1875, he joined a mission to Central Africa in an area later known as Livingstonia, and began work near remote Lake Nyasa. Lawes was woodcutter, physician, builder, stoker on the mission boat, and peacemaker. He founded mission stations at strategic lakeside and interior sites, and (a strong advocate of education) opened his first school in 1876; by the time he left Africa (1927), there were over seven hundred primary schools plus facilities for further education in theology, medicine, agriculture, and technical subjects—and a Christian community of sixty thousand with thirteen ordained African pastors.

Finding that traders and tribal chiefs did a thriving business in which guns and gunpowder were exchanged for elephant tusks and human bodies (“black and white ivory”), Lawes used Livingstone’s remedy: development of healthy trade. Scottish supporters of the mission formed the Central African Trading Company, which began operations in the region in 1878.

Laws’ educational, humanitarian, and (later) political contributions were many, but he never lost sight of his main task. He came to see that if Africa were to be won for Christ it would be won by the Africans themselves. By 1897 huge congregations gathered once or twice a year for four or five days to hear the gospel.

Laws visited North America, Germany, and Nigeria, was United Free Church moderator in 1908, and (so highly was he regarded) served on the legislative assembly of Nyasaland (now Malawi).

Leadership

(1) the educated and ordained clergy of the major Protestant church traditions, such as Episcopal, Presbyterian, and Congregational; (2) the eldership or council rule of the pietists and Anabaptists; (3) the new leadership models of the renewal movements such as the Methodists, Baptists, and various independent groups; and (4) visionary individuals whose commitment to the task and charismatic personalities drew others to follow.

The fourth type of leadership often led to another Protestant innovation, the interdenominational missionary society. During the so-called Great Century of Mission (1792–1914), there was an explosion of voluntary societies that brought together both clergy and laity. The dominant leadership characteristic of the new societies was the pragmatic concern for the spread of the gospel, which stood in contrast to the carefully defined roles of traditional church structures. As the movement grew and new societies emerged, the influential leadership positions were filled by clergy and lay leaders who had previously held no significant positions in their churches. These voluntary societies also set themselves apart from the church structures by the appointment of leaders from specialized fields, such as medicine, or individuals whose strong commitment to the cause distinguished them as proponents. Another departure from the church structures was the openness to women in positions of leadership.

Mission leadership continued to change and adapt during the twentieth century as the end of the colonial era spread. The success of interdenominational missions in the establishment of churches and ministries, particularly in the Southern Hemisphere, created a multiplicity of national church and parachurch leadership roles. Leadership began to transition from the hands of expatriate missionaries to those of the national leaders, leading to an era of integration and nationalization. The shift in the roles of the field councils and field leaders, while often difficult, resulted in the emergence of partnerships between national church leaders and mission liaison officers. A similar trend toward nationalization was widespread among parachurch ministries, often leading to increased pressure to recruit leadership from within the national church structures. Finally, denominational and renewal movements have also flourished and moved toward nationalization following the same patterns as their mission counterparts. The result of this shift has been a major focus on global leadership development at the end of the twentieth century.

Mission and Church Leadership. Critical issues emerged as the four major types of missions began to plant churches, especially for the interdenominational societies. The first was the nature of leadership in the church. Denominational missions planted churches based on their home countries, providing both structure and models for leadership. The movement toward seminaries and the recruitment of faculty ensured a direct correspondence with the theological distinctives of the denomination. The second group, those whose polity was based on eldership, were in many ways able to include growing Christian leaders in their fellowships based on a mentoring model supplemented by Bible schools. Their commitment to community gave a rationale for training that included both practical and theological aspects. The groups that emerged from the revivals, such as the Methodists, began with a direct correlation to the selection and training of leadership that grew out of their movements. The churches planted by the interdenominational societies have a variety of leadership models based on both denominational and indigenous traditions. A wide variety of selection and training models have been used; however, Bible schools that served the missions became major contributors to leadership development.

Churches that grow out of mission societies struggle with the issues of culture and leadership. The more individualistic missionaries tend toward the selection and training of individuals to fill the roles. By initially working under the direction of the missionary, in either practical or church-related work, the local leader is then educated through mission schools and Bible colleges (see Theological Education in Non-Western Contexts). Due to the affiliation with the expatriate missionary, the ascribed status of the national pastor is often a new form within the culture. The issues of power and function become significant in the growing role of church leadership. Often misunderstandings arise between the local community and the mission and church, based on the lack of credible models within the culture coupled with the external resources provided by the missions. Unwittingly, missions create a powerful new model for leadership, which becomes a much-sought-after role. The irony is that among interdenominational missions particularly, the lay people who brought the gospel end up creating a clergy-dominated church, struggling with the role of the laity.

A concomitant to the issue of culture is the emergence of indigenous forms and functions of church leadership. Collectivist societies have a more contextualized form of leadership involved in all aspects of life. One result of this view of leadership is the involvement of clergy in politics, even to the point of holding elected offices and engaging in business. As churches grow and continue to influence society, leadership either takes on new areas of influence or becomes increasingly irrelevant within the context.

As national churches have worked through the issues of independence and interdependence, a growing realization of the responsibility for world mission has impacted them. Not only have non-Western churches taken the responsibility for selection and training of church workers, but also a growing number have assumed the role of missionary sending churches. The missions vary in leadership approaches, although the movements are often tied to renewal within the church, making the dominant model that of visionary leaders.

Contemporary Issues. The central concern of mission leadership has always been the ability to prayerfully understand and obey the mission of God. It is not surprising that this essentially theological task is at times pressured by the complexities of managing the multicultural organizations that have emerged. The pragmatic concern for the spread of the gospel that led to the creation of mission societies continues to be the dominant characteristic of mission leadership. This raises some of the greatest opportunities and challenges today, especially in the relationships between missions and churches.

It was inevitable that the growth of mission societies would lead to increasing pressures on leadership, both internally and externally. Internal concerns focus primarily on the recruitment, preparation, support, supervision, and care of missionaries. As missions have grown numerically, their structures diversify to cope with the range of issues, establishing a need for expertise in each of these primary areas. In tension with these internal issues are the external concerns of building and maintaining a supportive constituency, locating and establishing ministry with all the concomitant relational and resource issues, and developing strategies appropriate to the political, social, cultural, and spiritual context. A necessary characteristic of mission leadership continues to be the ability to assess the changing world situation and move toward the future while retaining the unique vision God has given.

As the complexities of missions have grown so has the range of solutions, to the point where new specialized roles and organizations have emerged to cover many of these challenges. The development of leadership to meet the increasing demands, including selection and training, remains a major challenge for missions. Despite the changing times, the need for spiritual leaders remains the same throughout the ages. It is the duty of those in authority to identify people for positions of leadership who have been prepared by God to influence missions with all their complexities, toward the purposes of God. A study of the patterns by which leadership emerges reveals three essential areas of development: the spiritual formation of the individual (see Spiritual Formation), the formation of knowledge through the education process, and the formation of necessary skills through experiential learning. Both formal and nonformal programs to address these areas proliferated at the end of the twentieth century. Perhaps the most encouraging development has been the rediscovery of the role of mentoring in the development of leadership, a realization with antecedents in the early monastic period.

As has been the case in every major epoch of missions history, the need for innovative leadership is vital. A theologically appropriate response to the challenges of diverse colleagues, constituencies, and contexts remains the task of leadership and missions at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

See also Leadership Theory.

Leadership Theory. Leadership poses a central issue for mission because a primary focus of the Missio Dei is influencing people to submit to the lordship of Christ. Leadership is primarily an influence process. Clinton expands on this: "Leadership is a dynamic process over an extended period of time, in various situations in which a leader utilizing leadership resources, and by specific leader behaviors, influences the thoughts and activity of followers, toward accomplishment of person/task aims, mutually beneficial for leaders, followers and the macro context of which they are a part" (Clinton, 25).

In a multi- or cross-cultural context two additional sets of variables arise, such as Worldview (of the leader, followers, and the community) and the interaction of key leadership variables (e.g., the leader, followers, situation, kinds and uses of power and values).

Christian leadership shares much with local secular leadership in terms of cultural values and patterns. However, it clearly differs from secular, business, or political leadership in terms of its biblical value base, the use of spiritual power, accountability to Christ, and goal in the missio dei.

An understanding of leadership serves several key functions. It at least provides a way to explain the influence process; a way to predict what is likely to occur; a basis for action; and the foundation for the means to develop more leaders.
Leadership Theory

Western leadership theories are useful in mission. However, as with all culturally based theories, any leadership theory may have a limited usefulness because the undergirding values, assumptions, and worldview may not be appropriate either biblically or contextually. Theories based on Western conceptions of motivation and aimed at capitalistic production may not fit in more communally oriented non-Western ministry settings. Many Western theories depend on perspectives that do not include issues of spiritual power or differences in worldview.

However, at least four different theoretical approaches may help improve patterned leadership behaviors (leadership styles): (1) leadership perspectives from the traditions built on the Ohio State University research around a leadership grid (e.g., Hersey and Blanchard, Management of Organizational Behavior); (2) personality profiling using insights from psychology (e.g., the Meyers-Briggs Test and the Personality Profiles test commonly known as the DISC test; see Voges and Braund); (3) using metaphors to describe patterned leadership behavior (e.g., Bennett, Metaphors for Ministry); and (4) using values as the key guides or constraints for leadership behavior.

Each perspective provides a different view of basic leadership functions such as envisioning, motivating, coordinating, decision making, problem solving, task structuring, encouraging, and other leadership functions.

Western leadership theory has been undergoing continuous development through the last two centuries. Through the nineteenth century the “Great Man” theories emerged in which leaders were thought to be “born to be leaders” or “emerge out of the demands of the social context.” However, through the twentieth century attention to traits, leadership behavior, interaction with followers, other leadership functions.

Christian leaders involved in mission should be especially careful not to naively adopt local non-Western indigenous models of leadership or management. As with Western models they typically contain assumptions which may run counter to biblical values. However, the local leadership perspectives should serve to inform the development of contextually appropriate Christian leadership patterns.

Learning Theories. Among the many learning theories that have been developed by psychologists and educators, three stand out as particularly relevant to missiologists and intercultural educators: those related to adult learning, cognitive styles, and moral development. This article deals with the first two.

Adult Learning Theories. Carl Rogers (1969), Malcolm Knowles (1980), and Paulo Freire (1981) have developed interrelated theories of adult learning. Rogers focused on learning in which the whole person in both his feeling and cognitive aspects [is involved] in the learning event. It is self-initiated. It is pervasive. It is evaluated by the learner. He knows whether it is meeting his need, whether it leads toward what he wants to know, whether it illuminates the dark area of ignorance he is experiencing (p. 5).

Later Rogers (pp. 188–202) applied these principles in a concrete teaching situation by describing “a revolutionary program for graduate education.” Students are selected because of their problem-solving ability, empathy, spontaneous curiosity, and originality. After being introduced to the institution’s resources, they choose a sponsor and additional faculty members to consult with them regarding their work. Though most of their activity is carried on through independent study, they are able to join student/faculty encounter groups. As the program progresses, students submit cumulative evidence that they are competent and well informed in their fields. Finally, a decision regarding fitness to receive a doctoral degree is made by a committee of scholars and professionals from inside and outside the university. Although Rogers’ illustration focuses on advanced graduate study, he believes his learning principles are applicable to other levels and contexts as well.

Malcolm Knowles developed an “andragogical” approach to learning in which adults have a felt need to learn. Trusting and free environment is created, and progress toward mutual goals is made as learners actively share their discoveries and life experiences (pp. 57, 58). These conditions of learning are created through successive planning and decision making phases: (1) the establishment of a climate conductive to adult learning; (2) the creation of an organizational structure for participative planning; (3) the diagnosis of needs for learning; (4) the formulation of directions of learning objectives; (5) the development of a design of activities; (6) the operation of the activities; (7) the rediagnosis of needs for learning (evaluation) (p. 59).

Brazilian educator Paulo Freire (1971) adds a communal and societal dimension to adult education. He sees learning as a process of “conscientization” that frees persons to reflect on their cultural situation and engage in social action to transform it. Freire describes this kind of education in a letter to coordinators of community study groups (cultural circles) in Chile:

A cultural circle is not a school, in the traditional sense. In most schools, the teacher, convinced of his wisdom, which he considers absolute, gives classes to pupils, passive and docile, whose ignorance he also considers absolute.

A cultural circle is a live and creative dialogue in which everyone knows some things, and does not know others; in which all seek, together, to know more (p. 61).

When self-actualizing, andragogical, and conscientizing principles of adult learning are transformed into action, they can contribute to both methodological and structural renewal of the programs and institutions in which they minister. This makes them especially applicable in missions contexts where a primary agenda is individual and social change.

Cognitive Style Theories. Differences in thinking and learning styles have been observed both within and across cultures. Some persons have a greater tendency toward global, intuitive, and visual thinking. Others prefer linear, analytic, and verbal modes.

These contrasts extend across centuries and across disciplinary boundaries. Some biblical scholars see cognitive style contrasts in Hebrew and Greek thought. Contemporary neurophysiologists have observed specialized functions of the right and left hemispheres of the brain. Thought patterns of left-brain dominant persons tend to be verbal and structured, while those with right-brain dominance are likely to be visual and fluid. Learning theorists such as David Kolb (1984) see learning styles ‘not as fixed personality traits but as possibility-processing structures resulting from unique individual programming of the basic but flexible structures of human learning’ (pp. 95–97). H. A. Witkin and other cross-cultural researchers attribute cognitive style differences to factors in the physical and social environment such as childrearing practices and demands for sensitivity to visual or kinesic cues (see Bowen and Bowen).

Concerns about thinking styles overflow into broader considerations of cognition and culture. Edward T. Hall contrasts monochronic cultures, characterized by linear thought patterns and doing one thing at a time, with polychronic cultures, where thought patterns are holistic and people attempt to do several things at once (see Dodd, 87–89). Hall also describes differences between high-context cultures, in which procedures and rules are made explicit, and low-context cultures, in which persons expect to be told what to do in a given situation (see Dodd, 89–92). Paul G. Hiebert (pp. 107–36) links thinking styles to WORLDVIEW differences in his contrasts between American and Indian cultures in relation to “bounded” set and “fuzzy” set categories.

Peter Chang applies cognitive style theories to missiological issues. He challenges the imposition of Western, linear thought patterns in non-Western contexts. He asks whether the observation/interpretation/application cycle of inductive Bible study and grammatical-historical exegesis, with their embodiment of Western scientific principles, are the only valid approach to achieving biblical understanding. He also questions whether abstract, technical, and depersonalized theologies add to the understanding of the Bible stories from which they are distilled.

Chang sees implications in learning style theories for theological education. Typically, theological schools are compartmentalized into Old Testament, New Testament, theology, and practical theology departments, where courses are taught by disciplinary specialists. These persons are not always qualified to prepare the general practitioners needed in ministry. Chang also observes contrasts between American and Chinese sermon organization along linear and nonlinear dimensions: American sermons are like steak, potatoes, and peas served in separate piles on a plate; Chinese sermons are like chop suey, with everything mixed together. Chang concludes, “Our exegesis, theology and theological education are reflecting the . . . dominance of [the] left hemisphere [of the brain]. It is high time that we should appreciate and exercise more non-linear thinking to upset the lopsidedness and work out a more balanced approach” (p. 286).

Lebanon

Lebanon (Est. 2000 pop.: 3,289,000; 10,400 sq. km. [4,015 sq. mi.]). Lebanon is a war-torn country in the Middle East. While Lebanon (4,015 sq. mi.) borders Israel to the south and the Mediterranean Sea to the west, it is truly engulfed by Syria. Not only surrounded by Syria geographically to the north and east, this tiny country is also dominated by Syria’s military presence.

Historically the church has been present in Lebanon since the first century. A wide variety of Christians are found in Lebanon, including six types of Catholics, the Orthodox, the Nestorian, and various Protestant denominations. Since civil war broke out in 1975, almost one-third of the population has been lost either through death or emigration, the latter composed primarily of...
Lebanon

Christians. As a result, the country’s former majority of Christians has now become a minority to the Muslim population.

Protestant work began in Lebanon in 1823 under the leadership of Pliny Fisk, who was sent out by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM). Today the work is carried out by many Protestant bodies, including Adventists, Armenians, Baptists, Christian and Missionary Alliance, and various Pentecostal groups.

Lebanon maintains freedom of religion and is a sending point for mission organizations into other Middle Eastern countries. This once diverse and tolerant nation is now a land of division and intolerance, facing an uncertain future in light of a violent past.

Lee, Calvin (1897–1987). Chinese church planter and orphanage founder. Born in a village outside Guangzhou, China, he accepted Christ as a teenager in high school. From there he studied at Lingnam University in Guangzhou, and later graduated from Wheaton College. He also attended Princeton Seminary, majoring in biblical languages. He then served the Chinese church, teaching at the Bible Institute of Changsha, the Alliance Bible Institute in Wuzhou, and the Canton Bible Institute in Guangzhou. As pastor of the Wanshan Church in Guangzhou, he established both an elementary school and a high school, from which a significant number eventually entered the ministry. During the Japanese occupation in World War II, seeing the suffering of the homeless youth, Lee established the Morning Star Orphanage, meeting the needs of over five hundred.

With the fall of China to the Communists in 1949, Lee resided in Hong Kong as writer and editor of the Life Bimonthly magazine, as well as planting four churches in Kowloon and Hong Kong. Lee’s mission focus was demonstrated in teaching, writing, and establishing schools and churches. His holistic commitment and breadth was amply demonstrated by his arduous efforts in ministering to the homeless, the discouraged, and the sick. His vision, concern, and relating of theology with praxis are the lasting highlights of his life and ministry.

Legge, James (1815–97). Scottish missionary to China. He was a second-generation Chinese missionary in Malacca (1839–43), Hong Kong, and Guangdong province, China (1843–73). Legge entered Highbury College in England to prepare for a Chinese missionary career. Soon after marrying Mary Isabella Legge (1817–52), they left London in early 1839 to work at the London Missionary Society’s Anglo-Chinese College (1818–56). There Legge became intimately familiar with the Chinese classical traditions, resulting in the publication of The Chinese Classics (1861–73) at the mission press in Hong Kong. This monumental work included lengthy prolegomena reflections on comparative religion, ethics, and philosophy as well as Christian apologetic evaluations of Confucian traditions. Later made the first university professor of Chinese at Oxford (1876–97), Legge produced six other volumes of Confucian and Taoist texts (1879–91) for F. Max Muller’s larger Sacred Books of the East series.

Legge’s approaches to Chinese translation and missionary strategy anticipate culturally sensitive methods, but it was derided as accommodating to non-Christian culture. “Leggism” consequently became a standard nineteenth-century term in Chinese missionary literature for missionary strategies seeking religious and cultural bridges within Chinese literature. A missionary agitator against the sale of opium and British militarism in China, Legge also promoted general education for both sexes in Hong Kong and Oxford.

Leprosy Mission Work. Leprosy (Hansen’s disease) affects an estimated 10 to 15 million people worldwide, though the World Health Organization (WHO) reported in 1994 that the numbers of people afflicted with this disease had dwindled to 2.5 million. It occurs mainly in tropical, subtropical, and temperate regions of Southeast Asia, Africa, and South America. Most newly diagnosed victims are recent immigrants from Asia and South America.

The infectious bacilli, Mycobacterium leprae, is of the same family that causes tuberculosis. It is thought to be transmitted by skin-to-skin contact and nasal discharges. Only about 5% of the persons exposed to the bacterium contract the disease, so it is not considered highly contagious.

Two main forms of the disease are known: tuberculoid and lepromatous. The tuberculoid form mainly involves the skin and nerves. The lepromatous form is a more generalized infection that involves skin, mouth, nasal passages, upper respiratory tract, eyes, nerves, adrenal glands, and reproductive organs. Various skin eruptions may cover the entire body, but numbness is more patchy and less severe than in tuberculoid leprosy. In advanced stages, however, lepromatous leprosy can cause ulcers, eyebrow loss, collapse of the nose, enlarged earlobes and facial features, and blindness.

Equally devastating to the person who contracts the disease is the social stigma that accompanies it. Not surprisingly people fear what they cannot control or understand. The practice of isolation was the most convenient way of dealing with leprous people until the mid-twentieth century, though it was also dehumanizing. Jesus’ love for and ministry to people with leprosy is documented in the Bible and illustrates the strongest motivation for helping people with this disease (Luke 17). Organized missionary work among leprous people was motivated by Jesus’ example since the fourth century.

Important missiological issues developed among mission groups in the late 19th and 20th centuries, particularly among Protestant mission organizations. Missionaries, especially in Asia and Africa, witnessed the terrible plight of people afflicted with leprosy and were moved with compassion for them. The “lostness” of their “souls” was of primary importance, so strategies of evangelism developed to win them to Christ and to establish churches. Among the strategies employed was the practice of holding medical clinics to detect and treat the disease. One exemplary issue that arose was whether to hold general meetings for evangelistic purposes first and then conduct medical clinics. Such strategies were efficient for evangelistic purposes but often seen as manipulative or coercive.

It spite of such issues missionary work among people with leprosy continued. Hospitals were built and research conducted in India, Thailand, and Africa. New methods of reconstructive surgery were learned and new and more effective drugs developed. The former social stigma of the disease has become less in developing regions of the world as people have learned more about the disease and have seen that it can be treated and controlled. Governments, observing the selfless work of Christian missionaries, were influenced to change official policies of exclusion and adopt more humane treatment of their own people afflicted with this disease.

Lesotho (Est. 2000 pop.: 2,338,000; 30,355 sq. km. [11,720 sq. mi.]). Lesotho (formerly Basutoland) is a landlocked, mountainous constitutional monarchy entirely surrounded by the Republic of South Africa. Its 2.3 million people include 90 percent Sotho, about 7 percent Zulu and Xhosa, with tiny White and Asian populations. There are two official languages, Sesotho and English. Literacy is nearly 75 percent. The almost total lack of resources and resulting poverty force roughly 60 percent of the men to become migrant laborers in the South African mines, contributing approximately 45 percent of total domestic income.

The great Basotho leader, Moshesh, requested missionaries after his people fled into the Drakensberg Mountains for refuge from the Zulu conqueror, Chaka. The Paris Evangelical Missionary Society responded, beginning work among the Basotho in 1833 at Morija, where a printing press was established in 1841, then a girls’ school, industrial school, and a Bible school by 1880. The Basuthos were receptive to the gospel, assuming responsibility for the churches in 1865 and cooperating effectively in evangelism with the Paris Mission. By 1880, there were nearly 6,000 members. By 1990, the Basotho church sought other unreached areas and began a mission among the Barotse in present-day Zambia. The Lesotho Evangelical Church (a result of the Paris Mission) today includes nearly 30 percent of the population. It is an active member of the All Africa Conference of Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Roman Catholic missionaries came in 1862. Today, Catholics are nearly 45 percent of the total population. The Catholic Church currently emphasizes institutional development, including a political party.

The third largest group is the Church of the Province of South Africa (Anglican) that began work in 1875, today including about 10 percent of the people. African indigenous churches are also about 10 percent and traditional religionists about 2 percent of the population. Methodist, Dutch Reformed, and Pentecostal groups also work in Lesotho.

Missionaries counseled Moshesh to request British protection following conflict in 1858, 1864, and 1867 with white settlers (Afrikaners) moving north. Great Britain granted independence to Lesotho on October 4, 1966.

From the beginning, the Paris Mission stressed indigenous leadership, identifying strongly with the Basotho nation. Preservation of their territory, development of a strong church and educational system, a SoSotho (the language) literature beginning with the Bible and hymnal, and a country that claims 98 percent of its people to be professing Christians, are visible results of Moshesh’s request for missionaries.

Lew, Timothy Tingfang (Liu Tinfang) (1890–1947). Chinese educator and indigenous church leader. Lew was born in Wenchou, China, and attended St. John’s University in Shanghai. Missionaries sponsored him to go to the United States, and he attended the University of Georgia and Columbia University. Upon receiving his Ph.D. in 1920, he returned to China to teach in three universities. Outgoing, Westernized, and energetic, Lew was a leader in the Yenching (University) Christian Fellowship, a group of Chinese church leaders exploring indigenous church life and theology. Lew edited Life Journal for the fellowship (1920–24), and translated many hymns into Chinese. He edited Hymns of Universal Praise (1936), a milestone in Chinese hymnody. His slogan was "catholic appreciation," maintaining numerous contacts in both Christian and secular circles.
Lew, Timothy Tingfang

Samuel Ling

Liberal Theology. In the nineteenth century, some European and American Protestants responded to the intellectual challenges of the Enlightenment, Biblical Criticism, and Darwinism by calling for significant readjustments of traditional Christian doctrines. The resulting liberal paradigm included (1) a stronger emphasis on God's Immanence; (2) a more optimistic assessment of human nature and technology; (3) a greater skepticism about many elements of Christian supernaturalism; (4) a marked propensity to subordinate dogmatic concerns to the pragmatic demands of building the Kingdom of God on earth; and (5) a greater willingness to accommodate the Christian message to modern culture. This new theological agenda sparked intense controversy and sounded alarms about the loss of Christian distinctives. H. Richard Niebuhr eventually challenged the liberal credo by characterizing it as "a God without wrath bringing man without sin to a kingdom without judgment through a Christ without a cross."

By the late nineteenth century, the impact of theological revisionism began to penetrate the missionary enterprise. In particular, a conflict among American Congregationalists concerning the eternal destiny of the unevangelized led some to modify claims about the absoluteness and finality of the Christian faith. A new interest in Comparative Religions, epitomized by the Chicago meeting of the World's Parliament of Religions in 1893, further reinforced this development. In addition, some advocates of a social gospel critiqued the individualistic methods of traditional missiology and urged an approach more in line with liberal concepts of corporate salvation.

William Newton Clarke, professor at Colgate Theological Seminary, was one of the first to articulate an explicitly liberal approach to foreign missions. In A Study of Christian Missions (1900), Clarke sensed a looming crisis in the missionary movement that precluded naive hopes for immediate world evangelization. He still spoke of Christianity displacing other religions, but this was relatively subdued in comparison to his embrace of Darwinism and cultural relativism. For Clarke, General Revelation in nature and history assumed an ascendancy over special revelation through Christ and the Bible.

By the 1920s, the missiological consequences of liberalism became more visible and widespread, especially in American Protestant circles. While theological moderates dominated most denominational mission boards, liberal concepts of mission gained strength in nondenominational agencies like the Student Volunteer Movement and the Young Men's Christian Association. On the theological front, Daniel Johnson Fleming, a missions professor at Union Theological Seminary in New York, advocated a "fulfillment" theory that called on missionaries to adopt a "sharing and listening" strategy toward other religions. Although he recognized the validity of evangelism, Fleming appeared to place a higher priority on the practice of consistent Christian ethics for commending the gospel.

At several points, Fleming anticipated the conclusions of the Laymen's Foreign Missions Inquiry, which investigated the Protestant missionary enterprise in the early 1930s. This project, funded by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., was divided into a team of fact-finders and a Commission of Appraisal under the leadership of Harvard philosopher William Ernest Hocking. The Commission dropped a theological bombshell with the publication of Re-Thinking Missions in 1932. Re-Thinking Missions suggested many practical changes in the field operations of foreign missions, but controversy centered primarily on the first four chapters, which were penned by Hocking. In essence, he proposed a radical restructuring of the missionary enterprise's doctrinal base. A liberal perspective clearly surfaced in his syncretistic outlook on the issue of Christianity and other faiths, his ambiguous Christology, and his reinterpretation of the evangelistic mandate. In short, Hocking and his Commission contended that the aim of missions was "to seek with people of other lands a true knowledge and love of God, expressing in life and word what we have learned through Jesus Christ, and endeavoring to give effect to his spirit in the life of the world."

The liberalism that emanated from the Laymen's Inquiry did not immediately sway the missions movement. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions endorsed many of the Hocking Commission's prescriptions, but most mainline denominational boards joined fundamentalist and evangelical agencies in attacking the theological shortcomings of Re-Thinking Missions. Archibald Baker, of the University of Chicago, and some missionaries enthusiastically supported Hocking's ideology, but they apparently represented a minority viewpoint. In fact, a neo-orthodox surge in Europe produced deep skepticism about Re-Thinking Missions, seen most notably in Hendrik Kraemer’s The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World (1938), which he prepared for the International Missionary Council’s meeting in Tambaram, India, in 1938.

After World War II, the ecumenical missionary movement increasingly manifested the impact of a Hocking-style liberalism. These trends accelerated with the absorption of the International Missionary Council by the World Council of Churches in 1961. Since that time, several WCC conferences have revealed the triumph of a liberal mission theology, even as the actual contribution of ecumenical denominations to world mission has waned considerably.

In 1968 the WCC held its Assembly in Uppsala, Sweden. The writings of Johannes Hoekendijk, a Dutch missiologist, profoundly influenced the deliberations of this gathering. A strong critic of traditional church structures, Hoekendijk had previously called for a new conception of evangelism that focused on social engagement and transformation. In turn, Uppsala essentially jettisoned personal evangelism, redefining “mission” to include “humanization” and a wide range of secular activities. Ecumenical missiology had openly embraced the notion that the world sets the agenda for the church.

Similarly, conferences of the WCC’s Commission on World Mission and Evangelism further demonstrated just how far liberal missiology had veered from more evangelical models. CWME sessions in Mexico City (1963), Bangkok (1973), Melbourne (1980), San Antonio (1989), and Salvador, Brazil (1996), set forth the following tenets: (1) the priority of orthopraxis over orthodoxy (see Praxis); (2) a this-worldly understanding of salvation as the liberation of the poor and oppressed from all forms of injustice; (3) the validity of interreligious dialogue as a form of witness; (4) the necessity of contextualization and a more dialogue relationship to culture; and (5) the further widening of the scope of mission to include feminist concerns (see Feminist Theologies) and ecological awareness (see Ecology, Ecological Movement). While the continuities with the older liberalism are unmistakable, these more recent wakings point to the increasingly radical agendas of contemporary ecumenical missiology (see Ecumenical Movement).

Liberation. Originating in Latin American Roman Catholic circles, discussion on the meaning of liberation after Vatican II shifted from the eternal destiny of a person to the sociopolitical context. The exodus event in which God freed Israel from slavery is seen as the archetype event governing the Old Testament. In it God liberated Israel and showed himself to be a liberating God. The announcement of Jesus that he has come to preach to the poor, to proclaim release to the prisoners, and to free the oppressed (Luke 4:18–20) is seen as the corresponding New Testament archetype. Liberation in this context has taken on a specific orientation: it is the struggle on the part of the oppressed or marginalized for their own freedom once they have become aware of their bondage and the role the oppressors play in the maintenance of that bondage. The forms of bondage may be political, economic, social, racial, or gender related, and a host of liberation theologies call those who are oppressed to rise up and engage in the process of attaining their own freedom and dignity. It is maintained that while the oppression may be personal, it will always require redressing structural issues, since the very fabric of human societies tends to engender inequalities and injustices. A significant driving biblical metaphor energizing the sociopolitical liberation motif is the establishment of the Kingdom of God as a liberating force in oppressive societies and situations; the resulting focus is often on the horizontal level (among people) rather than the vertical one (people with God). In this struggle it is assumed that God is on the side of the oppressed.

As developed over the decades since the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) in Roman Catholic and ecumenical Protestant circles, most of the reflections on and praxis toward liberation were reactions to understandings of Development, political environments, and the theological ideologies of the past. Often, though not always, oriented in Marxist thought, the tools for understanding liberation are not limited to theology but include Anthropology, Economics, and Sociology. Development, it is noted, maintains or even exaggerates the gap between the rich and the poor. Further, it is typically the “developed” who set the agenda rather than those who are marginalized. This, it is maintained, is not genuine liberation but only a continuing form of oppression. Political struggles against Western hegemony in Colonialism were perceived to be struggles for liberation, but all too often the new regimes which arose in Third World settings after independence simply kept the old inequities intact. Liberation struggles that began initially against colonial rulers have slowly begun to turn against the new oppressive regimes that are often backed by one or the other competing global powers, unconcerned with the masses. Even so, new forms of economic colonialism in which the West economically dominates other countries still require liberation efforts, such as the call for forgiving all Third World international debt. Theologically it was noted that any system which did not attack the oppressive status quo was ideologically suspect in and of itself, as it did not embody the aim of true liberation, which is a holistic release of people from all oppression and injustice.

This orientation toward liberation was built in several new theological directions. First, the development of an Option for the Poor was a conscious decision to see the poor as the favored of God who are to be the architects of their own liberation and who enjoy a privileged position in part because their worldview is not tainted by the desire to remain in power. Second, the sociopolitical liberation of Israel through exodus was a paradigm of God’s liberating desire for humankind (though consideration of Israel’s conquering actions in entering Canaan are rarely entertained in the discussions). Third, Sin was defined in social terms and not limited to personal, individual rebellion toward God. In parallel fashion, Salvation was defined as redemption of the whole person rather than some isolated interior “soulish” element of the person, and human beings are to take responsibility for their own liberation. Additionally, because of the violence waged against the poor by oppressors, it was asserted we cannot automatically rule out violence in overcoming them in the struggle for liberation. Finally, true Christian praxis was defined in terms of a lifestyle of moving peoples and societies toward justice for all members, and mission was recast as committed solidarity with the oppressed in their struggle.

Evaluation. The very fact that evangelical missiology has moved in a more holistic direction in recent years is evidence that some of the critique brought by liberation theologies and the paradigm of liberation has forced evangelicals to turn to the Scriptures for deeper examination and recognition of their own ideological biases in approaching the Bible (see also Holistic Mission). In this sense evangelicals have gained significant insights on liberation from its advocates.

In spite of this, important considerations weigh against taking the contemporary liberation paradigm wholesale. Many who chose to focus on the socioeconomic and political arenas did so because of an incipient or even an outright Universalism in regard to salvation. Those who advocated radical Violence in the struggle for liberation tended to downplay the reality that violence often leads only to more violence rather than genuine liberation. The collapse of Marxism as a political ideology in Europe demonstrated that despite the rhetoric, under Marxist regimes the general population was often worse off than under free market economies. Liberationists also tended to place sole responsibility on the efforts of people in the struggle for dignity and freedom in part because they disregarded the continuing and pervasive effects on sin both in the individual and in cultures and political systems. Political structures established and carried out by fallen humans will always move in the direction of dehumanization, and thus God’s desire to create new people, new heavens, and a new earth as part of his redemptive program. Human work toward liberation, while laudable and potentially serving as a type of firstfruits of which God will ultimately accomplish, will always fall short of God’s ultimate goal of Shalom, which will only be established when God finalizes his kingdom.

Paul’s picture in Romans 6 is that we are slaves who can choose to serve sin or God. The picture is a dichotomistic one in which economic or political liberation is not our ultimate goal. Instead, our ultimate goal is freedom from sin because of our choice to become slaves to the Master of the universe. Jesus said that those he set free were truly free. This freedom is not a type of antinomian libertarianism, but freedom gained through holding to his teaching and knowing the truth as a result (John 8:31–36). Liberation in this sense is not an abandonment of obligations to serve our Creator, but freedom from the oppression and degradation of sin in our lives and freedom to proclaim that release to others as well.

Liberation Theologies. Any attempt to provide an overview of liberationist missiology must recognize the variety of movements labeled under that rubric. Each broad category of liberation “theology”—Latin American, African, Asian, or North American Black, Hispanic, or Feminist—also manifests internal diversity among its leading exponents and practitioners and has its own history of development. In addition, different movements of liberation theology have been openly critical of one another, pointing to perceived limited perspectives and commitments. The questioning of Latin American and Black liberation theology’s sensitivity to gender issues by feminist and womanist theologians is an example of this mutual challenging. This diversity does not negate, however, the reality of a significant degree of commonality among liberation theologies (Hennelly). The following discussion will focus primarily on Latin American liberation theology as representative to some degree of the larger concerns of these several movements.

Fundamental Commitments. To comprehend the particular orientation and contributions of liberationist missiology requires an appreciation of its fundamental commitments. Above all else, liberation theologies highlight systemic issues of injustice and attempt to speak for the oppressed within a given context. The particular issues and groups, of course, are defined by the brand of liberation theology under discussion; accordingly, concern can center on socio-economic class, race, and/or gender. In Latin America, special attention has been given to the first of these.

The serious consideration of the Latin American social context for missiological reflection and action has sought to provide a comprehensive framework from which to define and evaluate the mission of the church. For example, the histories of the Roman Catholic Church and Protestant denominations and missions are located within the economic and political trajectories of Latin America in order to discover either complicity and oppressive regimes and systems or the models of service to the masses of the poor (Dussel; see Poverty). The social sciences (including diverse elements of certain types of Marxism) assume an important role in the analysis of the Latin American context and in the articulation of visions of an alternative social and ecclesiastical reality. In contrast to more traditional approaches, the doing of liberation theology begins from the perspective of the weak. This starting point from the "underside of history" and the "preferential Option for the Poor" determines how the mission of the people of God is subsequently defined and evaluated (El-lacuría and Sobrino).

Key Themes. A particular interpretation of the concept of the Kingdom of God is foundational to liberationist missiology. The kingdom is an eschatological hope of total liberation that is realized in part today within history, wherever some sort of freedom from oppression is concretely achieved. The interpretation of other theological and biblical items coheres with this point of view. The historical Jesus is the basis of the Praxis of mission: his preaching of the kingdom of God, his earthly ministry to the marginalized (see Marginal, Marginalization), his death and resurrection are pointers to the virtue of self-sacrifice and the divine vindication of his solidarity with the poor. The mission of the church, then, has the example of Jesus to follow in its own striving to proclaim and incarnate the good news of God's commitment to the poor. The church, although it is not itself the kingdom, must be both the place where the reign of God is visible, as well as an active participant with other human beings in the partial realization of that kingdom in the here and now. In other words, the church is to be both its sign and servant.

The concentration on the context has not meant an abandonment of the mystical elements of Christian faith or of the issue of the eternal fate of the human soul. Yet, these topics are redefined in line with liberation theology's social and ecumenical orientation. Evangelization is linked to the sharing of the liberating word and life of God's kingdom of justice.

The Scope of Mission. According to liberation theology, the mission of the people of God must begin within the church. The church needs to be evangelized by the poor in the sense that it should judge whether its ethos, message, liturgy, and structures reflect the divine obligation to society's exploited. In Latin America, especially in Roman Catholic circles, this liberationist concept of the nature of the church generated a new formulation of Christian communion, the base ecclesial communities. This way of being the church was to be the catalyst for fulfilling the calling to be the instrument of the kingdom of God within the world (Boff; Cook, 150–56). Mission, therefore, is all-encompassing. The church is to reshape itself even as it reaches into the surrounding society.

The Future of Liberation Theologies. Much has changed in Latin America over the last decade, causing liberation theologians to reassess their understanding of the context and the church's mission. The failure of the Sandinistas to rebuild Nicaragua, the inability of the continent's other revolutions to establish a different socio-economic reality, and the global collapse of Marxism are among a number of factors that have forced liberationists to reconsider the church's task in the world.

On the one hand, some liberationists claim that the emerging capitalist hegemony underscores even more the themes that liberation theology has always championed, even if socialism no longer appears to be a viable option (see also Economics). The poor are becoming poorer, and the powerful nations continue to take advantage of the less fortunate. In addition, these circumstances provide the opportunity to probe other dimensions of mission (such as popular or Folk Religion, Ecology, and indigenous rights), as well as to join with other groups who are being pushed to the periphery in the global economy (Cook, 245–76; Irarrazaval).

Nevertheless, others are less sanguine about the future. Berryman details how liberation hopes in Central America broke down. He discloses how insignificant were the numbers of those actually involved in the base communities and admits that this minority voice, though important, tended to be elitist and idealistic and misread the heart of the poor. What remains for mission in the new situation are more limited Pastoral projects of solidarity among those who suffer (Berryman, 1994). At the same time, Berryman studies the phenomenon of the burgeoning evangelical presence in Latin America. While critical of some of what he sees, Berryman recognizes that evangelicalism has been able to tap into the deeply felt needs of the masses and sometimes exhibits some of the same social concerns as liberation theology, even if these are manifested differently. Any rethinking of liberationist missiology cannot ignore this evangelical component of Latin American religious life (Berryman, 1994, 145–218; 1996).

Liberia (Est. 2000 pop.: 3,565,000; 111,369 sq. km. [43,000 sq. mi.]). Located on the west coast of Africa between Sierra Leone and Côte d’Ivoire, Liberia (“Land of Freedom”) is home to some sixteen major ethnic groups (speaking thirty-four distinct languages) and a minority population of descendants from American freed slaves repatriated to Liberia as settlers.

Initially intended to be a resettlement colony for ex-slaves from the United States modeled after Britain’s experiment in Freetown (Sierra Leone), Monrovia (named after American President James Monroe) proved to be an extremely unhealthy location. Many of the early settlers succumbed to tropical diseases. The first group to arrive came in 1820 under the auspices of the American Colonization Society (chartered in 1816). The first two black American missionaries, Baptists Lott Carey and Colin Teague, arrived in 1821. Several settlements were eventually established and joined together as a nation in 1847, giving Liberia the distinction of being the first African country south of the Sahara to achieve independence. Joseph Jenkins Roberts (1809–76), a settler from Virginia, was elected as the first president. Politically, Liberia was led by the minority Americo-Liberians until the coup which put Samuel Doe in power in 1980.

Many of the several thousands of colonists who arrived over the following decades were already affiliated with denominations and joined or established their own denominational churches in the new settlement. Church work focused on the settlers, and, unfortunately, through the first half of the 19th century, little attention was paid to evanglizing the indigenous peoples.

Methodists were among the settlers who arrived in 1822, though the first Methodist missionary (Melville B. Cox) did not come until 1833; the Basel Evangelical Society sent missionaries in 1828 (who departed in 1832), the Presbyterians and Congregationalists arrived in 1833, the African Episcopal Church in 1835, the (American) Episcopal Church in 1836, and the Lutherans began work among the Loma and Kpelle along the St. Paul River in 1860. Roman Catholics went through three failed attempts (1842, 1884, 1903) before establishing an enduring mission in 1906. Progress among the indigenous peoples did not come until the last part of the 1800s, when a fresh wave of African Americans arrived after the American Civil War and the emancipation of slaves in the United States. For example, two American black denominations, African Methodist Episcopal Church (1873) and AME Zion Church (1876), sent missionaries. Pentecostal missionaries first came in 1908 and worked extensively among Grebo peoples of the interior, developing three Bible schools to train indigenous pastors. The Seventh-Day Adventists initiated work in 1927, Baptist Mid-Missions in 1931, and WEC International in 1938 (founding the Liberia Inland Mission church). In 1954 the Sudan Interior Mission (SIM) founded ELWA (Eternal Love Winning Africa), the first mission radio station in Africa. Prior to being destroyed twice in the recent civil wars, it offered broadcasts in 44 languages to all of Africa and the Middle East.

Prominent Liberian Christians include William Wade Harris, the charismatic West African evangelist whose primary work was outside of his own country and Edward W. Blyden, one of the most significant pioneers in African Christian theology. Today it is estimated that Liberia is roughly 37 percent Christian (8% evangelical) and 13 percent Muslim with roughly 49 percent following traditional religions. Traditional adherents focus attention on Ancestral Practices and affiliation as the core of their religious system. Witchcraft and Sorcery are also prominent, and associated practices have been exacerbated by the recent ethnic conflicts.

The multiple civil wars which have plagued Liberia through the 1990s resulted in an estimated 750,000 fleeing for refuge in neighboring countries, potentially destabilizing the larger region. The economy has been devastated, and with the vast bulk of the business people fleeing the country the ability to rebuild economically once the instability ends looks bleak.

LIBYA

Libya (Est. 2000 pop.: 6,387,000; 1,759,540 sq. km. [679,358 sq. mi.]). Libya is one of the least evangelized countries. The Sahara Desert consumes 90% of the land area. However, because a great reserve of oil was discovered in 1959, Libya’s per capita income is higher than that of most of its neighbors. This enables Libya to import 75% of its food and to provide subsidies and handouts to its citizens. Wealth also attracts large numbers of foreign laborers and professionals. Possibly as many as 30% of Libya’s 6.4 million people are expatriate.

No Christian witness to Libyans is allowed. A militant Muslim reform order founded in 1842, Sanusiya (Malikite rite), has influenced the ruling junta in the direction of passionate fundamentalism in belief and austere simplicity in lifestyle. “Islam is the religion of the state,” according to the Constitution of 1970. Allah Akbar (God is great) is the national anthem. Islamic social theory is seen as a necessary antidote to communism and capitalism. In a 1971 decision, the government decreed that all laws are to be subordinated to the Sharia (Muslim religious law) even if that means suspending existing laws. The Jamiat al-Dawah al-Islamiyah is the government-sponsored department that fosters Islamic missions internationally.

In 1829 the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews began Bible distribution in the large Jewish community in Tripoli. In 1889 the North Africa Mission established a small dispensary to serve Muslims. This was shut down by the Italian colonial government in 1936, reopened in 1945, and terminated in 1969 when the present government came to power. Since then, neither Catholic nor Protestant missionaries have been permitted, although a few Catholic nuns are allowed to work in hospitals.

In this restricted context, ministry through radio, printed and audio and video material, and friendship with Libyans overseas takes on new importance. Radio companies bearing a Christian message to Libya include the Far East Broadcasting Company, Trans-World Radio, and High Adventure (Lebanon). One of the most useful programs is produced by the Radio School of the Bible. Incorporated in France, this is the media ministry of the Arab World Ministries. Besides radio programs, this ministry creates and coordinates publications, Bible correspondence courses, and Theological Education by Extension curricula.

Possibly one hundred fellowship groups meet in Libya today, largely serving Korean, Filipino, Pakistani, and European expatriates. Some are organized by homesick nominal Christians. Corporate worship must be very discrete.

Liddell, Eric Henry (1902–45). Olympian and Scottish missionary to China. Born in Tientsin, China, in 1902 to missionary parents Liddell came to epitomize “muscular Christianity” when he won two gold medals at the 1924 Olympics. He refused to participate in the 100-meter race because it was held on a Sunday, so he ran the 400-meter instead and won. The 100-meter race having proved inconclusive, was rescheduled and once again he won.

Educated at Blackheath and Elthan College, Heriot-Wall College for Science, and Edinburgh University, Liddell received a bachelor’s degree in chemistry, physics, and mathematics. In 1925 he went to China to teach at the Anglo-Chinese College, in Tientsin. In 1930, feeling a great call to mission work in China, he applied to the London Missionary Society. He was accepted, but remained at the college to replace a colleague who had died. He found his theological studies constantly interrupted by numerous invitations to speak to Christian youth groups, but was finally ordained in 1938 during his first furlough from China. Friends reported that he rarely spoke of his Olympic victories, but he did often speak of his time in China that he had had to leave Europe because the adulation he received there would have turned any man’s head. In 1943 he was interned at Weihsien, Shantung, where he died in 1945 of either a brain tumor or a cerebral hemorrhage.

Liechtenstein

Liechtenstein (Est. 2000 pop.: 33,000; 160 sq. km. [62 sq. mi.]). The principality of Liechtenstein is one of the smallest independent states in the world. This territory received its name in 1719 when Prince John of Liechtenstein purchased and united the Lordship of Schellenberg and the County of Vaduz. Surrounded on three sides by Switzerland, it is not surprising that Liechtenstein’s six parishes were from the start in 451 a single deanery under the diocese of the Church in Switzerland. While sweeping political changes such as the Reformation brought great reform to Switzerland, it did not affect Liechtenstein which remains 87 percent Catholic today.

Liechtenstein’s major Protestant Church is the Interdenominational Evangelical Church formed in 1881 by immigrating textile workers from Lutheran or Reformed Churches. The church entered a patronage agreement with the Protestant church in Switzerland in 1954, the same year that a Lutheran congregation was formed belonging to the Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches in Switzerland and the Principality of Liechtenstein.

While freedom of religion is guaranteed to all under the Constitution of 1921, the Roman Catholic Church is the State Church and thus enjoys the full protection of the State. Under this guarantee, the state supervises religious education.

Lifestyle Evangelism. “You’re the only Jesus some will ever see.” “People don’t care how much you know until they know how much you care.” “You have to ‘earn’ the right to be heard.” These sample statements help explain the evangelistic strategy known as lifestyle evangelism. Advocates argue that EVANGELISM must be seen as a process of planting the seeds of the gospel through verbal WITNESS, watering and cultivating through Christian example and lifestyle, and finally reaping the harvest of new converts.

Great emphasis is placed on the role of the witness’s life in the evangelism process. Proponents point to the incarnation as an illustration of the importance of this approach to ministry. When God wanted to communicate with humans, they argue, God did not send tracts from heaven. Instead, God communicated with us by becoming a person and living among us (John 1:7).

The focus of lifestyle evangelism, then, is using the channels of relationships to share the gospel through both words and deeds. The latest phase of the movement, stimulated by Steve Sjogren’s Conspiracy of Kindness, emphasizes utilizing acts of service to give an opportunity for verbal witness of salvation in Jesus Christ.

While not the first book to appear on the topic, Joseph Aldrich’s book Lifestyle Evangelism has popularized the concept of lifestyle evangelism in American evangelicalism. Related terms used by other proponents include friendship evangelism, incarnational evangelism, and relational evangelism. Since the early 1980s numerous books have been written and witnessing programs developed around the basic concept of lifestyle evangelism. Jim Peterson, missionary to Brazil, argued in 1980 for the importance of lifestyle evangelism on the mission field. He emphasized a twofold missionary strategy: (1) the proclamation of the gospel to nonbelievers; (2) the affirmation of the gospel, which involves a process of modeling and further explaining the Christian message. Peterson found that in his mission field context, deeds of love helped clarify the gospel message to those he was trying to reach.

This emphasis on affirming the gospel mirrors the often-practiced strategy of using social ministry as a bridge to share the gospel. Social ministry can help break down suspicion, open doors for ministry in closed countries, and provide a hearing for the gospel. The construction of dams by the Basel missionaries in northern Ghana provided an opportunity for the gospel to be shared to the people there. Other missionary efforts through medicine, agriculture, engineering, nutrition, and education have illustrated this principle.

Proponents cite many benefits to utilizing the approach of lifestyle evangelism. They note there is a greater possibility for on-going follow-up, not only in continually clarifying the gospel message over a period of time but also in discipling persons who trust Christ as their Savior. Lifestyle evangelism advocates also argue that a consistent Christian lifestyle helps break down the accusation of “hypocrisy” and encourages nonbelievers to consider the reality of Christ, noting how recent visible scandals in the Christian community have caused many people to wonder: “Does Christ really make a difference? Is there any substance to all this talk?”

While affirming the benefits of a “lifestyle” approach, some people caution against letting the pendulum swing too far away from an emphasis on verbal witness. They warn against the danger of lifestyle evangelism becoming all lifestyle and no evangelism, all deeds and no words. They are concerned that Christians following a lifestyle evangelism approach may place great effort in building relationships with nonbelievers but never get around to sharing the gospel verbally. Some are concerned that an overemphasis on deeds could lead in the direction of the social gospel of the 1920s, where an emphasis on repentance and faith might be lost altogether. Perhaps the strongest critique of the lifestyle evangelism movement has come from Mark McCloskey, in Tell it Often—Tell it Well. McCloskey notes that while lifestyle evangelism certainly has strengths, the New Testament would seem to point toward a more comprehensive approach to evangelism, including taking the initiative to share the gospel message with persons with whom you have no prior contact. He argues that there are too many lost people to depend primarily on evangelism which is relational in approach. Not everyone has Christian friends or neighbors who can live out the message in deeds as well as share with words. Therefore, he advocates a comprehensive evangelistic strategy that includes witnessing through existing relationships but that goes beyond them to include any person with whom we might come into contact.

To summarize, the lifestyle evangelism movement has reminded the church of the importance of living a Christian life before others, that the walk of believers matters as well as their talk. Concerns raised by friendly critics need to be heard as well, in that Christians should guard against overstressing the walk whereby they become “silent witnesses.” Some have taken the principles of lifestyle evangelism to an extreme, saying “I just let my life do the talking.” A Christian’s life can only reinforce the message; it cannot substitute for it. Verbal witness gives clarity to believers’ walk by pointing people past them to their Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ. Christians cannot expect the nonbeliever to know that Christians are a reflection of the good news until they know what the good news is. As Paul affirmed, “For we do not preach ourselves, but Jesus Christ as Lord, and ourselves as your servants for Jesus’ sake” (2 Cor. 4:5). If believers do not point people toward Christ, they are only calling attention to themselves. Overall, the lifestyle evangelism movement has helped provide an apologetic for Christianity to an increasingly secular world, thus following the command of Christ in Matthew 5:16, “let your light shine before men, that they may see your good deeds and praise your Father in heaven.”

Liminality. Derived from the Latin word limen, liminality suggests a threshold, chasm, or margin. Anthropologists utilize the term to refer to an ambiguous phase that is uncharacteristic of the past and future states; it is a state of “in-betweenness,” a transitional stage of life in which one is torn away from familiarity. The liminal state has been likened to invisibility, ambiguity, darkness, death, limbo, and being in the womb. French folklorist and ethnographer Arnold van Gennep speaks of three different stages of passage in the life cycle: preliminal rites of separation, liminal rites of transition, and postliminal rites of incorporation.

Some anthropologists have observed a sacred dimension of liminality that compensates for the lack of secular power. The liminal severance from status and authority, the exclusion from a social structure dominated by power and control, require sacred power. So within the placeless, timeless, nonclassifiable milieu of liminality emerge such major categories of culture as myth, symbol, and ritual. Liminality is therefore a state of both transition and potentiality.

In tribal societies liminality is often characterized by a homogeneous communitas, a nonstructural equality among those involved. However, such homogeneity is not found in the complex urbanized world. The multiple states of liminality caused by race, class, and gender differences make communitas a difficult challenge today. While many in modern and postmodern society undergo liminality in terms of alienation because of fast-paced changes, this fragmented, individualized liminality lacks the power to create communitas.

On the other hand, it has been suggested that the concept of liminality can be used to develop a contemporary, multicultural theology of marginality. Liminal agents can be viewed as a creative minority in God’s plan of salvation, and the church can become in part a marginal community of liminality and a creative agency for transforming the world. This powerful ideal must, however, be informed by the significant distinction between voluntary and involuntary liminality. For example, missionaries voluntarily choose a liminal state, while their children experience the liminal state involuntarily. Likewise, the first and second generations of immigrant families suffer from the conflicting dynamics of voluntary and involuntary liminality.

Crucial missiological questions arise here: How do cross-cultural missionaries who choose liminality through missionary zeal process liminality in the midst of an intense phase of transformation on the field? In contrast, how do their children process their involuntary liminality to become voluntary creative agents of transformation? Finally, how in this complex urban world does one’s liminal experience form communitas as a creative force of transformation?

The answers to all three questions are inherent in the questions themselves. Sorting out the diverse experiences of liminality is the key to processing and maximizing it. While embracing the call of all Christians to the sojourning state of liminality, an understanding of its diverse contexts furthers the challenge of generating a creative minority full of potential to transform a dehumanizing world. By acknowledging the commonalities and multiplicities of liminality, Christianity can strengthen its missionary calling to the world. Thus, liminality becomes not merely a state of transition, but a state of potentiality as well.

Linguistics, Linguistic Theory. Linguistics, also called linguistic science, is concerned with the study of human language. Linguists are not necessarily polyglots—persons who are fluent speakers of several languages. Rather, they are specialists whose goals are to discover the rules of language structure, the regularities relating languages both past and present, patterns in the acquisition of languages, and principles underlying the use of languages by their speakers.
Linguistics, Linguistic Theory

Linguists whose focus is on language structure examine aspects such as grammar, vocabulary, and pronunciation in order to develop an increasingly adequate understanding of the nature of all human language. Those investigating the relationship among languages explore topics ranging from features that occur in all living languages (language universals) to the classification of related languages into groups or families. While some specialists in language acquisition focus on the cognitive processes employed by children as they acquire their native tongue, others examine the psychological and linguistic processes of children and adults engaged in learning additional languages. Those who research language use observe the roles language plays in human interaction, such as differences between male and female speech, the importance and functions ascribed to national languages versus regional and minority languages, and attitudes of speaker toward non-native use of their language.

The discipline of linguistics traces its roots to the third and fourth centuries B.C. when Plato, Socrates, and Aristotle dialogued about the nature of human language. The Greek philosophers of this era are credited with establishing many of the grammatical categories that are still used in descriptions of modern-day languages, such as nouns and verbs as well as verb tenses such as past, present, and future. Until the past one hundred years, however, the focus of linguistic inquiry was almost entirely on the written form of the language. This emphasis changed in the twentieth century, when anthropologists began to study the conversational use of American Indian languages, thus laying the foundation for much missionary activity in linguistics and language learning. More recently, linguistics has become a highly respected academic discipline studied in universities and colleges throughout the world (Finegan and Besnier, 1989).

The field of linguistics contains a number of somewhat overlapping subfields, and new ones continue to develop. These include historical linguistics (the study of how languages change over time, including the present-day relationships among languages), psycholinguistics (the study of the psychological processes involved in language use and the study of the how first and second languages are acquired), anthropological linguistics (the study of the relationship between language and culture), sociolinguistics (the study of how people use language in social interaction), and applied linguistics (the application of linguistic insights to practical concerns such as language learning/teaching methods and procedures, translation and literacy, the diagnosis and treatment of language disorders such as dyslexia, and the development of computerized speech production) (Crystal, 1987).

While each of these subfields has contributed to the area of missions, the greatest impact has been that of applied linguistics. Insights from this area have been of particular value in dealing with real-world issues in Bible translation, literacy work including the development of new alphabets, and missionary language learning (see Second Language Acquisition).

A number of twentieth-century theoretical and applied linguists have made significant contributions to missions. Referring to the founder of the Summer Institute of Linguistics (SIL) and Wycliffe Bible Translators, Ruth Tucker (p. 351) notes that "The one individual most responsible for the twentieth century surge in Bible translation work has been William Cameron Townsend." Following Townsend's early lead, SIL continues to be at the forefront of applied linguistics in the areas of translation and literacy work. SIL personnel are currently deployed in over fifty countries, where much of their work is with lesser known language and people groups and with previously unwritten languages.

Other highly respected scholars in Bible translation include Kenneth L. Pike, Eugene A. Nida, and William A. Smalley. Spanning decades of involvement in missions, these pioneers have written numerous books and articles in the areas of linguistics, cultural anthropology, and translation theory and practice. In addition, they have served as translation consultants for many hundreds of projects throughout the world. Their contributions, however, extend well beyond the missions community to the broader field of general linguistics.

Pike, Nida, and Smalley have also had a major influence on missionary language learning through their many publications as well as through the development and administration of prefield training programs for missionary candidates. Other prominent applied linguists include Donald N. Larson and E. Thomas and Elizabeth S. Brewster. These specialists have shaped our view of on-the-field language acquisition and provided tools to help missionaries become more effective self-directed learners. They have also written textbooks for missionary language learners, conducted prefield training programs, and worked as language- and culture-learning consultants for mission agencies, language schools, and individuals in many countries of the world.

Literacy, Literature Mission Work. Literacy is a threshold to another world. The printed page can communicate to hundreds of millions of people. Accordingly, in the world of missions, numerous organizations have been established to focus on literature. There are more than 300 significant literature organizations at national and international levels. An example of an international agency is the Christian Literature Crusade with bookstores around the world. Overseas Missionary Fellowship has publishing houses in several countries. Christian Communications Limited operates several bookstores in Hong Kong and has expanded into other countries where Chinese churches exist.

Books have a long history. Clay tablets the size of shredded-wheat biscuits were used in Babylon as far back as 2400 B.C.; papyrus was used in Egypt as early as 4000 B.C. The single most important development for book publishing was the invention of the printing press with movable type. Recently, a major step has been taken as personal computers become desktop publishing machines.

Print is the oldest mass medium and has been used in all aspects of Christian work. Indeed, it seems impossible to imagine Christian mission without printed material. Our teaching is presented in books, magazines, and pamphlets. Follow-up to evangelistic crusades and mass media programs are primarily done by letters and packages of printed material. The quarterly magazine Interlit helps missions use literature more effectively.

More than 22,000 new Christian book titles are published each year, and there are more than 23,000 periodicals. The great majority of books published by Christians are for Christians; only a small portion are suitable for evangelistic use. Of course, the Bible is by far the world’s number one best-seller.

Of special interest are magazines published for evangelistic purposes. For example, Breakthrough, a Chinese magazine published in Hong Kong, reaches the young. In the Middle East, Magalla reaches Arabic-speaking people in several countries. Step, published in Nairobi, has a higher circulation than any other magazine in Africa.

Several organizations are devoted to the publication of tracts, which have had extensive use. The use of tracts has declined in the West over the last few years, though recently comics have been produced for similar purposes. In the West the usual perception is that comics are for children, but in many countries they are widely used by adults. Various Bible Societies have produced whole series of Bible comics for semiliterates.

Mission agencies also use literature extensively for promotional purposes. A forerunner to direct mail was the missionary prayer letter, which was sent to supporters. During the last few years, direct mail has become a major fund-raising method for Christian organizations.

In comparison to other Media, literature makes big demands: one must be able to read, which takes years of learning and practice. Because the Bible is often the first book to be printed in a language, many missions have focused on literacy as a primary aim. Governments make huge investments in schools and literacy programs to help people to read. Even so, it is estimated that less than half the world’s people are readers. The non-literate are usually the poor and less privileged; but even in countries with high literacy, reading is decreasing because of television.

Among the literacy methods used by mission organizations we can mention the Laubach method (see LAUBACH, FRANK CHARLES), which could be called a disciple-making model. It is also known as the “each one teach one” method. The Gudaschinsky method, widely used by Wycliffe Bible Translators, could be called the “reading to learn” method. The Freire method aims at consciousness raising (see FREIRE, PAULO REGLUS NEVES). Each of these methods reflects the background in which it was first developed. Today other methods are being introduced, including the use of audiocassettes as the teacher.

Lithuania (Est. 2000 pop.: 3,692,000; 65,200 sq. km. [25,174 sq. mi.]). Originally settled by Indo-Europeans, Lithuania became the largest European state of the Middle Ages. Among the last of the pagan nations, Christianity officially arrived through an alliance with Poland in 1386. By the seventeenth century, Vilnius had become a major Jewish center. In 1795 Lithuania was given over to Russia. German occupation in World War II devastated both Lithuania and the Jewish population. More recently, Lithuania led the successful 1991 Baltic independence movements. The church in Lithuania has remained predominately Catholic since the Middle Ages.

considerable experience as a campus evangelist, he wrote How to Give Away Your Faith (1966), Liverpool Missionary Conference (1860). In the wake of the revival of 1858–60 in England, a few earnest Christians unrelated to missionary societies called for a conference of mission leaders.

The concern was that all Christians of the United Kingdom be stirred up to greater zeal in the work of the Lord. Fortunately, the London Secretaries Association responded to the challenge and appointed one of its members to plan such a gathering. Somehow this man was able to persuade the missionary societies to support the project, and from March 19 to 23, 1860, Liverpool was the venue of a conference of 126 mission members, of whom 37 were field missionaries.

The high percentage of mission directors who attended this conference devoted their time to policy discussion and produced not a few recommendations that significantly shaped mission relationships for years to come. Papers were read on missionary recruitment, the training of converts, and the planting of native churches under native leaders. They called for the establishment of a journal to treat Christian missions at large and for a new cadre of missionaries drawn from the sons of the wealthy and learned. Large crowds attended the evening meetings, which were opened to the public. Lord Shaftesbury, who chaired the final session used the word “ecumenical” to describe it. Something was begining to catch on! Liverpool 1860 is of significance in that it initiated the pattern of world missionary conferences that continues today.

Livingstone, David (1813–73). Scottish pioneer missionary and explorer in Africa. Born in Blantyre, Scotland, he left school at age ten, but a profound spiritual experience made him resolve to become a medical missionary, convinced that the God who had called him would see him past all the daunting obstacles. He qualified in medicine, trained in theology, and in 1840 set out for South Africa under the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.
Aiming to reach “the smoke of a thousand villages” where no missionary had ever been, he penetrated ever farther north, beyond the Kalahari Desert. There the only foreigners were Arab and Portuguese traders, and Boers who believed the Africans had no souls and exploited them mercilessly. Livingstone had to contend with drought, fever, wild animals, superstition, and slavery, which he called the open sore of Africa and helped stamp out. He learned languages, treated medicine men with courtesy as having something to teach him, got to know the African mind as few did, and recommended the training of national workers to relinquish their dependence on Europeans.

In 1852 he began a six-thousand mile journey that took nearly four years. He headed the government’s Zambesi Expedition (1868–74), after which he advocated the use of Lake Nyasa in honorable trade to make slave dealing unprofitable. On furlough in 1867 he electrified a distinguished Cambridge audience. “I direct your attention to Africa,” he said, “I go back . . . to try to make an open path for commerce and Christianity. Do you carry out the work I have begun.”

From this developed the Universities’ Mission to Central Africa—an Anglo-Catholic society that owed much to a Scottish Congregationalist. His explorations brought him both secular acclaim and criticism from some missionary circles, but whether explorer or missionary Livingstone always had right priorities. The Lord’s “Lo, I am with you alway” was “the word of a gentleman of the most sacred and strictest honor.” When Livingstone died in what is now Zambia his attendants bore his body 1,500 miles to the sea, and one of them was present at the funeral in Westminster Abbey.

Loewen, Jacob A. (1922– ). Russian-born Canadian linguist and missionary in Colombia,
Panama, and Africa. Born in Russia to a German-speaking family which immigrated to Canada in 1930, Loewen grew up exposed to both cultural variations and a strong Mennonite faith. He attended Missionary Medical Institute (1942–43) and the SIL institute in Briarcrest, Saskatchewan (1943), after which he served as a home missionary under the West Coast Children's Mission in British Columbia. After his marriage to Anne Enns in 1945, he attended Tabor College and they were sent to Colombia with the Mennonite Brethren to develop a written language for the Waunana (1947–57). Religious persecution resulted in his move to complete his Ph.D. in linguistics at the University of Washington. Accepting a position at Tabor College in 1959, he continued his linguistic and church development work intermittently over the next twenty-five years working on Bible translation in Panama with the ten dialects spoken by the various groups of Choco.

Loewen joined the American and United Bible Societies in 1964, as a translation consultant responsible for South America (1964–70), and West Africa (1979–84). He focused on research and writing after his retirement in 1984.

Loewen brought a solid commitment of applying anthropological insights to understanding people as a foundation in the missionary task. His voluminous writings have significantly influenced missionary Anthropology and Communication, especially the importance of understanding and utilizing Belief Systems and Myths in the Contextualization of the Christian message.

Love. Biblical love is often a concept that has been confused with cultural views of “love.” In Scripture, love is a description of God, a sacrificial act toward the undeserving, a fulfillment of the Law, and the trademark of a true disciple of Christ. Love should be characteristic of Christian mission. The Old Testament word is ’ahab. In the New Testament, two major concepts of love are expressed in two different words: philos and agape.

Philos expresses fondness or an attraction to someone or something. It is a highly emotive word which is similar to the English terms fondness or appreciation or affection. Older women are to teach (or train or advise) younger women to be “husband lovers” (philandrous) and children lovers (philotekrous) indicating that affection toward the husband and children was to be developed and thus was to exceed the conditional type of emotion related to familial relationships. Scripture declares that the Father loved the Son in this way (John 5:20) and believers are to love in this same affectionate manner (John 16:27). Philos is not a lesser type of love than agape but is of a different nature. It entails feeling good toward another person or a thing. One may be fond of someone or something and it can be a healthy and wholesome sentiment. It expresses joy in being with or involved with someone or something.

In agape the idea of sacrificially giving oneself on behalf of another is the primary emphasis. This form of love is not an emotional response to a person, place, or thing, but rather a volitional act toward a person or group of persons who may or may not be lovely. This is the word used to describe God’s attitude toward the world (John 3:16) and toward the sinners whom he redeemed (1 John 4:9). The love was not simply a verbal expression but a dramatic demonstration of selfless giving on behalf of those who were cut off from God and even declared to be his enemies (Rom. 5:8). This love is beyond human capacity but is to be exhibited by those who call God Father (1 John 4:7). Jesus also indicated that this love would fulfill all the law when exercised toward God with all of one’s heart, soul, and mind, and toward one’s neighbor (Matt. 22:36–40; Gal. 5:14). The reason for this sweeping statement is that if one is sacrificially giving himself/herself to God and neighbor, then one’s acts would not do anything offensive or harmful. This fits within the intent and heart of what the law was all about.

In missions, the declaration of God’s love must be demonstrated and not just verbalized. Whether in wholesome affection or sacrificial giving, the message of God’s character and action toward sinful humankind must be demonstrated. Those who carry God’s love must illustrate this through acts consistent with the loving behavior of the culture in which the message is being presented.

Since Jesus placed the act of loving one another as living testimony to identify the true disciples, those in ministry must protect the love relationship among fellow workers. Interpersonal relationships among missionaries are certainly observed by those hearing the message of John 3:16 and Romans 5:8. But if those who proclaim the message do not reflect such attitudes among themselves, the verbal witness can be undermined. Since loving one another is a command (John 15:17), it is evident that it is not left to human emotions nor is it merely a good thing. It is a moral obligation to give of oneself to others. To do this is to be a witness of one’s connection...
Love

with Jesus and to verify that one is truly on a mission for Jesus Christ who came as a demonstration of God’s love for sinners. This love, however, is not from human effort but flows from a Spirit-filled life (Rom. 5:5; Gal. 5:22).

ED GLASSCOCK

Love of God. The Christian mission stems from the saving love of God for humanity. This divine love is to be associated with the related concepts of his compassion, mercy, blessing, and grace, especially as revealed in Christ.

Since God is love (1 John 4:8) both within himself in the intra-trinitarian self-giving and in his special revelation, his love must be reflected in the act of creation, especially of human beings. Humans were originally God’s priest-kings (Gen. 1:26–28; 2:9–17). Their task was to consecrate their assigned rule and realm to him in loving obedience, with a view to realizing God’s ultimate eschatological goal for his creation (Dumbrell, 1994).

Their rebellion neither frustrated the divine plan for the world nor negated his love for humanity, his image in the world. Even at the point of excluding them from Eden, the realm of divine blessing, he extended hope for salvation (Gen. 3:16). When the necessity of a general judgment was typified by the Flood, the Lord graciously preserved a remnant. He also promised that his covenant of creation would stand (Gen. 6:18; 8:17–9:17), thereby also expressing his love (Matt. 5:45; Acts 14:17).

From among the disobedient nations, but in the chosen line of Shem (Gen. 9:26–27; 11:20–27), Abraham was chosen both to receive blessing and to be a blessing (Gen. 12:1–3), ultimately through Christ (Gal. 3:8) (see also Abrahamic Covenant). In fulfillment of this promise of blessing to humanity, and with a view to bringing his creation to its goal, God delivered Israel from Egypt. Redeemed Israel’s vocation may also be called her mission, for she is called with the world in view (Exod. 19:5). Her role as a priestly kingdom and holy nation is to bear witness to the true and living God by her distinctiveness in worship and moral life as a community under the Law or Mosaic covenant. Chosen Israel was thus called to model for the nations the blessings of the divine love experienced through obedience to Yahweh as king (Exod. 19:5b–6a; cf. 1 Peter 2:9). At best Israel fulfilled this calling very imperfectly, but at certain high points, like Solomon’s dedication of the temple (1 Kings 8:41–43, 60) Israel was keenly aware of her proper, Abrahamic role in the world. Only the Messiah (Christ), however, would perfectly manifest the love of God in himself and the divine intention of blessing for the nations.

God’s love for sinful humanity resulted in his giving/sending the eternal Son to become the promised Messiah (John 3:16). Jesus expressed this love of God for fallen humanity by his own loving obedience to the Father (John 14:31; Phil. 2:5–8), showing compassion for the hungry, the sick, the demonized, and the tax-collectors and “sinners.” To them he brought relief from their suffering and forgiveness of their sins through faith in him. This was a sign and foreshadowing of the future reign of God in blessing, power, and righteousness. His atoning death, “a ransom for many” (Israelites and Gentiles alike), was the crowning expression of God’s love for sinners. His resurrection guaranteed the final fruition of this love in the full implementation of the reign (kingdom) of God at his PAROUSIA. That age (or world) to come will be the final realization of his purpose for creation; then it will be fully subdued under his vice-regent, Jesus Christ, and his Body, the church.

The interim between his resurrection and his coming is the appointed time for the Christian mission—the sending of the apostles and others bearing the gospel to all the nations till the close of the age (Matt. 28:16–20; Luke 24:46–48; Acts 1:8). This fulfills the promise to Abraham (Gen. 12:3) in accordance with the love of God expressed in the giving of the Son (John 3:16).

In this way the risen Christ builds the community which has experienced God’s love in him through the Spirit (Rom. 5:5–8). Described in bridal imagery (Eph. 5:21–33; Rev. 21:2, 9) the church is not only the creation, through world mission, of God’s saving love; it is also the community reflecting this love in its life (e.g., Phil. 2:1–8; 1 Peter 2:22; 1 John 3:11–24; 4:7–12). As such it is the global fulfillment of Israel’s vocation—a living sign of the scope of God’s saving love and its instrument, embracing men and women of all peoples and legal statuses (Phil. 2:14–16a; 1 Peter 2:9–12, 17; Gal. 3:28).

The final destiny of those who respond to the reconciling love of God made known to them by the Christian mission is the enjoyment of the final issue of this love for the creation: the life of the world (age) to come, the reign (kingdom) of God in all the fullness of his blessing. This will be creation perfected at last—life in all its fullness where the bride of the Lamb “who loves us and frees us by his blood,” will see the face of him who is now also on the throne (Rev. 1:5, 6; chs. 21, 23).

The love of God revealed on the cross has been the core of the message and a fundamental motive for the Christian mission from the time of the apostles (2 Cor. 5:14–21) until the present day.

JOHN A. McINTOSHI
Lutheran Mission

Lutheran Mission. Lutheran world mission as an empirical fact began with the sending of Lutheran missionaries to Tranquebar, South India, by the Danish-Halle Mission (1706). This marked the first recorded sending of Protestant missionaries to a non-Western nation. Important antecedents are found in the work of Martin Luther and the sixteenth-century Reformation. Several periods of Lutheran mission activity must be distinguished.

Although Gustav Warneck (1834–1910), the father of nineteenth-century continental missiology, criticized Luther as being indifferent to mission because the Reformer had not supported regular overseas mission endeavors, later scholars demonstrated that Luther’s theology and understanding of church and kingdom were thoroughly missionary. For Luther, mission meant reestablishing the church on its true evangelical foundation in Jesus Christ and the gospel. Always the work of the Triune God, the goal of mission is the coming of the kingdom. God’s dynamic Word penetrates every barrier of culture, religion, or geography and awakens faith. The church, missionary in its very nature, is God’s instrument sending out his Word into the world. Every baptized believer has both a right and a duty to witness to Christ.

For Luther, God’s mission continues through the apostles and the church to the ends of time and space, resulting in universal proclamation though not world conversion. Because of the cross and the opposition of Satan, true believers will always remain a minority. The community of believers, proclamation of the gospel, baptism, the Lord’s Supper, lay witness, and a regular min-

Luce, Alice Eveline (1873–1955). English missionary to India and the United States. Born in Cheltenham, England, into the home of an Anglican vicar, she was educated at the Cheltenham Ladies’ College and London Bible College. She received further training in nursing and became competent in five languages. In 1896 she sailed to India and served as a missionary for sixteen years under the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Her identification with the Pentecostal movement began in India when, convinced of the authenticity of the baptism of the Holy Spirit, she prayed until she received it (about 1910). Two years later illness forced her to return to home-side work in England and Canada; she resigned from CMS for medical reasons. She then began work among Hispanics in Mexico, Texas, and later California, and was ordained in 1915 by the Assemblies of God (AoG). In 1926 she founded the Berean Bible Institute of San Diego (now the Latin American Bible College) for training pastors and evangelists and served there until her death.

Luce’s pioneering work of training an indigenous clergy for the evangelization of the Hispanic population provided the way for many young people to minister effectively to their own people. Author of several books, including The Messenger and His Message (1925) and The Little Flock in the Last Days (1927), she also prepared curricular materials for the Bible Institute and contributed regularly to various AoG publications. Her work laid the foundation for AoG missionary strategy and largely explains their successful Hispanic evangelism in the United States.

Lull, Ramon (c. 1235–1315). Missionary to North Africa. Ramon Lull was born on the island of Majorca. A dissolute early life was followed by marriage to Blanca Picany, who bore him two children, but not until the age of thirty did he give his life to Christ after seeing visions of the crucifixion.

The conversion of infidels became his passion. He spent nine years at the University of Palma studying Arabic, disputing with Jews and Mus-
The Enlightenment of the eighteenth century and the French revolutionary movement had devastating consequences for missions, undercutting theological clarity and motivation. But among Lutheran Pietists and Moravian circles commitment to mission endured and blossomed anew in the evangelical awakening of the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Lutherans and Reformed Christians joined hands in forming evangelical mission societies for recruiting, training, and sending missionaries to Asia and Africa. The Basel (1815) and Rheinisch (1828) mission societies were typical. After 1840, however, Lutherans in Europe and North America began organizing mission work on strictly confessional lines with the aim of propagating pure Lutheran doctrine, ministry, and sacraments overseas. The Dresden (later Leipzig) Lutheran mission was an early example. Some Lutherans (e.g., Bruno Gutmann in Tanzania, Christian Keysser in Papua New Guinea, and Johannes Warneck in Indonesia) developed Lutheran mission concepts that combined the gospel, social structures, and indigenous cultural forms. Lutheran missions in the late nineteenth century reflected a mixture of Lutheran confessional piety and student volunteer enthusiasm. European colonialism and America’s ascendance as an imperial power also contributed to popular support for Lutheran mission around 1900.

With the outbreak of World War I, Lutheran world missions faced a crisis—the wartime separation of Lutherans into opposing camps. German Lutheran missionaries working in British colonial territories were interned, with the result that their fledgling mission communities were orphaned. North American and Swedish Lutheran mission groups, working closely with the Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh Missionary Conference (1910), later the International Missionary Council (1921), managed to save German orphaned missions from seizure as wartime booty. Lutherans raised large sums of money and assumed trusteeship responsibilities for these missions affected by war.

This inter-Lutheran rescue operation, with its parallel in World War II, became a primary inspiration for international Lutheran cooperation. It led to the formation of the Lutheran World Convention (1923) and the Lutheran World Federation (1947), uniting more than 120 member churches encompassing 60 million Lutherans on six continents. The policies of the LWF Commission on World Mission (1952) and Church Cooperation (1970) called for formation of united Lutheran churches in mission areas, autonomy and representation for all member churches—small or large—in the world body, internationalization of the missionary force, and sharing of international resources for cooperative programs of mission, service, training, and development.

Western Lutheran churches and mission societies maintain both bilateral and multilateral relationships with partner churches in Asia, Africa, Oceania, and Latin America. Lutherans tend to favor integration of missions into the life of the church, though some independent mission societies still exist. In Germany and Scandinavia, formerly independent mission societies are now the mission departments of regional or national churches. The Ecumenical Movement has compelled Lutherans to rethink earlier attitudes of confessional exclusiveness. While supporting ecumenical ventures, Lutherans remain divided in their views about church unity and inclusive church fellowship.

World Lutherans, after nearly three centuries of global mission effort, remains predominantly a Western phenomenon with 37 million Lutherans in Europe and nearly 9 million in North America. Between 1950 and 2000, however, there was astonishing growth in the Two-Thirds World: 8 million in Africa, slightly less than 5 million in Asia, and 1.4 million in Latin America. The largest of the younger Lutheran churches are found in Indonesia, Tanzania, Ethiopia, Madagascar, India, Brazil, Papua New Guinea, South Africa, and Namibia. The participation of these bodies in the Lutheran world communion, and in LWF international programs for mission, service, development, theological study, and interfaith dialogue, has altered the historically Western character of Lutheranism and raised anew the question of Lutheran identity amid change and diversity.

Luxembourg (Est. 2000 pop.: 425,000; 2,586 sq. km. [998 sq. mi.]). The Grand Duchy of Luxembourg is an independent European country bordered by Belgium, Germany, and France. Its large iron and steel industry has produced a very high standard of living. Because of its central location Luxembourg has been subject to foreign invasions and domination for much of its history, which includes periods of Burgundian, Spanish, French, Austrian, and Prussian control. In 1815, it regained national independence and, after its autonomy was strengthened, developed democratic institutions. Luxembourg was declared a neutral country until giving up its neutrality to join various economic, political, and military organizations in 1948. Having already formed a close economic union with Belgium in 1921, Luxembourg became one of the founding members of the European Economic Community. With many offices and banks of that organization being located in Luxembourg, one-quarter of the working population are foreigners.

Luxembourg's native population is primarily of French and German descent. The predominant spoken language is Letzeburgesch, which is a mixture of German and French. In fact, it is such a mixture that neither French nor German natives can understand it. The people of Luxembourg wanted something distinctly their own. Both German and French are official languages, so most of the 425,000 nationals have learned at least two languages.

There is freedom of religion in Luxembourg. The Roman Catholic Church is the state church, with a membership of approximately 97 percent of the population. Protestants are a minority making up just over 1 percent of the population, most of them foreign. The foreigners seem to be hard to reach because of their mobility and lack of interest in spiritual things. Next to the Catholics, the largest group among the national population is the Jehovah's Witnesses.

Luzbetak, Louis J. (1917– ). American missiological anthropologist and missionary to New Guinea. Born in Joliet, Illinois, to a devout Catholic family which had emigrated from Slovakia, Luzbetak knew early in life that the mission of Christ was his only option. He entered the Divine Word Seminary at Techy, Illinois, as a freshman in high school, and over the next fourteen years (until his ordination), this group became a second family to him. After two years of theological studies in Gregorian University (Rome), he was asked to study anthropology at the University of Fribourg under Wilhelm Schmidt, who assigned him to research the Caucasus region in the southwestern Soviet Union. Because of the Cold War, Luzbetak was unable to enter the Caucasus for his fieldwork, and consequently went to New Guinea, where he worked from 1952 to 1956.

There he observed that the gospel did not reach the people's hearts because it lacked cultural relevancy. He dedicated himself to bring anthropological insights to the missionary task to make the gospel/culture encounter more significant. This dedication profoundly influenced his teaching career.

Luzbetak's service was rich in ecumenical exposure; his gracious spirit accommodating him across evangelical, ecumenical, and Catholic contexts. He taught at the Catholic University and Georgetown University, served as president of Divine Word Seminary (Epworth, Iowa), director of the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate (CARA) and editor of Anthropos (Germany). He was an official Catholic observer at Lausanne (1974) and the Willowbank Consultation, as well as the second president of the American Society of Missiology. His most widely recognized books are The Church and Cultures: An Applied Anthropology for the Religious Worker (1963) and The Church and Cultures: New Perspectives in Missiological Anthropology (1988).

Mabille, Adolphe (1836–94). Swiss missionary in Lesotho. Born in Switzerland into the family of a teacher who was active in the Free Church of the Canton of Vaud, he studied at Yverdon and Basel and worked as a French teacher in the Netherlands and then England where he was converted and decided to become a missionary. In 1856–59 he studied theology in Paris in preparation for service with the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society in its work in Lesotho. Before leaving he married Adèle Casalis (1840–1923), the daughter of Eugène Casalis, founder of the Lesotho mission and at the time the society’s director. Born in Africa, she taught him the language while they were traveling to the field. At the society’s Morija station he worked as an evangelist, opened a Bible school to train indigenous catechists (the first missionary to do so in southern Africa), and directed a publishing enterprise that brought out the Sotho Bible he had translated as well as a dictionary, hymnbook, and numerous tracts. He served as an adviser to the paramount chief Moshoeshoe (Moshesh) I and mediated conflicts between the Sotho and Boers (Afrikaners) who were encroaching on their territory. This eventually led to the establishment of the British protectorate of Basutoland in 1868. A totally committed laborer, he died of exhaustion at Morija in 1894.

Macau (Portuguese District/Region) (Est. 2000 pop.: 45,000; 16 sq. km. [6 sq. mi.]). The island of Macau lies on the southeastern coast of China. It has been under Portuguese administration since the sixteenth century, and was an important trading port for southern China until the British established Hong Kong in 1841. Due to the recent influx of Chinese immigrants, which have more than doubled the population in a decade, Macau has been revitalized.

The total area of Macao is roughly six square miles, and the population is comprised of 95 percent Chinese, 3 percent Portuguese and other Europeans, and 2 percent other Asian. Portuguese and Chinese are the two official languages, and the Cantonese dialect is by far the predominant spoken language. In 1999 its sovereignty reverted back to China, two years after a similar arrangement for Hong Kong. The church has remained small through the years. Roughly 80 percent of the population is Buddhists and 6 percent Roman Catholic, while Protestants number less than 1 percent.

The Roman Catholic Church established work in Macau in the mid-sixteenth century. By 1576 the first bishop, Melchoir Carneiro, was installed to oversee the parish. Originally the church was primarily for the Portuguese population, but it opened its doors to the Chinese in the nineteenth century. The church experienced rapid growth after 1949 when many Catholic refugees came from China for safe haven. It was at St. Paul Seminary of Macau that Matteo Ricci, the pioneer Roman Catholic missionary, received his training. There are now about twenty churches serving the Catholic community in Macau.

In 1807 the London Missionary Society sent Robert Morrison, the first Protestant missionary to China. He was stationed in Macau, concentrating on language acquisition and the translation of the Bible into the Chinese language. He gave his life for the sake of the gospel and was buried in Macau. There are now fifty-five Protestant churches of various denominations. The majority of the believers are grassroots people. The church faces a critical need for leadership in both the clergy and the laity. In addition, there is a high turnover rate among the pastors since very few are home grown. The majority come from neighboring Hong Kong. In 1982 the Macau Bible Institute was established to meet this critical need.

In recent years many mission agencies, both Chinese and Western, have made a renewed effort to reach the masses, especially new immigrants. The results have been steady but slow.

John D. L. Hsu
The first missionary sent by Canadian Presbyterians, Mackay settled in Tamsui in 1872 after graduating from Princeton Theological Seminary and studying theology in Edinburgh under Alexander Duff. Breaking with many missionary conventions, Mackay married a Formosan woman, maintained training schools for boys, girls, and women, and established a hospital and scientific-cultural museum.

His regular strategy was for a group to enter a village temple compound, gather a crowd by singing hymns, follow it by dental work, and then preach. Once a congregation was established, national preachers and Bible-women were employed rather than foreign missionaries. Before dying of throat cancer Mackay saw sixty chapels established in northern Formosa, leaving behind an encyclopedic knowledge of the peoples yet to be reached.

Mackay, John Alexander

Mackay, John Alexander (1889–1983). Scottish missionary to Peru and Mexico; ecumenical leader. Born in Inverness, Scotland, he was seriously convicted of the correlation between his academic preparation and God’s call to be a Christian missionary. He studied in Scotland, the United States, Spain, Peru, and Germany. “At the core of my movement from one academic center to another,” Mackay wrote, “I sought the cultural preparation that seemed most expedient to equip me for effective missionary service.”

After their marriage on August 16, 1916, Mackay and his bride, Jane Logan Wells, sailed for Lima, Peru, as the first missionaries sent by the Free Church of Scotland to Latin America. There they ministered from 1916 to 1932—nine years in Lima and seven years in Montevideo and Mexico City. Afterwards, Mackay served as president of Princeton Theological Seminary and became a central figure in the founding of the World Council of Churches.

As a “Christian traveler on the road,” his discovery of “the incarnational approach to the human situation” based on John 1:14 became the core of his missionary legacy and to this approach he dedicated his entire life and missionary work among academic audiences. He theorized: “I learned early in my career . . . that if I was to be taken seriously and to succeed in influencing others in the direction of the Christian faith, it was essential to establish close ties of friendship with them, and learn to understand their cultural background and aspirations.”

Macomber, Eleanor (1801–40). American pioneer missionary to Myanmar (formerly Burma). Her first missionary venture came in 1830 when she was sent by the Baptist Missionary Board of America as a teacher among the Ojibwas in Michigan. After nearly four years her health failed and she was forced to return to New York. In 1836 she became associated with the Burma Mission. In the autumn of that year she was appointed to Dong Yhan to work among the Karens. Her strategy was to begin immediately the worship of God in their midst. With little knowledge of the language, she gathered people on the Sabbath to hear the gospel. Weekdays she invited people for morning and evening prayers, often asking questions at the close. She soon had a school of a dozen pupils, and a church was formed in less than one year. With a select group of converts, she traveled widely to other villages. While away from her remote post she became ill and died nine days later. She left behind a band of disciples well grounded in the Christian faith.

Macomber was one of very few single women sent to a foreign mission field in her era. She ventured beyond the limited role for women and, in her relatively short tenure, laid the foundation for a permanent Christian presence among Burmese tribes.

Madagascar (Est. 2000 pop.: 17,259,000; 587,041 sq. km. [226,657 sq. mi.]). Larger than France and Belgium combined, Madagascar, located off Africa’s southeastern coast and the world’s fourth largest island, is nearly 1,000 miles long and 350 miles wide. The more than 17 million people and their culture are of Indo-Malaysian origin with later African, Arab, and Western influences.

After failed Protestant and Catholic mission attempts in the sixteenth century, the first enduring Christian work began on August 18, 1818, when David Jones and Thomas Bevan, London Missionary Society (LMS) missionaries, arrived in Tamatave. Within six months the Bevans and Jones’ wife and child died. Jones began work in the interior Merina kingdom under King Radama I, who desired to modernize his kingdom.

Bible translation (completed in 1835) and printing were given highest priority although the mission built schools and churches. People were attracted by the sermons and singing, both traditional Malagasy cultural forms, but seven years passed before a convert was baptized.

After Radama I’s death in 1828, traditionalists took power and a great persecution ensued until 1863. Bibles were destroyed, missionaries were banned, and Christians were martyred. The church grew tenfold with indigenous leadership; the martyrs’ faithful witness partially accounted for this growth.

Queen Ranavalona II came to power in 1869. She destroyed the national idols and invited the missionaries to return. The next thirty years saw some of the fastest church growth in mission history as much of the nation came into the church.

The LMS returned, took over the churches from local leadership, and invited the Quakers to join their work in 1867. By the early twentieth century the church was nominal.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel began in 1864. The Norwegian Mission arrived in 1866, and the American Lutherans as a branch of the Norwegians in 1888. The Lutheran Church today is a large nationwide church.

The French conquered the nation in 1896. The French Reformed Church took up the slack of the British missionaries as the French colonial government forced them out. During the period of French rule (1896–1958) the Roman Catholic Church, the only official church, gained strength.

Beginning in the south, the area of Lutheran work, in 1894 and continuing to the present, revival movements have been characteristic of the Malagasy church. The revival encompasses parts of all major denominations today.

In 1960 the LMS, Quakers, and French Reformed combined to become the United Church of Madagascar, an influential church today. Several smaller churches began in the twentieth century: Seventh-Day Adventists (1926), Malagasy Baptists (1932), Evangelical Mission of Tana-narive (1952), Jesus Saves (1962), and the United Pentecostal Church (1969).

From 1972 until 1991, the nation was under a strong socialist government that sent thousands of young people to socialist nations, the Soviet Union in particular, for military and university education. Many came to Christ in those nations and returned with a strong witness that contributed to revival.

Since 1991, many evangelical organizations, both Western and indigenous, have opened work in Madagascar. Malagasy Christians have served as missionaries in North and South Africa and in Europe. Many have taken significant leadership roles in the Lutheran World Federation, The All Africa Council of Churches, and the World Council of Churches.

Mana is closely related to energy fields as defined by the new age movement and as practiced by some healers in physical therapy. Mana is innate in an object or person and works apart from human expertise. It accounts for successes or lack thereof. It can be controlled by the right rituals but is dangerous to the ignorant. Charms, which attract beneficial supernatural forces, and amulets which ward off evil supernatural influences, are thought effective because they are invested with concentrated mana. Many societies prefer to think of mana as life-force, a personal power which may be transmitted magically to another in very much the same way as mana flows from one object to another. Magical practices and beliefs are found in all societies. Among others, even Western sportsmen practice magical rituals to ensure success over their rivals. Frequently societies influenced by concepts of magic and mana transfer these concepts to Christian practices such as communion, ordination, healing, speaking in tongues, liturgies, and holy places, resulting in syncretistic beliefs and practices.

Mahayana Buddhism

Form of Buddhism dominant in China, Japan, Korea, and Vietnam. It arose between 150 B.C. and A.D. 100 in reaction against theravada Buddhism for its literal interpretation of Buddha’s teachings as well as its narrow concern for personal salvation through strenuous monastic disciplines achievable only by a few. The term “mahayana” (greater vehicle) expresses the ideal of universal enlightenment in contrast to “hinayana” (lesser vehicle), which aims at salvation for oneself. Its followers thus have a deep sense of mission. Even as they seek their own salvation, they do so mainly for the sake of others. Mahayana represents a radical reinterpretation of the most fundamental concepts in Buddhism—the concepts of buddha, arhat, emptiness, and nirvana.

In theravada, the Buddha is regarded merely as the historical human sage who attained his own enlightenment, the merits of which cannot be transferred. However, in mahayana, the concept of the Buddha becomes that of the absolute being embodying ultimate truth and infinite compassion. The historical Sakyamuni was thought of as nothing but one of the many earthly appearances of the transcendent Buddha. There were buddhas before and after him. Amitabha is an example. Thus mahayanaists do believe in a divine being, faith and devotion to whom constitutes an essential part of salvation. While theravada emphasizes self-effort for liberation, mahayana emphasizes the gift of merit from Buddha. Thus the idea of grace is implicit.

Equally important is the idea that Buddhahood is attainable by all. Mahayana teaches that every human person possesses the Buddha nature. With proper help, one is capable of becoming a Buddha. This leads to the development of the idea of Bodhisattva in the place of the Theravada Arhant. An arhat is “the worthy one” who has achieved enlightenment for himself or herself, ready to be released from the cycle of rebirth to enter into nirvana. A Bodhisattva has likewise achieved liberation from rebirths, has even achieved transcendence, but puts off nirvana in order to remain in the world for the sake of delivering others. The merits of his or her virtues and wisdom can be transferred. A Bodhisattva has to go through ten stages of purification to become a Buddha. However, once the seventh stage is reached, he or she has already assumed a true Buddha nature. Progress to Buddhahood is then irreversible and sacrificial benevolence for others is spontaneous. A Bodhisattva may be regarded as the agent of salvation to those who have faith in him or her. This explains the rise of the cult of various Bodhisattvas. The cult of Avalokitesvara (“Kuan-yin” for the Chinese, and “Kannon” for the Japanese) is a good example. Self-reliance for salvation in Theravada is thus transformed into salvation through faith in a transcendent agent in the Mahayana.

Mahayanists on the one hand regard all empirical phenomena, including their constitutive elements, as void and empty; on the other, however, they affirm the reality of the indescribable Absolute. Only the Absolute is real, all empirical entities are illusions. The Madhyamika School (founded by Nagarjuna, circa A.D. 15–250) follows the Middle Way. They first expose the “self-hood” of all things as void or “empty.” All phenomenal entities are like shadows without substance of their own. There is no coming into being or disappearing, no differentiation or identification. However, they do not therefore affirm absolute nothingness. They affirm the reality of the Absolute. The Yogacara School (founded by the brothers Asanga and Vasubandhu in the fifth century A.D.) affirms the reality of the Absolute Mind. Only Consciousness is real. All appearances of external reality are nothing but false imaginations of the mind. All of these can be eradicated only by rigorous meditation. For both schools, nirvana is therefore complete identification with the Absolute. Once this is achieved, one sees that the only reality is the Absolute; all the rest is revealed to be nonreality. Since the Absolute is indescribable, true knowledge is therefore unutterable. All knowledge that can be conceptualized and expressed must also be empty. Even the principle of sunyata (emptiness) itself is empty. Nonattachment is the ultimate principle for salvation.

Buddhism spread to China in the first century A.D. It first encountered stiff resistance. For more than two centuries, Buddhism remained foreign. Kumarajiva (A.D. 344–413) and his followers made significant contributions in the indigenization of Mahayana Buddhism in China. They used the best literary style and the most prominent philosophical ideas of the time for the propagation of Buddhism. Translation of carefully selected Buddhist texts proved to be highly significant. Mahayana Buddhism took on a distinctively Chinese character and evolved into several schools such as the T'ien Tai, Hua-yuen, Pure Land, and Ch'an. Taoist influence is quite evident. Buddhism was introduced into Japan from China, and it began to prosper there in the seventh century A.D. Pure Land Buddhism and Zen Buddhism became most prominent. Whether in China or Japan, it is the practical aspects of Buddhism that seem to be most emphasized.

Malawi (Est. 2000 pop.: 12,144,000; 118,484 sq. km. [45,747 sq. mi.]). A century of missionary work by Malawians and foreigners made Malawi a Christian country. Islam, which came to Malawi twenty years earlier (c. 1840), became a minority (17%). Traditional religion, though much of it is still an everyday option for Muslims and Christians, is no longer an organized religion (5%). Even the officials at the territorial rain shrines are usually Christians or Muslims.

Malawi was first put on the Christian map by David Livingstone (1858), who also settled the first mission (Universities’ Mission to Central Africa) at Magomero in 1861. This Anglican mission could not stay long, but returned to Malawi from Zanzibar (1882). Early missionary work in Malawi was dominated by Presbyterians (Free Church of Scotland, Livingstonia, 1875; Church of Scotland, Blantyre, 1876; Dutch Reformed Church, South Africa, Nkhoma, 1889). These churches formed the Church of Central Africa Presbyterian (1926).

With Malawi being seen as a Presbyterian/English territory, evangelical and Catholic missions were seen as intruders. The early evangelical missions (except South Africa General Mission, 1900) all go back to Joseph Booth, a Baptist from Melbourne: Zambezi Industrial Mission, 1892; Nyassa Industrial Mission, 1893; Churches of Christ, 1896; Seventh-Day Baptists,
Malaysia

Malaysia (Est. 2000 pop.: 22,299,000; 329,758 sq. km. [127,320 sq. mi.]). Early Christian presence may be traced to Nestorians and to traders in Melaka prior to the Portuguese conquest in 1511. The British acquired Penang in 1786, and in 1795 took over Melaka, which had been conquered by the Dutch in 1641. Roman Catholic priests from Thailand established the Major Seminary in Penang in 1810. The LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) was based in Melaka and Penang from 1815, but most Protestant missions collapsed after 1842 when it became possible to enter China. Catholic leadership remained, but was divided between Portuguese and French. Open Brethren ministry dates from 1860 and Methodist from 1885. Presbyterianism grew through Chinese churches in Johore and expatriate congrega-
Malaysia

...tions in Penang, Ipoh, and Kuala Lumpur. Missions to Sengoi indigenous people began in 1932. Pentecostalism became a larger influence through the CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT of the 1970s, but North American and Ceylonese Pentecostal missionaries had been active from 1935.

Migration was an important factor in church growth. In Sabah, the Basnl Mission began work among migrant Hakka Chinese in 1882, many of whom were Christian. Tamil migrants to Malaya included Catholics, Lutherans, Anglicans, and Methodists. Migration increased after the Boxer Rebellion, particularly to Sitiawan and Sibu, still strong Chinese Methodist centers. Mar Thoma and Syrian Orthodox Churches were established in the 1930s following migration from the Kerela Coast of India.

In Sarawak the rule of Rajah Brooke included support for an Anglican ministry from 1847 and Catholics were later admitted. In 1828 the Australian Borneo Evangelical Mission began work with modest resources which nevertheless resulted in the largest indigenous church in Malaysia today, the SIB.

World War II saw the removal of expatriate leadership and a path toward INDIGENOUS CHURCHES was more clearly set. The Malay Christian Council (MCC), founded in 1948, coordinated mission groups during the Malayan Emergency. Chinese relocated into “New Villages” were served by missionaries, some formerly in China, who worked alongside local Christians in social and medical work. However, after independence in 1957, many churches became overly dependent on expatriates. In the 1970s churches developed structures independent of Singapore as well as of overseas support. Recent growth in independent churches is another sign of a desire to establish a Malaysian Christian identity.

Christian commitment to education has been strong through Anglican, Catholic, and Methodist schools, now part of the government education system. Social concern is expressed through medical work, and organizations such as Malaysian CARE. The Salvation Army and YMCA/YWCA make distinctive contributions.

Since 1983 the National Evangelical Christian Fellowship (NECF) has provided a focus for evangelical and independent congregations. The Christian Federation of Malaysia incorporating the Christian Council of Malaysia (formerly MCC), Roman Catholics, and the NECF was formed in 1986. The Sabah Council of Churches and Association of Churches of Sarawak fulfill similar functions in East Malaysia.

Malaysia is a multi-religious context where Western theological preoccupations are not always relevant. Lay leadership has developed strongly in most churches. Although there are many challenges through changing political and economic circumstances, like Malaysia itself, the churches are beginning to see that they have a contribution to make on a larger stage.

Maldives (Est. 2000 pop.: 297,000; 298 sq. km. [115 sq. mi.]). The archipelago called the Republic of Maldives, which lies 450 miles southwest of Sri Lanka, with its unique flora and fauna, is an almost perfect tropical oasis. However, some environmentalists are predicting a greenhouse deluge by the year 2020 that will completely cover the 1,192 islands, none of which rise more than three meters above sea level.

Inhabited by Sri Lankans from 500 B.C. on, there is an ancient tradition about a people called the Redin, a sun-worshipping people whose pagan heritage of beliefs and customs involving spirits, or jinns, is still evident today. The Redin, who may have arrived in 2000 B.C., supposedly left the islands about 500 B.C. or were absorbed by Buddhists from Ceylon and by Hindus from India. Later, the Maldivians converted to Sunni Islam. Because the islands were so small and building materials were limited, each subsequent people group built its important structures on the foundations of the previous inhabitants—this explains why many Maldivian mosques face the sun and not Mecca.

The government is based on Islamic law and uses its authority to enforce religious and civil Islam in order to promote national unity. We know of no officially recognized Maldivian Christians. Although restricted and unreceptive to the gospel thus far, Maldivians have made significant contacts with Christians through international commercial and sports events (e.g., the 1990 Indian Ocean Island Games in Madagascar). These contacts should be pursued by culturally sensitive Christians who can use such meetings as opportunities to help the Maldivians go beneath the surface of Islam and consider biblical answers to questions and fears stemming from their animistic background.

Mali (Est. 2000 pop.: 12,559,000; 1,240,192 sq. km. [478,838 sq. mi.]). Mali, the seventh largest country in Africa, is located in West Africa. Its population of over 12 million is comprised of thirty-three ethnic groups. Although the official language is French, the trade languages of Bambara, Fufulde, and Songhai are most commonly used. The economy is based on agriculture, which involves 80 percent of the population and is dependent on exports of cotton, peanuts, and cattle. While a mere 2 percent of the land is arable, 66 percent of the country is covered by the ever-encroaching Sahara Desert, which is spreading southward at a rate of eighty miles per year.

Although now one of the poorest countries in the world, Mali has a rich heritage. In the fourteenth century, the borders of its vast and enormously wealthy empire stretched inland from the Atlantic coast to the famed desert cities of Gao and Timbuktu. Colonized by France in the late 1800s, Mali became part of the French Sudan. Following independence in 1960, the country was governed by presidents under one-party rule until a 1991 coup d’état overthrew the regime in power and multiparty democracy was instituted.

Islam penetrated the land through a combination of economic and military persuasion. At times it waxed fervent, as during the Fulbe jihads of the 1800s, but for the most part was simply accepted and adapted to the existing culture. The Islamic sociopolitical system extolled by North African reformers has generally been given a lukewarm reception by the more ethnically diverse sub-Saharan nations. However, pressure has been increasing in recent years, as money and arms are offered by oil-rich Islamic nations to the people’s desperate plight, while Christian organizations poured in relief grain by the hundreds of tons. Nevertheless, Islam remains firmly entrenched at levels of authority, and opposition to Christianity, though not always overt, is staunch. Property and positions easily obtained by Muslims are often “unavailable” when sought by Christians. It is expected that as the Malian church grows in strength, such opposition will increase. Nevertheless, the church has been encouraged by the freedom of religion that is guaranteed by the country’s Constitution.

Protestant missionary efforts in Mali began in 1919 with the entry of the Gospel Missionary Union, followed by the Christian and Missionary Alliance in 1923. In the early 1950s they were joined by the Evangelical Baptists and the United World Mission. In 1980 other mission organizations began entering the country, and by 1993, 309 missionaries from 35 different agencies were ministering in Mali.

The growth of Christianity has been steady, and a significant response has been seen among the Dogon, the Bwa, and other groups. Drought and desertification, with the subsequent increase of disease due to inadequate nutrition, lack of potable water, illness triggered by dust and heat, and decreased economic stability, have significantly impacted the church. These circumstances make it difficult to support pastors and ministry projects, and tend to promote dependence on outside sources. Nevertheless, a new vision is rising among Christians—a sense of urgency to bring the gospel message to the unreached of every ethnic group. This new vision was clearly demonstrated by the scores of young people who dedicated themselves to full-time Christian service during a Youth Congress held in the capital city, Bamako, in 1995.

The 1995 organization of a Malian mission agency, Cidenya Komite, and the commissioning of a Malian couple as missionaries to a presently unreached people group, signifies the movement of the evangelical church of Mali from a body that receives missionaries to one that is participating in the fulfillment of the Great Commission by sending missionaries themselves to those who are unreached.

In expressing their concerns for the future, national church leaders see an urgent need for programs that will provide well-trained leaders capable of guiding the growing numbers of fledgling Christians to spiritual maturity, practical development projects that can assist people to regain economic stability, and health-care projects that provide medical assistance and basic teaching, giving evidence of Christian love and concern for those in need.

There has been a notable sense of disillusionment with Islam and an increasing openness to the gospel at the grassroots level of the populace since the drought years of 1973–87. Some have attributed this to a lack of response by the Islamic nations to the people’s desperate plight, while Christian organizations poured in relief grain by the hundreds of tons. Nevertheless, Islam remains firmly entrenched at levels of authority, and opposition to Christianity, though not always overt, is staunch. Property and positions easily obtained by Muslims are often “unavailable” when sought by Christians. It is expected that as the Malian church grows in strength, such opposition will increase. Nevertheless, the church has been encouraged by the open atmosphere in the new democratic state, and looks to the future with hopeful anticipation.

Mallory, Kathleen (1879–1954). American missions promoter and leader. She grew up in a Christian home of Southern Baptist parents in Selma, Alabama, and was educated at Woman’s College of Baltimore. Her engagement to a young physician ended with his death of tuberculosis. While attending the Alabama Baptist Convention (1908) with her father she was awakened to world missions. Her work began with the various women’s auxiliaries to the Southern Baptist Convention of Alabama. In 1912 she was elected the corresponding secretary of the denomination-wide Woman's Missionary Union, headquartered in Baltimore, later in Birmingham (1921).

Kathleen's organizational and business acumen was reflected in the performance of her multifarious tasks, including increasing organizational efficiency, establishing policy, raising funds for special causes, taking care of voluminous correspondence, and traveling widely. She edited the monthly magazine Royal Service and wrote numerous publications.

Under her leadership the Union expanded in the Orient, South America, Europe, and Africa. She encouraged its counterpart among African Americans in the National Baptist Convention. Over the years she was the recipient of numerous honors. Her legacy among Baptist women was to keep the Great Commission at the forefront through her emphases upon Christian stewardship.

Malta (Est. 2000 pop.: 377,000; 316 sq. km. [122 sq. mi.]). Island republic in the Mediterranean between Italy and Tunisia, and the site of the apostle Paul's famous shipwreck (Acts 28–29). It was also the home of the Hospitallers or "Knights of Malta" (1530–1798). One-tenth the size of Rhode Island and with a population of some 334,000, Malta won independence from Britain in 1964. About 97 percent of its indigenous people are Roman Catholics, most of whom attend Mass, and community and cultural life center around the national church. A challenge to this rigid regime was made by the Labour Party in the immediate post-independence years, and perhaps also by Vatican II reforms, but the Maltese church remains one of the most conservative in the world, disallowing both divorce and civil marriage.

The country's Constitution guarantees freedom of worship to other religions, but the latter effectively serve only the expatriate community. Scope for evangelistic outreach is in practice severely limited and even tacitly discouraged by mainline Protestant bodies themselves.

Management. Global mission in the post–World War II world has increasingly taken on strategic forms. David Barrett and others have documented the exponential growth of world evangelization plans featuring closure strategies. With increased specialization in global mission has come the use of resources from the world of organizational studies in an attempt to maximize the efforts of missionaries and sending agencies.

Current research does provide specificity in the use of terms. Leadership and management are words that are often used interchangeably, but these functions have specific though interrelated character. Leadership focuses on doing the right things while management focuses on doing things right. Leadership motivates people to want to do while management focuses on getting people to do.

The application of management principles to mission agencies necessitates the facilitation organizationally of at least three questions that form an integrated system. First, Who are we? As a mission agency, organizational identity is crucial to long-term effectiveness. Second, What is our business? What are the definable features of the mission agency and the parameters of the activities that provide uniqueness for the agency? Lastly, How do we get our “business” done? What particular tasks are chosen to fulfill our “business”? Management of the tasks/functions that flesh out these three questions constitutes a stewardship of ministry that facilitates mission efforts.

Particular management tasks provide cohesiveness to this integrated system of evaluative questions. The task of formulating mission statements gives the management of a mission organization self-identity and purpose. The task of strategic planning functions to enflish the mission statement with specific goals that best focus the agency's purpose. The task of personnel management is an ongoing function. Starting with CANDIDATE and continuing with LANGUAGE and CULTURE training, pre-field and reentry preparation, the management of personnel in mission organizations is increasingly complex. Management of on-field funding, children's education, health, and safety issues is continuous. Conflict management is a task that finds necessary usage among missionary personnel, agency leadership, and mission–national relationship.

The "how" function of any mission agency necessitates the organizing task, which arranges the work of the organization in ways most likely to bring about desired results. In Western agencies, organizational flow-charts, job-ministry descriptions, and levels of personnel participation all become part of the ongoing management scheme. The controlling function of managing organizations requires proper measurements statistically and fiscally. Controlling informational feedback is necessary to most efficiently carry out the purposes of the mission agency. Current research is highlighting the need to become a learning organization. To remain efficient in managing the purposes that the agency has defined for itself, mission efforts must implement processes of continuous improvement. Mission agencies must continually commit themselves to being organizations of life-long learning seeking to implement an ongoing facilitation of the plan, do, check, and act cycle, so that change can be effected smoothly and maximum efficiency of the stated mission of the agency can continue at optimum levels.

March for Jesus. Modeled after the biblical image of Jesus’ triumphal procession into Jerusalem, the first prayer and praise marches were organized to take worship experiences into the streets. In May of 1987, several groups joined together to organize a rally in London. In spite of inclement weather, some 15,000 turned out. The following year saw 55,000 join in, and the organizers, including song-writer Graham Kendrick, developed plans for multiple marches throughout Britain. Marches for Jesus were held in 45 cities in 1989, and over 600 in 1990. That same year, the first Marches for Jesus were held in the United States in Austin, Texas, with some 1,500 participating. The following year two marches were held in Texas (Austin and Houston) where 22,000 were involved. The organization went nationwide, and on May 23, 1992, there were some 142 marches around the United States. Internationally there were 25 marches in European countries. The movement became a global event in 1993 when, on June 12, an estimated 1.7 million Christians in some 850 cities participated in every continent. The largest single march was in Sao Paulo, where some 300,000 took part. June 25, 1994, was the first official global March for Jesus, with 10 million in 178 nations participating. In 1996, an estimated 2 million took part in the march in Sao Paulo alone.

The tone of the marches has been typically that of love and unity across denominational barriers and a focus on worship. Rather than confronting non-Christians, the marchers seek to celebrate the reality of their love for Jesus in a tangible and positive way. As a display of Christian unity and statement of Jesus’ kingship over all the earth, Marches for Jesus stand as significant events in mission at the end of the twentieth century.

Marginal, Marginalization. Marginalization is the process by which individuals and groups come to live on the margin of a culture, not fully able to participate in its socioeconomic, political, or religious life, due to cultural, political, religious, or socioeconomic differences. The process of marginalization may be the result of historic injustices that have developed over a protracted period of time. These injustices are usually produced by a dominant group or ideology that is systematically and intentionally exclusive. Medieval Europe is an example of a time and context that manifested marginalization in interwoven patterns of socioeconomic, political, and religious life. To be outside the dominant group/ideology was to be systematically excluded from any kind of voice or alternative to the place/purpose assigned by the dominant group. Seventeenth-century England, the entire history of Latin America and the Caribbean, colonial histories on all continents, apartheid in South Africa, immigration histories in the United States, and even the current struggles in the Mexican state of Chiapas all reveal the realities of the intentional marginalization of groups and individuals.

Marginalization is the most negative result of shifting cultural contexts. The failure of assimilation stimulates the development of marginalization. In assimilation the goal is not to maintain an isolated cultural identity, but to establish and maintain relationship with other groups. When this course is freely chosen, it creates the archetypal “melting pot.” If a dominant group forces assimilation, it is termed a “pressure cooker.” Variant forms of marginalization include separation. Willful separation from a dominant culture, such as that practiced by the Amish or Hutterites, has generally been respected. However, if separation is initiated and controlled by a dominant society, the situation is termed segregation. The results of such a cultural dissonance may include an inferiority complex, ambivalence, moodiness, lack of self-confidence, and disconnectedness. These characteristics can be experienced individually or corporately.

The classic definition of marginality maintains a strict separation between dominant and subordinate where unity is a goal between the groups living in a region. The dominant group uses the goal of unity for control of the subordinate group. This process of reaching unity progresses through four stages. The first stage is contact, in which the minority or possibly immigrant group experiences being truly marginalized and alien and may even experience this initial contact in the form of racism. The second stage of the process is competition, in which new or immigrant groups threaten the position of already arrived and more established groups. For example, in U.S. history, immigration of Chinese and Irish laborers in the nineteenth century created competition and great animosity between dominant and subordinate groups. The third stage is accommodation, in which education, socialization, and intermarriage tend to soften the sharp lines between dominant and subordinate groups. The fourth and final stage is called total assimilation, where it is anticipated that the subordinate group will be fully assimilated in the dominant group.

Many marginalized groups increasingly reject the melting pot ideal because the retention of one’s cultural heritage becomes limited. Robert E. Park’s classic theory on assimilation of the races is being replaced by the belief that eventual assimilation of the races and cultures is not possible or even desirable. Assimilation is increasingly viewed as an ideal only for homogenous national groups (for example, on the European Continent). The viewpoint of those previously marginalized is now being taken into consideration and particularly focused around racial and gender categories. In other words, who defines the “marginal” has great impact on how that group acts out its understanding.

Marginalized groups have continually produced revolutionary leaders like Karl Marx who proposed explanations of the evil of marginalization that incited millions to revolution. Given the debilitating dynamics of the process of marginalization that have systematically stripped dignity from people, it is understandable why violence has so often been a response.

Christian history is replete with examples of theologians who have addressed the impact of marginalization on peoples. Francis of Assisi, Martin Luther, and August Francke would be representative of such persons. Recent examples would include contextual theologians like Gustavo Gutiérrez who championed theology from the underside in response to a dominant theological perspective that has been perceived to have grown insensitive to the interconnectedness of gospel and culture in concrete ways (see Gospel and Culture). The contextual theologies have critiqued the perceived abstract theologies of the West (north) (see Liberation Theologies). The alternative theological systems have attempted to bring dignity to those on the underside (subordinate groups) by speaking of God’s interaction with humanity in concrete ways such as caring for the poor or the overthrow of unjust systems.

Non-Western scholars like Paulo Freire have argued for responding to historical examples of marginalization with new models of cultural identity for the “marginalized.” They offer a definition of marginal that has a new identity. The “new marginal person” overcomes marginality without ceasing to be a marginal person. The new marginal person transcends and lives “in but beyond.” In such a model, the once negative word becomes a symbol of a creative nexus that joins diverse and often contradictory worlds together and creates a mosaic rather than a melting pot. Such a reshaping of an understanding of marginalization assumes the reality of a pluralistic world. If we use the shifting cultural context in the United States as an example of the new understanding of “marginal,” we would find that “Anglo-American” does not necessarily mean a white person. True Americans in a pluralistic world are more than black, red, brown, or white. To be American is to be part of a whole as a distinct, identifiable, indispensable section of a beautiful mosaic. All Americans bring their ethnic backgrounds, whether from the majority or minority perspective, to the whole. Every American can be viewed as a marginal person who lives in multiple worlds as a part of a pluralistic society. The new marginality transcends the historic understanding of marginalization as it strives to be truly in both or in all worlds as a unique entity culturally.

Marks, John Ebenezer (1832–1915). English missionary to Myanmar (formerly Burma). Born in London to a family with Jewish roots, Marks launched a career in education as a schoolmaster in Hackney, England. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (SPG) appointed him as a missionary to Burma, where he arrived in 1860 after a difficult voyage. He began his overseas ministry at an Anglican boys’ school in Moulmein. In 1863 he was ordained as a deacon and transferred to Rangoon, where he opened another boys’ school that eventually became known as St. John’s College. The blessing of the king of Upper Burma assisted Marks’s efforts to establish another school in Mandalay in 1869, although the monarch’s support proved to be short-lived. In addition, Marks founded schools at some of the SPG river stations (1867–68) and St. Michael’s School in a Rangoon suburb (1878). Although he helped translate the Book of Common Prayer into Burmese and also served as a chaplain, his major achievements were in educational missions. Utilizing the English public school as his model, Marks influenced 15,000 schoolboys over a thirty-five-year period. Poor health forced his retirement from educational pursuits in 1895 and a return to England in 1898, where he promoted the SPG.

Marriage, Marriage Practices. Marriage is a nearly universal cultural institution. Marriage practices, forms, and rituals are also universal concerns. In considering this topic, therefore, it is particularly important to begin with a biblical understanding of marriage.

What Is Biblical Marriage? The creation account culminates in God’s creation of human beings in his own image (Gen. 1:27). This initial creation of man and woman together as the embodiment of the image of God functions as the foundational paradigm of marriage.

God’s creation, humankind, is first spoken of singularly and inclusively, “him,” this “him” meaning both man and woman. But “him” gives way to “them,” a plural which unites and distinguishes “them” as “male” and “female.” These few words eloquently describe human beings as creatures made in God’s own image, as alike and similar (“him”) and as unique and individual (“male” and “female”). A biblical understanding of marriage addresses each of these aspects.

God blesses and provides for the man and woman, and pronounces his work to be “very good.” The instruction to be fruitful presupposes the sexual union of the man and the woman and the complementary nature of “maleness” and “femaleness.” Alone, neither the man nor the woman accomplishes the apparent intentions of God in creation. It is together that they are commissioned for productivity in raising children and working in God’s world. This point is reinforced in Genesis 2, where God explicitly pronounces, “It is not good that the man should be alone.” The creation of woman completes the creation of humankind and cannot be separated from the creation of the man. The man and woman are joined; they are “one flesh.” They are created in relationship and for relationship.

What Went Wrong? God’s ideal for a harmonious relationship for man and woman, however, quickly broke down through the fall (see also FALL OF HUMANKIND). The initial and fundamental sin in Genesis 3, involving a declaration of independence from God, set off a cycle of human power struggles. It resulted in the eviction from an ideal community and the introduction of conflicting hierarchy replacing complementary harmony.

The difficulty of marital relationships, therefore, along with other human relationships, began with the loss of the ultimate community. A marital relationship cannot occur in isolation from the community at large.

Therefore, some missiological questions arise concerning marriage and marriage practices. How can we recover the ideals of marital relationship without the ideal community of Eden? What interplay takes place between the biblical text and culture? How may members of one culture interact meaningfully about marriage practices with members of another culture?

Biblical Marriage in Contemporary Settings. The biblical paradigm of marriage from the creation account is the ideal to which all marriage practices ought to be compared. It is the ideal par excellence. But the ideal was disrupted by the fall. Therefore, against the ideal of relationship, partnership, oneness, and difference, are the real-life crises which confront modern marriages.

Three basic patterns of marriage are recognized by anthropologists: monogamy, polygyny (commonly called polygamy), and polyandry. A fourth pattern is finding acceptance in limited communities, that of same-sex marriage.

Monogamy, the marriage of one man and one woman, with an exclusive sexual relationship, is the most common idealized form of marriage. Cultural variations of its enactment include religious rituals, civil ceremonies, and common law acceptance. The choice of partner may be up to the individual or at the discretion of the extended family. Monogamy is generally recognized to uphold the creation model of one husband and one wife restated by Jesus (Matt. 19:4–6). Polygamy, one man with two or more wives, is attested to in the Old Testament and continues to be practiced in some cultures today. Polyandry, one woman with two or more husbands, is the least common of the traditional marriage patterns. Same-sex marriages, involving two males or two females, have recently been suggested as analogous to monogamous relationships, though there is no biblical support for this type of marital union.

Several principles can be offered as foundations for the challenges related to marriage and the diversity of marriage practices found in the world today.

1. An initial acceptance of observed marriage patterns. The monogamous standard of Western culture has not always existed and is currently threatened by high divorce rates and multiple marriages resulting in what some have called serial polygamy. Previously accepted marriage patterns in the West have included polygamy, arranged marriages, common-law marriages, and marriages of convenience. It is important to remember that God works over time in the transformation of all cultures and their practices.

2. Understanding. The marriage practices of a culture have a significance for that culture which must be understood if that culture is to be fully understood. How men and women relate to one another, and the meaning of their interactions provide important insights about individuals as well as cultures (see GENDER ROLES). It is likely that some aspects of the relationships we observe will be useful in evaluating and critiquing our own relationships and practices. We must learn before we would be teachers.
Marriage, Marriage Practices

3. Issues of justice and mercy. In understanding and appreciating expressions of marital commitment in our culture as well as in other cultures, we must not overlook the critical issues of justice and mercy. We must remain sensitive to the fact that around the world women tend to be oppressed by men. The gospel is liberating good news of God’s justice to those who are oppressed.

Mercy recognizes that change is difficult, and often can occur only slowly with much hardship. When practices must be changed in order to conform to the creation ideal, then special care must be taken to protect those who might be injured or experience hardship as a result. Established families should never be divided. Rather, we should enable change to occur over generations and with the full knowledge, consent, and participation of those affected.

Missionaries working within polygamous contexts have learned this lesson over the years, many times through trial and error. For example, when a man with many wives becomes a Christian, what direction does the missionary provide concerning the man’s many wives (see POLYGAMY AND CHURCH MEMBERSHIP)? The issues are exceedingly complex, and missionaries must be patient and loving in processing these and other related issues.

Marsden, Samuel (1764–1838). English chaplain and missionary to Australia and New Zealand. Born in Yorkshire, England, he was profoundly impacted by Charles Simeon during his studies at St. John’s College, Cambridge. Samuel Marsden and his young family arrived in Sydney on March 10, 1794. Marsden, “Australia’s second preacher,” began his influential ministry in Sydney and Parramatta, founding the first permanent church building in Australia: St. John’s, Parramatta (1803). A tireless worker, Marsden was involved in farming, magisterial duties, education for orphans, and supervision of a factory for female convicts. The tragic loss of two of his children and an attempt on his life by an angry convict did not supplant Marsden’s missionary vision for the Pacific. On his only furlough to England, Marsden shared his burden for New Zealand, recruiting lay workers to join him. Undaunted by the stories of violent encounters, Marsden, accompanied by eight Maoris and three English missionary families, arrived in Whangoroa, New Zealand, in 1814. On Christmas Day, Marsden proclaimed the “glad tidings” from Luke 2:10 in what was the first Christian service in New Zealand. Marsden, “the Apostle to New Zealand,” made seven journeys to New Zealand and witnessed a mighty work of God.

Marshman, Joshua (1768–1837). English missionary to India. Born in Westbury Leigh, Wiltshire, Marshman apprenticed briefly with a bookseller in London, and then worked in his father’s weaver shop. Despite limited formal education, he moved to Bristol in 1794 to teach at the Broadmead School and study at the Bristol Academy. Accounts of William Carey’s mission efforts in India inspired Marshman to consider a missionary call, and he volunteered for appointment by the Baptist Missionary Society (BMS). In 1799 he and his wife, Hannah, along with William Ward and others, arrived at the Danish trading colony of Serampore, near Calcutta. As one of the famed Serampore Trio, Marshman contributed significantly to educational endeavors, in spite of some resistance from the BMS. He and his wife founded boarding schools to serve both Europeans and Indians. In 1818 Marshman established Serampore College, which he hoped would aid in the development of indigenous churches by training native pastors. He also devoted countless hours to Bible translation projects in several languages, including Bengali, Sanskrit, and Chinese. Although not esteemed as a great preacher, Marshman itinerated in areas beyond Serampore and organized several mission stations. He also wrote for the Friend of India on doctrinal and social issues.

James A. Patterson
Martin of Tours (316–97). Early French monastic missionary. Born into a pagan military family, Martin became a Christian at an early age and received instruction and preparation for baptism. He entered the army in his teens but obtained his discharge after a night in Amiens when, as a vision instructed him, he divided his coat with a beggar. Martin traveled with his friend Hilary to try to convert his parents. After entering monastic life in Milan, he rejoined Hilary and settled in Tours as a hermit, eventually founding the monastery at Ligugé. In 372 he was tricked into becoming the Bishop of Tours. He refused to sit on the bishop’s throne, but chose a crude stool and continued to live as a hermit in a cell outside the city, then founding another monastery in Marmoutier. Sulpicius Severus wrote of many miracles attributed to Martin. The bishop was active in winning non-Christians and traveled extensively outside his diocese on various errands in the interests of the faith. He introduced a parochial system. Although impeccably orthodox, he protested against the persecution of heretics and raised important issues regarding church-state relations.

JOHN EASTERLING

Martin, Walter R. (1928–89). American apologist, evangelist, and author. Martin became a Christian under the ministry of Frank Gaebelein at the Stony Brook School and received a bachelor’s degree from Shelton College and a master’s degree from New York University and Biblical Seminary. Widely considered the father of the American countercult movement, in the 1950s Martin almost single-handedly challenged evangelical Christians to develop biblically faithful and apologetically solid approaches to those involved in cults, non-Christian religions, and the occult. Toward this goal he founded the Christian Research Institute in 1960.

Martin’s first book, Jehovah of the Watch Tower (1953), was followed by many other books, booklets, and tapes, including the standard reference work The Kingdom of the Cults (1965), which remains in print in a revised edition. It has sold over 500,000 copies. Martin was also well known for his call-in radio program The Bible Answer Man, which began in 1965. An outgoing and articulate defender of the faith, he impacted world missions through his trips to Africa, Europe, Latin America, Australia, New Zealand, and the Far East to warn of the challenges of cults.

DOUGLAS GROOTHUIS

Martin, William Alexander Parsons (“Wap” Martin, 1827–1916). American missionary to China. Born in Livonia, Indiana, on April 10, 1827, Martin was raised in a family with a strong missionary zeal. In his last year at New Albany Theological Seminary he decided to be a missionary to China. In 1849, he was accepted as a missionary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions.

Martin’s first publication was his translation of the Bible into the dialect of Ningbo. His Evidence of Christianity proved to be a popular religious text in China, Japan, and Korea. Realizing that the Qing officials and Chinese literati needed to know international law to restrain continuing European encroachment, Martin translated and published Henry Wheaton’s Elements of International Law (1864). Between 1869 and 1894 he taught at and administered the Tong Wen College, an advanced institute for the study of Western knowledge. From 1872 to 1875 he also edited the Zhongxi Wenjianlu, a monthly magazine introducing modern science and technology. Among his works on Chinese culture and contemporaneous events are the Hanlin Papers: Essays on the History, Philosophy, and Religion of the Chinese (1880, 1881, 1894) and The Awakening of China (1907). Through his life and work, Martin established himself not only as a missionary, but also as a source of reform ideals for the Chinese gentry. He died in Beijing at the age of eighty-nine after sixty-six years of service for the Chinese.

Martyn, Henry

Martyn, Henry (1781–1812). English missionary to India and Iran. Born in Cornwall, England, he graduated from Cambridge. After rebelling against God, he followed in the train of David Brainerd and William Carey. Their missionary work motivated him to launch a brief but highly significant career in India and Iran. He emulated Brainerd’s deep levels of piety and Carey’s hard labor in Bible translation. Martyn fell madly in love, but maintained his vow of celibacy for the sake of becoming a missionary. After becoming an Anglican priest, he signed on with the East India Company as a chaplain and went to India in 1805. There he met Carey, who started him in Bible translation work. He had to serve the workers and their families for his employer, but he fervently pursued preaching at military posts—which included Indians—starting schools, and translating the New Testament into Arabic, Persian, and Urdu, the three primary languages of the Muslim world.

Although he was not in good health, he sailed to Iran to do further translation work. He tried to make it back to England overland, but died in Turkey. His model of sacrificial devotion, and his journal, inspired many students and missionaries in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

Martyrdom. The role of martyrdom in the expansion of the church is the common thread that links the church of all ages with its suffering Savior. Tertullian, third-century leader in the church of North Africa, wrote to his Roman governors in his Apology, “As often as you mow us down, the more numerous we become. The blood of the Christians is seed.” But martyrdom is not unique to Christianity. People have sacrificed their lives throughout the ages for a variety of reasons. To define the distinctive meaning of Christian martyrdom requires investigation of the Bible and church history.

Definition. The word martyr is an English word transliterated from its Greek equivalent (martyrō). It is closely associated with the word witness as used in the Scriptures. The Old Testament Hebrew equivalent is moed, which is used in reference to the place where God establishes his covenant with his people.

In the New Testament, the ideas of truth and Scripture are integrated into the verb form mārtucreō. Jesus uses it to establish his witness as truth (Matt. 26:65; Mark 14:63; Luke 22:71). John the Baptist links Jesus, truth, and Scripture. Luke speaks of witness to the whole world (Acts 1:8).

The word martyr also extends its meaning to include Christ-like values, such as faithfulness, truth, witness, and lifestyle. Eventually, even “death-style” is subsumed. The first Christian-era martyr known is Stephen (Acts 7) who, interestingly, was put to death by “witnesses” for his witness. In Revelation 3:14, the last word is given concerning Jesus Christ who is “the faithful and true witness.” The word does away with any distinction of what a true believer might live and die for. Death does not stop the witness given. It merely adds an exclamation point of truth, faithfulness, and love for the glory of God. It is the supreme witnessing act. Neither personal gain nor personal opinion provides the motive for such a death.

Church Growth and Martyrdom. Tertullian also wrote, “For who, when he sees our obstinacy is not stirred up to find its cause? Who, when he has inquired, does not then join our Faith? And who, when he has joined us, does not desire to suffer, that he may gain the whole grace of God?” Current estimates are that roughly 150,000 Christians are martyred each year, down from a peak of 330,000 prior to the demise of communist world powers. Some project that the numbers will increase to 600,000 by A.D. 2025, given current trends in human rights abuses and growth of militant religious systems.

Those inflicting contemporary Christian martyrdom include political regimes with counter-Christian agendas (e.g., official atheistic powers, such as China and the former Soviet Union); sociopolitical regimes enforcing religious restrictions (e.g., Egypt, Sudan); ethnic tribal regimes bent on eliminating minorities (e.g., Sudan, Rwanda, and Burundi) and religious regimes (e.g., Muslim countries in which Sharia is the official legal system).

Conclusion. Martyrdom will continue to be associated with the progress of gospel proclamation until the Kingdom of God is established. Jesus said, “Do not suppose that I have come to bring peace to the earth. I did not come to bring peace, but a sword” (Matt. 10:34). The sword was not to be used by his disciples against others, but could be expected to be used against them. Paul said, “All this is evidence that God’s judgment is right, and as a result you will be counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which you are suffering” (2 Thess. 1:5). Finally, as Augustine wrote in City of God: “Despite the fiercest opposition, the terror of the greatest persecutions, Christians have held with unswerving faith to the belief that Christ has risen, that all men will rise in the age to come, and that the body will live forever. And this belief, proclaimed without fear, has yielded a harvest throughout the world, and all the more when the martyr’s blood was the seed they sowed.”

WILLIAM CAREY, set the tone with his emphasis on played a major role in modern missions. See Marxism. See COMMUNISM, MARXISM.

Mass Communication. It has been said that the Reformation would have been impossible without Gutenberg’s invention of printing with movable type, which made literature available to the common person. The various forms of mass media also seem to have been providentially provided by God for world evangelization, and have played a major role in modern missions.

Print. The “father of modern missions,” WILLIAM CAREY, set the tone with his emphasis on publication and distribution of the Scriptures and other literature. He and his colleagues produced nearly 40 translations of the Bible or portions thereof in languages of South Asia, along with a great number of tracts and other Christian materials. A fellow member of the “SERAMPORE TRIO,” WILLIAM WARD, was an experienced printer and newspaper editor who operated a mission press.

Similarly, other pioneers saw BIBLE TRANSLATION and literature distribution as a key to reaching the masses for Christ (see LITERACY, LITERATURE MISSION WORK). ROBERT MORRISON, who arrived in Canton, China, in 1807, not only translated the entire Bible into Mandarin, but also published the Shorter Catechism and part of the Book of Common Prayer, along with a number of pamphlets. Two of Morrison’s colleagues were printers, and one, William Milne, set up a press in Malacca.

Early efforts to evangelize the Middle East included a printing press in Malta, donated in 1822 by the Old South Church of Boston, to publish tracts and Scriptures for distribution in the region. Similar stories could be told of almost every place in the world.

By 1921, according to Arthur J. Brown, some 160 presses run by Protestant missions were churning out 400 million pages per year. Today there are major Christian publishing houses in almost every corner of the globe. Most missions and national churches use literature extensively for evangelism as well as education of believers. Books, periodicals, Sunday school materials, pamphlets, and tracts continue to be published by the millions in hundreds of languages. Missionary organizations which work primarily with the printed page include Christian Literature Crusade, Every Home for Christ, Operation Mobilization, the various BIBLE SOCIETIES, and many more. Among many recent innovative efforts is Amity Press, set up by the United Bible Societies in China with government approval, which has printed over seven million Chinese Bibles and New Testaments. Also, several evangelistic magazines such as Step and African Challenge in Africa and Prisma in Mexico are reaching the secular market.

Desktop publishing and computer typesetting have revolutionized literature production, especially in non-Western alphabets.

Electronic Media. Radio began as “wireless telegraphy” at the turn of the century, with the first commercial audio broadcasts in the U.S. starting in 1919. Only ten years later, Ruben Larson and Clarence Jones began efforts to use the fledgling medium to reach the world with the gospel (see also RADIO MISSION WORK). Against the best technical advice at the time, which said radio would not work in the mountains or near the equator, they were led to locate in Quito, Ecuador, where the Voice of the Andes, HCJB, went on the air on Christmas Day, 1931. It became a voice heard literally around the world. Today HCJB and its affiliated stations broadcast in 39 languages, reaching Europe and the Far East as well as Latin America. In addition to the outreach within and from Ecuador, World Radio Missionary Fellowship (WRMF), HCJB’s parent organization, operates a string of stations along the Texas border which reach the northern areas of Mexico, one of the few Latin American countries that restricts gospel broadcasting.

A second missionary radio giant began just after World War II. John Broger, a former Navy officer, and Robert Bowman and William Roberts, both involved in pioneer radio ministries in the U.S., formed the Far East Broadcasting Company (FEBC) in December 1945. Although they had planned to set up a station in China, the Lord directed them to Manila, where DZAS, “The Call of the Orient,” began transmitting in 1948. Today FEBC and its associate organization, FEBA (Far East Broadcasting Associates), operate over 30 stations in the Philippines, Saipan, South Korea, the Seychelles, and other locations, broadcasting in some 100 languages.

Trans World Radio, founded by Dr. Paul Freed, grew out of a vision for reaching Spain with the gospel via radio. Freed was able to lease a frequency in the international city of Tangier, in North Africa. The Voice of Tangier went on the air in 1954 with a 2500-watt war surplus transmitter, broadcasting to Europe. With Morocco’s independence in 1959, operations were moved to Monte Carlo. Today TWR broadcasts from high-power stations in Monaco, Guam, Bonaire, Swaziland, Cyprus, Sri Lanka, and Albania, as well as leasing time on commercial stations in various countries. Recording studios all over the world provide programming in over 90 languages.

Other major international radio ministries include ELWA, in Liberia, West Africa, founded in 1954 by SIM International; IBRA (Sweden); and Voice of Hope in Lebanon. Another high-power international station in Africa, RVOG, the Radio Voice of the Gospel, operated by the Lutheran
Mass Communication

World Federation, was confiscated by the revolutionary government of Ethiopia in 1977, after 14 years of outreach and a $2 million investment. Also in 1977 the government of Burundi closed Radio Cordac, a joint effort of several missions. The recent civil war in Liberia resulted in major damage to equipment and forced temporary evacuation of ELWA staff.

In addition to the large international and multi-lingual radio ministries, an estimated 3,200 local stations worldwide are operated by missions, local churches, or lay Christians. Thousands of hours of gospel programming also go out each week on secular stations. Recent political changes in both western and eastern Europe have opened new doors for local gospel broadcasting in many countries where a few years ago it was totally impossible.

One new thrust in international radio outreach is “The World by 2000,” a joint project of WRMF/HCJB, FEBC, TWR, and ELWA, whose purpose is to provide programming in the language of every major unreached people group. The initial goal was 144 new languages. Satellite networks like the HCJB/TWR ALAS (WINGS) make programming available to local Christian and secular stations. If and when direct satellite broadcasting becomes feasible, missionary broadcasters will undoubtedly be at the forefront.

Missionary radio pioneer HCJB also built the first missionary television station (see also Television Evangelism). The Window of the Andes went on the air in Quito in 1961. Latin America, with relatively free access, has seen a proliferation of Christian TV channels, while in parts of Africa and Europe evangelicals have been able to get time, sometimes free of charge, on government stations. Organizations like the U.S.-based Christian Broadcasting Network (700 Club) buy time on hundreds of TV outlets and cable services worldwide. Evangelists such as BILLY GRAHAM and LUIS PALAU have held continent or worldwide media crusades; the Graham one-hour program, “Starting Over,” aired in April 1996, was seen by an estimated 2.5 billion people in over 200 countries, using 48 languages.

Radio and television are powerful tools which have taken the gospel to hundreds of millions of people, many in limited-access countries or isolated locations. The estimated total of 1.2 billion receivers means radio has the potential of reaching well over 90 percent of the world’s population. The widespread use of radio by the governments of countries like Russia and China for internal communications has paved the way for missionary broadcasts to those peoples.

Nevertheless, like all media, radio and TV have their limitations. “Potential audience” is usually very different from actual listeners. The effectiveness of short-wave has declined as local stations become more widespread. Further, atmospheric conditions can severely affect propagation, and ever more powerful transmitters are required to keep up with the competition.

Perhaps an even greater challenge is to provide attractive, culturally relevant programming, particularly with television, where dubbed versions of U.S. shows have more often than not been the norm. Keeping the home constituency satisfied may conflict with ministry effectiveness; witness dictation-speed Bible readings for people learning English—in the King James Version.

Recordings. Gospel Recordings was founded in 1941 by JOY RIDDENHOF, a former missionary to Honduras, to let people throughout the world hear God’s Word in their own language. By 1955 over one million 78 rpm records have been produced. Victrola-type players were simplified to the finger-operated, cardboard “Cardtalk” which required no batteries or repair parts. The vinyl record has been largely replaced by cassettes, and there are now gospel recordings in over four thousand languages.

Cassettes are being used in many areas of the mission field for both evangelism and teaching, particularly in areas of low literacy. Unlike radio, the message can be listened to repeatedly and at any hour. Rugged, hand-cranked players are available for remote areas.

Film. The lantern slides used by missionaries in the early part of the century were replaced by 16mm films and then video. Moody Science films and dramatic movies produced by groups such as Billy Graham have been widely translated and distributed. There has been some effort toward culturally relevant productions using Third World artists and settings. Cinema vans draw large open-air crowds in Africa, Latin America, and other parts of the world. Deserving special mention is the JESUS FILM, the most widely seen movie in cinematic history, which has been dubbed into more than 450 languages and seen by more than one billion people.

Master’s Degrees in Missions and Missiology. In this day of increasing specialization in ministry, many individuals choose to study on the master’s level in missions or missiology, either as part of their prefield preparation or as one facet of their continuing development as practicing missionaries.
In the North American context, the Association of Theological Schools (ATS) recognizes three kinds of master's degree programs that include specializations or special emphases in missions or missiology: basic programs oriented toward ministerial leadership (M.Div., M.A. in [specialization]), basic programs oriented toward general theological studies (M.A. [academic], M.A.R., M.T.S.), and advanced programs primarily oriented toward theological research and teaching (Th.M./S.T.M.). The M.Div. is a three-year program, built on the undergraduate degree. M.A. in (specialization) programs are often two years in length. The academic M.A. generally requires two years of full-time study, with advanced standing if the applicant holds an undergraduate degree in Bible/theology/missions. In some schools the length of the degree is reduced to a one-year program by such advanced standing. The Th.M. generally requires twenty-four to thirty-two semester hours of study, plus thesis, beyond the M.Div.

In Europe the master's degree is a specialization built on an undergraduate degree in a related area. Generally, schools in non-Western countries have developed their programs of study to reflect their connections with Europe or North America, as well as the standards of the educational systems and accrediting agencies of their regions.

As in all theological education, denominational distinctives are present in master's-level programs in missions and missiology. Some seminaries or graduate schools give more emphasis to the social sciences and their relation to intercultural understandings. Others place a stronger emphasis on the biblical and theological foundations for missions, with less attention given to the social sciences and their integration into the missionary effort. Some schools provide studies of a more theoretical nature while others offer extensive practical ministry experience. Most schools, however, attempt to maintain a balance with the integration of biblical truth and social science research with theoretical studies and ministry practice. Program concentrations are variously entitled Missions, Missiology, World Mission, Cross-Cultural Studies, Inter-Cultural Studies, Missions and Evangelism, Urban Ministry, or Church Growth. A few specialized programs exist in Muslim or Chinese Studies, as well as TESOL/TOEFL/TESL and Inter-Cultural Studies.

The Association of Theological Schools permits seminaries to admit as many as 10 percent of the students in the M.Div. and M.A. in (specialization) professional master's degrees without possession of the baccalaureate degree or its educational equivalent if their life experience is adequate to prepare them for graduate theological study. This provision might open doors of opportunity for older missionaries or missionary candidates.

Some seminaries have developed schools of world missions or missions departments with specialized faculty assigned to these administrative structures. Other schools have elected to integrate their specialized missions faculty with the other theological faculty to minimize separation of the missions emphasis from the rest of the school. In some cases seminary leadership has chosen teachers with extensive cross-cultural experience for most of the basic biblical, theological, and ministry-centered areas in order to provide the maximum integration of the missions focus into the life of the school and its curriculum.

The wise applicant will study catalogues from a variety of denominational and nondenominational schools to appreciate the differences and to choose the best program in light of present and future ministry responsibilities.

In North America the three-year M.Div. program (typically ninety to ninety-six semester hours) gives general preparation for local church and parachurch ministries, with strong emphasis on Bible, theology, and ministry-related coursework (evangelism, discipleship, preaching, teaching, counseling, pastoral duties, etc.). Some schools offer a missions track in the M.Div. Typical programs would include courses in Evangelism, Survey of Missions, Biblical Theology of Missions, History of Missions, Cultural Studies [Cultural Anthropology, Cross-Cultural Communication], Church Growth or Church Planting, plus electives in missions. Generally the M.Div. program includes a practicum or internship in cross-cultural ministry.

The two-year M.A. in (specialization) (typically sixty to sixty-four semester hours) provides a missions or missiology emphasis generally comparable to the M.Div. missions track programs. Programs vary in their admissions and graduation requirements, though. A few accept only those with previous cross-cultural experience. Some stipulate a working knowledge of a second language. All have a required theological and biblical core, plus stipulated courses as part of the missions/missiology concentration. All require some kind of integrative experience at the end of the program: practicum or internship, comprehensive exams, or thesis, or a combination of two of the three.

The academic master's degree (M.A., M.A.R. M.T.S.) (typically forty to seventy-two semester hours) is similar to the professional M.A. in (specialization). However, the applicant must hold the bachelor's degree (in North America). Generally this program does not have a practicum or internship. The integrative exercise is a thesis (preferably) with possible substitution of extra coursework and comprehensive exams for the thesis.

The Th.M./S.T.M. degree tends to permit greater flexibility in the choice of coursework in missions or missiology. The thesis and comprehensive exams assure that the graduate has competence in both content and research methodology. Many excellent seminars or graduate schools around the world provide specializations in missions or missiology. Never before in the history of missions have there been so many opportunities for quality and variety in graduate level preparation for cross-cultural ministry.

Mauritania (Est. 2000 pop.: 2,580,000; 1,025,520 sq. km. [395,953 sq. mi.]). The 99 percent Muslim majority of Mauritanians are mostly Sunnis of the Malekite rite who follow Qadiriya (Sufi) Maraboutism. Mauritania is inhabited by the Berbers, an indigenous people converted to Islam in the tenth century; the Arabs, who arrived in the fifteenth century; and blacks in the southern region. The Constitution protects Islam as the state religion and as such prohibits conversion from Islam. The country is united by Islam although some Mauritanians do follow pre-Muslim customs.

The Roman Catholic Church arrived in Mauritania at the turn of the century and remains the only organized Christian body. Almost all of the Roman Catholics are foreigners, the majority of which are transitory French government officials. Mauritania comprises the single diocese of Nouakchott, which in 1992 held approximately 4,500 adherents, the majority of which are nonnationals. The bishop also participates in conferences of Senegal, Cape Verde, and Guinea Bissau. Due to the Islamic majority, most mission efforts are directed toward immigrant workers from other African countries.

While Protestants have attempted works in Mauritania, the last group, WEC International, withdrew in 1965. The small congregation that does exist is comprised of expatriates in the capital.

GARY LAMB

Mauritius (Est. 2000 pop.: 1,179,000; 2,040 sq. km. [788 sq. mi.]). Mark Twain said that God made Mauritius so that we could have a glimpse of heaven. Much, but not all, of Mauritius’s population would likely share Twain’s observations. Mauritius boasted one of the most successful African economies in the 1980s, making a transition from an agricultural economy (sugar) to an industrial/commercial one (textile and tourism). Although the structural transition between these two types of economies may have taken place with relative ease, the fact that most of the older churches (Catholic and Anglican) have been in decline indicates that a socioreligious transition may not have supported the economic shift. Churches may want to reassess their role in this society moving from a traditional to modern structure. This reassessment may have a bearing on church growth and the reformulation of missiological questions for outreach to sociologically “displaced” Mauritians.

Even though only 27 percent of the Mauritian population would class themselves in the “Creole” ethnic grouping, the Creole language of Mauritius is the native language of the vast majority of the Mauritian people, and Creole is the first language of over half of the almost 1.2 million people who inhabit this volcanic island situated east of Madagascar in the Indian Ocean. This Creole ethnic/language situation points to two opposing missiological concerns revolving around “Creole” dominance. (1) Unfortunately, few of the 161 missionaries (including Catholic and Protestant) speak or minister in Creole, thus diminishing the prospect of incarnational ministry in the largest linguistic group of the island. (2) A significant degree of sensitivity should be shown to the Hindu population (65% of the national population) who often feel that one must “become a Creole” in order to become Christian. Despite this disparagement the Assemblies of God have seen a significant number of Hindus come to Christ.

Missiological thinking for Mauritius can be enhanced by examining the writings of the great Mauritian writer, Malcolm de Chazal (1902–81). One needs to ask how much de Chazal’s technique of corresponding between words and things, and between language and nature deal with the real spiritual questions being asked by the Mauritian people. (“Flowers are both knowing and innocent, with experienced mouths but childlike eyes. They bend the two poles of life into a divinely closed circle,” Sens-Plastique, p. 7.)

CLINT AKINS

Mayers, Marvin Keene (1927– ). American mission scholar and missionary to Guatemala. Mayers began his career translating the Bible for the Pocomchi of Guatemala, Central America, under the Summer Institute of Linguistics. Since 1965, he has taught anthropology, intercultural communication, and linguistics to thousands of missionaries. He chaired the department of sociology and anthropology at Wheaton College (1968–74), served as director of Texas Summer Institute of Linguistics (1976–82), and was the founding dean of the School of Intercultural Studies, Biola University (1983–89).

Mayers developed three anthropological concepts that have been incorporated into the academic world: “biculturalism,” “trust bond,” and “basic values.” Biculturalism is working in two different cultures at the same time (one’s own and that of the host country) seeing both cultures as valid before God. The trust bond is the foundation for building cross-cultural relationships, asking, “Is what I am doing, thinking, or saying building or undermining trust?” The basic values concept blends biblical principles with those from the behavioral sciences.

Mayers introduced a course into the academic community based on “activity oriented learning” that has become a model for such courses throughout Christian higher education.

Among his writings, Christianity Confronts Culture has been recognized as one of the major contributions to missions in the past century and Ministering Cross-Culturally has become a standard reference book for alerting North American Christians to cross-cultural differences in their own communities.

McDougall, Francis Thomas (1817–86). English missionary to Borneo. Born in Sydenham, England, McDougall studied medicine at the universities of Malta and London. Later, in 1842, he completed a B.A. at Oxford, where he was profoundly affected by a campus revival. After a three-year stint as an ironworks superintendent in South Wales, he was ordained to the Anglican priesthood in 1845 and served three short curacies.

In 1847 McDougall accepted an appointment with the Borneo Mission Society for a pioneer ministry in North Borneo. There he conducted evangelistic, medical, and educational efforts, primarily among native Dyaiks and immigrant Chinese. In 1853 he arranged for the transfer of his work to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. He was appointed bishop of Labuan and Sarawak in 1855, and became the first Anglican bishop to be consecrated in Asia. In addition to administrative duties, he prepared a prayerbook and catechism for the churches of his diocese. He and his wife persevered valiantly through the loss of five children and their own physical ailments.

In 1868 poor health forced McDougall’s return to his homeland, where he served the Church of England for eighteen more years as vicar, canon, and archdeacon.

McGeorge, Mary (1850–92). Irish missionary to India. Born in Newry, County Down, Ireland, her home and school life prepared her well for a uni-
McGeorge, Mary

University career. Her call to serve the Zenana missions in India came through the urging of an Irish Presbyterian minister-friend who recognized in her the qualifications for such a task. From 1879 to 1884 she studied medicine at the London School of Medicine for Women. While waiting for her licentiateship and overseas appointment, McGeorge gained valuable experience as house surgeon. In late 1885 she sailed to Bombay.

She lived in the manufacturing city of Ahmedabad, where her medical work focused on the needs of women and children. Assisted by a national, she saw scores of patients at the dispensary on a daily basis. She was able to visit numerous outlying villages where she found many neglected, diseased, and suffering people. She believed that her dispensary work opened the hearts of the women to listen to the gospel as nothing else could.

In 1890 McGeorge left India for furlough in England. She devoted her time to promoting the interests of Zenana missions and preparing for a lifelong missionary tenure. On her return voyage to India in October 1892, her ship was wrecked during a storm. McGeorge and another missionary were among those who lost their lives.

Though there were few outward results from her labor, McGeorge left a growing group of believers. She also foresaw the time when indigenous workers would do the work that foreign missionaries were doing. Her life was an example of one whose early Christian nurturing through home and church reaped great benefits for the missionary enterprise.

McPherson, Aimee Semple (1890–1944). American Pentecostal evangelist. Born in 1890, at the age of eighteen Aimee fell in love with both God and Robert Semple, the Pentecostal evangelist who led her to the Lord. After marriage both were ordained and in 1910 they left for missionary service in Hong Kong. Within weeks of their arrival, Robert contracted malaria and died, leaving Aimee a very young, pregnant widow. She returned to the United States and worked with the Salvation Army where she met and wed Stewart McPherson in 1912. They had a son, but Aimee's growing preaching ministry took a toll on her marital relationship, and she and Stewart divorced in 1921. She endured much controversy in later years over her personal life, and died in 1944.

Her accomplishments are many: she was a prolific writer; the first woman to receive an FCC license to operate a radio station, the founder of the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel, the builder of Angelus Temple in Los Angeles, and the founder of the Lighthouse for International Foursquare Evangelism (L.I.F.E.) Bible College. Her Angelus Temple Commissary met the physical needs of over 1.5 million people during the Depression, and she was a tireless fighter on behalf of the poor. A gifted communicator, she instilled in her followers a strong vision for evangelism.

JUDITH LINGENFELTER

McQuilkin, Robert C. (1886–1952). American educator and missions promoter. McQuilkin was born to Irish immigrant parents of Presbyterian heritage. His only attempt to enter missionary service was frustrated when the ship on which he was scheduled to sail caught fire in the Philadelphia harbor and sank.

In 1923, McQuilkin accepted a position as dean of the newly founded Southern Bible Institute in Columbia, South Carolina, and later became its first president, a position which he held until his death in 1952. Under his leadership the school became Columbia Bible College. In 1936, the college added a graduate division, the first evangelical graduate school of missions.
McQuilkin played a key role in encouraging students to form the Student Foreign Missions Fellowship. In 1940, he founded Ben Lippen School, a college preparatory boarding school that served many missionary families. All five of McQuilkin’s children served as missionaries. His son Robertson, after twelve years in Japan, served as president of Columbia Bible College and Seminary from 1969 to 1990.

McQuilkin’s emphasis on victorious Christian living and world missions was epitomized in the motto, “To know Him and to make Him known.” Under his leadership Columbia became a leader in training evangelical missionaries.

Mears, Henrietta Cornelia (1890–1963). American Christian educator, publisher, and missions motivator. Born in Fargo, North Dakota, Mears grew up in Minneapolis. After completing a degree in education at the University of Minnesota and working as a high school teacher, she moved to California in 1928 to accept a position with the First Presbyterian Church of Hollywood. For over thirty years she served as the church’s director of Christian education, developing a large and influential Sunday school program. In 1933 Mears founded Gospel Light Publications, which became one of the largest publishers of biblically based material for Sunday schools. She also established the Forest Home Camp Grounds as a conference center in the late 1930s and co-founded the National Sunday School Association in 1946.

Although not a missionary herself, Mears influenced world missions in a variety of ways. The widespread use of Gospel Light materials overseas led her to found Gospel Light International in 1961 to assist missionaries with obtaining and publishing Christian education materials in foreign languages. In addition, her emphasis on leadership training brought a sense of professionalism to nonformal Christian education programs in the United States and abroad. Mears frequently traveled internationally to speak and conduct training seminars, and encouraged over four hundred young people into full-time Christian service, including many who became missionaries.

Media. The media play a significant role in Christian mission, and several mission organizations are built around specific media. The all-pervasive influence of the media challenges Christians to investigate and use the media effectively in mission. Attitudes to Christian use of media span from almost uninhibited praise to nearly total rejection.

Media Classification. In popular usage the term “media” refers to the whole complex of broadcasting, particularly television, and its many uses. Marshall McLuhan defined media as extensions of the human body, the microphone becoming an extension of the voice and the camera an extension of the eye.

Media can be classified according to the context of use. Personal media are media used by a single person or in an interpersonal situation. Group media signify media that are used to enhance or stimulate interaction with or among a group of people. Mass media are understood as media that aim at communicating with multiple audiences at the same time.

Media Types and Ministries. Printed media include books, newspapers, magazines, brochures, and anything using the alphabet. In the past, print media have been chosen by churches and missionary organizations as their primary communication tools, and worldwide literature organizations such as David C. Cook have been established. Magazines such as Breakthrough in Hong Kong and Step in East Africa have extensive readership. Today, however, print is increasingly being challenged by the electronic media.

Audio media include radio, cassettes, records, CDs, and any other media that use sound only. Radio has been used extensively by churches and missions around the world and it demonstrates many possibilities for evangelism and Christian nurture. Major international radio organizations include Far Eastern Broadcasting Company, Trans World Radio, and HCJB (see Radio Mission Work). The use of audiocassettes includes possibilities for this unique and versatile medium that are possibly greater than any other medium available for Christian mission. Hosanna in the U.S. produces several million cassettes a year that are increasingly used in Christian mission.

Video media include television, film, slides, video, and DVD (Digital Video Disk). The video medium is having an enormous impact on societies around the world. It is changing entertainment patterns as well as family life, and it is impacting classroom instruction and educational methods. We could argue that video has caused a communication revolution that may be on the same level as that experienced at the invention of the printing press.

Television has an all-pervasive influence and the extensive use of television makes it one of the strongest forces in society. The average person in the industrialized world spends several hours in front of the television set each day. Christian leaders need to be aware of both the possibilities of using television in Christian ministry, but also the possible dangers that extensive exposure to television can have on church, society, and family life.

Film is a medium with unique possibilities in Christian mission. Few media are more persuasive than film. A prime example of film use is the JESUS FILM. Video is challenging or replacing film as movies are recorded on video cassettes and made available for home use.

Computer media. The computer is impacting all media, but its specific uses for E-mail and the internet have changed the way people stay in touch, advertise their services, and get their entertainment. Many Christian ministries are using web pages on the internet for church activities, counseling services, and marketing products. For those with access to computers, this medium will increase in significance in the decades to come (see also INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY).

Drama and art. Music, painting, and dance-drama all deserve much more extensive treatment. We cannot envision a radio or television program without music. Music is central to church services and evangelistic approaches. The artist is important in all media work. Dance-drama and other folk media are today being rediscovered by many churches, and we are experiencing exciting new uses of drama and traditional music (see also ETHNOMUSICOLOGY).

Media People. Different groups of people are involved in media. There are media theorists who study the theological, missiological, and theoretical basis for Christian use of the media. Media strategists define and plan the use of a medium in the total context of a local church or mission enterprise. There are also artists and media specialists who produce programs. Finally, the media users or generalists distribute and use the programs for a given audience.

Media Research. There has been relatively little in-depth study of the effects of media in mission, and few controlled experiments. This is in sharp contrast to secular use of media, where huge sums of money are used on research, and where a significant body of material is available. The lack of research in Christian media has resulted in counting media activities rather than measuring media results.

Marketing organizations will collect extensive data on the availability and usefulness of individual media channels in a given context. Diffusion studies have, likewise, analyzed the effects of various media. Christian communicators can use the available methods for testing media products.

Christian Media Organizations. Media users have established associations where their special interests are treated. Among the organizations with cross-media and global perspectives are the International Christian Media Commission (ICMC) which has evangelical roots, and the World Association of Christian Communication (WACC), which was formed on an ecumenical basis and covers organizations and churches from around the world. The National Religious Broadcasters is a major organization in the U.S.

Issues: Media and God's Communication Approach. The challenge for the future is to make the use of media in church and mission conform to patterns that are consistent with Scripture. From the creation of the world God has communicated to humanity. Passages such as Romans 1:20 and Psalm 19:1–4 speak of God's communication through creation. In the New Testament, we see God revealing himself through his Son (John 1:14: Heb. 1:1–3a).

A study of God's communicational activities yields significant guidelines for media use. God uses communication symbols that are understood by us within our specific cultural contexts. He uses language, culture, and human form. He is working for an interactive relationship. Our use of media must follow similar patterns, and media programs need format, music selections, content, and form of presentation that are appropriate for the intended audience.

Specific Challenges to Media Users. As in all aspects of Christian mission, the commission to communicate is the mandate. There is a clear goal of being prophetic and to present the gospel in such a way that people will want to listen, understand, follow, and commit themselves.

Christian communication is person-based. Jesus showed us the example by becoming a real human being, participating in our affairs (Phil. 2:7; John 1:14). In him, the message and the medium became one. This person-centeredness must be carefully guarded in media communication. Credibility of a piece of literature is associated with the way it is distributed and with the person who is giving it out. We need to make our use of media be person-centered.

The audience (receptors) has priority, and media programs need to be receptor-oriented. Jesus illustrated receptor orientation by creating parables out of everyday life of the listeners. In a parable, the audience become players, and as such each one discovers new truths and principles.

There must be a close relationship with the local church. It is the local church that provides permanent structures for effective communication. If churches are to function as a base for media strategies and have a sense of ownership, they need to be involved in the decision-making with respect to media employment and program design.

The effective use of media is based on the principle of process. Communication itself is a process, but the listener will also be living through an ongoing DECISION-MAKING process. During this process the needs of the audience will change and the communicator must adapt his or her programs and use of media accordingly.

Good information is mandatory if effective communication through media is to take place. Research provides us with information on which decisions can be based, and it makes media communication possible. The main concern is not the number of research methods used, but the fact that the needs of the audience have been studied and that products (radio programs, brochures, books, videos, etc.) are adequately tested before broadcasting or distribution.

Finally, media use needs to be rooted in the cultural context of the audience. As the gospel is clothed in the new culture it penetrates that culture with the true life of Christ. Then, from within that culture, it blooms to new tunes and new instruments. An intercultural understanding will lead us to investigate local and traditional media and art forms. A number of groups in Asian countries, such as India, Thailand, and Indonesia, have demonstrated the viability of using traditional forms of dance and drama in evangelism. The Balinese church has incorporated local cultural themes in the architecture of church buildings. These are helpful examples of developing appropriate media within a culture to communicate the gospel more effectively.

Viggo B. Søgaard

Medical Mission Work. The term “medical mission” originally referred to a medical post, such as a clinic or dispensary for the poor, which was supported by a Christian congregation. By the middle of the nineteenth century, the meaning of the term had broadened, referring primarily to the medical branch of Protestant overseas missions which paralleled the rapid growth of medical science (Grundmann, 1997, 184).

The literature of medical missions, including the publications of the mission societies which proliferated during the nineteenth century, was dominated by biographical accounts of physicians and nurses who were compelled by the urgency of human suffering and the desire to fulfill the Great Commission. John Thomas joined William Carey in India in 1773 and fought the practices of abandoning sick babies to death by exposure and the burning of Hindu widows on the funeral pyres of their dead husbands. The first American medical missioner, John Scudder, was a minister of the Reformed Church in America as well as a physician. His granddaughter, Ida Scudder, one of 42 missionaries in four generations of that family who collectively contributed more than eleven hundred years of missionary service, founded the Vellore Medical College in India in 1900. Edith Brown, an Englishwoman, laid the foundation for the first Asian women’s medical school, Ludhiana Christian Medical College, and Peter Parker, the first American missionary to China in 1834, started a modern teaching hospital. By 1933 six of China’s twelve medical schools were financed by missionary societies.

In the mid-twentieth century there were many prominent missionary physicians, particularly in Africa. Helen Roseveare served with the World-Wide Evangelization Crusade in the Congo and during the bloody civil war was raped and beaten repeatedly by Simba Rebels who occupied the Nebobongo mission compound where she worked. Paul Carlson, who worked at the Wasolo mission station in the Ubangi Province of Congo, was captured and tortured before being killed in the streets of Stanleyville. Carl Becker, who spent nearly fifty years in the Congo under the Africa Inland Mission, was perhaps best known for his compassionate treatment of four thousand resident patients at an 1100-acre leprosy village in the early 1950s. Stanley Browne, a boy with an encyclopedic memory from a modest south London home, became one of the world’s leading specialists in leprosy control and prevention. The Salvation Army Nurses’ Fellowship, born out of the blitz in bomb-scarred London during the Second World War, rapidly grew to become an international organization. Their midwives traveled by bicycle or paddle-boat or trudged on foot. Payment for services might be “a love-gift of an egg, or a posy of wild flowers, or maybe a handful of grain” (Carr, 1978, 30). Between 1850 and 1950 there were more than 1,500 medical missionaries from Britain alone serving in the developing world (Aitken, Fuller, and Johnson, 1984, 158).

Issues in Medical Missions. The place of medical missions in the larger context of world missions has been repeatedly examined. Mission societies, particularly those formed by churches in Great Britain and Europe in the nineteenth century, had as their highest priorities spreading the gospel through evangelism and educating indigenous populations through schools. Medical missionaries were “to be first preachers, then medical men, if time remained for that” (Gelfund, 1984, 19). Nevertheless, a characteristic feature of this evangelical movement became the establishment of health services where none existed. The 1928 International Missionary Council meeting in Jerusalem clearly stated that “Medical work should be regarded as in itself an expression of the spirit of the Master, and should not be thought of as only a pioneer of evangelism or as merely a philanthropic agency” (Lowe, 1886, 18). More recently compassionate ministries, such as medical missions, have been described as part of holistic ministry which “defines evangelism and social action as functionally separate, relationally inseparable, and essential to the total ministry of the Church” (Yamamori, 1997, 7; see also Holistic Missions).

Financially maintaining institutions built in the pioneering phase of medical missions has been increasingly difficult. Mission hospitals accepting government subsidies forfeited in principle their religious freedom and ability to operate autonomously. National churches and governments, however, have often not been able to assume the burden of these institutions, particularly that of paying staff salaries.

Adequate staffing for hospitals has been a perennial concern. Frenetic levels of activity in overcrowded facilities have often characterized mission hospitals and dispensaries because of the pressing human need they address with limited resources. Predictably, there is a high level of exhaustion, burnout, and turnover among the staff due to the medical work, staff experience frustration at the lack of time for spiritual ministry, family priorities, and personal rejuvenation.

The appropriateness of technology for health care services is a key issue. Remote hospitals with irregular power supplies often seek and request sophisticated medical equipment for radiology services, surgery, intensive care units, and laboratories. Government and mission funds disproportionately support institutions rather than health promotion at the community level. Additionally, physicians functioning as surgeons or family practitioners soon come to realize that the sicknesses they are treating could be better addressed through adequate sanitation, a clean water supply, and good nutrition.

Political instability, antagonistic postures toward Christian ministries by governments and religious groups such as Islam, the inability of institutions to significantly impact morbidity and mortality rates in their areas of service, and difficulties in integrating health ministries with affiliated local churches are all significant issues in medical missions (Van Reken, 1987, 16–19).

Directions and Trends in Medical Missions.

An important influence on medical missions was the International Conference on Primary Health Care, held in the former U.S.S.R. in 1978 at Alma-Ata, which focused global attention on health care at the community level. It defined primary health care as that which is accessible, acceptable, affordable, and linked to community initiatives. Further, primary health care included preventive, promotive, curative, and rehabilitative aspects and focused on clean water; adequate sanitation, immunization programs, maternal/child health, promotion of food supply and proper nutrition, prevention and control of endemic diseases, and education. Emphasis was placed on coordinating efforts with other sectors of community and national development that impact health, such as housing, communications, public works, and agriculture. MAP International, a Christian relief and development organization, and the Christian Medical Society led missions and medical ministries policymakers in the development of a declaration identifying how the Alma-Ata conference might affect the structure of Christian health care ministries. This facilitated the movement of the medical missions community away from hospital-based ministries and toward community-oriented ministries. The Christian Medical Commission in Geneva, through its influential Contact magazine, encouraged the development of holistic integrated health programs throughout the world.

David Van Reken has described the progress of medical missions as moving from the pioneer doing phase through a teaching era in which training schools were founded, and into an enabling period. In this final phase doing and teaching continue, but goals of community development, national rather than mission ownership and leadership, collegial rather than teacher-student relationships, and sustainable indigenous growth are emphasized (Van Reken, 1987, 6).

Another trend is an increase in short-term medical missions with agencies such as Medical Group Missions, in which participants provide service in their areas of specialization or as educators. Early retirement and mid-career job changes have also resulted in professionals pursuing second careers as medical missionaries. Tent Making Mission, receiving compensation for work done in the field, is also a trend, as are group practices for physicians in the U.S. which are structured to encourage their staff to engage in medical missions. Board certification is increasingly normative, as is a master’s degree in public health. Continuing education conferences are provided annually by the Christian Medical and Dental Society, alternately held in Malaysia and Africa.

The future of medical missions increasingly lies in partnering with the church, as God’s chosen channel for the restoration of wholeness and the transformation of society, and in promoting effective community-based health care, grounded in the discipline of public health, which genuinely impacts morbidity and mortality rates while encouraging positive health behaviors.

Melanesia. Melanesia, Micronesia, and Polynesia are the three major groupings of islands in the Pacific. The islands of Melanesia from east to west include Norfolk Island; Fiji; Vanuatu; New Caledonia and the Loyalty Islands; the Solomon Islands and the Santa Cruz Islands; New Guinea (Papua New Guinea and Irian Jaya), the Admiralty Islands, and the Bismarck and Louisiade archipelagos. The year 2000 estimated combined population of the islands exceeds 6 million.

Due to the rugged terrain of many of the islands and the vast distances of water between them, Melanesia is one of the most diverse regions in the world. It is estimated that in excess of a thousand languages exist in the New Guinea region alone. Melanesian societies are based on kinship and by comparison to other areas of the world, are small-scale, ranging from as few as seventy on the smaller islands to several thousand in the New Guinea Highlands. Traditional economies were based on rudimentary agriculture, hunting, fishing, and indigenous wealth which included primarily pigs and portable valuables. Trade networks were established between the islands by means of deep sea canoes which navigated the Pacific and through inland waterways and bush tracks linking the populated areas.

The diversity of Melanesia encompasses their traditional religious beliefs and practices. In general, however, Melanesian religions are theistic in that they emerge from a belief in a god. One overall effect of the widespread theistic religions with their solid commitment to the centrality of relationships was that Christianity spread rapidly.

Although some contact with Western explorers took place prior to the second half of the eighteenth century, the major movement was a direct result of the voyages of the British explorer, Captain James Cook from 1772 to 1779. With the opening of Australia as a colony, the expansion of the British Empire brought the predictable wave of settlers driven by commerce and opportunity. A surprising outcome of Cook’s exploration of Australia, New Zealand, and the islands of the Pacific came in response to his journals which became the reading material for a generation of young Christians destined to be part of the GREAT CENTURY OF MISSIONS. The earliest missionaries to the South Pacific were part of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) group arriving in Tahiti in 1797. One of the young Christians who studied Cook’s journals was John Williams, a man destined to impact not only the islands of Polynesia, but to take the gospel as far as Vanuatu in Melanesia. Williams’ commitment to including indigenous missionaries in his outreaches characterized Melanesian missions in the early days.

Following the early thrust of the LMS in Melanesia were the English Methodists who entered Tonga and Fiji in the mid-1820s. Methodism spread rapidly through Tonga and Fiji initially and from there to other islands of Melanesia. The Roman Catholic missions arrived in Tahiti in 1836 and in the Melanesian islands of Fiji and New Caledonia in the years from 1840 to 1851. Another thrust of missions came from the Anglicans in New Zealand and the work of GEORGE SELWYN, the first Anglican bishop and founder of the Melanesian Mission. Other missions appeared in Melanesia during this period including the Presbyterians who primarily focused on Vanuatu. By the decade of the 1870s, New Guinea became a significant target for a host of missions beginning with the LMS in 1871 and the Sacred Heart Fathers from France in 1884. Within a few years, the Neuendettelsau Mission (1886) and the RHENISH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (1887) established works in the northern part of the island which was under German rule. Missions to The Solomon Islands appeared during this same period. One of the significant missions to reach the Solomon Islands was the South Seas Evangelical Mission (formerly the Queensland Kanaka Mission).

The period from 1900 to 1942 was one of significant expansion of missions in Melanesia. Major efforts were launched by Protestant groups including the Lutherans, Anglicans, Methodists, and Congregationalists as well as new works by interdenominational faith missions such as the Unevangelized Fields Mission and the German Liebenzell Mission. The Roman Catholic missions continued to expand and develop throughout the region. The Seventh-Day Adventists entered Melanesia establishing works in a number of islands. The end of this period of active expansion coincided with the war in the Pacific.

Following the war, news of the isolated islands full of unevangelized peoples reached the ears of the churches in the West. The result was a resurgence of new missions, particularly those of the specialized ministries such as Missionary Aviation Fellowship and the Summer Institute of Linguistics. Smaller independent missions also dotted the Melanesian landscape, particularly those from North America. This growth and expansion of missionary efforts continued through the early 1980s. The early characteristic of a partnership between indigenous and expatriate missionaries was less a feature of the rapidly expanding missions in the twentieth century. One important attempt at greater cooperation in missions was the formation of the Evangelical Alliance which established combined works in education, medicine, and the Christian Leaders Training College in Papua New Guinea.

The growth of churches in Melanesia paralleled the periods of missionary expansion. The beginnings of church independence were seen in Tonga and Samoa as early as 1885, but did not reach Melanesia until the Methodist Church worked through the issues of finance and control in Fiji during the first decade of the twentieth century. Other churches followed a similar process of growth and independence.

A number of challenges and opportunities face the churches and missions of Melanesia at the end of the twentieth century. The more serious challenges include widespread nominalism, a lack of adequate resources to deal with the challenges of modernity, particularly among the youth; tribalism which undermines the church's ability to demonstrate reconciliation; and a need to develop more leaders to address the theological issues unique to Melanesia. As with any period of great challenge, great opportunities are also present. One of the most dynamic situations is the resurgence of interest in missions among the evangelical churches of Melanesia. This movement began in the early 1980s and culminated in a South Pacific missions conference held in Suva, Fiji, in 1989. One result of the conference was the launch of “The Deep Sea Canoe,” a combined mission movement designed to bring Melanesians back into an active role in world missions.

Melbourne Conference (1980). The theme of the conference was that of the Christ who is at the center of all things, and who is crucified “outside the gate.” This emphasized the movement of grace from the center to the periphery, and thus the significance of the poor in any evangelistic strategy, for the situation of the poor is no longer “a social ethics question; it is a gospel question” (Emilio Castro).

Melbourne also developed the concept of the poor being, as others also, not only sinners, but also “the sinned against.” That is, the poor are those whose essential humanity is threatened and indeed compromised by the social political and economic forces that challenge the god-like image within them; “the destroyer of the body may not be able to kill the soul, but it can, and too often does, rape and maim the soul” (Raymond Fung). Putting “sinned-againstness” on the evangelistic agenda enables human sinfulness to be addressed anew.

Clark Pinnock, after pressing the evangelical claim for an urgent proclamation of the message of salvation to all peoples in the power of the Spirit, admitted the great value of evangelicals sharing in ecumenical discussions: “The un-reached peoples are in large part also the poor of the earth which forces the evangelical agenda and the ecumenical agenda together. I believe that Melbourne has bridged the gap between Bangkok 72 and Lausanne 1974 to an important degree” (International Review of Missions, July 1980, 348). Many of the evangelicals present shared that perspective, but others were critical of a lack of doctrinal precision within the conference proceedings, especially with regard to the atonement. Some were also critical of a perceived lack of evangelistic urgency in a conference that all too easily took on the form of a mini WCC Assembly.

Member Care in Missions. The concept of member care—that mission members need to be cared for in important ways—has its roots in the New Testament. The Great Commission was given alongside the Great Commandment, with love for one another being the hallmark of Christian discipleship (John 13:34–35). Scores of “one another” injunctions in the New Testament summon Christians to demonstrate this care for other believers, including care for missionaries, in many ways. Even Jesus, the missionary prototype, indicated that he needed caring companionship when he said, “My soul is overwhelmed with sorrow to the point of death. Stay here and keep watch with me” (Matt. 26:38). And the apos-
Mennonite Missions

Mennonite Missions. Mennonites trace their spiritual ancestry and the origins of their concern for mission to the Anabaptist wing of the Reformation in sixteenth-century Europe. These Anabaptists had a deep sense of the responsibility of all Christians to evangelize, to share their newfound faith spontaneously in voluntary witness (see Anabaptist Missions). Already in 1527, Anabaptist leaders met in Augsburg and appointed missionaries to go out by twos and threes across central Europe. As they were driven in ever widening circles by their sense of God’s call and by increasingly ruthless persecution, these Anabaptists began new congregations wherever they went. Within these congregations members were taught that the Great Commission was Christ’s command to all believers at all times and they acted accordingly. They also believed that in the suffering of their church in persecution God authenticated their missionary witness. However, when most of the early leaders died as martyrs and the later church discovered that it would only be tolerated by the authorities if it was silent and abstained from mission activity, Mennonites turned their attention inward, content to practice their faith as the “quiet in the land,” living as much as possible separate from the society around them, passing on their faith only to their own children.

Only in the nineteenth century did Mennonites recover their concern for mission, this time through contact with Christians from other traditions rather than from a recovery of the missionary zeal which had been at the core of the Anabaptist faith. For example, early in the nineteenth century Mennonites in Europe were major supporters of the English Baptist Mission in Serampore, India. When Mennonites themselves became missionaries, their understanding of mission was like that of evangelical Protestants of that era and the churches which they planted were indistinguishable from the Protestant churches around them.

In 1847 Mennonites in the Netherlands organized their own Sending Society and in 1851 sent Pieter Jansz to Java as the first Mennonite to serve overseas in mission. He was soon followed by other Dutch Mennonites and then, in 1871, the Sending Society opened a new field in Sumatra, which was staffed with workers from the Mennonite settlements in Russia. Although direction of the Society remained in the Netherlands, in later years the major financial support for its work came from Russian Mennonites. Abraham Friesen of the Mennonite Brethren in Russia went to Hyderabad, India, under the American Baptist Mission Union in 1889 and began what became the Mennonite Brethren Church in India.

Among North American Mennonites interest in missions grew under the influence of the Evangelical Awakening and was a major concern in the formation of the General Conference Mennonite Church in 1860. At the founding sessions both home and foreign missions were commended to the congregations and three treasuries were set up to receive funds. The candidacy of Samuel S. Haury resulted in the formation of a mission board which commissioned him to work among the Arapahoe in Oklahoma in 1880. The first North American Mennonite to serve overseas was Eusebius Hershey of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (now part of the Missionary Church), who went to Sierra Leone in 1890.

Concern for mission among North American Mennonites accelerated rapidly near the close of the nineteenth century. Mission committees and boards were organized in the various Mennonite denominations, and by the early years of the twentieth century missionaries sent out by Mennonite sending agencies were at work in India, China, and the African continent. In this same period, Mennonites, who were almost entirely a rural people in North America, organized urban missions in a number of major North American cities. In addition to denominational missions, Mennonites also organized mission agencies which included more than one Mennonite denomination. Most notable among these were the China Mennonite Mission Society organized for work in Shandong in 1901, and the Congo Inland Mission (now the Africa Inter-Mennonite Mission) which began work in what is now Zaire in 1911. By 1957 there were 638 missionaries working under North American Mennonite mission boards in 28 countries around the world.

After the close of World War II, Mennonite concern for and involvement in worldwide mission grew rapidly. While between 1850 and 1939 Mennonites had established only 24 mission programs, in the 1940s they established 18 more, in the 1950s 42, in the 1960s 17, in the 1970s 28, and between 1980 and 1986 15 more.

In addition to more traditional mission sending agencies, North American Mennonite churches also work together in the Mennonite Central Committee, an agency formed in 1920 for famine relief in Russia. After World War II, Mennonite Central Committee ministries expanded rapidly with emergency relief aid and then development aid in many parts of the world. Now known as a relief, service, and development agency for ministry in the name of Christ, the Mennonite Central Committee had over one thousand volunteers serving in fifty countries in 1987.

Globally, Mennonite churches are loosely organized into the Mennonite World Conference. According to the 1990 Mennonite World Hand-
The mercy of God is related to mission in at least three ways. It is an integral part of the message we proclaim; it provides motivation for our service; and it describes the manner in which we carry out the Great Commission.

First of all, God’s mercy is an integral part of our message. The gospel describes the breaking in of the divine mercy into the world of human misery in the person of Jesus of Nazareth. His mercy is the basis of our salvation. “He saved us, not because of the righteous things we have done, but because of his mercy” (Titus 3:5).

The Bible describes God as “rich in mercy” (Eph. 2:4) and “full of mercy” (James 5:11). He is “the Father of compassion and God of all comfort” (2 Cor. 1:3). It is because of “his great mercy” (1 Peter 1:3) that we are saved. Thus, the mercy of God underlies the whole message of the Bible.

Second, mercy provides motivation for our ministry. Paul appeals to God’s mercy as the basis for service. It is the experience of mercy that keeps us pressing on in the work. To the church at Rome he says, “I urge you, brothers, in view of God’s mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices” (Rom. 12:1). To the church at Corinth he writes, “Therefore, since through God’s mercy we have this ministry, we do not lose heart” (2 Cor. 4:1).

Third, mercy describes the manner in which we carry out the Great Commission. Jesus is our model of mercy ministry. He felt deep compassion both for those who were spiritually lost and for those who were physically needy (Matt. 9:36; 20:34). But these deep feelings of compassion (literally, “moved in his bowels”—what today would be called the heart) always led Jesus to action. It was his mercy that moved him to heal the sick and feed the hungry (Matt. 14:14; 15:32). Through word and deed, Jesus engaged in holistic ministry, meeting the full range of human needs. He was not just a teacher or an evangelist. His was a life poured out in deeds of mercy, ministry to the whole person.

Jesus also taught about the importance of mercy. In the parable of the good Samaritan, Jesus illustrates the meaning of the second great command to “love your neighbor as yourself.” He describes the compassionate ministry of the Samaritan as an act of mercy. He then concludes this parable with the command, “go and do likewise” (Luke 10:37). Thus, mercy ministry is a command for the entire church.

The ministry of mercy is primarily a ministry of deeds, focused on meeting the physical needs of humanity. Because of this, it is often contrasted with evangelism. Evangelism is seen as the spiritual work of the church while mercy ministry is merely physical. It can be cogently argued that evangelism has a logical priority over mercy ministry because of the eternal consequences of rejecting the gospel. But this is an unhelpful and unnecessary bifurcation (see also Holistic Mission).

Mercy ministry was a significant part of Christ’s earthly ministry and remains an important aspect of the church’s mission. In fact, Jesus has given numerous “deed” gifts to the church that are explicitly related to mercy ministry: service, giving, mercy, helps and administration (Rom. 12:6–8; 1 Cor. 14:28; 1 Peter 4:10–11). Jesus expects his ministry of mercy to continue through his church. Both word and deed, evangelism and mercy ministry are emphasized in Scripture. They are like the proverbial two wings of an airplane.

However, mercy ministry does not just seek the interdependence of word and deed. It also addresses one’s attitudes. On two occasions, after seeing the critical and condemning attitudes of the Pharisees, Jesus rebukes them by quoting from the Old Testament: “I desire mercy, not sacrifice” (Matt. 9:13; 12:7). The scrupulously legalistic Pharisees were preoccupied with external religious rituals but knew little of God’s tender mercy or heartfelt compassion.

Furthermore, Jesus contrasts mercy with a judging, condemning, and unforgiving spirit. “Be merciful, just as your Father is merciful. Do not judge, and you will not be judged. Do not condemn and you will not be condemned. Forgive and you will be forgiven” (Luke 6:36–37). Thus, mercy is an attitude that describes how we are to carry out our mission. In the words of James, “mercy triumphs over judgment!” (James 2:13).

Richard D. Love

Merensky, Alexander (1837–1918). German missionary in South Africa. The son of a Prussian forest administrator, Merensky was born in Pans near Liegnitz in Silesia (Germany) in 1837 and studied at the Berlin Missionary Society’s seminary. In 1859 he was posted to South Africa and undertook a new work in the Transvaal (South African Republic) among the Pedi, a Northern Sotho people who lived north of Pretoria. In 1864 a conflict among the indigenous tribes forced him to relocate and establish a new station, Bothshabelo near Middelburg, which became the center of Berlin’s Transvaal mission. As the field director he developed workshops to train craftsmen, a printing plant, schools, hospitals, and a seminary to train African evangelists. He mastered several African languages, studied the history, culture, and religion of the people and published the results in Europe, and took part in geographical research expeditions. Forced to leave the South African Republic after the British defeat in 1882, he became one of the leading advocates for German colonial expansion.
Merensky, Alexander

1891 he led an expedition into southern Tanganyika which opened the way for the Berlin Mission to develop a field there. In his later years he continued his scholarly works, was showered with honorary degrees and scholarly society membership, and moderated his enthusiasm for colonial missions.

Methodist Missions. The Board of Global Ministries of the United Methodist Church resulted from the union of the Methodist Church and the Evangelical United Brethren Church that took place in 1968. To understand mission in this denomination the mission histories of the two streams need to be accounted for.

Mission from England gave birth to the Methodist Church, when from 1768 to 1774 John Wesley sent eight missionaries to America to promote and nurture the new Methodist movement. For years following the America Revolution the American frontier itself became a mission field for Methodist itinerants. The church followed the expansion to the west and an official Missionary Society was formed in 1819. Soon afterwards evangelists took the gospel into Canada and Nova Scotia.

Mission into the world was taking place when stress arose within the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States. A schismatic problem over the episcopacy led to the formation of the Methodist Protestant Church (1830). Soon afterwards, a second division around the issue of slavery resulted in the formation of the Methodist Episcopal Church (South), while the original

M.E. Church continued in the north. These lines of American Methodism pursued separate mission progrms until 1939, when union brought the three branches together, combining missionary operations under the Board of Missions of the reorganized Methodist Church.

Before the division, the Methodist Episcopal Church commissioned Melville R. Cox to Liberia.
He became the first official missionary (1833).
Soon afterward, work was opened up in Argentina, Brazil, and Texas (which in 1837 was still Spanish/Mexican territory). M.E. Church missions developed quickly after this time in China, Korea, India, Burma, Singapore, Malaya, and the Philippines as well as in Europe, the Baltic States, and Latin America, including Cuba, Brazil, Mexico, and Puerto Rico. The African work, which had begun in Liberia, expanded to Algeria, Tunisia, Angola, Rhodesia, Mozambique, and the Congo.

The Methodist Protestant Church, the earliest of the schismatic groups, established a Board of Foreign Missions at their first General Conference (1834). Most of the effort was in Home Missions for fifty years, with work opening in up
Japan and China toward the end of the century.
Second in the three-way split was the Methodist Episcopal (South), which formed its own Missionary Society in 1844 in Louisville. This board worked in home missions, not retaining any work overseas that had begun before separation.
It was fifty years before mission was launched in Japan, followed by China and Korea. By 1920, the Missionary Society had work in the Congo, in Europe, Mexico, and Brazil. At the time of union M.E. (South) had 169 missionaries. However, the mission enterprise of the M.E. (North) was the largest, including all the fields mentioned above.
Missionary work of the three groups, both home and foreign, was organized into one at the time of union (1939), as the Board of Missions and Church Extension. In 1952 this became the Board of Mission of the Methodist Church with three divisions: The World Division, the National Division, and the Woman's Division.

Church union between the Evangelical United Brethren Church and the Methodist Church took place in 1968. This further widened the mission areas of the newly organized United Methodist Church. The Department of World Mission, and the Woman's Society of World Service of the E.U.B. denomination had work in China, Japan, Hong Kong, Philippines, Brazil, Ecuador, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, and Europe. This presented a challenging, sometimes difficult task of reorganiization, not only for the new denomination, but also for ecumenical relationships among the overseas churches.

Following the union, mission administration was finally reconstituted as the Board of Global Ministries. The structures followed primarily the Methodist patterns, as the size of the Methodist Church at the time of union was nearly ten times greater than that of the E.U.B. The total missionary force was well over one thousand in 1968.
Since then, because of transfer of authority to national churches and changes in missionary roles, the number of overseas missionary personnel has been greatly reduced.

The contributions of women in all stages of mission history of the United Methodist Church are of inestimable importance (see Women in Mis-ion). The divided Methodist Church (until 1939), with their own separate boards of missions, were also organized into separate women's organizations. The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church had 473 missionaries and a budget of $1 million when union was achieved in 1939. The Woman's Missionary Society of the M.E. Church (South), organized in 1878, brought 169 missionaries and $400,000 into the union. The Methodist Protestant Church was smaller and its Woman's For-
with the M.P. Church’s Board of Missions. Equally effective in fostering missionary education and in the raising of funds were the women’s agencies of the two churches that formed the Evangelical United Brethren Church in 1946. The United Brethren Church had officially recognized their Woman’s Missionary Society in 1875. The W.M.S. is remembered for beginning the earliest African mission at Totifunk in Sierra Leone. The Evangelical Association was greatly helped by the Woman’s Missionary Society, formed in 1883. This Society functioned as a supportive Society rather than setting up their separate mission programs. After the merger in 1968, the Woman’s Society of World Service of the E.U.B. Church was integrated with the Woman’s Division of the Methodist Church.

United Methodist mission work cannot be fully appreciated without recognizing the closely allied United Methodist Committee on Relief. This is the arm of the United Methodist Church that responds by a diversity of programs to crisis situations as well as those that call for longer commitment, such as community development, agriculture, and humanitarian services. UMCOR maintains a separate program and budget, even though the kinds of projects carried out by the Board of Global Ministries and UMCOR are often very closely related.

In 1984, a second mission agency was formed as a voluntary association carrying the name The Mission Society for United Methodists. The purpose of the new society is to emphasize evangelism in the tradition of John Wesley and promote the centrality of the GREAT COMMISSION as the basis for mission. With headquarters in Atlanta, the MSUM carries on its work separately from the denominational Board. Missionary personnel of the society are United Methodists who work directly with the MSUM or are seconded to other mission agencies. This additional feature of joining with other mission organizations has resulted in a diversity of ministries in South and Central America, Central and Southeast Asia, Africa, North America, and in the new states of the former Soviet Union.

Methodius (c. 815–885). Greek missionary to the Slavic people. Born in Thessalonika (Saloniki) in the Byzantine Empire, he took the name of Methodius upon becoming a monk at the Mount Olympus monastery, where his younger brother Constantine (later to take the name of Cyril) joined him after 855. The work for which they are known began in 862 when Rastislav of Moravia requested Greek priests to teach the Slavic people in their own language. They traveled to Rastislav’s court and began training Slavic priests. They ran into increasing opposition from the Bavarian Catholic missionaries there. They traveled to Rome in 868 to confer with the pope, who approved the work of the brothers and the Slavic liturgy they created. Methodius was ordained, and eventually consecrated as archbishop of Pannonia and Moravia, which was removed from the authority of the Franks (Germans). This produced a violent reaction among Frankish secular and religious leaders and in 870 King Louis the German imprisoned Methodius in Swabia. Pope John VIII secured Methodius’s restoration in 873, although apparently only after a promise that use of the Slavic liturgy would be curtailed. The conflicts, however, continued. Methodius returned briefly to Constantinople (881–882) to complete the translation of the Bible he and Cyril had begun. He died in Moravia on April 6, 885. After his death, his followers were forced out of Moravia, with the result that they began evangelistic work among the Poles, Bulgars, Bohemians, and other Slavic peoples. The ministry of Cyril and Methodius is traditionally regarded as the major means by which the gospel was brought to the Slavic people.

Mexico City Conference (1963)

Mexico City Conference (1963). The first world conference of the newly created Division of World Mission and Evangelism, brought into being through the integration of the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL into the life of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, was held in Mexico City in December 1963. Under the title of “Witness in Six Continents” its four sections focused on: (1) the witness of Christians to those of other faiths; (2) the witness of Christians to people living in a secular world; (3) the witness of the congregation in its neighborhood; and (4) the witness of the Christian church across national and confessional boundaries. Taken together these clearly set the missionary task in the context of what God was doing in the secular world, with less emphasis on the nature of the church itself. Mexico City abandoned the geographical concept of Christendom because “The missionary frontier runs around the world: it is the line that separates belief from unbelief, the unseen frontier which cuts across all other frontiers and presents the universal church with its primary missionary challenge.” It was the first mission conference at which the Orthodox were formally present.
Mexico City Conference (1963)

Work on dialogue with people of other living faiths was not significantly advanced at Mexico City, and although the conference endorsed the idea of “Joint Action for Mission,” the official history records a slow response and “inadequate attention at Geneva” to this emphasis. The conference was, however, significant in establishing the understanding that, in Lesslie Newbigin’s words, “the home base of the world mission is worldwide, and that the mission field is also worldwide.” Accordingly the conference broke new ground in the attention it gave to missionary endeavor in the secular world of North America and Europe.

Mexico (Est. 2000 pop.: 102,410,000; 1,958,201 sq. km. [756,061 sq. mi.]). Mexico is Latin America’s third largest country in land mass. A civil war la Revolución took place from 1910 to 1917, and ended the long dictatorship of Porfirio Díaz ushering in a new period of equality and democracy. Nevertheless, the Partido Revolucionario Institucional (PRI) has dominated politics throughout the century, frequently resorting to fraud and corruption.

Catholicism was introduced into the country through the Spanish conquerors. This resulted in many distortions of the faith and much syncretism. Nevertheless, there were many sincere missionaries, including the famous Bartolomé de las Casas. Almost 90 percent of Mexicans are Roman Catholics, although fewer than 10 percent participate in weekly services. The Catholic Church has had a stormy relationship with the government, including a violent civil war which claimed over a million lives (1916–29). Due to the current vulnerability of both institutions, they are seeking a mutually beneficial relationship. The four main factions within the church are the conservative traditionalists loyal to the Vatican, the nationalists, a socially concerned comunidad de base sector led by a few progressive bishops, and a growing charismatic wing.

The history of the Protestant Church in Mexico can be understood as a series of “waves,” each one building on and going beyond the previous one. The first wave consisted of European immigrants who arrived in New Spain. Usually these were subjects of Charles V and Phillip II but were from countries other than Spain. The earliest was Andrés Moral, a Moravian lapidary, arrested in Mexico City in 1536 for ten Lutheran heresies. So many followed in his footsteps that a special tribunal of the Holy Inquisition was established in Mexico City in 1571. Almost every year “Lutheran and Calvinist heretics” were tried and sentenced. The last two condemned to death by the Inquisition in Mexico were Catholic priests Hidalgo and Morelos, the founding fathers who led the war of independence from Spain beginning in 1810.

The second wave was more intentional and took place in independent Mexico. James “Diego” Thomson was the representative of the British and Foreign Bible Society and of the British and Foreign School Society. He had traveled extensively throughout Latin America establishing Lancaster Schools (schools that utilized the more advanced students to teach the younger ones and used the Bible as one of the principal texts). He arrived in Mexico in 1827 with the same purpose. Political liberals in Mexico became thoroughly committed to his cause, such that on his departure in 1830, José María Luis Mora, a very influential statesman and author, became the official representative of the Bible Society in Mexico and promoted the translation of the Scriptures into the Spanish, Náhuatl, Tarasco, Otomí, and Huasteco languages.

The third wave was perhaps the most important and has rightly been called Mexico’s own “Protestant Reformation.” In 1857 President Benito Juárez and his cabinet implemented the Laws of Reform, which separated church from state and, in effect, granted religious liberty in Mexico. Although the Roman Catholic hierarchy condemned the new Constitution and the liberal politicians that promoted it, a significant number of priests were supportive of these initiatives. These Padres Constitucionalistas were expelled from the Catholic Church and formed an independent church with Juárez’s support. They underwent their own “Reformation” without much foreign influence. Although this Iglesia Mexicana de Jesús did not survive much past 1870, many of its leaders, such as Arcadio Morales and Sóstenes Juárez, became the founders and leaders of the Presbyterian, Methodist, and Anglican churches in the following decades.

The fourth wave was the arrival of foreign missionaries sent out by denominational mission organizations, primarily based in the United States, beginning in the 1870s. The Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, and other denominations experienced slow but steady growth during the long Porfirián dictatorship. Perhaps their most significant contribution was the 614 schools that they started throughout the country. Evangelical participation in the Revolution (1910–17) was widespread, especially in the military, ideological, educational, and political arenas. Nevertheless, after the Revolution, Protestant denominations... abandoned the public sphere due to legal and theological factors.

Pentecostals constitute the fifth wave. Mexican migrant workers in the United States returned to Mexico after the Revolution and many brought with them “Pentecostal fire.” Not only denominations like the Assemblies of God and the Church of God (Cleveland) were begun, but entirely autonomous movements sprouted, such as the Iglesia de Dios en la República Mexicana, the Iglesia Interdenominacional de Portales, the Iglesia de Pachuca, the Movimiento de Iglesias Evangélicas Pentecostes Independientes (MIEPI), and others. Currently, each of these movements has more than five hundred member churches.

Over the past twenty years, a sixth wave has burst on the scene, the Neo-Pentecostals. With many of their numbers coming from the middle and upper classes, these groups are much less traditional than other evangelicals. Utilizing lively music by Marcos Witt, Miguel Cassina, and others, these groups emphasize vigorous praise and worship more than doctrine and biblical exposition. Groups such as El Castillo del Rey (Monterrey), Amistad Cristiana, and Calocoy (Mexico City) minister to tens of thousands in their weekly services.

Comprising about 10 percent of the current population, Mexican evangelicals are involved in creative social ministries and venturing more and more into the political arena. Religious persecution continues in Chiapas, Oaxaca, Hidalgo, and other states, but this persecution has resulted in even greater growth.

The most rapid and extensive growth of Protestantism in Mexico has occurred during the last forty years in the southern states of Chiapas, Oaxaca, Tabasco, Veracruz, Quintana Roo, and Yucatán. Large people movements among Mayan tribal peoples have been common. In Chiapas, Tabasco, and Yucatán over 25% of the population is reportedly evangelical Portestant or Pentecostal.

Micronesia. POLYNESIA, MICRONESIA, and MELANESIA comprise the three major divisions of the large Pacific Ocean. It is located north of the equator in the western part of the Pacific. Geographically, Micronesia includes the large island nation of Kiribati (formerly Gilbert Islands, a British protectorate) located in the easternmost part and straddling the equator. Then, spread from east to west are the islands of the former U.S. Trust Territory of the Pacific— the Marshall Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia of Kosrae, Pohnpei, Chuuk (Truk), Yap; and Palau (Belau); and the Northern Marianas Islands (Rota, Tinian, Saipan). In the westernmost part, the island of Guam, an unincorporated territory of the United States, completes the list of Micronesian islands. It is an island world composed of over 2,000 islands scattered over 3 million square miles of the Pacific with a population of over 260,000.

In 1852, American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM) missionaries, assisted by newly trained Hawaiian couples, entered the eastern part of Micronesia (Marshalls, Kosrae, and Pohnpei) and established small island churches. Within the first twenty years missionaries on Pohnpei reached farther west to the Chuuk Islands with the help of local servants of Christ. Roman Catholic missionaries reached the western parts of Micronesia (Guam and the Northern Marianas) in the late seventeenth and the early part of the eighteenth centuries. They eventually established churches on Yap and Palau, and throughout the rest of the Micronesian islands.

ABCFM missionaries and Hawaiian co-workers evangelized the northern islands of Kiribati (Gilberts) in 1857, while the southern islands were reached by English missionaries of the London Missionary Society as the islands had become part of an English Protectorate and later an English Crown Colony. In 1898, after Spain lost the Spanish-American War, the United States took over Guam. The rest of the Micronesian islands became a colonial possession of Germany. Thus, in 1906, German Protestant missionaries of the Liebenzeller Mission (former German branch of the China Inland Mission) entered the eastern part of Micronesia in place of the American missionaries. They proceeded to strengthen the existing churches and to evangelize the unreached islands west of Chuuk. During World War I, Japan took over Micronesia from Germany. They replaced German missionaries with workers from the Protestant Church of Japan. In the 1920s and 1930s the Japanese government allowed German missionaries to return to the islands, but they placed them under severe restrictions as the islands were fortified for war. The U.S. liberation of Micronesia during World War II ended the Japanese control and initiated an American administration in the islands as the U.S. Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. This allowed missionaries from the original American Board to return to the eastern part of Micronesia. Further, German missionaries who had survived the war were allowed to continue their work under the auspices of the American Board. These missionaries joined their efforts to regather island Christians and to rebuild their lives and their churches.

The United States brought its educational, monetary, and postal system to the islands of Micronesia. They also provided health care and a political program that led the war-torn islands into a period of restoration and growth. Vigorous training programs by the United States equipped islanders with needed skills to rebuild the islands and explore new forms of democratic government. With proper training, they wrote their own Constitutions and democratically elected their own forms of governments at the municipal, state, and national levels. In the early 1960s, elected leaders from each island group formed the Congress of Micronesia and a national government in cooperation with the U.S. administration. However, over the past twenty years, each island group has elected its own style of government, thus ending a united Micronesia and resulting in the various island nations: the Republic of the Marshall Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia (FSM) made up of the four Island States of Kosrae, Pohnpei, Chuuk, and Yap; the Republic of Belau (Palau); and the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas.

All of these young island nations, except the Northern Marianas, have chosen to maintain their close ties with the United States through a unique arrangement with the United States, called the “Compact of Free Association.” Under this compact, the United States provides the island nations with needed funding for their internal development. They also have freedom to deal with their internal affairs and are allowed to enter the United States without a visa. In exchange, the United States receives options on land use for United States military purposes. The United States also assumes the responsibility for the defense of the area. The people of Northern Marianas elected an even closer bond with the United States, the status of a “commonwealth,” allowing them to receive greater benefits, especially U.S. citizenship.

The island of Guam, “unincorporated territory” of the United States and located within the western part of Micronesia, provides the United States with one of the most forward bastions of defense in the vast Pacific Ocean. There is a large U.S. military presence on Guam. The Organic Act of Guam (1950) by the U.S. Congress designated the island as an “unincorporated territory” of the United States, giving its people, the Chamorros, U.S. citizenship without the privilege of voting for the president of the United States. As the “Hub of the Pacific,” Guam has become the home for many Micronesians, Asians, and U.S. citizens. The island has also become the “honeymoon capital” for Japanese newlyweds. In recent years, Chamorros have been seeking to change their island status from a U.S. territory to a commonwealth.

During this crucial transition period, the missionaries assisted the island churches in developing their leadership through local training programs, centralized pastoral schools, as well as overseas education in Bible colleges and seminaries. This has resulted in self-governing and self-supporting island churches in the past twenty-five years. The mission boards (American Board/UCC and Liebenzell) still assist with some funding and personnel at the request of the churches.

The traditional island churches are also challenged by other Christian organizations establishing their ministries. The Assemblies of God, the Seventh-Day Adventists, the Independent Baptists, Youth with a Mission, Campus Crusade, and more recently the Salvation Army have become active on various island centers. The Jehovah’s Witnesses, the Mormon Church, and the Baha’i are also offering their services to the Micronesians.

Over the past twenty-five years, enormous changes have challenged the island traditions and cultural values. Subsistence farming and fishing is giving way to a cash economy. Communal living and sharing of resources is being taxed by a greater emphasis on the individual. Overseas travel and education, movies, TV (cable, CNN), videos, and other mass media bring incredible challenges to the island people and their cultural values. Elementary and high school education for all island young people adds to the culture change facing families, communities, and churches. Drugs, alcohol, and a promiscuous lifestyle challenge the island communities.

Rural-urban drift due to education, jobs, and adventure has drawn the young educated elite from their islands to the crowded administration centers of Micronesia, often leaving the very young and the older ones back on their islands. Guam, within easy access of most of the islands, has become the most attractive urban center for islanders from the central and western part of Micronesia. Since the “Compact of Free Association” was ratified in the early 1980s, Micronesian citizens have unrestricted entry into the United States. Thus, Guam, Hawaii, and the United States have become home to many Micronesians. For example, a recent estimate claims that over 9,000 Chuukese have migrated to Guam. Chuukese churches have attempted to provide pastoral care for their people on Guam. In addition, many Chuukese have settled in Hawaii and various parts of the United States. They have become a significant people group, among whom evangelistic and pastoral work is being done.

The continuous cultural change over the years has also sparked the rise of “nativistic movements” (Palau and Chuuk) that urge a return to cultural values and practices rejected and neglected by generations of island Christians. These movements have challenged the churches to become more sensitive to the unmet needs of islanders. Also, the persistent animistic practices, involving local medicine and magical assistance of various kinds through contact with ancestral spirits and traditional powers, challenge island Christians to demonstrate the all-sufficiency of Jesus Christ.

One of the most important roles for the island churches in Micronesia today is to be the prophetic voice of God to the elected leaders of the island nations; to provide a cohesive community of faith and values for island Christians in the face of rapid cultural change; and to demonstrate to many islanders in meaningful Power Encounters the all-sufficiency of the Lord Jesus Christ and the power of the gospel.

Middle East. Since World War II, the lands from the eastern Mediterranean Sea to the Persian Gulf have been called the Middle East. Other designations include the Levant and Near East. Though the geographic perimeters vary, the Middle East consists of the states or territories of the Arabian Peninsula, Cyprus, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Jordan, Lebanon, Palestine, Syria, and Turkey. At the core, religiously, it is a largely Islamic world. However, more than 8 million Christians live in the region. Despite the fact that massive emigration of Christians has eroded the strength of Christianity in some areas, notably Palestine, overall the Christian population is growing.

Christian presence in the region goes back to establishment of the first church in Jerusalem on Pentecost, when the Holy Spirit came upon the disciples of Jesus (Acts 1–2). From that epicenter the gospel was to spread to Judea, Samaria, and the ends of the world (Acts 1:8). Earliest Christianity in the Middle East thus had a missionary dynamic. Within the lifetime of Jesus’ first followers, Christianity spread to Africa, where notable Christian populations have continued to thrive in Egypt and Ethiopia despite the rise of Islam in the seventh century; to Europe; and eastward. Christians were first so-named at Antioch (Acts 11:26). Although surviving documents provide too slender a base to support some claims made about the expansion of Christianity in Asia during the lifetimes of Jesus’ apostles, an early tradition is that Thomas carried the gospel to India and established seven congregations along the Malabar coast.

Christianity spread through the Hellenistic world, largely tending to follow trade lines and attracting converts in the great urban centers of the Roman Empire such as Antioch, Ephesus, Corinth, and Rome. Although conversion to the new faith was uneven, by the end of the third century Armenia had become the first Christianized kingdom followed, early in the fourth century, by the Roman Empire. Within two hundred years after the death of Christ, Syrian Christians were carrying the faith into the Persian Empire and across the steppes of Central Asia. In addition to the tradition that St. Thomas visited South India, there is another account, dating to the third century, of his visit to northwest India (what is now Pakistan). Earliest evidence of Nestorian missionary activity in the ancient Chinese capital Chang’an dates to 635.

Missionary dynamism did not endure. Contributing to this decline was the internal political and theological splintering of Christianity. However, in terms of the transformation it brought to the religious geography of the Middle East, the major factor was the rise of Islam. During the period from the hijrah, or emigration of the Prophet and his family from Mecca to Medina in 622 to his death in 632, Muhammad created a religious community held together by his personal presence and authority. Though it lasted only ten years, Muhammad’s public mission had an impact similar to that of Jesus. After his death, his family and closest relatives by marriage transformed this community into a political and military empire. Within thirty years, the rule of the patriarchal caliphate stretched west through the richest provinces of North Africa halfway to the Atlantic Ocean, east into Asia, and north to the eastern shores of the Black Sea. Except for Asia Minor, Muslims ruled all of the ancient Christian Roman Empire in Asia.

Nonetheless, there remained a significant Christian minority population throughout the Middle East. Especially where large Arab Christian populations were involved, notably in what is now Egypt, Palestine, Lebanon, Syria, and Yemen. Muhammad’s successors granted immunity from forcible conversion. For non-Arabs, in what is now Iran or Turkey, Christianity remained as a tolerated minority, often in a sort of religious ghetto and subject to special taxes.

Gradually over the next three centuries Christianity in Asia went into decline. Under the Umayyad Caliphate (661–750) and ‘Abbasids (750–1258), a numerically large body of Christians persisted faithfully, but its missionary possibilities were curtailed and its long-term survival was in doubt. The world of Islam also experienced splintering, and ancient centers of civili-motion came under the sway of new Islamic political empires. These forced conversion to Islam all across Asia with the exception of the Middle East. The Nestorians in China disappeared, and the Thomas Christians of southern India were isolated as a minority-caste community.

Still Christianity survived under medieval Islamic rule. From the perspective of Asian history as a whole, the most distinguishing feature of the period was the fall of the Arabs and triumph of the Turks. There are, of course, other perspectives, most notably that of European history which tends to highlight the brief, failed intervention known as the Crusades. The first crusade began in 1095 with a call by Pope Urban II to the Christian rulers of western Europe to rescue the Holy Land from the Turks. This led to creation of a Latin kingdom of Jerusalem, which lasted in various forms from 1099 until the fall of Jerusalem in 1187. Properly speaking, the story of the succession of Crusades to restore Christian control of the Holy Land belongs to the history of the Western church. However, they did leave their mark on the churches of the Middle East. Negatively, they heightened the breach between Eastern and Western Christianity, and tended to unite Eastern Christians, Jews, and Muslims in their disenchantment with arrogant Western Christians. Positively, they contributed to the renaissance of European life, in part through the introduction of new architectural forms and learning to Europe. They also contributed to the emergence of two new Catholic missionary orders, the Dominicans and Franciscans.

The Castillian Dominic (1170–1221) sent preaching friars to the Middle East with a sense of mission shared by the Franciscans, to strive to heal the divisions of Christianity and to reach out in faithful evangelistic witness to Muslims. Among the early Dominican missionaries, Raymond Martin (1230–84) became a notable scholar of Islam. Francis of Assisi (1182–1226), became a notable missionary to Muslims. During his personal mission to Egypt impressed Muslims. His model of sincere Christian witness inspired Islamic rulers to allow Franciscans to remain in the region, often as custodians of the Holy Sites. Between the fourteenth and eighteenth centuries, Christian missionary activity in the Middle East was limited. Early in this period, the best-known missionary was the Spanish layman, Raymond Lull (c. 1235), who sought to convince the Western church of the vital need for peaceful missionary work among Muslims. During his preaching journeys to Tunis and Algeria in North Africa, and to Cyprus, he was attacked, arrested, and expelled many times. He met a martyr's death by stoning in Tunis.

The Reformation period of the sixteenth century, which witnessed the creation of new Roman Catholic missionary orders and some initial Protestant outreach, quickened the pulse of Christian evangelistic activity and awakened interest in work among Jews and Muslims. However, virtually no effort to evangelize in the Middle East followed from this. It remained for the evangelical awakening of the late eighteenth century to generate missionary activity in the region.

In the nineteenth century, Protestants undertook several initiatives. Animated by Paul's example of preaching first to the Jew (Rom. 1:16), the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews (Church Mission to Jews, or Church's Ministry among the Jews), founded in 1808 as an offshoot of the London Missionary Society, was the first of some twenty-three such societies in Britain alone. Many of these continue to the present. The London Society sent the Reverend Joseph Wolff (1796–1862), a converted Jew, to undertake various exploratory journeys, leading to the start of a medical ministry in Jerusalem in 1824.

Elsewhere, in 1818, the Church Missionary Society (CMS) sent a party of five missionaries to Egypt. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM) established work in Beirut in 1823. Notable work was done in the area of translation of the Bible into modern Arabic and establishment of the Syrian Protestant College, which became the American University of Beirut in 1920. The American Board also began work in Turkey in 1831. The Reverend William Gordell settled in Constantinople. The educational work gradually extended to other centers in Asia Minor and Armenia. In terms of conversions, however, numerical growth came from adherents of the ancient Eastern churches as, perhaps regrettably or unwisely, the mission formed a new Protestant denomination. In Iran, Henry Martyn, en route to England from service in Calcutta, India, between 1806 until 1811, worked on a Persian version of the New Testament until his death at age thirty-one, having baptized one convert. Missionaries with the ABCFM who opened a station at Urmia in 1835 concentrated on adherents of Eastern Christianity, with the same results as noted in Turkey. By contrast, Swiss missionaries of the Basel Mission, who settled in Tabriz in 1813, concentrated on contact with Muslims. Among its missionaries, Karl Pfander completed in 1829 the Mizan-al-Haqq (Balance of Truth), a book which helped pioneer a more tolerant approach to Muslims, with an inner understanding of Islam not characteristic of earlier missionaries. This approach began to bear fruit under the ministry of an Irish Anglican Robert Bruce, who spent ten years in the Punjab and, like Martyn, obtained permission to spend a year in Iran on his way back from furlough in Britain to improve his knowledge of Persian and of Islam. His year's stay extended to two, and in 1871, as he prepared to leave for India, nine Muslims with whom he had studied Islam in Isfahan asked for baptism. He remain in Iran and was joined by another CMS missionary with a background in India, Edward Craig Stuart. Their ministry bore fruit when the first Persian, Hassan Barnabas Dehqani-Tafti, was consecrated Anglican bishop on April 25, 1961.

One additional nineteenth-century initiative is worthy of note. Even as Christianity arose in Jerusalem under the unitive ministry of the Holy Spirit, Jerusalem was the setting of an ecumenical initiative between 1841 and 1886. In 1841 the Church of England and Prussian Evangelical Union jointly established the Protestant bishopric in Jerusalem. The first bishop, Michael Solomon Alexander, was a converted Jewish rabbi. He served from 1842 to 1845. His successor, Samuel Gobat, a French-speaking Swiss Protestant who had served the Church Missionary Society in Ethiopia, was bishop for thirty-three years, from 1846 to 1879. His tenure proved controversial in such areas as liturgy, missionary strategy, and relations with local political and religious authorities. When his successor, Joseph Barclay, died suddenly after less than two years in office, the joint undertaking collapsed, and the British Archbishop of Canterbury appointed a successor on a purely Anglican basis. The demise of the Jerusalem epis-copacy in 1886, due to conflict in Jerusalem and imperial politics in Europe, contributed to the continued breach between the Anglican and Lutheran churches and the splintering of the Christian community in the Holy Land. Proselytizing activities among Eastern Christians and failure to establish any viable Jewish Christian community among the local inhabitants further weakened Christian witness in the Holy Land.
This initiative contributed in some measure to the
tians to rethink attitudes toward Eastern Christians and the people of Israel.

The religious awakening of interest in the Middle East coincided with the decline of the Ottoman Empire and an awakening of European imperial ambitions in the region. At times, ecclesiastical and political rivalries often contributed directly to conflict, starting with Napoleon Bonaparte’s invasion of Egypt in 1798. In 1847, the Roman Catholic Church revived the Latin Patriaarchate under French auspices. This in turn attracted Russian interest, allegedly in support of Orthodox authorities, and contributed in some measure to the outbreak of the Crimean War in 1854. Struggle among European imperial powers for control of the region intensified in the aftermath of the collapse of the Ottoman Empire after World War I.

The lands of the Bible have extraordinary sigificance for Christians, Jews, Muslims, and the tiny community of Samaritans as well as for other religious communities such as the BHA’I and Druze. Interest in and care for the Holy Land cution. Christians exercise considerable political power of Cyprus, which remains partitioned, and in Lebanon, where they once formed a majority of the population. Religiously, the Christian churches remain fragmented, notwithstanding the longings of ordinary Christians to live as one body, including gestures to promote unity, such as the pilgrimage of the Roman Catholic Pope Paul VI in January 1964, and the encounters he had with Benedictos I, Greek Orthodox Patriarch of Jerusalem, and Athenagoras I, Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople.

Migration. Migration is as old as the departure of Adam and Eve from the garden (Gen. 3:23–24). Its uprooting nature drove Cain in fear to the security of the city (Gen. 4:13–14, 17) and scattered the builders of Babel’s city and tower (Gen. 11:9). Today, as of old, it has been motivated by famine and natural disaster, by the search for a better life, and by political conflict and war.

Migration Then and Now. Past or present, these migratory movements take many forms, some more peaceful in origin. The Berbers of Africa’s past and today’s Fulani demonstrate nomadism, a fixed lifestyle of wandering from place to place. Immigration, a relatively free movement of peoples within and across political boundaries, has a long history. With the passage of the 1793 Alien Bill in England its formal control was initiated and now has become the rule (Kritz, Keely, and Tomasi, 1983, xiii).

Out of the displacement of war and sociopolitical struggle have come the cause/effect patterns of Invasion and Displacement Migration. The mass intrusions into Israel’s history by conquering Assyria and Babylonia are good examples. They were accompanied by deportation, resettlement, and assimilation. Things have not changed much. World War II saw the displacement of some 40 million people in Europe alone. Since the end of the Vietnam War in 1975, over 2 million people have fled from Southeast Asia.

But there are new twists also. Ease of travel has increased international migration. Currently an estimated 125 million people live officially outside the countries of their birth, some permanently, others as a temporary labor force. Migration in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries flowed from richer countries to poorer ones; now the flow is from less developed regions to more developed ones. There is a growing feminization of both international and internal migration.

However, it is internal migration within the Third World countries that has deeply modified past patterns. That migration is from rural to urban areas, supporting a continuing trend toward ever-larger cities. Budgets are swamped by human needs and poverty has become the dominant social problem. Africa today resembles a “huge refugee camp” (Mieth and Cahill, 1993, 15).

Mission Response. Migration has been a major “bridge of God” for Christianity’s spread in the past (Norwood, 1969). “Aliens and strangers in the world” (1 Peter 2:11), Christians have wandered in dispersion “among the nations” (Luke 24:47). Christian immigrants planted the church at Rome and in Gaul. Wandering monks crossed Europe and followed the ancient silk route through Central Asia into China. Even such brutal invasions as the Crusades and the colonial conquests of Africa, Asia, and Latin America opened pilgrim paths for a compromised Christianity. Christians were part of the transoceanic migrations to Australia and North America in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Opportunities for skilled labor abroad today have opened CREATIVE ACCESS COUNTRIES to TENT-MAKING MISSIONS.

Migrants have also been the objects of evangelism and compassionate service. Christian ministries like the TEAR Fund, World Vision, and World Relief have become involved in social transformation and DEVELOPMENT projects for refugees and “children at risk.” CHURCH PLANTING has had its successes among the mainline Chinese, relocating after 1949 in Taiwan. The church has not forgotten that the treatment of strangers and aliens is still a criterion of fidelity to God’s covenant (Exod. 22:21; James 2:14–17). In caring for strangers, they care for Jesus (Matt. 25:36, 40).

Miguez Bonino, José (1924– ). Argentinean Methodist theologian whose pastoral concern for the poor, coupled with his lifelong interest in theological and political ethics have been combined to make him one of the most outstanding Latin American Protestant theologians. Born in Santa Fe, he has degrees from the Facultad Evangélica de Buenos Aires (1948), Emory University in Atlanta (1952), and Union Theological Seminary in New York (1960). His major contribution has been as a proponent of the theology of liberation, drawing heavily from Marxist principles of social analysis and praxis, yet rejecting parts of them on the basis of his view of Christian ethics. He makes this clear in his books Toward a Christian Political Ethics as well as in Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation. No less important has been his contribution in the field of ecumenism, both in his books and articles and in his participation in the World Council of Churches, in the Protestant-Roman Catholic dialogue toward unity, and as the only Latin American Protestant observer at Vatican II. Another significant contribution has been in the field of theological education, as president of the Instituto Superior de Estudios Teológicos, in Buenos Aires and as a visiting professor in several institutions in the Americas and Europe. His pastoral heart has also led him to translate and arrange several hymns exalting Christ as Savior and Lord.

Millennial Thought. Belief in the earthly reign of Christ before the end of the world and the eternal state. The most notable form of this doctrine is Premillennialism, which claims that the Lord will return before the golden age and is based on certain key passages of Scripture, including Daniel 7–11, Ezekiel 37–39, Matthew 24, 1 Thessalonians 4, 2 Thessalonians 2, and especially Revelation 20. There are two other major views, Postmillennialism, which states that the Lord will return after the millennium and Amillennialism, which states that the language of Scripture is too figurative to suggest that there will be a literal reign of Christ on earth.

Although these interpretations have never been without adherents in Western Christianity, in certain periods a particular outlook has predominated. During the first three centuries of the Christian era, premillennialism appears to have been the dominant eschatological interpretation. In the fourth century, when the Christian church was given a favored status under the emperor Constantine, the amillennial position was accepted. The millennium was reinterpreted to refer to the church. The famous church father, Augustine, articulated this position and it became the prevailing interpretation in medieval times.

Despite the fact that the Protestant Reformers accepted Augustinian eschatology, their emphasis on a more literal interpretation of the Bible and identification of the papacy with Antichrist called attention to the prophetic Scriptures. Later scholars especially in the Reformed tradition such as J. H. Alsted (1588–1638) and Joseph Mede (1586–1638) revived premillennialism. During the seventeenth century their view was shared by many of the leaders of the Puritan Revolution in England. However, with the restoration of the Stuart kings this opinion was discredited.

As premillennialism waned, postmillennialism became the prevailing eschatological interpretation, receiving its most important formulation in the work of Daniel Whitby (1638–1726). According to Whitby, the world was to be converted to Christ, after which the earth would enjoy universal peace, happiness, and righteousness for a thousand years. At the close of this period, Christ would return personally for the last judgment. Perhaps because of its agreement with the views of the Enlightenment, postmillennialism was adopted by the leading Protestant theologians of the era. New England Puritans, continental pietists, and evangelical revivalists of the eighteenth century all encouraged the emphasis on millennialism. One of the most outstanding missionary spokespersons of this period, Jonathan Edwards (1703–58), was a devoted postmillennialist.

During the nineteenth century, premillennialism again attracted attention. This interest was fostered by the violent uprooting of European political and social institutions caused by the French Revolution. Later in the century millennial enthusiasm found renewed support in the Plymouth Brethren Movement. J. N. Darby (1800–1882), an important Brethren leader, articulated the dispensationalist understanding of millennialism. Its name comes from the practice of dividing history into a series of ages, usually seven in number, which culminate in the millennium. A distinction is made between ethnic Israel and the church, and there is to be a tribulation period at the end of the church age caused by the Antichrist. After these events, Christ will return and rule the world for a thousand years with the help of the saints. This belief, popularized by the Scofield Reference Bible, the Bible Institute movement, popular evangelists, and mass media preachers, has become the dominant eschatology of American fundamentalists.

Despite the development of Dispensationalism, postmillennialism was the great dynamic for much of the missionary enthusiasm of the nineteenth century. America, many claimed, was the agent of God to bring in the last times. Timothy Dwight (1752–1817) anticipated the day when not a single Catholic cathedral, mosque, or pagoda would be left standing. Other spokespersons also merged the language of Manifest Destiny with millennialism and dreamed of the conquest of the world under the same laws and social characteristics as the Anglo-Saxons who would control all of North America. It was this confidence that led John R. Mott to publish The Millennial Thought

Evangelization of the World in This Generation (1900) and inspired the famous World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh (1910).

However, the new age did not come and more of those involved in the missionary movement adopted a premillennial view. Rather than trying to bring God’s kingdom to earth, they turned to winning individuals to Christ and preaching the gospel as witness to all nations so that Christ will return. Two world wars, genocide, economic depression, the rise of pluralism, the success of liberalism, and the privatization of religion in a secular society convinced them that only a supernatural, cataclysmic return of Christ would help the world. Yet changes in dispensational doctrine, a renewed emphasis on the Spirit of God by charismatic groups, and the concept of reaching whole groups of people with the gospel continue to encourage the postmillennial view. Despite the lively debate over the millennium there is no divergence of opinion among Christians as to the fact of Christ’s coming.

Mills, Samuel John, Jr. (1783–1819). American mission promoter and organizer. Samuel Mills was a visionary, a motivator, and a tireless inspiration during the early days of mission organization in America. He is best remembered for organizing a prayer meeting for missions at Williams College which, afterward, led to further stimulus for mission at Andover Seminary. Finally, this Society of the Brethren, as it was called, indirectly led to the formation of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM).

Mills, the son of a Congregational minister, was converted in the revivals that moved through the churches in New England at the end of the nineteenth century. Called to mission work, he attended Williams College (1806). While concerned with Asia and Africa, the Society of the Brethren did most of their planning around missions to the American Indians. It was during extended study at Andover Seminary that Mills with his friends, including Adoniram Judson, presented themselves for mission work, leading to the formation of the ABCFM.

Samuel Mills spent his life in far-reaching mission concerns. He planned to tour South America to open up missions. He worked among the poor in New York City. He worked tirelessly for the resettlement of freed slaves in West Africa, which helped form the American Colonization Society and, ultimately, the nation of Liberia. Mills died in June 1818 as he was returning from Africa after consulting about territories available for liberated slaves.

Minjung Theology. Minjung theology is called “a theology of the mass of people (minjung),” or “the Korean version of liberation theology,” or “a contextualized Korean theology of the poor.” It began to appear in 1975 and made its theological impact upon the Korean church and the society in the late 1970s and early 1980s, during the oppressive governments of President Park Chung-Hee and President Chun Too-Hwan.

Historical Background. The massive student demonstrations on April 19, 1960, brought down the government of President Syngman Rhee; political confusion followed afterwards. General Park Chung-Hee was able to take over power through his military coup d’etat on May 16, 1961, and ruled the nation with an iron fist until his assassination on October 12, 1979. President Park’s military government became oppressive and cracked down on any opposition to the government by limiting the freedom of speech and assembly. Many politicians, church leaders, professors, and students who opposed the military regime were imprisoned and severely tortured. There was a deep sense of Han (profound agony, sorrow, bitterness, resentment, and righteous indignation) in the souls of many Korean people.

There were three main reasons many pastors and theologians especially in the 1970s, voiced their opposition against the government: oppression, socio-economic injustice, and religious indifference. In 1974 the Korean National Council of Churches published “The Declaration of Human Rights in Korea,” and sixty-six Korean theologians and pastors also produced “The Theological Statement of Korean Christians.” In 1975 a renowned poet, Kim Chi-Ha, who was imprisoned for his writings against the military regime, wrote his “Conscience Declaration.” On March 1, 1976, twelve prominent leaders produced “The Declaration for the Restoration of Democracy.” Following that, a number of liberal theologians such as Suh Tong-Nam, Ahn Byung-Moo, Moon Hee-Suk, Kim Yong-Bock, Choo Chai-Yong, Hyun Yoon-Hak, and others began to introduce a new theology of liberation for the suffering masses in Korea, known as Minjung Theology.
Minority, Minority Populations

While the Bible teaches the basic unity of the entire human race because of our descent from the same original parents, it is obvious that there is tremendous diversity in the human race as well. This diversity opens the door for numerous minority groups.

It was God's will that humankind should spread out over the earth (Gen. 1:28; 11:9). While this diffusion was promoted by the rapid development of dialects and languages, once the groups became isolated from one another, their isolation encouraged still further diversity (or variety) of tongues.

It is more difficult to explain the variety in the physical appearance of people. Physical anthropologists who take an evolutionary view of human origins can describe this diversity, but can only speculate as to why it has occurred. It is best to say that our original parents, Adam and Eve, were created with genes that allowed for physical diversity over time, and that this diversity might very well have occurred whether or not humankind fell into sin.

Why, then, do we have minority groups all over the world? The basic reason is found in the age-old tendency of human beings to move. Some minorities have chosen to become minorities when they moved into the area of a majority group. Others became a minority group when a more dominant or larger group moved in on them. European expansionism, the slave trade, COLONIALISM, the desire for economic betterment—all these factors have contributed to the creation of more and more minority groups as history progresses.
Minority, Minority Populations

Most minority groups are ethnic groups. That is to say, they have their own language and culture which is different from that of the majority group. There are also religious and social minorities, but the ethnic minorities tend to be the most prominent, especially when ETHNICITY is reinforced by differences in physical appearance.

The apostle Paul spoke of human diversity when he told the Athenians, “And he made from one man every nation [ethnic group] of men to live on all the face of the earth, having determined allotted periods and the boundaries of their habitation” (Acts 17:26). What he said next is also important: “That they should seek God, in the hope that they might feel after him and find him” (v. 27). Here Paul suggests that human diversity contributes to evangelism rather than detracting from it.

Many missionaries and evangelists have found this to be the case. Although occasionally a minority group is politically, socially, or economically dominant in a given society, usually the dominant group is the majority group. The minority group or groups are often considered inferior by the majority group. They are given inferior work with less pay, they are given inferior schools, they are denied access to decent housing, and the like.

If both the majority and the minority group(s) have the same religion, those in the minority position will likely be more open to religious change, including a change to Christianity.

Missionaries to India were surprised when during the early decades of the twentieth century the untouchables of India responded to the gospel in significant people movements even though no missionary was attempting to reach them. They saw in Christianity a release from their servitude and a rejection of the Hindu caste system that had permanently locked them into the lowest social status.

In recent years special efforts have been made to reach the Kurds of northern Iraq and surrounding nations precisely because they have been persecuted by their Muslim “brothers.” It is thought that God might be using this persecution to prepare them to receive the gospel. In ancient times it was the slaves and lower classes of Greco-Roman society that especially responded to the gospel. The spread of the gospel was not by a trickle-down diffusion but rather by a welling up from the bottom rungs of society.

The existence of various minorities in many societies and their alienation from the majority group might be God’s provision for breaking the phalanx of unbelief that the gospel often encounters. But when minority groups have come to Christ and begin to form churches, new problems emerge. Within the walls of a church there is often a majority group and one or more minority groups. Will the majority group accept the appearance, the language, the dress, and the customs of the minority group? Or will they say, “We are all one in Christ,” and use that thought as a club to enforce majority customs and language on all minority groups?

When the apostle Paul wrote, “There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither slave nor free, there is neither male nor female” (Gal. 3:28), he did not mean that Jews had lost their ethnic identity or that men and women lost their sexuality when they became Christians. He rather meant that those who are joined to Christ are also joined to one another. Christians should therefore respect the ethnic differences among themselves.

But sometimes a minority group prefers to give up its identity as much as possible and be amalgamated or assimilated to the majority group. They may even change their family name in order to hide their ethnic background. If that is their choice, it is to be accepted. Amalgamation of languages and peoples (as well as separation) has occurred since the dawn of history. The important thing is that it is not forced on a group that is not ready for it.

The best word on this whole subject was given by Paul: “Accept one another, then, just as Christ accepted you, in order to bring praise to God” (Rom. 15:7).

TIMOTHY MONSMA

Miracles in Mission. Contemporary mission endeavor cannot and should not seek to avoid the subject of supernatural power and the miraculous. Neither, on the other hand, should missions today become obsessed with or distressed over the power and activity of evil beings under Satan’s control, nor over those who teach about them. The Bible teaches Christ’s victory over all the POWERS (authorities), PRINCIPALITIES (rulers), dominions, and demons (1 Cor. 2:6; 15:24; Eph. 1:15–23; Col. 1:15–20, 2:15; 2 Thess. 2:8; Heb. 2:14). Mission today needs to rest assured that God still can and does work miracles.

Areas of Interface between the Miraculous and Mission. Missions interface with the miraculous in evangelism, healing, deliverance, and other areas.

The Miraculous and Evangelism. All evangelism is miraculous but in missions today individuals and groups are opened to the gospel in ways that can only be miraculous. The history of Christianity is replete with accounts of people movements that obviously were instigated and promoted by the Holy Spirit.

Some contemporary missionaries consider warfare prayer and the “binding” of territorial spirits as a major method in evangelistic activities. C. Peter Wagner defines TERRITORIAL SPIRITS as members of the hierarchy of evil spirits... who, delegated by Satan, control regions, cities, tribes, people groups, neighborhoods, and other social networks and inhibit evangelistic breakthrough. John Duncan and Edgardo Silvoso recount how, in Argentina, after prayer, fasting, confession, and confronting territorial spirits, the Lord granted a marvelous gospel breakthrough. John Wimber, who believes in “power evangelism” and miracles in evangelism, does not hold miracles necessary for evangelism. He sees proclamation of the gospel as the “heart and soul” of evangelism.

The Miraculous and Healing. God has used healing to reveal the truth of his message throughout history. The Lord has healed through the prophets (2 Kings 5:1–16), Jesus (Mark 1:40–41; John 4:46–54), the apostles (Acts 3:1–10), New Testament believers (Acts 14:3), and Christian missionaries today. God continues to perform miracles of healing, both to meet the physical needs of suffering people and to reveal the truth of his message.

Belief in divine healing in no way prohibits using modern medicine and using modern medicine does not indicate a lack of faith in God’s power to heal. Missions today should allow God to speak both through modern medicine and God’s direct healing action.

The Miraculous and Deliverance. Demons (evil spirits, powers) exist and harm, but do not possess in the sense of owning, human beings, whether believers or unbelievers. Jesus and New Testament Christians expelled demons from persons (Matt. 8:28–34; Mark 5:1–20; Acts 5:16; 16:16–18). Contemporary missionaries face expanding needs and opportunities to oppose evil spirits who demonize persons. Deliverance from evil spirits has become a growing phenomenon among evangelical missionaries. Demons who attack people can be expelled and rendered powerless through God’s power (see also DEMONS, DEMONIZATION; EXORCISM; and SPIRITUAL WARFARE).

The Miraculous and Other Manifestations. Miracles today are evidenced in tongues, knowledge, visions, and other areas (1 Cor. 12–14). These manifestations, questioned by some, indicate to others the direct action of God. Missionaries must deal honestly and directly with these manifestations.

Principles Relating to Missions and the Miraculous. Several principles relate to miracles and missionary work. First, missionaries should welcome the aid of miracles and other manifestations of SIGNS AND WONDERS in missionary ministry. In regard to supernatural power and the miraculous, missionaries must be careful never to be materialists, disbelieving in supernatural powers, nor magicians, thinking supernatural powers can be controlled by ritual (see MAGIC).

Second, missionaries must affirm that miracles, signs, and wonders are not necessary for evangelism or other missionary work. The Holy Spirit continues to grant evangelistic fruit where there are no outward signs of miracles. Signs and wonders can, however, be instrumental in helping people become more willing to hear the gospel.

Third, missionaries must accept that healing is not always God’s plan for every person. God speaks through suffering as well as through healing. Missionaries should not, therefore, promise healing as God remains sovereign in granting healing.

Fourth, missionaries must also remember that power resides in the gospel itself, not in miracles (Rom. 1:16; 1 Cor. 1:18). Missionaries must be certain never to make miracles seem imperative for missionary effectiveness. They must remember that miracles, like all other Christian deeds, must glorify God rather than calling attention to humans. When miracles are used to bring fame and notoriety to humans, these “signs” are not of God. Christians may be seen doing miracles but never be doing miracles to be seen.

Finally, missionaries should remember that miracle events are not always of God. Pharaoh’s magicians did signs (Exod. 7:10–22) as did Satan (2 Thess. 2:9). Jesus declared that false prophets would perform miracle (Matt. 24:24). Missionaries must beware of counterfeit miracles. Missionaries must remember that signs and wonders function to convey truth, especially divine compassion. The purpose of signs is that people apprehend the message the signs bring rather than dwell on the signs themselves.

Missio Dei

Missio Dei. Latin for “the sending of God,” in the sense of “being sent,” a phrase used in Protestant missiological discussion especially since the 1950s, often in the English form “the mission of God.” Originally it was used (from Augustine on) in Western discussion of the Trinity for the “sentness of God (the Son)” by the Father (John 3:17; 5:30; 11:42; 17:18). Georg F. Vicedom popularized the concept for missiology at the CWME meeting in MEXICO CITY in 1963, publishing a book by this title: The Mission of God: An Introduction to the Theology of Mission.

Ecumenicals claim a comprehensive definition of missio Dei: everything God does for the communication of salvation and, in a narrower sense, everything the church itself is sent to do. Historically, most evangicals focused on the more immediate purpose of the Triune God in the sending of the Son: the task of world evangelization, the planting of the church among non-Christians, and the nurture of such churches. More recently, many have acknowledged the holistic nature of the task, though few give it an eschatological reference (see Holistic Mission).

The difference between the two approaches hinges on how the primary and fundamental human problem is defined—whether as a broken relationship with a transcendent God, or as suffering, oppression, and broken human relationships. Views of how the Kingdom of God is to be fulfilled now or eschatologically, how wide the scope of human salvation will prove to be, and basic assumptions about the authority and interpretation of Scripture are also critical (see Bible and Hermeneutics).

Missio Dei was first used in a missionary sense by the German missiologist Karl Hartenstein in 1934. He was motivated by Karl Barth’s emphasis on the actio Dei (“the action of God”), over against the human-centered focus of liberal theology at that time; he was also inspired by Barth’s 1928 lecture on mission, which related it to the Trinity. Hartenstein used the term again in his “Theological Reflection” on the IMC’s Willingen Conference (1952), published in the German report. Though the documents of the meeting itself ground mission in the Trinity, it did not use the term missio Dei. Nevertheless, in its new, trinitarian-missionary(ary) sense the phrase has been widely used since Georg F. Vicedom’s book.

Missio Dei came to encapsulate an important change in IMC and WCC thinking, from the Taboram Conference (1938) emphasis on the mission of the church to the Willingen stress on the mission of God. The latter meeting quite properly recognized that the true source of the church’s missionary task lay “in the Triune God Himself.”

The roots of the later, social gospel usage of the term lay in two things: first of all, Willingen’s “A Statement on the Missionary Calling of the Church,” which exhibited a common theological mistake. It properly defined the church’s missionary obligation as “beseeching all men to be reconciled to God,” and its concluding section rightly stressed God’s sovereign rule even in the “war and tumult” of history, the growth of human knowledge, and in political and social movements. However, it failed to distinguish this preserving, common-grace exercise of God’s power from his reconciling, special, redemptive-grace exercise in the history of salvation. Nor did it state the relationship either between preserving and redemptive grace, or between this present age and the age to come (see Hope).

The second and not unrelated factor was the presence of the Dutch missiologist, Johannes C. Hoekendijk. Hoekendijk was zealous to have the true arena of God’s saving action be recognized as the world of human affairs and the human condition, instead of the church. The mission of God (what he sent Christ into the world to do) was to establish shalom—“peace, integrity, community, harmony and justice”—or humanization in this world. In other words, the goal was the realization of the kingdom of God on earth. He insisted on redefining the church as a function of the “apostolate,” that is, the church as an instrument, of God’s action in this world, a means in his hands, by which he will establish shalom. This was the basic concept with which the phrase missio Dei came to be identified in WCC circles.

At the world conference of the World Student Christian Federation in Strasbourg (1960), Hoekendijk urged that Christians identify with “man in the modern world,” that the church become “open, mobile groups” (Bassham) to join the missio Dei and push for the realization of shalom.

These ideas dominated subsequent WCC reports: Witness in Six Continents (Mexico City, 1963), World Conference on Church and Society (Geneva, 1966), and especially the Studies in Evangelism report, The Church for Others (1967). These included the radical assertion of the thought-pattern expressed in “God-world-church.” The latter formula meant that the church should act in partnership with the sending God, not by world evangelization and church planting, but by directly promoting political and economic human good. Since shalom is the goal of God’s action in the world, and “the world sets the agenda,” the church must therefore forsake its existing “heretical structures” and join in God’s action. Traditional Christian missions were therefore merely “transitory forms of obedience to the missio Dei,” and no longer appropriate.

The climax of the impact of Hoekendijk’s version of God’s mission was to be seen at the Upsala Assembly, in 1968, which fiercely resisted the admission of words on the need to evangelize the non-Christian world.

Christians certainly ought to join with others in the common grace promotion of social justice, though not as the church, and not exclusively as Christians, but with others (Clowney). Evangelicals have been remiss in not acting strongly or broadly enough for social justice in this century. But the WCC adopted an almost purely socio-political concept of the missio Dei. It did so on the basis of broad, modern theological assumptions: universal salvation, through the “cosmic Christ”; the church’s election being only for the purpose of serving what God was already doing in the world; the ideas of process theology, Tillich’s “new being,” and Bultmann’s demythologizing of the New Testament. Taken together, these meant that the WCC could not affirm that indeed history must come to an end, with Christ’s coming, in order to realize the kingdom/shalom in its fullness. It lacked (and still lacks) commitment to other vital teachings of the historic Christian faith: the transcendence of God (his distinctness from creation); the reality of an objective, substitutionary atonement to deal with the fundamental human problem, sin, and its forgiveness; and the necessity of proclaiming Christ as the only one to whom one must turn for true shalom in this world and the world to come.

In WCC circles today some are questioning the very usefulness of the term missio Dei, and are seeking a “new link” between mission and church (Hoedemaker). Evangelicals, on the other hand, have struggled so far to match the theological depth and sophistication of the WCC. They need to show that the church is called not merely to expansion, not to become a mere “collection of converts” (Hoedemaker). It is “sent” for a faithful ministry of witness summoning the disobedient to turn to God, looking for success only to the Spirit of God. It must do this from the context of its life, where God is truly worshiped, the faithful built up, and compassion demonstrated. This whole is the true missio Dei, and foreshadows the true shalom to be realized in full at the Lord’s return.

JOHN A. McINTOSH

Missiology. Missiology is the conscious, intentional, ongoing reflection on the doing of mission. It includes theory(ies) of mission, the study and teaching of mission, as well as the research, writing, and publication of works regarding mission. Involvement in or the doing of mission, however, preceded by several centuries the scholarly reflection on mission. Apparently it was the passionate visionary Spanish activist, Raymond Lull (c. 1235–1315), who first critically reflected on missions, published his thoughts, and proposed the establishment of colleges for the linguistic and theological preparation of missionaries to Muslims and Jews. Though such a school was established at Majorca in 1276, Lull was unsuccessful in persuading Christian catalogue of Lull’s voluminous writings exists, but the partial list contains more than 280 titles. Lull may be considered the first missiologist in Christian history.

More than two centuries later the Jesuit missionary to Mexico and Peru, José de Acosta (c. 1539–1600), published his treatise On Procuring the Salvation of the Indians (1588), a learned discussion of missionary theology and methodology. Another significant missiological work of this period was On Procuring the Salvation of All Men (1613) by Thomas à Jesu (1564–1627).

The formal study of missions by Protestants can be traced to the colonial expansion of England, the Netherlands, and non-Iberian European powers. The year Pope Gregory XV created the Sacred Congregation of Propagation of the Faith, 1622, a small Protestant college for the training of missionaries for Dutch colonies opened as a branch of the University of Leiden. Unfortunately, the college was short-lived. (Five years later the Roman Catholic College of Propagation opened in Rome.) With their growing awareness of other continents and peoples, a few European Protestant professors of theology began manifesting serious interest in missionary questions. Hadrianus Saravia (1531–1613)—Dutch Reformed pastor-missionary and later professor, who after a period in England became an Anglican—published in 1590 his carefully reasoned challenge to the prevailing Protestant view that the words of Matthew 28:19–20 were meant only for the original apostles. The influence of Saravia is evident in the inaugural lectures of Gisbertus Voetius (1589–1676) at the University of Utrecht, lectures he entitled De plantatoribus ecclesiasticus (“On Church Planting”). Several other Dutch scholars helped pave the way for formal missiological studies, such as Justus Heurnius (1587–1651) and Johannes Hoornbeeck (1617–66), the latter a student of Voetius.

Though a number of missiological works were published in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, no professor of missions was named and the number of courses in missions was very limited. This was true in both Europe and North America until the last half of the nineteenth century.

The writings, correspondence, and widespread influence of the German Pietist leaders, August Herman Francke (1663–1727) and Philip Jacob Spener (1635–1705); the Moravian founder Nicolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf (1700–60); the Reformed theologian and philosopher Jonathan Edwards (1703–58); the Baptist missionary William Carey (1761–1834); and the renowned theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834)—contributed to a slowly changing attitude regarding missions as a scholarly endeavor. However, attempts to establish missionary training programs in European or American universities during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were seldom successful. Two serious histories of missions during this period do deserve mention: Robert Millar’s History of the Propagation of Christianity and the Overthrow of Paganism (1723) and Petrus Hofstede’s two-volume work on the history of Christianity in the Dutch East Indies (1779–80).

The nineteenth century brought tangible change. When Princeton Theological Seminary was founded in 1811, it was envisioned not only as a means to prepare young men to be pastors, but also as “a nursery for missionaries to the heathen,” a place where students could receive “appropriate training” to fit them for missionary work. The first concrete step to make the study of missions an academic requirement, however, occurred in 1835 when John Breckenridge (1797–1841) was elected professor of pastoral theology and missionary instruction. Though Breckenridge can be regarded as the first Protestant professor of missions, his tenure at Princeton was brief, 1836–38, and it would have been uneventful except for the fact that the course he initiated continued as a part of the curriculum until 1854.

F. A. E. Ehrenfeuchter, professor of practical theology at Göttingen, was one of the earliest European Protestants to include the subject of missions in his lectures in the 1840s and 1850s, and he is credited with publishing the first thoroughgoing theory of mission in Protestant history, Die praktische Theologie (1859).

In Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox circles J. B. Hirscher (1788–1865) urged that the study of missions be made an integral part of the study of pastoral theology, and shortly thereafter N. I. Liminsky (1821–91) published what can be regarded as the first scientific analysis of mission in the Orthodox Church.

In 1864 Karl Graul (1814–64), director of the Leipzig Mission, proposed that missions be accepted as a legitimate academic discipline in itself. His memorable lecture, “On the Place and Significance of the Christian Mission in Scientific Studies of a University Considered as a Whole,” qualified him to teach in the University of Erlangen; Graul’s untimely death prevented his becoming Europe’s first Protestant professor of missions, a distinction that was Alexander Duff’s (1806–78) when in 1867 he was named professor of evangelistic theology at the University of Edinburgh. Duff’s legacy, however, was mixed. The installation of Gustav Warneck (1834–1919) as professor of the science of missions at the University of Halle in 1896 signaled the momentous changes ahead, for by the turn of the century three other professorships of missions had been established, and in the decades preceding and following the World Missionary Conference (Edinburgh 1910), the study of missions became a part of the curriculum in an increasing number of schools in both Europe and North America.

The academic study of missions therefore inched its way into university and seminary curricula, first as a part of the study of practical theology and/or church history, and later as a separate department or course of study, partially a result of the growing interest in the history of religions. By the turn of the century the number of essays, books, and journals dealing with mission issues had expanded significantly.

During the first three decades of the twentieth century, the number of courses, professors, and chairs of mission increased dramatically, only to be followed by a leveling off and then a downturn. Since the 1950s the number of universities in Europe and the United States with professorships in missions has decreased, but the corresponding number of seminars and other schools, professors, and courses in mission-related subjects has increased substantially in the Americas, Africa, and Asia.

Roman Catholic missiological studies have followed much of the same path as Protestants since the time of Hirscher. Yet the number of outstanding missiologists has steadily increased as can be seen in the life and work of such giants as Robert Streit (1875–1930), Josef Schmidlin (1876–1944), Wilhelm Schmidt (1868–1954), Pierre Charles (1883–1954), John J. Considine (1897–1983), and a host of contemporary scholars.

Not all mission scholars and thinkers, however, have been professors. Some of the most influential theorists have been administrators, such as Henry Venn (1796–1873) and Rufus Anderson (1796–1880). Others have been missionaries, such as William Taylor (1821–1902), John L. Nevius (1829–93), J. Hudson Taylor (1832–1905), Roland Allen (1868–1947), E. Stanley Jones (1874–1973), and Hendrick Kraemer (1888–1965). Some have been missionaries and later teachers, such as Stephen Neill (1900–1984) and Donald A. McGavran (1897–1990). Only during the last third of his life did McGavran become the founder, dean, and professor in the School of World Mission of Fuller Theological Seminary.

Scholarship in mission of course involves much more than theories, professorships, and courses in missions. Equally important are the societies established for the study and support of missions. Often these have been student-led groups such as the Society of Inquiry on the Subject of Missions founded in 1811 at Williams College and replicated at Princeton Seminary in 1815, as well as the Student Christian Movement and the STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT (1886). Both the SCM and the SVM became international organizations, and both contributed to a steady stream of mission books and other educational material. The SVM helped shape Protestant missions from 1890 to 1940, recruited thousands of young people for missionary service, and was a major influence leading to the pivotal Edinburgh conference of 1910.

As already implied, much of the scholarly activity in mission resulted directly and indirectly from a number of international ecumenical conferences on world missions held in New York in 1854 and 1900, in London in 1878 and 1888, and in Edinburgh in 1910. The preparatory papers and the addresses delivered provided a wealth of material and insight into the thinking and doing of missions.

The number of annual missions lectureships established in colleges, seminaries, and divinity schools—such as the Student Lectureship on Missions inaugurated in 1891 at Princeton Seminary—increased steadily in the twentieth century. More recent are the Scherer Missions Lectures inaugurated in 1995 at the Lutheran School of Theology in Chicago and the Missiology Lectures at Fuller Theological Seminary.

During the 1960s some observers were lamenting the decrease in books dealing with missions. But in the last thirty years the quantity, variety, and scope of published works, books as well as other materials, have increased and the quality has improved significantly. Besides denominational publications, there are publishing houses that specialize in producing books about missions—Orbis Books and William Carey Press are examples. Moreover, a number of secular publishing houses such as Harper & Row/Collins, Lippincott, Viking Penguin, Macmillan, T & T Clark, Steyler Verlag, and E. J. Brill, as well as notable university presses such as Harvard, Chicago, Yale, Illinois, and California are publishing works on missions and missionaries. University publications include not only mission history and biography, but also studies of the role of missions and missionaries in anthropology, economics, and international relations.

Currently, there are scores of JOURNALS OF MISSION AND MISSIOLOGY being published throughout the world. These include The International Bulletin of Missionary Research, the Evangelical Missions Quarterly, the International Review of Mission, Missiology, Missionalia (Southern Africa), Indian Missiological Review, and the South Pacific Journal of Mission Studies.

Though there has been a steady stream of outstanding histories of missions, until the last twenty-five years there were hardly any reference works other than Edwin M. Bliss, Encyclopedia of Missions (1891, 1904) and B. L. Goddard, The Encyclopedia of Modern Christian Missions (1967). The publication of the Concise Dictionary of the Christian World Mission (1972) edited by Stephen Neill, Gerald H. Anderson, and John Goodwin, was followed by David Barrett’s World Christian Encyclopedia (1982), the “A.D. 2000 Series” which includes World Class Cities and World Evangelization (1986), Evangelize! A Historical Survey of the Concept (1987), and Seven Hundred Plans to Evangelize the World (1988). Gerald Anderson’s comprehensive Biographical Dictionary of Christian Missions (1997) will soon be followed by this work, The Evangelical Dictionary of World Missions.

Several centers for mission research are functioning, some for decades, such as the Overseas Ministries Study Center in New Haven, Connecticut. Newer ones include the Mission Advanced Research Center in Monrovia, California, the Oxford Center for Mission Studies and the Center for the Study of Islam and Muslim-Christian Religions, both in England.

Besides the universities and seminaries that offer the Ph.D., Th.D., S.T.D., and Ed.D. in mission studies, a growing number of institutions now have programs leading to a D.Miss. or doctorate in missiology (see also Doctoral Degrees in Mission). Moreover, in the past half-century some twelve hundred doctoral dissertations dealing with mission questions have been approved by schools in the United States and Canada.

Mention should also be made of the archival sources available to the serious scholar of mission. Stephen L. Peterson has analyzed those available in North America (IBMR 15 [October 1991]: 155–64), and Norman Thomas of the United Theological Seminary in Dayton, Ohio, is directing a massive international project on documentation, archives, and bibliography. Annotated bibliographies of no less than 10,000 volumes in missiology in all major European languages published from 1960 to 1990 will be available in printed form and on compact disks.

Clearly the bulk of what is noted here relates principally to what has been and is taking place in the West. But as Christians become more numerous in the Two-Thirds World and as they devote more personnel and resources to scholarly endeavors, they will make their own missiological contributions. Mission study centers, for example, already are functioning in such diverse countries as Japan, Papua New Guinea, South Korea, Peru, India, Bolivia, and Brazil.

A great deal of the aforementioned activity can be traced to the increasing impact of professional missiological societies such as the DEUTSCHE GESELLSCHAFT FUR MISSIONSWISSENSCHAFT (1918), the ASSOCIATION OF PROFESSORS OF MISSIONS (1952), the EVANGELICAL MISIOLOGICAL SOCIETY (1972), the INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR MISSION STUDIES (1972), and the AMERICAN SOCIETY OF MISSIOLOGY (1973). These societies meet regularly and most produce their own journals.

Missiometrics

Missiometrics. Science of missions which applies the contemporary scientific method to the phenomena of missions, studying them in ways that are empirical, quantitative, and material. The term thus parallels a whole series of twentieth-century neologisms describing over two hundred new empirical sciences, ranging from econometrics (“the use of mathematical and statistical methods in the field of economics to verify and develop economic theories”), to biometrics, jurimetrics, and bibliometrics (analysis of the whole range of books, libraries, holdings, usages). Since each year churches and missions worldwide regularly measure well over three hundred numerical indicators of their life and progress, missiometrics is thus presented with a gold mine of annual data waiting for analysis.

Based upon biblical concerns and criteria, missiometrics starts from the fact that the Old Testament is a vast storehouse of censuses and statistical data, and that the New Testament contains a surprising number of empirical mandates such as “Count the worshipers!” (Rev. 11:1, NIV, REB), “Measure the temple!” (Rev. 11:1), “Work out the numbers!” (Rev. 13:18, REB). There are some 23 verbs found in the major English Bible versions, with another 53 close synonyms, which (together with the 40 Greek biblical words associated with these synonyms) delineate the domain of the science of missiometrics. Because the 23 verbs enable us to measure the phenomena of mission, they are therefore the basic dimensions (from the Latin dimensio, a measuring) of the science of missiometrics. These biblical imperatives suggest that Christians thus have a significant new method—metrical investigation—assisting them in contemporary obedience to the GREAT COMMISSION.

Missiometrics measures anything and everything in any way relevant to world mission and global evangelization. Major variables measured each year by churches and missions include church membership, church growth, places of worship, church workers, clergy, women workers, home missionaries, foreign missionaries, preachers, colporteurs, evangelists, audiences, catechisms, catechumens, converts, baptisms, collections, finances, Scripture distribution, literature production, church administration, logistics, communications, broadcasting, computer usage, e-mail volume, networks, and the like. Each of the these provides voluminous annual series of data which, if seriously investigated, can result in highly effective mission strategies and tactics. A major concern in this respect is that Christians involved in world mission be effective and imaginative in utilizing the vast new areas of data and communications now available over the Internet. Today’s world is an enormously complex entity—6 billion human beings grouped into 13,000 ethnolinguistic peoples speaking over 12,000 languages. Thus navigating through these massive new data sources becomes a missiological priority.

Mission and Missions. Derived from the Latin mittō, which in turn is a translation of the Greek apostellō (to send), the term “mission,” as an English term with no direct biblical equivalent, has a broad range of acceptable meanings. The Oxford Dictionary gives the earliest occurrences of the English word in 1598. By 1729, use of the word in relation to the church focused on the GREAT COMMISSION: “Jesus Christ gave his disciples their mission in these words, ‘Go and teach all nations, &c.’” (E. Chambers, Cyclopaedia; or an Universal Dictionary of Arts and Sciences).

The contemporary secular definition of mission is simply “sending someone forth with a specific purpose.” That purpose may be defined broadly (e.g., to represent the interests of the sender) or very narrowly (e.g., to hand-deliver a message written by the sender). With the broadness of the term, our concept of the mission of the church will to a large degree depend on our theological orientation rather than an etymological analysis.

Few would challenge the need for clarity in our definition, for, as Dynness notes: “mission lies at the core of theology—within the character and action of God himself. There is an impulse to give and share that springs from the very nature of God and that therefore characterized all his works. So all that theologians call fundamental theology is mission theology” (p. 11). At the same time, however, the difficulty of defining mission cannot be overlooked or minimized. “Mission is never something self-evident, and nowhere—neither in the practice of mission nor in even our best theological reflections on mission, does it succeed in removing all confusions, misunderstandings, enigmas and temptations” (Bosch, 9).

Several questions among the many which could be asked illuminate the contemporary discussion and options: (1) Is mission, most broadly, the whole scope of God’s intention in the world or, more narrowly, the God-given MISSIONARY TASK of the church? (2) If our focus is on the task of the church, is mission limited to one core component of the church’s work or is it everything that the church does? (3) Is it possible to determine a focus or priority for mission, and, if so, what should that be? At least until the IMC WILLENGEN CONFERENCE in 1952, the answers to these questions for evangelicals appeared to be relatively straightforward. Missions was evangelism and the evidence of successful missions was the extension of the church through the crossing of cultural, geographic, and linguistic boundaries.
In this century, however, we have seen several developments, most of which were birthed in the Ecumenical Movement and brought into evangelical discussion by people involved in both groups. Two of these developments relate to the word mission. First was the recognition that God's mission was broader than the activities of his Church. Missio Dei, coined as a missiological term by Karl Hartenstein in 1934, was used in the 1952 Willingen Conference to stress that mission is God's not the church's. Georg Vicedom popularized it in the Mexico City Conference (1963) and in his text The Mission of God (1965). Missio Dei focuses on everything God does in his task of establishing his kingdom in all its fullness in all the world. While it includes what the church does, it is not limited to that, for God works both in and out of the church. Thus themes such as “Let the world set the agenda” were driven by a recognition that God is not limited to his work in and through the church and that his mission is seen wherever kingdom values (especially justice and mercy) are being promoted, fought for, or instituted.

The second important development was the dropping of the “s” from “missions” to reflect the unity of the total biblical task of the church. The dropping of the final “s” was formalized in ecumenical discussion when the International Review of Missions became the International Review of Mission in 1970. By 1972, George Peters, an evangelical teaching at Dallas Theological Seminary, wrote that mission, in contrast to missions, was “a comprehensive term including the upward, inward and outward ministries of the church. It is the church as ‘sent’ (a pilgrim, stranger, witness, prophet, servant, as salt, as light, etc.) in this world” (Peters, 11). He maintained that missions, on the other hand, is the actual work and the practical realization of the mission of the church. Some evangelicals voiced concerns that dropping the “s” might lead to the loss of commitment to, and action for, world evangelization and church planting.

Evangelical approaches to defining mission have not been unified. John Stott allowed the broadening of the discussion, as long as evangelism was seen as a leading partner in the missionary task. W. Harold Fuller proposed using mission for our purpose and passion, while ministry refers to all that we do. Arthur Johnston opposed any broadening of mission. Ron Sider argued that social transformation is mission. On a pragmatic level, the reality of the disagreement is seen in the titles used for introductory theology courses taught in 78 North American institutions: 31 drop the final “s” (“Theology of Mission”) and 46 keep it (“Theology of Missions”) (Siewert).

Multiple conferences organized from within the Evangelical Movement have sought to address the issue of mission and the primacy of evangelism within it. The Congress on the Church’s Worldwide Mission (Wheaton Congress, 1966) was organized to deal with theological and practical issues. Affirming the scriptural foundation for social justice, the declaration of the congress still proclaimed the primacy of evangelism. In the same year the World Congress on Evangelism (Berlin Congress 1966) was also held. Focused primarily on responding to shifting definitions of evangelism, the integral relationship of evangelism and missions was maintained. In 1970, the Frankfurt Declaration on the Fundamental Crisis in Christian Mission was developed in response to ecumenical shifts in thinking about mission, and it promoted a return to the classic orientation of mission as the presentation of salvation through evangelism. Calls for broadening the evangelical perspective came at the Thanksgiving Workshop on Evangelicals and Social Concern (Chicago, 1973), which issued the “Chicago Declaration of Evangelical Social Concern.” This was “essentially an affirmation of God’s total claim on the lives of his people, a confession of failure in demonstrating God’s justice in society, and a call for evangelicals ‘to demonstrate repentance in a Christian discipleship that confronts the social and political injustice of our nation” (Padilla, 242).

At the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelism (1974), John Stott pointed to the broadening of the definition of mission and indicated that he saw no reason to resist this development. Building his paradigm on John’s version of the Great Commission, he proposed that we see mission as the church “sent” into the world to serve just as Jesus served, including Evangelism and Social Responsibility as partners in the missionary task. He did not see fulfilling the Great Commission as completing the directive of the Great Commandment, maintaining both as integral to mission. Lausanne proved to be a critical juncture in this respect. By 1989, in fact, the role of the Lausanne Covenant would be noted in the official story of Lausanne II as follows: “It is a watershed in placing social justice within the purposes of the Church’s mission (Articles 4 and 5)” (Nichols, 15).

Since Lausanne, three streams have solidified within evangelicalism. One emphasizes the historic orientation of mission as evangelism, and carried on in meetings such as the Global Consultations on World Evangelization (GCOWE) organized in 1989, 1995, and 1997. The focus of this stream remains the development of thriving church movements among people groups around the world.

A second stream, following Stott, focuses on integrating a holistic approach to mission, incorporating evangelism and issues of social justice and reconciliation (see Holistic Mission). Consultations such as that in Wheaton in 1983, convened to discuss the nature of the church, gave voice to this group and “laid a sound theological basis for the mission of the Church, with no dichotomy between evangelism and social responsibility” (Padilla, 247).

The third stream, sometimes referred to as the radical discipleship group, and including evangelicals such as Ron Sider, Rene Padilla, and Samuel Escobar, considers social justice to be mission just as evangelism is, and does not give priority to either (see also Option for the Poor).

Representatives of the three streams have come together from time to time, perhaps most notably at the Consultation on the Relationship Between Evangelism and Social Responsibility (CRESR 1982), where the partnership of evangelism and social responsibility and the primacy of evangelism were both reaffirmed, though it was noted that “some of us have felt uncomfortable about this phrase, lest by it we should be breaking the partnership” (LCWE, p. 24). Wheaton ‘83 gave greater weight to the partnership stream, as well as opening discussion on transforming societies through structural intervention as an element of holistic mission. Finally, representatives of all three streams were also present at the Lausanne Congress II on World Evangelism (Manila, 1989). Again, the focus continued to give weight to the idea of partnership with evangelism being primary. Through the declaration and subsequent ongoing reflection, the second stream gained prominence in evangelical mission.

The debate continues and consensus over this complex issue remains a goal to be reached in the future rather than a present reality.

Mission Atlases. Mission atlases help the church see more clearly the work of God, the “white harvests,” and the neglected peoples. They open our eyes, touch our hearts, and leave us in wonder at what God is doing in the world. Mission atlases spur on the church to ministry beyond its own immediate context. In the process, motivated by mission zeal, the church has often led the way in mapping new areas of the world and publishing new geographic information.

Definition. There are many excellent atlases (books of maps, usually with graphics and geographical information), both contemporary and historical. A mission atlas is one that focuses on the distinctive mission of the church. This contrasts with secular atlases (which may include some treatment of Christianity) as well as Bible atlases, the mission component of which is often limited to the journeys of Paul. In addition, much mission understanding can be gleaned from historical atlases of religion and Christianity, since the history of the expansion of the church is essentially missionary.

Early Publications. The church has always been informed by maps. Early mission atlases, with exquisite hand-drawn maps, can be found in mission archives. The first modern Protestant mission atlas to be widely distributed was the World Atlas of Christian Missions (1911), an outgrowth of the Statistical Atlas of Christian Missions issued in conjunction with the 1910 World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh, focusing on missionary work among non-Christian peoples.

This landmark atlas was followed by a wealth of more specialized and denominational publications, including The Churchman’s Missionary Atlas (1912), the Concise C.M.S. Atlas (1913), Atlas Showing Mission Fields of the Christian and Missionary Alliance (1922), and World Missionary Atlas (1925), with a related article “On Making a Missionary Atlas” by Charles Fah appearing in the April 1925 issue of the International Review of Missions.

Recent Publications. The 1980s and 1990s brought a resurgence of interest in mission data and mapping, as well as a more holistic view. The first such volume was Target Earth: The Necessity of Diversity in a Holistic Perspective on World Mission (1989) with computer-generated maps, graphics, and data tables, along with commentary and photographs. Most recently, Bryant Myers through MARC/World Vision has produced two similar mission atlas booklets, The Changing Shape of World Mission (1993) and The New Conduct of World Mission (1996), which provide brief, easy-to-read descriptions of the world in which Christian mission takes place. While not strictly speaking a mission atlas, the new, full-color Atlas... of World Christianity (1998), edited by Peter Brierley and Heather Wright, does an excellent job of covering many mission themes.

Computerization. As we approach the turn of the century, the widespread use of personal computers, connected via the Internet, has enabled unprecedented collaboration in mission research and mapping, using “geographic information system” (GIS) software. As a result, more contemporary mission atlas material can be found today on a computer rather than on a bookshelf.

The Global Ministry Mapping System (CD-ROM updated annually since 1995) provides GIS software with extensive global geographic and statistical databases, including the mapping of over seven thousand ethnolinguistic peoples. With such tools, practitioners, researchers, educators, and managers are producing their own specialized mission atlases on demand. The result is an explosion of tailor-made individual mission maps but a dearth of mission atlases.

The World Wide Web promises to provide a rich environment for missions mapping. New strategic alliances between mission agencies and institutions—with the partners maintaining their respective data sets and integrating them with the whole—give public access to vast amounts of updated, geographically based mission information via the Internet.

The interactive, multimedia mission atlases of the future will make it possible to “drill down” to the specific information desired, listen to sounds and voices of people from other countries, watch video clips, simulate “flying through” a three-dimensional map, and transparently combine local information with networked information from the Web, all on a personal computer anywhere in the world.

Mission Headquarters. The development of mission headquarters began with the original missionaries of the modern missionary movement. Individuals were burdened and called by God to go overseas. They needed help of people at home to pray for them and to send finances.

There are several philosophies of mission headquarters. Some headquarters are simply a conduit for money to the missionary and provide tax deductible receipts for the donors. In this case, minimal help or accountability is offered to the missionaries. Other mission agencies have developed headquarters that share in decision making with the missionaries on the field. Typically, in this approach, the mission headquarters or mission board will establish broad areas of policy and a doctrinal statement. Missionaries are allowed to develop individual strategy and occasionally even define the structural relationships on the field.

Leaders in mission headquarters are often former missionaries, pastors, or key lay leaders from churches. The leaders may also consist of individuals or groups of people burdened for a particular type of ministry. Some headquarters are led by entrepreneurial leaders who have a vision for ministry but minimal cross-cultural experience.

Recently, larger churches have been bypassing mission agencies. They totally support their missionaries, believing that the expense and extra supervision of a missions organization is not needed. While in some cases this may be true, serving through a mission agency often provides greater long-term stability for the missionary, broader prayer support, and more experienced care.

Mission Libraries. The professionalization of information science, formerly known as library science, during the past century has been a boon to mission studies. The spread of Christianity around the world is considered important as an aspect of the history of Western civilization. Thus the resources documenting the history of missions are to be found in numerous secular and religious repositories. The modern researcher is also aided by the computerization of indexes and the catalogs of most collections, but printed guides are still useful as much of the older material remains accessible only in that form. The collections accessible by computer are often available through the Internet, making them potentially searchable from anywhere in the world.

In North America, mission collections are found in the libraries of most Christian colleges and seminaries. Denominational mission boards and large mission agencies often maintain focused collections related to their work. Regional libraries and historical societies often contain the mission history of the local area, and large public libraries also collect the records of local and historical figures. Only a few of the younger denominations in America are caring adequately for their materials. Examples of these are the Assemblies of God (Springfield, Missouri), The Missionary Church (Mishawaka, Indiana), and the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee). In the non-Western world, financial resources are inadequate for younger churches to consider preserv-
Mission Libraries

Many university libraries in Europe contain extensive mission collections. Protestant collections may be found at Uppsala, Hamburg, Tübingen, Marburg, Utrecht, Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh. The most notable Roman Catholic collections are at Munster, Louvain, Lisbon, and Madrid.

Selly Oak Colleges Library in Birmingham, England, was established to train missionaries and houses the Harold Turner Collection in the Center for the New Religious Movements. Andrew Walls was instrumental in establishing the resources of the Center for the Study of Christianity in the Non-Western World at the University of Edinburgh. Partnership House Library in London has incorporated the collections of The Church Missionary Society and The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. The Henry Martyn Mission Studies Library is a small but important research center on the campus of Westminster College, Cambridge. Other prominent European collections are found at the Vahls Missions Library in Denmark, the Egede Institutet in Norway, Hackmannsche Bibliothek at Marburg, the Library of the Norddeutsche Mission at Bremen, the Rhenish Missionary Society in Wuppertal Barmen, and the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society.

The primary Roman Catholic mission libraries are the Pontificia Bibliotheca delle Missioni (Library of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith) and the library of the Pontificia Universita Gregoriana. Perhaps the most prominent Roman Catholic collection in America is to be found at the Maryknoll Seminary Library in New York.

National repositories such as the British Museum, the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and the Cambridge University Library in the U.K. and the Library of Congress in the U.S. are excellent sources of published materials on missions. At the beginning of the twentieth century, two libraries were established to support world evangelization: the Day Missions Library at Yale University and the Missionary Research Library in New York. A direct outgrowth of joint evangelistic outreach symbolized by the Edinburgh conference of 1910, these centers supported research and publishing efforts toward that end. As interest in evangelism waned in mainline Protestant churches, these publications were taken over by other agencies, but the collections were preserved for their historical value. Currently Yale Divinity School Library continues to collect mission studies extensively in support of the Day Missions Library. Union Theological Seminary Library in New York now houses the Missionary Research Library collection and remains the depository of missions material for the denominational members of the National Council of Churches.

The task of collecting information resources for world evangelization was taken over by evangelical missionary training centers. Theological seminaries such as Asbury, Dallas, Fuller, Gordon-Conwell, Southwestern Baptist, and Trinity (Deerfield, Illinois) were leaders in developing major missions collections. In 1975, the Billy Graham Center was established on the campus of Wheaton College complete with its evangelism library and archives. The records of North American evangelical ministries are combined with published evangelism and missions resources from around the world to supplement materials from the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association. Following in the tradition of the Day Missions Library and Missionary Research Library, the collections of the Billy Graham Center are intended to provide information resources that will enable the Christian church to undertake strategic research and planning in order to complete the GREAT COMMISSION.

Significant ecumenical collections include the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES Library in Geneva and the Interchurch Center in New York which holds the libraries of the United Presbyterian Mission and Board of Missions of the United Methodist Church. Other specialized collections are found in the YMCA Historical Library in New York, the World’s Alliance of YMCA Library in Geneva, as well as the libraries of various Missionary Societies and Bible Societies.

In the non-Western world, resources for mission studies are scarcer. Some important collections can be found at the Morrison Library on China in Tokyo, Serampore University in India, and the United Theological College in Bangalore, India. The Missiology Project of the Research Institute for Theology and Religion at the University of South Africa (UNISA) is taking a leading role in collecting resources for the continent of Africa.

Mission on Six Continents. The COMMISSION ON WORLD MISSION AND EVANGELISM (CWME) of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES held its first world conference at MEXICO CITY in December 1963. It affirmed that the old unidirectional model of Westerners sending and non-Westerners receiving missionaries was past. Disavowing the antiquated paternalistic structures, the CWME declared under the caption “mission in six...

authentic representatives of Christian belief, life, and practice. As Johannes Verkuyl pointed out, it discarded the distinction between mission (in distant lands) and evangelism (in one's own land) and challenged churches everywhere to focus on the one world, which is in need of the gospel. An assumption here was that PARTNERSHIPS and reciprocity are to characterize relationships between Christians from all parts of the world.

The slogan was a milestone of twentieth-century mission theology. It maintained currency for a few decades in ecumenical circles.

Mission Schools

Mission Schools. Mission schools serve the missions community by providing the educational, social, and spiritual support desired by missionaries for their children. The number and variety of missions schools have grown dramatically in the past fifteen years. In the 1800s, several mission boarding schools were established in the sending countries as well as areas of high missionary concentration, such as China, Hawaii, and India. Today there are over 140 schools in approximately eighty nations that serve the educational needs of missionary children.

Mission schools vary significantly in their institutional purpose statements. Some serve the children of missionaries exclusively, while others accept students from the international business, diplomatic, and host country communities. Mission schools may admit students from outside the missions community either on a space-available basis, according to board-established percentages, or as an equally targeted student group.

The variety of mission school purpose statements and target student groups, as well as the problematic use of the word “missionary” in many locations has led some schools to prefer the term International Christian School (ICS), rather than “Mission,” or “MK School.” But the majority of mission schools, whether called an MK school or an international Christian school, see their function as twofold: serving the missions community with an educational program for their children that prepares them for tertiary education in their home country and reaching the expatriate community with the gospel through the provision of an educational program presented from a Christian worldview.

Many of the more established schools offer a variety of support services. These include ESL programs, programs for students with special educational needs, boarding services, and advanced studies programs. Many are now establishing programs to support missionaries choosing to home school their children. In a recent survey of 134 mission schools, 49 (or 36 percent) were found to offer boarding home services (Overseas Schools Profiles).

Mission schools, originally staffed by “field” missionaries with varying degrees of expertise in pedagogy, are now predominately staffed by fully trained educational professionals. Most of the larger mission schools are now accredited and offer university preparatory curricula. Most mission schools are interdenominational and increasingly multinational in student and faculty composition. Mission schools procure teachers through missionary sending organizations, although an increasing number are directly hiring staff and offering full or partial stipends.

Mission schools face significant challenges. Paramount is the recruitment and retention of professional staff. This perennial challenge is exacerbated by the proliferation of mission schools and the desire of mission agencies to place educators in nontraditional educational settings, such as with clusters of missionary families who would otherwise be Home Schooling their children without support.

Mission schools also face the challenge of developing culturally sensitive curricula appropriate for the multinational student body of the school. As the missionary force becomes increasingly multinational, so do the student bodies of mission schools. A pressing issue for schools is how best to prepare these students for tertiary education in their passport countries. Mission schools also face the ongoing challenge of responding to the increased expectations of missionary families for the educational preparedness of their children.

In spite of the educational, professional, and financial challenges facing mission schools, mission school personnel find the experience of serving in the international missions context to be both professionally stimulating and personally fulfilling as they contribute to the development and discipleship of missionaries’ children, support the ongoing missionary effort of their students’ parents, and experience the joy of seeing the lost come to know Jesus through their ministry in the mission school.

Mission Theory. “Mission theory” identifies principles which are held to be essential to the successful practice of mission. Over the years, the term has been used in an elastic manner to encompass beliefs, goals, policies, strategies, and procedures involved in the tasks of mission. Some argue that mission (or missionary) theory occupies an intermediate level between theology and policy, because it is shaped not only by theological convictions but also by the fruits of actual experience. In that case, “mission strategy” and “mission policy” are viewed as being nearly synonymous.

A comprehensive framework for mission theory has probably never been fully elaborated. In the Middle Ages, Franciscan and Dominican monks thought carefully about how to do mission effectively, while Roman Catholic thinkers such as José de Acosta (1540–1600) and Tomas à Jesu, wrote perceptively in this cross-cultural area in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The Jesuit Acosta produced a monumental mission manual in Peru, under the title De Procuranda Indorum Salute (1577), which was translated as Predicacion del Evangelio en las Indias (“Preaching the Gospel in the Indies”). Vibrant Dutch Protestants, including Hadrianus Saravia (1531–1613) and Justus Heurnius (1587–1651), also pondered over the essentials of mission. However, Protestant mission leaders in the nineteenth century did not pay much attention to them, if at all. Mission leaders such as the Serampore Trio drew much more from Moravian and German Pietist precedents, from their own experience in pre-Victorian India and from the theological well of Jonathan Edwards (1703–58), in developing their mission approach and philosophy.

During Europe’s Enlightenment era, an Englishman named William Orme urged (1828) that there was a need to develop a theoretical framework for the mission enterprise. Another contemporary of William Carey, during the opening phase of Protestantism’s “modern missionary movement,” was the German theologian Friedrich E. D. Schleiermacher (1768–1834). Partly influenced by Moravians and German Pietists, Schleiermacher viewed the “theory of mission” as part of practical theology.

Subsequent pioneers of mission studies in Germany, such as the Protestant Gustav Warneck (1867–1944) and Joseph Schmidlin (1876–1944), insisted that a full-blown theory of mission was essential to mission studies; but British mission thinkers did not respond to the challenge. As a debtor to the European Enlightenment, Schmidlin, the father of Catholic Missiology, equated “practical mission theory” rather narrowly with “missiology” in 1925. He modeled his Catholic mission theory on Gustav Warneck’s Missionslehre and defined “mission theory” comprehensively as “the scientific investigation and statement of the principles and rules which govern the work of spreading the faith. As the theory of the missionary art, it seeks to answer the questions as to why, whither, how and by whom missions should be undertaken.” Probably the last missiologists to develop distinctively German mission theory were Walter Freytag (1899–1959) and Georg Vicedom (b. 1903).

During the Victorian period, the key idea in Anglo-American mission theory came to be the concept of the indigenous church. This was developed simultaneously by two remarkable mission statesmen, an American, Rufus Anderson (1796–1880), and an Englishman, Henry Venn (1796–1873).

Anderson decreed the popular idea that Christian faith and Christian civilization were inseparable. He identified the proper aims of mission as being the planting of self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating churches. In the 1860s, Henry Venn, called for the “the euthanasia” of missions as the final stage of the mission-to-church process. Since he saw “the raising up of a Native Church” as the great object of a mission, he viewed mission as the scaffolding to be removed once a self-responsible indigenous church had emerged. John L. Nevius (1829–93), an American Presbyterian missionary to China and Korea, Robert E. Speer (1867–1947) and the Scot, John Ritchie (1878–1952), did much to further general acceptance of “indigenous church principles” in theory and practice until the mid-twentieth century.

Important contributions to the development of missions theorizing have come from the pens of missiologists such as Roland Allen (1868–1947), a vigorous critic of the Anglo-American mission system who wrote among other classic works The Spontaneous Expansion of the Church and the Causes Which Hinder It (1927, reissued 1960); William E. Hocking (1873–1966), Re-Thinking Missions (1932); Hendrik Kraemer (1888–1965), The Christian Message in a non-Christian World (1938); J. C. Hoekendijk (1912–75), Kerk en Volk in de Duitse Zendingswetenschap (1967); Donald A. McGavran (1897–1990), Understanding Church Growth (1969); and Ralph D. Winter (1924– ).

Jongeneel opines that the term “theory of mission” was replaced by the term “theology of mission,” particularly after the Second World War: This appears to be corroborated by changes in the classification system of the International Review of Missions [IRM], the premier missiological journal in mission studies during the first two-thirds of the twentieth century. The IRM’s classification system was set up by J. H. Oldham in 1912 and it operated until 1963, when its categories were radically changed by Lesslie Newbigin in line with the thinking of the CWME Mexico City Conference (1963). Until then, the “Theory and Principles of Missions” had featured as one of its major classification categories. Thereafter, the term “theory of mission” or “mission theory” sank out of view. Only the term mission “principles” was retained in the bibliography field of mainstream mission. Thus “the concept of mission theory and what it symbolized” evidently disappeared from general usage by the mid 1960s.

In the face of such a trend, serious work has been done recently in the U.S. to develop a new level of scholarly discourse on mission theory. After giving decades of attention to the subject, Wilbert R. Shenk, in his presidential address to the American Society of Missiology in June 1995, outlined seven elements necessary for development of “a general theory of mission.” He argued that “a general conceptual framework” would have to do the following:

1. Situate the mission process historically and empirically as an inter-cultural movement, including the agents and agencies, and the host culture and peoples.
2. Identify and critically evaluate the main model(s) by which mission has been and may be prosecuted.
3. Account for the impact of the mission on the host culture and the impact of the culture on the mission, i.e., as reflected in modifications and innovations the mission makes in response to the cultural context.
4. Correlate the development of the modern world system with the development of the mission, especially the impact of modern communications and the economic system.
5. Trace the influence the various strands of renewal, revival, and revitalization [not all necessarily Christian in nature] that touch the churches, often with long-range implications.
7. Hold in tension local mission and God’s mission to all people so that theory geared to the local context will be developed that will draw forth the fullness and richness of the particular in light of God’s ultimate saving purpose . . . (1996, 41).

In light of this, Shenk has distinguished very clearly between the development of “mission theory,” which must involve deep theological insight, and the business of mission strategizing (or planning). Vividly aware that “a strategy always reflects the culture and historical moment in which it is formulated” (1993, 219), he has underscored the “ambivalence” that “has characterized discussion of strategy in mission studies.” He reminded Christian thinkers that their best formulations still fall far short of representing God’s ways of advancing his kingdom.

Such warning was not intended to deter God’s people from exploring the unfathomable patterns and dimensions of God’s mission. Rather, it is a prophetic spur to missiologists to be doubly alert to the significance of what God is doing in the world, and the world church, today.

During the last quarter of the twentieth century, major contributors to our understanding of the dynamics of effective, cross-cultural Christian witness and service have included the South African, David J. Bosch (1929–94), especially his Transforming Mission: Paradigm Shifts in Theology of Mission (1991); the Puerto Rican, Orlando E. Costas (1924–87), with his Christ Outside the Gate: Mission Beyond Christendom (1982); the Gambian, Lamin Sanneh, especially his Translating the Message (1989) and Encountering the West (1993); and the Scot, Andrew F. Walls, a compendium of whose influential writings has been published under the title The Missionary Movement in Christian History (1996), of which his essay “Missionary Societies and the Fortunate Subversion of the Church” deserves special mention. At the end of the twentieth century, international Christian leaders consequently find themselves challenged by new frameworks from which to address missional situations, under rubrics such as a missiology for the West, Contextualization of the gospel, Two-Thirds World missions, mission in the city, and reaching the unreached.

Missionary

Missionary. Few terms within the evangelical missiological vocabulary generate more diverse definitions. For some, “everybody is a missionary,” but Stephen Neill is right in saying that if everybody is a missionary, nobody is a missionary. A few argue that a select category of persons are honored with this title; but still others discard it totally and substitute “apostolic messenger” instead.

The Biblical Root and Uses. In the New Testament the Greek term apostello (with a related one, pempo) emerges in two major categories: as a broadly used verb, the sending in one form or another and by different senders (132 times), and as a more specifically used noun, the apostolic person (80 times). The senders (either verb or noun) include a variety of people (including a negative one, Herod; Matt. 2:16), God (John 20:21), Christ (Luke 9:2), the church (Acts 15:27), the Spirit (pempo in Acts 13:4). The sent ones include the Spirit (1 Peter 1:23), Christ (Matt. 10:40; John 20:21), the apostles (Mark 3:15; Luke 6:12–16), other authorized representatives of the churches (2 Cor. 8:23; Phil. 2:25; Rom. 16:7), angels (Rev. 1:1), and servants or employees (Acts 10:17). The core New Testament meaning clusters around ideas related to sending and or crossing lines, to those being sent, the sent ones—whether messengers or the Twelve, or the others who serve with some kind of apostolic authority or function. The New Testament affirms that the apostolic messenger (the missionary) becomes the person authoritatively sent out by God and the church on a special mission with a special message, with particular focus on the Gentiles/nations.

Other Jewish records show this term (a derivative of the Hebrew salah) describing authorized messengers sent into the diaspora: to collect funds for Jewish uses; or taking letters from Jews or Jewish centers with instructions and warnings, including how to deal with resistance. The New Testament adopts some of these ideas, as well as a broader one from Greek culture with the concept of divine authorization. It then injects new meaning into the missionary apostles (life-long service, Spirit-empowered, with particular focus on the missionary task) referring to the original Twelve (plus Paul) as well as other authorized messengers. This is the core of the Christian apostolic person and function. There is no evidence of this office being authoritatively passed on from generation to generation.

The Term through Church History. Ironically as the Latin language takes over Bible use and church life, its synonym, mitto, becomes the dominant word. From mitto we derive the English word “missionary.” Therefore an “accident” of linguistic history has replaced the original Greek concept with all of its richness and depth. In the immediate post-apostolic era, the term was used of itinerant ministers, and in that form was known to Irenaeus and Tertullian. James Scherer argues that there is no New Testament connection that would utilize apostolic concepts and functions in the corporate life of the churches of that later period. “The functions of the apostolate were merged into the corporate ministry of the church.”

Roman Catholic usage emerged by 596 when Gregory the Great sent the Benedictine monk Augustine of Canterbury to lead a missionary delegation to the British Isles. The Roman Church also used the term in reference to their orders (as sent ones), starting with the Franciscans in the thirteenth century, and later other orders. This was established in 1622 when the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith was instituted. Hoffman writes, “According to the letters patent it gave to apostolic laborers overseas, missionaries were those sent to announce the Gospel of Jesus Christ, to teach the gentiles to observe whatever the Roman Catholic Church commands, to propagate the Catholic Faith, and to forewarn of the universal judgment.” Today Catholics use the terms missionary, missioner, missionate, and mission apostolate in a variety of ways, including “. . . anyone engaged in some manner in the establishment of the Church where it had not been established,” as well as teachers, medical personnel, agronomists and others serving holistically. Within Catholicism the broadest meaning is now also applied “. . . to all apostolic Christians collaborating with Christ in bringing about the total redemption of all mankind, and indeed of all created nature . . . in a word, all those engaging in the mission of bringing Christ to all being and all being to Christ.”

The Protestant Reformation, partially in reaction to the Roman positions, minimized the term and concept of the missionary. It reemerged with greater significance within German Pietism at Halle, itself a reaction to the Reformation excess. Thus the Moravians used the term for their broad-spectrum enterprise, and then it was adopted by Carey, Judson, Morrison, and Livingstone and their successors.

The Term Used Today. We have mentioned the diverse Catholic uses of this term. In secular circles the term “mission” still has a variety of uses: diplomatic, commercial, or military missions. Some Protestants have argued for their own particular coinage applied in the broadest way for all Christian activity as “mission” and subsequently all Christians are missionaries. Some evangelicals use the slogan “everybody is a missionary” to reject an apparent special category, but also because they desire to universalize missionary responsibility.

Singaporean Jim Chew encourages us to substitute “cross-cultural messenger.” To him, this special servant “. . . is not a temporary but an abiding necessity for the life of the church, provided always that the movement of mission is multidirectional, all churches both sending and receiving.” However, Chew sustains the position that “missionary” is simply a generic term for all Christians doing everything the church does in service to the KINGDOM OF GOD. We do a disservice to the “missionary” by universalizing its use. While all believers are witnesses and kingdom servants, not all are missionaries. We do not glamorize or exalt the missionary, or ascribe higher honor in life or greater heavenly reward, and neither do we create an artificial office.

This focused conclusion comes from a biblical theology of vocations (God has given us diverse vocations and all are holy, but not all the same); a theology of gifts (not all are apostles nor all speak in tongues—1 Cor. 12:29) and therefore not all Christians are missionaries; and a theology of callings (the Triune God sovereignly calls some to this position and task; see Missionary Call). These men and women are cross-cultural workers who serve within or without their national boundaries, and they will cross some kind of linguistic, cultural, or geographic barriers as authorized sent ones.

Missionary Affluence. A relatively unexamined element of recent missionary life and work has been the affluence of Western missionaries in comparison with the majority of the world’s peoples among whom they work. The development of great personal wealth in the West over the past few centuries and the cultural assumptions inherent with that wealth have been paralleled by the development of like assumptions and expectations of appropriate missionary lifestyles and capabilities. Wealthy missionaries, as Bonk rightly points out, find it difficult at best to truly incarnate Christ among the destitute of the world, as the gap between them is simply too big and the wealthy have too much to lose by letting go of that to which they cling.

It does not matter that missionaries, by Western standards, are generally on the lower end of the socioeconomic scale. What does matter is that all too often those among whom they work see the missionaries as having access to personal and institutional wealth of which the indigenous population can only dream. Often, however, it is not just a question of the amount of income; even missionaries who live at low income levels can still communicate a materialistic worldview, and those who have wealth can communicate genuine lack of materialism. Additionally, that the missionary may live a truly incarnate lifestyle does not remove the fact that such a lifestyle is by the missionary’s choice, and such a type of choice is unavailable for the poor.

The fact of such disparity may subvert the very gospel message the mission agencies and missionaries bring, and often leads to hidden resentment and eventually open conflict. As the gap between the rich and the poor continues to grow, and as Indigenous Churches begin to find their own authentic voices, it will become an increasing problem that Western missionaries who work in areas of endemic poverty will of necessity have to face more realistically if they are to be true partners in the global missionary task.

Missionary Call, The

for example, in a call to missionary service. (3) Openness to the leading of the Holy Spirit. The Spirit leads as he wills, according to the uniqueness of the individual's gifts and personality. Each Christian must be sensitive to the leading of the Holy Spirit in his or her own life, for the Spirit leads each person uniquely. (4) Belief in the Word of God as authoritative and a commitment to obey the principles and guidance laid down in it. (5) An understanding that the GREAT COMMISSION was given by Jesus to all Christians, and therefore each person should be involved in helping to fulfill this command. God works sovereignly in the normal issues and activities of life to lay these foundations of faith, obedience, and desire. Their reality in a believer's life is an act of God's sovereign grace.

Given the foundations for receiving a missionary call, there are certain attitudes and activities that help prepare one for receiving this call. These are normally developed over time as the Holy Spirit leads the potential missionary to the place in life in which he or she is able to respond positively and maturely to God's call.

One significant attitude is a hatred of sin. A person should strive to mortify sin, to put it to death in the life, and to bring every thought captive to make it obedient to Christ (2 Cor. 10:5). This attitude, with appropriate actions, shows a person's desire to obey God rather than self. Additionally, the one called should have open eyes, seeing beyond his or her own world of relationships and circumstances, seeing the world as God sees it, lost and without hope.

There should also be an open heart, a soft heart for the lost, like God's heart (John 3:16; 2 Peter 3:9). Jesus gave up his life because of God's love for the lost (Rom. 5:8), and believers are to have this same attitude (Phil. 2:5–8). There should be open ears, a sensitive listening to the Holy Spirit. This is developed through careful listening to the Word of God and obedience to its commands. As God's commands and guidance from the Word are carefully applied, we become more sensitive to the Spirit's quiet leading. And so we are able to hear when he calls. Christians must also have open hands demonstrated through an involvement in some kind of work for the Lord. Finally, we should have the attitude Isaiah demonstrated in his response to God's call. "Here am I, send me!" (Isa. 6:8). This shows willingness to go anywhere as the Lord commands.

As is clear from the above, there are obvious opportunities in a different culture away from the security and comfort of home; (4) reading missionary biographies and newsletters and books and journals on missions; (5) serving under the oversight and encouragement of a local body of believers who will help in the identification and development of spiritual gifts and ministry skills; and (6) gaining broad ministry experience, giving attention to ministry in areas in which God gives wisdom, fruit, and joy.

As revealed through many missionary testimonies, a person's missionary call may be impressed on the mind and heart as one listens to a message or a testimony, reads a passage of Scripture, prays for the lost, reads an article or book, hears of a particular or general need, or is personally challenged to go. God is not limited in the means or methods he will use to call his missionaries to serve him on the mission field. Complementary to this realization must be the recognition and confirmation of a local body of believers (Acts 13:2). The church is Christ's agent on this earth, and he will use the church to confirm the call and to send the missionary with the needed support.

The proof of the missionary call for any individual is that God has seen fit to allow the individual to serve him on the mission field. There are those who feel that they have received the call but are never able to go. This can be the result of such things as ill health, family obligations, or lack of resources. The Lord works his sovereign will to further his kingdom in many ways. Those who are prepared to go but are unable to may serve a vital part of the missionary endeavor through their work of support and spreading the vision for missions.

Missionary Children. With an international mission force composed primarily of families, missionary children (better known as MKs—missionary kids; see THIRD CULTURE KIDS) become central players in this movement. Western missions focused on the needs of their own off-spring; but with the globalization of mission, MKs now come from all nations and go to all nations—whether they want to or not. Missions leaders from the newer sending countries (non-Western, Two-Thirds World) now grapple with issues that formerly challenged leaders from the older sending nations (Europe, North America, Australia, New Zealand), such as MK educational needs and cultural identity. Korean missionaries in the Philippines offer a fascinating case study. Early on they sent their children to a boarding school shaped by U.S. curriculum and values.
However, they saw their children increasingly isolated from Korean culture, some grappling with tensions of internal identity and others unqualified for Korean universities. They finally responded by establishing a Korean school.

MKs are the youngest, and perhaps the most vulnerable of “God’s chosen people who are living as foreigners in the lands . . . .” (1 Peter 1:1). Pollock has noted that MKs worldwide grapple with the following crucial issues, each with its own benefits and particular challenges. (1) Mobility: MKs are adaptable with rich memory banks, but also struggle with rootlessness and restless migratory drives. (2) Relationships: they can grow deep people-roots by themselves, but tend to protect themselves while some drift into insulation. (3) Cultural balance: they enjoy a broad knowledge of cultural diversity as global pilgrims, but they can become “hidden immigrants.” off-balance in their own “passport” culture. (4) Language: many speak multiple languages, appreciate learning styles and linguistic nuances, many become excellent teachers, but they can also suffer from language limitation and confusion. (5) Worldview: they tend to have broad cultural paradigms, able to think laterally, but can appear arrogant, reflecting patriotic ambivalence toward their “passport” nationality. (6) Cross-cultural skills: MKs are keen observers, adaptable, less judgmental, cultural bridges, but can appear to lack in convictions, be “social chameleons” and socially undeveloped. (7) Leave-taking: MKs project sensitive empathy, but saying farewell is always a critical passage from nation to nation, school to school, people group to people group, grappling with closure, which on the negative side can generate unresolved emotional conflicts. (8) Development: most MKs reflect higher personal maturity in relational and communication skills, and are comfortable working cross-generationally; but some experience stunted maturational and delayed developmental transitions, and many grieve the inability to “return home”; and those whose entire education was done in Christian boarding schools run the risk of growing up in a sequence of unrealistic “bubbles,” comfortable only in those missionary subcultures.

Adult MKs never cease being MKs, and this reality has generated serious analysis of their particular issues. A surprising percentage return to some aspect of cross-cultural ministry, enter the helping professions, or head into other aspects of the borderless marketplace—whether in business, education, governmental foreign service, or relief and development. As adults they grapple with the challenges of what it means to be an adult MK, including: (1) Processing their memories. Most MKs share a memory pool that weaves them together, but not all come to positive terms with their emotions and story. Many have been damaged in childhood and find it difficult to surmount these handicaps. Other idealize their backgrounds or families, though in time the unrealistic perceptions will crumble or they hopefully will develop a healthy understanding and acceptance of their past. (2) Transitioning through life. Some of these changes are not unique to MKs, but they experience many of them, requiring constant variation and adjustment. Those who studied in boarding schools present a different profile from those who studied in a national, private, or international school. The vast majority transition to their passport culture for the last stages of their education, and there they face ongoing significant challenges and change, both positive and negative. Transitions can be keenly anticipated or feared, either as stepping stones to maturity or fraught with uncertainty and laced with pain. (3) Decisions at diverse crossroads. MKs have little control over their early life. As dependents of God’s global nomadic families, their parents determined where or how to live and how to school them. As dependents they live with the results of these choices. Entering adulthood the decisions become personalized and critical: What is their personal faith and value system? How will they live? Will they accept or reject their backgrounds and their parents’ faith? (4) Processing throughout their lives. At different stages of their life they will work through process memories, transitions, and key decisions, and it is crucial that they be encouraged to process these key elements that have so shaped them. The adult processing of unresolved grief which can be a haunting element must be addressed reasonably and thoroughly. Again the critical faith factor emerges, and MKs reflect the spectrum of attitudes of the particular spiritual and organizational subculture in which they were raised.

The majority of MKs do quite well emotionally, psychologically, spiritually, and career-wise. A small percentage are brilliant or outstanding leaders. But many are troubled and problematic. The prime stakeholders in MK welfare include the following groups: MKs themselves, their parents and close family; home-sending churches and mission societies; member care (physical and mental) providers; and educators. Healthy MKs tend to come from healthy families; unfortunately some missionary families are seriously dysfunctional. New geography and cross-cultural ministry never compensate for these dysfunctions. Therefore church and mission leadership must be alert to and address the holistic welfare of their missionary families.

Missionary Children

D. Walters, An Assessment of Reentry Issues of the Children of Missionaries.

The Missionary Task. Defining the missionary task of the church is central to missionary reflection. But it is more than that. It is also a crucial responsibility of the church, for a church unsure or misdirected about its mission can hardly achieve it. And yet rarely in church history has there been agreement on what the missionary task of the church is.

Following the early expansion of the Western church, the Middle Ages saw centuries of introduction that all but eliminated missionary activity, including later, among the reformers. Then came the Moravians, followed by what has been called the GREAT CENTURY OF MISSION. Nineteenth-century Protestants in Europe and North America gained a new missionary vision and were, for the most part, united in what the missionary task was—specifically, they grounded it in the commission Christ gave the first great missionary, Paul as “Mission to the Gentiles, to whom I now send you, to open their eyes and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins and an inheritance among those who are sanctified by faith in me” (Acts 26:17, 18). The twentieth century was, if anything, an even greater century for missions, but from the start the unity of vision began to disintegrate. As the conviction weakened that people without Christ were lost, the definition of mission began to change. “Missions” became “mission,” meaning purpose, and the old passion for classical evangelistic missions was swallowed up by the other good things a church must do. Consequently, from Europe and mainline churches in North America the stream of missionaries began to dry up, until by the end of the century it was a mere trickle.

Upon the gradual withdrawal of traditional missionaries nondenominational agencies and newer denominations (like the Assemblies of God and the Christian and Missionary Alliance) took up the slack for what may be history’s greatest surge of evangelism, following World War II. How did these forces of the last half of the twentieth century define the task? As the initial evangelistic thrust into new territories was successful, the focus of missionaries typically shifted to serving the new churches in pastoral, educational, and other helping roles until the de facto definition of “missions” became, “sending people away from the home church to serve God in some capacity elsewhere, especially cross-culturally.” Thus the popular understanding of “missions” moved gradually in the same direction as the earlier drift, defining missions as “all the good things a church does,” as DONALD MCGAWAN aptly put it, but with this spin: all the good things a church does away from home.

An even broader definition of “missions” and “missionary” began to emerge. In the effort to get all disciples fully involved in witnessing, it was said that “everyone is either a missionary or a mission field.” All disciples are sent as missionaries to their own world. Does it make any difference to define the missionary task one way or another? Is it helpful to distinguish clearly among the tasks of the church? Is it necessary? History would seem to teach that it does indeed make a great deal of difference. In fact, failure to focus clearly on the New Testament understanding of missions seems to have always marked the beginning of the end of missionary enterprise.

The original, basic missionary task of the church was to send certain evangelistically gifted members to places where Christ is not known to win people to faith and establish churches. That this is a biblical definition can be demonstrated in two ways: (1) the meaning of the term used for “missionary” and (2) the example of those who heard Christ’s final instructions.

Apostles. The term “apostle” (literally “one who is sent”) was used in several different ways in the New Testament (see APOSTLES). It was used in the historic root meaning of any messenger (John 13:16; Phil. 2:25). But another nuance was emerging in New Testament times, meaning “one sent as an authoritative representative of the sender.” In this meaning it is used supremely of Jesus, sent for our redemption (Heb. 3:1). When Christ finished his apostleship he passed that role on to others, called variously “the disciples” (though the ones highlighted were among hundreds of other disciples), “the twelve” (though there were more than twelve, with Matthias, Paul, and Jesus’ brother, James, added to the select group), and “the Apostles,” those sent with divine authority to establish Christ’s church. Thus the term referred to a unique office, the founders of the church. But the term was used of others, too, people like Barnabas (often included in the apostolate), Timothy and Silas, Andronicus and Junia (Rom. 16:7), Epaphroditus (Phil. 2:25) and, indeed, the whole missionary team (1 Thess. 2:6). In this use, “apostle” refers not to an office (the “twelve” founders), but to a role, the role of pioneering. Paul describes this role clearly when he describes his ambition to proclaim Christ where he has not yet been named (Rom. 15:20; Haldane, Hodge, Murray, and Calvin all clearly identify this apostolic role). “All who seemed to be called by Christ or the Spirit to do missionary work would be thought worthy of the title . . .” (Plummer, 84). Lightfoot wrote the seminal exposition of this meaning of “apostle” in his extensive footnotes on Galatians 1:27. We call these pioneer church-starting evangelists, “missionaries,” from the Latin translation of the Greek apostolas. They are sent by the home church to win people to faith and establish churches where there are none.

This apostolic role continued after the original apostles died. Eusebius, writing of the time from A.D. 100–150 speaks of “numberless apostles” or “Preaching Evangelists” who were living then. He described them:

They performed the office of Evangelists to those who had not yet heard the faith, whilst, with a noble ambition to proclaim Christ, they also delivered to them the books of the Holy Gospels. After laying the foundation of the faith in foreign parts as the particular object of their mission, and after appointing others as shepherds of the flocks, and committing to these the care of those that had been recently introduced, they went again to other regions and nations, with the grace and cooperation of God. (Schaff, 68)

Thus, from the beginning, there was a missionary function distinct from other roles in the church. It was distinct from the witnessing responsibility all Christians have, even distinct from that of evangelistically gifted Christians winning non-Christians who live nearby. These, rather, are sent ones, sent to those out of reach of present gospel witness. And their role is distinct also from what other “sent ones” do. These are “missionaries” who pastor the young church and who assist it in various other ways, but they do not have the apostolic function of winning to faith and starting churches. Failure to distinguish this task from other tasks may have the appearance of elevating their significance but in historic perspective it only serves to blur and diminish the original missionary task of the church. A full team is needed to reach the unreached, of course—those at home who send and colleagues on the field who reinforce the apostolic thrust in supportive ministries. But the original missionary task of the church is fulfilled through pioneer apostolic church starting evangelists. The first evidence for this is the way the term “apostle” was used in the New Testament and in the years immediately following. But there is other, even stronger evidence.

The Acts of the Apostles. One function of the Book of Acts is to demonstrate clearly what the missionary task of the church is. Christ gave what we call the GREAT COMMISSION on at least three occasions, probably on four, and perhaps on five. This, along with the demonstration of his own resurrection, was the only theme to which he returned in his several encounters with the disciples in the six weeks before he ascended. Clearly this “sending” was uppermost in his mind. What did he intend that those sent should do? Acts gives the answer of how those who received the commission understood it. Evangelism begins with incarnating the transforming gospel as we see from the first commissioning on the night of the resurrection: “As the Father sent me, so send I you” (John 20:21). If there were any doubt as to the implications of this command, John himself gives a commentary in his first letter: “As he is, so are we in this world” (1 John 4:17). But demonstrating the love of God (1 John 4:7–17) does not exhaust the evangelistic assignment. In fact, to live a good life without telling how we do it is bad news, not good news. So the second element in the commission is proclamation and witness, explaining what one has experienced personally: “Go into all the world and preach the gospel . . .” (Mark 16:15). This gospel “. . . shall be proclaimed to all nations . . . and you are witnesses . . .” (Luke 24:47, 48), and “You shall be witnesses to me . . . to the uttermost parts of the world” (Acts 1:8).

Thus, from the beginning, there was a missionary task in that place was completed, the missionary responsibility for pastoring and teaching was turned over to others and, once the missionary assignment came in: a select few were sent out from home churches to places where Christ was not known to win people to faith and gather them into local congregations. And that is the missionary task of the church. Paul and his missionary band first of all lived authentic lives, demonstrating the power of the gospel. In that context they immediately and constantly talked about it, explaining the gospel, urging their hearers to accept it. Thus they won people to faith and organized churches. Soon the responsibility for pastoring and teaching was turned over to others and, once the missionary task in that place was completed, the missionary band pressed on to regions beyond.

We derive our definition of the missionary task, then, from the New Testament term used to define the role, and from the New Testament example of those who fulfilled that role: the mis-missionary task is to go, sent as representatives of the home church, to places where Christ is not known, winning people to faith and establishing congregations of those new believers.

Modernity. A historical development generally regarded as arising in Europe in the seventeenth century, modernity is also associated with the ENLIGHTENMENT, which fundamentally altered society and economy. The Enlightenment, inspired by major developments in science and mathematics, emphasized the positive potential of human reason and the prospect of open-ended progress if Enlightenment thought were applied in all areas of life. The Enlightenment was imbued with a sense of a universal purpose and mission.

Modernity emphasized the contrast between traditional society and the emerging new culture. By its intensiveness and extensiveness modernity forcibly displaced traditional culture. Its intensiveness is seen in the way it penetrated all aspects of human life, while its extensiveness is evident in its spread worldwide. Traditional society typically focused inward; modernity has been markedly expansive.

In traditional society the production of goods depended largely on animal or human power; production in modern industrial society is dependent on inanimate sources of energy. The view of products and labor as commodities, the money economy, and urbanization are marks of modernity. Modernity also stimulated a range of institutional developments, including today’s nation-states and political systems.

The dynamism and the globalizing thrust of modernity have been fostered by several developments that mark the transition from traditional society to modernity:

1. The separation of time and space. Each traditional culture had its own way of measuring time. Time was defined by the people in a particular place. The invention of the mechanical clock changed this. Time could be dealt with independently of place since the clock made possible a universal basis for measurement. (The latter addition of international time zones unified the world further.) In a relatively short period the new basis for measuring time was accepted worldwide, thereby breaking the traditional connection between time and space. Each element could now be dealt with without reference to the other. Time and space had become instrumental elements to be exploited.

2. The disembedding of social systems. Modernity severed the nexus between social relationships and the context in which they were formed. Traditionally, relationships were dependent on and remained embedded in a particular social matrix. Modernity disembedded social relations from local culture. Various mechanisms facilitated this process. (a) Money replaced barter as the means of exchange. The modern economy uses money (a symbolic token) to facilitate the exchange of goods and services. The global capital market moves vast sums of money electronically and instantaneously without any reference to relationships or place of origin. (b) Knowledge and training have become increasingly specialized, with each area of specialization controlled by experts and a body of knowledge. Expertise is the court of appeal in problem solving. In modernity daily life is dependent on vast systems based on expert knowledge; health care, electrical power, transportation, and commerce are all independent of social relations. Indeed, disembedding is understood as a necessary step in making the productive process as efficient and cost-effective as possible. Traditional culture emphasizes the role of fortune or fate; modern culture puts a premium on expert knowledge.

3. Perpetual reflection and reordering. All humans to some extent reflect on their actions; in modernity reflexivity and skepticism are core values. In making decisions, traditional culture prized and drew authority from the past. Modernity insists on gathering feedback from all relevant sources in order to determine the most efficient future course. The past is regarded as a drag on progress; innovation is encouraged in order to achieve greater productivity. The ideal is a process of continual critical reflection, evaluation, and reordering. No area or activity is spared this routine, which actually undermines stability and security, for the process never reaches a stable point. In the modern process, knowledge is always incomplete. The only recourse is to generate further information.

Modernity engendered optimism about the future. Industrialization and URBANIZATION promoted economic growth and created new wealth. Modern societies experienced a rising standard of living. Even though social scientists have consistently pointed to certain problems that the modern system creates, they generally assumed that these negative consequences would, in the long run, be more than offset by the positive potential. By the mid-twentieth century, however, the problems of modernity were increasingly emphasized, and pessimism supplanted the earlier optimism. Among the causes of this loss of confidence in modern culture are the consumption of nonrenewable sources of energy at an accelerating rate; despoliation of the environment; the harnessing of technology by police states to control entire populations; the failure to achieve a more equitable distribution of resources among the peoples of the world; the rapid growth in world population; the rise of totalitarianism; the violence of two World Wars and many regional or local conflicts sustained by the industrial-military complex; the rising incidence of violence in industrial society; new diseases; the breakdown of social and family structures; and confusion about moral values.

The dynamics of modernity have been inherently globalizing. At the center of globalization is the modern economy. The traditional national economy that had systems of exchange with other national economies has been increasingly replaced by the global economy. In the global economy, manufacturing is a process of assembling components from all over the world. The capital markets operate globally through electronic hookups. In light of these new conditions, the meaning and function of the nation-state are being redefined.

In the late twentieth century, growing numbers of people asserted that modernity was being displaced by a new historical epoch, postmodernism, which involves a repudiation of certain Enlightenment values. Science is no longer regarded as the undisputed authority. Postmodern epistemology affirms that all knowing is based on faith. The modern split between public and private, objective and subjective, secular and religious, is increasingly rejected in favor of wholeness and reconciliation. This changing climate presents new opportunities for Christian witness. The postmodern attitude is more open to the reconciliation. This changing climate presents new opportunities for Christian witness. The postmodern attitude is more open to the reconceptualization of people and an ability to narrate the gospel in credible witness will begin with respect for modernism and the gospel in a pluralist society.

Modernization

“The country that is more developed industrially shows to the less developed the image of its future.” Modernization was a synonym for industrialization, and the modern was considered superior to traditional society.

The expansion of the colonial powers into other regions and continents coincided with modernity and the Industrial Revolution (see Colonialism). Each colonial government transmitted to its colonies a particular model of modernization—British, French, Dutch, Japanese. Colonies were encouraged to modernize according to the model of their colonial masters. The nations of Africa, Asia, and Latin America were Europeanized or Westernized. Following World War II the United States became the dominant Western power; and modernization was equated with Americanization. The Russian model was followed in the communist bloc. As modernization became a global phenomenon, the domination and control by foreign powers began to stir resentment. People wanted modernization without the label “made in . . .,” which implied dependence on or being within the political orbit of a foreign power.

The relationship of modernization and development must be noted. While the term “modernization” has largely fallen into disuse, a considerable literature developed around it following World War II. Modernization was understood to be a systemic process that encompassed all aspects of a society, including economics. But the terms “modernization” and “development” were not applied consistently and frequently were used interchangeably. Today “development” is the preferred term.

Early studies of modernization drew a number of general conclusions. First, it was recognized that no theoretical models were at hand for studying this complex process of cultural change. One task was to analyze the paths to modernization taken by developed societies. This focused attention on the variables influencing whether a traditional society remained intact or modernized: natural resources, educational systems, geopolitical relationships. These prerequisites for takeoff toward modernization were widely discussed in the early literature.

Second, early studies saw the economy as fundamental. An expanding economy that effectively tapped a country’s human and natural resources was essential to modernization.

Third, early studies recognized that industrialization has been the powerful engine of cultural change in the modern period. Industrial development entailed the centralization of the means of production, especially labor, so that goods and services could be produced in the greatest quantity at least cost. Thus, urbanization has been a necessary concomitant of modernization. Considerable controversy has arisen with regard to the emphasis to be given to industry vis-à-vis other sectors such as agriculture.

Fourth, the impact of secularization on traditional society, including religion, proved difficult to assess. In the first phase of modernization studies, secularization was regarded as the indispensable ally. It was also assumed that traditional religio-cultural values were incompatible with modernization and impotent in the face of secularization. For a society to modernize, the shackles of tradition had to be broken. Traditional mentality, it was argued, must be replaced by a rationalist and positivist outlook. Gunnar Myrdal’s Asian Drama (1968) revamped the discussion by emphasizing the important role of attitudes and values, including religion, in modernization. And yet as modernization accelerated in the 1960s, some of the strongest resistance was evident in societies controlled by a religious tradition that sensed the threat of secularization to its core values. The outstanding example was Iran, where a countermodemizing Islamic movement led by Ayatollah Khomeini overthrew the promodemizing monarchy in 1979 and installed a regime committed to restoring the country to its Islamic foundation.

According to Daniel Lerner, three interlocking conditions are required to sustain modernization. The first is geographical and social mobility. Traditional society is characteristically static. For a society to modernize, its population must be ready to relocate in response to new opportunities. Throughout the modern period people have been leaving the rural and agrarian world for urban and industrialized society. This mobility has various essential characteristics, but most important are openness to change and willingness to adapt to new situations.

The second condition is psychic mobility. Physical mobility is prerequisite to psychic mobility. Explorations in the fifteenth century began expanding the geographical horizon. This was augmented by the printing press and publication of books and maps detailing expeditions to various parts of the world. The mass media have greatly expanded and accelerated psychic mobility by making vicarious experience of diverse realities possible. The third condition is the system of modernity with its dependence on the mass media (see mass communication). Traditional society is an oral society with certain correlates: the socioeconomic sector is rural; the cultural sector is nonliterate; the political sector is designative. In modern media-dependent society the socioeconomic sector is urban, the cultural sector is literate, and the political sector is electoral.

The model of modernization thus comprises four elements: urbanization, literacy, media participation, and political participation. The relationships among the four elements will vary. Urbanization tends to progress at a more rapid rate than literacy, but media participation is extremely high, extending even to rural areas. The media have grown in importance as the world economic system has evolved.

The modern mission movement was an important agent of modernization worldwide. Some caution and dissent would have been justified, for modernization has espoused a technical and rational approach; it has largely ignored the religious dimension. A sound missiology, to the contrary, is concerned with the whole person, a subject that began to be addressed by Christian development theorists and missiologists from the 1960s on.

Moe, Malla (1863–1953). Norwegian missionary to Swaziland. Moe’s parents died when she was a teenager, and she and her sister moved from Norway to Chicago to live with an older married sister. In 1892 evangelist Frederick Franson, founder of the Scandinavian Alliance Mission, challenged her to go to South Africa, even though she had no formal Bible training. She set out as one of a band of eight pioneer missionaries whose numbers dwindled to three after a year. Moe began her ministry by visiting African homes and learning the language, and her dependence upon Africans became a hallmark of her ministry. She used evangelistic methods many colleagues found unorthodox, like her traveling “Gospel Wagon” which she had built at age sixty-five to go into new areas. She planted a great many churches, and founded a mission station at a place she named Bethel, which became her base of operations for over fifty years of ministry in Swaziland.

Colleagues and critics struggled to work with a woman who was so independent and domineering, but her personal characteristics grew from a singular focus: her life was totally devoted to soul winning, and she was impatient with any impediments that kept her from doing God’s work. She died in Swaziland in 1953 at age ninety.

Moffat, Robert (1795–1883). Scottish pioneer missionary to Southern Africa. Born in East Lothian, Scotland, he trained as a gardener, but after conversion heard God’s call to the mission field. In spite of little formal education he was accepted by the London Missionary Society (LMS), which made room for “godly men who understood mechanic arts.” Moffat’s arrival in Cape Town in 1816 brought no welcome from a colonial government that distrusted “nonconformist” preachers, nor from Boer farmers convinced that God had made them superior to nonwhite races. Delayed by red tape (he spent the time learning Dutch), Moffat in 1817 journeyed north, befriendiing an outlawed Hottentot chief whose conversion eased official prejudice against the LMS. Despite the obstacles he pressed on toward remote villages where Jesus’ name was unknown. He settled at Kuruman (1826–70) in modern Botswana. There he evangelized, built stone houses, irrigated orchards, made soap and clothes, and opened a school. Moffat was a great thanksgiver, with a genius for winning the friendship of local chiefs, but as a product of his culture and time could also exhibit muscular Christianity in repelling threatening invaders.

He translated the Bible into Sechuana (1840–57). His Missionary Labours (1842) and Rivers of Water (1863) sold in large numbers. In England (1838–43) he captivated audiences by his arresting accounts, sought and got the support of Christian England when the missionary movement was gathering momentum, and recruited for the Bechuana mission the young David Livingstone, his future son-in-law. But Moffat still had twenty-seven crowded years traveling out from Kuruman with the gospel. Even after retirement he directed attention to Africa. Made D.D. of Edinburgh, the “Apostle of the Bechuanas” downplayed his success with “I simply did the work of the day in the day.”

Moffett, Samuel A. (1864–1939), American pioneer missionary to Korea. Moffett was commissioned as one of the pioneer missionaries to Korea by the Northern Presbyterian Mission in the United States to Korea, arriving in Seoul on his twenty-sixth birthday (January 25, 1890).

After his arrival, while engaging in language study, he directed and upgraded into a school an orphanage for boys which had been founded by Horace G. Underwood in 1886. In 1893, he moved permanently into the northern provinces of Korea, establishing long-term residence in Pyongyang. Through strategic planning and wide itineration he raised up a growing network of village and city churches, established a Bible training class system for all believers, and served as pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church of Pyongyang until 1907. He was elected to be the first moderator of the Presbyterian Church of Korea at its organizing Presbytery in September 1907.

Moffett, a strong proponent of education for Christians, founded several hundred primary schools for the children of believers and in 1901 he started the Presbyterian Theological Seminary in his living room in Pyongyang with two students. The first seven graduates were ordained in 1907. He served as president of the seminary until 1924. Among many other early Christian institutions established by him and his missionary colleagues was a Christian Academy for young men which evolved into the first Christian college in Korea, Soongsil. Moffett served as president from 1918 to 1927.

Moffett was very sympathetic to the movement for Korean independence from Japan, which had annexed Korea in 1910. His well-known opposition to efforts by the Japanese colonialist powers to subjugate worship of the triune God to the deified Japanese emperor through forced attendance of Christians at the Shinto shrines led eventually to his being driven from Korea on four hours’ notice in 1936 after forty-six years in Korea.

Moldova (Est. 2000 pop.: 4,510,000; 33,700 sq. km. [13,012 sq. mi.]). Moldova is a landlocked, ethnically diverse republic of the former Soviet Union, nestled between Ukraine and Romania. Moldova was once part of Romania, and nearly two-thirds of its citizens are ethnic Romanians, while slightly more than a quarter of its people are Slavs, most of whom live in the troubled Transdniester region. The Orthodox Church claims the nominal allegiance of at least two-thirds of the population, while evangelicals—especially Baptists and Pentecostals—make up less than 2 percent of the population. Although strong Orthodox opposition has made evangelical outreach difficult at times, the evangelical movement is growing. Particularly encouraging has been a significant movement to Christ among the minority Gagauz people, a Turkic ethnic group.

Monaco (Est. 2000 pop.: 34,000; 1.95 sq. km. [0.75 sq. mi.]). “Money is power” in Monaco, one of the world’s smallest nations. Images of Grand Prix automobile racing and wealthy tax-dodging exiles stereotype this principality surrounded by France and the Mediterranean Sea.

Missionaries to Monaco face many challenges. Material distractions dull spiritual sensitivity; indeed, a focus on the power of money dominates
Western church insisted on Latin. languages in liturgy and Scripture, while the beginning in the eighteenth century. The monks also did heroic work among Aleuts in Alaska established the church. In the tenth century monks languages, translated the Scriptures, and established the alphabet that became the basis of modern Slavic Slavic peoples in the ninth century, devised an alphabet that Constantinople, CYRIL and METHODIUS went to the East to aid and abet the processes which began during centuries of the slave trade and colonial expansion of the West, and which continues through multinational corporations and international agencies such as the World Bank and International Monetary Fund. These chains also lead to the worship of false gods. In a pastoral message to North American churches, Bishop Oscar Romero of El Salvador (1917–80) wrote in 1979 that the idolatry of wealth and private property inclines persons toward “having more” and lessens their interest in “being more.” It is this absolutism that supports structural violence and oppression of people (Voice of the Voiceless, 173). Elsewhere Romero wrote that the god of money forces us to turn our backs on the God of Christianity. As people want the god of money, many reproach the church and kill movements that try to destroy false idols.

Money. The fact and scale of Western money constitutes a major barrier to cross-cultural transmission of the gospel, all the more so because chains of affluence may prevent discernment of their evil effects. For example, a major cause of conflict according to the Epistle of James is covetousness. Historically, Western Christian missionary outreach was undertaken in tandem with an insatiable quest in the West to control global resources, a process which began during centuries of the slave trade and colonial expansion of the West, and which continues through multinational corporations and international agencies such as the World Bank and International Monetary Fund. These chains also lead to the worship of false gods. In a pastoral message to North American churches, Bishop Oscar Romero of El Salvador (1917–80) wrote in 1979 that the idolatry of wealth and private property inclines persons toward “having more” and lessens their interest in “being more.” It is this absolutism that supports structural violence and oppression of people (Voice of the Voiceless, 173). Elsewhere Romero wrote that the god of money forces us to turn our backs on the God of Christianity. As people want the god of money, many reproach the church and kill movements that try to destroy false idols.

The analysis of James and the prophetic warnings of Romero are but two portrayals of how money is a problem to those throughout the world struggling to incarnate the gospel. Mission activity cannot take place without money, but money poses at least three challenges. First, the affluent, including those who live privileged lives among the poor, must take into account teachings of the Bible on the subject of the poor, the wealthy, and the consequences of acquisitiveness. Second, Western missionaries have worked from positions of power and Missionary Affluence. The relative wealth of Western Christians engenders strategies which create dependency among younger churches and harm the poor. Finally, affluence leads the relatively wealthy Christians of the West to aid and abet the processes which have plunged poor nations into a succession of traumas and may contribute to future crises (see also Wealth and Poverty).

In 1990 the communist government was renounced and a new multiparty system was installed in 1992. With freedom of religion now guaranteed in the Constitution, spiritual revival has taken place. Many Mongols are returning to their Buddhist and Shamanist roots, but others are turning to Christ and Christian churches are appearing on Mongolian soil for the first time since the early 1900s. In less than a decade the church grew from less than ten known indigenous believers in the nation to an estimated two thousand, and the numbers continue to grow steadily. Recently Mongols have begun reaching out to their own people. Churches in the capital are adopting Aymags (Provinces) and using the JESUS FILM and other methods to share Christ with their countrymen. The New Testament is translated into Mongolian, but numbers are limited. Despite the history, the future presents open possibilities for the continuing growth of the Mongolian church.

While at Grinnell College she joined the STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT for Foreign Missions. After graduating in 1913, she taught school and then applied to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions.

Arriving on Hainan Island in 1915, Moninger began language studies and worked tirelessly for the cause of female education. During her years on Hainan she served at the Kiungchow, Nodoa, and Kachek stations and functioned as mission treasurer, secretary, and agent at various times. Violence forced the Hainan missionaries to flee to Haiphong in 1925 and to Hong Kong in 1927.

Moninger was a delegate to the Church of Christ in China conference and to the Presbyterian China Council at Shanghai. She published several anthropological articles on the aboriginal Miao people of the island’s interior. She collected botanical specimens for the National Arboretum of the Philippines and Harvard University. She also compiled a two-volume dictionary of the Hainanese dialect. Held under virtual house arrest at Nodoa by the Japanese in 1937–38, she and her colleagues at Kiungchow-Hoihow were again placed under house arrest after July 1941. Moninger was repatriated first to Shanghai and then home on the Gripsholm in 1942. Ill health forced her retirement, and she died at Marshalltown.

Monism. Monism is the philosophical view that there is only one ultimate reality of which everything else is merely a part. In religion it is usually connected with a pantheistic view of the nature of God (“God is all and all is God”). There is considerable diversity among monistic systems.

Among Asian religions, Hinduism, especially according to the interpretation of the Upanishads by the eighth-century mystic philosopher Sankara, is monistic in that all reality is summed up in Brahman and the gods are manifestations of Brahman. Likewise, the New Age movement in the West, because of Hindu influence, adheres to pantheistic monism. Some forms of Buddhism appear to be monistic, especially in the emphasis upon nirvana or sunyata (emptiness) as the ultimate reality.

Western thinking includes several philosophical monists, from Parmenides and Democritus in ancient Greece to Plotinus in the third century and on to B. Spinoza and G. W. F. Hegel in the modern period. Spinoza, for example, defined reality as the one substance, calling it either God or Nature, while Hegel is the most influential monistic thinker in the modern West with his concept of the Absolute.

Christian theology opposes monism for at least two reasons. First, monism is incompatible with the biblical distinction between God the creator and the created order. Second, monism is incompatible with Scripture in its idea of evil as an inherent part of the universe rather than an alien intrusion into the perfect creation through human choice.

Monotheism. Derived from the Greek mono (single, only) and theos (god), monotheism is the belief that there is only one God. Monotheism is thus contrasted with polytheism (belief in a plurality of deities), henotheism (worship of one deity as supreme without necessarily denying the reality of other deities), and atheism (denial of the existence of any deity). Monotheism is also generally understood as involving belief in a personal, transcendent creator of all else that exists, and thus monotheism must be distinguished from the various forms of nonpersonal monism (ultimately there is only one reality) and pantheism (identification of God with the universe).

Monotheism is usually associated with Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, all of which affirm that there is one eternal Creator God. However, the three faiths differ substantially in their respective understandings of the nature of the one true God. Central to Judaism is the Shema, the credal statement found in Deuteronomy 6:4—“Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God, the Lord is One.” Jesus reaffirmed this confession in Mark 12:29–30, and the unity of the one eternal God formed the foundation of the early Christian community as well (1 Cor. 8:4, 6; Eph. 4:6; 1 Tim. 2:5). Nevertheless, the early church came to recognize that within the unity of the one eternal God there is a fundamental distinction among the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, resulting in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. Both Judaism and Islam reject the doctrine of the Trinity and the deity of Jesus Christ.

Sikhism is also monotheistic in its emphasis on worship of the one God, the “True Name,” the sovereign Creator. Theistic traditions that call for worship of one supreme deity (e.g., Shiva, Vishnu) can be found in certain forms of Hinduism and Buddhism (Amida and the Pure Land schools). The High God of African traditional religions is sometimes characterized as a form of diffused monotheism as well.

The challenge for Christians missiologically is twofold: (1) to encourage those from polytheistic, pantheistic, or animistic worldviews to come to an understanding and acceptance of the biblical God as the one, eternal, sovereign God; (2) to encourage non-Christian monotheists to embrace a fully biblical understanding of the deity of Jesus Christ and the trinitarian nature of the one God. This is particularly important for ministry among Muslims. Islam seriously misunderstands the orthodox teaching of the Trinity, accusing Christians of denying genuine monotheism. These misunderstandings need to be addressed in a clear and sensitive manner. In an effort to be faithful to the teaching of Scripture and to build on common ground, ministry among Muslims, Jews, and Sikhs should emphasize the oneness and unity of God. While remaining consistent with the teaching of Scripture, ministry among non-Christian monotheists should explore new terms and fresh formulations for communicating the biblical understanding of the Holy Trinity.

Montgomery, Carrie Judd (1858–1946). American Pentecostal minister-teacher, editor, writer, and social worker. Born and raised in Buffalo, New York, Montgomery dedicated herself to Christian ministry and lifelong teaching about divine healing after her own healing. Her efforts to bridge denominational barriers included work in transdenominational ministries and affiliations with Pentecostal and Holiness healing movements, the Christian Missionary Alliance (CMA), the Episcopal Church, and the Salvation Army. Montgomery’s book recording her testimony influenced A. B. Simpson in founding the CMA. She became the recording secretary of the first CMA board and later organized a CMA church in Oakland.

In addition to writing numerous books, Montgomery began and edited (for sixty-five years) the nonsectarian magazine, Triumphs of Faith. Montgomery combined holiness and divine healing to establish several homes throughout the United States where sick people could come for prayer, teaching, and support. She married after moving to Oakland, California, in 1890. Although her wealthy husband, George Montgomery, remained a layman, Carrie was ordained by the Churches of God in Christ and credentialed as an evangelist in the Assemblies of God. Together, they developed several ministries, including an orphanage, a campground, a missionary training school, a mission, and a missionary rest and ministry center. Montgomery also pastored Beulah Heights Chapel.

Montgomery, Helen Barrett (1861–1934). American Bible translator, author, mission advocate, and licensed Baptist preacher. Born in Kingsville, Ohio, and raised in Rochester, New York, Montgomery attributed her success to the influence of her school administrator/Baptist minister father: She excelled at Wellesley College and began her career teaching school, receiving a master’s degree from Brown University and three honorary doctorates. She and her husband, William A. Montgomery, a successful businessman, gave sacrificially to missions. Montgomery also raised huge amounts of money for cooperative mission efforts. She and Lucy Peabody, both leaders of the Women’s Missionary Movement, traveled extensively to research and promote international missions.

Montgomery served ten years as the first president of the combined Women’s American Baptist Foreign Mission Society. She was also the first woman to translate the New Testament from Greek to English (the Centenary Translation), first woman president of a major denomination (Northern Baptist Convention), founder and first president of the Federation of Women’s Boards of Foreign Missions, first woman on the Rochester school board, and president of the Women’s Educational and Industrial Union for twenty years. Montgomery often preached and she filled her father’s pulpit after his death. A prolific scholar, Montgomery wrote numerous books about missions and lectured in seminaries and churches. She taught the Barrett Memorial Bible class for forty-four years.

Montserrat (United Kingdom Dependent Area) (Est. 2000 pop.: 11,000; 102 sq. km. [39 sq. mi.]). A British colony in the northern Leeward Islands of the Caribbean, Montserrat has a tiny population of only 14,000 people and restricted economic opportunity. Montserrat nevertheless has benefited from its natural beauty and rugged terrain to emerge as an attractive tourist site. The largely Protestant population is 20 percent evangelical, two-thirds of whom are Pentecostal.

Moody, Dwight Lyman (1837–99). American evangelist. Born in Northfield, Massachusetts, at age seventeen he began working in a Boston shoe store, where he was converted through the witness of his Sunday school teacher, Edward Kimball. He moved to Chicago in 1856 and developed a successful shoe business. In 1858, he organized a Sunday school, which eventually grew into what is now Moody Memorial Church. In 1860, he devoted himself full-time to city missionary work through the YMCA. During the Civil War he ministered to soldiers. Between 1865 and 1869, he served as the president of the Chicago YMCA. In 1871, following the great Chicago fire, he began his career as a traveling revivalist. He was joined by Ira Sankey and together they ministered effectively throughout Great Britain from 1873 to 1875, returning to America as celebrities.

Moody held evangelistic campaigns in virtually every major city in America. His influence was far-reaching, not only in evangelism but in education (founding three schools), conferences, and publishing. Saving souls was his highest aim in life. He said: “I look upon this world as a wrecked vessel. God has given me a lifeboat and said to me, ‘Moody, save all you can.’”

Moon, Charlotte ("Lottie") (1840–1912). American missionary to China. Born into an aristocratic Southern family in Scottsville, Virginia, she and her younger sister, Edmonia, became the first single women missionaries to northern China for the Southern Baptist Mission (1873–1912). Converted in 1858 revivals, “Lottie” joined her lifelong Presbyterian friend, Anna Safford. They taught and, in 1871, established their own girls’ school in Cartersville, Georgia. When opportunities for single women to become missionaries opened, both women changed careers and became Chinese missionaries. Moon arrived in the Shandong city of Tengzhou in 1873.

Personal discipline, institutional loyalty, and generous hospitality characterized her relatively stable missionary career. Competent in Chinese and sensitive to the Chinese cultural restraints on women’s roles, she made friendship a means to evangelism. Working at first in girls’ schools in Tengzhou (1873–85), Moon later moved to the town of Pingtu, and became the first single woman missionary to open a Chinese station without any other support. Her work in the area resulted in the development of over thirty independent Chinese congregations.

During the anti-Qing revolutionary years, the septuagenarian Moon’s unselfish generosity led her to suffer from malnutrition with those around her. Colleagues discovered her condition only too late. She died, emaciated and incoherent around her. Colleagues discovered her condition and thought she suffered from malnutrition with those around her. Colleagues discovered her condition only too late. She died, emaciated and incoherent, during the initial days of a voyage to North America for medical treatment. She has been idealized among Southern Baptists for her sacrificial act of love; yearly Christmas offerings for foreign missions is taken in her name. One estimate claims that these offerings have come to nearly $1.5 billion by 1995.

Moral Development. The most cohesive body of research on moral development has been carried on within the framework of the cognitive stage theory conceived by Jean Piaget (1965) and extended by Lawrence Kohlberg (1984), James Fowler (1981), and others. Intercultural findings related to the work of these theorists are quite consistent. Although rates of development vary and growth may be arrested before higher stages are reached, the same developmental patterns are observed across cultures.

Jean Piaget, a Swiss “genetic epistemologist” (as he preferred to call himself), spent forty years studying the cognitive development of children at his Center for Genetic Epistemology in Geneva. He identified four developmental stages: the sensorimotor stage (to 2 years), during which rudimentary logical-mathematical operations such as hiding and finding, grouping and separating develop; the preoperational stage (2–7 years), when the child begins to retain mental images while objects are absent and to engage in activities such as playing, speaking, and looking at pictures; the stage of concrete operations (7–11 years), during which the child becomes able to conserve substances, weights, and numbers when their shape or position changes; to classify objects by color, size, and shape; and to seriate objects from short to long, light to heavy, and so on. Piaget’s final stage, formal operations (12 years and over), involves complex “operations upon the operations,” such as extrapolating what comes next from what is there, and holding some variables constant while others are manipulated. Some cross-cultural Piagetian studies suggest that some adults who have not had school-like experiences that require thinking from action are still functioning at a concrete operations stage.

Kohlberg (1965) also constructed a moral reasoning model, based on the child’s developing concepts of respect, fairness, intentions, and punishment. He identified a two-stage model: heteronomy, characterized by unilateral respect for authority and conformity to rules; and autonomy; marked by mutuality, reciprocity, equality, and cooperation. In one study within this framework, Native American children were found to believe that rules in white persons’ games could be changed, while rules in their tribal games could not.

Lawrence Kohlberg (1984) developed a more complex six-stage model that extended Piaget’s moral development theory into adulthood. He identified two preconventional stages, during which moral decision making is based on a fear of consequences and egocentric need gratification; two stages of conventional morality, characterized by a desire to please others and live by social rules; and, finally, two postconventional stages in which contractual commitments and universal principles predominate. Kohlberg studied the reasons behind moral decisions, not the ethical implications growing out of them. Only in the final years of his life did he acknowledge that some kind of advocacy or indoctrination might be necessary in moral education (Snarey, 1992, 857).

Although extensive research supports the validity of Kohlberg’s first four stages across cultures, questions have been raised about the cross-gender and cross-cultural validity of his model at postconventional levels. Some evidence suggests that women tend to base moral decisions on car-
Moratorium. Since the mid-nineteenth century, a number of international Christian leaders became very concerned about paternalistic and authoritarian mission practices and the need for new churches in the southern continents to determine their own courses of action. One hundred years later, Hendrik Kraemer, Max Warren, and James A. Scherer argued that mission business should not continue “as usual.” Patronizing missions from the West needed to be dismantled in favor of a new order of relationships. Reflecting this, Bishop Federico Pagura of Central America wrote a pithy challenge in 1964 entitled “Missionary, Go Home . . . Or Stay.”

After appeals in 1971 from John Gatu of Kenya and Emerito Nacpil of the Philippines, a heated debate developed over the need for “mission,” but not for Western missionaries. This occurred both in print and especially at international conferences in Bangkok (1973), Lusaka (1974), Lusanne (1974), and Nairobi (1975). Calls were issued by some for a transfer of “the massive expenditure on expatriate personnel in the churches in Africa [for example] to programme activities manned by Africans themselves.”

In 1974, Gerald H. Anderson argued that while there were “situations in which the withdrawal of missionaries would be in the best interests of the Christian mission,” such a general policy for all situations was “neither biblically sound nor in the best interests of the churches” anywhere. Instead, he urged the development of “mutuality in mission.” Similarly, Stephen Neill observed that different churches held rather divergent views on the “moratorium” issue, reflecting the fact that many of them were at different stages in life.

During the 1990s, questions were raised in evangelical circles on questions such as: “Are American [or Western] missionaries still needed overseas?” Alternatives have been suggested by mission organizations acting on the premise that twenty-five or more local believers (who are far more effective evangelists than are expatriates) can be supported for the cost of maintaining one American missionary overseas (K. P. Yohannan).

Moravian Missions. The Moravians had their roots in a small band of refugees, spiritual descendants of the fifteenth-century Hussite movement, who settled on the estate of Count Nicholas von Zinzendorf near Dresden in 1722. They named their settlement Herrnhut, the “Lord’s watch.” Others from various church traditions joined them. Zinzendorf had been raised in a pietist home, and made a deep commitment to Christ as a youth. At the University of Halle he was a founder of the Order of the Mustard Seed, one of whose stated purposes was “to carry the gospel to those beyond the sea.”

As the community grew, there was dissension over various issues, including its relationship to the State Lutheran Church. In 1727 Zinzendorf called them to unity with the principle that “Herrnhut shall stand in unceasing love with all children of God in all churches, criticize none . . . to preserve for itself the evangelical purity, simplicity, and grace.”

After weeks of teaching from 1 John, prayer, and fasting, the group experienced its Pentecost on August 13, 1727, and was knit together by a mighty visitation of the Holy Spirit. In February 1728 Zinzendorf introduced plans for evangelism in the West Indies, Greenland, Turkey, and Lapland. Twenty-six people made a covenant to pray for the mission and to go forth immediately when called. A chain of prayer around the clock was inaugurated that lasted one hundred years. The Moravians became a unique fellowship of laity and clergy, men and women, with the spread of the Christian message the major objective of the whole group, not just a minority. While they married and had families, in many respects they were monastic in their discipline and obedience, willing to go anywhere in mission. Their purpose was twofold: to take the gospel to those who had not heard, and to bring renewal and unity to churches that had grown cold. This small community furnished over half the laity and clergy, men and women, with the spread of the Christian message the major objective of the whole group, not just a minority. While they married and had families, in many respects they were monastic in their discipline and obedience, willing to go anywhere in mission. Their purpose was twofold: to take the gospel to those who had not heard, and to bring renewal and unity to churches that had grown cold. This small community furnished over half the Protestant missionaries in the eighteenth century.

In 1732 Leonhard Dober and David Nitshmann left on foot for Copenhagen, their meager possessions on their backs and thirty shillings in their pockets, on their way to the West Indies. The missionaries were expected to make their own way and support themselves. By 1740 68 had gone; by 1760 the number had grown to 226. A report in 1739 mentioned 16 locations where they served in Asia, Africa, North America, and Asia, in addition to several areas in Europe, including the Baltic states and Russia.

They often went to the hardest places and worked with the most oppressed people, persevering despite terrible suffering. Over fifty adults and children died the first few years in the West Indies and Surinam. Work with the slaves brought opposition from the planters and the Dutch clergy. When missionaries were imprisoned on St. Thomas, slaves gathered outside the prison to hear their message and sing with them. Eight hundred were converted.

Called a fool by the European settlers, George Schmidt established the first mission station in South Africa and in 1742 baptized the first black converts. Soon he was expelled by the Dutch.

After the first three missionaries to Greenland had experienced near starvation, sickness, and the hostility of the people, they signed a covenant, vowing never to leave their posts, adding, “We came hither resting on Christ our Saviour, in whom all the nations of the earth shall be blessed.” Three years later as he heard the story of Jesus in Gethsemane, newly translated into his own language, the first native Greenlander was converted.

Moravians worked among a number of indigenous American tribes, often incurring the enmity of both European colonists and other Indians. At Gnadenhutten, Pennsylvania, a number of Indians and missionaries were massacred. Moravians went to the West Coast of Africa, Ethiopia, and Algeria, to Kurds in Persia, and to Laplanders in the far north. Several were imprisoned in St. Petersburg. Others went to Ceylon, hoping to establish missions to the East Indies, Mongolia, and Persia. Their vision was worldwide.

They studied medicine, geography, and languages, and were sent out only with a strong sense of call, validated by the community. Their message was clear. “Tell them about the Lamb of God till you can tell them no more,” Zinzendorf exhorted. So was their motive. “May the Lamb receive His due reward for what He suffered on the cross,” two Moravians shouted as they bade farewell to friends and family. They took whatever jobs were available and formed self-supporting communities. Their pattern of life commended the gospel and consequently won many. They were not to seek glory for themselves. The missionary was to be content to suffer, die, and be forgotten.

They taught slaves to read, cared for widows and orphans, nursed the sick, and translated the Scriptures and other Christian literature into many languages. They encouraged converts to become teachers and elders.

Moravian missions among people of existing churches in Europe and North America focused on renewal and unity but were usually met with suspicion and rejection by church leaders. Even so, Zinzendorf warned against establishing Moravianism, encouraging converts to remain in their
As part of the broader eighteenth-century movements of revival, the Moravians played a major role as a catalyst to revival and missions. They were the first church to recognize their obligation to the Jews. Their influence on the Wesleys is well known. Spangenburg met John Wesley in Georgia and asked if he knew Jesus Christ. Wesley could not answer with certainty. Back in London in 1738 prior to Wesley’s “heart warming” experience, Peter Boehler taught that he could know the assurance of salvation. The Basel and Leipzig Missionary Societies, the Methodist missionary enterprise, and the London Missionary Society were all stimulated and to some extent guided by the Moravians. In 1792 William Carey cited their example when he proposed the formation of the Baptist Missionary Society. The Moravians continue as a relatively small denomination in the United States and Europe. Well over half their members are located in Africa and Latin America.

Mormons. The followers of the Church of Jesus Christ Latter-day Saints (LDS) have come to be called Mormons because of their belief in a sacred text, the Book of Mormon, which was allegedly revealed to and translated by their founder Joseph Smith, Jr., in Upstate New York in 1830. The text purports to be the record of the early peoples of the Americas and of a visit to them by Jesus Christ.

Professing to be Christian, Mormons differ from historic Christianity in these doctrinal beliefs: the preexistent soul, God’s evolution as a man to godhood, the potential of Mormon men to evolve into gods of their own planets, three separate heavenly abodes, the necessity of post-death baptism for non-Mormons, the inclusion of three additional texts as Scripture that are more authoritative than the Bible, the restoration of the Aaronic and Melchizedek priesthoods, the need for a living prophet (understood to be the current President and Apostle of LDS), and that all other churches are an abomination to God. LDS redefines the Trinity by stating the Heavenly Father is Elohim, Jesus is Jehovah, and the Holy Ghost is a bodiless spirit. Their Christology includes the belief that Jesus is the biological brother of Lucifer and all humans, born from a physical relationship between God and Mary, that Jesus married at least three wives and fathered children, and that his death paid only for Adam’s sin. The cross has little significance to Mormonism.

The LDS is headquartered in Salt Lake City, Utah, and reflects a strong hierarchical structure. Its membership exceeded 8 million in 128 countries in 1993 and is projected to reach 35 million by 2020. Young men (more recently women as well) are encouraged to spend two years as active missionaries, resulting in nearly fifty thousand missionaries serving at the end of the twentieth century.

Mormons can be challenged on the authenticity of the LDS version of its history. Since they are taught that new revelation supersedes old, it is helpful to present them with the historic reliability of the Bible and the principle that new revelation cannot contradict older revelation.

Morocco (Est. 2000 pop.: 29,637,000; 446,550 sq. km. [172,413 sq. mi.]). The history of this northwest African country has been shaped by the interaction between the original Berber population and a succession of outside invading peoples: Phoenicians, Carthaginians, Romans, Vandals, Arab Muslims, Spanish, and French. Today it is estimated that 75 percent of the population are of Berber stock. In Morocco there are three main Berber tribal groups: the Riffians in the north, who speak the Rif dialect, the Berraber in the center, who speak Tamazight, and the Shluh in the southeast, who speak Tashilhuit. However, Arabic is the official language.

Christianity entered Morocco in the second century, but the church was weakened by persecution, the Donatist schism, and the ravages of invaders. In the thirteenth century, six Franciscan friars came to serve as missionaries. Morocco was opened to Protestant missions through the tolerance of Sultan Moulay Hassan (1873–94). In 1875, the Church Mission to the Jews established a ministry to the large Hebrew community in Morocco. In 1884, the mission to the Kabyles and Other Berber Races began work. This mission later was renamed the North Africa Mission, and still later became Arab World Ministries. Many other missions followed.

After France occupied Morocco in 1912, Christians began holding public meetings and selling reading material. Orphanages were established. Medical work was developed, most notably through the North Africa Mission Hospital in Tangier. (This hospital was nationalized in 1974.) By the 1960s, there were several Christian bookstores and a thriving camp program, as well as... widespread distribution of Bible correspondence courses. At one point forty thousand Moroccans were enrolled in these courses, writing from every city in the nation. Arabic radio broadcasts were begun by North Africa Mission in 1961 and by Gospel Missionary Union in 1966. Soon Berber broadcasts were added. By 1967, both the Bible correspondence courses and the publishing programs had moved outside Morocco, incorporating the radio ministries. By 1970 increasing pressure and expulsions by the government had reduced missionary personnel by two-thirds from its peak of one hundred in the early 1960s. Now a vigorous program of evangelism is carried on from outside the country by means of radio, Bible correspondence courses, and publications.

The penal code of June 5, 1963, prohibits the “use of means” to “exploit” the weakness of Muslims and “seduce” them to convert to another religion. Since then, hundreds of Bible correspondence course students in at least eight cities have been interrogated by the police, pressured to stop the courses, and threatened. Some believers have suffered job losses, house arrests, or imprisonment. Nevertheless, several hundred Moroccan believers gather in house meetings in several cities. Since conversion from Islam to Christianity is forbidden by law, these national Christians are not recognized as such by the government.

Morris, William Case (1864–1932). British-born Argentine missionary educator. Born in England, Morris lost his mother when he was six; the following year he and his father emigrated to Argentina. After serving as a Methodist lay worker and pastor, Morris was ordained in the Church of England and joined the (Anglican) South American Missionary Society. Motivated by a natural compassion for poor and especially motherless children, in 1898 he founded a school in Buenos Aires primarily for the underprivileged. Under his direction and unyielding effort, by 1930 the “Argentine Philanthropic Schools,” including an orphanage, counted some 140,000 alumni and were providing over 6,500 students with academic and vocational training, books, clothing and shoes, and a sense of duty to God and country.

Despite charges of proselytism and opposition from Catholic authorities to the use of the New Testament and evangelical hymns in the curriculum, the “Morris Schools” received government subsidies along with support from many local institutions and individuals. Morris was also an outstanding writer and translator; he edited a magazine, La Reforma, to which notable literary figures of the day contributed. Highly respected by the authorities and society, Morris is the only Argentine evangelical to have a monument in Buenos Aires in his honor and streets and communities named after him.

Morrison, Robert (1782–1834). English pioneer missionary to China. Born in Morpeth, England, he entered Hoxton Academy in London in 1803. The following year the London Missionary Society appointed him as a missionary. For the next two and a half years, he studied at the “Missionary Academy” at Gosport, as well as studying medicine, astronomy, and Chinese. He arrived in Canton on September 6, 1807.

Living in Canton and Macao for the next twenty-seven years except for two years in England, Morrison saw his main calling as preparing the way for future missionaries. He served as interpreter for the East India Company (beginning in 1809) and for two British government missions to China. But in fulfillment of his calling, Morrison and his colleague William Milne completed and published the Bible in Chinese in 1823. He also authored nearly forty other works in Chinese and English, plus many articles in periodicals. Other than the Bible, his best-known publication was his six-volume A Dictionary of the Chinese Language (1815–22).

Morrison and Milne also established the Anglo-Chinese College in Malacca in 1818, with the dual purpose of providing Chinese-language training for future missionaries and educating local boys, a number of whom played significant roles in later Chinese history.

Recognized by scholars as a leading Sinologue, Morrison remained at heart a missionary fulfilling his calling to prepare the way for others. His plea to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions led to the appointment of Elijah Coleman Bridgman as the first American missionary to China. One of his earliest co-workers, Leang Afa [Liang Fa], became known as the “first Chinese evangelist.” While he had fewer than a dozen converts directly attributable to his work, Morrison gave his life in the conviction that he was laying the necessary groundwork for later effective missionary work in China. Clearly, his attribution as “Father of Protestant Missions in China” is well deserved.

church, Bridgewater, Nova Scotia, in 1861. Visiting the West Indies for his health he was moved by the deplorable condition of East Indian indentured laborers working on the sugar plantations. Sent by the Synod of the Maritimes, from 1868 until his death he led the Canadian Presbyterian Mission to the East Indians in Trinidad. He and his wife had to learn Hindi and Urdu to communicate with the people. When other missionaries arrived, the work expanded to Guyana, St. Lucia, Grenada, and Jamaica, and by 1873 they were operating twelve schools, which produced civic as well as church leaders. The first indigenous pastors were ordained in 1882. Morton’s missiological methodology effectively combined education with evangelism; he started day schools, a teachers’ college, and a theological college. His work resulted in a continuing viable mission and small self-supporting churches. By 1925 there were 101 places of worship and all-province diocesan offices. Mother Teresa (1910–97). Yugoslavian social worker and missionary in India. Mother Teresa has become one of the most accepted and celebrated missionaries in the modern world, having been honored with the inaugural John XIII Peace Prize (1971), the inaugural Templeton Prize (1973), and the Nobel Peace Prize (1979).

Born in Skopje, Yugoslavia, as Agnes Gonxha Bojaxhiu in 1910 into an Albanian peasant family, at eighteen she joined Loreto Nuns. She came to Calcutta, where she taught at Loreto Convent High School for seventeen years. God called her as she was traveling by train to a Himalayan retreat in 1946 to give up everything and follow him to the slums to serve him among the poorest of the poor. Two years later she left the convent and started the Missionary of Charity Order, which began its first children’s home in 1955 and its first leprosarium in 1957. The ministry now includes schools, food distribution centers, and AIDS hospices worldwide.

By the 1960s, nine foundations were established in other countries, and by 1975 there were more than a thousand sisters spread out all over the world. After an interview with Malcolm Muggeridge for British Broadcasting, she became an international celebrity. In recent years Missionaries of Charity has grown to over three thousand sisters and four hundred brothers.

Mother Teresa is a true model of Christian love in action. She was well accepted by all religious and political groups. She did not make an issue about people getting converted, but she shared Christ through her life and mission. Her life and work was her testimony for Christ. After her death, she was honored by an Indian state funeral with dignitaries from around the world present.

Motive, Motivation. One’s motives for seeking missionary service must be correct ones. Some Christians are fascinated with the romance of travel, the idea that missions is the highest form of Christian service, the intrigue of another culture, or the desire to do good. These are all inadequate motives, which pale when compared with the centrality of biblical motives.

The missionary is one who is “sent.” Although humans are involved in the process, the missionary must sense that the Holy Spirit is sending him or her.

God’s dealings with Abraham (Gen. 12:2–3) are an early biblical indication that God desires to call, bless, and send his people, so that “all peoples on earth will be blessed” through them. This is repeatedly indicated to Abraham (Gen. 18:18; 22:16–18), as well as to Isaac (Gen. 26:4) and Jacob (Gen. 28:13–14). It is apparent that God did not intend Israel to be the sole recipient of his grace and love. Rather, Israel was to be a channel and a conduit through which his love could flow “to all nations on earth.” At high moments in Israel’s history, this focus was renewed (1 Kings 8:43; Ps. 96:3).

The five Great Commission passages of the New Testament give us strong motivation for mission. Even Jesus’ disciples finally caught on. Peter, in Acts 3:25, points back to God’s promise to Abraham: “Through your offspring all peoples on earth will be blessed.” Paul echoes the same thought in Galatians 3:8. It is apparent that God’s plan has always been to wrap his message up in his people and then send them to reach others. This is the bedrock motivation for mission. We go in obedience to his will.

Another motivation that has propelled Christians to missionary service has been the needs of the world. The number of Unreached Peoples is a stimulus to missionary activity. Other Christians have been moved to do missionary work because of the hunger, sickness, or poverty around the globe. Acts 13:1–4 indicates that leadership in the church has a role to play (under the direction... of the Holy Spirit) in setting apart persons for missionary service.

God’s guidance to individuals in the form of a Missionary Calling is also a powerful motivation for mission. As he did with Abraham, so God still speaks to individuals. The nature of a call is the subject of great debate. Certainly we may say that such a call varies among people. For some it may come as a thunderclap; for others, it comes like the gradual dawning of a new day. However it is defined, most churches and mission agencies desire that a person should have a clear sense that God is leading him or her to apply for missionary service. This motivation often is the only anchor that will hold the new missionary steady during the dark testing times of Culture Shock and other problems on the field.

Biblical motives must be central for missions. The needs of the world may beckon us, the romance of other cultures may intrigue us, but in the end the primary motivation for mission must be because “Christ’s love compels us” (2 Cor. 5:14).

Mott, John Raleigh (1865–1955). American missionary promoter and ecumenical leader. Born into a Methodist family in Sullivan County, New York, he graduated from Upper Iowa and Cornell universities, was converted during his student days, and pledged himself to missionary service (1886). He was a YMCA secretary (1888–1915), co-founder and chair of the Student Volunteer Movement (1888–1920), prime mover in establishing the World Student Christian Federation (1895), and chair of the World Missionary Conference (Edinburgh, 1910). Mott traveled two million miles enthusiastically, his motto, “With God anywhere, without him, not over the threshold.” He acquired an immense knowledge of the missionary enterprise worldwide, encouraging students and field-workers and setting up national councils of churches. In 1923 a Japanese Christian leader called him “father of the young people of the world.” John R. Mott was adept at spotting and nurturing recruits, was much respected by political heads at home and abroad (he once spoke to three U.S. presidents—Taft, Coolidge, Wilson—in a day), labored tirelessly for prisoners of war and Orphanage Mission Work, and could extract large donations from the American rich (Rockefeller funds established the Missionary Research Library). He was chair of the International Missionary Council (1921–41) and presided over the Jerusalem Missionary Conference (1928). In 1935 a future archbishop of Canterbury declared, “He led us then; he leads us still.” In 1946 he shared the Nobel Peace Prize; in 1948 the newly formed World Council of Churches named him honorary president. But the Methodist layman who had declined prestigious academic and political posts wanted to be remembered simply as an evangelist.

His many works included The Evangelization of the World in This Generation (1910) and Addresses and Papers (6 vols., 1946–47).

Mozambique (Est. 2000 pop.: 18,991,000; 801,590 sq. km. [309,494 sq. mi.]). Mozambique is a Portuguese-speaking nation in southern Africa. Located in the east side of the continent bordering the Indian Ocean, the country encompasses 38 ethnic groups and 24 major vernacular languages. Religiously, 42 percent profess Christianity, 40 percent are adherents of traditional religions, 13 percent follow Islam, and 5 percent are nonreligious.

After nearly five hundred years of Portuguese colonial rule, the country became independent in 1975, under a Marxist regime. As the Portuguese left the country, civil war broke out and the country experienced its worst drought of the century. All these factors combined brought the country to a virtual collapse with almost all infrastructure destroyed. By October 1992 a peace accord between the anti-communist guerrilla movement and the government was signed in Rome. The guerrilla movement became the opposition party. In the following year Mozambique had its first multiparty elections.

Catholicism was brought to Mozambique by Portuguese Dominicans in the early sixteenth century. Protestantism arrived in the form of ABCFM missionaries in 1879. Shortly thereafter Methodists and Presbyterians began their work. After World War I Baptists, Pentecostals, Nazarenes, and Adventists joined the effort. After independence all forms of religion were suppressed by the communist state. As a result of civil war, which was aggravated by a vicious cycle of drought and floodings, the country spiraled toward economic collapse. As foreign aid started pouring in from Christian and Muslim agencies, the government relaxed its pressure on all religious groups, and in fact, called on them for help. By 1990 there was general religious freedom.

Mozambique is a melting pot for the world of mission agencies. The missionaries, now around four hundred belonging to forty-seven agencies, have to compete with the growing number of cults such as the Jehovah’s Witnesses. The Protestant mission agencies with the largest number of missionaries are African Inland Mission, Youth With a Mission, and Africa Evangelical Fellowship. Besides the strong Catholic presence, Islam is particularly viable in the northern part of the country. In addition to radio and the Jesus Film, a major area for missionary activity has been that of relief work. The large number of orphans, people ravaged by war, and unemployed youth constitute an important mission field.

Mission agencies and missionaries have a great task before them in Mozambique. One factor is an 80 percent illiteracy rate, another the paucity of the Scriptures available in local languages. But the major force against Christianity is doubtless the ever increasing attempt by Muslims to Islamize the country. Mosques are being built in many locations and by 1996 the Muslims had two official holidays in the national calendar. Finally, there is an urgent need for instilling a missionary vision among Mozambiquian Christians to reach out to their own people. To date only a handful of Mozambiquians have gone out as missionaries, and this remains an unrealized potential for the church in Mozambique.

Müller, George (1805–98). German faith missions advocate and founder of orphanages. Born in Prussia, Müller was converted and awakened to missions while a university student at Halle. He went to England to do mission work among the Jews and there joined the renewal movement within British Protestantism that became the Plymouth Brethren. He ended his connection with the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews and served as pastor in Teignmouth, where he established his lifelong practice of accepting no salary, instead trusting God for his mouth, where he established his lifelong practice of accepting no salary, instead trusting God for his needs. In 1832 he moved to Bristol, where he lived the rest of his life. In 1834 Müller founded the Scriptural Knowledge Institution for Home and Abroad with the purposes of establishing day schools, Sunday schools, and adult schools for teaching the Bible, distributing Bibles, and supporting mission work. Müller achieved fame for founding the Bristol Orphanage Mission Work. His greater contribution, however, was the example of his life of faith and prayer. He determined not to ask for support and instead prayed for the needs of the orphan homes and missions, trusting that God would meet those needs without his prompting others to give. By the end of his life, Müller had built five orphanages; cared for 120,000 children; preached in forty-two countries; raised a quarter million pounds for missions; and raised almost 2.5 million pounds altogether—all by faith.

Murray, Andrew (1828–1917). South African devotional writer and promoter of missionary awakening. He was born in 1828 in Graaff-Reinet, South Africa, to a Scottish minister and his wife. The Christ-centered home in which he was reared proved to be a launching pad for his own life of ministry both in South Africa and around the globe. During his time of theological training at Utrecht University in Holland, he and his brother John helped form a student missionary society. Ordained at age twenty, Murray returned to South Africa in 1848, where he would serve as a pastor until 1906. His years of service were spent in Bloemfontein, Worcester, Cape Town, and Wellington, where he labored for thirty-five years. During his pastorates he was also an impassioned itinerant evangelist in the Transvaal and other locations along the Cape, where he ministered to immigrants.

In addition to speaking he was active in establishing centers for higher education. He helped found the University College of Orange Free State in 1856, the Stellenbosch Theological Seminary in 1857, the Huguenot Seminary in 1874, and the Wellington Missionary Training Institute in 1877. The establishment of the latter was a reflection of his belief that missions was "the chief end of the church." His desire to see the lost reached and the believer discipled led to his cofounding and appointment as the president of the South Africa General Mission (now AFRICA EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP) in 1889, a position he held until his death in 1917. In his final twelve years, he was also responsible for introducing the Keswick spirit into South Africa and spent much of his time participating in evangelistic meetings in the Western world. Murray’s 240 writings challenged and inspired many to a deeper walk with Christ.

With Christ in the School of Prayer and Abide in Christ continue to do so today.

Muslim Mission Work. Muhammad, the prophet of Islam, died in A.D. 632. From that point on the conflict between the world’s two largest monotheistic religions (Christianity and Islam) has raged on unabated. Each persuasion has a great commission to fulfill. Each is convinced it is the unique path to God. Each declares that truth is revealed only in its scriptures. Thus the stage is set for mutual antagonism.

Certain critical historical events have caused Muslims to be resistant to the Christian message. The CRUSADES of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries were a terrible violation of basic human rights. Even though these events took place hundreds of years ago, Muslims today are still angry concerning the outrages against their ancestors.

Between 1700 and 1960, colonialists from the so-called Christian West reigned over much of the Muslim world. Missionaries took advantage of friendly rulers to gain permission to preach Christianity. Muslims in these countries had no recourse to legal procedures by which to expel missionaries.

The issue of Palestine came to the fore in 1948 as the United Nations, with the stroke of a pen, mandated the new state of Israel into existence. Muslims had been living in Palestine for over thirteen hundred years. What right, they asked, did the world have to radically change the political status of their land? Jihad was their declared response.

Lastly, the antagonism between Christianity and Islam has been enhanced by the Muslims' perception of Christians as pig eaters, wine drinkers, and perpetual adulterers. Western media have presented a powerful depiction of moral depravity in countries where most of the citizens would declare themselves to be Christians.

Muslims do not generally make a distinction between nominal Christians and practicing Christians. They look upon the 1.8 billion as one community. Accordingly, Christians are to be indicted as a whole for all of the reasons we have listed. Thus the task of Muslim evangelism is dictated as a whole for all of the reasons we have presented. Thus the task of Muslim evangelism is made exceedingly difficult, quite apart from theological distinctives.

Historically, Christian outreaches among Muslims made little impact prior to the mid-1960s. A few names stand out as exceptions; Raymond Lull (c. 1235–1315); Henry Martyn (1781–1812); and Samuel Zwemer (1867–1952). But even these giants of faith failed to see large numbers of Muslims come to Christian belief through their evangelistic efforts.

Indonesia, the country with the world's largest Muslim population (in excess of 170 million), has produced the greatest number of converts to Christianity. In the 1960s, as a result of an uprising against communism, hundreds of thousands of Muslims embraced Christianity. Even today there continues to be a significant rate of conversion, especially on the island of Java. Other countries where there have been large numbers of converts to Christianity include Bangladesh and Ethiopia. Overall, however, there are few conversions to Christianity. Countries like Saudi Arabia, Mauritania, Algeria, and Afghanistan have produced but a small number of converts.

Among the evangelical missions emphasizing outreach among Muslims are the Southern Baptist Foreign Mission Board, Frontiers, TEAM, SIM, and Interserve. Frontiers is unique in that their personnel are engaged in tentmaker ministries that allow them opportunity for personal witness.

The Samuel Zwemer Institute was founded in 1978 by Don McCurry. This small organization has produced a number of research projects related to the world of Islam. Fuller Theological Seminary offers the master's and Ph.D. degrees in Muslim studies. Columbia International University inaugurated a master's program in Islamics in 1996. Other Bible colleges and seminaries offer specialized courses on Islam. International Missions, Inc., administers a practical-cum-academic summer program geared to Muslim outreach.

One of the more innovative departures from traditional evangelistic methodology was pioneered by International Christian Fellowship (ICF), which merged with SIM in 1989. In the mid-1970s an ICF team of twenty-seven missionaries from six nations introduced a contextualized style of Muslim evangelism in Bangladesh. Their threefold goal was to (1) see a large number of Muslims accept Christ, (2) disciple these believers within their social and cultural context, and (3) minimize financial assistance to the converts. The approach included wearing local Muslim-style clothing, living in simple rented accommodations, adopting certain Muslim vocabulary, following a general pattern of Islamic worship styles, writing and designing attractive literature that would be appreciated and easily understood by the target Muslim community, initially seeking to win male heads of families to Christ, avoiding ministries that required high-profile institutions, and engaging in discipleship of new believers who would be encouraged to remain within their own community. This style of outreach has produced thousands of Muslim converts to Christianity in Bangladesh. Various missions and church bodies working both in Bangladesh and in other Muslim countries have incorporated segments of this methodology into their evangelistic strategy. Critics have averred that such contextualization is extremely vulnerable to syncretism. Most advocates of the new paradigm would agree and have taken steps to minimize this possibility. Islamic shari'a law has been partially implemented in a number of Muslim countries. This legal system strongly opposes conversion from Islam to Christianity. In certain nations converts have been sentenced to death. This strict interpretation of shari'a law generates fear and inhibits all but the most courageous from any serious investigation of Christian claims to truth.

Arab oil money has fueled a new ethos of excitement and optimism within the Muslim world. New mosques are being built in many countries. Muslim missionaries from Egypt and Pakistan can be found in remote villages of Asia. Jobs are being offered to poor Christians who are willing to convert to Islam. Muslim organizations are Myanmar (Est. 2000 pop.: 51,539,000; 676,578 sq. km. [261,227 sq. mi.]). Myanmar, known as Burma before 1989, is an ancient nation in the Indochina peninsula. It shares borders with five nations: Bangladesh, India, China, Laos, and Thailand. Its long southern coastal plain stretches along the Bay of Bengal and Andaman Sea. Until recently, it has been relatively insulated from its neighbors in political and religious development.

The population is comprised of some 135 ethnic groups speaking 106 languages. The eight major ethnic groups and their percentage of the total population are: Bamar (69), Shan (8.5), Kayin (6.2), Rakhine (4.5), Mon (2.4), Chin (2.2), Kachin (1.4), and Kayah (0.4). There are 314 townships and 13,751 villages. The urban population is 24.81%, and the literacy rate is 66.5%.

The major religions in Myanmar are Buddhism (89.4%), Christianity (4.9%), Islam (3.9%), Hinduism (0.5%), and animism (1.2%). Small numbers practice Confucianism, Judaism, and Laipianism, a local religion.

Myanmar Mission Boards and Agencies. There are two major streams of Protestant missionary efforts in Myanmar. The first is that of conciliar mission work, which is a joint effort of eleven mainline Protestant churches united in the Myanmar Council of Churches related to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The Regional Council for Burma was formed in 1914, and renamed the Burma Christian Council in 1949 and the Burma Council of Churches in 1975. Today, Myanmar Baptist Convention, Methodists, and Presbyterians, through their mission boards and societies, are sending missionaries to the unreached areas. Evangelistic efforts since the 1970s, such as “Chins for Christ in One Century” and “Kachin Gideon Band-3/330,” have been the most dynamic. The Conciliar mission stream emphasizes ecumenicity, development, and theological education.

Under the Evangelical-Pentecostal stream there are seventeen denominations and some parachurch movements, ranging in persuasion from fundamentalistic to charismatic. The Myanmar Evangelical Christian Fellowship was organized in 1984. Assemblies of God, the fastest growing and third largest denomination in the country with a membership of 67,648, began in 1930 and is a strong mission church. The other denominations in this stream have come into existence as the result of renewal, evangelism, and church planting. The renewal movement among the Zomi Chin during the past three decades has resulted in mission across cultures. Also, parachurch movements such as Campus Crusade, Witnessing for Christ, Every Home for Christ, God’s Trio Partners, Gospel for the Nation, and Myanmar Church Planting Mission all help fulfill the evangelistic mandate. The churches in this stream emphasize... evangelism, renewal, church planting, and theological education in their missionary efforts.

In addition to these streams, the Myanmar Bible Society, Christian Literature Society, and Myanmar Blind Mission Fellowship all work independently with their own mission boards.

Mystic, Mysticism. Mystical experience is common to most religions, although it assumes various forms in different traditions. Mysticism occurs in theistic contexts (Judaism, Christianity, Islam, theistic Hinduism), monistic traditions (philosophical Taoism, some forms of Hinduism and Buddhism), pantheistic traditions (Shinto), and even naturalistic contexts (nature mysticism). Mystical experience occurs in explicitly atheistic traditions such as Jainism and Zen Buddhism as well.

Understood in a general sense, mysticism has a long history in Christianity. Mystics such as Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153), Meister Eckhart (d. 1327), Teresa of Avila (d. 1582), and John of the Cross (d. 1591) all in varying ways gave testimony to experiences of immediate awareness of a special intimacy with God transcending normal categories. A distinction is sometimes made between numinous experiences (the experience of “the Other” or “the Holy” in theistic contexts) and mystical experiences (contemplative experiences associated with Hinduism and Buddhism in which one realizes the transcendent or ultimate by “looking within”). Christian mysticism would fall in the former category.

There are some phenomenological similarities between mystical reports from various cultures and religious traditions, although significantly different doctrinal claims are made on the basis of these experiences within the relevant traditions. Mystical experiences are generally characterized by an emphasis on the inadequacy of human language and rational categories to communicate ultimate reality; a sense of unity between the subject and object of experience; and a noetic quality (one attains superior insight into reality as a result of the experience). Central to mysticism is the notion of a direct, unmediated encounter with the ultimate or transcendent. In Hinduism and Buddhism mystical experience is cultivated through rigorous physical/psychic discipline (yoga).

Thinkers such as A. Huxley and S. Radhakrishnan have popularized the notion that mystical experience is a common factor in all major religions and forms the essential core of true religion. However, in spite of some similarities in language in mystical reports, it is clear that mystics tend to interpret their experiences in light of the religious and theological traditions in which they participate. Thus Christian mystics claim to encounter God the Holy Trinity; Advaita Vedanta Hindus seek the identity between the self and Brahman; and Zen Buddhists, denying the substantial reality of both the self and a transcendent Being, claim direct access to Emptiness (sunyata). The ontological implications of these experiences are mutually incompatible: the triune God of Christianity is quite different from nirvana Brahman, and both are incompatible with the insubstantial nature of Emptiness in Buddhism.

There is something of significant value in the mystical traditions. Mysticism reminds us of the limits of human knowledge; there is much about God that remains mysterious and unknown. It also reminds us of the importance of a dynamic, experiential dimension to faith. However, mysticism also presents special challenges to the Christian church. Cultures impacted by mysticism tend to emphasize intuitive religious experience and to regard conceptual knowledge and verbal expressions of religious truth with suspicion. Intuitive experience takes priority over explicit beliefs and doctrines. But at the heart of Christian faith is belief that God has revealed himself definitively in an understandable manner in the Scriptures, and that what we believe has a direct bearing on our salvation. The challenge for the church in contexts impacted by mysticism, then, is to recognize human limitations and the need for profound personal experience of God while also maintaining that all that is necessary for salvation and godly living has been revealed to us in God’s Word.

Myth, Mythology. The word “myth” in popular parlance connotes fiction or untruth. However, for the majority of the world’s people, just as for the people of biblical times, mythology acts as a root metaphor for reality. While not always based on fact as seen from a rationalist viewpoint, myth is truth from the perspective of people for whom it establishes identity—it is their scripture.

Every society has myths at some level: epics that proclaim cosmic origins; folklore depicting family, cultural or national events, and heroes; etiological stories to explain how some things came to be; and fairy tales that entertain while passing moral value to the next generation.
Mythology can serve as a people’s history and a rationale for their beliefs and values. It provides intellectual edification by communicating particular cultural lessons or knowledge. Mythology may also be used to validate appropriate behavior or to chastise inappropriate behavior. Passed down through the generations as oral literature or ritual drama, myth provides a sense of identity and place. The message may be encased in a series of stories organized to present a moral (cultural objectives and values) in acceptable forms.

If missionaries understand a people’s mythology, they can present biblical themes in a similar style that will catch people’s attention and relate God’s wisdom to daily living. A people’s acquaintance with epic could be used to introduce Genesis; similarly, a variety of mythic forms offer parallels to the parables of Jesus. Just as people respond to the truth of myth, they may come to faith in God who approaches human beings in the context of their myth.

Namibia (Est. 2000 pop.: 1,752,000; 824,292 sq. km. [318,259 sq. mi.]). Namibia is thinly populated, with just over two individuals per square mile. English is the official language, though Afrikaans is the common language for most of the population. The largest group is the Ovambo (50%); other groups are the Damara (9%); Ovongo (about 7%); and the Herero (7%). Those of European descent include the Afrikaner (8%), German (3%), and English (1%).

Only one percent of the hot, dry desert land is arable, though half of the population depend on subsistence agriculture, primarily livestock. There are abundant mineral resources, and rich fisheries on its Atlantic shore. The urban population is increasing at more than double the general population increase. About 40 percent of the people are in urban areas, primarily in the capital, Windhoek. The resulting urban slums create a challenge for the churches.

The gospel entered what was then known as Southwest Africa in 1842 through the Rhenish Mission (German Lutheran). In the first fifty years, about four thousand members were gained. The Finnish Lutherans entered in 1870; in its first forty years, its churches had two thousand baptized Christians. The great growth of both of these groups came under the colonial rule of Germany, then South Africa, in a pattern similar to much of sub-Saharan Africa.

Colonialism meant stability and security for development of a diverse and extensive ministry. The Finnish Mission developed a large missionary and African staff for its ministry through ten high schools, ninety elementary schools, nine hospitals, and eleven dispensaries. By 1955, there were over two hundred thousand members in its associated church. Despite the interruptions of World War I and its aftermath, the Rhenish Mission had comparable growth.

Nearing the end of the twentieth century, more than 50 percent of the population were members of the United Evangelical Church of Southwest Africa, formed in 1970 by union of the works related to the Rhenish Mission and the Finnish Lutheran Mission. Namibia is the only country in Africa with a Lutheran population majority. Another 20 percent of Namibians are members of the Anglican Church, several indigenous churches, and the predominantly white Dutch Reformed Church. Approximately 15 percent are Roman Catholics. As a nation, Namibia has the highest percentage of Christians in Africa, despite increasing nominalism in the last decades of the twentieth century.

A German colony from 1884 to 1919, Namibia was administered and then annexed by South Africa (1949). There was much unrest under South African rule. Opposition to apartheid was led by the churches of Namibia, though they were divided on the issue of support for the guerrilla movement fighting for Namibian independence.

In 1971, African leaders of the United Evangelical Church of Southwest Africa officially condemned apartheid, and later called for independence. They were supported by Anglican and Catholic leaders. SWAPO, the Southwest Africa Peoples’ Organization, identified three necessary elements of a successful revolution: church workers and clergy, workers in the towns, and guerrillas fighting in the bush. The South African government responded by expelling some foreign Christian workers and refusing entry to others.

After a long war that left much unemployment and many refugees, independence was achieved in 1990. Because of their identification with the liberation struggle, the major churches have the wide acceptance necessary to lead Namibia’s diverse groups to reconciliation after the ravages of apartheid and war. Each week, the secular government has given the churches sixty hours of radio time on the national network.

Since 1970, several North American-based evangelical and Pentecostal missions have begun work in Namibia. Together, their memberships are less than 3 percent of Namibians. Two evangelical seminaries and specialized ministries in radio and to children contribute to revitalizing witness in the major church bodies. There are at least three missions based in Namibia, sending personnel (30 to 35 in 1998) to various parts of Namibia and Belgium, South Africa, and Netherlands.

Nation, Nation-Building, Nationalism. A nation is a significant group of people who are so identified with one another in terms of common language, ancestry, history, religion, and culture that they are recognized by others as a distinct entity.

Nationalism is a term that can simply express such a people's sense of belonging together as a nation, with appropriate pride and loyalty to that nation's history and culture. More commonly, however, it is used to refer to the political perspective on international relationships and programs that places loyalty to one's nation as the highest of human virtues. It therefore describes the ideologies that nurture national self-consciousness and the desire for national self-determination.

Although people have always been devoted to their native soil and to the traditions of their ancestors, it was only in the eighteenth century that what we now call “nationalism” came to be recognized as a distinct and potent religiopolitical force with the rise of political units known as “nation-states.” These came to supersede the church, city, or local lord as the focal points for the allegiance of increasing numbers of people. In other words, nations are really historical phenomena, arising out of a particular set of contexts, rather than what might be called natural expressions of human life. The American and French Revolutions are often held up as the first significant manifestations of nationalism in the Western world, and the nineteenth century is usually referred to as the age of nationalisms in Europe.

Of course, similar movements have arisen in Africa and Asia throughout the twentieth century. In its historical context, the rise of African nationalism came as part of a response to European imperialism. However, while it is possible to analyze the emerging non-Western nationalisms solely in terms of a drive toward political independence, economic viability, and cultural emancipation, this would be to vastly undervalue both the importance of the desire to establish personal and national dignity, and the influence of religious beliefs and values.

There are, of course, positive values that are bound up with the concept of nationality. The Bible teaches that God is responsible for the creation of nations (Acts 17:26), and therefore we must assume that to some extent it is right to identify with our nationality and to rejoice in it. It is also easier for properly appointed leaders to govern people who share a common commitment to the larger community. Values such as loyalty and self-sacrifice can be nurtured in a nation that takes a healthy pride in its history and identity. Each national group has developed its own culture, and has thereby made a unique contribution to the life and history of humanity. Countries such as Poland, the United Kingdom, South Africa, and the United States of America have also interwoven a deeply felt Christian conviction with nationalist ideals to produce a powerful, though not unambiguous, sense of mission in the modern world.

All of this can therefore be interpreted as a healthy expression of the inherent dignity of human culture. If individuals, as neighbors, are to love and respect one another, then surely nations should demonstrate the same mutual acceptance and encouragement. Many would see it as a Christian responsibility in the modern world to encourage the development of strong and stable democratic nations, each fully respecting and supporting the others. Such a democratic nationalism is held to benefit Christians in a pluralist world.

However, nationalism is ambivalent by nature. It can also lead to self-serving ideologies and an ambition to marginalize other nations. Nations can become so preoccupied with protecting their own interests that they disregard those of others.

We should not neglect the words of Machiavelli, who epitomized the raising of the state to an end in itself: “Where it is an absolute question of the welfare of our country, we must admit of no considerations of justice or injustice, of mercy or cruelty, of praise or ignominy, but putting all else aside, must adopt whatever course will save its existence and preserve its liberty.” Nationalism, when it reaches this level, leads to xenophobia. In our time, we have seen many examples of “ethnic cleansing” among peoples whose prime motive was the creation of a “pure nation.”

All too often, there is a clear relationship between nationalism and racism. The National Front of Britain published a book in 1977 in which one of its leaders wrote that “racialism is the only scientific and logical basis for nationalism. We seek to preserve the identity of the British nation.” Missiologists are deeply concerned about this nationalistic rationalizing of the desire to marginalize and dominate others, since sin and evil are woven into the fabric of human nature and relationships.

Christian countries and their governments have not been free from the potent interplay of religion and politics in the temptation to dominate other peoples, as in, for example, the marriage between the interests of Christian missions and governmental colonialists in the nineteenth century.

What is more, many Christians would claim, since all people are made in God's image, the fact of a common humanity should be more important than differences based on race or nationality. The Bible is clear that God's love and commitment are given to all people, regardless of nationality or any other human distinction, and it presents the eschatological context for redeemed humanity as a united congregation of people of every nation (Rev. 7:9). Every Christian has a double responsibility in terms of his or her call to mission: as a citizen, to be "the salt of the earth," and as an evangelist, to be "the light of the world" (Matt. 5:13–16). Our nations and their governments, like all authorities, are part of God's provision for his world (Rom. 13:1–7), but they are also accountable to him (Amos 1–2), and Christians must give absolute loyalty to God (Matt. 4:8–10; Acts 4:18–20; Rev. 13).

Missiology has the task of helping churches recognize this, and to clearly distinguish between the desire to obey the Great Commission and the desire to dominate or inappropriately influence others.

NAURU (Est. 2000 pop.: 12,000; 21 sq. km. [8 sq. mi.]). A single island in Oceania between the Solomon Islands and Kiribati, Nauru achieved independence in 1968 after being a German colony, an Australian territory, and a United Nations trust territory. NEE, WATCHMAN (NI TUO-SHENG) (1903–72), Chinese preacher and author. Born in Swatow, China, Nee was converted while a student at Trinity College, Fuzhou. He was influenced by missionary Margaret Barber, and the writings of Jeanne de la Motte Guyon (1648–1717), G. M. Pember, Robert Govett, D. M. Panton, and Jessie Penn-Lewis. From 1926 to 1928 Nee wrote The Spiritual Man, a spiritual compendium based on the trichotomous view of man as body, soul, and spirit. In 1928 he moved to Shanghai, and there edited The Revival, The Bible Record, and in 1930, The Little Flock Hymnal. In 1933 the “London Group” Brethren invited Nee to visit Britain, but broke fellowship with him because Nee attempted to visit T. Austin-Sparks (who deeply influenced his theology) while in London. Nee built his movement of “Assembly Hall” congregations and evangelistic efforts known as “the work,” which grew rapidly in the 1930s and 1940s. In 1938 he preached in Europe; his messages in Helsingør, Denmark, were later transcribed as The Normal Christian Life. His theology is characterized by a heavy emphasis on man as body, soul, and spirit; he calls Christians to be broken in spirit so that the Spirit of God may be released in them. He taught that there should be one church per location; denominational connections are antibiblical. He was later imprisoned by the communist government. He deeply influenced the life and witness of the house churches in mainland China, and numerous Christians outside China. One of his followers, Witness Lee, developed his thought further into the aberration known as the “Local Church Movement,” based in the United States.

NEILL, STEPHEN CHARLES (1900–1984). Scottish mission scholar and missionary to India. Born in Edinburgh to second-generation evangelical Bengal missionary parents, he was converted in 1914. Educated at Trinity College, he served as a CMS missionary in India from 1924 to 1944.

In India Neill mastered the Tamil language and literary culture. He engaged in evangelistic work, dialogue with Hindus, and theological education. Along with other Tamil scholars, he worked on the revision of the Tamil Bible and in other ways promoted production of Christian literature. He also participated in church union discussions leading to the formation of the Church of South

India. His greatest lasting contribution, however, was in his writing. Author of more than sixty-five books as well as articles and reviews, he also coauthored or coedited several volumes and was the chief editor of the World Christian Books series. Among Neill's best-known contributions are A History of the Ecumenical Movement, 1517–1948 (1954), Christian Faith and Other Faiths (1961), A History of Christian Missions (1965), Colonialism and Christian Missions (1966), and Concise Dictionary of the Christian World Mission (1970). A less-known little book, Bhakti: Hindu and Christian (1974), indicates something of the breadth of Neill's scholarship and is of particular interest in India. At the time of his death he was engaged in writing a three-volume history of Christianity in India.

Neo-orthodox Theology. Neo-orthodoxy identifies a broad alliance of theologians, including Karl Barth (1886–1968), Rudolph Bultmann (1884–1976), and Emil Brunner (1889–1966), who were brought together in the wake of World War I by their rejection of nineteenth-century liberal theology's optimistic quest for God in reason, history, and culture. Over against liberalism, this movement reclaimed and reworked some of the Reformation distinctive—God's absolute transcendence and holiness, the sinfulness of humankind, and Jesus Christ as the singular and unique revelation of God—and so the name, "neo-orthodoxy."

However, within a decade this coalition began fragmenting. Bultmann separated, arguing that God's revelation provides faith's self-understanding, not a knowledge of God in himself. For Barth and Brunner, however, God so assumed flesh in Jesus Christ that he is for humanity and determines humanity so that all sinners are elected for glory. In Jesus Christ, God elects to take on himself the judgment that is due humanity for himself. In Jesus Christ, God elects to make himself known and this God saves by grace alone! So Barth concludes that the revelation of God is the "abolition of religion." Since religion is the universal human attempt to find God, all religions, including Christianity, are manifestations of unbelief and works-righteousness (CD I/2:280ff.). Barth is not denying the religions' impressive human achievements, but their value as God's revelation. This critique was further developed and promoted by Hendrick Kraemer (1888–1965).

In view of the opposition between revelation and religion, Barth insists that missionaries must not seek for a point of contact in other religions. For the Word of God does not supplement what one already knows, but overthrows our prior knowledge by requiring repentance, and reveals what we can know in no other way. Similarly, Jesus' reconciling work does not perfect the good humans already possess, but bridges the infinite chasm between the holy God and the rebellious sinner. Faith is simply accepting this fact that Christ has done for us what we cannot do for ourselves. To combine the Word of God with other religions domesticates and subverts revelation. So missions must be pursued with a sincere respect and yet also an equally sincere lack of respect for the religions.

God's Election of Jesus Christ. For Barth election is the sum of the gospel. By electing Jesus Christ, the God-man, God from all eternity determines that he is for humanity and determines humanity for himself. In Jesus Christ, God elects to have himself the judgment that is due humanity so that all sinners are elected for glory. Simply put, election is God's great "Yes" to all humanity in Jesus Christ (CD II/2:94ff.). Contra Calvin and Luther, Barth rejects the notion of a double predestination grounded in an inscrutable decree, for Jesus Christ is the self-revelation of a gracious God.

Barth acknowledges that Christ's reconciling work must be subjectively appropriated through the Spirit to bear fruit. He even concedes that the sinner continually evades Christ and thus lives in danger of being condemned (CD IV/3:465). So the possibility exists that one may reject Jesus Christ, and through this perverse choice involuntarily bear witness to Jesus’ judgment as the rejected one (CD II/2:321). Yet Barth insists that the believer who knows God in Jesus Christ must not assume the ultimate rejection of sinners, and should even pray for God’s gracious mercy in a future universal salvation.

The Church’s Mission. After discussing Christ’s salvific work in his priestly and kingly offices, Barth treats Jesus as the true witness who declares his work of reconciliation and thereby fulfills his prophetic office. God’s work in Jesus Christ makes possible the church’s mission (CD IV/3:830f). Through the Spirit’s work the church fulfills the Lord’s command, “be my witnesses” (Acts 1:8).

Just as Jesus’ mission was for the world, so also the church must serve the world which God reconciled to himself in Jesus Christ (2 Cor. 5:19). However, the world does not define the church’s ministry. Rather the church is always a witness to its Lord, Jesus Christ. Through the term “witness,” Barth reconceives the church as a missionary community, in place of the traditional notion of the church as an end in itself or the institution of salvation. For salvation is God’s work alone. As a witness to God’s reconciling work in Jesus Christ, the church stands at the heart of human history awaiting Christ’s final coming when this new reality of reconciliation will finally appear to all.

Barth elaborates the church’s ministry of “witnessing” broadly under twelve basic forms: praise, preaching, teaching, evangelization, foreign missions, theology, prayer, the cure of souls, personal examples of a Christian life, service to the needy, prophetic action in the world, and fellowship among races and classes. Through these forms of witnessing the church is not simply proclaiming but also making disciples. Consequently, the Christian community is constantly renewed as converts themselves become new disciples and begin witnessing to the gospel.

Neopagan, Neopaganism. The term “neopagan” is attributed to Tim Zell, founder of the Church of All Worlds, who coined it to refer to all worshippers of the Mother Goddess who were not part of the WICCA movement. Followers of the neopagan tradition tend to follow the basic rituals developed by Gerald Gardner, but have added a substantial degree of variety and diversity, depending on their emphasis. Some pagan groups focus on particular cultural religious traditions, such as Celtic, Druidic, Egyptian, or Norse rituals and practices.

Neopagans worship the Great Mother Goddess, who along with her consort the Horned God (Pan), represent the male and female principles basic to life. Through the use of magic neopagans seek to draw on the cosmic powers that underlie the universe in their own personal quest for blessing, success, fertility, and harmony. Worshipers are generally organized into small autonomous groups, often called “ covens.” Worshipers meet semimonthly at new and full moons to worship the Great Mother Goddess and to practice their magic. They generally observe eight major solar festivals, including Halloween (October 31), Yule (December 21), Candlemas (February 2), Spring Equinox (March 21), Beltane (April 30), Summer Solstice (June 21), Lammmas (August 1), and Fall Equinox (September 21).

Nepal (Est. 2000 pop.: 24,842,000; 140,797 sq. km. [54,362 sq. mi.]). Officially Hindu, Nepal also has a considerable Tantric Buddhist influence. Popular Nepali religion is a mixture of Brahmanism and shamanism with elaborate healing rituals, belief in malignant spirits, and astrology. Given this background, it is not surprising that the Christian church in Nepal is of recent origin despite attempts by Catholics and others to plant the gospel in the region. In fact, the story of the church in Nepal is not so much a story of foreign missions and missionaries as it is a record of efforts by Nepali Christians to reach their own people. Nepal was closed to the outside world, but Nepali people managed to seep out into India where they came in contact with Christian missions. Here and there, some Nepali were converted. A number became active evangelists. Foreign-mission influence was secondary. These Nepali Christians organized their own Gorkha Mission. Contacts developed along the border, and there were excursions into Nepal as well.

Revolution in 1950 brought change and the first decade of the church in Nepal. A new democratic monarchical government began an era of reform. St. Xavier’s School was started by the Catholics in 1951. Christian worship began in Kathmandu in 1953, and secret believers eventually were baptized. Three Mar Thoma missionaries founded the Christa Shanti Sangh ashram and took up residence in Kathmandu in 1953. In the same year the Nepal Evangelistic Band received permission to open a hospital at Pokhara. In 1954 Tir Bahadur became the first pastor in the Kathmandu Valley, and the United Mission to Nepal received permission to begin medical work. Other agencies followed: Mission to Lepers, National Missionary Society of India, Seventh-Day Adventists, The Evangelical Alliance Mission. Restrictions were in force, but the missions were wanted to help build a new Nepal. The role of missionary women is significant, but the story of the church in Nepal is primarily a record of Nepali Christians, many of them women, penetrating their country with the gospel.

The second decade, the 1960s, saw dynamic evangelistic expansion and the beginning of church growth in east Nepal and far west Nepal. A new hymnbook and a revised New Testament appeared. The stage was set for great growth in the 1970s and 1980s. Christian organizations such as Wycliffe, Youth for Christ, Operation Mobilization, Far East Broadcasting, Gospel Recordings, and Scripture Union came to Nepal during this time.

In spite of persecution, imprisonment, and other hardships (it was illegal to profess and preach Christ), the churches multiplied, especially since 1980. The church from its inception was indigenous in character and outlook with an emphasis on local leadership development. In the late 1970s and early 1980s discipleship schools and Bible schools came into existence to meet the need for training. Christian witness spread to various parts of the nation. Many people became Christians through healings and other miracles. In 1990 a multiparty government system was reestablished. Christians in prison were released. Since 1990 churches have been growing more rapidly. In 1991 there were more than 50,000 baptized believers in Nepal. The exact number of Christians is not known, but in 1996 was estimated to be 200,000.

Nestorian Mission. The Nestorian movement took the name of Nestorius, who was appointed patriarch of Constantinople in 428 but deposed three years later at the Council of Ephesus over the issue of the relationship of the human and the divine in Christ. His Christology was probably orthodox, although perhaps not stated adequately. Ecclesiastical politics were also involved. The controversy was a factor in the breach between the East and the West, and the church in Persia became Nestorian.

For several centuries the Syriac-speaking Nestorians were one of the most passionately missionary branches of the church. A school was established in Nisibis with a strong focus on spiritual discipline, Bible study, and mission. In the sixth century it had over a thousand students. Nestorians spread their faith through merchants, accountants, bankers, and physicians, as well as missionary monks and priests and in some cases women who married chiefs of central Asian tribes. In the sixth century Nestorians arrived in India, while a mission to the Huns in central Asia evangelized, reduced the language to writing, and taught agriculture.

The best-known mission was to China. A monument discovered in 1623 described the arrival of Alopen, the first missionary, in 635. Churches and monasteries were established. Christian literature was produced, and the movement had the favor of the emperor. It even reached the border of Korea. It died out in the tenth century but experienced a resurgence from the eleventh to thirteenth centuries, when it disappeared again. The reasons for its demise in China appear to have been threefold: overcontextualization to the point of religious syncretism, with inadequate focus on the cross and resurrection; foreign leadership of the church; and strong dependence on the imperial house. The movement disappeared first when the T’ang dynasty fell in the tenth century, and again in the fourteenth century because of government persecution.

Nestorian Christianity reached several central Asian tribes, notably the Uighurs, whose language was reduced to writing in the eighth century. From there it was passed to the Mongols. By the thirteenth century the Keraits were considered Christian. Nestorians often coexisted with Islam and served its leaders as physicians and scholars, even translating a number of Greek philosophical works into Arabic. However, the Christian faith in Asia was eventually exterminated by a combination of Islamic pressure and the massacres of Tamerlane in the fourteenth century. Scattered Nestorian communities, often calling themselves Assyrian Christians, still exist in some areas of the Middle East and the United States.

Netherlands Antilles (Netherlands Autonomous Area) (Est. 2000 pop. 389,000; 961 sq. km. [371 sq. mi.]). Consisting of two groups of islands separated by some 800 km. (500 mi.) in the Caribbean Sea, the primary economic generators are tourism and offshore finance. In 1993 the population was estimated to be 94.5 percent Christian (12.9% Protestant, 78.3% Catholic, and 3.3% marginal). The Catholics trace their origin to missionary work in the sixteenth century, Protestants to Dutch immigration and settlement in 1650. The island of Bonaire is home to the Trans World Radio station transmitter, the largest in the Western hemisphere.

Netherlands (Est. 2000 pop.: 15,934,000; 40,844 sq. km. [15,770 sq. mi.]). The Netherlands is an independent European country located on the North Sea with Germany to the east and Belgium to the south. It is often called Holland after a historic region now a part of the modern nation. The Netherlands is one of the smallest and most densely populated countries in Europe. The population is approximately 15.9 million; more than 40 percent live in the two western provinces of North and South Holland, which include the three largest cities, Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and The Hague. The population is primarily Dutch, with some Indonesians and Surinamese. The national language is Dutch, a Germanic language. English, German, and French are quite commonly studied in most secondary schools.

The Franks established a Dutch church at Utrecht in the seventh century. Willibrord and Boniface significantly advanced the cause of Christianity in the eighth century. Until the rise of prominent local cities around the time of the Crusades, the country remained under the Holy Roman Empire. In the sixteenth century, Holland became a refuge for the followers of the Reformers. After eighty years of intermittent war with Spain from 1568 to 1648, the Protestant-led revolt finally won the Dutch their independence. In the years following, they built a vast overseas empire, becoming for a time the world’s leading maritime and commercial power. In 1794, Napoleon led his French revolutionary forces to invade the Netherlands and set up the Republic of Batavia. The Congress of Vienna liberated the country from France in 1815 and reestablished the United Kingdom of the Netherlands, which included present-day Belgium. The government is a constitutional monarchy with a democratic parliament.

Religion has influenced Dutch history, society, institutions, and attitudes, and is closely related to political life, though to a diminishing degree. Although church and state are separate, a few historical ties remain (e.g., the royal family belongs to the Dutch Reformed Church). Dutch Catholics and Protestants constitute two of the four principal groups on which the three main political parties are based.

Approximately 65 percent of the population is Christian, with 35 percent Roman Catholic and 28 percent Protestant, though there is much secularized Christianity. Both Protestant and Roman Catholic churches have yielded ground to secularization. The large Protestant churches, which are traditional and formal, have become quite liberal in their theology and have focused on theological disputes rather than on missions and evangelism. The Catholic Church is also in a spiritual decline.

Fortunately, many Christian agencies have made some progress within the country to reach people for Christ. For example, Youth with a Mission (YWAM) has reached many of the diverse populations found within Amsterdam. The various media are also proving successful in the proclamation of the gospel in the Netherlands. With such little progress being made in and by the formal churches, at least for now, the future hope for missionary work in the Netherlands appears to be through the various new agencies.

MARKUS WAGNER

Nevius, John Livingston (1829–93). American missionary to China and leading missions theorist. Born into a Presbyterian family in upstate New York, he graduated from Union College, Schenectady, and responded to God’s call to missionary service while studying at Princeton Theological Seminary. He spent forty years as a Presbyterian missionary in China (1853–93), where he was active as an itinerant preacher and evangelist, wrote tracts, and did famine relief. He died of a heart attack in China.

Late in his career, after being invited to speak to Presbyterian missionaries in Korea, Nevius devised the plan of missionary work for which he is best remembered. The so-called Nevius Plan became the Three-Self Plan: self-propagation, self-government, and self-support. It was so well received that the Presbyterians in Korea formally adopted it as mission policy. His plan is credited with the subsequent church growth in Korea after World War II and the Korean War. It shaped the mission strategies of countless evangelical agencies after World War II. Similar theories were developed by Henry Venn and Rufus Anderson, and later by Roland Allen. His plan also included requiring thorough Bible teaching of all converts and wide itineration by missionaries accompanied by national helpers. This was a reversal of the usual mission approach of paying national evangelists to do the preaching. Nevius thought missionaries should spend their time in discipleship training. The issue of self-support seemed primary to Nevius. The traditional system provided money for early church development and then gradually withdrew funds. Nevius was more interested in self-support from the beginning. His plan also called for strict church discipline, cooperation with other missions, and relief help for churches. He did not consider his plan the... final word, and thought it should be modified by local circumstances.

Nevius Method. In June 1890 the Presbyterian Mission in Korea invited John Nevius and his wife, missionaries in China, to give a series of messages on Nevius’s book, The Planting and Developing of Missionary Churches. Though the Neviusites were only in Korea for the two-week missionary conference, the Nevius Method was adopted by the missionaries as the primary means to reach Korea for Christ. Many attribute the rapid growth of the Korean church to the consistent application of the Nevius Method in Korea.

There are nine principles of indigenous church development in the Nevius Method, including an emphasis on personal evangelism through wide itineration; the development of congregations that are self-supporting, self-propagating, and self-governing; the need for systematic Bible study for every Christian; strict discipline in the noninterference in lawsuits; and general help for those in economic need. The heart of the Nevius Method is the three-self formula of indigenous mission work, well known in modern missions strategy (see INDIGENOUS CHURCHES and THREE SELF MOVEMENT [CHINA]).

Resulting from consistent application of the Nevius Method, the Korean church has established itself as a church which places a high emphasis on personal evangelism, self-support (tithing), self-propagation (Christianization of Korea Movement), self-government (strong denominations), and systematic Bible study and prayer (cell-groups).

The Nevius Method is still valid, though not as well implemented as it should be. For example, many church leaders of the developing nations in the Third World are heavily dependent on financial assistance from foreign missionary agencies. This dependence does not help the growth of the national church. The principles of indigenous missions outlined by Nevius are needed today just as they were in the late 1800s in order to strengthen indigenous local churches and speed the evangelization of each nation.

New Age Movement. The New Age movement offers many challenges to missiology and missionary endeavors. Many in the West have rejected atheistic materialism and are openly embracing spiritual ideas and experimenting with spiritual practices that are not Christian, despite some superficial similarities to Christian terminology. Since those caught in this spiritual error must be reached with the gospel, it is imperative to understand their worldview and its weaknesses.

Sociologically, the “New Age movement” is a misnomer because it is neither a unified social movement nor an organized conspiracy, notwithstanding its common themes and emphases. Nevertheless, New Age perspectives are affecting vast segments of Western culture. The American counterculture of the 1960s and early 1970s served as a cultural magnet for a wide variety of non-Christian worldviews. Experimentation with mind-altering drugs was often combined with explorations into oriental religions such as Hinduism, Buddhism, various indigenous pagan traditions such as Druidism and Shamanism, and Western occult practices. Although the flamboyance of the hippie culture is largely gone, many of its animating ideas live on in the New Age movement.

In the late 1980s, many dropped the term “New Age” because of its associations with glitzy and glamorous elements—such as an occult fascination with crystals—that were not reckoned as central to the worldview. In the 1990s essentially New Age ideas are being presented as a “new spirituality,” a generic orientation to life that draws on spiritual strength in a very individualized manner. Although the influence of the New Age movement is global, it is probably the strongest in North America and the West in general (since it appeals more to post-Christian cultures than to pre-Christian situations). The new spirituality is eclectic and syncretistic; however, several common elements emerge.

New Age thinking looks to the self for spiritual power. This orientation is often mixed with a messianic and apocalyptic mood emphasizing the urgent need for massive individual and social renewal to solve the personal, social, and international problems facing the planet. As one New Age slogan puts it, “The only way out is in.” Individuals and societies can only evolve harmoniously and usher in the New Age by tapping into the power within. New Age luminary Deepak Chopra claims in his best-selling book The Seven Laws of Spiritual Success (1994) that we all have unlimited potential to create wealth and happiness, once we awaken from the illusion of limitation and inadequacy. Chopra claims that we are all gods and goddesses. Pantheism is at the heart of the New Age; its god is an impersonal and amoral field, force, principle, power, or substance that is the one true reality. God is not respected as a personal and moral Creator who is ontologically separate from his creation.

New Age Movement
New Age Movement

Second, this new spirituality stresses the unity of all things (MONISM). Humans are not separated from each other, from the planet, from the universe, or from God. All is one. Chopra uses pseudo-scientific terms to dub this oneness a quantum field of pure potentiality. The theme of monism unites most New Age thinking, although the emphasis on the individual’s unique spiritual journey contradicts the ancient monistic Hindu teaching that individuality is nonexistent and illusory. The New Age effort to accommodate Western individualism while retaining an essential monism is deeply problematic.

A third essential New Age belief is that our consciousness must be transformed if we are to harness the power of our divinity. A number of spiritual practices, such as YOGA, visualization, MEDITATION, hypnosis, and consciousness-raising seminars, are recommended as means to the end of self-realization or God-realization, which are viewed as synonymous. The Transcendental Meditation (TM) movement, for example, has been instrumental in the West since the late 1960s in initiating millions into a Hindu form of yoga, which has been disingenuously presented as a religiously neutral self-help method. Many New Age books and seminars also promote the spiritual benefits purportedly available through contact with angels or other spiritual entities, which are understood in unbiblical terms (see Isa. 8:19–20; Col. 2:18–19; 1 John 4:1–4).

A new slant on New Age ideas comes from the culture of computer networks known as “cyberspace.” Some claim that the electronic connections achieved through the Internet form a type of mystical, unified consciousness. Visionaries speak of “technoshamanism” as an electrically enhanced tool for spiritual awareness. Timothy Leary, LSD guru of the counterculture, was influential in advancing these ideas.

Fourth, this new spirituality emphasizes a pleasant view of the afterlife, usually involving a benign view of REINCARNATION. Many accounts of near-death experiences speak of the peace and light of the afterlife where there is no hell to fear and no holy God to face. The categories of heaven and hell (Matt. 25:46) are rejected as rigid, negative, and dualistic.

Fifth, New Agers are syncretistic, which forces them to reject the exclusive and absolute claims of Christ (John 14:6; Acts 4:12). For them, the mystical essence of all religions is pantheistic monism. Therefore, Christ is viewed as a master or guru who taught that we could attain his status by tapping into the “Christ consciousness.” The view that he is “God’s only son” (John 3:16) is dismissed as parochial.

Sixth, since all is one and we are all divine, a sense of absolute, objective, universal, and transcendent moral authority vanishes for many New Agers. A phrase commonly heard is that “we create our own reality,” which means we are under no higher ethical standard (see Isa. 5:20).

Missiologists, missionaries, and others must develop an APOLOGISTIC and an evangelistic strategy adequate to refute the New Age worldview (1 Peter 3:15–16; Jude 3). This entails subjecting pantheism, monism, OCCULTISM, reincarnation, SYNCRETISM, and RELATIVISM to exacting critiques, both logically and theologically (2 Cor. 10:3–5). Such an endeavor will expose: (1) the hollowness of an impersonal and amoral deity that cannot possibly love anyone, since it is impersonal; (2) the illogic of a monism that denies the pluralities we presuppose in everyday life; (3) the dangers of occultism and the reality of Satan and his fallen angels; (4) the lack of evidence for and the illogic of reincarnation; (5) the fact that syncretism is false, since religions make contradictory truth-claims; and (6) the errors of RELATIVISM that deny the essential and objective ethical categories of morality.

Constructively, we must set forth the cogency of the Christian worldview, particularly with respect to the uniqueness and supremacy of Jesus Christ as the one mediator between sinful humans and a holy God (1 Tim. 2:5). This will demand sound EXEGESIS (since New Agers misinterpret Scripture) and historical argumentation concerning the reliability of the Bible and its superiority to other supposed revelations about Christ. It will also involve earnest prayer for the spiritual protection, wisdom, humility, and courage required to face a very seductive and influential spiritual counterfeit (2 Cor. 11:14; Eph. 6:10–18).

DOUGLAS GROOTHUIS

New Apostolic Reformation Missions. The New Apostolic Reformation is an extraordinary work of God at the close of the twentieth century which is, to a significant extent, changing the shape of Protestant Christianity around the world. For almost 500 years, Christian churches have largely functioned within traditional denominational structures of one kind or another. Particularly in the 1990s, but with roots going back for almost a century, new forms and operational procedures are now emerging in areas such as local church government, interchurch relationships, financing, evangelism, missions, prayer, leadership selection and training, the role of supernatural power, worship and other important aspects of church life. Some of these changes are being seen within denominations themselves, but for the most part they are taking the form of loosely structured apostolic networks. In virtually every region of the world, these new apostolic churches constitute the fastest growing segment of Christianity.

One of the strong characteristics of the new apostolic churches is the conscious desire to reinstate the ministry and office of apostle, whether the term itself is used or not. Churches which characterize themselves as apostolic in nature have outreach built into their very fabric. This includes outreach and church planting in their own surroundings and social ministries as well as foreign missions. The strong desire to be directly involved in taking the gospel to the nations of the world is reminiscent of the upsurge of world missions among traditional evangelical churches after World War II.

During the last quarter of the twentieth century the more traditional Western missionary agencies have been in notable decline, while Third World-based missionary agencies have been strongly increasing (see NON-WESTERN MISSION BOARDS AND SOCIETIES). Many of these Third World agencies have emerged from the new apostolic churches in their midst. An important part of their methodology is to recognize apostolic leaders in foreign nations, build personal relationships with them, and encourage the formation and multiplication of apostolic networks which relate to each other in non-bureaucratic, non-controlling ways. The local congregation frequently becomes the principal launching pad for overseas missions, somewhat to the dismay of traditional mission agencies, both denominational and interdenominational. Ted Haggard, pastor of new Life Church of Colorado Springs, said this at a National Symposium on the Post-denominational Church held at Fuller Seminary in 1996: "[The New Apostolic Reformation] is the 'black market' of Christian ministry. Because the lost of the world are demanding prayer and the message of the Gospel, the demand is forcing us to work outside normally accepted missions methods to satisfy the cry for eternal life in the hearts of people."

A common characteristic of new apostolic churches is for the senior pastor to lead teams of lay people on at least one, and more frequently two or three, mission trips to different nations each year. These are usually facilitated through personal relationships with apostolic figures in the nations visited, and they last for a week or two. Stated immediate objectives of these trips vary greatly from supporting the preaching and teaching ministry of the senior pastor to undertaking a construction project, to street evangelism, to prayer journeys to social service projects to literature distribution to other similar activities. However, a more fundamental reason for this kind of an ongoing program is the benefit of a constantly increasing level of missions interest and commitment throughout the local church. Almost invariably the individuals who take these trips return as transformed persons. Missions is no longer peripheral to them, but an essential part of their personalities. And this permeates through their respective spheres of influence in the church. How much can one local church be involved in missions? A new apostolic church of 2,500 in Anaheim, California, Grace Korean Church, pastored by Kim Kwang Shin, has an annual church budget of $6.5 million, of which $5 million is spent on foreign missions in East Africa, Russia, mainland China, Vietnam, and other places.

David Shibley of Global Advance, one of the foremost trainers of new apostolic missionaries, lists six reasons why new apostolic churches are making such a significant contribution to world evangelization: (1) less bureaucracy; (2) a high view of Scripture; (3) the expression of signs and wonders for the verification of the gospel; (4) strategic-level spiritual warfare and advanced intercession; (5) advanced praise and worship; and (6) apostolic networking (Ministry Advantage, July–August 1996, p. 8).

New Caledonia (French Overseas Territory) (Est. 2000 pop.: 195,000; 18,700 sq. km. [7,220 sq. mi.]). New Caledonia, a French Overseas Territory, is an island in the southwest Pacific Ocean east of Australia. Although the French are the most numerous ethnic group, representing about 25% of the population, there are nearly 50 other ethnic groups as well. The population is over 87% Christian, including over 71% Roman Catholic. Active evangelical groups include Eglise Evangeliques Autonome with over 20,000 members, Eglise Evangélique Libre with 9,000 members, and Assemblies of God with 2,600 members.

New Covenant. The term new covenant is usually used in contrast to the old covenant of Moses found in the Old Testament (John 1:17). But the Old Testament contains more than one covenant, and most are related to mission. God made a covenant with Noah (Gen. 8:21–9:17) on which Paul based his appeal to his audience at Lystra (Acts 14:14–18). This cosmic or Noahic covenant, made with human beings in creation, is one part of the salvation story (Rom. 1:19–20), incomplete in itself and yet of continuing validity in evangelism. God covenants not to destroy again sinful humankind by a flood, promises to sustain life on earth, warns against sin, and establishes the cycle of seasons. This state of humanity is an expression of God’s will.

God’s covenant with Abraham (Gen. 12:3; see ABRAHATIC COVENANT), his election of Israel to be the mediator of his salvation to the nations (Exod. 19:5–8), and his covenant with David to establish his eternal kingdom through David's descendant (2 Sam. 7:11–16) all look forward to the new covenant. Jeremiah foretold of the coming of this new covenant, when external rules would be replaced by the internal control of the living Spirit of God (Jer. 31:33–37).

The choice of Abraham and the election of Israel do not mean that the peoples of the earth are ignored or rejected. Neither, however, do any of the old covenants require that Israel seek actively by specific missionary activity to proclaim God to the nations. God's movement toward the nations is always with reference to their relation to Israel as God's people. As the nations see God's action in judgment and salvation in Israel, they may then share in the blessing of the elect nation. (Ps. 67:1–2).

Karl Barth comments:

... it is precisely the covenant of Yahweh with a unique Israel, of Israel with a unique God ... far from being an end in itself ... that has meaning, revelation, real and dynamic import for the relation between God and all peoples, men of all peoples. (Blauw, 1962, 28)

Jesus comes as the elect and covenanted Servant of God who will "restore the tribes of Jacob ... (be) a light for the Gentiles ... (and) bring my salvation to the ends of the earth" (Isa. 42:1; 49:6).

The early ministry of Jesus in the New Testament, with occasional exceptions, was focused on reaching and renewing the "lost sheep of Israel" (Matt. 10:6). But he was also building a new community—a community of the covenant. This becomes clear during the last week of his earthly ministry when he instituted the Last Supper. Two things are of particular importance in the Matthean account (Matt. 26:26–30). By speaking of the "blood of the covenant," Jesus was reminding his disciples how Moses ratified the old covenant by sprinkling the blood of bulls on the altar and the people (Exod. 24:6–8). The blood of the new covenant—of Jesus' pending sacrifice—was "poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins." This covenant then went beyond blessing for Israel. It was for the peoples of the world. As believers everywhere celebrate the Lord's Supper, they are reminded of Jesus' sacrifice and of the need to make him known everywhere until Christ's return.

Paul elaborates on this by pointing out how the sacrifice of Christ destroyed the barrier between Jews and Gentiles (Eph. 2:11–22). This truth became the theological foundation enabling the early church to break out of its Jewish cocoon and realize that no people were "impure or unclean"—all could receive salvation through trust in Jesus who is the Way, the Truth, and the Life.

The author of Hebrews repeatedly refers to the blood of Christ and his one sufficient sacrifice—the central content of the new covenant—as being far superior to every feature of the old covenant. He notes the redemptive aspects of this covenant: forgiveness of sins (7:27, 8:12), being redeemed from sin (9:15), freedom from guilt (10:2), cleansing from an unclean conscience (9:14), a living way into the presence of God (10:22), and an eternal inheritance (9:15). The blessings of the new covenant are to the end that "we may serve the living God" (9:14).

With the theological foundation established by the new covenant, Jesus summoned his disciples to the mountain top in Galilee. Here he reminded them that they, as the beginning of the new covenant community, had a weighty responsibility, to reach out in a centrifugal mission activity, making disciples of all peoples. He assured them of his total authority and his eternal presence for this task. This new ministry was not merely a matter of obedience. It required the activity of the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of the new covenant (John 29:22; 2 Cor. 3:6, 17–18).

With confidence, then, the disciples proclaimed that "God has made this Jesus, whom you crucified both Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36). Initially uncertain of the cultural expectations to be placed upon Gentile believers, they finally concluded that God had no favorites (Acts 10:34) and salvation was only through the grace of Jesus Christ (Acts 15:11). God's chosen servant, with whom he had made a covenant (Isa. 42:6), was the only source of salvation (Acts 4:12) and the "one mediator between God and humans" (1 Tim. 2:5). Under this banner, the message of salvation was spread throughout the Roman Empire (Acts 1:8; 28:28–31).

The question "what about those who have never heard" was not raised explicitly by the early believers. They assumed that they and those to follow them would take the message everywhere. With great zeal and sacrifice missionaries through the ages have sought to complete Christ's GREAT COMMISSION. Now that we know the task may not be completed in the foreseeable future, some missiologists are rethinking the "cosmic covenant" that God made with Noah. Is there a wider hope by which the unevangelized may receive the blessings of the new covenant without explicitly naming the name of Jesus? Even as through God's common GRACE some in the Old Testament—Abel, Enoch, Melchizedek, Job, Naaman, Rahab—had a relationship with God, is this probable, or even possible, now?

Thinkers like John Hick and Paul Knitter have opted for radical PLURALISM or UNIVERSALISM which affirms that all the unevangelized will be saved. The traditional evangelical view is that there is no hope for salvation for those who have not heard the message of Jesus and placed their hope in him. The “wider hope,” now espoused by a number of evangelicals, posits the possibility of evangelization at or after death or universally accessible salvation apart from evangelization. The latter view is called “inclusivism” by its adherents who believe that salvation comes only through Christ as God works through general revelation and providence. The unevangelized need not have explicit knowledge of Christ and the sacrifice of the new covenant in order to be saved. John Sanders states, “God’s salvific will is universal, and that is clearly manifested in the universal covenants of Genesis, which were neither revoked nor replaced by later covenants” (1992, 218).

The more recent statements of these views, theoretical at best, cannot negate the call of Christ in the new covenant actively to make disciples of all the peoples of the world. “He is the atoning sacrifice for our sins, and not only for ours but also for the sins of the whole world” (1 John 2:2).

New Delhi Assembly (1961). The Third Assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) met in New Delhi, India, in November 1961. Unlike the two previous assemblies (AMSTERDAM, 1948; Evanston, 1954), New Delhi was precisely planned, crisply administered, and pragmatically efficient. The location in India was in sharp contrast to the western cities of Amsterdam and Chicago. The assembly was composed of 577 voting members, with a total of 1,006 persons participating.

New Delhi avoided the speculative theological themes addressed earlier, and prepared reports on witness, service, and unity. Four developments give New Delhi its significance in ecumenical history.

First, the enlargement of membership was dramatic. Twenty-three different communions joined the Council. The Russian Orthodox Church, with its satellites from Bulgaria, Romania, and Poland, joined, making the Orthodox tradition the largest communion of the WCC. Two large denominations of Pentecostals from Chile also became members.

Next, the Roman Catholic Church sent five official observers, giving New Delhi a status that had never been achieved previously by an assembly of the WCC.

Third, the confessional basis of the WCC was theologically reinforced, emphasizing the deity of Christ and the authority of the Bible. The trinitarian and biblical aspects of the basis were strengthened, which pleased the evangelicals and the orthodox.

Fourth, ecumenical history was made by the merger of the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL (IMC) with the WCC. Although the merger had been discussed during the formative years of the WCC, the IMC had decided to maintain its separate identity. After 1958, however, negotiations with the ecumenical councils, and tremendous pressure from the WCC, led to the incorporation of the IMC into the WCC. The work of the IMC consequently became the responsibility of the newly created COMMISSION ON WORLD MISSION AND EVANGELISM of the WCC. New Delhi marked the end of one era and the beginning of another in ecumenical missions history.

New Religious Movements. The term “New Religious Movement” (NeRM) lacks precise definition but has become the term of choice among scholars in a conscious attempt to eliminate the more sensational and pejorative connotations of “cult” or “deviant religion.” In general, the term is used to identify religious groups that adhere to a theological perspective and a structure or pattern of religious behavior that is self-consciously distinct from the dominant society. The group may be “new” in the innovative sense in which distinctly original religious visions and structures are developed in the context of the existing religious milieu (MORMONISM in the United States and BABA’I in Iran). The term may also apply to mainline or marginal subgroups within established religious traditions that are imported whole into a new social and religious setting (Hare Krishnas in the United States and Mormonism in Asia).

NeRMs share a set of characteristics. The relative force of each characteristic will vary, but in general NeRMs are marked by strong charismatic leadership, clear boundary markers between members of the group and society at large that reflect and intensify the necessity of a high level of commitment, a claim to have access to or possession of Truth that is not available to anyone outside the group, and a pronounced emphasis on personal needs and experience.

While the emergence of new religions is as old as history itself, the last half of the twentieth century has been a remarkably fruitful time for the development and growth of NeRMs. This is a worldwide phenomenon and reflects the power of broad social trends characteristic of the mod-
New Religious Movements

Modern migration movements have placed numerous societies in direct contact with a wide range of alternative religious traditions, greatly increasing opportunities for interpersonal religious interchange. Being confronted with a Buddhist neighbor is significantly different than being confronted merely with Buddhist philosophy.

The post–World War II era has seen a marked decline in the power of established institutions to retain broad-based loyalty and commitment. Political and social institutions also reflect this change, but it has become increasingly characteristic of the modern religious landscape. This breakdown in the power of institutions is tied to the rise of individualism. Individualism acts as a two-edged sword, at once freeing persons to seek individual choices outside the constraints of social conformity while also leaving persons isolated and alone, highly responsive to the message of communal wholeness characteristic of many NeRMs.

The rise of relativism as the dominant ethical ethos of modern life, when combined with the social changes noted, helps reinforce a climate of moral and spiritual confusion. The most successful religious responses to this general climate of confusion have been a call to return to the old paths (worldwide fundamentalism) and the quest for new paths to an unknown future (NeRMs).

Beyond these generalized characteristics of the modern age, there appear to be specific social and cultural conditions that are particularly conducive to the rise of NeRMs:

- Secularization—decline of the authority and status of established religious institutions for participation in public discourse
- Generational discontinuity—the loss of confidence among youth in the ability of the values, institutions, and mores of the mature generation to meet the political, economic, social, and religious needs of the future
- Religious freedom—the lack of political and social constraint on personal religious orientation and practice

Postwar Japan is a classic case where these factors have coalesced to form a very fertile field for NeRMs. There are over 11,000 distinct Buddhist groups in Japan, the great majority formed in the postwar era (see also Japanese New Religious Movements).

While the twenty-first century has every potential of being most hospitable to NeRMs, the fact remains that the vast majority of NeRMs do not succeed in attracting and holding a significant following. In the United States nearly 75 percent of persons who join such movements leave within the first two years. The Mormon experience is a rare exception. Even those movements that appear to succeed remain quite marginal. In the United States the Hare Krishna never numbered more committed disciples than the average Sunday morning attendance of one large evangelical church. However, there are factors that generally mark off the more successful movements:

- A balance between continuity and tension with the dominant culture. Successful NeRMs must provide an alternative, but they cannot be too different.
- Effective charismatic leadership that balances a new vision with sufficient organizational skill.
- Strong internal relationships and clear boundary lines that mark off the group as distinct, if not unique, but do not result in complete isolation.
- Sufficient socialization of children that limits defections and ensures continuity.

Evangelicals generally characterize and respond to NeRMs in terms of their distance or deviation from orthodox Christian belief and practice. This theological approach is centered on an analysis of truth claims and should be motivated by a concern for the truth and for persons. It is wise and prudent for evangelical Christians to learn about the theology, practice, and methods of expansion of NeRMs and be prepared to speak the truth of the gospel of Christ in love. However, considerable caution should be exercised in linking those efforts with the secular anticult movement that carries a strong antireligious bias, affirms the right of the state to control religion, and is not constrained by Christian ethical concerns.

New Testament Theology of Mission. The New Testament is first and foremost a missionary document in the sense that it details the carrying out of God's plan of salvation for the world. Perhaps the best single portrayal of this is the "chain of revelation" in the Gospel of John, in which God reaches the world first through Jesus as the Sent One. Then the Father and Son "send" the Holy
New Testament Theology of Mission

Spirit and finally the Godhead “sends” the disciples to encounter the world with the demands of God and thereby to force decision. The means by which this is accomplished is called “mission,” which technically, in John, means the process of sending chosen heralds with the gospel message of salvation.

Theology of Mission in the Gospels and Acts.

One positive result of redaction criticism is the realization that each Gospel contains its own portrayal of Jesus and its own theological emphasis (see also JESUS AND MISSION). We will begin with Mark because of the likelihood that Mark was the first Gospel. The centrality of mission in Mark can be seen in the framing of Mark’s prologue with “gospel” (1:1, 15). Jesus comes as one proclaiming the “good news” about the “kingdom of God,” calling for “repentance” and “faith-decision” (1:14, 15). The kingdom refers to the in-breaking of God’s rule into history. Jesus taught it as both present (Mark 3:27; cf. Matt. 12:28; Luke 17:20–21) and future (Mark 1:15; cf. Luke 21:31). The disciples are thus heralds of the kingdom message, calling the lost to God. In this sense there is a progression of agents, from the prophets (12:2–5) to John the Baptist (1:2–3; 11:32) to the disciples, who from the start are “apostles” or “sent ones” (3:13–15), to the Son himself (1:38; 9:37). The disciples are called from the start to be “fishers of men” and to leave everything to do so (1:16–20; 10:28). Jesus warns them to expect terrible opposition (13:9–13) in their mission to the nations (13:10) but tells them that their task is worldwide proclamation (3:14; 14:9). Jesus’ way is one of suffering (8:31; 9:30–31; 10:33–34), and the disciples are called to imitate Christ by “bearing their cross” with Jesus (8:34). One of Mark’s major themes is discipleship failure (6:52; 8:14–21; 9:14–32; 14:27, 32–41, 50–52; 16:8) but Jesus provides the answer when he promises to meet them as Risen Lord and overcome their weaknesses (14:28; 16:7). In the midst of failure to understand and remain faithful, the disciple in mission is promised the presence of the Risen Lord.

Matthew’s mission theme is built upon Mark’s but expands several emphases. At the outset, there is an antithesis. Matthew has the greatest emphasis on particularism, that the mission is only for the Jews (10:5, 6; 15:24). At the same time, the Gentile mission is given an important place from the start, as the Gentile Magi are the first to come (drawn by a divinely sent star) to worship the newborn Messiah (2:1f.). In short, Matthew is a salvation-historical chronicle of the movement of God’s plan of salvation in three stages: from the mission of the prophets (23:37; cf. 21:34–36; 22:3–6) and John the Baptist (3:1–12; 11:7–14) to the mission of Jesus that is the core of the first Gospel to the mission of the disciples to the nations that concludes the Gospel (28:18–20). Each stage prepares for the following step. The Jewish mission is the core of the first two stages, and the universal mission is the goal of the third. In this sense “the gospel of the kingdom” called both Jews (4:23; 9:35) and “all nations” (24:14) to repentance. In fact, the mission to the Jews was in reality the first stage of the universal mission, which in Matthew is linked to the eschaton (13:24–30; 24:14). A major theme in mission is rejection, as the disciples must expect the same hatred and persecution as Jesus suffered (10:17–36; see vv. 24–26 on sharing Jesus’ suffering). But the goal of it all is to bring the Jewish people and the nations to faith (a key element in the miracle stories) and obedience. (The ethical requirements of the kingdom are central to the Sermon on the Mount.)

Mission in Luke–Acts is at the heart of the New Testament emphasis. The two should be considered together, for they form two volumes of a single story, detailing the divine plan of salvation as it moves from Jesus to the early church. In fact, one of the major themes of Acts is that the church relives and carries on the life and ministry of Jesus, seen in parallels between Luke and Acts in miracle stories, the road to Jerusalem/Rome, and the trials of Jesus and Paul. The two points of continuity between the life of Jesus and the church’s mission are the temple (inaugurating both volumes) and the Holy Spirit (central to both). Soteriology is the primary theme, with the three major aspects coming together in Luke 24:47—repentance (25 times in Luke–Acts vs. 10 total in the other Gospels), forgiveness of sins (9 in Luke–Acts vs. 3 total in the rest of the New Testament), and proclamation of the gospel (the heart of Acts; see proclamation evangelism). In Luke we have salvation procured for the world, and in Acts we have salvation proclaimed to the world. In preparation for Acts, the universal mission is even more emphasized in Luke than in the other Synoptic Gospels, as in: (1) Simeon calling Jesus “a light of revelation for the Gentiles” (2:32); (2) 3:4–6, Luke adds to the Isaianic “voice in the wilderness” (Isa. 40:3–4) the statement in 40:5, “And all mankind will see God’s salvation”; (3) Jesus’ inaugural address of 4:18–27, which concludes with a turn from the Jews to the Gentiles (vv. 25–27); (4) Jesus’ deliberate ministry to Gentiles (7:1f.; 8:26f.; 17:11f.); (4) Jesus stressing Gentile openness (7:9; 11:30–32; 13:29).

All this comes to fruition in Acts, as the mission is launched in two stages, Jesus’ resurrection command (1:8) and the coming of the Spirit to launch the mission (2:1–12). Yet it takes time for the church to understand God’s will. They apparently understood Jesus in terms of the Old Testament centripetal approach (see Old Testament Theology of Mission), for they remained in Jerusalem, seemingly waiting for the Gentiles to come to them. The Spirit had to force them out in a series of steps to the Gentile mission, first in the PERSECUTION following STEPHEN’s manifesto (8:1–3), then Samaria (8:4–25) and the Ethiopian eunuch (8:26–40), followed by the conversion of Paul, the missionary to the Gentiles (ch. 9), and finally the conversion of Gentile Cornelius (ch. 10). At each stage, supernatural leading was evident. The missionary journeys demonstrated several themes: evangelism and follow-up; flexible methods demonstrating sensitivity to culture; home-based church planting methods; the CONTEXTUALIZATION of the gospel for both urban and rural settings; and primarily the centrality of the empowering presence of the HOLY SPIRIT. Acts might better be entitled “The Acts of the Holy Spirit through the Apostles.” It is the work of the Spirit that is carried out by the church, and the Spirit sends, guides, and empowers the human agents in carrying out God’s mission.

An important subsidiary element in Luke–Acts is the ministry of Jesus and the church to the outcasts. Luke wants to show that the kingdom completely reverses all earthly mores, and so shows that Jesus and the disciples are especially oriented to the poor and the oppressed, as in the quotation from Isaiah 61:1–2 in the inaugural address of Luke 4:18–19, “The Spirit of the Lord . . . has anointed me to preach good news to the poor. . . .” This continues throughout Luke’s Gospel (1:51–53; 3:11–14; 6:20–26; 12:13–33; 16:8b–13, etc.) and Acts (2:44–45; 4:32–35, etc.). The debate between EVANGELISM AND SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY in modern missions would be a false one for Luke. For him, to have one without the other produces a truncated gospel.

Mission in John has often been overlooked. Several recent studies have shown that mission is at the heart of John’s purpose, which was twofold—to bring unconverted Jews to Christ, and to involve the church in God’s mission. Let us begin with the “chain of revelation” introduced above. (1) In the prologue Jesus is called the “Word” (1:1, 2, 14), which means he is the “living revealer” of the Father; to meet Jesus is to “know” (two words used 141 times), and “see” (five verbs used 114 times). God’s universal salvific love (1:4, 7, 9; 3:16) has brought salvation to the world and called it to respond to the new “life” (66 times in John) in Jesus. (2) In the farewell discourse, the Holy Spirit as the parasēleitē (the best translation is probably “Advocate”) is also a “sent one,” being given or sent twice by the Father (14:16, 25) and twice by the Son (15:26; 16:7). He will carry the “witness” of the Father and the Son (15:26) into the new age begun by Christ. (3) The followers of Jesus become “sent ones” (17:18; 20:21) and continue the mission to the world. In the resurrection commission of 20:21–23, they are sent by the entire Godhead and filled with the divine presence. Furthermore, they continue Jesus’ function as judge (5:22, 30; 8:15–16; 9:39) in verse 23, for as the world responds to their mission, “whatsoever sins you forgive are forgiven, and whatsoever sins you retain are retained.”

Mission Theology in Paul (see also PAUL AND MISSION). It is difficult to capture the message of so voluminous and deep a thinker as Paul. Virtually everything in his ministry and writings touches on the concept of mission, so all we can do is highlight key aspects. Before the Damascus road experience, Paul was a committed Jewish particularist, and so his conversion completely reversed his direction in life and all that he stood for. Paul’s commission to mission came in three stages—the voice of Christ (Acts 26:16–18; cf. Gal. 1:15–16), the confirmation of Ananias (9:15), and a later vision in the temple (22:21). From that time Paul viewed himself as a pioneer missionary with a global rather than local vision (2 Cor. 10:15–16) who sought to bring the gospel to “those who have not heard” (Rom. 10:14). Those brought to Christ were his “joy and crown” (1 Thess. 2:19) and “the seal of my apostleship in Christ” (2 Cor. 1:19–20), who sought to bring the gospel to “all the Gentiles” (Rom. 11:15). Paul’s commission to mission included a vision for the Gentiles (ch. 28), and the vision of Christ’s eschatological mission to the world (Rom. 11:26). Mission is thereby an eschatological unfolding, a culmination of the divine intent from eternity past. In its united mission the church manifests the “manifold wisdom of God” to the cosmic powers, telling them in effect that they have lost. This victory is based upon the sovereignty of God and upon the cosmic reconciliation of “all things in heaven and earth” achieved by Christ (Col. 1:19–20). According to Colossians 2:15 Christ achieved this victory “after the cross when he disarmed,” “triumphed over,” and “made public display” (imagery of the Roman triumph) of the evil POWERS. The church participates in this reconciling and triumphant work by “proclaiming” the “hope of the Gospel” to “every creature under heaven” (Col. 1:23). The universal mission is the great mystery of God, and it needs the focus and priority of the people of God.

For Paul eschatology, Christology, and soteriology intertwine. The redemptive-historical act of God in Jesus is the basis of mission. All of history points to the life and sacrificial death of Christ on the cross as its mid-point. The sin and guilt brought about by Adam have now been expiated by the gracious gift of Christ (Rom. 5:12–21), leading to the justification of the sinner (Rom. 3:21–26). The creeds and hymns of the early church reflect upon the humiliation/exaltation of Christ (Rom. 1:3–4; Eph. 1:3–14; Phil. 2:6–11; Col. 1:15–20; 1 Tim. 3:16), and the unbeliever participates in this via faith-decision and confession (Rom. 10:9–10). This gracious and merciful act of God provides the content of mission. Paul believed strongly in a contextualized message and strategy in which the missionary became “all things to all people” in any area not contrary to the gospel “in order to win some” (1 Cor. 9:19–23). He adapted his message to reach the people where they were, centering on fulfillment of Scripture for Jews (Acts 13:16–43) and upon natural revelation for Gentiles (see Acts 14:14–18; 17:22–31).

Mission Theology in the General Epistles.
The General Epistles do not all center upon mission. Some are primarily pastoral, like James, 2 Peter–Jude, or the Johannine epistles. The two that contain mission principles are Hebrews and 1 Peter. Hebrews defines itself as a “word of exhortation” (13:22), a pastoral homily addressing a church tempted to return to Judaism due to persecution. There are two primary themes, christology (the superiority of Christ) and soteriology (the pilgrimage theme). God is the one who completes his revelatory acts by speaking through his Son, the culmination of his plan (1:1–3). Indeed, all of Scripture points to fulfillment in him. Thereby he is superior to the angels (1:4–2:18), to Moses and Joshua (chs. 3–4), to the priesthood (chs. 5–7), and to the covenant, sanctuary, and sacrifices (ch. 8–10). Christ is not only the Son exalted to the right hand of God (1:2–3; 8:1; 10:12) but also has authority over this creation (1:2, 8, 10) and the angelic orders (1:9).

Christ alone has made salvation possible by his once for all sacrifice (9:12, 26–28; 10:10–14). Hebrews does not discuss a mission to the Gentiles, but there is a witness theme. Like the heroes of the faith in chapter 11, who witness with their sacrificial lives (12:1), and like Jesus, who is the final model of those who are willing to “resist to the point of shedding blood” (12:2–4), believers are called to a life of pilgrimage. They must run the “race” (12:1–2) and consider themselves “strangers” in this world (11:9, 13), oriented not to the present but to a future reality, “a better country—a heavenly one” (11:10, 16). This means a willingness to “bear the disgrace (Christ) bore” (13:13). The contribution of Hebrews to a mission theology deals with the negative side, rejection and persecution, as the people of God witness through suffering.

First Peter is also written to a suffering church, and like Hebrews it calls for believers to consider themselves called by God to be temporary visitors and resident aliens on this earth (1:1, 17; 2:11). The message of this book is that the mission, when conducted in the midst of terrible hostility, calls upon the believers to witness via exemplary lives of goodness. The theme is given in 2:12: when the pagans slander you as being evildoers, let your conduct so shine that they observe your goodness, are convicted by it, and “glorify God in the day of visitation” (see also 2:15). “Glorify God” means they are converted and then glorify God at the last judgment. Peter then shows how this works out in the three primary relationships Christians have—to government (2:13–17), to master-slave (2:18–25) and then wife-husband (3:1–7) relationships. Christ is the model for a proper reaction to hostility, for he refused to retaliate and instead entrusted himself to God (2:21–24). So his followers must also become models of faith and goodness when the world turns against them (4:19). That is their mission. For Peter mission is an eschatological journey, done in light of the blessings of salvation (1:3–12; 2:4–10) and at all times looking forward to the culmination of mission in eternity (1:4; 2:22; 4:7). With this in mind, in spite of persecution the people of God are always ready to respond to queries with gentleness and a life that proves the validity of the gospel (3:15–16).

Mission Theology in Revelation. Many have said that there is no mission in this book, since it deals with cosmic war and the end of human history. However, a close study shows a distinct and profound message. The major theme of the book is the Sovereignty of God, and in the cosmic war the sub-theme is the futility of Satan. Divine control is subsumed in the verb “was given” which occurs often in two key passages, the four horsemen of the Apocalypse (6:2, 4, 8) and the coming of the Beast (13:5, 7). This verb tells us that God (the giver) is in control of the forces of evil. They can do nothing without his permission. Moreover, everything Satan does is merely a parody or great imitation of what God has already done perfectly, such as the mortal wound healed (= resurrection), the mark of the beast (= God sealing the saints), the false trinity of 16:13. Armageddon is not the great defeat of Satan. It is actually his final act of defiance, for the war was won by the “slain Lamb” on the cross (the predominant title of Christ in the book).

Mission is the outgrowth of the activity of the slain Lamb, and it is far more predominant than has often been thought. In fact, Richard Bauckham (1993; 238–337) has noted that “the conversion of the nations” is a major theme of the book. The “nations” are not just predesigned to judgment but are called to repentance. In fact, 14:6–7 shows that one of the purposes of the seals, trumpets, and bowls is not just to pour out judgment but to prove God’s sovereignty over the earthly gods (the trumpets and bowls are built upon the Egyptian plagues of Exodus) and thus to proclaim “the eternal gospel” and call the nations to “fear God and give him glory.” The earthdwellers reject that offer and refuse to repent (9:20, 21; 16:9, 11, though the refusal shows the call to repentance was real), but apparently some do repent and give “glory to the God of heaven” in 11:13. Moreover, the nations produce those “purchased ... by the blood of Christ” (5:9), worships before God (15:4), the multitude standing before the throne in 7:9, and the saints who bring their glory and honor into the New Jerusalem (21:24–26).

The saints are militant during the Great Tribulation not by fighting back (13:10) but by witnessing through their perseverance and their proclamation of the one true God. The use of lampstands for the church (1:12, 20) may well symbolize its witnessing activity; and the witness theme is central to the book. Jesus as the “faithful witness” (1:5; 3:14) is the model, and the saints are called to the interdependent perseverance and witness. As seen often above, witness leads to persecution, and the mission of the church via martyrdom (“witness”) ends in martyrdom, as in 12:11 where the believers “conquer” the dragon by the word of their testimony in that “they did not love their lives so as to shrink from death” (see also 6:9). It is clear that the people of God are pictured as engaged in missionary activity even as they are hunted down by the forces of the Beast, and that some respond to their witness and have their place in the eternal city.

New Tribes Mission. Paul Fleming, a zealous evangelist serving in Malaysia, returned reluctantly to the United States due to sickness in the early 1940s. This seeming setback resulted in the formation of New Tribes Mission (NTM) in 1942. The purpose of the fundamental, nondenominational, faith mission: to “reach new tribes until the last tribe has been reached.” Its goal: to “evangelize unreached tribal groups, translate the Scriptures, and plant indigenous New Testament churches.” Fleming started NTM because other agencies refused to accept mission candidates he felt were qualified spiritually. Such agencies required a high level of formal education and monthly support, restricted the number of children, and placed age limits. Fleming felt God could use anyone and supply their economic needs “by faith,” as long as they are “channels for Him to work through.” Forged under Fleming's philosophy, including a strong sense of urgency, NTM offered spiritually qualified candidates opportunity to participate in holistic tribal ministries.

Presently, the international agency based in Sanford, Florida, is composed of 3,199 missionaries from 28 countries. Members work in 200 language groups in 27 countries. Translators have completed 26 New Testaments with over 100 in progress. Church planters have planted over 770 churches. Twenty-five training centers exist in 11 countries to motivate and mobilize missionary candidates. Two missiological contributions that have broadened beyond NTM include Steffen’s phase-out exit strategy for church planting, and McIlwain’s comprehensive Chronological Teaching story model used for evangelism and follow-up.

The agency has faced numerous trials over the years. In 1944, the death of five martyrs challenged the fledgling agency. More martyrs, forest fires and lost lives, potential splits, plane crashes (one of which claimed the life of Fleming), criticisms from anthropologists, and recent captivities created a resolve to remain true to the stated purpose and goal. Today, as founding leaders pass the baton to others, a mission-wide evaluation is under way to discern training needs for reaching twenty-first-century tribal people.

New Zealand (Est. 2000 pop.: 3,759,000; 270,534 sq. km. [104,453 sq. mi.]). New Zealand consists of two large and many smaller islands in the southwest Pacific, similar in land area to Japan. The main islands run 1,000 miles from northeast to southwest and are very mountainous with active volcanoes in the North Island and the South Island divided by the southern Alps. The population is 3.76 million. Thirteen percent are Maori, the indigenous settlers, nearly 80 percent are of European descent, the majority having British ancestry, 5 percent are Pacific Islanders, and there is a growing Asian population.

The first missionaries came from the Anglican Church Missionary Society in 1814 under the leadership of Samuel Marsden with the support of Ruatara, a Maori chief. After initially emphasizing civilization as a preparation for evangelism the mission concentrated on evangelization and peace-making. Methodists arrived in 1822 and initially worked closely with the Angilcans. The first official baptism was in 1826. Maori evangelists and the impact of literacy played a significant role in the expansion and acceptance of Christianity in the 1830s and 1840s. The translation of the New Testament was completed in 1837 and the whole Bible in 1868. Roman Catholic French Marist missionaries arrived in 1838 led by Bishop J. B. F. Pompallier. Protestant missionaries played a significant role in the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi in 1840 between Maori chiefs and the British Crown, which resulted in New Zealand becoming a British territory.

The rapid growth of European migration after 1840 brought considerable pressure on Maori land, resulting in the emergence of the King movement with its assertion of Maori sovereignty. War in the 1860s led many Maori to reject missionary Christianity and identify with new religious movements which drew heavily from the Old Testament and their own culture. The movement led by Te Whiti and Tohu in the 1870s and 1880s combined prophetic utterances with passive resistance. T. W. Ratana’s healing movement after the First World War developed both religious and political dimensions and by 1926 claimed 20 percent of Maori. Anglicans appointed a Maori bishop in 1928 but he had limited powers. The churches operated along assimilationist lines. In the 1980s and 1990s Anglicans and Methodists, in particular, recognized greater Maori autonomy and committed themselves to bicultural partnership.

The settler churches, with Anglicans the largest, followed by Presbyterians, Roman Catholics, Methodists, and others such as Baptists, Congregationalists, and the Salvation Army, reflected their British and Irish origins. Colonial Christianity faced the challenges of pluralism, sectarianism, and secularization. Evangelicals were committed to the transformation of society through individual conversion and moral reformation with attention to prohibition, Sabbath observance, and religious education in schools. Overseas missionary interest has been a significant dimension of the New Zealand churches almost from the beginning. Christianity flourishes among Pacific Islanders and there is a vibrant presence among recent Asian migrants. Ecuemism has resulted in significant cooperation between denominations without achieving church union. The impact of Pentecostalism and the charismatic movement has reinvigorated evangelical Christianity while mainline church membership has declined overall since the mid-1960s. Despite the nominal Christian adherence of many New Zealanders the country is very secular.

New Zealand Mission Boards and Societies. Anglican CMS, Wesleyan Methodist, and French Catholic Missions predate the annexation of New Zealand by Britain and the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi in 1840. The involvement of missionaries in the negotiations contributed to Maori acceptance of the treaty and to Christian concern about the abuse of Maori rights by the British settlers and government. Christianity developed in distinct settler and Maori streams, but sensitivity to issues of mission at home such as these increasingly informed convictions about Christian mission overseas.

In 1841 an error in Bishop Selwyn’s letters of appointment gave him jurisdiction in the Pacific and led to the formation of the Melanesian mission. Interest in Chinese in the Otago gold fields from the 1860s led to Presbyterian mission in Canton. Presbyterians were also involved in Vanuatu and later in India and Southeast Asia, particularly in medicine and theological education. The New Zealand Baptist Missionary Society began in Dunedin in 1885 and still maintains work in Bangladesh. The Church Missionary Society of New Zealand was founded in 1892 and by 1992 had sent out 280 missionaries to 24 countries. Open Brethren missions began in Argentina in 1896. By 1996 some 800 Brethren missionaries had gone to over 50 countries. In 1922 the interdenominational Bible Training Institute was founded with an emphasis on missionary training. The period after World War II initially saw growth in overseas involvement, but over time there was a reduction in length of service, tapering off of denominational missions, and the multiplication of evangelical agencies, many linked to international groups based in North America and Britain. Founded in 1982, Servants to Asia’s Urban Poor provides a contrasting model of holistic mission as a New Zealand initiative.
New Zealand Mission Boards and Societies

New Zealand churches have shared in worldwide moves toward ecumenism and the realization that Christianity is now a global, multicultural religion without a dominant culture defining its theology. While older denominational boards have often been sensitive to the realities of a post-colonial world, including the complex demands of genuine partnership, some appear weaker in their commitment to evangelism. Many, but not all, evangelical societies have a commitment to social ministries, though few are comfortable with political issues.

Mission boards and societies generally no longer have a monopoly on firsthand stories about social need and religious change in remote societies. In an electronic age the power that such information gave has gone forever. Not surprisingly supporters of mission have a wide range of perceptions of the needs of the world.

Historically women have served in large numbers as missionaries, and as supporters through denominational groups such as the Presbyterian Women's Missionary Union. Today feminist concerns seek to redress the lack of recognition for women's contribution to world mission, and reject models which still reflect values of patriarchy and dominance.

In 1997 there were some seventy mission agencies involved in supporting Christian mission outside New Zealand, about ten of which were denominational. Roman Catholics participate internationally through missionary orders. New Zealand Pentecostals share in the spontaneous commitment of the worldwide movement. Anglican Partnership-in-Mission structures provide for diocese to diocese links throughout the world. The contribution of migrant Polynesian and Asian Christianity to mission from New Zealand is likely to prove important. New Zealand's role as a place of international theological and mission education is still developing. Influence is impossible to quantify, but anecdotal evidence points to surprising supporters of mission have a wide range of perceptions of the needs of the world.

John Roxborough

Newbigin, (James Edward) Lesslie (1909–98). British churchman, culture scholar, and missionary to India. Lesslie Newbigin's work and accomplishments demonstrate leadership in mission theology and the Ecumenical Movement. After ordination and commissioning as a missionary in 1936 by the Church of Scotland (though English by birth and education), he served for almost four decades in India. An architect of the church union that resulted in the Church of South India (CSI), he became one of its initial bishops (1947). In 1959 he took the assignment to be the general secretary of the International Missionary Council at the time it was heading toward integration into the World Council of Churches. Upon integration in 1961 at New Delhi, he became associate general secretary of the WCC and director of the newly established Division (later Commission) of World Mission and Evangelism, serving, in that capacity, as the editor of the International Review of Missions. In 1965 he returned to India and served as the (CSI) bishop of Madras. In 1974, he returned to England to teach mission theology at Selly Oak Colleges in Birmingham until 1979, during which time he wrote his major work on mission theology, The Open Secret. Thereafter he fostered in the churches of the West a sense of the missionary encounter of the gospel with their own culture.

A prodigious author, Newbigin published numerous articles and more than thirty books. Half of the latter deal explicitly with his own engagements with the two primary mission contexts of his life, India and the West. The rest are critical reflections on the missional issues facing all churches. His major contribution was to articulate a rationale for mission in the culturally and religiously plural world of the late twentieth century. Grounding his reasoning in the biblical account of the character, actions, and purposes of God, he has been an apologist both for the gospel, defending belief within a postmodern context, and for the Christian mission, providing confidence to those who give witness to the unique revelation of God in Christ.

Nicaragua (Est. 2000 pop.: 5,169,000; 130,000 sq. km. [50,193 sq. mi.]). Nicaragua is the largest of the Central American countries. During much of the twentieth century Nicaraguans lived under the dictactorships of three generation of Somozas. In 1979 the Sandinistas gained control of the government after a bloody civil war. The 1980s saw the rise of U.S.-supported subversion in the form of the Contras. Violeta Chamorro won the presidential election in 1990 and governs the country, although the Sandinistas are still a strong political force.
The Roman Catholic Church makes up about 79 percent of the population, although many Catholics are quite nominal in their participation. There are three rival factions within the Catholic Church: the conservative traditionalists, the more politically active base communities, and the worship-centered charismatics.

Protestant influence in the eastern seaboard of Nicaragua dates back to the 1670s, when the British assumed a protectorate over the Miskito Indian kingdom. Moravian missionaries arrived at the town of Bluefields in 1849. By 1852 an "English Protestant Church" had been established in San Juan del Norte (Greytown). The Central American Mission began work in Nicaragua in 1900 and encountered both opposition and success. As a result of COMIBAM, a COMITY agreement assigned Nicaragua to the British assuming a protectorate over the Miskito Indian kingdom. Moravian missionaries arrived at the town of Bluefields in 1849. By 1852 an "English Protestant Church" had been established in San Juan del Norte (Greytown).

The Central American Mission began work in Nicaragua in 1900 and encountered both opposition and success. As a result of COMIBAM, a COMITY agreement assigned Nicaragua to the Baptists, and they extended their work in Managua, Masaya, Diria, and León. In addition to their many churches, they also founded the "Colegio Bautista" (1916) and a hospital (1930).

There are more than 120 Protestant denominations working in the country, and they constitute about 22 percent of the population. The overwhelming majority of these evangelical Christians belong to Pentecostal denominations, such as the Assemblies of God, the Apostolic Church, the Church of God (Cleveland), and the Church of the God of Prophecy. The largest non-Pentecostal denominations are the Moravians, the Seventh-Day Adventists, various groups of Baptists, the Brethren in Christ, and the Nazarenes.

A major turning point in the growth of Protestant work in Nicaragua came after the earthquake that rocked the country on December 23, 1972. Evangelicals banded together under the CEPA D organization (Comité Evangélica Pro Ayuda a los Damnificados) to minister to those who had lost homes and loved ones. As a result, an increasing number of Nicaraguans became evangelicals. For example, the Assemblies of God Pentecostal denomination entered the country in 1912 but only had fifty members in three congregations by the 1930s. They had grown to 150 churches in 1979, and during the following decade they began two hundred additional churches. Other denominations have experienced similar growth.

The civil strife of the past three decades has left the country polarized into different factions. The evangelical churches are no exception. Those churches sympathetic to the Sandinista goals are involved in EDPAD, CIEETS, and/or the Baptist Theological Seminary. Other churches have chosen to form more conservative coalitions. More recently, evangelicals have been influential in the formation of politically diverse parties, and movements such as the Partido de Justicia Nacional (PJN), founded in 1991, the short-lived Partido Ecuménico de Rehabilitación al Agraviado (Pera), and Grupo de Convergencia, and the Movimiento Evangélico Popular (MEP), founded in 1992. The evangelical movement in Nicaragua is demonstrating its maturity in maintaining its emphasis on both evangelism and social concern.

Nicholson, William Patteson (1876–1959). Irish international evangelist. Born in Bangor, County Down, he was an apprentice seaman at fifteen, then worked on a railway construction gang in South Africa before returning to Belfast. He was suddenly converted in 1899 and studied at Glasgow's Bible Training Institute (1901–3). He stayed in Scotland as an evangelist with the Lanarkshire Christian Union (1903–8). He then joined Chapman and Alexander in their Australian and North American missions (1908–10), settled with his family in Pennsylvania, was ordained as an evangelist in the Presbyterian Church (1914), and joined the staff of the Bible Institute of Los Angeles.

In 1920 he returned to Ireland and conducted a series of missions in Ulster that brought thousands into the kingdom at a time of serious intercommunal strife. A robust preacher haunted by "the thud of Christless feet on the road to hell," he was in 1926 an unlikely last-minute substitute at Cambridge for a sick missioner, but about one hundred students professed conversion. In his latter years "Willie Nic" preached on four continents, and died just before his projected retirement. He wrote On Towards the Goal (1925), The Evangelist (1937), and God's Hell (1938).

Nida, Eugene A. (1914– ). American premier linguist and translation consultant. At an early age Nida committed his life to Christ and was called to missionary work. His first contact with modern linguistics and Bible translation came the summer of his graduation from U.C.L.A., when CAMERON TOWNSEND invited him to attend the Summer Institute of Linguistics (SIL). Each summer from 1937 to 1953 Nida returned to the SIL to teach. In 1943 he completed his Ph.D., was ordained, married, and joined the staff of the American Bible Society (ABS). He was the associate secretary for versions (1944–46) and then executive secretary for translations.

Nida's ABS work involved travel to more than seventy countries. The volume and significance of his writing are phenomenal, especially in the face of his grueling travel and lecture schedule. His writings fall roughly into four chronological phases: descriptive linguistics (1943–51; Morphology, 1949); cross-cultural communication (1952–60; Message and Mission, 1960); translation (1961–73; Towards a Science of Translation, 1964; and The Theory and Practice of Translation, 1969); and semantics (1974–).

One of Nida’s greatest contributions to missions was the development and popularization of DYNAMIC EQUIVALENCE translation, which seeks to capture the meaning and spirit of the original without being bound to its linguistic structure. This approach to translation is highly influential in modern BIBLE TRANSLATION work.

Niger (Republic of Niger) (Est. 2000 pop.: 10,805,000; 1,267,000 sq. km. [489,189 sq. mi.]). Niger is a large, arid, landlocked country on the southern edge of the Sahara, a region called the Sahel. The Niger River passes through the capital city, Niamey. Consisting primarily of highlands and sandy plains, a southern strip of arable land supports 90 percent of the population (10.8 million). Currently, Niger’s economy rests on animal husbandry and subsistence farming of the main staples: millet, sorghum, and rice. One of the world’s poorest countries, Niger ranks last (of 165 countries) in International Monetary Fund economic stability.

Niger was once the largest net exporter of uranium until world demand plummeted in the 1980s. Devastating drought and famine in 1972–74 and 1984–85 (which significantly curtailed the nomadic tradition of the Fulani and Tuareg peoples) interrupted ambitious government development plans and rendered the country even more dependent upon foreign aid.

Niger’s sixteen ethnic peoples are divided into five principal language groups: Tamajaq (Tuareg), Fulfulde (Fulani), Kanouri, Hausa, and Songhai-Djerma. Historically, much of western Niger was part of the vast Songhai Empire. Following earlier treaties, Niger joined French West Africa in 1922, becoming independent in 1960. The first president, Hamani Diori, was overthrown in 1974 whereupon a military government, primarily under the popular Col. Seyni Kountche, ruled until single-party presidential elections in 1989. A new multiparty Constitution was established in 1992 and a tenuous democracy governed until another military coup in January 1996 prompted most donor nations to suspend their aid indefinitely.

Though a constitutionally secular state, Niger is largely Islamic, with ISLAM claiming 90.5 percent of the population. Another 9 percent is animistic, .5 percent Christian, with evangelicals comprising 0.2 percent. Islam came to the sub-Sahara in the ninth century, and is essentially of the folk variety today. Ethnic diversity has diluted traditional Islamic solidarity, with government policy and society currently resisting militant Islam.

The more than one hundred evangelical churches are experiencing steady growth, in spite of a waning period of division. The SOCIETY FOR INTERNATIONAL MINISTRIES (SIM; 7 ethnic ministry teams) and the Evangelical Baptist Church have been in the country since the 1920s, while other missions have entered in recent decades. Recent directions in outreach include media, an indigenous missionary training center, community and youth centers, AIDS awareness, and new translation projects. Indigenous missions from Nigeria have made increasing commitments, now numbering more than 20 missionaries.

KENNETH J. BAKER

Nigeria (Est. 2000 pop.: 128,786,000; 923,768 sq. km. [356,667 sq. mi.]). The West African nation of Nigeria, a country comprised of some 250 ethnolinguistic groups, is the most populous country in Africa. The south is the most densely populated. While the majority live in rural areas, urbanization is increasing. Although the country is well-endowed with natural and human resources, it is among the world’s twenty poorest countries. There are twenty-five universities with many Nigerians also trained overseas, yet the literacy rate remains at 30%. Though a secular state, Christianity (50%) and Islam (40%) are the major religions, with 10% still adhering to traditional religions. Evangelicals are 15% of the population.

Islam arrived via the north in the eleventh and fifteenth centuries. Modern Christianity was introduced on the coast in the early nineteenth century by Anglicans, Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and Roman Catholics. Freed slaves were instrumental in securing this initial success. One of them, SAMUEL CROWThER, became the first African to become an Anglican bishop. His method combined the gospel with education and commerce. Sudan Interior Mission, Sudan United Mission, and the Anglicans penetrated central and northern Nigeria in the late nineteenth century under the leadership of RONALD BINGHAM, KARL KUMM, and Walter Miller: A combination of medical work and education was employed, especially in central Nigeria, where indigenous converts were key agents in the further spread of the gospel in central and northern Nigeria.

Of Nigeria’s thirty-seven years of independence only nine have been under civilian rule. The resulting political instability has led to economic depression due to mismanagement and corruption. In the process the nation acquired a $28 billion debt with little to show for it. To these factors one should add Islamic pressure and multi-ethnicity as major factors affecting the development of Christianity in Nigeria today. Nigerian Muslims are belligerent and pressure from Islam has had a significant effect on the color of Nigerian Christianity. During the constitutional review in 1978 Muslims struggled unsuccessfully to introduce Shari'a law into the Constitution. In the late 1980s Muslims went on successive rampages in the north, burning churches and killing many Christians. Muslim heads of state have collaborated with Islamic groups to clandestinely enlist Nigeria in the Islamic Conference Organization. Concern over such events led to the formation of Christian Association of Nigeria. This association unites all Christians against Islamic-oriented political domination.

Around independence in 1960 many of the mission churches came under indigenous leadership. Despite allegations by some church historians that the conversion of many is not genuine the subsequent growth of the church has averaged 8.33% per annum. The majority of new churches, such as the Deeper Life Bible Church, and Living Faith Ministries, are Pentecostal/charismatic in nature. There are also syncretistic groups which to varying degrees are more inclined to traditional religions than to Christianity. Such independent groups as the Aladura, Cherubim and Seraphim, and Celestial Church of Christ were born out of discontent with mainline denominations and their supposed inability to be contextually relevant.

Part of the new growth has been through Nigerian missionary societies. Denominational societies such as Evangelical Missionary Society (EMS) of the Evangelical Church of West Africa (formerly led by PANVA BABA), Church of Christ in Nigeria Community Mission (CCM), the United Missionary Organization (UMCA), Baptists, Foursquare Gospel Church, and non-denominational societies such as CAPRO, Christian Missionary Foundation (CMF), and Nations for Christ Missionary Organization (NCMO) have missionaries serving both within and outside Nigeria. New Life for All (NLFA), an interdenominational lay movement, led for many years by the late Paul Gindiri, is instrumental in spreading the gospel among Muslims in the north. The Great Commission Movement, the Nigerian IFES (the largest student movement in the world), the Fellowship of Christian Students (FCS, Scripture Union (SU), and others are working with students and creating mission awareness.

Some of the churches, including ECWA, COCIN, Roman Catholics, and Lutherans, are involved in holistic ministry. The role of the church in these areas is increasingly important with the collapse of national health and educational systems due to the economic depression. There are also Christian nongovernmental organizations such as Christian Rural and Urban Development Association of Nigeria (CRUDAN), People Ori-

Nigeria. From the beginning, it was recognized that most of the work would have to be done by Africans. The Anglican CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS) got many workers from among the rescued slaves settled in Sierra Leone. The Methodists used Ghanaians, and the Presbyterians had West Indian missionaries. As local converts were won, most foreign missions trained and sent out local evangelists as quickly as possible. Many of these worked in cultures not of their own.

Most notable among the early African missionaries working with the CMS was SAMUEL ADJAI CROWTHER. He set up and supervised the Niger Mission, which worked along the Niger River from the delta to the confluence with the Benue River, ministering to at least five language groups. He recruited rescued Africans from Sierra Leone as staff. Crowther worked within the framework of the CMS, and the Niger Mission developed into regular Anglican dioceses. Today the Anglican Church in Nigeria has its own mission-sending structure.

In 1949 the Sudan Interior Mission, now the SOCIETY FOR INTERNATIONAL MINISTRIES, helped the churches they had founded to set up their own missionary-sending body, the African Missionary Society. Its name was changed to the Evangelical Missionary Society (EMS) upon the organization of the Evangelical Churches of West Africa in 1953. The oldest and largest Nigerian mission agency, the EMS has over a thousand workers in several African countries, Britain, and the United States.

The Nigerian Baptists have been sending missionaries to Sierra Leone for many years. They have also worked in the less-reached areas of Nigeria. Other notable denominational missions are the mission departments of the Church of Christ in Nigeria, Assemblies of God, Gospel Faith Mission, and Deeper Life Bible Church. Deeper Life had seventy-two missionaries in 1992 had fifty-five missionaries in at least eight African countries, Britain, and the United States.

Campus revivals in the 1960s and 1970s led to the founding of Nigeria's first nondenominational mission societies. Calvary Ministries started with educated young people in Zaire in 1975. By 1996 they had over two hundred workers serving in nineteen Nigerian ethnic groups and ten other African countries. The Christian Missionary Foundation started in Ibadan in 1982, and by 1992 had fifty-five missionaries in at least eight Nigerian tribes and nine other countries. Many smaller mission agencies continue to be formed.

In 1982, nine Nigerian mission organizations banded together to form the Nigeria Evangelical Missions Association (NEMA). Their joint projects include raising mission awareness, research, and missionary training. There were over thirty-five agencies in NEMA by 1996. Members include independent agencies, denominational agencies, support agencies, and specialized ministries (e.g., children's and student work).

Today many of the independent agencies run their own missionary training programs. The larger denominations have tried to incorporate missionary training into their existing theological education.

The number of Nigerian missionaries continues to grow. In 1992 there were 2,873 missionaries from Nigeria, of whom 1,259 were doing cross-cultural work. Most Nigerian cross-cultural missionaries work in less-reached Nigerian tribes, though there are about 250 working in other countries.

The Roman Catholics have a college for training Nigerian missionary priests. Some of the less orthodox African Independent Churches of Nigeria send missionaries to the Nigerian communities in Western lands and some to non-Christian Nigerian peoples.

Nigeria has 50 percent of the population of West Africa and 85 percent of the region's evangelicals. This makes it a strategic sending nation for the evangelization of West Africa.

Niijima, Jom (1843–90). Japanese educator and church leader. Born in Edo (later Tokyo), he left for Hakodate, and then became a stowaway on a ship headed for the United States, in order to further his knowledge of Western culture. This took courage, for it was a capital offense to go abroad without permission, since Japan had tried to seal itself off against foreigners. In America, Niijima was befriended by an American Christian businessman, Alpheus Hardy, who supported his studies at Phillips Academy, and in honor of whom he sometimes styled himself “Joseph Hardy Neesima.” Becoming an ardent Christian, he prepared for the ministry at Amherst College and Andover Seminary. He was asked by the Japanese government to accompany the Iwakura Mission to study Western education as a translator, for which he would be absolved for breaking the law in leaving the country. From this trip, Niijima formed the goal of founding a Christian institution of higher education that would guide Japan’s future course. Eventually supported in this by the American Congregational Church, he returned to Japan in 1874 and set about founding his Christian school, the Domshisha (“the common-purpose association”), in Kyoto, just north of the former Imperial Palace. Beset by ill health, Niijima continued to work for the strengthening of the new Japanese Congregational churches, and his struggling Domshisha, until his death in 1890.

Niles, Daniel Thambyrajah (1908–70). Indian church leader and evangelist. Born near Jaffna, Ceylon, as a fourth-generation Christian, Niles was an active churchman, ecumenical leader, and evangelist. As an Asian church leader Niles played a significant role in the development of the ecumenical movement in which he was active during four decades and to which he contributed a blending of Eastern and Western thought. From 1953 to 1959 he was executive secretary of the Department of Evangelism of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC). At the time of his death he was executive secretary of the East Asia Christian Council (EACC—of which he was a founder), president of the Methodist Church of Ceylon, and one of six presidents of the WCC.

Niles was ever an evangelist and preacher, explicitly Christocentric in faith and practice, a pragmatic Methodist. He emphasized the proclamation of the gospel, not polemics. To Niles, the rationale for evangelism stems from the uniqueness of Christ. According to LESSLIE NEWBIGIN, Niles was above all an expositor of the Bible. He is best known today through at least seventeen books that he wrote as well as the EACC hymnal he edited. Among his better known books are Preaching the Gospel of the Resurrection (1953), The Preacher’s Task and the Stone of Stumbling (1958), Upon the Earth (1962), The Message and Its Messengers (1966), Buddhism and the Claims of Christ (1967), Who Is This Jesus? (1968).

Ninian (c. 360–c. 432). Early missionary to Britain and Scotland. Of his life and ministry among the Southern Picts surprisingly little is known for certain, and even the dates given above have been challenged. Bede the historian says Ninian went to Rome, where he received theological training, papal encouragement, episcopal consecration, and a commission to evangelize his homeland. His return trip reportedly took him through Gaul, where he was warmly welcomed by fellow bishop MARTIN OF TOURS, pioneer of monasticism in the Western Church, who gave Ninian both spiritual counsel and practical assistance.

Ninian established his base at what is now Whithorn in southwest Scotland. There he built a stone church known as Candida Casa (“the White House”). A monastery was founded, and from this training center Ninian and his preachers took the gospel not only northward to the Grampians, but also south to England and over the sea to Ireland. The work Ninian began was continued in the sixth century by COLUMBA and Mungo. Here, too, the chronology has been challenged, but we do know that by the Middle Ages Whithorn was well known as a place of pilgrimage.

Nitschmann, David (1696–1772). German missionary to the Caribbean. Born in Zauchtental, Moravia, he and his family in 1724 joined a colony of refugees that was taken in by Count NIKOLAUS LUDWIG VON ZINZENDORF at his estate in Herrnhut, Saxony. In 1727 a revival broke out at Herrnhut, out of it sprang the MORAVIAN missionary movement.

Nitschmann, thirty-five, and Leonard Dober, thirty-one, facing ridicule and opposition, walked to Copenhagen and then sailed for St. Thomas, West Indies, on October 8, 1732. Zinzendorf had simply told them to do everything in the spirit of Jesus. They had no prior examples to follow and no society behind them. On arrival they found the family of the slave Anthony, whose visit to Herrnhut had inspired the Moravians’ missionary vision in the first place. They preached the gospel to the slaves who gathered around them. The Moravians labored fifty years in the West Indies and had baptized 13,000 converts before any other mission arrived there. As the first bishop of the Moravian Brethren in Germany (consecrated in 1735), Nitschmann was instrumental in the opening of twenty-eight fields by 1760. He died on one of those fields—Bethlehem, Pennsylvania.

Niue (New Zealand Dependent Area). (Est. 2000 pop.: 2,000; 260 sq. km. [100 sq. mi.]). Located 300 miles east of Tonga and 350 miles southeast of Samoa, Niue is an uplifted coral atoll 36 miles in circumference. Called by James Cook “Savage Island,” its Polynesian inhabitants initially rejected European and missionary contacts. Declared a British protectorate in 1900 it was annexed to New Zealand in 1901 and in 1974 became a self-governing territory in free association with New Zealand. Three-quarters of its population belong to the Ekalesia Niue (formerly LMS), 10% are Mormons, and the remainder mainly Roman Catholics, Seventh-Day Adventists, and Jehovah’s Witnesses.

Nobili, Robert de (1577–1656). Italian missionary linguist in India. De Nobili was born into a wealthy family in Montepulciano, Italy, and in 1597 joined the Roman Catholic monastic order the Society of Jesus, despite resistance from his relatives.

De Nobili asked to be sent to India as a Jesuit missionary, arriving on the Fisher Coast in 1605. There he spent several months studying Tamil before moving on to Madura, the hub of Tamil culture. Few converts were being won in Madura, especially among the higher-caste Brahmans. De Nobili saw that the Hindus despised the Portuguese for their foreign customs of eating meat and drinking wine. The Indians equated Christian conversion with becoming Portuguese, a notion reinforced by the missionaries.

Probably aware of the innovative methods of fellow Jesuit Matteo Ricci in China, de Nobili decided to assume the identity of a Brahmin, adopting the local wardrobe and diet as well as some of the customs. An outstanding linguist, he applied himself to mastering Tamil, Sanskrit, and Telugu, eventually writing more than twenty books and other materials in these languages. Perceiving him to be a European holy man, many locals began coming to his new dwelling in the city's Brahmin section, where he explained Christianity, debated religious issues, and discussed the errors he had found in Hinduism, as well as its similarities with Christianity. He died in Mylapore, penniless and nearly blind.

Notoriety continues to follow de Nobili. While some fault his theology and claim his contextualized approach perpetuated the class distinctions still blighting the church in India, many more rank de Nobili with Ricci and Francis Xavier as among the greatest missionaries of his era.

Nominal, Nominal Christian. While nominality is usually described rather than defined, the Lausanne Committee has defined nominal Protestant Christians as “those who, within the Protestant tradition, would call themselves a Christian, or be so regarded by others, but who have no authentic commitment to Christ based on personal faith.”

Nominality is an acknowledged problem in second and succeeding generations of Christians who have lost the joy and fervor of the new birth. E. Gibbs gives two pathways to nominality: those who belong to the church but no longer believe and those who believe but no longer belong. The Lausanne Committee identified five types of nominal Christians: Those who (1) attend church regularly, worship devoutly without any relationship with Jesus Christ; (2) attend church regularly, but for cultural reasons; (3) attend church only for major church events; (4) hardly ever attend church but maintain a church relationship for reasons of security, emotional or family ties, or tradition; (5) have no relationship to any specific church and never attend but consider themselves believers.

A nominal Christian may be unconverted according to biblical criteria. Reasons for nominality can be classified as theological (i.e., leadership, local church, and cultural misunderstandings) or historical (i.e., traditions taking precedence over vital faith). The missiological challenge is to move nominal Christians toward genuine conversion and a vibrant, personal relationship with Christ.

Nommensen, Ludwig Ingwer (1834–1918). Danish missionary to Indonesia. The son of a dike-lock attendant, Nommensen was born on the island of Nordstrand in Schleswig. Escaping injury despite a serious accident, he decided to become a missionary and joined the Rhine Missionary Society in Barmen. In 1862 he traveled to Barus on the northwest coast of Sumatra. In 1864 he began work among the Toba Batak, who were independent of the Dutch crown colony. His respect for indigenous social structures earned him trust, as did his desire to win the people in their own language with a humble and patient attitude.

In 1874 Nommensen translated Luther’s Small Catechism into the Batak language, followed by the New Testament in 1878. He also allowed the Batak a church polity that was contextually oriented. In 1881 Nommensen became director of the Rhine Mission to the Batak. When he extended his efforts to include the southern coast of Lake Toba, church growth advanced so rapidly that entire clans were baptized. Nommensen was awarded an honorary doctorate by the theological faculty of the University of Bonn for his services as the leader of the Batak church, and in 1911 he received the Officer’s Cross from the Royal Dutch Order of Orange-Nassau. Nommensen died in 1918 in Sigumpar in Sumatra.

Non-Church Movement (Japan). One of the distinctly indigenous expressions of Protestant Christianity in Japan today is the Mukyokai or “non-church” movement. It was founded by Kanzo Uchimura (1861–1930), a devoted follower of Jesus who was at the same time intensely Japanese in his loyalties. Inevitably he became a vocal critic of Western denominationalism because of what he regarded as its unwarranted elevation of human leaders, its promotion of factionalism, and its penchant for superimposing Western values on Japanese Christians. Uchimura was a Luther-like apologist for the biblical faith and a genuine promoter of social righteousness. Although his spiritual experience began within Western denominationalism, its sectarian and ecclesiastical rigidities soon drew him to possible association with Quaker simplicity and its non-sacramental view of church ordinances. This led him to abhor both congregational organization and formalism in liturgy and polity, creeds and dogmas. Eventually the Mukyokai movement emerged. It is significant that no form of Christianity has been more prolific in its literature and more relevant to the educated elite in urban Japan. It is devoid of anything approximating a local or national federation of assemblies. No Sunday schools or systematic instruction of youth are permitted, no offerings are taken, and no sacraments are administered. All public witnessing by an ordained or professional clergy is eschewed. The Mukyokai movement is devoid even of church buildings. Despite this, Uchimura produced a religion of the spirit that is distinctly Japanese through and through. In the mid-1950s Emil Brunner reported that he felt that the non-church movement represented the “cream of Japanese Christianity, vital and biblical in the very best sense.” The movement has plateaued of late, and tends to be currently regarded as just another Christian sect.

Nonresidential Missionary. Strategic mission planners of bygone eras historically tended to neglect the sections of the world that were more resistant to the gospel, with a few notable exceptions. Antagonistic zones have become more impenetrable, especially since the end of World War II. A nonresidential missionary, however, has the responsibility of discovering ways to identify and evangelize historically resistant and Unreached People groups, or population segments, with the intent of establishing a viable movement of Christian churches among them.

In the wake of the Western colonial era, emerging national governments dissolved legal restraints on precolonial, indigenous religious movements. Blocs of Islamic, Hindu, Buddhist, and tribal peoples renewed and reasserted themselves against external religiosocial influences.

Introduction of Marxist ideologies in many countries created an unprecedented set of circumstances that often coerced peoples to resist the gospel and to accept, or at least practice, various forms of atheism.

Identifying the world’s distinct religiosocial groupings of peoples, primarily by linguistic criteria, has aided researchers in specifying the nature of the task remaining for fulfillment of Christ’s commission to preach the gospel to all the peoples of the world. Technological advances enable mission strategists to gather data more effectively, assess the implications of that data more precisely, and envision new ways and means of penetrating resistant blocs of peoples.

In 1986, a team of Southern Baptist Foreign Mission Board researchers coined the term “nonresidential missionary” to describe a radically new mission methodology. Nonresidential missionaries function in innovative ways in that they often begin their ministry outside the indigenous locale of a distinct people group, or designated population segment, that is historically resistant to, or perhaps even left untouched by, the gospel. While living outside the target area, they commit themselves to strategic research, language learning, and discovery of new avenues for establishing contact with decision makers inside the target area. They usually do not rely on the resources of just one agency or denominational sending structure to penetrate their resistant people or population segment. Instead, they coordinate like interests among various Christian entities and orchestrate a collective but focused strategy to establish legitimate humanitarian bases for entry into the targeted area.

Once the nonresidential missionary establishes a viable foundation for working in the targeted context, the host government may grant a long-term presence. Teams of qualified people able to render and administer humanitarian services indirectly engage in evangelism, discipleship, and church planting ventures through the web of social relationships they are able to establish with individuals from their assigned people group.

It is at this point that the term “nonresidential” may lose its meaning because of an indefinite presence in the targeted area. Because of this frequent occurrence, some mission agencies relabel the model to reflect more accurately the function a nonresidential missionary performs, namely, the coordination of various strategic initiatives among Christians aimed at reaching an unreached area or people with the gospel and establishing a viable Christian presence.

Nonresidential Missionary

Non-Western Mission Boards and Societies. As people in countries around the world were evangelized and incorporated into a worshiping group of believers by missionaries, one of the natural results was the development of missionary outreach from these newer churches. Similar to their counterparts in Europe and North America, believers in Africa, Asia, Latin America, and Oceania developed their own missionary-sending vision and efforts. Like those of the Western countries, these efforts required missionary-sending organizations with explicit policies and procedures.

Terms. There have been several labels for this development. The phrase “Third World Missions” was borrowed from political economics (see Third World). Many from Africa, Asia, Latin America, and Oceania felt, however, that “Third World Missions” implied third-class missions. As this was not the intention, “Non-Western Missions” was suggested, a particularly good replacement to describe those in Asia, since most of their cultures are non-Western. However, the peoples in Latin America consider themselves just as Western as those of North America, so this term also had its deficiencies.

“Emerging Missions” was used to describe the arising army of new missionaries from countries that traditionally had received missionaries, yet now sent workers as well. The term was not meant to imply that the emerging movement was completely new. For records as early as the 1820s tell of missionaries like Joshua Mateinaniu, who planted churches by traveling from one Pacific island to another. What the term actually intended to convey was that this phenomenon had recently become better documented and in this sense was emerging.

The current term is “Two-Thirds World Missions,” a more accurate representation of the resource God is now mobilizing for his kingdom; the countries of Africa, Asia, Latin America, and Oceania constitute nearly two-thirds of the world’s inhabited land mass and at least that fraction (if not more) of the world’s population (see Two-Thirds World). Although “Two-Thirds World Missions” is the more popular term today, the other labels continue to have some use in describing this extremely significant development.

Growth. In 1972, the first year the worldwide activity of the emerging missions was reviewed, there were an estimated 2,951 missionaries sent out by approximately 1,600 non-Western agencies or organizations in Africa, Asia, Latin America, and Oceania. This growth has continued, while in the West missionary recruitment and deployment have either plateaued or declined.

Types of Agencies. The missionary activities of the Two-Thirds World can be classified as structured or unstructured. The unstructured groups consist of believers who spontaneously proclaim the good news of Christ’s love without any formal organization to define and direct their activity. The Quechua Movement for Christ in Bolivia, the Tzeltal Christians and Chol Indian Church of Mexico, the Apostolic Church of Ghana, and the Chinese Christians in Burma are examples of effective unstructured missionary endeavors. Receiving encouragement from colleagues and church leadership, those members of the group who have an evangelistic vision reach out spontaneously, often to a neighboring village or town of another culture. Finances come from friends or tentmaking activities; training and pastoral supervision are often minimal.

Within the Two-Thirds World, however, most of the missionary activity is structured. There are national officers or directors, a system for raising and maintaining financial support, and methods to coordinate the evangelistic outreach of workers hundreds of miles from the central office. The agencies vary greatly in character, but are united by the fact that they are formally organized. They are usually led by a charismatic communicator; while the vast majority of workers are from the ethnic group or nation conducting the outreach.

There are large denominational agencies, like the Burma Baptist Convention and the Diocesan Missionary Association of the Church of the Province of Kenya (Anglican). On the other hand, there are large nondenominational agencies, like the Friends Missionary Prayer Band in India and Mission Amen in Peru. There are agencies that maintain their main office close to the field of service rather than in the home country, for purposes of recruitment and fund raising, for instance, Project Magreb, a Latin American agency located in Spain. And there are hundreds of smaller agencies that operate along family lines: employees at the home office are family members, and the missionaries are either friends of the family or relatives.

Problems. In the Two-Thirds World, mission agency problems are virtually the same as those anywhere. Funding the work and adequately training workers remain critical concerns for prayer and resolve. One of the ways in which newer agencies have learned to handle some of these difficulties has been to participate in continent-wide or international conferences on global missions. Another way they have learned about mission structure and administration has been from nationalized structures that are related to international agencies. Youth with a Mission, Operation Mobilization, New Tribes, Wycliffe, and a host of other agencies of European or North American origin have been sources of encouragement and education for newer groups.

The future of global missions clearly lies with the Two-Thirds World agencies and missionaries. Like those that preceded them, they are not always without cultural bias and limitations. Yet if the gospel message is to continue to move into all nations, it will in large measure be the work of very committed missionaries from the churches and agencies of the Two-Thirds World.

Norfolk Island (Australian Territories) (Est. 2000 pop.: 35,000; 2 sq. km. [1 sq. mi.]). Norfolk Island, an external territory of Australia since 1913, is an island in the Pacific Ocean off the east coast of Australia. The island was originally settled by descendants of the mutineers from the Bounty. Forty percent of the population are Pitcairnese with the rest split between Australians, British, and New Zealanders. Three-quarters are Christians and one-quarter are nonreligious. Most of the evangelicals are found in the Anglican and Methodist communities.

North American New Religious Movements. From the time of the earliest English settlements, North America has had two religious personalities. The primary personality has been broadly Christian, with the clear dominance of Protestant Christianity. The alter ego has been one of remarkable religious diversity, the home of the free and the innovative. NEW RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS (NeRMS) have been part of the American character from the beginning. However, the last half of the twentieth century has been particularly rich in number and variety of NeRMS. The Institute for the Study of American Religion identifies 1,667 different religious groups in North America, of which 836 are classified as “unconventional.” Of these nonconventional movements, nearly 500 arose after 1950. These figures do not include movements not defined as religious, such as est and primal therapy, nor does it include the many groups that are too small or secretive to be studied. Thus, 1,500 to 2,000 is a reasonable estimate of the number of NeRMS in North America.

The term “NeRMS” lacks precise definition. The differences among NeRMS in North America are enormous and it cannot be assumed that a characteristic of one movement applies to others. However, these movements share at some level most, if not all, of the following general characteristics. NeRMS are innovative in doctrine, worldview, forms of religious expression, and social arrangements. They tend toward an emphasis upon subjective experience and focus upon meeting personal needs. NeRMS are characterized by strong charismatic leadership; the group attributes to the leader the capacity for extraordinary insight, revelation, and authority. NeRMS tend to be separatistic, aiming for not only a different vision of society but a different model for society. They tend to be more holistic than conventional religious bodies, with higher levels of conformity and commitment.

NeRMS in North America fall into three broad categories: the revival of ancient religious traditions, variations on traditional Christian themes, and movements flowing out of the more established religious traditions of the non-Christian world. Many movements represent a synthesis across these category lines.

Many NeRMS that fall within the broad definition of “New Age” are not at all new, but rather represent a modern revival of ancient and folk religious traditions. ASTROLOGY, one of the oldest and perhaps the most universal human religious expressions, plays a major role in most of these groups. Gnosticism, or the belief that humans are capable of direct and transcendental knowledge of God through esoteric ritualism or symbolic interpretation of Scripture, undergirds the worldview of many NeRMS. NEO-PAGANISM, the calling back to life of ancient Egyptian, Greek, and European deities, is a growing phenomenon in North America. Some persons heavily invested in the modern feminist and ecological movements have found a religious home in the neo-pagan revival.

Many NeRMS in North America grow directly out of more conventional Christianity. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, a number of powerful forces swept through American Protestantism—adventism, the Holiness Movement, and Pentecostalism. These forces certainly do not constitute a new religious movement, but when one or more became highly intensified, particularly under strong charismatic leadership, groups emerged that are clearly and self-consciously outside the broad American Protestant tradition. Branchamism, JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES, and The World Wide Church of God are classic examples of this form of NeRM. In addition, there are a number of groups that began as a variant of the Christian tradition, but have so synthesized ancient or folk traditions that the “Christian” aspect is little more than an overlay.
North American New Religious Movements

The third broad category of NeRMS consists of groups that reflect the flow of established religions into North America. The religious heritage of India has been an influential component of the New Age phenomenon (see also HINDU NEW RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS). Transcendental Meditation, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (Hare Krishna), and ZEN BUDDHISM are the most widely known of these movements, although there are many others with origins in Asia, the Middle East, and Africa. While few movements have drawn significant numbers of indigenous Americans as committed disciples, their influence on the overall religious ethos of North America is growing in significance. The UNIFICATION CHURCH is especially significant. It has roots in Protestant Christianity, introduced into Korea in the nineteenth century. The founder, Sun Myung Moon (b. 1920), combined elements of Christianity with Korean folk shamanism and a Taoist worldview. (Such synthesis is not unusual in NeRMS. There are thousands of such movements in Africa alone; see also AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCH MOVEMENT.) However, in the 1970s Moon came to North America and introduced his vision as both a NeRM and the final stage in the evolution of Christianity.

Perhaps the most significant issue facing evangelicalists is not the “what” but the “why” of NeRMS. Scholarly research has developed a general profile of the convert to a NeRM. The greater number of converts are young, usually in their late teens or early twenties. Most are isolated and unattached. The vast majority of converts are single, geographically disconnected from family and located in a new or unfriendly environment. With the exception of ethnically centered groups (BLACK MUSLIMS, SANTERIA), most converts are from middle-class or upper-middle-class families and are better educated than the general population. Converts generally have a “seeking spirit” but have experienced alienation from family, friends, or society as a whole. Many converts experienced alienation and disillusionment with conventional American religion. They are on a quest for meaning and value and the quest has not been satisfied by mainstream American Christianity. The growth of NeRMS is not simply the result of failure in the church, but it may be more productive to view NeRMS less as a threat and more as a challenge.

A number of factors should be borne in mind when dealing with someone involved in a NeRM. In North America adults enjoy religious freedom. Forcible “deprogramming” is illegal, unethical, based upon faulty assumptions about “mind control,” and is much more likely to do harm than good. It is indisputable that the vast majority of converts leave NeRMS voluntarily and few suffer long-term damage or disabilities. While it is important to learn all one can about a particular movement, one should treat with skepticism information from the movement itself or from secular anti-cult organizations. It is important to maintain contact with the person involved in the NeRM, fostering a good relationship of trust, and manifesting love and care for the convert.

Norway (Est. 2000 pop.: 4,427,000; 323,895 sq. km. [125,056 sq. mi.]). Christianity came to Norway in the ninth century from the British Isles and Germany. During the twelfth century the church was firmly established. The Reformation was formally introduced in 1537 when the Danish-Norwegian king decided that Lutheranism was to be the religion of the two countries. In the Constitution of 1814 Lutheranism was retained as the official religion of the state. The Church of Norway is still a state church, but has in many ways become a self-governing body in line with the general democratic development.

Under the lay preacher Hans Nielsen Hauge a period of revivals took place at the beginning of the nineteenth century. They had a particular effect on common people who then established what later became free lay organizations for mission at home and abroad. The revivals occurred within the state church as reform movements. As a result the lay organizations have in many ways functioned as have the free churches in other countries (e.g., Sweden).
The Church of Norway has 3.8 million members (of a total population of 4.4 million), divided into 1,350 geographical parishes and 11 dioceses. The General Synod was instituted as late as 1984, with 80 delegates meeting once a year. Even though the king remains head of the church, and the government and parliament decide on the budget, appointment of bishops, and church laws, the state church is enjoying an increasing amount of freedom and independence, especially at the local parish level. Nevertheless, there is growing opposition to the state church system among younger clergy and evangelical laypeople.

It is impossible to understand Norwegian church life without seeing the interwoven nature of its official and voluntary structures. This pattern has since the early nineteenth century released much spiritual energy for evangelism and mission at home and abroad. The first of the voluntary structures was the Norwegian Missionary Society (formed in 1842). The largest Lutheran lay movement today is the Norwegian Lutheran Mission, with 500 career missionaries abroad. The Norwegian Lutheran Home Mission is the oldest of the organizations evangelizing in Norway, with 2,800 fellowships and hundreds of "prayer houses." These prayer houses, of which 2,600 are still in existence today, were built by laypeople in response to the revivals in the early part of the nineteenth century. Their use is, however, today decreasing (less than one-third are used weekly). Overall, the voluntary lay organizations within the Church of Norway functioned during the twentieth century as a committed opposition and reform movement in defining doctrinal matters and in challenging the less committed sections of the church to mission and evangelism. The Church of Norway does not have its own specific mission board. Rather, the independent missionary societies together carry on the church’s mission activity. Today these Lutheran missionary societies support more than 1,000 Norwegian missionaries.

Among the churches outside the state church we find Methodist, Baptist, Covenant, and Lutheran (there are three Lutheran free churches in the country). The largest independent churches are, however, the Pentecostals with 32,000 members and the Roman Catholic Church with 40,000 members (many of them immigrants from southern Europe, Asia, and Latin America). The total membership of the free churches is 200,000. Most of the free churches are evangelical in doctrine and support a strong mission movement with 500 missionaries (290 of them Pentecostals).

Approximately 93 percent of the population is affiliated with Christian churches and fellowships, while 2 percent (95,000) belong to other religions; 4.5 percent (195,000) have no religious affiliation. The proportion of people baptized and confirmed is, however, decreasing: 84 percent have been baptized and 76 percent confirmed in the Church of Norway. About one-third of the adult population say they believe in Jesus as Savior; and one-fifth consider themselves "personal Christians." However, fewer than 400,000 attend church at least once a month. On a weekly basis about 5 percent attend church and religious meetings (prayer houses). This number (220,000) constitutes what is termed the active members.

It is primarily this active membership that supports the missionary work abroad. Of the 1,500 Norwegian career missionaries (not including tentmakers and team ministries, both of which are growing) 60 percent are women. Norwegian mission is active in about 75 countries (19 in Europe, 14 in Latin America, 20 in Asia, and 21 in Africa). Of the 650 missionaries working in African countries, 260 are in Ethiopia and Kenya. Within the 10/40 Window Norwegian mission is fairly weak. The focus on mission to Muslims is, however, increasing today.

Beginning in the early part of the eighteenth century with mission to the Lapps and to Greenland, mission work has also in modern times experienced a great expansion in numbers of missionaries and in new working areas. Following the closure of China new work was started in Japan, Taiwan, Tanzania, Indonesia, Thailand, Israel, and Ethiopia. In the period after 1961 new independent, American-inspired activities blossomed, including Aril Edvardsen’s support of indigenous evangelists and Norwegian branches of the Navigators, Operation Mobilization, and Youth with a Mission. At the same time work behind the Iron Curtain began. Since 1974 the LAUSANNE MOVEMENT has been a strong inspiration for much Norwegian mission. Coupled with worry over the theological and missiological developments within the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (when the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL did not join the new COMMISSION ON WORLD MISSION AND EVANGELISM), the Lausanne emphasis on evangelization, partnership, and UNREACHED PEOPLES (including Muslims) has influenced missiology and mission work in Norway. As a result new work has been started in Kenya, Mali, Ivory Coast, Azerbaijan, and Mongolia.

Traditionally, Norwegian mission organizations have maintained their independence of the official church structures for theological, missiological, and economic reasons. Since 1994, however, some of the Lutheran missionary organizations have joined with the Church of Norway in a Cooperative Council for Church and Mission. The aim is to promote a natural integration of mission in congregational work by overcoming the traditional tension between the official church and the independent movements. A major reason for this cooperation and integration is the decline in membership and resources within some of the major organizations (The Norwegian Missionary Society and the Norwegian Santal Mission). The initiative has met with fairly strong criticism from parts of the lay movement.
Norway

Ntsikana (c. 1780–1821). South African pioneer evangelist, composer, prophet, and missionary. One of the first Xhosa to come to Christ, Ntsikana grew up in a prominent traditional Xhosa family during an era in which white settler encroachment on Xhosa lands resulted in dislocation and stress. Prior to his conversion, he was known among the Xhosa for his singing, oratory, and dancing skills. Apparently as a child he heard the preaching of pioneer missionary J. T. Van der Kemp, though his conversion did not come until he received a vision as an adult (c. 1815). After the vision, he immediately began preaching, holding regular services in mornings and evenings, unique among the Xhosa in that they were not kinship-formed. Instruction under missionary Joseph Williams from 1816 to 1818 solidified his biblical orientation. Ntsikana attracted many hearers; the relatively few who became his disciples came from the Xhosa social elite. His message to lay down spears and take up spiritual armor through singing his hymns and then submitting to life’s circumstances was a prophetic one in distressing times for the Xhosa.

He reportedly composed the first four Xhosa hymns. His continuing influence after death is seen in several ways, including the continuing influence of his “Great Hymn” (inscribed shortly after his death and still sung today) and the development of the Ntsikana Memorial Association (1909) and the Ntsikana Memorial Church (split from the United Free Church) in 1911.

Nuñez, Emilio Antonio (1923–). Salvadorian theologian, educator, and writer. Born into a poor family in El Salvador, he struggled to obtain an education as a schoolteacher. Through the woman who later become his wife, Sara Echegoyen, he came to Christ and shortly after, in 1944, enrolled in the Central American Bible Institute in Guatemala City, where after graduating he began teaching, in 1947. He was also a pioneer radio speaker and helped found a school for children from poor Christian families, especially those in ministry. Going to the United States for further studies, he earned a B.A. from Southern Methodist University, a Th.M. from Dallas Theological Seminary in 1964, and a Th.D. from Dallas in 1969. He served as dean and president of his alma mater, which had become the Central American Theological Seminary, and continued to teach there after giving up administrative responsibilities in 1979. A founder of the Latin American Theological Fraternity, he has served WEF, the Lausanne Committee, the Bible Societies, and other entities in various capacities. The author of seven books in Spanish, he wrote Liberation Theology (1985) and Crisis in Latin America: An Evangelical Perspective (1989, with William D. Taylor) in English.

STEPHEN SYWULKA

Nuttall, Enos (1842–1916). English missionary and church leader in Jamaica. Nuttall grew up in a church-based family and came to faith early in life. Educated largely by personal study and tutoring, he was later granted honorary B.D. (1879) and doctoral degrees (1908) recognizing his exemplary life and service.

Appointed a lay preacher for the Wesleyan church at the age of seventeen, a growing interest in missions in the Fiji Islands led him to London where he sat under George Osborn’s tutelage. After three years, Osborn asked Nuttall to go to Jamaica and serve the Wesleyan Missionary Society (WMS), and he set sail in 1862.

After three years as a WMS lay missionary, Nuttall’s perception that the WMS bore an un-Wesley-like antagonism toward the Church of England (CoE) eventually resulted in his application as a candidate for ministry within the CoE. He was accepted in 1886, and ordained four months later. Consecrated Bishop of Jamaica in 1880 and Primate of the West Indies in 1893, Nuttall served a total of fifty-four years in Jamaica. He was a prolific writer, though the bulk of his work is in his journals (comprising 19 volumes, begun in 1866), letters (over 35,000 in all), articles, and papers. Despite bouts with severe illness, Nuttall served tirelessly and played critical roles ranging from helping to organize the Church of Jamaica after disestablishment from the CoE to founding education, medical, housing, and agricultural works as well as providing a strong, stabilizing influence after a devastating earthquake in 1907.

Obedience. Obedience (literally, “hearing under”) embodies the core essence of the Christian life. Christ’s obedience, learned from suffering (Heb. 5:8), provides the model (Phil. 2:8) and stands in stark contrast to Adam’s disobedience (Rom. 5:17–18). Genuine faith results in obedience (Rom. 1:5), and obedience convincingly demonstrates our love for Christ (John 14:21).

The Great Commission (Matt. 28:19–20) contains one command to obey (“make disciples”) and then describes a disciple as one who is baptized and being taught to obey. Here baptism illustrates the theological realities of being identified with Christ (Rom. 6:3–7) and placed into Christ (1 Cor. 12:12, 13). Thus, a disciple has been incorporated into Christ, into the invisible, universal body of Christ (Gal. 3:26–28) and into a visible, local body of believers (Acts 2:41). Then, in the context of that local church, a disciple begins the lifelong process of being taught to obey everything that Jesus commanded. Discipleship involves teaching a lifestyle of obedience, not merely a list of facts and doctrines.

The issue of obedience raises a significant and legitimate missiological concern. When a person from one culture defines obedience for someone from another culture, there exists the danger of cultural imperialism. Cultural rather than biblical norms may be put forward to be obeyed (e.g., North American Evangelicalism’s stance against drinking as opposed to many European believers’ enjoyment of alcoholic beverages, or Western forms and styles of worship as opposed to the use of traditional African music and instruments). Obedience must always be presented in the context of supra-cultural principles, though separating the biblical from the cultural is often quite difficult.

Obedience may cost in every culture. The Western believer may face ridicule and social ostracism, the loss of a job or a friend. For others, obedience may carry a much higher price. In many restrictive cultures or countries, the obedience of the disciple might lead to expulsion from the family, imprisonment, torture, and even death (see Martyrdom). Whatever the cost, the truth remains that obedience is not optional for the believer.

Occom, Samson (1723–92). Native American preacher and evangelist. Born in Mohegan (near New London, Connecticut) to a non-Christian family, Occom came to faith at seventeen during the Great Awakening. In 1743 he began tutelage under Eleazar Wheelock, a Congregational missionary to the Iroquois. He served the Montuak for twelve years as a teacher and minister; being ordained by the Long Island Presbytery in 1759. In 1761 he traveled to central New York to work among the Oneida, and in 1765 he embarked on a highly successful two-year fund raising trip on behalf of Wheelock’s Indian Charity School in Lebanon, Connecticut. His return to Connecticut brought reverse culture shock when his wife refused to adapt to British ways, and further personal shock when Wheelock moved the school to New Hampshire and opened it to whites, using the money raised by Occom to found Dartmouth College. The two separated, and Occom fell into poverty.

The last phase of Occom’s life was spent working to develop a town where native Americans from diverse backgrounds would live and work in harmony. Brothertown was founded in Oneida territory after Occom secured a land grant in 1773. With the exception of the interruption of the Revolutionary War, Occom recruited people to move there, taking permanent residence himself in 1789. He published sermons, a hymn book, and one of the earliest Native American autobiographies (A Short Narrative of My Life; 1768). He is recognized by many as the best known Native American evangelist of the eighteenth century.

Occultist, Occultism

Occultist, Occultism. The shaman and other practitioners of the occult (the term comes from the Latin for “hidden” or “concealed”) rely on secret techniques to gain access to the supernatural realm and obtain knowledge or power. Occult practices include astrology, divination, reliance on charms or fetishes, fortune telling (tarot cards, tea leaf reading, Ouija board, palm reading), magic, numerology (attaching special significance to numbers), automatic writing (and speaking), seances, witchcraft (see Wicca), and so on. The practices are as varied as the cultures in which they are found.

Practitioners typically separate what they consider good practices (white magic) from evil ones (black magic or sorcery). Biblically, the two are inextricably intertwined, since the same techniques that are used for one may be used for the other. Occult practices and practitioners of all types are judged harshly in the Bible (Deut. 18:9–14). Such practices are demonic in origin, and are forbidden to the Christian. Those who fear bad luck need to know how to use prayer to exercise the authority they have in Christ. Those who fear spirits or sorcerers need to know substitutes to help them face their fears. Without such substitutes, they may return to the occult.

Often in history people came to faith when missionaries successfully challenged the occult practitioners with the power of God (see Power Encounter). At the same time the missionary must be aware not just of the practices but of the purposes they serve within the culture. For example, people rely on the occult for protection from spirits, sorcerers, evil people, bad luck, and so on. Those who come to Christ and give up occult protection need appropriate Christian substitutes to help them face their fears. Without such substitutes, they may return to the occult. Those who fear spirits or sorcerers need to know how to use prayer to exercise the authority they have in Christ. Those who fear bad luck need to understand God’s sovereign and loving control over the universe. Creative application of the truths of God to the needs of the people is an important component of missionary work among occultists.

Oceania. Oceania is one of the most Christianized areas of the world. In a brief period of two hundred years, Christianity has spread across the vast expanse of the Pacific Ocean. Consisting of approximately 25,000 islands, Oceania extends from Easter Island on the east to Palau on the west; from Hawaii and the northern Mariana Islands on the north to Australia and New Zealand on the south.

Traditional society in Oceania is usually divided into four main cultural areas: Polynesia, Micronesia, Melanesia, and Australia (Aborigines). The original hunting-and-gathering peoples of Australia and Melanesia came in the first of several major waves of migrations from Southeast Asia at least forty thousand years ago. Later, people with an agricultural way of living populated Micronesia, Micronesia, and Polynesia, as their boating skills allowed them to traverse immense distances of open waters. Beginning at the end of the eighteenth century, settlers and migrants from Europe and other parts of the world would soon form the majority of the populations of both Australia and New Zealand (whose original people, the Maoris, were Polynesian). Also, large numbers of indentured plantation laborers from India went to Fiji, and Filipinos, Japanese, and Chinese came to Hawaii.

The first organized mission work in Oceania itself was done by Catholic Spanish missionaries and Filipino catechists in Guam and other Mariana Islands in the seventeenth century, and by Spanish missionaries from Peru in Tahiti in the following century. However, the first major missionary movement was the fruit of the eighteenth-century evangelical revival in Britain—sparked by such great preachers as Whitefield and Wesley. Through his influence and financial support, Thomas Haweis convinced his fellow co-founders of the London Missionary Society (LMS) to establish their first mission in the Pacific. Their own ship, the Duff, carried thirty missionaries in 1797 to Tahiti, the Marquesas, and Tonga. Tahiti, although abandoned for a short time in 1808, would become the base for the LMS—“the first sustained Christian missionary activity in the South Sea islands” (Gunson, 1978, 12). John Williams, their most famous missionary of this early period, and others sent out Polynesian evangelists, who “laid the foundation for the evangelization of Oceania” (Douglas, 1986, 23).

The LMS was soon joined by others. An evangelical Anglican mission was established in 1814 by the Church Missionary Society (CMS) in New Zealand under the direction of Samuel Marsden, who greatly influenced the early stages of evangelical missionary work throughout Oceania. CMS established the first mission among the Maoris of New Zealand and stimulated further missionary outreach by the Anglican churches of New Zealand and Australia.

Congregational missionaries from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in Boston arrived in Hawaii in 1820 and eventually expanded into Micronesia. English Methodists of the Wesleyan Missionary Society established a base in New Zealand in 1820, and contributed to the missionary movement from Tahiti and Hawaii westward across the Pacific into Tonga, Samoa, and Fiji. The Mormons began in present-day French Polynesia in 1844, and the Seventh-Day Adventists came to the Pacific around 1890.
After recovering from the effects of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars, the Catholic Church in France began sending members of newly founded missionary societies to the Pacific in the 1830s. The Congregation of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, or Picpus Fathers, worked in the eastern area of Oceania, and the Marists in the central. On many of the islands where Protestant missionaries had already begun working, there was competition between Catholics and Protestants. However, Christianity was established through the initial contacts of Catholic missionaries in such places as the islands of Mangareva and the Marquesas of present-day French Polynesia, and in Wallis and Futuna of western Polynesia.

The history of Christianity in Oceania in the nineteenth century is unfortunately scarred by tensions between Protestant and Catholic missionaries and churches. This situation was aggravated even further as competing colonial governments eventually began sweeping over the Pacific and in varying degrees favored “their own”—France the Catholics and Britain the Protestants.

Around 1850, primary missionary efforts began shifting to western Oceania, especially Melanesia. In contrast to Polynesia, Christianity was often accepted en masse with the conversion of their king or other hereditary leaders, missionaries faced a much different situation in Melanesia, consisting of many, smaller competitive social and linguistic units with a more fluid style of achieved leadership by elders, or “big men.” In addition to these linguistic and cultural challenges, a number of missionaries died due to sickness and attacks by the islanders, who often identified the missionaries with the behavior of labor-recruiters, traders, and colonial officials—the great wave of outsiders “invading” their world and forcing them to jump directly from the Stone Age into modern times. While their intentions and approaches were very different, missionaries and Christianity admittedly played a significant role in the phenomenon of social change (cf. Whiteman).

Within this Melanesian context, the Anglican Church of New Zealand in 1849 initiated the successful Melanesian Mission under George Selwyn’s innovative leadership. Presbyterian missionaries of the late evangelical revival in Scotland began in the 1850s in the Melanesian islands of New Hebrides (present-day Vanuatu). Due to his widely read autobiography, John Paton became their most famous missionary. Around 1875, George Brown established the first missionary effort of Australian Methodists in the Bismarck Archipelago, with Fijian and Samoan Methodists also joining them. The Missionaries of the Sacred Heart (MCS), another Catholic congregation from France, came to this area in 1882. In the same year, the interdenominational Queensland Kanaka Mission began its work among Solomon Islands sugar plantation workers in Australia, and then in 1904 changed its name to South Sea Evangelical Mission and, based on the China Inland Mission model, extended its missionary outreach to the Solomon Islands.

New Guinea, the largest island in Oceania, was the last to be approached by missionaries. By the end of the nineteenth century, only the coastal area had been touched. Appropriately the LMS, the pioneer missionaries of the Pacific, began on the south coast in 1871, and MSC on Yule Island in 1885. When the British established a protectorate on part of New Guinea in 1884, it was the first case in Oceania of a colonial government taking the initiative to invite missionaries—in this case, the Methodists and Anglicans from Australia. Germany annexed the northeastern part of the island in 1884 and one Catholic and two Protestant missionary agencies came from Germany: the Society of the Divine Word, Rhenish Missionary Society, and Neuendettelsau Mission Society.

By 1900, Christianity was just beginning in Melanesia, but in the rest of Oceania national churches for whole island groups were established and sent out their own missionaries. Pacific islanders played a major role in the world missionary movement (cf. Tippett), as did the young immigrant churches of Australia and New Zealand.

As for the issue of mission and politics, missionaries in eastern and central Oceania had arrived before the colonial powers and were very influential in precolonial political developments. Most missionaries did not initially favor colonial annexation, but many later changed this stance. Eventually, Tonga would be the only island nation to avoid colonial rule. In Melanesia, missionaries for the most part arrived after colonial annexation.

The years between 1900 and 1942 marked a period of relative stability for most island peoples and churches and it has even been called “the high point in the life and influence of South Pacific Christianity” (Forman, 1982, 11). Although colonial rule had somewhat curtailed the earlier influence of the church in island societies in eastern and central Oceania, other influences from outside the area were not too intrusive. Movements toward establishing independent churches began in Tonga, Samoa, and Fiji. At this same time, Christian missionary efforts were slowly but steadily making progress in Melanesia. The most significant newcomer to the missionary field during this period was the Assemblies of God.

This relative tranquility was shattered in 1942 as Oceania was engulfed in the turmoil of World War II. While some of the islands were only used as military bases, others became combat zones.
Oceania

large number of islanders and missionaries died due to the war. Besides the upheaval to daily life (including missionary and church activities), events surrounding the war triggered shock waves of tumultuous social change throughout the Pacific, which often led to the dramatic phenomenon of adjustment movements (cf. Forman, 1982, 154–63; see also CARGO CULTS).

In the political arena, no sooner had colonial rule shifted in some islands through postwar negotiations, then there were initial steps toward political independence. A stronger call for church independence followed and missionaries in general took a more supportive backseat role. The Pacific Council of Churches was established in 1966. Also, many new religious groups were entering Oceania after World War II (cf. Ernst).

By 1980, most of the larger churches of Oceania had achieved independence and were sending missionaries to other parts of the world. For example, the churches with an LMS background are now joined together through the Council for World Mission. The Pacific is probably “the most solidly Christian part of the world” (Forman, 1982, 227), out of which “the regional concentration of evangelicals in the Pacific (17.6% of the Christian population) is the highest worldwide” (Ernst, 1994, 11). However, Pacific Islander Christians are facing new challenges today as each generation strives to respond to the continual call of God’s mission.

Oceania

Spanish Catholic missionaries saw a small measure of success in the seventeenth century. However, it was not until well after British, Protestant missions—such as the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS), the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS), and the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society—started arriving around 1800 that Catholicism (increasingly French) started to grow significantly. Moreover, it has been primarily Protestant or independent efforts that have included the work of indigenous missionaries. For example, Tahitian missionaries first took Christianity to Fiji under the LMS; a missionary from Kiribati named Tabuia independently evangelized Nauru between 1888 and 1899; and, after a Samoan convert from Tonga had brought Christianity to Samoa in 1828, a Samoan missionary named Paulo helped lead two hundred to three hundred Niueans to faith by 1852. Other groups not long in coming to Oceania included the Presbyterians, the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, the Seventh-Day Adventists, and the Liebenzell Mission.

A further illustration of the connection between Protestant (especially the LMS) and indigenous mission efforts was the Cook Islands Christian Church, begun by the LMS in the 1820s, which sent about seventy missionaries to Papua New Guinea between 1872 and 1896. Also, an LMS seminary established in 1844 trained numerous Samoans for evangelistic outreach. After Tahitians had helped evangelize Samoa in the 1830s, an LMS missionary named Murray trained Samoans in Tutuila, who in turn spread the gospel eastward to Manua.

Tahitian missionaries indeed have gone out all over the Pacific, as have Samoans: by 1972, over 210 Samoan Congregationalists had served as missionaries, introducing Christianity to Tokelau, Niue, the Gilbert and Ellis Islands (now Kiribati and Tuvalu), and Vanuatu. Moreover, new missionaries continue to be sent out throughout the Pacific and around the world. The Fijian church has been sending overseas missionaries for over one hundred years, and Tongan missionaries have gone out throughout the Pacific (e.g., to Samoa and Fiji in the nineteenth century), including Australia, Hawaii, and California.

Naming all of the missions and similar organizations operating in Oceania today would make a rather extensive list. Some of them are as follows, listed (where applicable) with their dates of establishment and grouped into identifiable categories: ecumenical agencies: Pacific Conference of Churches (PCC, 1966); Council for World Mission (formerly LMS, 1977); parachurch agencies for literature distribution: The Bible Society of the South Pacific, Lotu Pasifika Productions (1973); educational institutions: Pacific Theological College (associated with the PCC, 1965), Pacific Regional Seminary (Catholic, 1972), Christian Leaders Training Colleges; research and training organizations: The Micronesian Seminar; Pacific Churches Research Center (1976); student fellowships: Campus Crusade for Christ, Pacific Students for Christ; women’s groups: YWCA (1974), The Girls’ Brigade Asia-Pacific. The continuing presence of ex-patriate missionaries in leadership roles is perhaps best exemplified in the work of Wycliffe Bible Translators, Mission Aviation Fellowship, and Christian Radio Missionary Fellowship in Papua New Guinea. Overall, however, the international missionary community in PNG and throughout Oceania works largely in supporting and cooperating with indigenous churches and missions in seeking to reach out to as yet unreached groups, as well as to countries throughout the world.

Old Testament Prophets. The message and ministry of the Old Testament prophets focused primarily on Israel. At the same time, the commitment to communicating Yahweh’s message to his people reflects an awareness of God’s involvement in the history of other nations. Whether focusing on the various dimensions of life within the elect community or on the course of events in surrounding states, these spokespersons grounded their words in the person of Yahweh. This attention to the singularity of Yahweh must, therefore, be the starting point for any discussion of the mission of the people of God in the prophetic material.

The Uniqueness of God. The prophets repeatedly denounce the waywardness of Israel’s penchant for seeking after other gods. The narrative of Elijah’s confrontation with the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18) might be the most impressive account of the continuous attack on Idolatry and Syncretism, but the prophetic books are replete with passages underscoring that Yahweh alone is God and contrasting the reality of his person to the idols’ lack of substance.

Isaiah, for instance, describes Yahweh as the sovereign Creator: he is not like the idols crafted by human hands (40:12–31; 44:6–20; 45:14–46:9), which can neither know nor bring to effect the things that are to come (41:22–23; 43:12–13; 44:7–8; 45:11, 21; 46:10; 48:3–5). Jeremiah and Ezekiel decry the presence of images in the sanctuary of Jerusalem and the pernicious presence of idolatry throughout Israel’s history (Jer. 2, 10; Ezek. 8, 16, 23). Hosea powerfully presents the profound covenant love of Yahweh for his people through the parallel experiences of his own marriage (Hos. 1–3, 11) and angrily reproaches the Northern Kingdom for worshiping at the high places (4:10–5:7).

The social sciences and philosophical Ethics can illuminate in part this diligence in highlighting the uniqueness of Yahweh (Carroll, 1992, 49–91, 122–34). Humans create and order their social worlds and cultures, and these contexts to a large extent determine self-understanding and perspectives on personal and communal life. Religion can play a significant role in this social construction of reality by providing answers to the ultimate questions of existence, detailing rules for life and welfare, and legitimizing (or challenging) social structures and practices through divine revelations, symbols, and rituals. In other words, a society’s makeup, mores, and activities are impacted by its concept of God. The prophetic struggle to clarify the nature of the person of Yahweh and defend his demands, as well as their censure of inappropriate worship, is ultimately therefore a battle over Israel’s self-definition and its vision of mission among the nations.

The Demand of Justice. The emphasis within the prophets on the person of God explains the all-encompassing breadth of their message (Birch, 1991, 240–69; Gossai). What the prophets seek is that the nation who calls itself by Yahweh’s name reflect his person in every dimension of life. Thus, they speak to the actions and the ethos of the marketplace, judicial abuses, economic inequalities, and national foreign policy decisions. The persistent denouncing of religious ritual is not a call to definitively abolish sacrifice, but is rather a cry against religion divorced from justice and righteousness (e.g., Isa. 1; Hos. 4, 6; Micah 6; Amos 4–6).

This demand for worship of the one true God and for justice and compassion is not limited to God’s people. It extends to every nation. Several prophetic books contain extensive sections of oracles directed against other nations’ idolatry, cruelty in warfare, and unrestrained greed (e.g., Isa. 13–23; Jer. 46–51; Ezek. 25–32; Amos 1–2; Obad.; Nahum). In sum, mission within the prophetic corpus envisions that the people of God be a blessing among the nations in holiness and truth (cf. Gen. 12:1–9; see ABRAHAMIC COVENANT), yet these concerns are universalized to encompass all of humanity.

The Future Hope of the Prophets. The tone of the prophets is overwhelmingly negative. Most announce imminent and inevitable judgment. Yet, many also envision a future of peace, prosperity, and holiness beyond the coming divine chastisement. Most fundamentally, the prophetic hope centers around the Messiah. Different passages offer several pictures of the person and ministry of Yahweh’s Anointed One (Kaiser; 1978, 182–261; Satterthwaite, Hess, Wenham). He will be a king and a shepherd, and he will be led by the Spirit of God. The Suffering Servant of Isaiah (Isa. 42; 49; 50; 52:13–53:12; 61), more than any other description, points to the extent of Yahweh's love and holy requirements: although meek, the Servant will persist even unto death to accomplish the task of bringing justice and salvation to the ends of the earth, for the glory of the Lord.
Old Testament Prophets

Another related dimension of the prophetic hope is the eschatological role of Zion. Its importance for mission lies in the belief that in the future the nations would stream to the mountain of God to learn of Yahweh and enjoy his abundant provision (e.g., Isa. 2:2–4; 25:6–9; 66:17–24). Interpreters differ in their understanding of the fulfillment of the promises concerning the Messiah and Jerusalem, yet all agree that in some measure these hopes have been realized in the life and ministry of Jesus, at Pentecost, and in the history of the church.

Classic Prophetic Mission Passages Reconsidered. Those interested in missionary outreach and recruitment naturally go to the Old Testament seeking echoes of the New Testament mandates to take the good news of salvation to the ends of the earth. Two portions that have continually been appealed to are the call of Isaiah (Isa. 6, especially verse 8) and the Book of Jonah. The utilization of these passages, however, often does not reflect the textual data.

The charge to Isaiah is not to go to the nations with a word of hope. He is to announce irrevocable doom on his own people, without any expectation of repentance and escape from disaster (Isa. 6: 9–13). What is more, the words "Here am I, send me!" are not a response to an open-ended invitation to participate in God's plan for world evangelization, but instead reflect the willingness of the prophet to accept his difficult commission. He is the only human being present in this temple scene. Yahweh, although he has multitudes of seraphs ready to do his will (vv. 2–4), has decided to send someone from Judah. Isaiah apparently never leaves Jerusalem, and much of his ministry is directed at the monarchy. Nevertheless, a global element is present in the angelic proclamation that the whole earth is full of God's glory (v. 3). A careful reading of these lines in the context of the book, however, reveals that it will be Emmanuel, the Davidic king (Isa. 7, 9, 11, 32), who is also the Suffering Servant of later chapters, who will bring that universal glory to Yahweh through his righteous person and reign.

Warnings not to evade the touch of God to go to the nations sometimes point to the prophet Jonah for biblical support. The overriding sovereignty of God, it is said, will redirect the path of the disobedient to conform to the Missionary Call. The problem with this view is that the notion of going to the nations contradicts the Old Testament hope of their coming to Zion. In light of the vocabulary of 1:2 (cf. Gen. 4:10; 18:20), what one expects is that Jonah will go preach judgment against the sinful city. In fact, this is what he does when he finally arrives at Nineveh (3:4). It is not until chapter 4 that the prophet says why he ran away: he knew that the love of God extended beyond covenant boundaries (4:2, 11; cf. Exod. 34:6–7). He desired above all else the destruction of a violent empire, who was the enemy of Israel (3:8). The Book of Jonah, therefore, does not speak of obstinateness at obeying a missionary call. Perhaps a better application of its message resides in the realization that God's mercy must overcome all human prejudice and hatred, even if it is rooted in the memories of horrific suffering at the hands of the powerful.

In sum, the Old Testament prophets do not directly address world missions, as this is understood in the New Testament and the Christian church. Instead, their contribution lies in that they display the character of God, who, on the one hand, requires that his people accomplish the mission of being a holy people among the nations. On the other hand, this same Yahweh demonstrates that his love and justice are universal, both in the future judgment of all nations and in the worldwide ministry of Messiah.

SEE ALSO Old Testament Theology of Mission.

Old Testament Theology of Mission. Given that Israel was not sent out across cultural or geographical barriers, can one speak of mission at all in the Old Testament? Such a view, however, identifies mission too exclusively with the activity of human missionaries, whereas the Bible speaks first of all of the mission of God in God's world, and derives all human mission from that prior reality (see Missio Dei). From that point of view the Old Testament is fundamental for two reasons. First, it presents the mission and purpose of God with great power and clarity and with universal implications for all humanity. Second, the Old Testament shaped the very nature of the mission of the New Testament church, which, indeed, felt compelled to justify its mission practice from the Scriptures we now call the Old Testament.

Coming after the primordial history of Genesis 1–11, in which the nations of humanity are portrayed as in rebellion against God, scattered and divided under his judgment, God’s call of Abraham and the promise made to him, in Genesis 12, come as a radical new start in human history. After the three specific promises of posterity, blessing, and land comes the astonishing declaration of God’s intention: “through you, all the families/nations of the earth will receive blessing” (Gen. 12:3, and cf. 18:18; 22:18; 26:4f.; 28:14; 35:11). Although the focus of attention from here on would be Israel as the descendants of Abraham, the ultimate mission of God is to bless the nations of humanity (see ABRAHAMIC COVENANT)—good news, indeed, in the light of the preceding chapters, and described as such by Paul, in defense of his own mission to the (Gentile) nations, in Galatians 3:8.

Missiologically the covenant with Abraham contains two balancing truths. First is the universality of God’s purpose in the election of Abraham and Israel. They were called into existence only because of God’s “missionary” purpose of ultimate blessing to all nations. Israel’s election was not for the rejection of the nations, but for the sake of their salvation. Hence Paul’s insistence that the in-gathering of the Gentiles in his day was not a contradiction of the promises made to Israel, but rather their eschatological fulfillment. Blessing the nations (which was the fruit of his mission) was the very reason for Israel’s existence in the first place. Let those who wanted to make the Gentile converts into followers of Moses, “consider Abraham…” (Gal. 3:6–9).

Second is the particularity of the means God would use to bring about this universal blessing—“through you…” The instrument by which God would bless the nations would be the historical, particular; unique people he had created and called. Their uniqueness would ultimately be inherited by the Messiah, Jesus, as the one in whose name alone “repentance and forgiveness would be preached to all nations, beginning in Jerusalem” (Luke 24:47). It is important to hold these balancing truths together in a Biblical Theology of Mission: the inclusive, universal goal (God’s commitment to bless the nations); and the exclusive, particular means (the people, the Person, through whom God chose to do so).

The People: “A Light to the Nations.” The nation of Israel was not, of course, physically sent out to the nations. Yet there are aspects of their identity and role that clearly have missional significance (see ISRAEL’S ROLE). First, there was the uniqueness of their historical experience of God’s revelation and redemption (Deut. 4:32–40). No other nation experienced what they had of the knowledge or the saving power of God. This unique experience, however, was not an exclusive privilege, but a trust: “so that you might know that Yahweh is God in heaven above and on the earth beneath, and there is no other.” The uniqueness of Israel’s covenantal experience was the basis of their understanding of the uniqueness of Yahweh as God. This dimension of Israel’s redemptive monotheism underlies the missiary nature of the New Testament proclamation of the UNIENCE OF CHRIST as Lord and Savior. (Note the way certain key Old Testament monotheistic texts are christologically expanded and quoted in the New Testament: e.g., Deut. 6:4, 4:35, 39 and 1 Cor. 8:5–6; Isa. 45:22–24 and Phil. 2:10–11).

Second, Israel was called to ethical distinctiveness, as part of what it meant to be “a light to the nations.” As early as the patriarchal narratives, the link between the socioethical quality of life of the covenant community and the fulfillment of God’s promise of blessing to the nations is made (Gen. 18:18–19). In Deuteronomy 4:6–8 Israel’s visibility before the nations is put forward as a motivation for obedience to the law. Indeed, this missional perspective transforms a Christian understanding of the meaning of the law itself. Obedience was not only to be a matter of response to the grace of God’s redemption (Deut. 6:20–25), but was to be for the purpose of attracting others to the light of God’s presence among God’s people (Isa. 58:6–10; 60:1–3; 62:1–2).

Third, Israel was given an identity (priestliness) and a task (holiness) in the foundational declaration at Sinai (Exod. 19:3–6). The priesthood in Israel stood between God and the rest of the people, both teaching God’s law to the people and representing the people before God through sacrifice. Entrusted to Israel as a whole, the task of being God’s priesthood in the midst of the nations is a mission in itself—to bring the knowledge of God to the nations, and to be the means of bringing the nations to God. Both centrifugal and centripetal dynamics are present in prophetic visions of this role (e.g., Isa. 2:2–5; 66:19–21). To be holy was to be fundamentally different (Lev. 18:3), and that difference was to be visible in social, economic, and political terms, not just in religion (Lev. 19). There is a correspondence between the desired visibility of Israel’s distinctive ethic as a means of drawing the nations (Deut. 4:6–8) and the New Testament ethical exhortations that have the same missiological implications (Matt. 5:14–16; John 13:34f.; 1 Peter 2:9–12). As Luke observed, the social and economic life of the early Christian community was inseparable from the apostolic preaching in producing the growth and spread of the church (Acts 2:44–47; 4:34 [quoting Deut. 15:4]).

The Scope: The Totality of Human Need. Mission involves declaring and applying the redeeming work of God to the brokenness of the world. But what is the nature of that brokenness and what does redemption consist of? Again, it is the Old Testament Theology of Mission

Old Testament that provides so much of the fundamental worldview that underlies the assumptions and practice of Christian mission. Its comprehensive analysis of the human predicament in terms of moral rebellion, the personal, social, historical, and ecological effects of sin, alongside the rich vocabulary through which this whole taxonomy of evil is expressed, all combine to forestall a shallow vagueness about what salvation needs to be and leaves us in no doubt that only God can accomplish it. An adequate understanding of the gospel depends upon an adequate appreciation of the radical effects of sin. It is the Old Testament that provides this earthy realism.

Similarly, the Old Testament presentation of redemption offers a rich variety of models, all of which have influenced the Christian understanding of salvation through Christ and the missionary task of the people of God. The exodus, of course, stands as the key Old Testament model of redemption (and is celebrated as such, Exod. 15:13), with its comprehensive deliverance of Israel from political, economic, social, and spiritual bondage. The same holistic understanding of God’s concern is found in the laws that the redeemed people were to follow in the land—perhaps most clearly in the Jubilee institution (Lev. 25), with its thrust toward restoration of people to meaningful participation in the community through access to fruitful resources. But it too is based on the theological roots of God’s sovereignty and historical redemption (the exodus). The Jubilee strongly influenced Jesus’ understanding of his own mission, and found eschatological echoes in the early missionary preaching of the church (Acts 3:21).

Then there is the sacrificial system, providing atonement and cleansing from sin. The cultic dynamics of Leviticus have been woven deeply into the Christian understanding of the death of Jesus, and in the hands of Paul, become, paradoxically, the language he uses to portray the power of the cross to unite Jew and Gentile in God’s forgiveness (Rom. 3:25–31; Eph. 2:11–22 etc.). When Jesus declared, then, that “repentance and forgiveness would be preached in his name to all nations,” the understanding of what those terms mean was already prepared for in the Scriptures (as indeed he was pointing out, Luke 24:45–47). Clearly, a holistic understanding of the nature of mission flows from a biblically holistic view of what redemption means and includes (see Holistic Mission). It is this breadth of understanding that the Old Testament contributes.

The Old Testament, however, has rich resources for mission which are not directly tied in to the redemptive-historical tradition of Israel. The wisdom literature, for example, with its strong creation base and its adaptation of the wisdom of other cultures to the faith of Yahweh, offers a worldview and an approach to life and living that is perhaps the most cross-culturally bridge-building material in the Bible. Questions of what leads to a happy and successful life (Proverbs), how to wrestle with the problem of suffering (Job), and what to think in the face of futility and death (Ecclesiastes) are perennially and transculturally relevant, and provide an opening for the message of redemption from elsewhere in the canon.

And the worship of Israel at times rises to a breadth of universal vision in its faith imagination, in summoning all nations and all the ends of the earth to praise Yahweh (e.g., Pss. 47, 67, 96, 98, etc.)—a vision that is implicitly missionary in effect—as Paul realized when he quotes such material as the climax of his own missionary vision of the ingathering of the Gentiles (e.g., Rom. 15:7–12).

The Goal: “To Bring My Salvation to the Ends of the Earth.” The eschatological vision of the Old Testament envisages the nations being brought in to share the blessings enjoyed by Israel. That was, of course, the very reason for Israel’s election in the first place, and indeed “Israel” comes to be redefined and extended in a way that prophetically anticipates Paul’s missionary theology in Romans 9–11.

In some contexts the nations are portrayed as summoned to celebrate what God had done in Israel, even when, paradoxically that included Israel’s victory over them (cf. Ps. 47:1–4). The only justification for that must have been that the nations would somehow benefit from Israel’s salvation history, unique as it was (cf. Pss. 22:27–28, 67; 96:1–3; 98:1–3). The Deuteronomic history has some remarkable passages anticipating this universal blessing, most notably of all the prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the temple (1 Kings 8:41–43) in which God is asked to do for the foreigner whatever he asked in prayer (which had not even been promised to Israel!), so that God’s name would be known and praised throughout the earth. Did those Gentiles who appealed so movingly to Jesus have any suspicion of the way they fulfilled this prayer (Matt. 8:5–13; 15:21–28)?

But in other contexts we find a more breathtaking vision that the nations would ultimately be included, along with Israel, as the extended people of God. Psalm 47:9 includes Gentile nobles “as the people of the God of Abraham.” Isaiah 19:19–25 extends the privileged status of Israel (“my people, my inheritance, my handiwork”) to their historical enemies. Isaiah 56:3–8 anticipates the joyful inclusion of certain categories of people previously excluded by the law (Deut. 23:1–3). Doubtless Luke intends us to see this text finding its first fulfillment in the salvation of the foreigner who was also a eunuch, and who was reading Isaiah at the time (Acts 8:26–39)! Significantly, though he had been to the temple in Jerusalem, the Ethiopian eunuch actually found joy when he believed in Jesus, the temple’s fulfillment. A little later in Acts, James uses Amos 9:11–12 to clinch the theological (i.e., scriptural) justification for the amazing success of the Gentile mission (Acts 15:13–18).

This great Old Testament vision lies behind Paul’s missiological theology of the multinational nature of the eschatological community being created in the Messiah, Jesus. Far from undermining in any way God’s faithfulness to his promises to Israel, the ingathering of the nations was nothing less than the fulfillment of the very mission and raison d’être of Israel.

The Servant of the Lord: “A Light to the Nations and the Glory of Your People Israel.” The mission of the servant, which was also bound up with the identity and mission of the Servant, the mysterious figure in Isaiah 40–55 whose identity seems to oscillate between that of Israel and that of an individual yet to come. The mission of the Servant would be one of justice, gentleness, enlightenment, and liberation (Isa. 42:1–9). But it would also involve rejection and apparent failure (Isa. 49:4; 50:6–8) in the task of restoring Israel to God. In response to that, his mission would be extended to include the nations to the ends of the earth (Isa. 49:6). In that way, the mission of the Servant would be the fulfillment of the mission of Israel itself.

This dual nature of the Servant’s mission—restoration of Israel and bringing salvation to the nations—lies behind the perception of the New Testament that the first task was Jesus’ primary mission, while the second was entrusted to the church. This probably influenced the shape of Luke’s two-volume work. His Gospel describes the mission of the servant to Israel, and Acts describes the fulfillment of Israel’s scriptural mission in the ingathering of the Gentiles. This combined missiological understanding of Luke–Acts seems clearest in the “hinge” material of Luke 24:44–49 and Acts 1:6–8. It also seems that the dual nature of the servant’s mission influenced the historical and theological shape of Paul’s missionary strategy (Acts 13:46–48; Rom. 15:8–9), explaining among other things why one so conscious of his commission to the Gentiles believed it crucial that the gospel be preached “to the Jew first” (Rom. 1:16; 2:9–11).

Oldham, Joseph Houldsworth (1874–1969). Scottish ecumenical leader. Born in India to Scottish evangelical parents, he graduated from Oxford, where he had been John Mott’s guide in 1891. He served the YMCA in India (1897–1901), then studied divinity at New College, Edinburgh, where he was to organize the World Missionary Conference (Edinburgh, 1910) and edit its nine-volume report. The diminutive Scot hailed by John Mott as “the deepest thinker and most influential worker in the British Student Movement,” was named secretary (1910–21) of the continuation committee, not least because, sensitive to delicate situations, he was trusted both by the Germans and by the Anglo-Catholics. Oldham helped found and became joint secretary of the International Missionary Council (1921–38) and founded and edited the International Review of Missions (1912–27). Concerned that missions might drift into a backwater, he begged Mott to concentrate exclusively on the IMC. He was also chief architect of the 1937 Oxford conference and edited the Christian News Letter (1939–45), which sought to encourage Christian witness in secular life. His latter years were chiefly spent in improving the educational and social standards of the indigenous African peoples. He saw the importance of the future church in Africa, and persuaded missionary societies and the British government to devote more resources to Africa. Oldham’s work was sometimes suspect in some American missionary circles whose continuing suspicion of colonialism led them to believe that his labors were only of value for the British Empire. He wrote Christianity and the Race Problem (1924) and A Devotional Diary (1929).

(Est. 2000 pop.: 2,626,000; 212,457 sq. km. [82,030 sq. mi.]). The sultanate of Oman is one of the Gulf states in the southeast of the Arabian Peninsula. Oman is famous as an ancient trade center. In 1749, the dynasty of the al-Sa’id gained the Imanate with Ahmad bin Sa’id and established a sea empire. Trading in spices and slaves made Oman rich.

Although Oman’s oil production started in 1967, the then Sultan Sa’id bin Taimur continued to isolate the country and forbade any innovation (no press, no media, no bikes, no glasses allowed; only three schools existed as well as twenty-five beds in a single hospital). Only after a coup d’etat... in 1970 did the monarch's son, Sultan Qabus bin Said bin Taimur al-Said, gradually reform this medieval monarchy. Although he became the symbol of progress and development, he also paid respect to tradition. Today Oman remains an absolute monarchy (no political parties, no Constitution, no labor union, no Parliament), but with considerable freedom, political stability, and welfare for the average person. Still, much remains to be done for the approximately 60 percent illiterate with an annual growth of about 3.8 percent, since Oman's oil resources will probably be depleted by the year 2020.

Although open Christian witness is forbidden among the 65 percent Kbadi, 30 percent Sunni, and 5 percent Shi'i Muslims of Oman, there are 2.5 percent Christians of different denominations among the 530,000 foreign workers from the Philippines, Pakistan, India, Baluchistan, Europe, and the Near East. They worship in four centers in a number of churches. Foreign workers have been converted, and many of them are in daily contact with Omani people.

CHRISTINE SCHIRRMACHER

Omnipresence of God. God is infinite and therefore cannot be limited, measured, constrained, or contained in any particular space. Omnipresence speaks of God as infinite with respect to space. Though God is transcendent and wholly different from physical entities, he cannot be excluded from any part of his creation.

The omnipresence of God was fundamental to Paul's message and mission. He confidently proclaimed to his hearers that God is “not far from each one of us, for in him we live and move and have our being” (Acts 17:27–28). He affirmed that no one can escape God's presence, and could confidently assume that God preceded him and was present, even to his pagan hearers.

The omnipresence of God is personal. The psalmist extols the intimate presence of God that is for him a source of awe and strength, when he wonders: “Where can I go from your Spirit? Where can I flee from your presence?” (Ps. 139:7). God is infinitely and intimately present to humanity in time of need (Ps. 46:1). This is a source of profound assurance and hope: God is personally available to all who call on him—regardless of where they are. However dark the circumstances, God is there.

Those who speak and act in witness to Christ can be assured that God is never absent from a place, a people, or a person. The missionary never brings God, but rather announces and witnesses to the presence of God. The missionary is a witness to this reality and a catalyst by which it is awakened in the hearer's conscience.

Although God is completely present in all places and at all times, at times he is hidden and at other times revealed. At times God is obviously active; at other times God's presence is subtle or quiet.

We cannot assume that God is present where there are dramatic and visible signs. More often than not, God's presence is more difficult to discern. Elijah did not recognize God in the earth-quake, wind, or fire, but in a still small voice (1 Kings 19). Discerning the presence of God begins with recognizing this principle.

Omniscience of God. The omniscience of God describes God as all-knowing, an attribute of majesty that expresses God's transcendence (Weber, 1983, 403, 438). The fact that the merciful God (see GRACE OF GOD) wants to know us completely means that he accepts us and that he loves us. In the Bible the concept of knowing is broader and deeper than rational cognition of facts—it is intimate, loving relationship of care, commitment, and mutuality (e.g., Gen. 4:1; Prov. 1:7; John 8:19; 17:25–26).

Nothing in creation can be hidden from a God of love. The omniscience of God refers to God's knowing all things in terms of extent and scope, as well as in terms of penetration (God knows all things completely and deeply) and time (what has always been, is, and will be). “It is not merely an outer knowledge of its objects; it is also an inner knowledge. It is not partial; it is total” (Barth, II:1, 555; 1 John 15; Ps. 139:11–12). Thus God's foreknowledge is not time-bound, neither does it imply a mechanistic determinism as if God's foreknowledge meant his direct control or causation. Rather, God's foreknowledge is relational (John 1; Eph. 1; Col. 1).

Thus the Bible stresses God's intimate, relational knowing in love. God "knows" as creator. "By his knowledge the deeps were divided" (Prov. 3:20). God knows us in the womb before we are born (Pss. 103:14; 139:15–16). God knows our coming and going and even our thoughts (e.g., 1 Sam. 2:3; Pss. 44:21; 139:1). God knows our needs (Matt. 6:8) and he knows those who are his (2 Tim. 2:19). God knows us in choosing us “in him before the foundation of the world . . . to be adopted as his (children) through Jesus Christ” (Eph. 1:4–5). One of the ways in which the Gospels assert the deity of Jesus is to affirm that Jesus knows people's thoughts, yet does not control them (e.g., Matt. 12:25). He knows his sheep though they have not yet responded to him (e.g., John 10:14).

In cross-cultural missions, the omniscience of God has several implications. First, when we step into a new context of mission, there is an assurance of being accompanied by God in Jesus Christ, by the Holy Spirit. In fact, God has been there already, waiting for us. In the GREAT COMMISSION Jesus says that wherever his disciples go, he will be with them always. His omnipresence implies omniscience. Our Lord knows where we are going, knows us as we cross cultural barriers, and welcomes us when we get there. Second, as creator, sustainer, and lover of all people and all creation, God understands all cultures and all peoples in those cultures. He "knows his sheep," even sheep of another fold. Even while they were yet sinners, "Christ died for (them)" (Rom. 5:8). Thus, when we cross barriers to another culture, we can be assured that God understands the other persons though we may not. God knows their thoughts and their WORLDVIEWS and cares for those to whom we are sent. Third, God's omniscience implies that Christians in all cultures everywhere in the world are intimately known by God and therefore may be assured that they can read the Scriptures and hear God's Word in their own language and culture, and can know God in very special and unique ways in their particular worldview (Van Engen, 1996, 71–89).

OMS International. This mission society was founded by the Pilgrim Holiness missionaries to Japan, Charles E. and Lettie B. Cowman, in 1901. They were joined by Ernest E. Kilbourne whom they had come to know at God's Bible School in Cincinnati. Especially central to their success was their collaboration with Juji Nakada, who had been instrumental in their choice of Japan. Their goal was to establish self-supporting, self-governing, and self-propagating churches on the WILLIAM TAYLOR model. Among the results of this mission in Asia were the Japan Holiness Church and the Korean Holiness Church. The latter supports the largest seminary in Asia: Seoul Theological Seminary. The Korean Holiness Church is involved in mission throughout Asia, with special attention to Thailand, Siberia, and Japan.

During and after World War II, OMS spread into India, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Spain, and the Caribbean. Under the name of the Inter-American Missionary Society the group established denominations in Colombia, Brazil, and Ecuador. More recently OMS has sent missionaries to Indonesia, France, and the Philippines. OMS, Inc., maintains a close connection with Asbury College (where a study center for students and a missionary home are maintained) and Asbury Theological Seminary. The agency serves as a mission sending agency for Holiness members of the United Methodist Church as well as from the smaller Holiness churches. The international headquarters is in Greenwood, Indiana.

Option for the Poor. There has long been a recognition that the poor (economically, politically, and socially marginalized people) hold special attention and affection in God's eyes. The phrase “option for the poor” or “preferential option for the poor” is of relatively recent coinage. Roman Catholics began wrestling with issues related to poverty in the SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL (1962–65). Catholics in Latin America, who felt that the work at Vatican II did not go far enough, convened in Medellín, where the emphasis was changed from seeing the poor as the objects of the mercy of the church to seeing them as the subjects of their own history (González, 19). The actual phrase “preferential option of the poor” did not appear until the 1970s, reportedly used by Gustavo Gutiérrez in a lecture given in Spain in 1972 (ibid.). Since then the term has been used primarily in liberation and conciliar theological circles but also increasingly in evangelical missiology.

The concept behind the term is one that demands a radical paradigm shift. The poor are not to be seen as objects of mercy, but as people who are particularly gifted by God to represent his justice to the rest of the world. The “option” for the poor is not optional, but required by the very nature of God's compassion and incarnation in Jesus. Because Jesus came to preach liberty to the poor, they have an advantage in reading the Scriptures. They are not weighted down with the presuppositions and agendas of the rich and are freer to read and interpret the text as its primary audience. Such reading requires the recognition of structural issues that create and perpetuate poverty and new tools of analysis to understand and change those structures.

Evangelical use of the term traces its roots to the LAUSANNE CONGRESS ON WORLD EVANGELISM (1974) and the eventual wrestling of evangelicals over EVANGELISM AND SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY (see Walker). A shift toward holism within the evangelical movement (see HOLISTIC MISSION), prompted in part by reflections from both non-Western evangelical theologians (e.g., Vinay Samuel, Rene Padilla, and Samuel Escobar) and Western evangelicals (e.g., Ron Sider and Jim Wallis), has resulted in greater empathy for the option for the poor (see also LIBERATION THEOLOGIES MISSIONAL). It is now not uncommon to see the phrase “option for the poor” across the spectrum of missiology. Evangelicals who have committed themselves to this agenda have in the past been referred to as radical evangelicals, though the language of opting for the poor has been gaining momentum in mainstream evangelical missiological circles in recent years.
Option for the Poor

What is God’s view of the poor? They are people and part of his creation. They have oppressors who keep them poor. While they are sinners, they are also in significant ways sinned against by those who oppress and subvert justice against them. God does “opt” for them in the sense of siding with them in demanding impartiality and justice. He cares for their spiritual and material needs. The same attitude should be found in the church (e.g., James 2:2–6). That the poor teach us about God or enjoy special spiritual status is true in the sense that their humble circumstances force them to see more realistically their broken condition before God. That they are somehow automatically saved or members of God’s church simply by virtue of their socioeconomic status, however, cannot be sustained in light of the overall biblical evidence. The poor are in need of having the Good News preached to them and thus the thrust of Jesus’ statements about his mission in Luke 4:18–20.

Orphanage Work in Christian Missions. Perhaps no other work in Christian missions has commanded so deep an emotional response to people as has care for children who have no place to call their home. The plight of Korean children during and after the Korean conflict (1949–51) and the work of Robert Pierce on their behalf not only raised the awareness of Western Christians to parentless children there, but also was the primary impetus for the establishment of World Vision International.

The beginnings of orphanage work in Christian missions, however, extend much farther back into the history of Christian missions. Indeed one could cite more than seven hundred references in Scripture concerning children as an indication of their importance to God, and hence to the religion that would spring from worship of him. A representative text of Jesus is known to many people. He said, “Let the little children come to me, and do not hinder them, for the kingdom of heaven belongs to such as these” (Matt. 19:14).

Throughout the early history of the church Christian compassion focused upon the plight of children. A representative sermon/essay by Cotton Mather reflects this emphasis and is likely the source for the term “orphanage.” In his essay (c. 1711) he spoke of orphanages as “orphanotrophism,” as “the care taken in the divine Providence for children when their parents forsake them.” Need for such care was caused by the terrible conditions of the Industrial Revolution when parents were thrown into debtors’ prisons and children were forced to work in crude factories, leaving many children without homes or parents (see Pierson, also Gaston).

Elsewhere on the globe, orphanages did not develop until the nineteenth century due in large part to the lack of any need for them. Asia, Africa, and Latin America were mostly nonindustrial regions, depending upon agriculture but with high infant mortality rates. The need for children and stable cohesive social structures provided a relatively secure social and family arrangement for them, except for conditions of war. This picture changed with the coming of industrial economies and the establishment of urban centers.

China is a case in point. There, feudal wars and terrible climatic conditions (famine, floods, etc.) left families economically impoverished and malnourished and children homeless. To meet these conditions missionaries, often women, took up the burden, established homes, or simply took in a wandering child, and then another and another, until finally an orphanage, de facto, was founded (see Wang).

The words “strategy” and “missionary method” seem oddly out of place when speaking of orphanages in missionary work. Such terms appear crass and manipulative, giving the appearance of “using” pain and loss for the purposes of proselytism. Nor do such terms reflect the spirit of such efforts. Mary Schaffler LaBree writes with a keen intellect and deep feeling and conviction about the plight of children in Persia, and the significance of her work and ministry is unsurpassed. Yet, there is not a hint of missionary strategy in the book. The same can be said of Thomas Gamble’s description of the establishment of George Whitfield’s Bethesda (House of Mercy). Here you find no hint of winning people to Christ through philanthropy. Rather, you find work springing from the well of deep compassion for the plight of children and others.

Orthodox Mission Movements

No comprehensive history of Eastern Orthodox missions exists today. Only studies of particular periods and personalities are available, especially in Russian Orthodox missions. Moreover, few "Departments of Missions" exist as distinct disciplines within Orthodox seminaries throughout the world. Only a handful of missiologists are qualified as specialists in this field, though the situation is gradually beginning to change. The subject, therefore, is a lacuna that needs to be aggressively filled in missiological studies today.

The history of Orthodox missions is made more difficult because the so-called Oriental Orthodox Churches (such as the Armenian, Syrian Jacobite, Coptic, and Ethiopian communities) rightly deserve to be included in the Orthodox family. Any treatment of Orthodox mission movements must view the church in light of its theological unity and complex administrative autonomy. Ideologically, throughout its history the Orthodox Church engaged in what may be termed "incarnational evangelism," that is, missionary enterprises that sought contextualization of the gospel for diverse nationalities out of faithfulness to the witness of the apostles. While this has had its obvious advantages, it also has tended to promote confusion among the uneducated between the gospel and nationalism leading to "ethnic Christianity."

The history of Orthodox missions shows that there has been very few missionary institutions, organizations, or orders. After the apostolic age, Emperor Constantine in the fourth century was given the missionary titles "Equal to the Apostles" and "Overseer of the Things/People Outside" the empire. The emperor was called upon to be the political protector and promoter of the Christian faith in places where it had not yet been received. In the early Middle Ages, the Byzantine government frequently enlisted missionaries as agents of imperial policy. Military interventions and political diplomacy from the imperial throne were used to support the spread of Orthodox Christianity. Byzantine missions to Eastern Europe often implied the acceptance of both Orthodoxy and a political alliance with Constantinople. Some individuals were officially supported while others worked on their own. The principles of mission were incarnational: the Bible, liturgy, and the Church Fathers were translated into the vernacular; indigenous clergy were implemented to lead the flocks; and local autonomy was encouraged. By these methods, numerous races of the Russian plain, the Caucasus, Persia, Arabia, and Africa were baptized in the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries. Some of these peoples have disappeared, though others still exist today (such as the Georgians, Armenians, Syrians, and Ethiopians).

The great age of Orthodox missionary activity began in the ninth and tenth centuries. Patriarch Photios dispatched a mission to Boris I of Bulgaria, and sent Sts. Cyril and Methodius to the Moravians. The Great Moravian mission occasioned the first confrontation between Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox missions. Cyril and Methodius created a unique alphabet so they could preach the gospel and translate the liturgy into the native vernacular. Use of the vernacular in worship and mission polarized Rome and Constantinople in the ninth century and highlighted their different missiological principles. The greatest success of Byzantine missionaries was the conversion of Prince Vladimir I of Kiev in 988. Characteristically, missions in Russia worked from the top down by focusing first on the political leaders who then encouraged their people en masse to follow their example. People of the northern Caucasus region followed Russia's example. In the ninth century, systematic work in Serbia was undertaken by the followers of Cyril and Methodius, but it was not until the thirteenth century that Serbian attachment to the Eastern Church became final.

The history of missions from the fourteenth century is mainly the history of Russian Orthodox missions. This was due mostly to the Turkish captivity of the Greek Church under Islam. In Russian Orthodox missionary activity, the focus was on evangelism within the boundaries of the great Russian Empire itself. The progressive penetration of the gospel was carried on by monks who worked among the Finnish races in what is today northern Russia, and later in the Urals and Siberia. A special type of missionary, known as the "colonial monk," taught a new way of life without seeking to intentionally convert the heathen. These monks became bearers of Russian culture as well as the gospel. Examples of Russian missionary heroes are Sts. Sergius, Stephen of Peres (both 14th century), and Seraphim of Sarov (17th and 18th centuries). Peter the Great, as part of his imperial strategy, also supported Russian missions, which extended as far as China in the eighteenth century. The nineteenth century was the "Great Century" of Russian Orthodox missions (though not comparable to the scope of Protestant and Catholic missions of the same period). In 1791, the Russian mission first arrived in Kodiak, Alaska, from the Valamo monastery in Finland under St. Herman. Possibly the greatest personality of the period was (John) Innocent Veniaminov, or "St. Innocent of Alaska" (1797–1879). Innocent followed the tradition of Cyril and Methodius by translating the Gospels and liturgy into the Aleutian language and establishing a native priesthood.
Orthodox Mission Movements

East Asian missions in the nineteenth century included the Japanese Orthodox Church, founded by St. Nicholas Kasatkin, and the Korean mission founded by Russian clergy in 1898. In the twentieth century, at least two regions reveal modern missionary zeal: first, in Africa, an intense ecumenization of the Orthodox faith and worship has occurred under the Patriarchate of Alexandria, and in Asia under the Patriarchate of Constantinople; second, a significant emergence of new Orthodox communities has arisen in the so-called diaspora churches located especially in America, but also to a lesser degree in Canada, Western Europe, Australia, and Latin America. A new Pan-Orthodox mission board was recently founded in St. Augustine, Florida, as a means to promote Orthodoxy and serve the needs of the mother churches overseas. At present, the most active missionary group in North America is the Antiochian Orthodox Church, with approximately 50 percent of its pastoral staff comprised of converts from mostly Protestant and Catholic backgrounds. Advocates of American contextualization have called for indigenous new ways of incarnating the gospel in keeping with the church’s past missiological practices. Such advocates highlight the missionary imperative of translating “Old World Orthodoxy” into the multicultural vernacular of an American audience through native creativity in liturgical, hymnographic, and iconographic expressions of the faith.

Documents for contemporary models and emphases in Orthodox missions have been hammered out largely in the context of the church’s involvement in the WCC. The Orthodox have distinguished five contexts for their witness in the modern world: (1) traditional Orthodox countries, such as Greece, parts of Lebanon, and the Middle East; (2) postcommunist countries (closely overlapping the first), including Russia, Romania, Serbia, and Albania; (3) Islamic lands, such as Egypt; (4) churches of the so-called diaspora, such as America, Canada, and Western Europe; and (5) young missionary churches, including Africa and Korea. Renewal movements within the Orthodox Church itself—such as the Lord’s Army in Romania, Zoe in Greece, the Orthodox Youth Movement in Lebanon, the Brotherhood of St. Symeon the New Theologian and the Antiochian Evangelical Orthodox Mission in America—have revived interest in Bible study, preaching, pietistics, and liturgics. Moreover, mission organizations that build bridges between the Orthodox and evangelical traditions include the Society for the Study of Eastern Orthodox and Evangelicalism and Christians for Middle East Understanding. The greatest missiological challenge of global Orthodoxy at the dawn of the third millennium appears to be the need for “internal mission,” for example, the reconversion of its own people to the saving gospel of Jesus Christ.

Orthodox Theology of Mission. The Eastern Orthodox Churches (EOC) are not generally thought of as missionary churches. In part, this stems from a lack of knowledge of the history of the Eastern Churches and also a misunderstanding of the theological framework of the Orthodox Church, which appears to be antithetical or at least indifferent to the missionary vision of both the Roman Catholic and Protestant experience. In spite of oppressive historical circumstances that have hindered the expression of missionary concern, Eastern Christianity, represented by both the Chalcedonian and non-Chalcedonian churches (also called Oriental Orthodox Churches [OOC] or occasionally lesser Orthodox Churches) share the same ethos as the mainline Eastern Orthodox Churches. The Nestorian Church had an impressive missionary thrust into China (see Nestorian Mission). The Mar Thoma Church of South India has a very similar liturgy and theology, as do the other OOC. They are distinguished from the EOC in that the EOC are in communion with and recognized by the Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople.

For the EOC, the key elements of their theological framework revolve around the purpose of the incarnation. Often accused by Western theologians of having an inadequate doctrine of Sin, the EOC focus on the potential that humankind was created to achieve. The first human pair were created perfect but with the possibility and necessity for growth and development. This maturation would eventually lead to humans fully manifesting the image (but not the essence) of God. Evangelization therefore proceeds along the line of fulfilling God’s purpose in creation. The goal is not justification of the sinner, but rather what would be termed in Western theological categories as justification and sanctification. The Orthodox call their understanding of the biblical meaning of salvation theosis. This Greek word is sometimes inadequately rendered deification in Latin, which has inherent pantheistic overtones, something not intended in the doctrine. The paristic phrase, “God became man, so that men might become god,” does not convey a sharing of the divine essence. The intent is that to be fully human, one must become fully mature in the imago Dei (Image of God).

The goal of restoring humankind to the lost image of God has several implications for missions. In the first place, it highlights the importance of the liturgical community, which celebrates the incarnation and the death and resurrection of the Lord. It is in this community that the maturation and growth in grace occurs. Therefore it also elevates the importance of each culture because no language is inappropriate to worship God. Only in one’s mother tongue can the true worship of God be expressed. The Orthodox see Pentecost as the reversal of the confusion of tongues at the Tower of Babel. The gospel must be preached in all the world and God worshiped in all the languages of the world. The entry of the Second Person of the Trinity into first-century Palestine is taken to be the model for the incarnation of the gospel into each people group so that each will be able to worship the Triune God. Indeed, the focus in the EOC is on the correct (ortho) praise (doxia), and not merely on the correct doctrine. Great emphasis is placed on the use of the vernacular in the liturgy. The result is that where the Orthodox faith has been planted it has penetrated deeply into the soul of the nation. The transmission of the gospel into the culture has shaped the culture in many lands where the Eastern Church was the predominant Christian expression. This close identification of Orthodox Christianity and culture has led to the religious persecution of non-Orthodox Christians in traditionally Orthodox lands.

The pillars of the mission theology of the EOC have been the use of the vernacular, the deployment of indigenous clergy, the translation of the Bible into the vernacular and the selfhood of the national church. The goal was the creation of self-governing churches praising God in their own language and, to some extent, style which accounts for the minor differences in liturgical practice and theological emphasis throughout the EOC. These differences have been treated as either local traditions or under the category of theologumenon (theological opinion that does not contradict counciliar definitions). However, liturgical uniformity and allegiance to the creeds and councils bound the diverse linguistic groups into a whole.

To use the traditional Western categories of mission, the ultimate aim of mission is to restore all of humanity to a right relationship with God, which would issue in all of humankind correctly praising the Trinity. The motives for mission are obedience to God, love for God, and love for a fallen humanity. The method would be to have lives lived in accordance with the gospel and engaged in the worship of the true God. In Orthodox theory and practice, the liturgical expression of the church is a method of evangelistic outreach. In this, it mirrors the church of the early centuries, which allowed catechumens (those being instructed for baptism) to stay for all but the eucharistic portion of the liturgy. While the order of catechumens is no longer observed in the EOC, the warnings for them to depart before the Eucharist still form part of the liturgy of the EOC. However, the liturgical witness of the EOC is seen as a legitimate and appropriate form of evangelistic witness. Stories abound of the conversion of pagans once they had observed the liturgical ceremonies of the EOC. One of the traditional stories of the conversion of Prince Vladimir (989), founder of Russian Christianity, revolves around his envoys witnessing the liturgy celebrated in Constantinople.

A phrase used in EOC theology to describe the centrality of the liturgical rites is “the liturgy after the liturgy.” This signifies the Orthodox view that engagement in the world is also an act of leitourgia. The word comes from the two Greek words leitos (public) and ergon (work). Traditionally the liturgy signified the celebration of the Eucharist by a local community, but this has been expanded to use “liturgy” to signify the Church’s witness to the world. The other term used is martyria to signify the centuries of witness that led to martyrdom. The EOC involvement in the Ecumenical Movement has led to a clearer articulation of a theology of mission that follows the traditional EOC theological perspective.

There are no independent mission societies in the EOC. All missionary work is undertaken under episcopal supervision. In 1870, Metropolitan Innocent, himself a former missionary to Russian Alaska, founded the Orthodox Missionary Society in Moscow. More recently, missionary interest in Greece was sparked by Poreithenes, a missionary journal founded in 1959 and succeeded by Pante to Ethnes. The Inter-Orthodox Missionary Centre was founded in Athens in 1961. The center supported the work of the African Orthodox Church, an African-initiated independent church located in East Africa. In North America, mission interest was stimulated by the Mission Committee of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America and the work of the Inter Orthodox Mission Center in St. Augustine, Florida. Orthodox missionaries are at work in Africa, Asia, Central Europe, and North America.

ceeded the China Inland Mission (CIM), which had been founded in Great Britain in 1865 by James Hudson Taylor. Taylor had served as a missionary in China from 1835 to 1860 with the Chinese Evangelization Society. An international, interdenominational organization, the CIM was a faith mission that eventually became the largest mission agency in China. It had its headquarters in Shanghai, as Taylor believed that decisions needed to be made in the country where the mission actually operated, not in the sending country. He firmly believed that God would provide the money necessary to run the organization and, accordingly, asked only for prayers and personnel for the work, never directly soliciting funds. Another unusual aspect is that Taylor insisted that his missionaries live as much as possible like those they sought to convert. All were required to adopt native dress, and, while the Qing dynasty was in power, the men were required to grow queues, pinning fake ones inside their hats until their own hair reached the proper length. As most of the CIM missionaries were married, the mission established a boarding school for their children at Chefoo.

While emphasizing belief in the whole Bible, the CIM encouraged its members to maintain their ties to the various denominational churches. CIM recruits were not required to be university graduates, and the organization sent unmarried women and unordained men to China as missionaries long before most other missions recognized the contributions they could make. In the first decades of its existence the CIM sent only British missionaries to the field, but in 1888 Taylor visited the United States to preach at various interdenominational mission conferences, and the CIM subsequently expanded its base to North America. The first North American recruits sailed from Canada that year. Henry W. Frost was appointed North American director and held the position for forty years.

Because Taylor was committed to the evangelization of China’s unreached population, CIM missionaries often established themselves in remote locales and small towns overlooked by other mission groups. Notable among the CIM missionaries in China were the martyred John and Betty Stam, whose infant daughter escaped death and was carried in a basket by a Chinese convert to the nearest mission station. Taylor, who died in 1905, was succeeded as CIM director by D. E. Hoste, George W. Gibb, Frank Houghton, J. O. Sanders, Michael C. Griffiths, and James Hudson Taylor III, great-grandson of the founder. The CIM’s major publication was the periodical China’s Millions, which kept supporters at home informed of the work. When Christian missions were forced to withdraw from China in the early 1950s, the CIM removed its operations to other Asian countries including Japan, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Korea, the Philippines, Thailand, and Singapore.

Pacifist Theology. Christian pacifist theology grows from the conviction that Jesus meant it to be taken seriously when he said, “Love your enemies” and “Do not return evil for evil” (Matt. 5), even to the extent of laying down one’s life rather than taking the life of another. Likewise, the theology of Christian missions stems from the conviction that Jesus’ final words, “Go and make disciples of all people” (Matt. 28), were given to be obeyed, even to the extent of forsaking one’s homeland so that others might hear the gospel.

Just as post-Constantinian obedience to the Great Commission is rooted most clearly in the radical biblicism of such historic Christian movements as the Celts, the Franciscans, the Waldensians, Anabaptists, Moravians, Baptists, Wesleyans, and Pentecostals, so the Christian embrace of pacifism is most closely linked with these same expressions of renewal. In this broad historic sense there is a discernible connection between pacifist theology and mission. However, many evangelical Christians with roots in the nineteenth- and twentieth-century missionary movement were unaware of these connections. Members of “historic peace churches” such as Quakers, Brethren, and Mennonites did, of course, maintain outspoken commitment to Christian pacifism, but they were somewhat less conspicuous at the forefront of the missionary movement, though they were certainly not absent. However, others such as Baptists and post–World War II Pentecostals almost forgot their pacifistic origins.

For example, the pre-1967 Assemblies of God official statement on war read in part, “We, as a body of Christians, while purposing to fulfill all the obligations of loyal citizenship, are nevertheless constrained to declare we cannot conscientiously participate in war and armed resistance which involves the actual destruction of human life, since this is contrary to our view of the clear teachings of the inspired Word of God, which is the sole basis of our faith” (Beaman, p. 24).

The engagement of these same groups at the forefront of global missions is a matter of historical record. For example, the Moravian revival of 1727 was rooted in a combination of contemporary German Pietism and earlier European evangelical radicalism among the Hussites and Anabaptists. It was this same Moravian revival which, beginning immediately in its first decade, inaugurated the outpouring of missionary energy which resulted both in the conversion of John Wesley and the sending of Christian witnesses worldwide (see Moravian Mission). The link with pacificist groups is clear, especially in their Reformation and pre-Reformation radical heritage. These historic connections between pacifism and missions are not accidental. They derive from a straightforward evangelical biblicism which affirms both “Go ye into all the world” and “Love your enemies.” In each case, obedience requires sacrifice and suffering love.

Pacifist Christians maintain that the two are logically as well as biblically linked. The world is full of enemies, they say, and the only way to go to them with integrity is to go in love with a commitment to peace. Any other posture leads either to neglect of the missionary mandate (where the enemy is fought or ignored) or to compulsive proselytization of the kind which Jesus condemned.

Non-pacifist evangelical Christians, while maintaining commitment to love of enemies, argue that there are some circumstances in which Christians are permitted or even obligated to take up arms against others. These circumstances are usually defined as (1) times when the government which is ordained by God orders its citizens to arms or (2) when taking the life of another is necessary to protect the innocent. This position has been defended classically as “just war,” although the use of mechanical war against citizen populations in the twentieth century and the threat of nuclear war after 1945 raised serious questions as to whether a traditional just war is any longer possible.
Pacifist Theology

In summary, evangelical pacifists view the missionary movement since Pentecost as having been embedded in forms of biblical literalism and obedience which were either outright pacifistic or inclined in that direction, thus linking the two. Evangelical non-pacifists, in contrast, tend to see Christian pacifism either as an impossible ideal or as a failure to read Romans 13 correctly, thus denying significant connections between pacifism and missions.

Because various forms of evangelical non-pacifism have been predominant in twentieth-century evangelicism and because most evangelical pacifists spend more time defending their view of peace biblically and philosophically than promoting it as intrinsic to a missiological stance, little has been written on missions and pacifism. It remains, however, a fertile field for investigation.

Padilla, Carlos René (1932– ). Ecuadorian theologian, writer, and pastor. At an early age he started developing his writing and analytical skills and later took his training at Wheaton College Graduate School. Upon graduation he worked among university students, serving in Latin America with the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students (IFES). Almost simultaneously he earned a Ph.D. in New Testament from the University of Manchester, in Great Britain. Living and ministering primarily in a continent with deep social and economic problems and not fully satisfied with the solutions offered by either the theology of liberation or the evangelical movement as a whole, Padilla has written and spoken extensively throughout the world, calling for a hermeneutic not affected by ideology or traditional practices in the process of contextualizing the biblical message in order to communicate it effectively. This is the focus of a missionary theology, faithful to the gospel and relevant to the context. He has also written Mission Between the Times, and was the founder and editor of the magazine Misión from his headquarters in Buenos Aires, plus establishing “Kairós,” a conference and retreat center for in-depth discussions of subjects pertinent to the times and situation in Latin America.

Padwick, Constance Evelyn (1886–1968). English author and missionary in Egypt, Palestine, Sudan, and Turkey. Born in West Thorney, Sussex, England, to an Anglican family, Padwick was initially rejected from service abroad by the CMS for health reasons. She left CMS home office service to work in Egypt with the Nile Mission Press, but returned to the CMS when they agreed to accept her for work in the Middle East.

Gifted in communication and cultural observation, Padwick engaged in a successful literature ministry work throughout her career. In contrast to the polemic approach of literature written at that time for use in evangelization among Muslims, Padwick wrote so as to engage in “penitent love” by creating sensitive understanding of Islam. Her approach was to build bridges through loving understanding rather than to attack Islamic doctrines and beliefs. Muslim Devotions (1961), along those lines, is a compilation of devotions from various Sufi orders chosen to promote understanding among Christians of the deeply held religious faith of Muslims.

Writing biographies about missionaries such as Henry Martyn (1922) and W. H. Temple Gairdner (1929), developing such works as Muslim Devotions, editing Orient and Occident, writing Arabic text books for Sudanese schools, and working with scholars such as Hendrik Kraemer, Padwick was a pioneer among women in bridging the gap between missionary service and missionary scholarship. She is rightly characterized by Ruth Tucker as one of the first great contemporary women missiologists.

Paganism. See Neopagan, Neopaganism.

Pakistan (Est. 2000 pop.: 161,827,000; 796,095 sq. km. [307,372 sq. mi.]). A token Christian presence from as early as the fourth century has been documented in the region of Pakistan. There is also a Thomas tradition, believable but not proven. Christian communities once existing in Baluchistan, Punjab, and Sindh became isolated, declined, and died out by the eleventh century, probably absorbed by Islam.

The earliest known missionary activity was initiated by Roman Catholics during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries at the mouth of the Indus River. No continuing church resulted. A Jesuit mission to Akbar failed to gain the Moghul empire for Christianity. After the British annexed Sindh in 1843, and the Punjab in 1849, Roman Catholics arrived as chaplains of the British army and gradually extended their work to the local population.

The American Presbyterian Mission was the first Protestant agency, entering Punjab in 1849. CMS began its work in Sindh by 1850, and extended to Punjab by 1854. Then followed the United Presbyterians in 1855, the Church of Scotland in 1856, both in Punjab, and the Methodists in 1872 in Karachi. Three events had a lasting impact on the church. The first was a large-scale conversion movement in Punjab from 1880 to 1930. Two related developments were an indigenous Punjabi metrical paraphrase of the Psalms, and a spiritual revival that resulted in further conversions and a Christian Life Convention, which continues today at Sialkot.

After independence and separation from India in 1947, at least fifteen new mission agencies entered Pakistan. The 1951 census reported over 400,000 Christians, of whom more than half were Roman Catholics. In 1970 the Church of Pakistan was created by a union of Anglicans, Methodists, Church of Scotland Presbyterians, and Lutherans; the new church had a combined total of 200,000 members. The United Presbyterian Church, started in Sialkot in 1855, the largest single Protestant body in Pakistan, did not join the united church. Smaller groups included Baptists, Brethren, and Pentecostals.

The Islamic Republic of Pakistan has one of the largest Christian communities in the Muslim world. As of 1978 the churches in Pakistan claimed approximately 900,000 adherents—540,000 Protestants and 360,000 Roman Catholics. At least 90 percent are of Hindu background. The Christians are concentrated mainly in Punjab, 80 percent in rural areas. Muslims have been resistant, but there are signs of change.

The Christian Study Centre in Rawalpindi attempts to provide understanding between Christians and Muslims. The Pakistan Bible Correspondence School is active. In addition to hundreds of local schools, both rural and urban, that are operated by Christians, Pakistan has at least four Protestant seminaries, a large Roman Catholic seminary, and four Bible schools. Various Protestant and Catholic relief services are active. Catholics run twelve hospitals and Protestants twenty. Christians comprise only 2 percent of the population but provide 15 percent of the country’s medical care.

Palmer, Phoebe Worrall

Palmer, Phoebe Worrall (1807–74). American revivalist. Phoebe Worrall was born in New York City to Methodist parents, her father having been converted under John Wesley’s ministry. In 1827, she married Walter Palmer, a New York physician. She did evangelistic work in the slums of New York, founded the Hedding Church there, and in 1850 established the Five Points Mission, a forerunner of later settlement houses. In 1835, she began the “Tuesday Meeting for the Promotion of Holiness” and soon became a leading spokesperson for Holiness Theology. Her eighteen books include Promise of the Father (1859), and what was her most significant work, The Way of Holiness (1843). She also edited the Guide to Holiness periodical from 1864 to 1874. Palmer modified Wesley’s doctrine of perfectionism by arguing that sanctification was instantaneous upon one’s complete submission at the altar. God would then send a baptism of the Holy Spirit, which empowered the believer to live a life of holiness and witness effectively. She participated in over three hundred revival meetings throughout the United States, Canada, and Great Britain. She also was heavily involved in humanitarian causes and in the struggle for women’s rights, but is best known for her emphasis on holiness.

Panama Congress (1916). A watershed event in the life of the evangelical Protestant church, the Panama Congress drew attention to Latin America as a mission field and gave fresh impetus to the continent’s small and struggling Protestant churches. The Congress came about largely as a reaction to the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE in Edinburgh six years earlier, where the organizers had excluded Latin America from the agenda. Considering it already Christian because of its Roman Catholic heritage, Edinburgh focused instead on “pagan” nations. During the Edinburgh conference, however, North American delegates laid plans for a special meeting to consider the unique missionary problems in Latin America.

The Panama Congress had a strong North American flavor, with representatives from several dozen agencies from the United States. World War I limited European representation. The proceedings were conducted in English, with Robert Speer presiding at business sessions and Samuel G. Inman as executive secretary. Of the 304 participants, only 21 were native-born Latin Americans.

Nonetheless, the Panama Congress made a lasting impact on Latin Protestantism. It produced the first serious study of Protestant work on the continent. It also gave a sense of identity and solidarity to the small and struggling Protestant church, then numbered at 126,000 members, up from 50,000 in 1900. After the congress, Latin Protestants reportedly began identifying themselves as “evangelicals,” since they were not “protesting” anything. The Panama Congress also gave rise to a series of follow-up regional conferences (Lima, Santiago, Rio de Janeiro, and San Juan), thus promoting efforts of evangelization.

Pantheonism. Panenthism, from the Greek pan (all), en (in), and theos (God), refers to a family of Western and non-Western religious perspectives on the relation between God and the world. In contrast to both classical theism (which maintains an ontological distinction between God and the world) and PANTHEISM (which identifies God with the world), panenthism both identifies God and the world in one sense while distinguishing between the two in another. The world exists in God, yet God is not exhausted by the world.

Panentheistic views are found in various schools of Hinduism, especially in the Visistadwaita-vedanta school of Ramanuja (see VEDANTA HINDUISM). Panentheistic themes can also be found in the Sufi mysticism of Islam. In the Christian context, panentheism is expressed in the process theism of John Cobb and Charles Hartshorne, which finds its inspiration in the philosophy of Alfred North Whitehead. In contrast to classical theism, process theism holds that God himself is in a state of process and change. God is “dipolar”; in his moral character God is unchanging, but in his knowledge God is in process. God is limited both in power and knowledge, and God’s knowledge grows in response to the changes brought about by free agents in the world.

In religious contexts influenced by the themes of panentheism, the effective missionary will be able to build upon those understandings of God which are compatible with biblical theism, but he or she must be careful to distinguish the biblical God from that of panentheism.

Pantaenus (d. c. 194). Possible pioneer missionary to India. He was born in either Athens or Sicily; almost nothing is known of Pantaenus’s childhood. He was head of a school in Alexandria from roughly 180 until his death, and was succeeded by Clement. While few details are known, Eusebius relates that Pantaenus responded to a call sent through the bishop of Alexandria and traveled to India. Jerome adds that his work was among the Brahmins. There he apparently met Christians who were familiar with Matthew’s Gospel in Hebrew. The India mentioned by Eusebius may refer to South Arabia, and Pantaenus’s work appears to have been little more than a visit.

Pantheism. The word “pantheism” is derived from the Greek pan and theos and means “all is God.” Pantheism could also be described as the worldview that individual human beings are not ultimately real as separate entities; what exists is a unified, ontological whole. The idea itself is at least as old as Hinduism, which teaches in the Vedas that all is Brahman, and as new as Alan Watts’ pantheism in his New Age blend of Hindu, Buddhist, and Christian thought. But the name comes from the English writer John Toland (1670–1722) who held that the whole universe is God. The word “pantheism” has come to be used in contrast to “theism” which usually distinguishes God from the creation. It is also related to “monism” which teaches that everything is ultimately one.

There are many forms of pantheism. Among the more significant are hylozoistic pantheism which views God as immanent in the universe as its mover and changer; absolute pantheism in which God is identical with the universe; and relativistic pantheism which views the universe as within God though he is changeless and unaffected by the world.

The Bible presents God as transcendent over the universe as its creator but at the same time immanent within its processes and active in history. Most significantly God is personality, providing a more satisfying cause for human personality and possibility for relationship.

Papasarantopoulos, Chrysostom (1903–72). Greek Orthodox missionary to East Africa. He inaugurated a new period of mission endeavor within worldwide orthodoxy. Papasarantopoulos was born in Vasilitsion, Greece. Leaving home at fifteen, he joined the ascetic Panagoulakis, where he learned the disciplines of prayer, fasting, and the study of Scripture. Upon release from the Greek Armed Forces, Christos entered Marthakion Monastery, where he was tonsured a monk and renamed Chrysostom on August 4, 1925. Rising quickly, he was ordained a deacon and priest in May 1926; soon after he was appointed abbot of Gardikiou Monastery. After moving to the monastery of Chrysokeklaris in 1935, where he founded catechism schools, he was called to Athens as archimandrite and appointed abbot of Fameromeni Monastery. Christos received his grammar and high school degrees at age fifty. Five years later, in 1958, he earned the Licentiate in Theology from the University of Athens.

Responding to the call to missions, Papasarantopoulos became the first twentieth-century Greek Orthodox missionary to Africa. During the following thirteen years, he worked in Uganda, Zaire, Tanzania, and Kenya, where he learned Swahili, built churches and schools, trained initiates for the priesthood, and translated liturgical books. His work and correspondence with individuals and organizations helped spawn a new period of missions within Greek Orthodoxy. Papasarantopoulos was laid to rest in 1972 at the Church of St. Andrew in Kananga, Zaire.

Papua New Guinea (Est. 2000 pop.: 4,809,000; 462,840 sq. km. [178,703 sq. mi.]). Due north of Australia, Papua New Guinea (PNG) is the eastern section of the second largest island in the world. PNG’s 4.8 million people speak over 700 languages. While English is the official language, two local languages, Neo-Melanesian Pidgin (a creole of English) and Hiri Motu, are widely spoken. In addition to the cultural diversity, PNG’s mainland and 600 islands extend from the equator to 11 degrees south. The mainland is divided by the central mountain range with peaks in excess of 12,000 feet and populated valleys at elevations up to 7,000 feet. The coastal lowlands are covered with tropical rain forests and savannas with rivers created from the high mountain rainfall. PNG is governed by the National Parliament with representatives from the 20 provinces. Port Moresby, the capital city, has a population of 193,000.

Although the earliest Christian contact came with the explorers during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the first significant wave of missionaries was in the latter half of the nineteenth century. The early missionaries came from the London Missionary Society, the Methodists, Roman Catholics, Lutherans, and the Anglicans between 1870 and 1890. In addition to the missionaries from the colonial empires, a number of Pacific Island missionaries served sacrificially to establish the work in PNG. By the early 1890s, the major denominations had established their regional influence, which remains until the present. A second wave between 1890 and 1940 established new missions in PNG, particularly in the inland and coastal regions.

The post–World War II thrust included missions who targeted the isolated tribal peoples and those who concentrated on the growing urban populations. The large number of tribal groups and the geographic isolation, coupled with few government restrictions provided the ideal conditions for the multiplication of missions of all sizes and denominations. With more than 80 percent of the population living in rural areas, a defining characteristic of missions was their involvement in commerce, education, health, and transport.

From the early days of missionary work in PNG, local believers have served with expatriates as missionaries to other tribal groups. This tradition has matured with the churches and in many cases has led to local churches and denominations taking on the responsibility for evangelizing the unreached tribes within their region. During the past two decades, a mission movement has emerged among churches targeting the world outside of PNG. As a result, Papua New Guineans have joined international missions as part of their global outreach teams. The growing interest in missions has also given rise to at least one indigenous mission society with missionaries currently serving overseas.

The diversity of Christian traditions, churches, and missions has created a landscape of “mission pluralism,” which has fostered a number of alliances. The mainline Protestant and Roman Catholic churches and missions have affiliated with the Melanesian Council of Churches to facilitate cooperative ventures and serve as a voice to the government. Due to the relative size of many of the evangelical missions and churches, an alliance (EA) was formed to provide training for church workers, teachers, and an evangelical voice to government bodies. The newest group is the Pentecostal Alliance, formed in the early 1980s by the rapidly expanding number of traditional and independent Pentecostal churches throughout PNG. With over 90 percent of the population claiming Christianity, missions have made one of the most significant contributions to the development of PNG.

Parachurch Agencies and Mission. Parachurch agencies appear at first glance to be a relatively recent phenomenon, by many accounts beginning their ministries shortly after the Second World War. But a closer look at the history of the church and its missionary enterprise will reveal a longer and deeper background. This background raises the question of defining these organizations, which relate in various ways to national denominations and local churches. Many would agree that the term “parachurch” is a convenient but imprecise term for these organizations. The term itself is a compound, indicating that such groups function “outside” the church, or at least parallel to it (from the Greek preposition para, meaning “beside” or “alongside”). These organizations specialize in a diverse array of Christian services and are self-supporting, drawing their funds from Christian churches and Christians within those churches. Further, parachurches see themselves for the most part as “arms of the local church” and not in competition with it. Although there are legitimate differences of opinion regarding just how such organizations come into being, many of them are born “in” the church and then sent out as functioning and healthy parts of the local or denominational body. Certainly it is beyond dispute that many, by the same token, are brought into being when a visionary Christian believes that either the church is not doing an adequate job in, for instance, reaching a particular segment of the community, or for whatever reason, the church is unable to do it.

History. Missiologist RALPH WINTER points out a distinction between stationary institutions (modalities) and mobile agencies (sodalities) that began in biblical times (see SODALITY AND MODALITY). In the next few centuries, the church became more institutionalized, heretical sects sprung up, and the church began to splinter into factions, sometimes resembling the denominations of the present century. Subsequent history records the significance of the councils of the church which gathered to sort out the lines of orthodoxy and to affirm and clarify precise statements by which the church would proceed. The early monastic movement and the subsequent orders of the Roman Church indicated a useful paradigm for both spiritual formation as well as specialized ministry commitments. When these kinds of groups were formed, they were often made up of the laity “carrying on a personal ministry outside the direct authority and control of the church.” The Reformation signaled a way in which a committed churchman like Martin Luther wanted to change the church from within but was prevented from doing so; the result (as in the later experience of John Wesley) was the formation of a new movement outside the church which developed into a full-fledged denomination. At the present time parachurch organizations almost defy description because of their proliferation throughout the Christian world. The main prerequisites seem to be an individual with a vision, a cadre of supporters who affirm that vision, and the courage to initiate ministry and raise the necessary capital to sustain the ministry. In the providence of God, many of these ministries have established themselves in such a way as to provide leadership for the church in areas where the church was either weak or where it lacked the incentive to undertake such bold initiatives in reaching out beyond the parameters of the local church. Foreign mission societies have enabled regional and national churches to specialize in meeting the needs of specific interest groups, and in so doing, they have enlarged the ministries of local congregations far beyond their ability to accomplish the same thing on their own.

Classification. Generally speaking, almost every conceivable area of mission has been addressed, with many of these, unfortunately, duplicating other ministries. By and large, these groups have been organized around Great Commission and Great Commandment passages in the New Testament. Evangelism and Discipleship, educational institutions, relief and community development (see Relief Work and Development), medical societies, Bible distribution and translation groups, media and communication agencies, and many specialized organizations too numerous to mention—these constitute a broad survey of the categories by which parachurch agencies can be identified.

Contributions of Parachurch Agencies in Missionary Activity. Parachurch organizations relate to missions by providing training and momentum for local churches and denominations. Some of the most creative initiatives in world mission have come from within these organizations, often working in tandem with local churches or denominations. Recently unique openings for the gospel have come from the almost universal screening of the life of Jesus from the Gospel according to Luke (see Jesus Film); literally thousands of churches have been planted as a result of the follow-up and discipling of new believers. The ministry of the Bible translation has also resulted in openings for the gospel in very remote areas of the globe, a ministry undertaken by Wycliffe Bible Translators, International, a mission agency devoted to working in cultures with languages that had been without structured analysis and written materials. At the present time special emphasis is being given to reaching national and religious groups which traditionally presented great challenges to missionaries. The spread of communicable diseases, famine, earthquakes, floods, and national and international military conflicts have spurred the church into action, and often, the parachurch agencies (e.g., World Vision and World Relief) have responded quickly to relieve the immediate suffering, provide rescue operations, and in many cases have remained to provide supplies and aid in rebuilding the infrastructure destroyed in the struggle for peace and stability. Parachurch organizations have also pioneered strategic thinking in reaching unreached peoples (see Peoples, People Groups), establishing cross-cultural training for both short-term and career missionaries, and exploring the potentially explosive creative access countries through tentmaking mission strategies.

Hindrances to Parachurch Effectiveness in Missionary Activity. Parachurch agencies have always challenged the status quo in which religious culture can be found, and having pointed to their strengths it would be easy to overlook their weaknesses. Because of the tendency toward entrepreneurial leadership, there is often a lack of accountability outside the organization and particularly to the local church. From the churches’ perspective, it is easy to ask for funds to meet a pressing need while at the same time not being sensitive to the counsel of godly leaders within the church, be it local or denominational. And even if it is not a stated policy, parachurch organizations have tended to hold their local church responsibilities rather loosely, sometimes scheduling events without coordinating with church calendars. Over the years, however, these issues have been addressed within the organizations themselves, and other agencies have been created expressly to assist in matters of financial integrity as well as in theological orthodoxy.

The Future. Few would deny that parachurch organizations have contributed greatly to the church’s mission throughout the church’s history. Indeed, the church has been enriched through the many ministries created by visionary Christians. But when the designation “parachurch” is used of such organizations, there is a clear expectation that these organizations will work more closely with national and local churches, always trying to achieve that unity which brings great delight to the heart of God (John 17:21–23; Eph. 4:1–13).

Paraguay (Est. 2000 pop.: 5,613,000; 406,752 sq. km. [157,047 sq. mi.]). Paraguay is an inland, subtropical South American republic bordered by Bolivia, Argentina, and Brazil. The country is divided into two distinct areas by the Paraguay River, with 96 percent of the 5.3 million inhabitants living in the more fertile east. Although the capital of Asuncion (founded 1547) and its suburbs has a population approaching one million, over 50 percent of the total population is rural. The people are mostly of mixed Spanish and Guarani (the dominant indigenous people group) descent. As a result, although Spanish is the official language, 90 percent speak Guarani. Literacy is officially said to be 90 percent, but may be about 80 percent. There are two universities in the country, one of which is Catholic. The Guarani seem to have an innate gift for music and many are adept in the use of the Spanish guitar and harp accompanied by Guarani percussion instruments. Paraguayan painting and sculpture date from Jesuit mission art schools and often are found in the churches. The recent construction of two immense hydroelectric dams on the borders with Brazil and Argentina has provided high rates of employment as well as supplying the country with ample power.

The state religion is Roman Catholicism (92% of the population), which dates from the founding of Jesuit missions in 1609. In 1767 the Jesuits were expelled after supporting a Guarani revolt against the move to cede the country to Portugal. A disastrous 1865–70 war against Argentina, Brazil, and Uruguay resulted in the death of over half the population of one million. Less than 30,000 men survived. The territorial Chaco War against Bolivia from 1929 to 1932 added to Paraguay’s land. There have been two hundred years of tyrannical dictatorships and government incompetence topped off by the oppressive presidency of Alberto Stroessner from 1954 until 1989. The country is well known for illegal commercialization (contraband) and its neighbors are happy to take advantage of it.

The earliest Protestant missionary came in 1817, and was the first of a number of traveling salesmen for the British Bible Society. Resident Methodist missionaries arrived in 1886. About 6 percent of the present population can be called Protestant, with slightly over 4 percent registered as evangelicals. Mennonites, who form the largest Protestant group, as well as other ethnic groups, live in self-contained colonies where European languages other than Spanish are dominant. Other denominations include the Assemblies of God (whose rapid growth after 1981 has resulted in 6,450 members in 172 churches), Southern Baptists (5,200 members in 73 churches), and various Pentecostal groups (8,200 members in 116 churches). Notable among social outreach is the Southern Baptist hospital founded in Paraguay in 1953. A recent high point in evangelical missions has been the increasing cooperative spirit among different Christian denominations.

Paris Evangelical Missionary Society. (Société des missions évangéliques de Paris) [PEMS]. Established in 1822 after the pattern of other famous interdenominational missionary societies in the wake of the great religious revival of the nineteenth century, the PEMS began as a society of prayer in support of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY and the Evangelical BASEL MISSION. It soon established branches in France, Switzerland, Italy, and Holland, and won the support of many friends worldwide. At that time, long before the creation of the Evangelical Alliance in 1846, “evangelical” meant unifying Protestants in a common obedience to Jesus according to the gospel. The PEMS was always wary of doctrinal disputes, but actually followed the evangelical line when choices were necessary. A famous case was the refusal of Albert Schweitzer’s application as a missionary candidate for Lambarene in 1905 because of his alleged commitment to higher criticism. This evangelical line lost its visibility in 1948, when the PEMS was reorganized in the wake of the missiological ideal of merging church and mission. The PEMS was then almost completely integrated into the sending churches in France and Switzerland. Henceforth, final doctrinal and financial decisions were made by the respective synods.

The first missionaries of the PEMS went to Southern Africa in 1829, soon to be guided to Lesotho in 1833, where Eugene Casalis and Thomas Arbousset planted the Evangelical Church of Lesotho in close cooperation with the local king Moshoeshoe. From there new evangelical ventures were launched with Esaias Seele and other Sotho missionaries in 1863 and later with François Coillard and his party from 1877 along the Zambezi River, planting the church which is now a part of the United Church of Zambia. In the meantime the PEMS was asked by the LMS to take over some mission fields coming under attack by French colonialism and Roman Catholicism: Tahiti (1843, 1866), Madagascar (1897), Loyalty Islands and New Caledonia (1883, Maurice Leenhardt as from 1902). The same pattern applied in West Africa. The PEMS took over the American Presbyterian field in Gabon (1892, Lambarene 1893), the German Baptist field and the Basel Mission field in French Cameroon (1917), and the German Lutheran field in Togo (1929). All these churches became formally independent in 1957-64, calling themselves "Evangelical Church" in Cameroon, in Madagascar; and in New Caledonia. These developments led the PEMS to decide on its own dissolution in 1971, giving birth to two new bodies, one common mission board of several French mainline Protestant Churches called Département Français d’Action Apostolique [DEFAP], and one international community of 47 Reformed, Lutheran, Methodist, and United churches (1997), called CEVAA (Communauté Évangélique d’Action Apostolique or Evangelical Community for Apostolic Action), both based in Paris.

The PEMS has been publishing since 1826 one of the oldest missionary magazines in the world, the Journal des Missions Évangéliques, until 1990 when the journal was renamed Mission: Mensuel Protestant de Mission et de Relations Internationales (monthly). The PEMS was also a publishing house, active in Bible translation and distribution (e.g., the Sotho Bible, 1879), promotional literature, and in-depth studies. Several periodicals in local languages were launched, including Leselinyana [The Little Light] (1863- ), the second oldest periodical in Southern Africa (in Sotho) and Ny Mpamafy [The Sower] (1900-1958) (in Malagasy).

Parker, Peter (1804–88). American pioneer medical missionary to China. Born and raised in Framingham, Massachusetts, Peter Parker received his basic college education at Yale University. He then engaged in three years of intensive graduate studies at New Haven, receiving both his B.D. in theology and M.D. in medicine. After ordination as a missionary with the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, he sailed for China as the first medical missionary to that country. In 1835 he opened the Ophthalmic Hospital in Canton. Three years later he assisted in founding the Medical Missionary Society for promoting medical missions in China.

During the political troubles at the time of the Opium War (1839–42) Parker returned to America, spoke extensively on medical missions, and strongly advocated to his government an American commission to China.

After his return to China in 1842, Parker served as interpreter in the 1844 Wanghsia treaty negotiations between the United States and China, became the American chargé d'affaires, and was ultimately appointed commissioner to China. His relationship with his mission board was terminated in 1847, both because of his political duties and because of disagreements over his role as a medical missionary. He left China in 1857 and lived in Washington, D.C., until his death in 1888.

Parousia. Early Christians lived in the expectation of the prompt return of the Lord Jesus Christ (1 Thess. 4:16–18; 4:8; 2 Peter 3:3ff.). This belief flowed naturally out of their definition of the Kingdom of God as both a present reality and a future expectation. Both Judaism and Christianity are characterized as forward looking in their faith and practice. They believe human history cannot resolve the complex morass of human existence. Only God can. The parousia of Christ is for Christians the ultimate answer to death, evil, injustice, and chaos. What, then, is the relationship of the future appearance of Christ and world mission? Does a belief in the parousia encourage or paralyze the mission of the church?

The New Testament and the Parousia. While the parousia is uniquely Christian, some of the language and concepts in which it is couched are Jewish. During the Old Testament and intertestamental periods Jewish expectations of the kingdom became increasingly prominent. They believed the kingdom would appear in history as a gift from God. The Day of Yahweh was one of a number of phrases used to express this belief.

Jesus taught that the kingdom was present in his ministry and the New Testament writers believed that the kingdom had come through the incarnation, including the death and resurrection of Christ and the coming of the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:28; Luke 2:17; 1 Cor. 15:23). Jesus also taught his disciples to expect a future coming of the kingdom (Luke 22:16, 18). Paul, the Gospel writers, James, and Peter taught explicitly that Jesus would appear a second time (Titus 2:13; John 21:22; James 5:8; 1 Peter 1:5). The word parousia means coming or appearance. The New Testament uses a number of words for the second advent such as coming, appearance, reveal, presence, and day (of Christ, God, Lord). Words such as appearance/coming (parousia) and day of the Lord were used to express this belief. At times the language and belief of Jesus and the early church was characterized by a note of imminence. But there was a uniform avoidance of date setting (Acts 1:7; Mark 13:32).

The Problem of the Delay. Modern critical study of the New Testament has in general been characterized by a belief that the delay of the parousia led to a crisis in early Christianity. When theology of imminence was followed by continued delay, so the argument goes, the church became disillusioned, resulting in an abandoning of the imminent expectation of the parousia. The hypothesis became a controlling presupposition of much twentieth-century scholarly study of the New Testament.

One of the obvious problems with this hypothesis is the notable absence of data in the New Testament and the early church fathers (2 Peter 3 and John 21:18ff.). The failure of these writers to talk about this problem seems to indicate there was no major problem in the delays of the parousia. That Jesus and the early Christians believed in imminence cannot be doubted. This being so, why did the delay of the parousia prove inconsequential?

Sociological studies show that movements that engage in date-setting, such as the Seventh-Day Adventists and Jehovah’s Witnesses, may continue to grow and thrive in spite of eschatological disappointment. As for early Christianity it can be shown that although Jesus taught imminence, as did the apostles, their faith was deeply anchored in two things: a belief in present salvation and a total involvement in mission (Matt. 24:14; 28:20; Acts 1:6–11; Gal. 2:7–8; Rom. 1:14–16; 15:23–24). These early Christians were experiencing the “already” through the empowering presence of God in the resurrection and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit for life and witness. Any supposed delay of the parousia served a good purpose (2 Peter 3:9).

Mission and Parousia. There is a vital relationship between the parousia and mission. Alongside the church’s belief in imminence was belief in worldwide mission. Jesus clearly and specifically called the Twelve and Paul to engage in mission to the world. The delay of the parousia caused no paralysis in mission, rather, as the church became universal its belief in the parousia was a motivating factor in mission (Matt. 24:14; Acts 1:6–11). The church engaged in mission, not to bring in the kingdom, but as an act of faithfulness to their king who was coming. World mission gives meaning to the church’s life between the crucifixion/resurrection of Christ and the second coming of Christ. For those who had experienced the blessings of the age to come while living in this present age, their desire was to make this Good News known to the unreached while awaiting the completion of their salvation (Rom. 15).

While the place of the parousia in the life of the church has ebbed and flowed throughout the history of the church, the early church believed fervently in both imminence and world mission. Properly understood, the parousia of Christ motivates Christians for mission. Those who firmly believe that God will complete the not yet of the kingdom will be energized to preach the gospel to every people group in the world.

Parrish, Sarah Rebecca (1869–1952). American pioneer missionary physician in the Philippines. Born in Bowers, Indiana, Parrish developed a heart of compassion and an understanding of adversity from her early experience as an orphan. She received her medical training in the U.S. In 1906, Parrish was the first female physician sent to the Philippines under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Woman’s Foreign Missionary Society. She combined medicine, evangelism, and social work in her efforts to ameliorate poverty and unsanitary conditions. Parrish began work in a one-room dispensary in Manila. Within a year, it had grown to two rooms with ten beds. Two years later, a generous donation from the Johnstons of Minneapolis enabled her to establish the Mary Johnston Hospital and School of Nursing in Tondo, a waterfront slum. Parrish maintained high credentialing standards at the hospital and it is still operating. She took few furloughs and worked in the Philippines for 27 years. Upon retirement, Parrish wrote her memoirs and lectured widely. In 1950, she received a citation and medal of honor from President Quirino and the Civic Assembly of Women for her pioneering efforts to inspire health and social welfare in the Philippines by “... bringing Christian love, healing, and enlightenment, and a better way of life.”

Partnership. The voices calling for the Moratorium of foreign mission agencies have grown silent. In their place new voices call for other options. As for church-mission relationships, these include, with numerous variations, at least four theories: (1) departure, (2) subordination, (3) parallelism, and (4) partnership.

Theory 1: Departure. Once the national church reaches maturity, the expatriates depart physically, although they may continue to send funds. HENRY VENN and RUFUS ANDERSON must be credited for this unrivaled mission theory of the nineteenth and first half of the twentieth centuries: the three-self indigenous church concept (self-propagating, self-supporting, self-governing). JOHN

726
Nevius, sensing the practicality of the three SELFS, instituted them in China and more effectively in Korea. Nevius’s The Planting and Developing of Missionary Churches remains a classic. Roland Allen echoed Venn and Anderson’s theory in the twentieth century, arguing that the three SELFS work not just because they are practical, as did Nevius, but because they are biblical. Allen makes the argument in his classic Missionary Methods: St. Paul’s or Ours? Failure to ask the global questions, among other things, would eventually date this theory.

Theory 2: Subordination. Once the national church reaches maturity, expatriates work under national leaders while providing their own support. This unilateral theory transfers complete control to the national church. Some view this theory as ecumenism at its best while others see it as distorted partnership representing a kind of reverse paternalism.

Theory 3: Parallelism. Since the national church is mature, each party develops complementary, yet separate agendas while maintaining individual organizational structures, personnel, and budgets. This theory respects the unity, diversity, and autonomy of all the players. Proponents see the international body of Christ in action, utilizing the different parts to fulfill a unified goal. Opponents believe it stifles the Great Commission within the national church, leaving evangelism and mission to outsiders.

Theory 4: Partnerships. Luis Bush defines partnerships as: “an association of two or more Christian autonomous bodies who have formed a trusting relationship and fulfilled agreed upon expectations by sharing complementary strengths and resources to reach their mutual goal.” This theory advocates that institutions work not apart from each other [Theory 1], or under each other [Theory 2], or unified but separate [Theory 3], but as equal partners. Proponents argue this multilateral theory protects both the commission of the receiving national church and the sending institutional structure to fulfill it. They agree upon assigned roles and rules that foster complementary partnerships that utilize effectively the diversity represented, take seriously the stewardship of resources (human and material), and create liberated synergy, thereby credibility to witness.

Strategic partnerships deal with methodology, not with goals of what must be done. Central to the “what” should be the expansion of the church as a sign of God’s kingdom. Wise partners will insist that the vision statement centers around selective components of the Great Commandment and the Great Commission.

A common vision serves as the driving force behind effective strategic partnerships. Partners negotiate a vision statement, and the organizational structure to fulfill it. They agree upon assigned roles and rules that foster complementary participation. Every member shares in the risks without compromising their divine call or corporate values.

The duration of strategic partnerships varies depending upon the specified goals. Some are designed to field quick response teams for short periods. Others form for long-term activities or somewhere in between. Whatever the duration, partners will want to institute procedures for the graceful dismantling of the partnership, due either to the completion of the stated goals, to the completion of the original time frame for the partnership, or to unresolved conflicts that may arise.

Partnership Fundamentals. Strategic partnerships today go far beyond mission agencies and national churches to include local churches, parachurch organizations, and academic training institutions. Participants may partner on the local, national, or international levels. On the international level (often cutting across geography, theology, ethnicity, gender, generations, and income boundaries), participants may come from anywhere in the world and go anywhere in the world.

Motivations for forming strategic partnerships vary considerably. One is fear: The declining missionary population from the West in contrast to the increasing missionary population from the Third World (see Non-Western Mission Boards and Agencies) raises control issues. The high cost of new start-ups, along with the maintenance of existing programs, creates tremendous competition for dollars in a shrinking support pool. The competitive search for dollars also influences job security. A second motivation is convenience. Seekers may find association with another group advantageous, whether for finances, personnel, training, facilities, technology, logistics, psychological security, linguistics, cultural or lifestyle nearness, name recognition, global access, or publicity. A more positive motivation is theology. The Bible calls for Christians to set aside unhealthy competition and instead create alternative complementary partnerships that utilize effectively the diversity represented, take seriously the stewardship of resources (human and material), and create liberated synergy, thereby credibility to witness.

Partnership Life Cycle Phases. Fundamental to the success of any strategic partnership is trust. Open communication facilitates trust-building and efficiency. During the exploration phase, potential partners will want to discuss their expectations in relation to the term “partnership”...
Partnership

nership.” These expectations may include languages to be used, conflict resolution, goals and priorities, organizational structure (status and roles), decision-making, planning and evaluation, operation ethics, theological distinctives, mutual accountability contingency plans, finances, deportnering, and how cultural distinctives influence the interpretation of each. During this phase they will seek to discover if there is a genuine mutual need, for herein lies the basis for healthy partnership.

The formation phase may involve a facilitator respected by all parties who demonstrates strong belief in the sovereignty of God, personal integrity, ability to network, an appreciation of diversity, ability to solve cross-cultural conflicts, live without strengths for and champion the vision. During the operational phase changes can be expected as adjustments are made to adapt to present realities. Participants will continually reevaluate personal relationships, the purpose, procedures, and performances. They will attempt to make necessary adjustments in culturally sensitive ways that reflect a Christian spirit. Once the partnership completes its goals, the dismantling phase begins.

Pastoral Counseling. Two major areas of concern exist with regard to pastoral counseling and missions. First is the provision of counseling services to missionaries themselves. Second is pastoral counseling provided by the missionary as part of his or her ministry.

Pastoral Counseling Services to Missionaries (see also Member Care). Commonly used measurements of stress reveal that the average missionary and family leaving for overseas faces significant stress before they even arrive to face the stressors of their placement. Gish (1983) identified nineteen areas of significant stress. The survey established the lack of pastoral care as significant stress for 35 percent of the missionaries surveyed. The following responses would assist in avoiding missionary BURNOUT.

Missions agencies must develop a commitment to provide supportive and caring environments. To form the foundation for this commitment, the ethos created by administrators and supervisors should value healthy and encouraging interpersonal relationships. Training for supervisory personnel should include basic courses in helping relationships and group/system dynamics. Additionally, mission agencies should employ or subcontract trained and experienced pastoral counselors, who themselves have served in cross-cultural settings long enough to adequately understand the missionary context. While requiring dual training will limit the number of available personnel, the dual training is necessary to effectively minister in this specialized context.

Missionary conscripts should receive preparation for spiritual and emotional stresses that will typically face them. Standard training should include stress management, identifying and coping with depression and anxiety, and cross-cultural conflict resolution.

A well thought out plan of pastoral care, based in careful and accurate studies of the points of vulnerability, should be put into action. For example, during their training period, new missionaries should establish a relationship with a pastoral counselor. The missionary should then receive an extended visit from this pastoral counselor after six months, and again after twelve months in the field.

Pastoral counselors serving missionaries should be allowed to maintain confidentiality (as is true of any licensed counselor) in order for the missionary to be assured that counseling content will not be shared with administrators without the missionary’s permission.

As a standard, furloughs should include regular pastoral counseling for missionary and family. This counseling should focus on discovering how the individual and family are dealing with stress.

Last, continuing education seminars should be available on the field focusing on the areas identified in studies such as the one cited above. Extra time should be scheduled for seminar leaders to minister to missionaries. Other resources (i.e., literature, videos, audiotapes) can be provided as required.

Pastoral Counseling Provided by Missionaries. The goal of training missionaries to provide CROSS-CULTURAL COUNSELING as part of their ministry is simple: to better equip them in fulfilling their cross-cultural task. It is commonly accepted that missionaries must become deeply involved in the lives of those to whom they desire to bring God’s Word. Since becoming deeply involved includes being involved with individual and family problems, training in cross-cultural counseling is essential. Attempting to minister to personal and family problems with an understanding of human behavior from an ethnocentric perspective can have extremely unfavorable results. Despite the best intentions, great harm can result.

Because effective counseling is based in understanding the feelings, cognitions, and behaviors of the culture being served, increasing importance must be given in mission and theological training centers to cross-cultural counseling.

Pastoral Responsibilities. Pastoral responsibilities include guiding, comforting, correcting, encouraging, nurturing, protecting, healing, and worshipping. Caring for others, and being cared for by others, is not simply our biblical responsibility, but also a vital part of our evangelistic witness. Missionaries from Western countries are having less opportunities to serve as local-church pastors in Two-Thirds World countries. They still, however, find extensive opportunities for pastoral responsibilities.

The Methods of Pastoral Ministry. In regard to pastoral responsibilities, missionaries should remember that the biblical model for pastoral care and leadership clearly reflects the servant model. God called Abraham not just to become a great nation, but rather to become a blessing to the “nations” (Gen. 12:1–3). The Servant in Isaiah lived for the benefit of the people and not his own, and Israel was called to emulate this servanthood (Isa. 49:5–6; 53:4–6).

The incarnation remains the greatest example of the servant model (Luke 4:1–4; Phil. 2:5–11). Jesus explained his ministry as to serve rather than to be served (Mark 10:45; Luke 9:23–27). The Lord indicated that the pattern of leadership for people would not be that of the Gentile rulers who “lord it over” and “exercise authority over” those under their control. But, said Jesus, among his people the greatest would be the servant of all (Matt. 20:24–28).

Clear emphasis on the servant pattern of leadership and pastoral ministry comes through Jesus’ teaching in John 12:20–28. Only the seed that falls into the ground and dies brings forth great fruit. The servant pattern produces fruitfulness; the absence of the servant pattern leads to the tragedy of fruitlessness.

All pastoral responsibilities for missionaries should be based on and patterned after this servanthood model. Genuine pastoral leadership eschews the authoritative, paternalistic, manipulative, controlling, leader-dominated patterns too often seen even among Christian leaders. Biblical ways in pastoral leadership and ministry follow the pattern of servanthood.

Servant leadership expresses itself through relationship rather than position. The missionary refuses to consider himself or herself as the one in a position of authority but as one in a relationship of helping. The servant pastor seeks to serve rather than control; this model of pastoral ministry recognizes that equipping is better than performing. Through properly expressing the servant pattern of pastoral ministry, the missionary can live out the example of Jesus in his or her pastoral duties.

The Goals of Pastoral Ministry. The goals of pastoral ministry center in efforts to equip people first for their own relationship with God and then for the ministries to which God has called them. Both missionaries and national leaders have opportunities for this equipping ministry. The goal of equipping others follows the proper interpretation of Ephesians 4:11–13 and remains a primary goal of pastoral work.

Pastoral responsibilities include guiding and correcting. Gentle, sympathetic guidance including correction are among the more imperative functions of missionary leaders, and should be carried out in ways that are in keeping with local, culturally accepted patterns.

One of the foremost opportunities for pastoral responsibilities in today’s world relates to helping others develop pastoral skills, which multiplies the effectiveness of the missionary caregiver.

Pastoral responsibilities often include leading in worship. Worship leadership in cross-cultural situations demands sympathetic learning of the local ways in order that the worship will be done in culturally appropriate patterns rather than imported methods.

The Recipients of Pastoral Ministry. Missionaries engaged in pastoral responsibilities target different recipients for their ministries. One recipient group for pastoral ministry resides in the missionary’s own family. The missionary finds abundant opportunity to be a pastor to spouse and children. Also, the families and individuals within the mission organizations often need pastoral care—in times of tragedy, stress, discouragement, and the like. A missionary pastoral worker makes full use of such opportunities for other ministries.

A second recipient group for pastoral ministries rests with the leaders of the national organization. Rather than allowing this relationship to become adversarial, the wise missionary will commit himself or herself to serving as pastor to these leaders. Ministry to national leaders is among the most fruitful of all pastoral roles for missionaries.

A third recipient group for pastoral ministries includes the members of the churches. Missionaries will often be called on to minister to church members and their families. Western missionaries will exercise care in rendering pastoral ministry in the cross-cultural setting. Acts that extend love and concern may be overlooked if the missionary does not take fully into account the cultural realities of the society.

Pastoral Responsibilities

Paternalism. In a generic sense, all that is positive in familial relationships, in particular that of father to child. When paternalism exists in adult or institutional (such as church-mission) relationships, however, the considerable literature shows it has negative connotations. Paternalism might be thought of as the use of coercion to achieve a good that is not perceived as such by those persons for whom it is intended.

Paternalism, the concept of intervening actively for the perceived well-being of another, has long existed in mission. People with knowledge, skills, funds, or power (the older missions) have used them to get new churches to follow their demands. An example of paternalism is a mission keeping control of a work because it feels that the locals are unqualified and would do themselves and the cause of Christ harm by taking leadership. Paternalistic attitudes assume superior knowledge, wisdom, and skills. While well intentioned in some cases, they fail to recognize the work of the Holy Spirit in young churches and their leaders.

While the connotations of paternalism are often negative, churches or missions sometimes develop rules (by-laws, covenants, mission and purpose statements) with the positive result of producing mature Christian behavior.

Paternalism is a complex issue. Mission leaders must face the tension involved in deciding how much or how little influence to exert, either actively intervening or passively withholding something, for the perceived good of emerging missions, churches, and their leaders.

Paton, John Gibson (1824–1907). Scottish missionary to the South Pacific. Born near Dumfries, Scotland, and with little early education, he worked with the Glasgow City Mission (1847–56) while preparing himself for overseas service by undertaking studies in medicine and divinity. Ordained by the Reformed Presbyterian Church in 1858, he established a station on the New Hebrides island of Tanna. Incredible privations, chiefly caused by local hostility, coupled with the loss of his wife and infant son, forced his removal in 1862 to Australia. He extended the missionary undertaking studies in medicine and divinity. Ordained by the Reformed Presbyterian Church in 1858, he established a station on the New Hebrides island of Tanna. Incredible privations, chiefly caused by local hostility, coupled with the loss of his wife and infant son, forced his removal in 1862 to Australia. He extended the missionary challenge there, in New Zealand, and in Scotland, where his church elected him moderator in 1864 and where he recruited seven missionaries for the work in the New Hebrides. He settled on the island of Aniwa (1866–81) and most of its inhabitants professed Christianity.

Paton campaigned fearlessly against white men with vested interests that disregarded the welfare of the people, notably in arms, alcohol, and indentured labor. From 1881 Paton was based in Melbourne. His many missionary tours, including visits to the United States and Canada, produced vast sums for the work in the South Pacific region. He also translated parts of Scripture into the Aniwan tongue. Recipient of a Cambridge D.D. degree (1891), Paton was a simple but riveting speaker. At the Ecumenical Missionary Conference in New York in 1900 he was hailed as a great missionary leader.

Paton died in Australia, but the family’s missionary connection with the New Hebrides was to continue until 1970.

His best-selling autobiography was edited by his brother James (1907).

Paton, William (1886–1943). British missions statesman and author. The son of Scottish parents who had settled in England, he was educated at Oxford and Cambridge, and ordained in the Presbyterian Church of England ("to save him from [World War I] conscription," notes his biographer). He was missionary secretary of the Student Christian Movement (1911–21), combined with work for the YMCA under whose auspices he went to India. He returned there as general secretary of the newly formed National Christian Council of India, Burma, and Ceylon (1921–28) before appointment as joint secretary (with J. H. Oldham) of the London-based International Missionary Council. Paton was an ecumenical pioneer, a champion of war-orphaned missions, an ardent pacifist, an indefatigable writer on a wide range of subjects, and the possessor of a wicked wit as seen in the parody (of Mott’s famous watchword), “The Moon turned to Blood in our Generation.” An ecumenical enthusiast who hung loose to denominational affiliations, Paton made a substantial contribution to the movement that in 1948 became officially the World Council of Churches. His published works included Jesus Christ and the World’s Religions (1916), Christianity in the Eastern Conflicts (1937), and The Church and the New Order (1941). For sixteen years he served as editor of the International Review of Missions.

Patrick (c. 389–461). Early British missionary; “Apostle of Ireland.” Born in Roman Britain, he was captured at the age of sixteen by Irish raiders and carried into slavery in Ireland. After six years, he escaped and was eventually reunited with his family in Britain. Called in a dream to evangelize Ireland, he is said to have returned there as a bishop in 432, and from his base in Armagh carried out what he called his “laborious episcopate.” He claims to have been the first to take the gospel to more remote regions of the island. Numerous legends have grown up around Patrick’s life; he is said, for example, to have been trained in Gaul and to have had a close relationship with Martin of Tours (calling for a fourth-century Patrick).

Reliable data come only from his two short writings: The Confession, a spiritual autobiography; and a work denouncing the tyranny of a British chieftain who persecuted Christians. Patrick aimed first to convert the princes who would then give him safe conduct through their territories and access to the common people. He supported monasticism, refused all presents, broke the power of heathenism in Ireland, and typified the enthusiasm of the Celtic Church. He was known for remarkably clear statements of faith (he continually quoted Paul), and for a missionary heart that played a major part in sending monks to evangelize Europe during the following two centuries.

Patteson, John Coleridge (1827–71). English missionary in the South Pacific. Born in London, he was educated at Eton and Oxford. He took a curate in Allington and was ordained in 1854. He was then recruited by Bishop George Selwyn for ministry in the South Pacific. Upon his arrival, Patteson noted the two influences of European civilization on the islanders: the immorality of the merchant sailors and the gospel. He was determined to make the latter stronger than the former, but gradually learned that for most of the indigenous population, Christianity and moral decadence were inextricably linked.

Education became his primary strategy. He made regular trips to the Solomon and New Hebrides Islands, selecting young men and women to be trained at St. John’s College in Auckland, New Zealand. His plan was that upon returning to their homelands, the islanders would function as missionaries to their own people. The ministry was successful and on February 24, 1861, Patteson was consecrated bishop of Melanesia. By 1870 his school was training 145 students.

Danger to missionaries increased as a result of national reaction to the forced impressment of islanders by slave traders, and in September 1871 Patteson suffered a mortal blow to the head while visiting the island of Nukapu. He was buried at sea, earning the title “Martyr of the Islands.”

Paul and Mission

The mission of the apostle Paul in the first century has functioned as a principal inspiration and paradigm for Christian witness during the millennia since. The modern missionary movement in particular has routinely attempted to take bearings from the apostle’s missionary thinking and endeavors. Where this has been pursued at a scholarly level, such inquiries have not infrequently also proved suggestive for those engaged in the modern academic study of Paul. Among more familiar examples of such studies in the past century would certainly be those by Allen, Blauw, Senior and Stuhlmueller, and Bosch.

The modern academic study of Paul has had good reason, in any case, to devote considerable professional attention to Paul’s mission, since that mission has functioned as a principal feature in the scholarly reconstructions of early Christian history and theology. In the process, contemporary Pauline research has sometimes proposed findings that challenge popular assumptions about the Pauline mission, serving thereby as a useful corrective for a too easy correlation between the Paul of history and the interests and requirements of the modern missionary movement. At the same time these modern academic inquiries have not always escaped their own accommodations to contemporary intellectual fashions.

Beginning with F. C. Baur of Tübingen in the mid-nineteenth century, and throughout the entire period of modern Pauline studies since, the history and literature of the Pauline mission have been continuously queried. For example, Baur counted only four of Paul’s principal letters as authentic, and nonevangelical scholarship today tends conventionally to accept only seven as assuredly Pauline (excluding Ephesians, Colossians, 2 Thessalonians, and the Pastorals). Likewise the historical reliability of Acts, and of its account of the Pauline mission, has been repeatedly called into question. While fashionable opinion on the matter has oscillated over the years, the recent pattern has increasingly been to assume a sharp contrast between the Paul presented in the narrative of Acts and the historical Paul represented by his principal letters, and in consequence to discount the usefulness of Acts in assessing the history of the Pauline mission.

Such findings can often seem to have more to do with the predilections of the modern-day academic than with an even-handed scholarly assessment of the historical data. The problematic nature of many of the assumptions that undergird such findings has often been demonstrated. Nevertheless, a large segment of contemporary Pauline scholarship would doubt the traditional chronological reconstruction of Paul's mission, and in particular the "three tours" approach so characteristic of more popular presentations.

Yet it is noteworthy that in the alternative reconstructions being proffered, while the chronology of the Pauline mission is shifted, the pattern of Paul's geographical movement as presented in Acts is left largely intact. This anomaly within the modern inquiry arises from the fact that, whatever the chronology of events, the relevant data derivable from Paul's principal letters on the geographical pattern of his mission correlate remarkably well with the more detailed data available from Acts.

That is to say, in both the letters and in Acts Paul carries out his missionary endeavors in the same sector of the Mediterranean world, in the same provinces, and in the same general sequence. In both sources Paul works in the lands surrounding the northeastern Mediterranean, between Judea and the Adriatic; both sources show him progressing through this area generally from east to west; and both sources see him attending to Syria/Cilicia, Macedonia, Achaia, and Asia, in that order—and also Galatia at some point along the way.

Indeed, the Paul of the letters is explicitly conscious of such a geographical pattern in his mission. In a context in which he anticipates travel westward to Rome and beyond to Spain, he states that already "from Jerusalem all the way westward to Rome and beyond to Spain, he brought the message of the Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. 15:19). The distinctiveness of this geographical dimension in the apostle's understanding of his mission can be obscured by its very familiarity. Paul clearly took his mission to be in part a geographically definable accomplishment.

A second distinguishing characteristic of the Pauline mission, evidenced both in the letters and in Acts, is the intentional focus on community formation. Paul saw his mission as more than gospel proclamation and conversion of individuals; through and beyond these endeavors he understood his missionary role to concern the establishment of settled, believing communities. This churchward orientation of his mission is evident not least in his surviving missionary letters, all of which are directed to the stabilization and maturation of newly planted churches. Paul pursued his geographical mission in terms of ecclesial achievement.

In the first decades of the twentieth century Pauline studies came increasingly under the influence of a history-of-religions approach, which emphasized the importance of the Greco-Roman religious context for understanding Paul. This approach affected the understanding of Paul's mission in at least two respects. First, it helped ignite a debate that continues to the present on the relationship of Paul's Damascus experience to his subsequent theology and to his Gentile mission preoccupation. For example, numerous studies attempted a religio-psychological interpretation of the Damascus experience, in which the sudden reorientation to Gentile mission of this erstwhile Pharisee was explained as the compensatory outworking of an uneasy conscience over the harsh exclusivism of Judaism. Such an approach is no longer in vogue, owing to the excessive degree to which modern assumptions must be interpolated into the historical data in order to render such psychological interpretations feasible.

It is now widely recognized that whatever led up to the Damascus event, the interpretive baseline for the event must begin with the fact that Paul experienced it as an encounter with the risen Jesus. And, in light of his own explicit testimony, it is also increasingly accepted that Paul experienced this encounter not as a conversion so much as a call, as a divine summons to a task described in the letters for as unfolding from this duality at the heart of the original experience. It was the christological reorientation, while it was the call to Gentile mission that determined the direction of the resulting theological development.

The history-of-religions phase within Pauline studies also stimulated considerable interest in the numerous examples of religious propaganda in the Greco-Roman world, and sought to reinterpret Paul's missionary efforts in light of this larger social phenomenon. Such studies highlighted not only the vigorous Jewish proselyte movement of the period, but also the wandering preachers then common in the Hellenistic world, and the rapid spread of the Eastern mystery religions throughout the empire at this time. Such studies have thrown much useful light on the patterns of religious propagation within Paul’s world. At the same time, in attempting to trace a generalized phenomenon of the period, such investigations have tended to accent those characteristics common to all these efforts while obscuring the individual distinctions. In consequence, even today scholarly texts will speak with assurance of multiple first-century movements of religious propaganda, all functioning more or less on the familiar pattern of the Pauline mission.

Recent research has been severely undermining this projection. It is now being noted, for example, that the wandering preachers of Hellenism were not pursuing community formation. Neither was the spread of the mystery religions nor the Jewish proselyte movement furthered by individuals under a sense of divine calling to missionize. And none of these movements interpreted itself in terms of geographical progress. Even for Christianity itself in the initial postapostolic centuries, closer inquiry finds the evidence almost entirely lacking for the figure of the missionary evangelist seeking to plant churches in new geographical areas on the Pauline model. A significant result of this reassessment now in progress has been to clarify more adequately the distinctiveness of Paul’s particular mission, and especially to clarify the extent to which the geographical framing of his mandate, and its ecclesial focus, represent exceptional characteristics for missionary perception and outreach in his day.

In the latter part of the twentieth century an increasingly influential sociological approach in New Testament studies produced illuminating contributions on the social dimensions of the early Christian mission. For example, a helpful distinction has been traced between the “itinerant charismatic” preachers of the early Palestinian Christian communities and the more orderly efforts of those like Paul who may be characterized as “goal-oriented community organizers.” But more adventurous attempts to reinterpret Paul’s missionary outreach itself in terms of modern sociological models for religious expansion, such as millennial, conversionist, or sectarian models, have thus far proved less than persuasive, owing to a general perception that these models are being inappropriately imposed upon the historical data. This field of inquiry is nevertheless promising, and more methodologically sensitive and disciplined studies along these lines should prove fruitful for a better understanding of the varied patterns of religious propagation in the Greco-Roman world.

The Bultmannian school of thought, which dominated Pauline studies in the middle decades of the twentieth century, transmuted the larger inquiry into existentialist categories in ways that rendered the essential issues of Paul’s mission largely peripheral or irrelevant. By the last quarter of the century, this whole construct had been duly challenged and displaced, especially owing to the far-reaching reassessments in Pauline studies precipitated by E. P. Sanders in 1977, now mediated most prominently through work by J. D. G. Dunn in what is conventionally termed the “New Perspective” in Pauline studies. The result has been to move the dominant issues of Pauline inquiry at the commencement of the twenty-first century back into territory more congenial to acknowledging and addressing questions relating to Paul’s mission and mission thinking.

In particular this shift of perspective has allowed renewed consideration of a significant but less dominant strand of inquiry in twentieth-century Pauline studies emphasizing and exploring the eschatological structuring of Pauline theology. The eschatological nature of Paul’s thinking was first effectively accentuated in 1911 through an influential survey of Pauline studies by the New Testament scholar A. Schweitzer, who subsequently gained wide notice as a medical missionary in Africa. Beginning in 1936 O. Cullmann then directed attention to the eschatological nature of Paul’s own self-understanding. Building on this, the Danish scholar J. Munck from 1947 on systematically worked out the proposition that all Paul’s missionary thinking and endeavors are best interpreted in terms of his eschatological convictions.

Munck demonstrated that the salvation-historical framework in which all of Paul’s theological reflection takes place also functions as the determinative framework for Paul’s understanding and implementation of his mission. Paul took himself to be a participant in the end-time redemptive events of Old Testament prophetic expectation. More particularly, he understood himself to be a participant in the fulfillment of that part of Old Testament eschatology which expected the inclusion of the nations, the Gentiles, in the messianic blessing. Paul therefore took his own vigorous outreach to be part of the eschatological ingathering of the nations, and his Damascus experience to be a divine summons to participate in this outreach to the ends of the earth. The historical characteristics of Paul’s missionary outreach are then best understood as those practicalities implicit in seeking to implement such an eschatological assignment, given the realities of Paul’s first-century world and his assumptions about that world. Paul sought to actualize the promised “blessing to the nations” by concrete efforts to help form believing communities province by province across his Roman world. This required deliberate travel to the population centers of these provinces. The little gatherings he formed center by center symbolize for him the incorporation of the Gentiles into the messianic community in fulfillment of Old Testament expectation. He recognizes that he is working between the “already” of Christ's redemptive act and the “not yet” of Christ's final triumph, bringing the life of the age to come into the present fallen world. And as a messenger of the Crucified One in this interim time, he knows that he must work amidst all the vicissitudes of the human condition, accepting toil and suffering and being vulnerable to conflict and disappointment. Yet he is sustained by the joyous assurance that God's eternal purpose, to unite Jew and Gentile together in the worship of Christ as Lord, will be fulfilled.

Of course the mission of the apostle Paul must not be used as an exclusive norm for appropriate Christian outreach. The biblical understanding of mission encompasses more than is represented by the particularities of the Pauline model. Yet within the larger scope of the biblical witness Paul does constitute a principal representative of evangelical outreach. And for those prepared to find in his mission a guiding point of reference for appropriate Christian witness in our own day, Paul can serve as an effective reminder of basic components of the biblical perspective on mission. This would include convictions such as:

1. That Christian mission should be understood and implemented within a theological frame of reference; and that theological reflection may in turn discover a needed relevance, balance, orientation, and dynamic if pursued (as for Paul) within a missiological frame of reference.

2. That within the eschatological structuring of God's redemptive purpose, the primal mandate for the time between Christ's first and second advents is gospel proclamation to the nations, that within the larger divine economy the core intention for the present interim period is the effecting of this mandate.

3. That from among the recipients of redemption God may commission selected individuals to a singularly disciplic, proactive, and sustained collaboration in the proclamation to the nations.

4. That the proclamation of the gospel is meant to be implemented, and its achievement measured, in part by geographical attainment, that a deliberately cross-cultural mission to the unreached peoples and nations of one's world functions under first biblical warrant.

5. That through and beyond missionary proclamation and evangelism, the planting of believing communities and their nurture to settled maturity in Christ must remain a primary focus of any biblically validated missionary outreach.

6. That God's redemptive purposes will assuredly be achieved, that he remains sovereign in the course of the missionary proclamation to the nations, and that he will triumphantly accomplish his intention to sum up all things in Christ.

W. PAUL BOWERS

Paul, Kanakarayan Tiruselvam (1876–1931). Indian church and mission leader. K. T. Paul was born at Salem, Tamil Nadu, in South India. He graduated from Madras Christian College, where he was a classmate of V. S. Azariah. With Azariah he was involved in the founding of the National Missionary Society of which Paul became secretary in 1907. In 1913 he was appointed national secretary of the Indian YMCA, and in 1916 became the first Indian to serve as general secretary of the YMCA in India. In this capacity Paul developed a program for rural construction and promoted adult education. The YMCA under Paul had a team of dynamic thinkers.

In 1930 Paul participated in the First Round Table Conference in London. He supported the idea that there were values in a continued British connection with India. Nevertheless, according to Robert Speer, he heralded the demise of the colonial era of missions.

Paul was active in the negotiations for Church Union in South India. He was Moderator of the South India United Church from 1925 to 1927. He represented India at ecumenical conferences. Paul was the first Christian statesman of India and produced a theology of the church and its mission in the context of developing nationalism in a religiously pluralistic society.

ROGER E. HEDLUND

Paulinus of York (d. c. 644). Missionary to England. Sent to buttress the missionary work of Augustine of Canterbury, Paulinus left Rome in 601. Nothing is recorded of his work between 601 and 625, when he was ordained as bishop and settled to work among the Northumbrians. King Edwin and his chiefs came to Christ two years later through the ministry of Paulinus, who then took up residence in York and began extensive travel throughout the region. After Edwin's defeat in battle and death in 632, however, Paulinus returned to Kent with Edwin's wife and took up the vacant bishopric of Rochester, where he ministered until his death.

ROBERT SPEER, he heralded the demise of the colonial era of missions.

A. SCOTT MOREAU
Peace

The word “peace” is multidimensioned, emotive, and capable of being misused. Peace can refer to inner tranquility or tranquil relations between nations. Peace can also refer to war. Those who “fight for peace” may do so because they believe this is a way to ending conflict and moving toward a better world. For purposes of this entry, negative peace refers to the absence of war, or armed conflict. Positive peace refers to the absence of causes of war. In addition to practical efforts to make peace in personal and social relationships, peace is also a utopian idea. Throughout Christian history, followers of Jesus have looked forward to an end of time when God will intervene to bring about peace, “when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more” (Isa. 2:4).

Pacifism, principled opposition to all war, manifested itself early in Christian history (see PACIFIST THEOLOGY). The first Christians believed that military service and killing were contrary to Jesus’ teaching. In the second and third centuries, prominent leaders such as Tertullian and Origen condemned war and military service. Gradually, however, the church accommodated itself to admitting soldiers into membership. A tradition known as just war theory, holding that Christians could sanction a war fought under certain conditions for a just cause and in a just manner, emerged. Pacifism did not disappear. In such forms as conscientious objection, it remains a way to witness as a Christian.

Apart from those in the historic peace churches (Anabaptists, Society of Friends [Quakers], and the Church of the Brethren), positive peace is implicit in the vocation of missionaries as ministers of reconciliation. During the nineteenth-century explosion of missionary activity, peacemaking often arose out of the encounter with religious practices and social structures missionaries regarded as barriers to personal religious and societal change. Missionaries often condemned evil and developed strategies to end practices perceived as immoral such as polygamy in Africa, the trans-Atlantic slave trade, opium trafficking in China, human rights violations in Macedonia, Armenia, and the Congo. In India, for example, missionaries focused on sati, the custom of burning of Hindu widows on the funeral pyres of their dead husbands; infanticide; and the caste system as barriers to the spread of the gospel.

While furloughed missionaries often found an audience for their attacks on sati, slavery, and other evils, they had a harder time developing models for mission sensitive to more durable cultural patterns. For example, it was nearly fifty years after the arrival of Protestant missionaries in India before several women missionaries pioneered zenana visitation as a strategy of effective evangelism among women, which entailed calling on caste women in the secluded quarters of their homes. They introduced potential converts to the rudiments of Christianity, identified families in need of food, clothing, or medicine, and recruited children for schools. Their vision of work among “neglected and despised” women of India led to formation of the Ludhiana Medical College.

Sometimes missionaries dealt directly with the issue of war. In the nineteenth century, for example, during the Burmese-British war in 1824–25, the Burmese government held ADONIRAM JUDSON (1788–1850) captive for eighteen months. After his release, he helped draft the Treaty of Yandabo which ended the war. Many missionaries joined peace societies, and successor organizations in the twentieth century such as the Fellowship of Reconciliation of the Mennonite Central Committee. Some wrote for periodicals with titles such as Peace and Goodwill. In this century, perhaps the bloodiest in history, Christians have worked for positive and negative peace and reconstruction of war-torn regions.
Peace

Christian peacemaking is part of mission. Christian missionaries provide a comprehensive ministry of spiritual and physical healing. They incarnate Christ in a broken world among victims of sin, including war. They contribute to positive peace through a holistic sharing of the gospel of Jesus. When war has erupted, they number among martyr victims along with indigenous believers. Violent conflict serves as an impediment to mission, as experienced by the ancient eastern churches in the face of Islam, or as it was known would disappear and God would usher in a new era of peace and righteousness. When this did not happen, they adjusted to living in the here-and-now. Jesus’ disciples, the earliest missionaries, proclaimed in word and deed that Jesus Christ has made it possible for anyone to find peace with God. As followers of Jesus, they put on the sandals of peace (Eph. 6:15). While our Lord tarried, the ongoing mission of the church included proclamation of restored peace with God, the state which characterized humanity at the time of creation.

God in Christ engaged in the work of reconciliation and then entrusted the Christian community with the “ministry of reconciliation” (2 Cor. 5:18–20). God forged this reconciliation with humanity, between estranged human beings, and with the entire created order (Eph. 2:14–16; Col. 1). When Christians engage in the ministry of reconciliation, they take part in God’s mission as revealed in Christ. In these two passages, as well as Romans 5:1–11 and Colossians 1:15–23, Paul elaborates that God makes peace by the blood of the cross, and that Christ is the head of the church. In Christ all things hold together. Beginning with the cross, God has effected peace on earth and in heaven.

Jesus effected peace between Gentiles and Jews, males and females, free persons and slaves. In effect, he has made peace among all the nations. Announcing this human dimension is also part of the mission of the church. Jesus blessed peacemakers as God’s children (Matt. 5:19) and warned disciples against hoarding material possessions and allowing themselves to be tempted by wealth and power (Matt. 6:19–21). A later writer affirmed that true justice is the harvest reaped by peacemakers from seeds sown in a spirit of peace (James 3:18); wealth and power represent the source of conflict and quarrels (James 4:1–5). Christian peacemakers reflect the very nature of the one known as the God of Peace (Rom. 15:33; 16:20; 1 Cor. 14:33; 2 Cor. 13:11; Phil. 4:9; 1 Thess. 5:23; Heb. 13:20).

In these few paragraphs, we have begun to lay the groundwork upon which a theology of mission is built from the biblical understanding that we have peace with God in Christ. Health, security, long life, healing of broken relations, salvation, wholeness, life in Christ: these have been the basic work of missionaries from the first century until our own. Through self-giving love, death, resurrection, and glorification, Jesus broke the cycle of death and made possible radiant living in peace. Peace with God, therefore, is the basis of all ministry and mission.

Penman, David (1936–89). New Zealand missionary to Pakistan and Anglican Church leader. He was born on August 8, 1936, and raised in Wellington and Wanganui, New Zealand. While training as a teacher he was converted in a mission led by Howard Guinness, and in 1957 began training for the Anglican ministry, gained an MA from the University of Canterbury, and married Jean Newson. After a curacy in Wanganui, Penman was accepted in 1965 by the New Zealand Church Missionary Society as a missionary to Pakistan. He became a careful student of Muslim culture, and wrote a Ph.D. thesis on Islamic sociology while at the same time reaching out to students and young people. In 1968 he helped to found the Pakistan Fellowship of Evangelical Students. In 1972 Penman was invited by the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students to serve in Lebanon, and from 1974 to 1975 he served as regional director of IFES work in the Middle East. In 1976 he was invited to lead CMS missionary training at St. Andrew's Hall in Melbourne, but in 1979 accepted the invitation to serve as vicar of the large Anglican parish of All Saints, Palmerston North in New Zealand. In 1982 he returned to Melbourne first as an assistant bishop and then in 1984 as archbishop of the influential diocese. Here a lively administration with a reputation for liberal evangelicalism gave him strong political influence, particularly on Australia’s policy toward the Middle East. He died on October 1, 1989, after leading Bible teaching at the LAUSANNE CONGRESS II ON WORLD EVANGELISM (MANILA, 1989). Ever an activist and a strategist, he did much to relate evangelical outreach to the world through the Middle East. Pentateuch, Mission in the. Scholars have debated whether the concept of mission can be found in the Pentateuch. While there are no explicit examples of preachers being sent to other tribes or nations, still the five books of Moses do contribute to an understanding of mission. The Old Testament speaks about mission because of Yahweh’s missionary God. The Pentateuch reveals this in several key passages.

Genesis 1–3 teaches that humanity is alike in two ways: All people are created in the image of God (Gen. 1:26–27), and all people are affected by sin and need redemption. Genesis 3 tells the tragic story of human sin, which leads to suffering and separation. It also reveals God as a missionary God who seeks to reconcile humanity to himself. God could have destroyed Eve and Adam because of their sin; but, instead, God sought them in the Garden and provided for their needs. In this way God distinguished himself from all other deities in the world. In the world’s religions people seek for gods, but in Christianity the true and living God seeks after fallen humanity.

Genesis 3:15 has been called the protevangelium because it provides the first mention of the gospel. Evangelical scholars have seen in this verse a foreshadow of the cross where Satan injured Jesus Christ, but Jesus crushed Satan and the power of sin (Rom. 16:20; Rev. 12:9; 20:2). God prefers to save people rather than judge them. God’s holy nature makes the gospel necessary; his love motivated and provided it.

Genesis 12:1–3 speaks of God’s call to Abram (see also ABRAHAMIC COVENANT). From this passage on, the history narrated in the Old Testament is the history of Israel, “and the history of Israel is the history of redemption” (Kane). God chose Abram and his descendants to fulfill his redemptive plan. Their election was not an end in itself, but the means to an end—world redemption.

In Genesis 12:1–3 God promised Abram several things: land, a name, and a nation; however, most important, God promised Abram that “all peoples on earth will be blessed through you.” God repeated this promise to Abram (later Abraham) four more times (Gen. 18:17–19; 22:16–18; 26:2–5; 28:13–15). God’s particular blessing of Abram resulted in the universal blessing of all peoples. People are blessed by Abram’s example of faithfulness, but ultimately God blessed the peoples of the earth through Abram’s descendant, Jesus Christ.

The NIV translates the Hebrew word goyim in verse 3 as “peoples,” and that is superior to “nations,” as some versions render it. God is not referring here to nations as political entities; rather, God is saying that through Abram every ethnolin-guistic group on earth will be blessed. Surely this must be an encouragement to those who endeavor to discover and evangelize unreached people groups (see also PEOPLES, PEOPLE GROUPS).

In choosing Abram and his descendants God revealed a threefold purpose for Israel. First, Israel was to receive and guard God’s special revelation to the world (Heb. 1:1–3). Second, Israel was to provide the door through which the Messiah would enter history. Third, Israel was to be God’s servant and witness to the nations.

The Book of Exodus tells the story of God’s deliverance of Israel from bondage in Egypt. The exodus is the pivotal event in the Old Testament, as central in the Old Testament as the cross is in the New Testament. Again, God’s deliverance was not an end in itself, but a means to accomplish God’s plan for world redemption. This becomes clear in Exodus 19:5–6. This passage records God’s words to Moses and the nation of Israel. In these verses God made conditional promises to the Israelites. If the Israelites would obey God...
Pentateuch, Mission in the

and keep his covenant, then God promised to make them a "treasured possession," a "kingdom of priests," and a "holy nation."

Of special interest here is the phrase "kingdom of priests." God intended for the people of Israel to become a nation composed of priests. Their role was to minister to the other nations. Old Testament priests were expected to teach the people God's law and mediate between God and the people. God wanted the Israelites to teach the other nations about his love and grace. They were to stand as a living testimony to the other nations. Unfortunately, Israel did not fulfill this role. Throughout their history they did little to fulfill God's intention for them. The Pentateuch, however, repeatedly emphasizes Israel's instrumental role in God's mission to the peoples of the earth.

JOHN MARK TERRY

Pentecostal Missions. A twentieth-century missions movement noted for its emphases on Spirit baptism, expectation of miraculous "signs and wonders" in gospel proclamation, utilization of indigenous church principles, pragmatism in communications and technology, and spectacular church growth.

Radical evangelicals on the fringe of the nineteenth-century missions movement anticipated the premillennial return of Jesus Christ and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in the last days to spiritually equip believers with apostolic power for the world evangelization (Joel 2:28–29). Accordingly, miracles would witness to the power of the gospel as they had in the expansion of the Early Church. A. B. Simpson and A. J. Gordon, among others, believed that prayer for the sick and power encounters (exorcisms, etc.) would attract non-Christians to the gospel.

As the century drew to a close and statistics revealed the slow pace of conversions on the mission fields, some believed that God might also bestow xenolalic tongues (known human languages) on Spirit-baptized missionaries as happened on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:4). Hence, they could bypass lengthy language study and immediately begin preaching to bring swift closure to the GREAT COMMISSION. In varying degrees, Simpson, Gordon, and C. T. Studd, with others such as W. B. Godbey, Frank W. Sandford, and the Kansas holiness preacher, Charles F. Parham, considered this possibility.

Parham concluded that speaking in tongues constituted the "Bible evidence" of Spirit baptism: he and most of his students at Bethel Bible School in Topeka, Kansas, experienced the phenomenon in January 1901. This event and particularly news of the later Welsh Revival (1904–5) prompted the Azusa Street Revival in Los Angeles, California, under the leadership of the African-American William J. Seymour. It became the most influential revival of the century in global perspective and marked the beginning of Pentecostal missions. Similar revivals followed in the wake of Topeka and Azusa Street including ones at Zion and Chicago, Ill.; Dunn, N.C.; Nyack, N.Y.; Winnipeg and Toronto, Canada; Sunderland, England; Oslo, Norway; and Stockholm, Sweden. From these arose a new diaspora of missionaries, reaching upwards of two hundred by 1910. In India, however, influenced in part by the Welsh Revival and the ministry of Minnie F. Abrams, the Pentecostal revival began autonomously in 1906.

Although robust in their faith, the early missionaries were often ill-prepared, traveling without salary or pledged support, and without cross-cultural preparation. Before 1908, most of them expected to preach with "missionary tongues," but subsequently understood them to be glossolalia or unknown tongues for prayer in the Spirit (1 Cor. 13:1; 14:2). Whereas in India, a significant contingent of veteran missionaries (e.g., CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE [CMA], Methodists) became Pentecostal. Beginning in the 1920s, Bible institute graduates, particularly from North America and the United Kingdom, became the backbone for much of the mission enterprise.

Apart from glossolalia and belief that all of the gifts of the Spirit (1 Cor. 12:7–11) had been restored, Pentecostal missionaries initially differed little from their CMA and holiness contemporaries. As time passed, however, they continued to highlight miraculous signs and wonders more than their Wesleyan–holiness and Reformed revivalist brothers and sisters. Other evangelical missionaries virtually dismissed the notion of miracles. Nonetheless, because of their focus on the Spirit’s work in mission, Pentecostals have willingly addressed the dark side of spirituality: Satanic power. This has helped them to effectively relate the gospel to peoples with non-Western worldviews. Because the Spirit’s outpouring empowers seekers with spiritual gifts and for SPIRITUAL WARFARE (Eph. 6:12), Pentecostalism quickly becomes indigenous.

With ever-increasing numbers of missionaries, farsighted leaders recognized the need for organization. The earliest and most successful European mission agencies were in the United Kingdom the Pentecostal Missionary Union of Great Britain and Ireland (1909), Zaire Evangelistic Mission (1919); in Netherlands, the Pentecostal Mission Alliance (1920); and in Scandinavia, Missionaries sent out from Swedish and Norwegian Pentecostal congregations. In South Africa, the Apostolic Faith Mission (1913) sent missionaries to various people groups in that region.

North American agencies included the Pentecostal Mission in South and Central Africa (1910), Assemblies of God (1914), Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada (1922), Russian and Eastern European Mission (1927), Pentecostal Holiness Church (1911), and Church of God (Cleveland, Tenn.) (1902). Following the trinitarian dispute in the Assemblies of God (1913–16), many “Oneness” or “Jesus Name” missionaries joined organizations that eventually merged to form the United Pentecostal Church (1945). Still, a large number of independent missionaries served abroad, preferring the personal guidance of the Holy Spirit in their activities over the directives of mission boards.

With the delay in Christ’s return, Pentecostals frequently borrowed the paternalistic practices of their Protestant counterparts to give permanence to their efforts. However, Alice E. Luce, formerly with the Church Missionary Society in London, preferred the personal guidance of the Holy Spirit in their activities over the directives of mission boards.

The emergence of Pentecostal missions represented a vibrant new thrust in evangelism at a time when the older missionary movement had begun to decline due in part to questions raised about the ultimate claims of the Christian faith. Without such hesitancies, Pentecostal missionaries have changed the landscape of Christianity in the twentieth century through their accent on the role of the Holy Spirit in the Christian world mission. Although contemporary statistics of worldwide church growth appear inflated, Pentecostals now represent one of the largest families of Christians. Pentecostalism has proven to be the most dynamic force of the century for Christian expansion.

Pentecostal Movement. A restorationist and millenarian movement highlighting the baptism and gifts of the Holy Spirit that emerged from the broader holiness movement beginning in 1901. Branches of modern Pentecostalism include “Classical” (denominational) Pentecostals,
Pentecostal Movement

“Neo-Pentecostals” (charismatics), and so-called “Third Wave” evangelicals who view “signs and wonders” as essential for successful ministry (Acts 5:12).

Throughout the nineteenth century, Protestants from a broad spectrum of churches prayed for the outpouring of the Spirit (Joel 2:28–29) to divinely enable them to bring about moral and social reform and to evangelize the world. Among them, Wesleyan holiness advocates encouraged believers to seek for a postconversion experience of grace that would immediately bring “entire sanctification.” Reflecting the influence of John Wesley, and more directly that of his associate John Fletcher, this experience became known as the “second blessing,” the “double cure,” or “eradication” of the sinful nature, and increasingly as the “baptism in the Holy Spirit.” Writers such as Phoebe Palmer and William Arthur taught that it would rid believers of the moral flaw in human nature. Late in the century, Benjamin H. Irwin’s theology, which proposed a third work of grace—“fire baptism” for empowerment—played a crucial role in the development of Pentecostalism. Separating sanctification from Spirit baptism, however, generated questions about what distinguished them from each other. It was but a short step to arguing that speaking in tongues as found in the “pattern” of Spirit baptisms in the book of Acts (2, 8 [implied], 10, 19) provided definite evidence of the third work.

Reformed revivalists like Charles G. Finney, Dwight L. Moody, A. B. Simpson, and Reuben A. Torrey, as well as speakers at the annual Keswick conferences in England (see Keswick Convention), rejected the sinless perfection of the Wesleyans and taught that the second work brought the “fullness” of the Holy Spirit. Not only would it enhance personal holiness, but more importantly it would invigorate Christians for evangelism. In addition to the growing popularity of the doctrine of divine healing based on the atoning work of Christ (Isa. 53:5; James 5:13–15) and the dispensational premillennialism of the Plymouth Brethren, these beliefs crystallized together as the “full” or “fourfold gospel”: Jesus Christ as Savior, Sanctifier (Baptizer in the Spirit), Healer, and Coming King.

Radical evangelicals from the holiness ranks wondered aloud with other premillennialists how humanity could be evangelized in the “last days” (Acts 2:17) before the imminent return of Christ. With a pessimistic appraisal of the future course of human history and discouraged by the slow pace of conversions in the mission lands, they prayed for the restoration of apostolic power. This “radical strategy” anticipated supernatural interventions of the Spirit’s power in Signs and Wonders to reach every tribe and nation with the message of salvation (Matt. 24:14). For some, this meant praying for the sick and exorcising demons, but others pondered the idea that God might restore the gift of tongues—“languages” (xenolalia). Through bypassing time-consuming language study, Spirit-baptized missionaries could expedite world evangelization by immediately preaching to their hearers. By 1890, this short-cut to cross-cultural evangelism had gathered considerable interest.

To prepare a special contingent of end-times missionaries, the Kansas holiness preacher Charles F. Parham opened Bethel Bible School in Topeka in the fall of 1900. Influenced by Irwin and convinced that tongues-speech represented the “Bible evidence” of Spirit baptism and afforded linguistic ability for gospel proclamation, he and his students prayed in early January 1901 to receive the gift and consequently testified to speaking in various languages. The “Apostolic Faith movement,” as Parham called it, had begun and his insistence on tongues became the hallmark of Pentecostal doctrine.

In 1905, Parham started another Bible school in Houston, Texas. It was there that William J. Seymour, an African-American holiness preacher, met Parham and accepted his teachings. Leaving Houston in early 1906 and arriving in Los Angeles, he became the foremost leader of the Azusa Street revival (1906–9). The impact of this event brought global dimensions to the movement through the following revivals and others that it sparked: Toronto, Canada (1906); Oslo, Norway (1906); Dunn, North Carolina (1907); Memphis, Tennessee (1907); Nyack, New York (1907); Sunderland, England (1907); Stockholm, Sweden (1907); Calcutta, India (1907); South Africa (1908); Chile (1909); and Brazil (1910).

Yet among early Pentecostal revivals, Azusa Street was unique for its accent on racial reconciliation and the outpouring of the Spirit on the poor. Thus, while it shared the same concern for missions that marked Topeka, other aspects of the Spirit’s work flowered, especially the fruit of the Spirit in human relationships as in the case of blacks, Hispanics, and whites in attendance. In addition to Seymour, prominent African-American leaders included Charles H. Mason (Church of God in Christ), Garfield T. Haywood (Pentecostal Assemblies of the World), L. M. Mason (United Holy Church of America), and Ida Robinson (Mount Sinai Holy Church of America). Pentecostal awakenings amid oppressed peoples (e.g., the victims of apartheid in South Africa) took inspiration from Azusa as a model of true Pentecostal blessing and liberation—the conferral of dignity and the Spirit’s gifts upon the poor and oppressed.

News of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit spread through persons traveling from Los Angeles, in addition to printed reports in periodicals such as the Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles), published by the Azusa leaders. At the same time, believers schooled in holiness teachings in India began speaking in tongues in July 1906, though unaware of events in the United States and Parham’s teaching on the evidential nature of tongues.

While there is little doubt that Pentecostalism attracted the poor and marginalized elements in society, this perception has also created an inaccurate stereotype. Recent research shows that while many Pentecostals came from the ranks of blue-collar workers; indeed, there were even some wealthy Pentecostals. In regard to their role in society and due to their biblicism and expectation of Christ’s return, many were pacifists. As a result, some were jailed or ordered to do alternative service during World War I. As for women’s involvement in ministry, many Pentecostals, like their holiness forebears, found justification for this in the Spirit’s outpouring on women as well as men (Acts 2:17). Women, therefore, have made significant contributions as evangelists, missionaries, pastors, and Bible school administrators. Most notable among them were Anna Larssen Bjourn, Christine A. Gibson, Aimee Semple McPherson, Lillian Trasher, and Maria B. Woodworth-Etter.

Pentecostal dynamics in worship have included encouraging everyone to become involved in singing, giving testimonies to answers to prayer; playing musical instruments, clapping and raising hands in prayer; manifesting the gifts of the Spirit (1 Cor. 12:8–10), and praying for the sick, along with the preaching of the Word. The accent on the immanent presence of the Holy Spirit became the chief distinctive of their corporate worship.

Between 1906 and 1916, Pentecostals divided over three doctrinal issues. Beginning in late 1906, the first centered on the indispensable need of speaking in tongues as “initial evidence” of Spirit baptism. As the belief in “missionary tongues” failed, they increasingly considered speaking in “unknown” tongues (glossolalia) as prayer in the Spirit and the source of empowerment. Some emphasized tongues, but without insisting on them for Spirit baptism. However, the emerging Pentecostal denominations generally saw this as the entry into the Spirit-filled life.

The second division over the “Finished Work of Calvary” arose in 1910 when Pentecostals with Reformed backgrounds challenged the Wesleyan holiness notion of sanctification. The most prominent leader of the opposition, Chicago pastor William H. Durham, contended that Jesus finished the work of salvation and sanctification on the cross. The legacy of this controversy continues with the Wesleyan view retained by several “holiness-Pentecostal” organizations including the Church of God in Christ, Church of God (Cleveland, Tenn.), and International Pentecostal Holiness Church. The Assemblies of God, Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada, International Church of the Foursquare Gospel, Pentecostal Church of God, and United Pentecostal Church International (UPCI) represent “finished work” bodies.

The third division began in 1913 when a relatively small contingent of Pentecostals started teaching that water baptism in the name of Jesus Christ according to Acts 2:38 had precedence over the baptismal formula of Matthew 28:19. The restoration of another “pattern” in the book of Acts led Frank J. Ewart, Howard A. Goss, and others to replace the historic doctrine of the Trinity with a radical “Jesus-centrism.” Dividing the Assemblies of God in 1916, “Jesus Name,” “Apostolic,” or “Oneness” Pentecostals left with many of them later joining together to form the UPCI in 1945.

Pentecostals have remained evangelical in doctrine, confessing belief in the Trinity (the large majority), the inspiration and infallibility of Scripture, justification by faith, substitutionary atonement of Christ, and other historic doctrines of the Christian faith. Nevertheless, they have differed on several vital points: the ordinances of the church, function of tongues in Spirit baptism, role of the Christian in society, attitudes toward women in ministry, and church polity.

Traditional Episcopal, Presbyterian, and Congregational polities are utilized with some Pentecostals claiming that the offices of apostle and prophet have been restored. Episcopal polity is evident in the Church of God (Cleveland, Tenn.), and even in circles that ostensibly appear Congregational (e.g., David Yonggi Cho’s Yoido Full Gospel Church in Seoul, Korea). Hybrid Congregational/Presbyterian forms appear in such denominations as the Assemblies of God and Open Bible Standard Churches. Congregational polity dominates the continental European scene, Brazil, and many other sectors of the movement.

Evangelical recognition of American Pentecostals came with an invitation to several denominations to join the National Association of Evangelicals (NAE) at its founding in 1942. This close identification with the NAE and participation in its member agencies has led to a gradual “evangelicalization” of Pentecostalism, an adoption of issues and perspectives germane to the largely Reformed member organizations. NAE conferences also kindled interest in Pentecostal unity that led to the founding of the Pentecostal Fellowship of North America (1948), recently reorganized as the Pentecostal/Charismatic Churches of North America (1994). Concern for unity among Spirit-baptized believers had led earlier to the four meetings of the International Pentecostal Council in Europe prior to World War I. In 1939, the European Pentecostal Conference in Stockholm, Sweden, helped lay the basis for the founding of the Pentecostal World Conference in 1947. Pentecostal church bodies have also joined the World Evangelical Fellowship,
Pentecostal Movement

Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization, and World Council of Churches.

Beginning with the charismatic renewal in the 1960s (see also Charismatic Movement), “neo-Pentecostals” or “charismatics” appeared in the mainline Protestant churches, the Roman Catholic Church, and several of the Orthodox churches. This had actually begun in the Protestant churches in the 1950s and gained national press coverage in 1960 when Dennis Bennett, rector of St. Mark’s Episcopal Church in Van Nuys, California, announced to his parishioners that he had been baptized in the Spirit and spoken in tongues. Several factors account for the renewal, including believers in the historic churches searching for a deeper work of the Spirit, the influence of the postwar faith healing movement, and the activities of the Full Gospel Business Men’s Fellowship International.

The appearance of Pentecostal phenomena among Episcopalians, Presbyterian, Reformed, Mennonites, Methodists, Messianic Jews, Disciples of Christ, Baptists, Lutherans, and others prompted vigorous debate, but for the most part charismatics gained approval within their respective denominations. Official Catholic and Protestant doctrinal statements on the renewal can be found in Presence, Power, and Praise (1980) edited by Kilian McDonnell, O.S.B. In regard to theological reflection, Pentecostal and charismatic scholars have made important contributions in part through the conferences and journals of the Society for Pentecostal Studies and the European Pentecostal Theological Association.

The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) laid the theological groundwork for the Catholic charismatic renewal, the largest of all the renewal movements. Beginning with the famous “Duquesne Weekend” retreat in the Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, area in 1976, interest in the outpouring of the Spirit grew quickly, especially through the ministry of the Word of God community in Ann Arbor, Michigan, and major conferences at Notre Dame University in South Bend, Indiana. Leading figures have included Stephen Clark, Ralph Keifer, Ralph Martin, Edward D. O’Connor, C.S.C., Kevin and Dorothy Ranaghan, and Leon-Joseph Cardinal Suenens, the latter given oversight of the movement by Pope Paul VI.

David J. Du Plessis, a key leader in charismatic circles and sometime secretary of the Pentecostal World Conference, uniquely served as a bridge between classical Pentecostals and Protestant and Catholic charismatics. In response to the Catholic charismatic renewal and because of Pentecostal church growth in historically Roman Catholic countries, Du Plessis and McDonnell were instrumental in founding the Roman Catholic and Classical Pentecostal Dialogue that began in 1972.

Another path in the broader Pentecostal tradition came with the emergence of the “Third Wave” of the Holy Spirit by the early 1980s. According to this definition, the Pentecostal and charismatic movements represent the first and second waves of the Spirit in the twentieth century. Focusing their attention on prayer for the sick, exorcisms, and other spiritual manifestations, key proponents like C. Peter Wagner and Charles H. Kraft have encouraged evangelicals to seek for supernatural power in ministry. Particularly influential has been John Wimber and the Vineyard movement. Speaking in tongues, however, has not been at the forefront of their thinking or deemed as a validation of Spirit baptism.

More recent developments have also impacted the world church, especially those at the Toronto Airport Vineyard in Canada beginning in 1994 and at Brownsville Assembly of God in Pensacola, Florida, a year later. Although not without controversy, these and continuing revivals in various parts of the world (e.g., Brazil, Argentina, Burkina Faso, Korea) have been influential in encouraging evangelism and revival elsewhere.

Classical Pentecostals alone constitute one of the largest families of Christians in the world today and along with charismatics and others in the Pentecostal/charismatic tradition enjoy an unusual grassroots ecumenicity in the Spirit rising above conciliar and creedal boundaries. Together, they represent the single most dynamic development in twentieth-century Christianity.

Penzotti, Francisco (1851–1925). Italian missionary in South America. Born in Chaivenna, Italy, at the age of thirteen he emigrated to Uruguay, South America. In 1875 he heard the gospel and shortly thereafter became a Christian within the Methodist Church. He threw his heart... into the spread of the Scriptures as a Bible distributor with the American Bible Society throughout Argentina, Bolivia, and Chile. Visits to Peru in 1884 and 1886 convinced Penzotti and the ABS of the need to establish a Bible Society agency to serve Peru, Ecuador, and the western part of Bolivia.

Penzotti moved his family to Callao, Peru, in 1888 to direct the ministry. During the following year Penzotti and his three colleagues, Juan Arancet, José Illescas, and Manuel Noriega, were able not only to distribute 4,500 Bibles or portions thereof, but also to explain the gospel to those who acquired them. Such receptivity was sure to cause concern among the Catholic hierarchy, especially at a time when public non-Catholic religious services were prohibited in Peru. Penzotti was taken to court, where his case attracted worldwide attention. He was imprisoned on July 26, 1890. After nine months in jail he was finally released on Easter Sunday in 1891. He continued his Bible distribution ministry in Peru, in Central America after 1896, and finally in Argentina, where this “Luther of Latin America” died in 1925.

People Movements. Phenomenon of a significant number of the people of one tribe, class, or caste converting to Christ together. The term is comparatively new in the annals of missions. J. Waskom Pickett reports that he searched a hundred volumes of reports from missions in which movements of this kind occurred without finding a single use of even the term “mass movement” until 1892 (1933, 21). There seems to have been no recognition of the need for a distinctive term to describe these movements, even on the part of those whose ministry precipitated them. Missionaries resorted to the word “Revival,” or whatever term was familiar to them on the basis of experiences in their home churches. When, belatedly, the term “mass movement” came into wider usage it was not without reservations. Pickett himself adopted that term in writing his classic work Mass Movements in India, but he indicated that it obscured tribal, caste, and other types of unity shared by converts. In accord with the use of the term, he nevertheless acknowledged that the term “group movement” might have been preferable.

In a somewhat parallel but later development, Donald A. McGavran became acquainted with Pickett and his work after his arrival in India. Alan R. Tippett credits McGavran with coining the term “people movement” though he does so without complete confidence (1987, 253). In any case, it seems clear that McGavran has done more than anyone to popularize and promote this particular approach to mission strategy.

The history of the expansion of Christianity is replete with cases where numerous people sharing some common trait(s) have become Christians either simultaneously or within a short period of time. The Christian church began with the conversion of large numbers of Jews and Gentile God-fearers. From the time of Constantine through the Middle Ages, tribes and nations of southern, central, and then northern Europe were Christianized as missionaries preached the gospel message and sovereigns prescribed conversion to the Christian faith. People movement advocates readily admit that the conversion of Europe contains much that is repugnant to us today. Also that they will not be repeated in the modern world. Nevertheless, advocates insist that they were important to later advances evident in the ministry of people like Wycliffe, Knox, Luther, Fox, the Wesleys, and Carey.

As viewed by McGavran, Tippett, and others of the Church Growth school of thought, the typical missionary strategy that developed during the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries was the “exploratory mission station approach” or the “exploratory gathered colony approach.” Missionaries first acquired land and built suitable residences for themselves. Then they added churches, schools, orphanages, hospitals, residences for helpers, and so on. Since nationals who received the ministrations and message of the missionaries were often forced from their homes, many of them came to live at or near the mission station. Still others in the area became dependent on the mission station economy. This type of mission strategy grew out of the individualism of Western missionaries and the gap between the Western and non-Western worlds. It “fit” the times. But two additional things must be said about it. First, that pattern does not fit today’s world in which the peoples of the world are determined to assert their own identity and resist the tutelage of foreigners. Second, though they have not been sought by missionaries in most cases, the history of modern missions as well as the history of the early church and Middle Ages reveals that the great majority of converts have come to Christ in people movements large and small. Mission accounts from a wide variety of cultures and areas around the world—Oceania, Indonesia, India, and Burma in Asia; and Ivory Coast and Gold Coast in Africa to name but a few—yield outstanding examples of Christward movements of this kind. Proponents of people movement strategy are quick to point out that they exemplify the strategy now required to evangelize the emerging world.

To test the validity of such claims, in the 1960s Marion Cowan undertook a study of a developing church among the previously resistant Tzotzil Indian tribe in Mexico. The gospel had entered the Tzotzil Indian tribe through a “chance” meeting between a neighboring Tzeltal Christian and an unbelieving Tzotzil. Cowan noted that most of the early Tzotzil believers were converted as a group. She then charted the various relationships that existed between the members of the believing group and attempted to discover the channels of effective initial communication (i.e., communication resulting in conversion). A detailed summary of her findings cannot be included here, but it is relevant to point out that, out of a total of eighty such cases, thirty-nine occurred between consanguineal kin and thirty-eight between affinal kin. Only three cases of effective communication occurred between persons not related by either blood or marriage, and these occurred between members of a small farmers’ cooperative.

From a people movement point of view, the key to understanding the history of Christian missions and contemporary occurrences such as these is a recognition of the fact that they were not, and are not, simply movements of larger numbers of individuals acting on their own initiative and more or less independent of each other. Rather, they represent the way in which people actually communicate with each other and the way in which they “like” to come to Christ. People communicate and relate most often and effectively with their own kind of people. And they resist being wrenched out of the families, extended families, and other groupings with which they are most intimately associated (see also Homogenous Unit Principle).

Western Christians especially are inclined to take umbrage at the notion that social ties are—or, at least, should be—as consequential as people movement philosophy and strategy suggest. Numerous Scripture passages in both Old and New Testaments indicate that to please God one must be willing to leave father and mother or anyone standing in the way of obedience to God. Group conversion is often seen as entailing something less than the kind of personal decision that true commitment calls for. Moreover, in the church distinctions of race, class, and status are of no account. All are “one” in Christ.

These and other criticisms have occasioned various types of responses from people movement proponents, especially those of the Church Growth school of thought. First, terms and definitions have been modified in an effort to promote understanding. The term “mass movement” has been superseded by “people movement” and, in certain cases, “web movement.” “Group decision” and “group conversion” have been explained as “mutually interdependent decision” and “multi-individual conversion.” Changes and explanations of factors that occasion and characterize Christward movements of this kind. Second, an effort has been made to ground the strategy in Scripture—in the experience of the early church, the ministry of the apostle Paul, and, especially, in the requirements of the Great Commission. The ethnē in Matthew 18:19 is understood as “people groups” rather than “nation-states” or even “Gentiles.” Third, as indicated above, advocates are quick to point to the numerous instances of people movements in church and missions history, especially in the history of modern missions. Fourth, a case is made for concluding that the kind of group decision making that is part and parcel of people movements results in more stability as well as more rapid church growth than does one-by-one gathered church extractionism. Fifth, advocates maintain that the kind of tribal-, race-, and class-consciousness that gives rise to a people movement is not permanent. Though it often is determinative of the way churches begin, it does not describe what churches will ultimately become as members grow in their understanding of God’s way and will.

Efforts to quiet critics have met with varying degrees of acceptance. For example, the term “people group” now enjoys wide usage. But as originally defined by McGavran the term signified an “endogamous group.” Subsequently it evolved through a series of modifications and now is usually thought of as an “affinity group.” This latter definition, however, lacks the kind of precision necessary for sound strategic thinking. And the change process itself argues against equating “people group” with ethnē quite apart from a consideration of the biblical usage of the Greek word. Nevertheless, sound missiology is well informed by people movement thinking. Not only does it make a great contribution to our understanding of the ways in which people become Christians. It also arms us against the kind of cultural bias that overlooks the vital importance of group ties and the potential that often exists to both initiate and encourage whole groups of people to embrace and follow Christ.

David J. Hesselgrave

Peoples, People Groups. Way of perceiving humanity as being composed of identifiable cultural and/or sociological grouping. Mission is then seen as directed to such groups. Our Lord’s mandate as recorded in Acts 1:8 made an early related strategic distinction: “You will be my witnesses, in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth.” Later the Constantinian church, challenged from the north, sent missionaries to “barbarians.” They in turn carried the gospel into pagan northern Europe and transformed other barbarian peoples into the entity that left its stamp on the definition of missions: Christendom. En route, mission was defined as directed toward the “heathen” or “heathen.”

When the modern missionary movement took shape, Europeans became aware, through travel and trade, of the vast reaches of whole “dark continents” without the gospel. There were the civilized inhabitants of Christendom, and there was the non-Christian world of the colonies. No further definition seemed necessary. Later, the historical flow of colonial contacts caused mission agencies and denominations to shift focus from the coastal port cities to the interior areas of these continents. Hence names like Africa Inland Mission, Sudan Interior Mission, China Inland Mission. “Interiors” now defined mission.

The surge of missionary effort subsequent to World War II took place in the context of newly independent nation-states, fifty-seven formed in Africa in a single decade. Mission agencies responded by focusing strategy on “national” boundaries and church bodies within them. Once a group, recognizable by denominational distinctions, was in existence, many agencies and strategists declared “mission” to be complete within the entire boundaries of these nation-states. Blindness to the possibility of mission on the part of the “Younger” churches took the next step of excluding from view countries from which Westerners were restricted. For a significant segment of mission sending, the day of mission was declared over. Supposed national churches existed, while whole segments of nations had no church or witness. A new definition was needed.

The often artificial nature of nation-state boundaries was missed. The consistent national experience, especially in Africa, was of near civil war, as truer identities surfaced and civil wars or unifying border strikes sought to reunite peoples through stronger tribal or ethnolinguistic identities. These natural units intruded themselves on the attention of mission strategists. Awareness of their reality forced, yet again, a redefinition of the definition that would make “frontier” and “hidden” synonyms of the now prevailing “unreached,” by which was meant any group that did not contain a contextualized church demonstrably capable of completing the evangelization of the group. Both are to be distinguished from the less precise “homogeneous unit” popularized by the CHURCH GROWTH MOVEMENT.

In practice, several definitional difficulties remained. 1. Was exhaustive and exclusive categorizing possible or necessary? 2. Most of the definitions remain to this day more serviceable for nonurban, traditional peoples. The intersective groups so common in sociological and urban analysis are confusing if shoe-horned into a classification that seeks to sort each and every inhabitant of earth into one and only one group. 3. The difference between evangelized peoples and unreached people groups seems to be that evangelization focuses on individuals and on external efforts made by others, while unreached deals with groups and with outcomes in church planting. The terms are unfortunately not used carefully. 4. Macro distinctions are used in attempts to simplify and communicate, but nomenclature remains a problem. Various authors have suggested solutions, including Wilson and Schreck: Peoples vs. People Groups (Schreck, 1987); Winter: Macro-, Mega-, and Micro-spheres; Johnstone: Affinity Blocs and Gateway People Clusters (Johnstone, 1996).

The basics of the definition for those who use the concept are these: 1. Strategic decision focuses on groups, not individuals. Strictly speaking, individuals are not unreached, but unevangelized. 2. The group must be real, not just a conceptual category. 3. Not all groups are of strategic interest. A group may be too small, that is, not large enough to require that a contextualized church become the vehicle of living out Christianity in sociocultural ways. The group must not be so large as to contain within itself segments that constitute barriers to evangelization. 4. The group is no longer unreached when a viable, contextualized church exists capable of carrying on effective witness. Thus, boundary-crossing mission is defined, and not merely the boundary between faith and unbelief. Evangelism is needed after mission is theoretically fulfilled.

Missiologists, particularly from South Africa, have objected to the use of the concepts on the grounds that it promotes racist church bodies. While this danger does exist, partisans respond that social divisions will and do already characterize branches of the church, and it is better to recognize and work against them, much as one would not reject the concept of caste or class, while still opposing their prejudicial effects (see also Homogenous Unit Principle).

The church of Jesus Christ is always missionary. The ways of defining missions sending in terms of units that are the focus of evangelism will continue to evolve. For the moment, real, intermediate groups without a contextualized church constitute our best working definition.

Recently, at least 1,746 large, ethnolinguistic groups have been identified which are verified as having no church among them capable of announcing Christ's Good News. Many have not a single believer. Such groups are truly aliens to grace. This eternal tragedy is a current and compelling call for continuing mission. The groups listed do not include intersective urban groups. The gospel has not been and does not go where a meaningful invitation to follow Christ is not present. Such groups are truly aliens to grace.

Persecution. Suffering experienced by those whose opinion or belief is being attacked by another group. For the first Christians who came from a Jewish heritage, suffering and persecution were both part of their lot. Jews living under Roman rule could expect to be persecuted if they chose to follow Jesus (e.g., Matt. 5:10–12; 10:23; Luke 21:12; John 15:20).

The Jews as a people had been persecuted for centuries prior to Christ's birth. Christians who came out of Judaism still faced hostility from Rome. In addition, at least until a.d. 70, they faced persecution from the Jewish leaders. Such persecutions often had the opposite of the intended effect. The persecution of the church after Stephen's martyrdom did not stop Christianity but spread the gospel beyond the confines of Jerusalem (Acts 8:1). Paul's conversion resulted from the Damascus road encounter with Jesus while he was traveling under Jewish authority to persecute the church in Damascus (Acts 9:1–31). In testimony and correspondence Paul frequently referred to his persecuting work (Acts 22:4; 26:11; 1 Cor. 15:9; Gal. 1:13; Phil. 3:6; 1 Tim. 1:13). James was martyred by Herod, and when the populace approved he had Peter arrested for the same purpose (Acts 12:1–11). Through God's intervention, the tables were turned and Herod lost his life, while Peter escaped and was able to continue sharing his faith. Jewish persecution of Paul for his evangelistic work led to his arrest and eventual transport to Rome under guard. In this, however, the Jews living in Rome as well as Paul’s escorts and his guard detail all had the chance to hear the gospel (Acts 28:17–30; Phil. 1:12–14). Persecution, though violent and intended to shut down the church, often had the opposite effect.

The Roman rulers initially tolerated Christians as a subsect within Judaism, but Nero’s scapegoating of them after the A.D. 64 fire in Rome started a pattern of persecution which continued for almost 250 years. With varying intensity, Christians were perceived as a threat to the state. Though not consistently applied throughout the Roman Empire, and with periods of hostility followed by temporary reprieves, the reality of Christianity’s illegality as a religion remained part of the Christian experience until the Edict of Milan (A.D. 313) officially legalized Christianity in the empire. Though two relatively brief periods of persecution followed (under Licinius in 322–23 and Julian in 361–63), official toleration of Christianity across the Roman Empire was assured.

Contemporary Situation. While it is true that Christians have over the course of history persecuted others (e.g., Muslims during the Crusades; Jews during the Middle Ages and the modern era), including other Christians (e.g., the Donatists, Anabaptists, Puritans, and Huguenots), by and large it is accurate to say that Christians have been the recipients of hostility. Far from being only a thing of the past, persecution today continues to be a reality faced by many Christians, particularly those in militant religious states. It is estimated that more Christians have lost their lives through persecution in this century than all other centuries combined, though generally there has been little publicity of this in the secular press of free countries. David Barrett estimates that some 160,000 Christians were martyred in 1996 simply because they were Christians. Contemporary researchers have begun to speak out on behalf of the persecuted (e.g., Shea and Marshall), noting that the Western church and Western governments have been largely silent in the face of an increasingly well-documented reality.

A number of mission organizations have also been founded to investigate, publicize, and advocate on behalf of those at risk, including Brother’s Keeper, Christian Solidarity International, International Christian Concern, and Voice of the Martyrs. Additionally, existing agencies are incorporating departments which emphasize the persecuted church, including Christian Life Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention, Open Doors, and World Evangelical Fellowship Religious Liberty Commission. The National Association of Evangelicals (U.S.) published a statement of conscience in 1996 reflecting “deep concern for the religious freedom of fellow believers, as well as people of every faith” and many agencies and churches have joined the WEF-sponsored International Day of Prayer for the Persecuted Church.

Missionary Implications. With the recent increase in interest in reaching the unreached, persecution of missionaries will likely grow rather than shrink in the coming decades, simply because so many of the unreached live under religious or political ideologies that suppress the spread of the Christian message. Additionally, Christians are often perceived as part of the West in general, and the official anti-Western tenor in these countries will exacerbate the potential problems.

Almost no missiological training in the West offered today will help future missionaries training face persecution, though it appears that house seminaries in China prepare their future pastors for interrogation. Missionaries, especially those going into at-risk situations, would benefit from realistic preparation for the possibilities they may face. In addition, having been trained, they may also be more able to offer both preparation and aid to indigenous Christians who suffer because of a choice to follow Christ in a hostile environment.

Person, Personhood. The divine persons of the Holy Trinity express themselves in human images. The essence of human personhood is our potential to image the ultimate personal being, the Lord God (see also Image of God). Scripture views all human beings as persons because we have the potential to rule and relate to God in God-like ways.

Adopting God’s Stance. The answer to the question whether all humans are persons deserving to be treated with dignity and respect rests on our beliefs concerning the stance our Creator takes toward the wide variety of humans in sundry conditions. Throughout history, numerous people interpreted traits such as physical and mental capacities, gender, and race, as indicating less than full personhood. God takes the stance that the fetus and the profoundly impaired are fully human persons, created to image him. Like a flower in bud form, they are not yet all they will be, yet neither are believers (Ps. 139:13; 1 John 3:2).
Person, Personhood

Integral to human personhood is the experience of life in terms of role and status. God assigns differing roles to men and women, having designed them physiologically for complementary functions (1 Cor. 11:3–12; see also Gender Roles). Male persons, with their physical capacity to implant "seed," symbolize God's initiating grace. Female persons, with their capacity to receive the "seed" and "bear fruit," symbolize believers' receptive faith. God saves and gifts each equally as co-heirs of the grace of life (1 Peter 2:7). Believers adopt God's stance and treat all men and women of all races and classes as potential brothers and sisters in Christ (Gal. 3:28–29).

Embodied Souls. Scripture summarizes persons as embodied souls. Into a figure made from dust God breathed the "breath of life" (Gen. 2:7). Paul utilizes the useful formula of spirit, soul, body in his prayer for believers to be preserved complete, without blame (1 Thess. 5:23; cf. Job 7:11, 15; Isa. 26:8, 9; Heb. 4:12), though he more typically writes in dual rather than tripartite language (e.g., 2 Cor. 7:1; 4:16; 1 Cor. 6:16, 17). The human soul synthesizes influences from the multiple systems in which it participates (body, personality structures, family, culture, society, spirituality) and offers creative influences back to those systems. Thus, the soul is a social reality that is always changing at new levels of organization, function, and value. Missionaries carry the message of a new birth for the whole person at all levels.

Five Aspects of Personhood. Human personhood may be described in a wide variety of ways. Some basic aspects of mature persons fulfilling their capacity to image God include rationality, consciousness, reciprocity, communication, and embodiment.

1. Rationality. People have the capacity to resist complete determination by their causal pasts, to say yes or no, to inject creativity into the chaos coming out of the past (LeFevre). Missionaries recognize that persons of all cultures decide the meaning of their life through creative choices, regardless of how their culture frames those choices. Our actions are more than mere events or happenings; they express our emotions and caring concerns, further forming those very emotions and potentially new concerns. Therefore, God tells us that he will judge people by their fruit (Prov. 24:12; James 2:24; Rev. 20:13).

2. Self-consciousness. A second aspect of mature human personhood emphasizes intentional- ity and self-motivated activity. Self-consciousness, including our awareness and concepts of our self, rests on learning our place in history (e.g. Isa. 1:3–4). We experience the guilt of conscience and the relief of humor through reflection: we can stand apart from and enter into dialogue with our self. Self-motivated actions both delight God and determine just judgment for each person (2 Thess. 1:11, 12). In executing justice, God deems a person's motives for his or her actions as of ultimate import, a matter of life and death (e.g., Josh. 20:3; 1 Thess. 2:3–4).

The unconscious and subconscious form our conscious identity as persons (Prov. 4:23). Mental and physical memories and the worldview beliefs we integrate into those memory-stories constantly influence our emotional and physiological reactions and choices. Only through memory can a person maintain a relatively coherent, consistent identity over time.

3. Reciprocity. A person's life is social. Each person has been shaped by sociocultural interaction, by dialogue with others, and by the internal voice of community. Originally dependent on parents, the mature person continues those interdependent relations in appropriate ways. Sin defames God by proudly disregarding the interdependent nature of our relations. Conversely, we glorify God by submitting to him and to one another. God commands us to love him with all our heart, soul, mind, and strength (Mark 12:30–31). We demonstrate that love when we transcend ourselves by reaching out to others, entering imaginatively into their lives and into dialogue with them as persons. Thus we obey the command, "Love your neighbor as yourself."

God desires to use whole persons in healthy community to reconcile to himself fragmented persons in fragmented communities. Individuals who seek fulfillment in God become infinitely valuable to him for their potential impact on their community (Jer. 5:1; 9:23). Social ministry to whole persons in their community, not merely to "save souls," enables the churches to more clearly communicate the good news of the kingdom.

4. Communication. Fourth is the capacity for communication, especially verbal (cf. 2 Peter 2:16). Persons shape themselves and their world through language. Language makes possible the dialogue that gives birth to mind, self, and society. Language makes possible the distancing and the use of memory and imagination that grounds freedom (LeFevre) To the extent personhood rests on consciousness of contiguous stories, radical alteration in identity requires acquiring, integrating, and acting out new stories. The storytelling-approach to missions meets this need (see Storytelling).

5. Embodiment. A fifth aspect of human personhood is the integration of soul and body, mind and brain. Through our bodies we delight in pleasures that lift us close to divine joy (e.g., Song of Solomon). However, the passions of the flesh can deceive and overcome us, and drag us close to animalization (2 Peter 2:12). The fruit of the spirit includes self-control (Gal. 5:16–26; cf. Mark 9:43–47; Rom. 6:13; 1 Cor. 9:27).

Missionaries proclaim the hope of resurrection: Christ removes the curse of death and reunites body and soul (Gen. 3:19; Acts 17:31; 1 Cor. 15:42–57; 2 Cor. 6:1–5; Phil. 3:21). Whole persons will stand before God to be judged for the deeds done “in the flesh” and angels will cast some “body and soul into hell” (Matt. 10:28).

Ideal Humanness. As J. I. Packer says, HOLINESS is simply human life lived as the Creator intended. Perfect and ideal humanness unites the aspects and systems of body and soul in a totally God-honoring and nature-fulfilling way.

Personal/Family Responsibilities. The obligations of the missionary to his or her own family are often sensitive and delicate issues. The goldfish bowl effect of public ministry, the education of children, and the care of aging parents in the home country are just a few of the dimensions of missionary life that can be stress-inducing. The missionary, like the pastor, often faces a tug-of-war between the care of family and commitment to ministry. Rightly understood, the tension between the two should be at a minimum.

Two persons who marry voluntarily take on certain obligations. The marriage covenant includes the vow “to love and to cherish.” Missionaries are not exempt from this responsibility. When children are born into the family, an even more complex issue presents itself. Should the mother limit her missionary responsibility to care for the family?

The right perspective on these issues is a scriptural one. Guidelines such as Ephesians 5:21–6:4 are useful. Neither the family nor one’s work should be ignored. Attitude is the key factor in successfully discharging family responsibilities. Many missionary children (including those sent to boarding school) testify that they did not feel deprived because their parents created a positive and supportive atmosphere in the home. The father may have to travel, but if the children sense that he really wants to stay at home, rather than go, they will be helped. Missionary parents should strive for a peaceful home that is characterized by mutual appreciation and kindness.

When considering missionaries’ responsibilities to their families, there are few hard and fast rules. Varied situations obtain in different nations and cultures. There are a wide variety of personality types. An increasing number of mission agencies are providing personal and family counseling for their missionaries. Ultimately, prayer and the primacy of love (1 Cor. 13) provide the guideposts for the successful discharge of family responsibilities.

Peru

Peru (Est. 2000 pop.: 26,082,000; 1,285,216 sq. km. [496,222 sq. mi.]). An ethnically diverse South American country in whose vast territory is an ongoing process of cultural transformation. Its spiritual history is shaped by the syncretistic mixture of native animism with the medieval Catholicism brought by the Spanish after 1532. Christianization through Franciscans, Mercedarians, and Dominicans accompanied bloody military conquest. Writings by Jesuit José de Acosta (1539–1600) are evidence of unsuccessful efforts to correct early missionary practices. An established colonial church kept social control through the Inquisition, but after three centuries it was weakened by spiritual decline. It opposed political emancipation from Spain, barely accommodating to republican life after the war of independence (1821–24), but still managed to rule out religious toleration.

Scottish educator and colporteur James "Diego" Thomson arrived in Lima, the capital (1822–24), as the first of several agents of the BFBS (see also Colportage). He was hired by emancipation leader General San Martin to establish the first teacher training school. Thomson thought that the Roman Catholic Church could be reformed from the inside through popular education and Bible reading. The Anglican Church for foreign residents was allowed in 1849.

Francisco Penzotti’s arrival in Lima as a Methodist minister and agent of the ABS was a decisive step for evangelization. Between 1888 and 1896 Penzotti sold Bibles, preached, trained national colporteurs, and organized a Methodist church in 1889. Catholic reaction sent him to jail for nine months (1890–91). His case became an international scandal, gathering liberal forces to fight for a constitutional change. Religious toleration became a law in 1915. American Methodist Thomas B. Wood carried on intensive grassroots evangelism and founded schools. In the first three decades of this century, John Ritchie (RBMU) developed successfully an indigenous Peruvian Evangelical Church in the central and southern highlands. John A. Mackay (Free Church of Scotland) evangelized university students in Lima, and became influential among key political leaders. Ferdinand and Ana Stahl (Sevent-Day Adventist), through educational and health work, established strong churches among the Aymara natives around Lake Titicaca, the basis for what is today the largest non-Pentecostal denomination whose university and social agency OFASA are highly respected. Through Comity agreements after 1916 Nazarene and Pilgrim Holiness missionaries worked in the northern and eastern jungles and Pentecostals in the Huaylas highlands north of Lima. In 1940 most Protestant churches and missions formed the National Evangelical Council, which in 1998 still continues to be the most representative Protestant institution.

After World War II a limited modernization process brought massive migration to Lima, and American missionary presence, both Catholic and evangelical, became stronger. Social activism of foreign missionaries living among the poor provoked a crisis of social awareness in Peruvian Catholicism and the beginnings of liberation theologies. Faith Missions and Southern Baptists have seen relatively little church growth. Wycliffe Bible Translators made the Bible available in more than thirty tribal languages in the Amazonian jungle. Pentecostal churches such as Assemblies of God and Church of God have had the largest numerical growth, especially among the urban poor. Among the native Quechua- or Aymara-speaking population there has been lately significant evangelical growth, and sociological research has proven that conversion fosters economic and social development. A radio station started by The Evangelical Alliance Mission (TEAM) was influential in opening doors for significant growth of the Christian and Missionary Alliance among the middle and upper classes during the 1970s.

Failure of military attempts at social reform (1968–79) and inefficiency and corruption of center or left-oriented democratic regimes fostered a violent political climate. The ten-year war between Maoist guerrillas of the Shining Path and military forces (1980–90) affected especially isolated areas where missionary efforts had been successful. Presbyterian and Pentecostal leaders in Ayacucho became the target of communist terrorism and military repression, and more than seventy pastors were killed. This brought Protestants to public attention; relief and human rights work among the victims was followed by political activism. An estimated 8% of the population of Peru is evangelical and their vote was an important factor in the rise of Alberto Fujimori to power in 1990. Church growth at all levels has continued. Among thousands of Peruvian migrants for political or economic reasons, a significant number of evangelicals become active as lay missionaries, especially in Europe and the United States.

Samuel Escobar

Pfander, Karl Gottlieb (1803–66). German pioneer missionary to Armenia, India, and Turkey. Pfander was educated at Basel Evangelical Missionary Seminary, entering at the age of seventeen. There he was introduced to Islam and began Arabic and Qur’anic studies. He completed his studies in 1825, and was sent on his first missionary assignment to Shusha, a provincial capital in Russian Armenia. He focused his attention toward the Muslims, roughly two-thirds of the population. He wrote several tracts, including Mizan ul-Haqq (Balance of Truth; 1829), still considered a classic in evangelizing Muslims.

In 1833 Pfander took leave to find a wife, a quest in which he was successful. In 1835, however, his wife died on the mission field. Shortly after this, Protestant mission work was banned and the missionaries expelled from Armenia. After Urdu studies, and a lengthy application process, Pfander was sent in 1840 to Agra, India, under the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS). There he met Elizabeth Swinbourne and married for the second time. Pfander’s tracts, critical of Muhammad, received a wide reading resulting in sharp attacks by Islamic apologists. In 1854, Pfander was invited to a public debate, where he found himself unprepared and unable to successfully refute the European biblical criticism his Islamic opponent introduced.

Shortly after the debate, Pfander was transferred by the CMS to continue his work in Persia. In 1861, he was appointed to establish CMS work in Istanbul, Turkey. Eventually that work was shut down by Islamic authorities, and Pfander went to England, where he died in 1866.

Phenomenology of Religion. In broad terms phenomenology (from the Greek, phainomenon, “that which appears” or “that which shows itself”) is the study of “phenomena,” or the ways in which “appearances” manifest themselves to human consciousness. Phenomenology of religion is the study of religious phenomena. It is helpful to distinguish phenomenology as a distinctive philosophical movement and methodology from phenomenology of religion, although the latter has been to some extent influenced by the former.

Philosophical Phenomenology. The term “phenomenology” was used as early as 1764 by J. H. Lambert, and it appears in the philosophical works of I. Kant (d. 1804) and G. W. F. Hegel (d. 1831). But its more modern meaning comes from the penetrating work of Edmund Husserl (d. 1938), founder of the phenomenological movement. Later philosophers who followed Husserl in phenomenology include M. Scheler (d. 1928), M. Heidegger (d. 1976), J. P. Sartre (d. 1980), and M. Merleau-Ponty (d. 1961). Phenomenology in philosophy is not so much a school with a clearly defined set of teachings as it is a broad methodological movement comprising diverse thinkers united by certain ideals and assumptions. Central to philosophical phenomenology is the investigation of phenomena that appear in immediate experience, allowing the distinctives of the phenomena themselves to control any description of the experiences.

Douglas Allen provides five characteristics of philosophical phenomenology. First, it is descriptive in nature. Philosophical phenomenology is concerned with classical issues in epistemology and ontology, but it holds that an indispensable element in dealing with such questions is a rigorous description of the phenomena of experience.

The concern with rigorous and accurate description leads to a strong opposition to reductionism in treatments of experience. Although philosophers such as Husserl, Heidegger, and Merleau-Ponty certainly went beyond mere description of experience, they exemplify phenomenology’s reaction against earlier movements (empiricism, rationalism, idealism), which tended to reduce the elements of experience to more simple factors, thereby losing the richness of experience.

Third, phenomenology, under the influence of Franz Brentano (d. 1917) and Husserl, has characterizedly emphasized intentionality. A careful investigation of experience, it is held, indicates that all consciousness is consciousness of something. All states of consciousness are directed toward something, the intentional object.

Fourth, in an effort to allow the phenomena to speak for themselves, phenomenologists advocate a method of bracketing, or what Husserl termed the epoché. Bracketing involves the methodological suspension of beliefs and judgments accepted by the phenomenologist, or the attempt to free oneself from unexamined assumptions that might interfere in the investigation of the phenomena. A totally “objective” stance that is not colored by any prior values or assumptions is, of course, impossible. But as a methodological ideal, bracketing enables one to minimize the distorting effects of such commitments.

Fifth, many phenomenologists also see the “intuition of essences,” or the eidetic vision, as a major part of the task. Careful analysis is said to reveal the essences (or the “whatness”) of the phenomena, uncovering essential features that enable us to identify and categorize the phenomena.

Phenomenology of Religion and Missions. Understood as an identifiable movement within the study of religion, phenomenology of religion can be traced back to Max Müller (d. 1900) and the Religionswissenschaft (history of religions) movement, which saw itself as a descriptive, objective science free from the biases of theology and philosophy. Among the more significant phenomenologists of religion was W. Brede Kristensen (d. 1953), who advocated a careful comparative approach to the study of religion that was rigorously descriptive and also sought an empathetic “feeling” for the data that reflected the stance of the believers themselves. Rudolf Otto (d. 1937) was concerned to recognize the irreducibly religious nature of religious experience, drawing attention to the “numinous” dimension that lies beyond the rational and conceptual elements. Gerardus vander Leeus (d. 1950) was enormously influential between 1930 and 1950, emphasizing in his work the special place of “power” in religion. Other notable phenomenologists include Friedrich Heiler (d. 1967) and Mircea Eliade (d. 1986).

Although there are significant differences in methodology and conclusions among the leading practitioners in the field, phenomenology of religion is generally characterized by its concern for a comparative, systematic, empirical, and rigorously descriptive approach to the study of religious phenomena. It has come to be understood in a loose sense as the descriptive study of religious phenomena, or as Ninian Smart puts it, “the procedure of getting at the meaning of a religious act or symbol or institution, etc., for the participant.” It is an “attempt at value-free descriptions in religion” (The Science of Religion, pp. 20–21). It is antireductionistic, and seeks to preserve what is distinctively religious in the phenomena. Practitioners emphasize the importance of empathy or sympathetic understanding, and try to avoid (at least in principle) making judgments of value or truth about the phenomena under investigation.

Understanding religious worldviews is essential for those engaged in Christian mission, and the phenomenology of religion can be a useful tool toward that end. Phenomenology’s concern with rigorous description of the phenomena can be helpful in understanding the religious symbols of a culture, and its emphasis on “bracketing” can help the missionary be aware of his or her prior assumptions, which might distort an understanding of such symbols.

It is also important, however, to recognize that phenomenology of religion has its limitations. Phenomenology of religion cannot stand alone and it should be combined with the related disciplines of cultural anthropology, ethnography, history, and so on in forming a comprehensive understanding of the religious worldview. Furthermore, the Christian missionary can never be content merely with a descriptive approach to religious phenomena. Questions of truth and compatibility with biblical values must be addressed, and doing so will involve going well beyond the phenomenology of religion. Evaluation of the religious phenomena is inevitable and, when conducted properly, is an essential part of engaging the culture in Christian witness. Evaluations should be made, however, only after careful study of the phenomena on their own terms and such assessment should be based on clear biblical principles and values and not on one’s own cultural biases.

Philippine Mission Boards and Societies. Evangelical churches in the Philippines have been sending missionaries to peoples of other cultures since the beginning of the twentieth century. This movement may be due in part to the influence and example of the Western missionary movement. Perhaps a more significant reason, however, is the cultural diversity of the Philippine Islands. It is not uncommon for Filipinos to speak two or more languages. In one sense, one can say that cross-cultural communication is something Filipinos do as a matter of course in their daily lives. It is therefore not surprising, given the large Christian population and wide cultural diversity, that a strong indigenous missionary movement has grown and matured over the years. Generally, this movement focused at first primarily on CHURCH PLANTING and EVANGELISM within the Philippine Islands. Some worked cross-culturally while others called themselves missionaries as they worked among their own people group. Nevertheless, Tagalogs worked among the Samal and Badjao in the southern Philippines or among the Ifugao or Kalinga people of the north.

Two studies done in 1986 revealed that two-thirds of the mission agencies active at that time were founded in the 1970s and the first half of the 1980s, when Filipino missionaries could be found in Indonesia, Hong Kong, Singapore, the Middle East, Latin America, and Africa. Therefore, while the sending of missionaries is not a new phenomenon, the number of new mission agencies has grown significantly during the past two decades.

In 1986, Filipino national leaders, while considering how to evangelize their home country, set a goal of sending two thousand new Filipino missionaries by the year 2000. They further subdivided this goal by projecting that one thousand of these missionaries would be sent to minister cross-culturally within the Philippines and one thousand would be sent outside of the country.

Various modes of support for these missionaries have been used in their cross-cultural envi-pronments. Some Filipino missionaries have been sponsored by Western denominations. Others have served in Tent-Making Mission, working as domestic or manual laborers, while serving Christ and giving witness to their faith in their newfound cultural contexts. Still others have been sent by local churches and supported through the sacrificial giving of the local church as full-time Christian missionaries. Those in this category have found missionary work difficult financially because the economic base for sending and supporting from the Philippines has not been strong enough to support the Western model. Also, it has been difficult to send local currencies abroad due to local government restrictions. Finally, several indigenous mission agencies are closely connected with Western or international mission agencies. The OMF Home Council is responsible for Filipino missionaries serving with Overseas Missionary Fellowship. New Tribes, Philippines, is also working closely with the New Tribes Mission of North America. Many agencies are beginning to develop their own international contacts without the benefit of Western involvement. This has been facilitated by the networking activity of the Missions Committee of the Evangelical Fellowship of Asia.

Three cooperative organizations are worthy of mention. AMNET, directed by Chito Navarro, is a loose association of independent churches which are cooperating to reach unreached peoples in the 10/40 Window. In 1998, they were using one member mission agency, the Tribes and Nations Outreach, as their sending agency. But they have been effectively promoting a missions vision among their constituent churches. Another organization is a cooperative project of the Overseas Missionary Fellowship, SEND International, World Team, and the Alliance of Bible Christian Communities Philippines. They have called it the Global Alliance Philippines Ministries, Inc., or GAP. This new organization will be the sending agency for Filipino missionaries working with any of the participating international missions. They are currently considering the expansion of GAP to accommodate other mission agencies which can incorporate Filipino missionaries on their international missionary teams. Finally, there is the Philippine Missionary Society, which seeks to establish links between Filipino missionaries and local churches or denominations in other countries. For example, a local church in Guatemala may need a Christian worker for church planting or evangelism. PMA seeks to raise funds for travel and other costs for the Filipino missionary while the church in Guatemala takes on the support of that missionary when she or he arrives.

The growing number of mission agencies is an indication of a developing missions movement in the Philippines. Interest in serving in missions is high among university students and young professionals, but local churches are still reluctant to make the financial commitment to send. As this changes, further growth in number of mission agencies and the expansion of existing agencies can be expected.

Philippines (Est. 2000 pop.: 74,575,000; 300,000 sq. km. [115,830 sq. mi.]). Christianity arrived in the Philippines with Ferdinand Magellan in 1521. Although Magellan died soon after his arrival, one of his ships managed to return to Spain. Its rich cargo convinced King Philip II, for whom the Philippines are named, to occupy the islands. Philip dispatched Miguel Legazpe to establish control. Father Andres de Urdaneta and five other Augustinian friars accompanied Legazpe. The Augustinians established their first church in Cebu and then followed Legazpe to Manila, where they established their second parish. Some historians believe that the Hispanization of the Philippines halted the northward spread of Islam, which had already gained a foothold on Mindanao and Sulu in the southern region.

The Spanish quickly gained control because of the fragmentation of the Philippines, which comprise 7,100 islands and coral atolls. Many of the islands are bisected by mountain ranges. The geography accounts for the fact that over one hundred languages are spoken in the islands.

Before the Spaniards arrived, most of the Filipinos adhered to their traditional animistic tribal religions. In 1594 the Council of the Indies in Spain assigned responsibility for specific regions in the islands to each of four religious orders: the Augustinians, Dominicans, Franciscans, and Jesuits. Later, the Jesuits agreed to share part of their region with the Recollects. All of the orders were allowed to establish churches and monasteries in Manila, the capital city. By 1898 almost 90 percent of the population had become Catholic, and the Philippines came to be called the only Christian nation in Asia.

Protestant Christianity first reached the Philippines when two representatives of the British and Foreign Bible Society arrived in Manila in 1873 and began to distribute Bibles. Their mission ended abruptly when they were poisoned. One man died, and the Spanish authorities imprisoned the other. Their efforts, though short-lived, must have borne some fruit. When the first Protestant missionaries arrived in 1898, they discovered thirty-five small evangelical congregations with about four hundred members.

The Protestant era began in 1898 when an American naval force under Commodore Dewey sank the Spanish fleet in Manila Bay. With American annexation came freedom for Protestant missionaries to evangelize. American denominations hastened to send missionaries to the Philipippines: Methodists (1898), Presbyterians (1899), Northern Baptists (1900), United Brethren
(1901), Disciples of Christ (1901), Episcopalians (1901), Congregationalists (1902), Christian and Missionary Alliance (1902), and Seventh-Day Adventists (1905). In 1901 several of the missions met in Manila and approved a comity agreement that divided the country into zones of responsibility. The comity agreement remained in force until World War II.

The Philippines became an independent country in 1946. While the Philippines struggled to overcome the destruction of the World War, civil war raged in China. The Communists’ victory there forced many missionaries to relocate to other Asian countries. Thus the Philippines experienced an influx of evangelical missions. These included Southern Baptists, the Overseas Missionary Fellowship, Conservative Baptists, the Evangelical Free Church, the Far Eastern Gospel Crusade, Missouri Synod Lutherans, and the Baptist General Conference. The freedom of religion guaranteed by the Philippine Constitution made it possible for all these groups to enter and prosper.

Later, specialized mission agencies sent large numbers of missionaries to the Philippines. Included were the Summer Institute of Linguistics, New Tribes Mission, Missionary Aviation Fellowship, Campus Crusade for Christ, Youth with a Mission, and the Navigators. Several of these now deploy large numbers of Filipino Christians in cross-cultural ministry.

After World War II the government encouraged farm families to relocate to the southern island of Mindanao by offering them homesteads (free farm land). Many took advantage of the government’s offer; and Mindanao became the frontier area of the country. Mindanao also offered opportunity to missionaries, and in 1980 it was described as the most responsive island in the world. Though Mindanao has only 20 percent of the nation’s 74,575,000 people, 50 percent of the evangelical Christians in the Philippines live there.

As in Latin America, in recent years Pentecostal and charismatic groups have grown rapidly in the Philippines. The Assemblies of God entered the country in 1926, but their great growth came after World War II. Other denominations like the United Pentecostals and the Church of God began work in the postwar period. Charismatic Catholic fellowships have multiplied, and many independent charismatic fellowships are flourishing, particularly in urban areas.

Complete freedom of religion and the continued openness of the Filipino people bode well for the future. Many of the agencies named above are cooperating with the DAWN 2000 Movement, which has as its goal the planting of an evangelical church in every town and village in the Philip-ines. An increasing number of Filipino Christi-s serve as missionaries both domestically and internationally. Many of these intend to evangelize the unreached people groups found in remote areas of the country.

Philosophy of Religion.

The idea of philosophy of religion as a separate discipline is a relatively modern one that assumes a basic distinction between philosophy and religion/theology, a distinction that is accepted in the modern West but is more problematic in East Asian cultures. In the West, philosophy is regarded as the systemic, rational, and critical assessment of basic questions that perennially recur in human cultures. Philosophy of religion, in turn, can be thought of as the application of philosophical analysis to religious issues.

The Western Tradition. Philosophy is generally said to have emerged with Thales in Miletus, Greece, around 585 B.C. What distinguished philosophy was the attempt to answer fundamental questions about the cosmos through careful ob-ervation and reasoning rather than by simply resorting to the Homeric myths and prevailing views on the gods. Later Greek thinkers such as Plato (d. 347 B.C.) and Plotinus (d. A.D. 270) applied philosophical analysis to religious issues.
Philosophy of religion—or, more accurately, philosophical theology—was practiced by devout Christian theologians in the Middle Ages such as Augustine (d. 430), Anselm (d. 1109), Thomas Aquinas (d. 1275), and John Duns Scotus
(d. 1308). The Islamic tradition also produced some brilliant philosophical theologians, such as Ibn-Sina (d. 1037) and Ibn-Rushed (d. 1198), who grappled with many of the same issues addressed by Christian theologians. Indeed, medieval thinkers such as Aquinas were influenced in part by Islamic philosophical theologians.

In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries the distinctions among philosophy, religious studies, and theology became more pronounced, with philosophy increasingly challenging theology.
Epistemological difficulties with religious claims were given classic expression in the writings of David Hume (d. 1776) and Immanuel Kant
(d. 1804), and much of modern theology and philosophy of religion has been a response to the agenda set by such critics. Although in the early twentieth century philosophers were generally

Philosophy of Religion

The Eastern Tradition. Although the distinction between philosophy and religion is less clear in Asian cultures, philosophical reflection on religious themes in India goes back at least several centuries before the emergence of philosophy in Greece. The Upanishads, put into writing around the eighth century B.C., provided the material for the later systematization of the philosophical schools of Hinduism. Recurring themes in the writings include the fundamental unity of the cosmos; the superiority of spiritual reality to the physical dimension; that the manifest universe is the product of divine agency; that proper works (karma) and special knowledge (vidya) are necessary for release from samsara, the wearisome cycle of rebirths. The later Upanishads spoke of Brahman as the sole reality, prompting the question of the relationship between the self (atman) and Brahman. An influential school of thought, Advaita Vedanta, maintained the essential identity of the atman with Brahman.

Buddhism, emerging in sixth-century B.C. India, was as much a philosophical movement as a religious one. The central teachings of Buddhism were not regarded as products of divine revelation but rather the result of careful reflection and meditation, culminating in the Enlightenment of the Buddha. Buddhist writings in both the Theravada and Mahayana traditions have engaged in sophisticated philosophical discussions of epistemology and ontology, emphasizing the impermanence and insubstantiality of all things apart from nirvana. A recurring theme in much Buddhist literature, finding particular expression in Zen, is the inherent inadequacy and limitations of reason and the need for direct experience of ultimate reality.

The philosophical/religious traditions of Asia manifest considerable diversity, some assuming Theism, others embracing versions of Monism, Pantheism, Polytheism, and even naturalistic materialism. Some are explicitly atheistic. While broad generalizations are hazardous, we might note three recurring themes in much Eastern thought: (1) There is often a suspicion of human language and the capacity of rational categories to express higher levels of truth. The need for special intuitive insight, or direct experience, is emphasized. (2) Hindu, Buddhist, and Jain traditions have a strong “soteriological” concern—the philosophical perspectives are intended to provide release or liberation from the human predicament. (3) There is often concern for a comprehensive perspective that maintains that behind the plurality of the phenomenal world is a more wholistic and unified Reality.

Philosophy of Religion and Mission. Philosophy of religion can play a significant role in missiology. Particularly helpful is the emerging discipline of “cross-cultural philosophy of religion,” or “worldview analysis” (Ninian Smart), which involves rigorous analysis of religious issues from multicultural and multireligious perspectives. The concern here is to understand various religious worldviews as well as to clarify the basis on which claims to truth in various traditions can be assessed. For the Christian, philosophy of religion must always be subservient to God’s unique and authoritative revelation in Scripture. But when properly conducted, philosophy of religion can assist missions in several ways.

First, it can help Christians understand their own tradition better. Whether for good or ill, at critical junctures throughout history major theological issues have been significantly influenced by contemporary philosophical movements. One cannot appreciate the christological discussions of the fourth and fifth centuries, or Aquinas’s views on analogy in the thirteenth century, without some familiarity with Greek philosophy. Nor can one understand Schleiermacher in the nineteenth century apart from some grasp of Kantian philosophy.

Furthermore, while in no way removing the mystery of God, proper philosophical analysis can help Christians understand certain biblical teachings better. By clarifying relevant concepts, philosophical analysis can indicate what is and what is not entailed by biblical doctrines such as the Trinity, the deity of Jesus Christ, divine omniscience, or the relation of divine sovereignty to human freedom.

Philosophy of religion can also be an indispensable aid in APologetics by helping Christians understand the assumptions of the culture in which the gospel is to be presented and by removing some obstacles to faith and providing positive grounds for accepting the gospel.

Cross-cultural philosophy of religion can assist in understanding complex cultures such as India, China, and Japan, which have been shaped by centuries of sophisticated religious and philosophical traditions. The gospel has faced strong resistance in cultures dominated by Hinduism, Buddhism, and Taoism, as well as Islam. Part of the reason for this might be the failure of Christian missions to understand the religious worldviews adequately and to respond to them in an appropriate manner. Cross-cultural philosophy of religion can be an aid in developing an appropriate, culture-specific apologetic in such cultures.

HAROLD A. NETLAND

Pierson, Arthur Tappan (1837–1911). American minister, theological writer, and missionary spokesman. Hailed as the greatest popularizer of missions of his age and one who revolutionized missionary literature, he was born in New York City and educated at Hamilton College (1857) and Union Theological Seminary, New York (1860). After ordination in the Presbyterian Church, he served pastorates in Binghampton and Waterford (N.Y.), Detroit, and Philadelphia until 1889. An extended stay in Great Britain had him preaching at the Metropolitan Tabernacle of C. H. Spurgeon for a period of two years and lecturing at New College (Edinburgh). From 1895 to 1901, he was the president of A. J. GORDON’S Missionary Training School (now Gordon College, Wenham, Mass.).

Pierson sustained a lifelong commitment to world evangelization. For twenty-four years he was the editor of The Missionary Review of the World, spoke at numerous conferences promoting missions, and wrote extensively on the subject. In 1886, at the D. L. Moody sponsored conference in Mount Hermon, New York, Pierson gave a keynote address on missions to a group of 251 students from 89 colleges across the country. From this the STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT arose in 1888, along with its watchword “the evangelization of the world in this generation.” Pierson’s address “God’s Providence in Modern Missions” was later revised and published in volume 6 of The Fundamentals. Among Pierson’s protégés were such mission giants as ROBERT E. SPEER, JOHN R. MOTT, AND SAMUEL ZWEMER.

Author of over fifty books, Pierson is best remembered as one of the original editors of the Scofield Reference Bible (1909), and author of such mission-related books as George Müller of Bristol, The Crisis of Missions, The Miracles of Missions, Forward Movements of the Last Half Century, and God and Missions Today. Pietism. Along with Puritanism and the movements to which they gave birth, pietism led to the first Protestant missionary effort and became the catalyst for the wider Protestant missionary movement of the following centuries. An effort to continue and deepen the work of the REFORMATION, pietism focused on the renewal of the Christian life at a time when Lutheran orthodoxy emphasized belief in correct doctrine alone. Seeking the conversion of individuals, the renewal of the church, and the transformation of society, the movement had arisen in German Lutheranism shortly after the Thirty Years’ War left the country in a disastrous situation physically, economically, and spiritually. Poverty, ignorance, and violence were common, and class distinctions were great.

Philip Spener (1635–1705) is generally considered the founder of pietism, but it had a number of roots in Germany and elsewhere. Johannes Arndt’s True Christianity (1606–9) was significant, and as a student in Strasbourg, Spener was influenced by Puritan and Reformed writers. Appointed as senior pastor in Frankfurt in 1666, Spener found the church in a deplorable state. Drunkenness and immorality were common among the laity, who were expected to be passive listeners to erudite sermons that focused more on fine points of doctrine than edification. Spener encouraged the formation of small groups for prayer, Bible study, and the reading of devotional works. This concept of the church within the church, which was not intended to be divisive, spread widely within and beyond Germany despite bitter criticism. In 1675 Spener published an introduction to a new edition of Arndt’s work. In Pia Desideria (Pious Desires) he called for the reform of Christian society through six means: (1) more extensive use of the Scriptures; (2) greater participation by the laity; (3) the practice of love in everyday life; (4) an attitude of love in controversies; (5) stress on piety as well as scholarship in theological schools; and (6) theological education that taught that preaching was to save souls, not just demonstrate scholarship. Thus pietism focused on the need for conversion, commitment, and personal trust in Christ, an authentic Christian life, and the ministry of the laity.

The Lutheran orthodoxy of the day denied that the Great Commission was still in effect. Mission belonged to God, who needed no human helpers. Thus pietism focused on the need for conversion, commitment, and personal trust in Christ, an authentic Christian life, and the ministry of the laity.

The Lutheran orthodoxy of the day denied that the Great Commission was still in effect. Mission belonged to God, who needed no human helpers. Thus pietism focused on the need for conversion, commitment, and personal trust in Christ, an authentic Christian life, and the ministry of the laity.

August Hermann Francke (1663–1727) became the second leader of the movement. Through the efforts of Spener he was appointed professor of theology at the University of Halle in 1691, and became pastor of the church in nearby Glaucha the following year. He believed that converted and transformed individuals would renew the church and society. He was instrumental in establishing schools for poor children including girls, as well as an orphanage. His vision also led him to focus on world mission. He established a Bible institute to print and distribute Bibles inexpensively. This was the first institution with the goal of bringing the Scriptures to every part of the world. His projects were supported by faith alone and became the model for the orphanages of George Muller in Bristol, England, which then became the model for the faith principle of the China Inland Mission.

Francke's mission involvement was extensive. He sent Henry Muhlenberg and others to the North American colonies, where they organized Lutheran churches among German immigrants. He sent missionaries to the Baltic states, where they worked for the renewal of Lutheran communities. Pietist influence was important in bringing a deeper life to the churches in the Scandinavian countries as well and would be the source of most Scandinavian mission societies.

In 1706, influenced by his pietist chaplain, King Frederick IV of Denmark decided to send missionaries to his colony in Tranquebar, India. Two young men from the University of Halle, Bartholomaeus Ziegenbalg and Heinrich Plütschau, agreed to go. Plütschau returned in 1711, but Ziegenbalg remained, with one brief visit to Europe, until his death in 1719. This was the first Protestant missionary effort outside of Europe, with the exception of the Calvinist mission to Brazil in 1555. Despite the hostility of the Danish community and its chaplains, the higher Indian castes and Roman Catholics, and harassment from the governor, Ziegenbalg accomplished much during his short life. His missionary approach anticipated many methods that came later. He established schools to educate Christian children and develop leadership. In the belief that Christians needed the Scriptures in their own language, he translated the New Testament and part of the Old into Tamil before he died. He was convinced that missionaries needed to understand the worldview and religious beliefs and practices of the people. Thus he wrote on aspects of Hinduism. As a pietist, his aim was personal conversion, but he also worked to establish an Indian church with its own pastors. The first Indian pastor was ordained in 1733. About sixty missionaries went from Halle to India during the eighteenth century, and the work was eventually taken over by the Anglican Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge.

The influence of pietism on the total missionary movement was great. Ziegenbalg's visit to Europe in 1714 resulted in the establishment of the College of Missions in Copenhagen, where Moravian missionaries would later study, and the founding at Halle of the first Protestant student mission movement, the Order of the Mustard Seed. This was led by Nicolas Ludwig von Zinzendorf, who later became the leader of the Moravians (see Moravian Missions). All of this activity built on Francke’s vision for mission, which encompassed the whole world. He believed that the earth would eventually be transformed through godly people serving God and their neighbors, proclaiming Christ, and working to relieve poverty and oppression. His concern for the poor and emphasis on education as a means of social transformation were outgrowths of his theology. The intellectual and spiritual leader of missions, he was the first to inspire Christians in Europe to pray for and support missionaries, a radically new concept at that time.

Because of its focus on conversion and heart religion rather than theological controversies, pietism was broadly ecumenical. Francke corresponded with Anglicans, including the archbishop of Canterbury, and the New England Congregationalist leader Cotton Mather. Their correspondence went beyond denominationa controversies and focused on the need for world evangelization. Anton Boehm, a court preacher in London, translated pietist writings and was influential in the expansion of the missionary vision of the Anglican Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge (SPCK). The SPCK made Ziegenbalg and Francke corresponding members, and a Copenhagen/London/Halle Alliance for Mission was formed. Francke also showed interest in mission to North American Indians. Thus pietism was the first Protestant movement that focused both on mission and on ecumenical relationships.

Further influence of pietism came through the Moravians, who served as an even wider catalyst for mission. Pietism along with Puritanism also laid the foundation for the eighteenth-century evangelical awakenings in North America, Britain, and the continent. These awakenings broadened the Protestant missionary movement (see Great Awakenings). Theodore Frelinghuy- sen, a Dutch Reformed pietist, was the initial leader of the first Great Awakening, which began in New Jersey in 1726. That movement spread to New England in 1734 and up and down the Atlantic coast under its better-known leaders, Jonathan Edwards, Gilbert Tennent, and George Whitefield. It would eventually lead to the founding of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM) in 1810. Susanna Wesley was motivated to a deeper Christian life through reading the accounts of the Danish-Halle missionaries in India. As a result, she began to spend an hour each week with her children, John and Charles among them, to nurture them in their Christian faith. The influence of the Moravians on the conversion and subsequent ministry of John and Charles Wesley is well known.

The wave of revivals on both sides of the Atlantic in the eighteenth century led to the establishment of a number of missionary societies and to the Great Century of Mission. In Britain the Baptist Missionary Society (1792), the London Missionary Society (1795), the Scottish societies in Edinburgh and Glasgow (1796), the Church Missionary Society (1799), the Religious Tract Society (1799), and the British and Foreign Bible Society (1804) were formed. On the Continent the Netherlands Society (1797), the Basel Mission (1815), and the Berlin Missionary Society (1824) were established. These early Protestant missionary societies could all trace their roots in one way or another back to the pietist impulse that came from Halle.

Pike, Eunice (1913– ). Missionary and Bible translator for Mexican Mazatecs. Shortly after receiving her nursing degree at Massachusetts General Hospital, Pike went to Mexico to do literacy and Bible translation work among the Mazatec tribes. She and her colleague Florence Hansen (Cowan) found mastering Mazatec, a tonal language, impossible until Pike's brother Kenneth Pike shared his findings with working with another tonal language, Mixtec. With feedback from their native language helpers, Pike and Hansen immediately began translation of the New Testament, beginning with the book of 1 John. Pike soon began to focus on literacy, developing a series of Mazatec primers and teaching from her front window, while her partner and colleagues focused on translation. Once a book was completed, it was printed and Pike sold it in the markets. In 1961, the New Testament was completed as well as various passages from the Old Testament. In addition to translation and primers, Pike also authored hymns for the Mazatec church, wrote books on phonology, published several ethnographic and linguistic articles, and taught at the University of Oklahoma's branch of the Summer Institute of Linguistics during the summers. Pike also wrote a biography of her brother and three books describing her work among the Mazatecs.

Pike, Kenneth Lee (1912– ). American pioneering linguistic scholar and missionary to Mexico. Born in Woodstock, Connecticut, Pike grew up in a pious Congregational family. At the age of 16, his country doctor father suffered complications from appendicitis, and Pike vowed to serve God if his father was healed. Eventually he was, and Pike began fulfilling his promise by attending Gordon College. Rejected by China Inland Mission, Pike eventually became intrigued with phonetics, attended Camp Wycliffe (forerunner of SIL), and found his calling as a linguist.

Pike's accomplishments in linguistics over the next 60 years have been legendary. His first field assignment was among the Mixtec in Mexico. Work on his Ph.D. (1942), ongoing academic research and writing, and Wycliffe administrative responsibilities (Pike was president from 1942 to 1979) delayed the translation and printing of the Mixtec New Testament until 1951. In all, Pike wrote more than a dozen books, 200 articles, and 250 published poems. His pioneering work includes the development of the linguistic theory of tagnetics as well as the coinage of the widely used terms emic and etic. Referred to as the greatest American descriptive-theoretical linguist of this century, Pike has been honored through ten honorary doctorates and fifteen nominations for the Nobel Peace Prize.

Pilgrimages. Journeys to holy places undertaken to obtain supernatural help, to do penance, or to offer thanksgiving. Pilgrimages are a spiritual feature found among many of the world religions.

Within Islam, participation in the annual pilgrimage (hajj) to Mecca is one of the five essential requirements (“Pillars”) of religious practice. Such a pilgrimage should be undertaken at least once during a Muslim’s lifetime if at all possible. The hajj is very significant since Muslims believe that through it they will be freed from their sins if their pilgrimage is accepted by Allah. In Mecca the pilgrim makes seven circuits around the Kaaba and visits Arafat, Muzdalifah, and Mina.

Within folk Islam, the tombs of holy people also provide a focus for those seeking God’s blessing. One of the most popular is that of Khwaja Muinud-din Chishti in Almer, India. While such shrines are looked down upon by Muslim purists, they attract the devotion of many visitors, particularly on the date commemorating the death of the saint.

There are many Hindu pilgrimage sites of local or national interest within India. Such sacred sites may be identified with a religious myth, a temple, a bathing place, or a geographical feature. The Kumbha Mela is the largest gathering of pilgrims and is held every twelve years at Allahabad, India, at the (supposed) confluence of the Ganges, Yamuna, and Saraswati rivers. Large numbers of pilgrims also bathe in the Ganges at Varanasi.

Some Christians have spiritual or educational reasons for visiting sites associated with the life of Christ. Within the Roman Catholic piety, pilgrimages are undertaken to various sacred places including Lourdes in France, which is associated with healing miracles.

Pilkington, George Lawrence (1865–97). Irish missionary translator in Uganda. He attended Pembroke College, Cambridge, where in 1885 he was indirectly influenced by Dwight L. Moody. He applied for missionary service with the China Inland Mission, but delayed going to teach at Harrow School. When a call went out for university men to go to Uganda, Pilkington answered as a lay missionary with the Church Missionary Society of England.

Pilkington’s translation work began within three months of his arrival in Uganda. In addition to the Bible, he translated hymns and pamphlets, and prepared a grammar and dictionary of Luganda. In 1893, discouraged by a lack of spiritual power, he retreated to the island of Kome, where he experienced a great baptism of power. Returning to Uganda, a revival broke out which included local Muslims. Soon after this, Pilkington led seventy-five Ugandan soldiers to Christ.

After a furlough to complete the printing of his translation work, Pilkington returned to Uganda in 1896. New hostilities caused the British governor to ask Pilkington to serve as a translator for the soldiers restoring British colonial control. While on this expedition, Pilkington was shot and soon died. His death was mourned on two continents.

Pioneer Mission Work. Work done from the first contact of an unreached area or population until a viable and indigenous local church is established. Frontier mission, a more recently coined term (see Winter), describes pioneer work in which the missionary crosses significant cultural boundaries. The types of activities done as part of pioneering work include such things as Evangelism and Church Planting, Literacy and Translation, Relief and Development, and even establishing institutions (e.g., schools or hospitals). Such activities may be the full-time occupation of the missionary, or may be ancillary to some type of professional occupation (see Tent-Making Mission).

In situations where countries grant missionary visas, missionaries are free to preach the gospel openly as their full-time job. While this was more generally the case in recent centuries (especially when Western missionaries worked under the protection of colonial empires), political autonomy and religious attitudes have today closed the doors of many nations to the traditional full-time pioneer missionary. Therefore, many involved in pioneer work today, especially in Creative Access Countries, can only attain residency as students, researchers, or professionals. When local residency is not possible, a base may be established outside the target country or culture from which periodic trips into the target area as a tourist are made to establish contacts or evangelize.

Since the goal of pioneer mission work is to plant an Indigenous Church, it must always include some form of evangelism. This evangelism, especially in sensitive areas, may be limited to small-scale or even covert work. Once people within the target area have come to Christ, pioneer missionaries need specific skills to gather them together in small fellowships and help them grow toward becoming a church.
Pioneer Mission Work

While many pioneers have gone out as individuals, most have followed Paul’s example of gathering a team to work together (see also Teams in Mission). In prior centuries a team was sometimes necessary simply to ensure survival, as missionaries came to harsh environments without the necessary survival skills or resistance to disease already possessed by the indigenous population. Further, a team approach makes it less imperative that any single individual possess each of the multiple gifts needed for church planting. It also provides a place of encouragement when the work is slow to develop.

The trend in contemporary evangelical missions discussion of pioneer work has been a switch from a focus on geo-political boundaries to ethnolinguistic ones (see Peoples, People Groups) in conceptualizing the church-planting task of missions. The development of the related concepts such as the 10/40 Window, unreached or hidden people groups, and the Adopt-A-People campaigns also reflect that shift. It is estimated today that there are some 12,000 ethnolinguistic people groups, and that some 2,000 of them have no viable witness or church and are therefore in need of pioneering mission work. Most of these groups, it is noted, lie in the 10/40 Window and—in part because they are the hardest to reach physically, politically, and religiously—less than one-tenth of the total missionary effort is actually concentrated on them.

Because frontier missions are focused on crossing significant cultural barriers to plant churches, it is a subset of pioneer mission work, which does not always involve the crossing of significant cultural barriers. The concept of pioneer mission work cannot be limited to settings where there has never been a gospel witness. It also includes evangelism in areas where there once was such a witness that is no longer viable. For example, secularized, post-Christian urban areas where the gospel is no longer proclaimed need missionaries with a pioneering outlook and commitment, and this should not be overlooked in considering the scope of pioneer mission work.

Pitcairn (United Kingdom Dependent Area) (Est. 2000 pop.: 100; 236 sq. km. [91 sq. mi.]). Consist-Study of the histories of the religions, however, produces a different picture: Gautama in an earnest search for an explanation of human suffering, Muhammad in the cave Hira pondering the absurdities of Arab polytheism, even Marx, in the Reading Room of the British Museum, researching the causes of the miseries of the ‘toiling masses’ and some possible solution for them. There is today a general recognition that religions represent on the one hand a perverse human rejection of revelation (Karl Barth’s ‘principle preoccupation of godless humanity’) and on the other hand a search, in the absence of revelation, for some understanding of the apparent meaninglessness of the human experience.

As to the salvific validity of other religions, there has been a spectrum of responses, ranging from the naive view that ‘sincerity’ in any religion is salvific to the denial that ‘religion’ can play any part at all in the process of salvation. This latter view is made untenable by the plethora of examples of those who have found the Traditional Religions, or Islam or Hinduism gateways to Christ faith. Broadly speaking four distinct views may be identified. There is the inclusivist view, that finds salvation somewhere in each religion, the pluralist view that the common root to all religions is precisely the salvific root, the exclusivist view that salvation is to be found in Christ alone or, more rigorously, that salvation depends on an overt acknowledgment of Christ as Lord, a view usually associated with HENDRIK KRAEMER, and the view that while salvation is necessarily based on Christ’s Passion, an overt knowledge of Christ is not essential to salvation.

Each view has its own problems: John Hick’s attempts to produce a Copernican Revolution, replacing Christianity as the center of the universe of religions by God, or the Absolute, or “the Real,” adding epicycles to cycles, has served primarily to demonstrate the absence of a common center applicable to all religions, and the inevitability in any such exercise of the abandoning of core Christian theology, particularly incarnational theology. Karl Rahner’s creation of Anonymous Christianity, which purported salvifically to identify sincere religionists as de facto Christians was crushingly labeled religious imperialism. As LESSLIE NEWBIGIN commented, the scheme was “vulnerable at many points.” It must be said, however, that Rahner’s view closely resembles the Constitutive Christocentrism of the SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL, with its generally positive stance respecting the universe of religions. However, Roman Catholic thinking has moved on, and Pope John Paul II in his 1995 Crossing the Threshold of Hope has gone some way toward restoring the 1442 Council of Florence Exclusive Ecclesiocentrism.

The traditional evangelical view has its own difficulty. The vast majority of humankind, through no fault of its own, never heard of Christ, and appears to be condemned for its sin, which (as a consequence of the fall), it could not resist and for which it had no remedy. The academic theologian has found this no particular problem, where the missiologist, with one foot firmly in the real world, most especially in the Two-Thirds World, is, perhaps, touched with a greater compassion.

But the fourth view also is not without its difficulties, primarily because of the generally negative soteriological tenor of Bible texts such as Acts 17:24–28 and Romans 1:18–23 which speak of General Revelation but apply it as a foundation for God’s judgment while not explicitly discounting its salvific potential. It has been repeatedly suggested that any relaxing of the traditional exclusivist position must inevitably weaken missionary motivation. To this two replies must be made. First, that we seek and then follow biblical theology wherever it may lead us, and second, that the Christian mission is not merely response to command or obligation but is, or at least should be, ontological. The biblical imperative for mission is, of course, entirely clear: If the church is to be properly apostolic it must also be praxeologically apostolic, it must engage in mission. But to be effective in its praxis the church as a whole (not only its missionary representatives) must engage the religions by which it is confronted with a confident yet compassionate insistence on Jesus as the Way, the Truth, and the Life.

Poland (Est. 2000 pop.: 38,786,000; 323,250 sq. km. [124,807 sq. mi.]). There has never been a developed Protestant foreign missionary movement from Poland, the major reasons being political. The Roman Catholic Counter-Reformation, using Polish nationalism, was successful in largely eliminating the strong Protestant churches that existed in the sixteenth century. The three Partitions of Poland among Russia, Prussia, and Austria in 1772, 1793, and 1795 removed the Polish state from the map of Europe. Only in 1918 did it reappear. Twenty-one years later it was again dominated and partly dismembered, this time by Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia. In 1945 its borders were moved westward to their present positions. The Roman Catholic Church has remained the main rallying point of Polishness for most of the past two centuries and is seeking at the present time to reassert its dominant position in the life of the nation. By reason of its international nature, the Roman Catholic Church has enabled Polish priests to take part in the missionary activity of the church. There are over one thousand Polish Catholics involved in various places in the Roman Church’s worldwide mission. By contrast, Polish Protestant churches, all numerically small, have spent most of their energies in struggling to survive and maintain their congregational and denominational life under various adverse conditions. At the present time there is a small number of men and women sensing God’s call to overseas missions. Some have come to the West to train, others are being prepared in the newer seminaries such as the Evangelical Seminary in Wroclaw. Contacts with Western evangelicals, which began before the demise of the Soviet empire, have been instrumental in this process. Western help, especially in the areas of information and financial support will continue to be needed if the movement is to achieve its full potential.

Political Elections. “The state,” observes Sanders (1985, 273), “serves first as an institution to restrain the sinfulness of men by promoting social order.” Secular historians Will and Ariel Durant confirm this observation in stating that “the prime task of government is to establish order” (1968, 68). The biblical data support this. God, who is the God of order (1 Cor. 14:33), ordained government and gave it authority (Rom. 13:1) to serve the good of the people and to punish “the wrongdoer” (Rom. 13:4). He commands rulers to do justice (Isa. 56:1), which is a precondition of peace. The government or the state, then, is not outside the sovereignty of God. Jesus is Messiah, and in him, Christians cannot escape their political vocation. As citizens of the state and of the Kingdom of God, their attitude to the state is a dual one, otherwise their “faith has either become sentimental or secularized” (Brunner, 1957, 60).

They are subject to authority (Rom. 13:1). They are to pray for rulers (1 Tim. 2:1–2) and to participate in the life of the city so that it may prosper (Jer. 29:7). In democratic countries, Christian involvement in political elections is critical because “the power of national leaders is derived from the populace which is the primary focus of God-given authority” (Mouw, 1973, 55). It is through this that Christians can serve their own people and share in God’s work of redemption and preservation.

To elect governors is a privilege to be grateful for and a duty to be fulfilled. It is, first, a partnership with God in kingdom building in a world of rapid social change. As members of his church, they are to be “a responding community, a people whose task it is to discern the action of God in the world to join in His work” (Cox, 1965, 91). It is, second, to help put into office righteous people who are qualified for governance so that godless (evil) individuals will not rule, laying snares for people (Job 34:30). In righteousness a nation will be exalted (Prov. 14:34) or judged (Ps. 96:13).

Involvement in political elections also carries a number of correlative responsibilities. First, believers are to encourage others to vote for “capable men [and women] . . . who fear God, trustworthy men who hate dishonest gains” (Exod. 18:21) and who are committed to do what is just and right (Prov. 21:3). Second, Christians themselves may seek election for public office. The story of Jotham (Judg. 9:7–15) reminds us of the tragic consequences when qualified men and women do not seek election to public ministry. Government is a “minister of God” (Rom. 13:4). Elected officials play a crucial role in value transformation. They teach ethics by their examples. They serve as role models and key arbiters of social values. “Morality,” as Marshall points out, “must become concrete political morality” (Marshall, p. 16). Third, they are to help establish an electoral system that ensures an honest election. The will of the people expressed in their ballots must not be thwarted by fraud and violence.

Political elections are acts of faith that anticipate the future where “the kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of Christ; and he will reign forever and ever” (Rev. 11:15). This, obviously, will not be realized by legislation. Any social analysis that excludes sin in humanity and any solution that does not include the gospel will fail to achieve the kingdom. Justification by faith and justice are conjunctives of the kingdom of God. Weigle well summarized: “A state degenerates into tyranny if its citizens abandon conscience when they approach the polls, and forget God when they are in public office” (Weigle, 1947, 12).

Political Theologies. Today political theology is usually associated with various forms of liberation theology, such as that developed by Latin American thinkers. However, the theological roots of political theology can be traced to the work of postwar German theologians. In 1964 Jürgen Moltmann published his Theology of Hope. According to Moltmann, eschatology had become a sterile teaching of death and dying rather than life and hope. Events such as the second coming were relegated to some future “last day” (see also MILLENNIAL THOUGHT AND MISSION). By divorcing these future events from our present experience, they are robbed of their impact on the present. The church is to live in the expectation of the future coming of God’s kingdom (see KINGDOM OF GOD). Its primary role in this world is to announce the coming kingdom and by doing so to awaken hope. This is the missionary responsibility of the church—participating in the liberating sending of Jesus. This also includes the “other side of proclamation,” Christianity’s calling in society. The church has been called out to “creative discipleship” and simply cannot accept the obvious wrongs of society and its evil structures. Rather, it is to awaken hope by practicing a “present” eschatology which, in the expectation of God’s coming kingdom, criticizes and changes society. In order for this biblical hope to be properly interpreted and applied to our world, a melding of the historical and contemporary horizons has to be achieved. Texts that come to us from our past should not be examined simply in terms of experiential possibilities offered within that particular situation, but should be interpreted in terms of their historical context—of their understanding of their own past, as well as their hope for the future. Only when the future horizon of the historical text is melded with the present horizon of the interpreter can the texts be understood and their truth applied.

A return to this kind of existential hermeneutic will help us concentrate on life itself rather than on vague and abstract theories. But in order to be of practical benefit it will have to be developed into a realistic political hermeneutic. Political theology represents an attempt to relate faith to society in general. Moltmann is initially interested in his own society. His analysis of postwar German culture revealed a political environment that left the country without a real capital, divided and cut off from its own history. He also discovered a religious climate which was essentially a form of civil religion, in which Christianity becomes an involuntary part of life devoid of decisions and community.

Several unsuccessful attempts have been made to adapt the gospel to that environment. Rudolf Bultmann sought to de mythologize theology, but in the process left us with no absolute standards. Wolfhart Pannenberg developed a universal historical theology, which sought to provide objective orientation and reasons for faith. But it was, for that very reason, too narrow and even tended to support European prominence over other cultures and religions. Trutz Rendtorff’s theory of Christianity attempted to integrate everything in the church. But that made it hard to distinguish between what is Christian what is modern European culture. Finally, there is what Moltmann
Political Theologies
calls the “Evangelical Apocalypse,” which demands opposition to evil but operates in the “empty rooms of society, which are ignored by the ruling consciousness” (Moltmann, 1984, 21–26).

Moltmann’s alternative is political theology, which is best understood as the field, the milieu, the context, and the stage on which Christian theology is to be done during this modern era. Looking to the cross as the crux of Christ’s struggle with the public powers of his day, political theology seeks to use the cross as an instrument or symbol of criticism to be directed against what Moltmann calls political religion. This is the symbolic integration of a people and the unity of religion and society or civil religion. It leads to a number of modern idols, which oppress and subjugate people under a tyranny of arrogance and fear. Political religion is the focal point of political theology’s criticism. Two fundamental assumptions underlie this activity. The first is that the Old Testament’s ban on idol worship includes those forces that alienate and dehumanize people today. The second is that the theology of the cross represents the radical application of the Old Testament ban on idol worship in demythologization, in natural theology with its profanations of God, and in political theology through the fundamental democratization of power structures.

It is the Christian belief in a Deus crucifixus which liberates humanity from idol worship. Since the church (the community of believers) cannot identify itself with those idols (power structures), it must form its own fellowship. Having been liberated, it is no longer in need of self-confirmation (it has nothing to prove) and can (must) open itself to the others: the poor and oppressed. For that reason it cannot remain politically neutral. It must take a stand which works toward the democratization and the liberation of the oppressed. Hope is not only an open future but a future for the hopeless.

Political theology is above all a participation in history in order to understand history. It builds on traditional approaches in that it talks of promises made and fulfilled. But it goes beyond the traditional in that it views the future from the present and experiences the power of hope. For this reason it places emphasis on action and praxis. This is not to be understood as a one-way exchange. Rather, it is a dialectic between reflection and action. It issues in a Christian passion for action that is not limited to the clergy. This is not a theology for priests and pastors, but for active laity.

It is not difficult to see how Moltmann’s pioneering work served as a catalyst for similar theological models around the world. The basic themes of liberation and hope characterize almost every political theology, be it South African Black Theology (see African Theologies), Latin American Liberation Theology (see Liberation Theologies), Philippine Theology of Struggle, Indian Dalit Theology, North American Black Theology, or Korean Ming Jung Theology.

EDWARD ROMMEN

Politics. From New Testament times to the present, the relationship of Christian missions to government and politics has been ambivalent. On one hand, Jesus, Paul, and Peter all understood the legitimate claims of human government as an institution ordained by God for the restraint of evil and the promotion of good (Matt. 22:21; John 19:11; Rom. 13:1–7; 1 Tim. 2:1–2; 1 Peter 2:13–17). On the other hand, the New Testament also affirms that: (1) civil authority is subordinate to the sovereign God (Matt. 26:51–53; John 18:36); (2) there are times when the claims of the state interfere with the believer’s obedience to God (Acts 4:19 and 5:29); and (3) government sometimes assumes an idolatrous and demonic character, as is evident throughout the Book of Revelation. Christian missionaries in all ages have had to function with an awareness of the biblical tension between the positive and negative traits of the political realm.

In the early church, Christian evangelists primarily faced circumstances where the Roman government was hostile and offered extremely limited possibilities for political engagement. Although persecution sometimes was sporadic, affording Christians the opportunities to utilize some of the benefits of the imperial system to spread the gospel, Christianity enjoyed no legal standing or protection. In the apostolic era, the apostle Paul did not hesitate to invoke his Roman citizenship when he was mistreated or when his life was in danger (Acts 16:37–39; 22:25–29; 25:7–12). It is not apparent, however, that Paul’s example proved to be ultimately helpful for his own cause or for later generations of Christians who fell victim when the Roman state intensified its campaigns against the church. The initial evangelization of the Roman Empire occurred apart from any direct support or encouragement on the part of civil authorities. In fact, Christian refusal to participate in the emperor cult and state sacrifices provoked particularly aggressive attempts to exterminate the Christian movement between 250 and 311, thus highlighting an adversarial relationship between church and state that places major roadblocks in the path of Christian missionary advance (see also Church/State Relations).

Constantine’s ascendancy to the imperial throne in the early fourth century set the stage for a whole new pattern of Christian expansion. The emperor’s embrace of Christianity and his granting of favors to the institutional church held enormous implications for missions, which were reinforced later in the same century when Theodosius declared Christianity to be the one official state religion. These dramatic shifts created an alliance of throne and altar where, for several centuries, Christian missionary outreach would be significantly undergirded by the carnal weapons of “Christian” governments. In early medieval western Europe, for example, kings like Charlemagne in Saxon Germany and Olaf Tryggvason in Norway employed military force as a tactic in the Christianization of typically unwilling subjects. Later the Crusades illustrated the dangers of church-state coalitions aimed at the expansion of Christendom, whether directed at infidel Muslims who were attacked by European armies seeking to reclaim the Holy Land or at pagan Prussians who were compelled to be baptized by the victorious Teutonic Knights.

The Constantinian-Theodosian model persisted in some form into the Reformation and early modern periods. On the Roman Catholic side, Spain and Portugal built overseas empires with the blessing of Pope Alexander VI, who on the eve of the Reformation charged the monarchs of those countries with the evangelization of the lands that they conquered, thus creating a royal patronage system to support Catholic missionary endeavor. For their part, European Protestants almost universally accepted the state church tradition and system to support Catholic missionary endeavor. These principles informed their early, sluggish mission efforts and eventually contributed to the linkage between colonization and Christianization that characterized the European missionary enterprise in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries (see Colonialism). The common thread that ran through much of Christian missions from the fourth century on was an ecclesiastical willingness to rely on some measure of political assistance for fulfilling the Great Commission.

Although the Constantinian impulse did not die quickly, it was struck a mortal blow by the Enlightenment, which encouraged a division of the “religious” and the “secular.” Enlightenment thought influenced the American political experiment, especially regarding the separation of church and state. Hence the American missionary movement developed without the baggage of the older European traditions; most mission agencies viewed themselves as nonpolitical, a perception that was not shared by European colonial authorities who sometimes feared American missionaries as subversives. In addition, the American missions enterprise did not entirely escape the clutches of Manifest Destiny and imperialism in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, when missionary leaders often expressed facile sentiments that joined national and evangelical interests. In two notable cases, Protestant boards cooperated with the United States government in providing educational and social services for Native Americans at home and Filipinos overseas.

In the twentieth century, Christian missions encountered new challenges on the political front. Rising nationalism in Asia and Africa contributed to the collapse of colonial empires, which finally put to rest the antiquated notion of government-sponsored mission. At the same time, the emergence of totalitarian governments, particularly under the banner of communism, once again raised the issues of doing missions in the context of Persecution. Similar concerns have been expressed in response to a resurgent Islam, since missionary activity in many Islamic nations is prohibited or severely curtailed. Beyond the problems inherent in relating to hostile governments, modern missionaries have been involved in many projects in the developing world that have political implications, including the encouragement of democracy, the operation of schools and hospitals, and the introduction of social reforms. Further, compelling evidence suggests that American missionaries have influenced the foreign policy of the United States in the Near East and China; more ominously, some have charged that the Central Intelligence Agency has used missionaries in its covert operations. Finally, political developments since 1989 in the former Soviet bloc have opened unexpected opportunities for ministry in areas that previously had been closed to missionaries.

James A. Patterson

Pollard, Samuel (1864–1915). English missionary to China. Born at Camelford in Cornwall of parents who were both preachers with the Bible Christian Church, Pollard was converted at eleven years of age. Initially prepared for a career with the civil service, he was influenced toward missions at a London conference in 1885 and sailed for China in 1887. After language study, he traveled to Zhaotong in Yunnan province, after which he was assigned to the provincial capital, now called Kunming.

During his early missionary years Pollard engaged in evangelism and a ministry of compassion among the Chinese. In 1907 a people movement to Christ among the Miao, a minority nationality, reached the Zhaotung area from its starting point in Anshun, and Pollard became its most famous missionary leader. Before his death...
Pollard, Samuel

in 1915, he established a center for the thousands of new believers in Shihmenkan across the Guizhou provincial border; itinerated widely, planted churches, trained leaders, obtained justice for Miao Christians from officials and land-lords, developed the unique Pollard script, and used it to translate the New Testament into the Miao language.

Polygamy and Church Membership. The issue of what to do about believing polygamists has been a major concern in missionary circles from the beginning of Western missionary endeavor. With well over three-quarters of the societies of the world permitting plural marriages, and nearly half of them marriages with more than one wife as the ideal, Western missionaries encountered a major discrepancy between traditional custom and the Christian ideal. To this day the church has mainly responded by condemning the custom and reject for church membership any men who did not divorce their “extra” wives, no matter how sincere their faith might be.

Underlying this position were several largely unexamined Western worldview assumptions: (1) that Western-style monogamous marriage is the only form of marriage endorsed by God; (2) that God’s patience with polygamy in the Old Testament has been replaced by condemnation of the custom as indicated by the “one wife” passages in 1 Timothy 2:1–13 and Titus 1:5–9; (3) that plural “marriage” is not really marriage at all but adultery; and (4) that all we have to do to change such a custom is to make rules and enforce them.

In spite of the universality of the position that refused church membership to men with more than one wife, there have always been dissenting voices both within the missionary community and within the churches. Several conferences have been held through the years to discuss the issues raised by, on the one hand, the tenacity of the custom and, on the other, the intransigence of missionaries and the indigenous church leaders who followed them to change the church rules.

However, roughly since the 1950s a greater appreciation has arisen as to how God works with culture, even with customs that are less than ideal. This has brought a greater openness among missionary theorists and some mission leaders to rethink the church’s position. Large numbers of indigenous leaders who are now in charge of the churches have, however, refused to change. Meanwhile, many church members either secretly engage in the custom while maintaining their church membership or they fall away. Or, they become members of the thousands of independent churches that have separated from the missionary churches (especially in Africa).

Behind these splits often lay the quest for a more culturally appropriate Christianity that allowed for an acceptance of centuries-old customs such as polygamy and the incorporation of indigenous approaches to Scripture and the church. Both the leaders of the splinter groups and mission theorists point out that God was patient for centuries with polygamy, even though it is not his ideal, and that Paul could not have had polygamy in mind when he wrote the passages in Timothy and Titus, since the custom did not occur in Greek society. Furthermore, in the societies where it occurs, polygamy is legal marriage, not adultery and, therefore, should not constitute a barrier to church membership for those who have come to genuine faith. Nor should the church continue to recommend divorce (which Jesus did condemn) as a way out of a custom about which both Jesus and the rest of Scripture are silent.

Polynesia. Polynesia covers a vast triangular area of the Pacific Ocean stretching from Hawaii in the north to New Zealand in the southwest and Easter Island in the east. The term “Polynesia” refers to the “many islands” settled by people who originated in Asia and began entering the Pacific from west to east c. 1000 B.C. Described as “Polynesians” by nineteenth-century scholars, the people were great seafarers who shared a common linguistic and cultural heritage which took on distinctive characteristics as they separated and migrated to different areas. Societies were ruled over by chiefs who inherited status and rank, although this varied from the significant kingdoms like Tonga and Hawaii, to large tribal units in Tahiti and small tribes in atoll settlements. Warrior traditions were strong and inter-tribal conflicts in the pursuit or defense of mana, prestige or power, were frequent. Religious beliefs varied with “departmental gods” prominent in eastern Polynesia while Tongans and Samoans gave more significance to local spirits. While there were common features and names within Polynesian mythology and cosmology, they were accented by particular emphases and influenced by geographical location. Rituals and practices were clearly defined and priests or specialists gave leadership in both spiritual and practical areas of life. Sacred spaces were set aside as places for rituals with, in some areas, special buildings. Concepts such as tapu, with its sense of holy or sacred, could be applied to people, places, and behavior and influenced the whole of life. Polynesians believed in an after-life where the spirits of the dead lived, although for Tongans this was limited to those of high rank. There was no sense of punishment and rewards. There was a close relationship between people, the land, and the sea.

The first European contact with Polynesia was made by voyagers such as Magellan (1521), Mendana (1567–68, 1595), and Quiros (1606). Although motivated by Christian as well as materialistic ambitions their impact was limited. Dutch in the seventeenth century and French and British explorers in the eighteenth century, notably James Cook, mapped the Pacific and through their writings made its islands and people better known in Europe.

This new knowledge, combined with the eighteenth-century evangelical revivals in Great Britain, created considerable interest in the evangelization of the Pacific. The London Missionary Society, founded in 1795, chose the Pacific as its first sphere of work. In 1796 they dispatched the Duff with thirty missionaries, five wives, and three children to Tonga, Tahiti, and the Marquesas. Four were ordained and the rest were artisans, reflecting the influence of Thomas Hawels who believed Polynesians needed to be civilized in British ways as part of their evangelization. The missionaries were ill-prepared. Of the ten taken to Tonga in April 1797, three were killed, one “went native,” and the remainder abandoned the mission in 1800.

In Tahiti, where they arrived on March 5, 1797, the missionaries were confronted by a society undergoing political and religious turmoil, in which they were valued for giving access to European goods rather than the Christian message. Progress in learning Tahitian was slow, most of the missionaries abandoned their work, and communication and support from England were difficult. Pomare II, a leading chief, requested baptism in 1812, but this was delayed until 1819 because of missionary anxiety about his behavior. Literacy and the printed text, particularly the Bible, People Movements, Power Encounters, the surrender of idols, and the influence of chiefs were important in the rapid movement of Tahitians toward Christianity after 1815. Similar developments occurred elsewhere in Polynesia. Christianity spread through Tahiti and the surrounding islands, often through indigenous agency. Missionaries, in cooperation with the chiefs, attempted to control moral and political behavior through codes of law and were often disappointed at what they called “backsliding.”

The expansion of Christianity throughout the Pacific owes a great deal to John Williams who began at Moorea in 1817 and shifted to Raiatea in 1818. He emphasised morality and the acquisition of practical skills like carpentry and boat-building and attacked what he saw as Pacific indolence. Visitors from Rurutu were returned with two Raiatean teachers to their home island where they effected the conversion of their people. In 1821 Williams took two Raiateans, Papeiha and Vahapata, to Aitutaki in the Cook Islands where by 1823 they had achieved quick success. Papeiha was taken to Mangaia in 1823 but was withdrawn after a hostile reception. Williams then took him to Rarotonga and when Papeiha was visited in 1825, the missionary was astonished at the progress he had made. Two teachers were taken to Mangaia in 1824 and within a few months many had accepted Christianity. Williams, Charles Pitman, and their families went to reside in Rarotonga in 1827. Williams began translating the Bible into Cook Island Maori and introduced a code of laws. With limited resources he built the Messenger of Peace and with it was actively involved in visiting other islands, stationing islanders, and giving them support. Aaron Buzacott started a theological institution, Takamo, on Rarotonga in 1839 to train “native agents.”

In 1839 Williams visited the Wesleyan missionaries, Turner and Cross, in Tonga and it was agreed that the Methodists should concentrate on Tonga and Fiji and the LMS would take responsibility for Samoa. Accompanied by Fauhea, a Samoan, Williams went to Samoa where he was well received by Malietoa, the leading Samoan chief. Tahitian teachers were left in Malietoa’s care. When Williams returned to Samoa in 1832 with additional teachers, he was impressed with the progress. In 1834 the first Europeans, Platt and Wilson, were stationed in Samoa. A training institution was established at Malua in 1844. The New Testament in Samoan was completed in 1848 and the Old Testament in 1855.

Attempts by Williams to land teachers at Niue in 1830 resulted in the first of several rejections. In 1846 two Niueans, Peniamina and Fakaftitiu, who were converted in Samoa, returned to Niue and in 1849 Paulo, a Samoan, joined them. W. G. Lawes, the first European resident missionary, arrived in 1861 and by 1868 he had translated the New Testament. Initial LMS endeavors in the Tokelau islands in 1855 also met with opposition and the first missionaries, a Tokelauan converted in Samoa and two Samoan teachers, were accepted in 1861.

LMS teachers from Tahiti arrived in Tonga in 1822, the same year that Walter Lawry and his wife Mary, the first Methodist missionaries, settled on Tongatapu. Lawry abandoned Tonga in 1823, but in 1826 John Thomas and John Hutchinson resumed the Methodist work. The baptisms of leading chiefs, Aleamotu’a in 1830, Taufa’ahau in 1831, and Finau in 1832 and a revival in Vava’u in 1834 encouraged the rapid acceptance of Christianity. There was some resist-acceptance among rival families which resulted in civil war. Methodists promoted the first code of laws in 1839 and the recognition of Taufa’ahau, as King George Tupou I in 1845 consolidated the Methodist dominance in Tonga.
Polynesia

Despite the agreement with the LMS over Samoa, “Lotu Tonga,” or Christianity in a Methodist form, had already reached Samoa through a chief who had been in Tonga before Williams’ first visit. Peter Turner was sent to oversee Methodism in Tonga in 1835, but following LMS protests was withdrawn in 1839. Support from Tongans ensured the continuation of Samoan Methodism and in 1857 the Australasian Methodist Conference sent Martin Dyson to superintend this work. George Brown joined him in 1860 and made a notable contribution. A district training college was started in 1864 and in 1868 was transferred to Lufilufi and called Piula.

Protestant beginnings in the Pacific were marked by initial opposition but the rapid acceptance of Christianity in most areas resulted from indigenous evangelism, the impact of literacy, power encounters, people movements, and the significant role of chiefs. Missionaries introduced strict observance of Sunday, encouraged peacemaking between tribes, and codes of law which blurred the distinction between church and state. Indigenous movements such as Ma-maia in Tahiti and Sio Vili in Samoa and the revival of traditional customs such as tattooing indicate that the acceptance of Christianity did not always meet the missionaries’ expectations.

Catholic beginnings in Polynesia were closely associated with French missionary expansion and drew a hostile reaction from the Protestant missionaries. Eastern Polynesia was assigned to the Congregation of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary. Missionaries were landed at Tahiti in 1836, the Marquesas in 1839, the Cook Islands in 1894. The Society of Mary entered Western Polynesia under the leadership of Bishop J. B. F. Pompallier in 1837. Pierre Bataillon quickly converted Wallis (Uvea) and, after the murder of Pierre Chanel on Futuna in 1841, the people accepted Catholicism. Returning Tongan Catholics from Wallis and disaffected anti-Methodist families became the basis of “Lotu Popi,” Tongan Catholicism, and their first resident priests arrived in 1842. The Vicariate of Western Oceania was set up in 1842. Catholic missionaries arrived in Samoa in 1845. Tokelauns were introduced to Catholicism at Wallis and took it back to their own people in 1861.

Missionary activity in Polynesia had ambiguous colonial connections. Only Tonga retained its independence. Shirley Baker, a Methodist missionary (1860–79) who drafted the country’s Constitution, together with the King established the Free Church of Tonga in 1885 which separated from the Wesleyans who retained links with the Australasian Conference until their reunion in 1924. The French protectorate accepted by Tahitian chiefs in 1842 emerged out of French naval intervention in support of Catholic missionaries. George Pritchard, British consul in Tahiti and former LMS missionary, was deported in 1844 because of his attempts to provoke Tahitian opposition to the French.

Seventh-Day Adventists and Latter Day Saints (Mormons) also entered Polynesia in the nineteenth century. Protestants throughout Polynesia, Samoa apart, maintained a Comity policy trying to avoid competition. Anglican church members in Tonga, recruited by a disenchanted Shirley Baker, were taken over in 1902 by Alfred Willis, former Bishop of Hawaii, but their group remained small.

Some one thousand Polynesian missionaries, starting from Williams’ visit to the New Hebrides (Vanuatu) in 1839, as catechists, teachers, and ministers, along with their wives, made significant contributions to the evangelization of Melanesia. Their training was limited, although Tupou College in Tonga under James Moulton reached high standards. Indigenous ministry was promoted by Protestant missions although control of the church remained in the paternalistic hands of European missionaries and missionary societies until well after the Second World War.

Christianity has penetrated all aspects of life throughout Polynesia and in its different denominational forms contributes to the identity of both people and their country. Daily family worship, both morning and evening, and participation in services throughout the week and particularly on Sunday are the norm for village life in most parts of Polynesia. Churches have made notable contributions to education at the primary and secondary levels and through theological institutions.

Considerable pressure is placed on small Pacific societies by forces such as nuclear testing, external migration, secularization, the impact of television, economic pressures, and material values. The division of Christianity as a result of pentecostal and fundamentalist groups and the proliferation of groups such as Latter Day Saints and Jehovah’s Witnesses challenge small communities. Polynesian Christianity, however, finds vibrant expression in song and dance and the language of Pacific peoples. Through migration Polynesian Christianity is significant in New Zealand, Australia and the west coast of the United States.

Polytheism. The term originates from the Greek words polus (many) and theos (god), and refers to the recognition and worship of many gods. Popular nineteenth-century scholarship considered monotheism the apex of an evolutionary process in religious devotion. This evolution was thought to have moved from early primal awareness of supernatural powers to ancestor worship to polydemonism to polytheism to monothelism (and, in the eyes of some, finally to atheism). The Vienna School associated with Wilhelm Schmidt contrasted this view with the belief that monotheism was the original human creed, which later degenerated into polytheism; monotheism was then reintroduced at a later point in time. This is also the Judeo-Christian-Islamic worldview.

A consideration of the word “theism” automatically includes a belief in god (theos) to which “many” (polus) is added to account for the variety of human experiences (arts, fertility, industry, hunting, fishing, healing) and societal structures (families, clans, villages, cities, countries). That monotheism preceded polytheism is demonstrated (aside from the biblical revelation) in that society had to achieve some degree of compartmentalization (Gen. 5–11) in order to accommodate the personification of the various deities within the polytheistic structure. The monistic nature of Hebrew life (i.e., that life is one whole and God is one) automatically brought it into conflict with polytheism.

Polytheism relates to animism and polydemonism in that all three acknowledge supernatural powers as the creative forces. However, the clarity of thinking along theistic lines in polytheism is sharper than in animism or polydemonism. Additionally, unlike animism and polydemonism, the number of spiritual forces in polytheistic systems is generally limited. These deities may be viewed as friendly or unfriendly, and often take on some amalgam of human and creaturely form. They may be thought of as personifications of nature (e.g., Mithra, the Persian sun god; Thor, the Norse god of rain and storm) or of animals or plants (e.g., Kukulcan, the feathered serpent god of the Mayas).

The attributes of deity are sharply distinguished in polytheism and monotheism. Polytheism views the gods as immortal, though often with some type of beginning. Monotheism recognizes God as eternal, with no beginning or end. In polytheism, power is distributed among the various gods. In monotheism, God alone is all-powerful. Polytheistic gods are generally gods who act in this world, though some are perceived as remote (e.g., Zeus). Monotheism acknowledges God’s transcendence (he is beyond all human events) as well as his immanence (he is involved in all human events, seen uniquely in the incarnation and person of Jesus Christ).

Where care is not taken to recognize and prevent the possibility of syncretistic thinking, a de facto polytheistic subsystem will exist in many expressions of Christianity. Often it results when the old gods are reduced to angels, demons, or saints within the Christian orbit. Therefore, great care must be taken to provide missiological and salvific responses to the belief in many gods that polytheism presents.

Population, Population Explosion, Population Planning. As the world enters the twenty-first century its population continues to grow at an alarming rate. In 1999, the projected population of the world reached 6 billion people, with the figure estimated to reach 10 billion by 2060. Rapid growth of the world’s population impacts missions in a number of ways. In terms of sheer numbers it means that there are constantly increasing numbers of people who have yet to hear the gospel of Jesus Christ. Since the most rapid population growth tends to occur in some of the least evangelized sections of the world, this means that in spite of encouraging church growth in other sectors the task of world evangelization remains daunting. High birth rates tend to fall among those peoples who are also the poorest, compounding the problems of poverty, malnutrition, education, and general quality of life. For example, although the current doubling time for the world’s population in general is 137 years, the doubling time for the poorer countries of the world is only 33 years (New State of the World Atlas, 1991). Finally, the population explosion raises ethical questions about stewardship of earth’s natural resources, both in terms of preserving the limited resources for future generations and working toward a more equitable distribution of the use of existing resources among nations. There are those who say there is no cause for alarm, for there is plenty of food on this planet to feed everyone for many years. It is only a matter of a more equitable distribution of existing food supplies, or of using more fertilizer, or planting different types of crops, or the like.

Projected population data, however, will help bring reality to the discussion. If the 1999 world population was 6 billion and people in many nations of Asia and Africa are already suffering from either malnutrition or simple starvation, how will the world sustain a projected 10 billion people by the year 2060? If there is a surplus of food in Canada and there is need in India, who will pay to ship food from Canada to India on an indefinite basis? The economic realities and gigantic numbers involved all suggest that there is indeed a crisis, and that it will get worse before it gets better.

Demographers hope that the rate of growth will be slower during the twenty-first century due to greater use of birth control. Continued wars and the AIDS epidemic might also slow the growth. But even though it is slowing down, continued growth raises serious questions about the quality of life for most people during the twenty-first century and the continuing disparity in standards of living between the haves and the have-nots.

Some newspaper reporters and politicians in Africa have spoken out against population planning, suggesting that this is merely a Western device that is being promoted in order to keep Africa under Western domination. This argument overlooks the fact that many European nations are already setting the pace by holding their population growth to almost zero percent. Mainland China is also striving vigorously for zero population growth in spite of the felt hardships it creates for their people. It has been observed that regardless of what intellectual leaders may say, many Africans of moderate income desire to limit the size of their families because in a rapidly urbanizing world they no longer have the resources to support large families.

Ironically, population growth is greatest among the poor, who are those least able to sustain such growth. One way therefore to slow population growth is to raise living standards for the poor. But this will be difficult, for most poor people are already living in overcrowded areas where there is fierce competition for available resources.

In 1990 Luis Bush wrote, "More than eight out of ten of the poorest of the poor...live in the 10/40 Window" (5). He defined the 10/40 WINDOW as a rectangular block of land from the Atlantic to the Pacific from 10 to 40 degrees north of the equator. Inasmuch as most who live in this giant rectangle are Muslim, Hindu, or Buddhist, they are also unreached.

If the population explosion is taking place largely among the poor within the 10/40 Window, conversion to Christianity may be the only viable route to their physical betterment, for it has been observed time and again that when people turn to Christ, their standard of living tends to rise. And most wealthy nations of the world today have at least a Christian background although the majority of their citizens may not be practicing Christians.

The runaway population explosion, therefore, is added reason for missionary attention to the 10/40 Window. There is however another implication of this population explosion that the missionary world has been slower to grasp. As the population explodes, people are pushed off the farm and to the cities. There is direct correlation between the population explosion and the exploding growth of cities in the non-Western world (see URBANIZATION).

Attention to the 10/40 Window, therefore, should not simply identify the various ethnic groups so that missionaries and evangelists can be sent to them. It should also identify the various social groups in the giant cities of our world so that social groups that have been neglected may also receive missionary attention. Shantytown dwellers, street children, street vendors, and the unemployed are all legitimate targets for mission effort, as well as wealthy business people, government workers, soldiers, professional people, and all the social classes between these two extremes.

Portugal (Est. 2000 pop.: 9,807,000; 92,389 sq. km. [35,671 sq. mi.]). Traditionally Roman Catholic, Portugal severely restricted religious liberty for Protestants until 1910, when the monarchy ended and a republic was established. The nation was under a dictatorship from 1926 to 1974. That year a democracy was inaugurated, the African colonies given their independence, and religious liberty decreed. Portugal continues to be the poorest country in the European community, but it is now developing and modernizing quite rapidly with rising living standards.

Scottish Presbyterians began work in 1866. Brazilian Presbyterians and Baptists arrived in 1910. Brethren from England also began work early in the century, while the Assemblies of God, having arrived later, now constitute the largest evangelical movement in the country. Others include Seventh-Day Adventists, Methodists, Lusitanians (Anglicans), and various Pentecostal groups. Out of a population of approximately 10 million, only about 1.25 percent are evangelicals. Approximately 25 percent are practicing Catholics. Most of the rest are nominal Roman Catholics.

The changes in 1974 opened the door to religious pluralism and secularism despite an extremely conservative Roman Catholic Church. The evangelical movement, led by Pentecostals, is growing at approximately 5.7 percent per year; but MORMONS and JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES are growing at the same rate and constitute about 1 percent of the population. In 1993 there were 335 Protestant missionaries working in the nation, coming primarily from the United States, Brazil, and the United Kingdom, while Portuguese Protestant churches had sent 168 missionaries to other parts of the world.

Among the needs are greater unity of vision to reach the whole nation for Christ and increased CHURCH PLANTING, especially in the far north and south. With only one pastor for every three congregations, more full-time workers and lay leaders are needed along with adequate biblical and theological training. Groups needing greater focus are the 1.3 million Portuguese workers in other parts of Europe, the large number of marginalized youth, and immigrants from Africa and Macau.

There are nine theological seminaries and several programs of THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION BY EXTENSION; production of Christian literature and Bible distribution are growing, along with some Christian radio and television. The International Fellowship of Evangelical Students works in eight universities. Campus Crusade for Christ and Scripture Union are also present. As Portugal moves away from traditional Catholicism toward SECULARISM, there are significant challenges but also new opportunities.

Paul E. Pierson
Posselt, Wilhelm (1815–85). German missionary in South Africa. Born in Diekow (Neumark), Germany, he first was trained as a teacher and then attended the seminary of the BERLIN MISSIONARY SOCIETY. After completion of his studies and ordination in 1839, he arrived in South Africa in 1840 and served in the Berlin Mission’s work in the Xhosa territory of the Eastern Cape Province (known at the time as Kafraria). During the British conflicts with the Xhosa he sought to establish closer relationship with the African peoples. In 1847 he began a work among the Zulu in Natal at Emmaus and in 1853 at Christianenburg, where he remained for the rest of his life. In his later years he served as the Berlin Mission’s field director in Natal. He carried on an extensive pastoral ministry among the Zulu and Xhosa, and his station was a center for missionary endeavors in the region.

Possession Phenomena. In almost every culture of the world the phenomenon of possession is known and experienced. Typical symptoms of possession include trance, trembling, sweating, groaning, screaming, speaking in a different voice or an incoherent language, taking on a new identity, inordinate strength, inexplicable knowledge, and prophecy. Often, but not always, those who have been possessed have no memory of the events of the possession after they are released (see also EXORCISM).

Explanations for possession can be classed in three categories: physical, psychological and social, and spiritual. Each generally offers alternative explanations for the same phenomena. However, the categories are not mutually exclusive; in many cultures possession first takes hold of a person as a result of an illness or emotional trauma, but is explained in spirit-related terms.

Physical explanations include fever, chemical imbalance, epilepsy, asthma, hypnosis, drug-induced hallucination, severe physical trauma resulting in shock, and sleepwalking. When possession is purely the result of a physiological state, it will be alleviated as soon as the physical problem is properly treated.

Psychological and social explanations include wish-fulfillment (as an attention-getting device), social stress and mob hysteria, and simulated possession (as a means of obtaining a desired goal). Anthropologists note the Taita of Kenya as an example. When Taita women are stressed because of their husbands’ negligence, they may call for a community ceremonial dance. During the dance some become possessed, and spirits berate the husbands through the mouths of the wives. The husbands, fearing retribution from the spirit world for disobedience, obey the directions of the spirits. The Taita see this as actual possession, the anthropologists as a cultural phenomenon designed to alleviate social stress.

Spiritual explanations from a non-Christian perspective range from mystic states (e.g., a shaman’s voyage) to beneficial mediumship. Non-Christian perspectives do not necessarily view possession as negative. For example, it may be a sign that ancestors or spirits have chosen a person as a channel through which they will communicate with the community. From the Christian perspective, however, all genuine possession (or demonization) is demonic control of the person and must be dealt with by exercising Christ’s authority. It should be noted that some Pentecostal phenomena have a surface similarity to possession (e.g., slaying in the Spirit), but in those cases the explanation is that the Holy Spirit is at work.

Possession Phenomena

The tendency of cross-cultural workers is to apply the explanation that makes best sense in light of their own cultural framework (see Flaw of the Excluded Middle). The missionary from a secular background may seek to explain possession purely in terms of physical or psychological categories. The missionary from an animistic culture will tend to explain all the phenomena as actual possession. The former must be aware that not all possession phenomena can be reduced to the physical and psychological, and the latter that not all that appears to be demonic possession is genuine demonization in the biblical sense (see also Demon, Demonization). In terms of ministry, people will respond best when help is offered in categories that make sense to them culturally. Therefore the sensitive missionary will seek to develop contextualized ministry patterns that are faithful to the Scriptures and, as far as possible, in tune with cultural practices.

Postmillennialism. Postmillennialists believe that the kingdom of God is already being realized in the present age through the proclamation of the gospel and the saving influence of the Holy Spirit. As a result, the whole world—the majority of the members of all nations including Israel, that is—will be Christianized at a future, presently unknown time. Christ will return at the end of the millennium, an age of unknown duration marked by justice and peace. The new age will not be essentially different from the present and will come about as more people are converted to Christ. The postmillennialist view is the only one of the three significant eschatologies based directly on the charter of Christianity, the Great Commission (Matt. 28:19-20), interpreting it not only as a command, but also as a promise and as prophecy.

The roots of modern Protestant world missions lie to a great extent in the work of Calvinist, Puritan, postmillennial preachers in England and America, as well as that of Lutheran, Pietist, postmillennial pastors in Germany.

The first modern Anglo-Saxon missionaries (preaching to indigenous American Indians) were motivated by a Calvinist, postmillennial hope. That postmillennial expectations led to the establishment of practical missionary activity is true not only for Calvinist Anglicans, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists, but also for Calvinist Baptists such as William Carey whose major work, "An Enquiry into the Obligations of Christians . . ." (1792), initiated the final awakening of Protestant missions. Postmillennial expectations can be discovered in the sermons held at the founding of the London Missionary Society in 1795, of the New York Missionary Society in 1797, of the Glasgow Missionary Society in 1802, and to a certain extent of the Church Missionary Society in 1799. Many Calvinist mission leaders such as John Eliot, Alexander Duff, David Livingstone, Henry Martyn, Rufus Anderson, and Henry Venn expressed a postmillennial hope.

American and British revival movements were seen as the first indications of a wider wave of conversion, expected to soon engulf the whole earth. Not only Jonathan Edwards, but also English (Isaac Watts, Philipp Doddridge) and Scottish theologians (John Williamson, John Erskine) related postmillennial hope to revival and to the idea of missions.

The close relationship between postmillennialism and missions can be traced through the ideas of the Reformed Puritans of America and England back to the optimism of the Reformed theologians John Calvin, Ulrich Zwingli, Theodor Biblender, Martin Bucer, Peter Martyr, and Theodor Beza, even though none of them expressed a postmillennial system. This had, however, already occurred in the Reformation period in England, then by leading Puritan theologians such as John Cotton, John Owen, Matthew Henry, and Samuel Rutherford. For all of these Reformed thinkers since the Reformation, the kingdom of God still had a long period of time before it, in contrast to the immediate expectations of the end of the world of Lutheran orthodoxy.

It is therefore not surprising that postmillennialism, with its emphasis on reaching all peoples with the gospel, has been integrated only into Reformed confessions of faith (Calvin’s Genevan Catechism, 268–270, Larger Catechism of Westminster, 191, Congregationalist Savoy Declaration 1658, art. 26.5). Postmillennialism offers the best explanation as to why the dogma of double predestination should not detract from missions but supports them.

Rufus Anderson was the first theologian to again emphasize the love for the lost as motivation for missions rather than postmillennial expectations, even though he clearly expressed a postmillennial belief. As late as 1909, W. O. Carver observed that the postmillennial view was still the most influential motivation for missions. Not until the end of the First World War did postmillennialism lose its preeminence. Following Hudson Taylor it had, in the area of world missions, however, been gradually superseded by Faith Missions, which were strongly influenced by Premillennialism.

A missionary-minded postmillennialism strongly emphasizing Old Testament Law became prominent in Calvinist circles since the 1970s through the Christian Reconstruction movement, best rep-

Similar developments can be observed in German-speaking evangelical missions, for Philipp Jakob Spener, and August Hermann Francke, the founders of German Pietism and its growing missions movement, based their activities on postmillennial ideas. All of Spener's works, including his major work Pia desideria (pious wishes) are characterized by expectations of a better future. He radically rejected the pietistic orthodox Lutheran interpretation of history including the expectation of Christ's immediate return. Postmillennialism maintained its dominant position in German Pietism until Johann Albrcht Bengel began to combine premillennialism with postmillennialism by teaching the idea of two millennia. His pupils then completely rejected postmillennialism in favor of premillennialism and taught that missions should not be carried out until the millennium (for example, Johann Tobias Beck [1804–71]). Many state church mission societies, such as the Basel Mission (Theodor Oehler and Hermann Gundert, for example) continued to think in a postmillennial context.

Postmodernism. A way of perceiving and explaining reality shared by thinkers in philosophy of language and science, sociology, the arts, architecture, management theory, and theology that arose in the West during the last half of the twentieth century in reaction to Modernity. At its most basic, postmodernism involves the realization of the ultimate bankruptcy of modern and premodern approaches to life.

Challenges to Modernity. Postmodernity's critique of modernity includes the issues of individualism, rationalism, scientific positivism, and technology. First, postmodernity has been critical of modernity's love for the autonomous individual. A more collective perspective is especially clear in postmodern philosophy of science, in which changes in scientific theory, called paradigm shifts, are seen as part of a corporate process in the discovery and use of new data.

Second, the modern myth of the autonomous individual elevated rationality to a point of near infallibility. One of postmodernism's strongest projects has been to call into question the modernist dependence on rationality by reconsidering the basic assumptions sustaining modernity's concept of rationality (and therefore of Truth). Postmodern philosophers and sociologists have pointed out that knowledge is in part socially constructed and draws from the whole person, not only from rational argument.

Third, at the heart of modernity lies a perspective of the world that reduces reality and truth to that which can be seen, tested, and verified through the inductive method of scientific materialism. Postmodernism has asked soul-searching questions about the assumptions of scientific positivism, demonstrating that such a scientific method tends to see only what it is looking for. Postmoderns want to assign equal validity to other sources of knowledge like experience, the emotions, the forces of social and personal psychology, and the spirit world.

Fourth, postmodernity has been rethinking the matter of technology. Clearly one of the most amazing and almost self-justifying aspects of modernity is the technological revolution it has produced. But modernists have been slow to reflect and evaluate the impact that technology has had on matters of value and belief. The reality of today's world has called the entire legitimating myth of technology into question. A threatened planet, the incurability of the AIDS epidemic, the use of technology in waging wars, and a deep fear of the cities that technology has produced are just a few examples of the reality that has stimulated a profound pessimism on the part of postmoderns with regard to technology.

Dangers. Postmodernism has helped us reexamine the world in which we live. Much of the world is simultaneously premodern, modern, and postmodern. Within two generations, societies like those in Korea, Malaysia, Indonesia, and Kenya have made significant progress in moving from being predominantly agricultural and rural to becoming industrial and now service-oriented. The postmodern critique offers us new vistas to understand how we may evangelize the peoples of the world, including those living in the West.

At the same time, evangelical missiologists must be aware of the dangers that postmodernity represents. Postmodernism advocates a degree of valuelessness and atomization of persons which is antithetical to the gospel. This relates not only to postmodernism's antifoundationalism, but also offers no solid footing on which to stand in seeking to transform a lost and hurting world so loved by God. Second, evangelical missiology must beware of postmodernism's elevation of relativism as the only acceptable alternative to rationality. The loss of any concept of truth undermines the message of the gospel and is unacceptable for evangelical missiology. Third, evangelical missiology needs to be careful with postmodernity's rejection of any referential use of language. Linguistically, postmodernity discards any sense that language refers to something beyond itself and affirms that language itself creates meaning. This leads to meaninglessness and ultimately to silence, since we are left with each person's exclamations of opinion. Such a direction is contrary to Christian notions of empathy and understanding. It represents a loss of commitment to truth and to the welfare of other persons, since all opinions are now just individual pronouncements of the person's own viewpoint. Fourth, postmodernity's rejection of concepts of purpose leaves little room for an evangelical to take seriously the metanarrative of the story of God's mission that is moving toward a final destiny. Instead, postmodernity creates a troubling paralysis that leaves Christians unable to participate actively in God's mission in the future.

Possible Contributions. In spite of the dangers, there are ways in which postmodernity can help us. First, postmodernity is helping us see that mission into the next century will be global and local rather than national and denominational. This is already evident in the rise of the mega-churches which are now increasingly involved in world evangelization directly as congregations, rather than working through denominational or mission structures. Second, postmodernity has reminded us that a biblical gospel is wholistic: the Holy Spirit comes to transform all of life and all relationships (see Holism, Biblical). The church of the future needs to see itself as basically composed of relational networks of persons and groups rather than hierarchical organizations and structures. Third, postmodernity has offered us a new way to affirm that the church of Jesus Christ is a corporate body, not a gathering of isolated, autonomous individuals. Last, postmodernity has offered the church a new way of understanding and responding to the world of the unseen. Postmodern churches are providing a more realistic assessment of reality that understands that the world we live in includes not only the physical and the seen but the unseen world of spirits, demons, ancestors, and spiritual forces (see Powers).

We are concerned about our non-Christian (and post-Christian) world that needs to know Jesus Christ as the only Way, the Truth, and the Life. We are called to respond to the nihilism, relativism, pluralism, and the loss of the concept of truth and sense of purpose that mark the foundationless character of postmodern society. We want to present an apology of the gospel as public truth and to do so in ways that a postmodern culture will be able to accept. We accept the challenge to be Christ's prophets who extend the word of hope in the midst of the hopelessness of a postmodern world.

Potter, Philip A. (1921– ). Dominican general secretary of the WCC and missionary to Haiti. After the 1930 hurricane destroyed Dominica’s economy he came, as a boy, to understand that God in Christ assumed the human lot (Phil. 2).

After training for the Methodist ministry he served five years as a missionary to largely illiterate poor in Haiti. Later, while on the staff of the Methodist Missionary Society in London, he was involved in the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL (IMC). He did graduate studies in London University.

As a student he was active in the Student Christian Movement (SCM), and addressed the WCC assemblies of 1948 and 1954. He joined the WCC Youth Department in 1954, became chairman of the World Student Christian Federation (WSCF) in 1960, and director of Division of World Mission and Evangelism (DWME) in 1967. As general secretary of the WCC (1972–84) his influence included a threefold thrust: the fundamental unity of witness and service, the correlation of faith and action, and the inseparability of personal spiritual life from action in the world.

His thinking was strongly colored by Paul Tillich’s and other modern theology. He defined salvation as liberation (from self-centeredness and self-assertion), both individual and corporate (structures, institutions), and conversion as “the realm of turning to each other in love as a result of being turned to the King” (the kingdom of God). The conversion from false gods to the true (cf. 1 Thess. 1:10), the objectivity of Christ’s atoning work, and the root sin of worshiping the creature instead of the Creator were not in view.

Power Encounter. The term “power encounter” was coined by Fuller missiologist ALAN TIPPETT to label an event commonly experienced by the peoples of the South Pacific as they converted to Christianity. Tippett noted that people usually had come to Christ in large groupings (“PEOPLE MOVEMENTS”) soon after a major confrontation that tested the power of their ancestral gods against that of the Christian God, resulting in an obvious victory for the latter. These encounters were reminiscent of the scriptural encounters between Moses and Pharaoh (Exod. 7–12) and between Elijah and the prophets of Baal (1 Kings 18).

South Pacific peoples were (and are) keenly aware of the presence, activity, and power of spirits. Their leaders were openly committed to the gods of their islands. They credited these gods with providing protection, food, fertility, and all other necessities of life for them. But they also lived in great fear of their anger and vengeance. To challenge the ancestral gods was unthinkable for most South Pacific peoples. Nevertheless, in turning to Christ, often after years of weighing the consequences, it was chiefs and priests, those who knew the gods and their power best, who chose to challenge them. In doing so, they wagered that the Christian God had greater power than their gods and cast themselves completely on him for protection from the revenge of their gods.

A typical power encounter would involve a priest or chief, speaking on behalf of his people, publicly denouncing their allegiance to their god(s) in the name of Jesus and challenging the god(s) to do something about it. When the god(s) could not respond, the victory belonged to Jesus and large numbers of the people usually converted. As Tippett noted, power-oriented people require power proof, not simply reasoning, if they are to be convinced.

The value and validity of an approach to evangelism that involves power confrontations is widely accepted today in missiological thinking and practice, since it is recognized that most of the peoples of the world are power-oriented. Current theorists, however, have expanded Tippett’s original concept to include healing and deliverance from demons as power encounters. They see Jesus’ ministry as including numerous such power encounters. These encounters are usually less spectacular than those Tippett described but, it is argued, qualify as genuine power encounters since they involve the pitting of the power of God to bring freedom against the power of Satan to keep people in bondage. Furthermore, such “signs and wonders” frequently result in the conversion of families and even larger groups who accept the healing or deliverance as demonstrating the presence and power of God. There is, however, some difference of opinion over whether such encounters should be planned or simply taken advantage of when they occur.

It is important to note that conversion through power encounter does not assure that the movement will be stable and enduring. Throughout the Scriptures we see that people can observe God’s mightiest demonstrations of power but soon go right back to the gods who were defeated. Thus it was both after Moses defeated Pharaoh and Elijah defeated the prophets of Baal. So it has been in many of the power events in the South Pacific and elsewhere. As always, the crucial dimension in conversion is what happens after the turning, whether people feed and grow in their new relationship with Jesus Christ or neglect it and let it die.

Power Ministries. Proactive involvement in power ministries has not been characteristic of evangelical missions until recently. Two mind-sets which have been widespread among traditional evangelicals, including evangelical missiologists, have made them very cautious about participating in ministries that call upon the Holy Spirit to manifest outwardly the kinds of power ministries prominent in the Gospels and Acts. (1) The first mind-set is the doctrine of cessationism, which postulates that certain gifts of the Holy Spirit which were in use by the apostles and first-century church leaders had been given to the church only until the New Testament canon had been completed at the end of the apostolic age, at which time they ceased and are no longer to be expected in the church. The power ministries being introduced into evangelical missiology today would be included, for the most part, in the list of gifts which are thought to have ceased, and therefore cessationists could not accept the validity of contemporary power ministries. (2) The second mind-set among traditional evangelicals is a worldview suffering from what missiologist Paul G. Hiebert called the Flaw of the Excluded Middle. The Western worldview, strongly influenced by scientific rationalism, has a difficult time comprehending just how the supernatural powers of the invisible world can and do affect daily life of human beings. The non-Western worldview deals with such powers on a daily basis, and therefore is much more in tune with assumptions made by Old Testament and New Testament writers than are many Westerners. Exceptions to this among Third World leaders are generally those who have been trained by Westerners in Western-oriented institutions.

Both of these mind-sets were seriously challenged by evangelical leaders over the final two decades of the twentieth century. As a result cessationism has weakened in popularity. The major work reflecting this is Jack Deere’s Surprised by the Power of the Spirit (1993). Changes in Western worldview are taking place more slowly except in circles influenced by the charismatic movement, by the New Apostolic Reformation, by missiologists, and by the New Age. The book which has been influential in helping evangelicals think through the paradigm shift is Charles H. Kraft's Christianity with Power: Your World View and Your Experience of the Supernatural (1989). A consequence of this is that evangelical mission leaders, although not in one accord, are much more open to power ministries as a component of mission strategies than they have been in the past. Of the many facets of power ministries now being advocated and used by evangelical missionaries, six may be noted as areas of particular significance.

Supernatural Signs and Wonders. Jesus sent his disciples out to preach the gospel of the kingdom of God accompanied by healing the sick, casting out demons, and raising the dead. He told them that, by the power of the Holy Spirit, they could expect to do even greater works than he did. In the framework of Third Wave thinking, John Wimber's Power Evangelism (1993) has been very influential in this area.

Prophecy. A frequent experience of the apostles was to hear God speaking direct words to them for instruction or admonition or comfort. The gift of prophecy is mentioned in the lists of spiritual gifts in Romans 12 and 1 Corinthians 12. Recently, beginning particularly in the 1980s, many evangelicals have begun to accept not only the gift of prophecy, but also the contemporary office of prophet. Two works have been particularly helpful in moving evangelicals out of the assumption that God does not exhibit any revelatory activity today, namely, Wayne Grudem's The Gift of Prophecy in the New Testament and Today (1988) and Jack Deere's Surprised by the Voice of God (1996).

Strategic-Level Spiritual Warfare. Taking seriously the biblical assertion that a major obstacle to world evangelization is the fact that Satan, the god of this age, has blinded the minds of unbelievers (see 2 Cor. 4:3-4), a number of evangelicals have argued that he does this by means of dispatching high-ranking demonic beings, sometimes referred to as Territorial Spirits, to keep cities, nations, people groups, religious blocs, and other social networks in spiritual darkness. They attempt to follow the lead of the apostle Paul, who asserts that we do not wrestle against flesh and blood but against principalities and powers of darkness (Eph. 6:12). Under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, they use the weapons of Spiritual Warfare, principally intercession, to neutralize these powers to the greatest extent possible in order to prepare the way for the harvesters who are the missionaries, the church planters, the pastors, and the evangelists. The major apologetic for strategic-level spiritual warfare is C. Peter Wagner's Confronting the Powers (1996), while the contrary position is expounded in Clinton Arnold's 3 Crucial Questions about Spiritual Warfare (1997) (see also POWERS, The) and Chuck Lowe's Territorial Spirits and World Evangelization (1998).

Spiritual Mapping. Prayer directed against the forces of the invisible world is seen to be more powerful if it is accurately targeted. The assumption is that the more we can discover about the devices of Satan (see 2 Cor. 2:11), the more vulnerable he and his forces become, and the less he will take advantage of us. Spiritual mapping is said to be to the intercessor what X-rays are to the surgeon. One of the leading figures in advocating spiritual mapping is George Otis Jr., whose principal works are The Last of the Giants (1991) and The Twilight Labyrinth (1997).

Identificational Repentance. Corporate repentance has been recognized as a principal weapon of spiritual warfare. The enemy frequently keeps people blinded to the gospel because unremitting corporate sins, both past and present, provide what is the equivalent of a legal right for the powers of darkness to afflict whole populations. Present generations can identify with and repent for corporate sins of their ancestors, removing the legal right of the enemy and opening the way for the healing of national wounds, and for the expansion of God's kingdom. The chief textbook describing this principle is John Dawson's Healing America's Wounds (1994).

Prayer Evangelism. While prayer has always played a role in the process of evangelization, some have felt that the potential power of prayer as a proactive evangelistic tool has been underutilized. The major work arguing that prayer can be used as an evangelistic methodology, rather than simply as a back up to other methodologies, is Ed Silvoso's That None Should Perish (1994).

Power, Theology of. The power of God is a major theme of Scripture. Two central Old Testament metaphors graphically depict this power. First, God is the Creator who made from nothing what is. From the beginning of the world God is seen ruling over his creation by right of being its Creator: Humans, because they are made by God, should consider themselves to be “sheep of his pasture” (Ps. 100:3). Second, God is the liberator of covenant people elected to be in relationship to him. The Jewish confessional declares God’s mighty acts of deliverance: “We cried out to the Lord, the God of our fathers, and the Lord heard our voice and saw our misery, toil and oppression. So the Lord brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm, with great terror and with miraculous signs and wonders” (Deut. 26:7-8).

In both of these metaphors the power of God is not conveyed indiscriminately but in relationship.
Genesis 3 describes God the Creator searching for fallen humanity, calling, “Where are you?” This searching reveals the nature of God. He seeks to reestablish an intimate relationship between himself and his creation rather than merely exercise his power to punish. God’s deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt was covenant deliverance: God delivered from oppression those with whom he had developed a relationship (Exod. 3:23–24). Based on this relationship (Exod. 20:1), God called Israel into an exclusive relationship with him (Exod. 20:2–7). Throughout the Old Testament God is contrasted to the gods of the nations by the use of rhetorical questions demonstrating his incomparability. Moses, for example, praised God, asking, “What god is there in heaven or on earth who can do the deeds mighty works you do?” (Deut. 3:24; cf. Ps. 77:13; 89:6).

In the New Testament God’s power became incarnate in the person of Jesus Christ. His birth was by the power of God through the Holy Spirit so that he might be called “the Son of God” (Luke 1:35). As God’s Son, Christ manifested “the power of the Spirit” in his ministry (Luke 4:14, 18, 36). The metaphors of creation and liberation can also be used to describe the power of God in Christ’s life. As re-creator, Christ came “to seek and to save what was lost” (Luke 19:10). Sin separated humanity from God, but God in Christ has re-created those who believe to become new. As deliverer, Christ came “to destroy the devil’s work” (1 John 3:8), to free those demonically oppressed and possessed. Christ was appointed “with the Holy Spirit and power” to heal “all who were under the power of the devil, because God was with him” (Acts 10:38). Finally, by his resurrection Christ is declared to be God’s Son (Rom. 1:4) and has been exalted to God’s right hand, where he stands above all principalities and powers (Eph. 1:18–23).

God’s ministry in Christ was not an indiscriminate demonstration of power for the sake of power but rather power operating in divine relationship and through divine intention. Blind Bartimaeus, although chastised by the multitudes, continued to cry out in faith, “Son of David, have mercy on me!” (Mark 10:46–52). The Roman centurion demonstrated a remarkable faith in the power of Jesus to heal from a distance (Matt. 8:5–13). The father of the young boy possessed of an evil spirit responded to Jesus’ statement that “Everything is possible for him who believes” by saying, “I do believe; help me overcome my unbelief!” (Mark 9:22–24). These works of power thus “presuppose faith both in him who does the work and in those on whose behalf they are done, so that a personal relationship is demanded” (Grundmann, 1985, 189).

Since the FALL OF HUMANKIND, God’s rule has been challenged by SATAN. Satan, an angelic being cast down from heaven because of rebellion (Rev. 12:9; Van Rheenen, 1990, 264–66), created a dominion which stands in opposition to the KINGDOM OF GOD. The gods of the Old Testament, demons of the Gospels, and principalities and powers of Pauline literature are various terminologies describing the forces of Satan (see also POWERS, THE). Although described by these various terms, they all reflect the forces of the devil, who “has been sinning from the beginning” (1 John 3:8). Humans were created free to choose either the dominion of Satan or the kingdom of God (Gen. 2:16; 3:1–5).

Sometimes God’s power is not apparent in a world largely controlled by Satan (1 John 5:19). Followers of God ask, “Why do you hide your face?” (Ps. 44) or “God, my Rock, why have you forgotten me?” (Ps. 42). Christians, participating in the sufferings of Christ (1 Peter 4:13), cry out in anguish, pleading for God to intervene (Rev. 6:9–11). During these times of suffering, Christians stand in faith, acknowledging God’s ultimate sovereignty.

Not only is God’s power quantitatively greater than Satan’s, the quality is also different. Satan’s power is debasing—contorting the disobedient who follow the cravings of their own sinful nature (Eph. 2:3). God’s power, based on his great love, raises believers above these earthly cravings into heavenly realms (Eph. 2:4–6). Paul’s prayer in Ephesians 3:14–21 interweaves God’s power with his great love. Arnold writes, “Christ . . . roots and establishes the believer in his own love and strengthens the believer to follow the pattern of that love (3:16–17).” He succinctly contrasts Christian perspectives of power and love with pagan Ephesian perspectives: “In magic, many of the recipes and spells were used for the purpose of gaining advantage over people—winning a chariot race, attracting a lover, winning at dice, etc. God’s power enables the believer to love after the pattern of Christ. The seemingly impossible demands of this kind of love require divine enablement in order for them to be fulfilled” (1989, 100).

Humans frequently misuse the power of God and contort it for their own selfish, egocentric purposes. The Willowbank Report says, “Power in human hands is always dangerous. We have to mind the recurring theme of Paul’s two letters to the Corinthians—that God’s power, seen in the cross of Christ, operates through human weakness (e.g., 1 Cor. 1:18–2:5; 2 Cor. 4:7; 12:9, 10). Worldly people worship power; Christians who have it know its perils” (Stott and Coote, 1980, 327). The power of God must never be used to give glory to human personalities or human institutions. Ultimate power is of God, and its use in defeating Satan must only give glory to God.

There is always significant distortion of the Christian message when Christianity is reduced to power. God’s power must always be seen in a broad eschatological framework: God, who has already defeated Satan through the death and resurrection of Christ, will consummate his work at the end of time. Currently believers stand between the times: Christ, who has come, will return at the end of time.
Power, Theology of

These theological perspectives on power should guide Christians to understand both Prayer and Spiritual Warfare. Prayer should never be understood primarily in terms of power but rather as relating to God who is the source of all power. The difference between the two is significant. If prayer is understood as power, Christians will readily seek power words or rituals rather than personally relating to a sovereign God and waiting for him to act in his own time. Likewise, these understandings help us comprehend the nature of spiritual warfare. Spiritual warfare is not about fighting Satan; he has been defeated by the triumphal resurrection of Jesus Christ. Spiritual warfare rather is standing firm in Christ’s mighty power. It is accepting God’s victory through Christ by faith and allowing God’s redemptive power to work through Christ.

Powers, The. Given the reality of Territorial Spirits and their hostility to the gospel and to the people of God, some missiologists have been calling the church to take a direct and aggressive stance toward these supernatural powers. New strategies have been devised involving practices such as “spiritual mapping” (discerning the spirit powers) and “warfare prayer” to enable evangelists and Christian leaders to nullify the influence of territorial spirits and thereby enhance the receptivity of a people to the gospel. Many have wondered, however, whether these new practices are biblically rooted and, more importantly, whether believers have the authority to engage territorial spirits.

Since the mid-1980s numerous stories of Christians effectively battling territorial spirits have surfaced from all over the world, including the United States, Argentina, Korea, Japan, Canada, and elsewhere. More than anywhere else, Argentina became the focal point for the implementation of a strategy involving a direct attack against territorial rulers. Some evangelists and pastors in that country exercised authority in Jesus’ name to cast out or bind the spirits over certain cities. According to the practitioners, the results have been dramatic. Once the territorial ruler has been identified and cast down, massive outpourings of people converting to the gospel have followed and churches have grown exponentially.

Following the 1989 Lausanne Congress II in Manila, an international group was formed to share and discuss ideas about battling the powers in the context of world mission. The “Spiritual Warfare Network” (SWN) has met annually under the leadership of C. Peter Wagner, professor in the School of World Mission at Fuller Theological Seminary. The group officially became part of the prayer track of the AD 2000 and Beyond Movement. Wagner compiled many of the new insights and went public with a strategy for engaging high-ranking powers over cities and territories—a strategy he called “Strategic Level Spiritual Warfare” (SLSW). Wagner’s numerous books on the issue have attracted significant attention as he has essentially become the principal spokesperson for SLSW.

At the heart of the new strategy is a threefold emphasis on (1) discerning the territorial spirits assigned to a city, (2) dealing with the corporate sin of a city or area, and (3) engaging in aggressive “warfare prayer” against the territorial spirits. “Spiritual mapping” is one method for discerning the territorial spirits. According to George Otis, Jr., the originator of the spiritual mapping concept, this task involves conducting an extensive spiritual analysis of a city or country especially focused on the religious history of the area. This information can provide specific clues for understanding the spiritual forces that are at work. This information is given to intercessors who can then pray with much more specificity and according to how the Spirit leads them.

Some advocates of SLSW have taken “spiritual mapping” much further and have sought information from pagan and occult contexts about spiritual forces. They have even understood mapping to be the attempt to uncover the demonic grids of power in a given city. This uncritical acceptance of information from occult or idolatrous contexts has led a number of critics to wonder whether some SLSW advocates are falling into a syncretistic form of Christian animism.

Since the mid-1990s, a strong emphasis in SLSW has been placed on the practice of “identificational repentance.” In fact, the Philosophy of Prayer statement for the United Prayer Track of the AD 2000 and Beyond Movement states, “no aspect of warfare prayer is more important than identificational repentance.” The assumption here is that corporate sin in a city or area has provided openings for high-ranking principalties and powers to establish spiritual strongholds. These must be dealt with through the corporate identification with the sins of a city and then confessing and repenting of these sins as a means of effecting reconciliation and thereby breaking Satan’s grip on the city. The strongest advocate of this approach has been John Dawson.
Some advocates of SLSW believe that by engaging in identificational repentance they can “remit” the sins of others. But there is no sense in which one Christian can apply the atoning and forgiving work of Jesus to another person who has not personally exercised faith in Christ. What these proponents often mean, however, is that the intergenerational curse resulting from the sins of the ancestors can be lifted by identifying oneself with those sins and confessing them. But once again, there is no scriptural evidence supporting the notion that believers can vicariously confess the sins of other people and remove God’s temporal penalty, or curse, on the corporate sin. Advocates of identificational repentance have also often inappropriately applied covenant promises given to the nation of Israel directly to contemporary nations and cities. Believers do not function in a priestly role between God and their nation in the sense that they bear a responsibility for confessing the sin of the unbelieving population to God. Their responsibility is to confess their own sins (perhaps even corporately) and proclaim a gospel that consists of the possibility for reconciliation between sinners and God.

The final aspect of battling territorial spirits—and perhaps the most controversial part—is the direct engagement with the territorial spirits. Some have called this “warfare prayer,” but it is not properly prayer since it is not directed to God. Many proponents of SLSW would contend that there is a stage in the battle where one needs to take authority in the name of Jesus and command the ruling spirit(s) to leave. They contend that just as Jesus himself commanded Satan to leave after his temptation with the words, “Away with you, Satan!” (Matt. 4:10), believers have the responsibility to come against him in the cities and regions of their ministry.

There are difficulties with this last aspect of the strategy. Jesus was not evicting Satan from Jerusalem with his remarks, he was simply telling Satan to leave his person. In fact, there is no example in the Bible of any leader discerning a territorial ruler and commanding it to leave its territory. Jesus did not throw down the ruling spirit over Galilee or Judea; Paul did not command the spirit over Corinth to “be gone” nor did he bind the territorial ruler over Rome. Perhaps most instructive is the fact that in the most informative Old Testament account about territorial spirits, Daniel was not engaging in any kind of warfare prayer against the heavenly powers (Dan. 10:13, 20, 21). He was involved in praying and fasting on behalf of the people of Israel and actually had no awareness of the angelic struggle in the spiritual realm until he was told after the fact by the interpreting angel.

Debate still continues over the propriety of SLSW, but the current consensus remains to be that God has not given believers the authority or responsibility to cast demons out of cities or territories. God himself will direct his angels to fight the battles against the high-ranking powers.

Practical Missiology. The practical contours of the missionary role and task require consideration of candidature and training: field, home, and family responsibilities; and the contextual realities encountered abroad.

Screening of mission applicants should secure the highest calibre of personnel possible and preempt the financial cost and trauma of sending out persons who are not suitable for a missionary vocation. The missionary call should be pivotal to every applicant’s testimony: a divine compulsion impelling the aspirant to communicate the reality of Jesus Christ across geographical and cultural frontiers. There should be a number of significant motives for mission service: a sense of obedience to God’s mandate, a spirit of humility and gratitude as the recipient of God’s grace, a zeal for Christ to be honored worldwide, an urgent desire to seize the particular moment in history, and a generous love for humankind. The applicant should meet the criteria of physical and mental health, evidencing an authentic spirituality, a mature personality, a flexible attitude, and a frontier spirit. Giftedness, previous theological training, and experience to match the assignment are other basic prerequisites. The goal of the selection process should be to confidently endorse the candidate as one who will meaningfully and effectively communicate the name and spirit of Christ in word, deed, and life in a cross-cultural environment.

Appointment to the field provides a poignant moment for the mission agency and local church both to promote the cause of world missions and to embrace prayerfully the departing missionary. This courier of the Good News is a gift from one church to another group of people and the missionary needs to recognize the importance of mediating and securing ongoing connection between the sending and receiving communities of faith.

On arrival, the missionary’s first task is bonding to the new culture as soon as possible. Acquisition of language and cultural skills will establish a sense of belonging and presence with the local people. Crossing the frontier of language,
Practical Missiology

Culture and worldview will generate excitement, apprehension, and the inevitable adjustment anxiety. Culture shock touches every missionary at some point or other and is easily identifiable when the sent one begins to lament the fact that the cultural signs and guidelines from back home do not fit this new landscape.

It is imperative that the mission agency prepare their candidate to recognize the different stages of cultural adjustment and how to cope with them. In the midst of the language learning ‘crisis’ and cultural adjustment that creates natural feelings of vulnerability and homesickness, simply knowing that the feelings are normal helps the one persevere with Christian dignity, fortitude, and grace.

On the field the missionary will face strenuous demands and continuous expectations. A disciplined regimen will nourish the individual’s spiritual life. A family altar should never be optional or discarded in the busyness of the day. Neglecting family for ministry is a travesty that God cannot endorse. The missionary home needs to be a haven of trust, love, humor, enrichment, and the spiritual life. A family altar should never be optional or discarded in the busyness of the day. Neglecting family for ministry is a travesty that God cannot endorse.

Furlough times for the missionary are often a mixed blessing. The onerous deputation schedule, the competing expectations of relatives, and the disruptive lifestyle leaves many looking forward to a return to the mission field. On a more positive note, the leave of absence from the field provides opportunities for rest, recreation, reflection, and refitting (updating educational and professional skills).

The Christian missionary of the third millennium will not be able to adopt a neutral stance or bracket out faith convictions from the contextual realities of his or her place of service. Attitudes to life are cardinal and the missionary journey requires an incarnational mission model that embraces compassion, servanthood, and the cross. Compassion prohibited both the Father and Son from noninvolvement and the bypassing of humankind. Jesus rolled up his sleeves and addressed the moral and social trouble spots of his day; the missionary is not exempt from walking the same path. Often the local context will provide an agenda for mission as the missionary addresses the spiritual and material plight in the area: endemic poverty caused by structural injustice and greed, corrupt political dispensations, rampant unemployment, competing truth claims of a secular and pluralistic society, and the anonymity and despair of the urban setting. The gospel’s task is to confront and change people and circumstances. The missionary stands at life’s cutting edge and must articulate clearly in word and deed the universality of God’s activity in the world and the particularity of God’s intervention in Jesus.

Servanthood requires diligence and hard work as it is inimical to human nature. The envoy for God comes with authority and conviction but must remember the divine enterprise of mission was birthed in servanthood and humility. Missionaries are guests in their new home and will have to contain the tendency toward cultural efficiency, aggression, and ecclesiastical colonialism. The local community makes the decisions, the missionary contributes when his or her advice is solicited. The national leaders shape their own churches in their image as they respond to the gospel. Identification with the local people presupposes self-denial on the part of the missionary that may at times require living with uncomfortable theological and ethical practices and symbols like polygamy and ancestral practices that contradict personal mores.

The cost of discipleship reminds every mission volunteer that martyrdom is a reality in an era where terrorism, violence, and explosive brutality stalk the mission field. The propagation of the gospel afar is not some romantic adventure and quest in God’s name but a provocative life-and-death struggle. The missionary must realize that the people who are to be won and saved always retain the possibility of crucifying the bearer of the good news.

David Bosch reminds both missionary and church of the pulsating eschatological dimensions that undergird modern missiology: Easter brought with it the dawn of the end time and the Missio Dei belongs to God—he retains the initiative, creates history, and guides it toward fulfillment. And we could add with wonderment and awe, ours is the privilege to be part of God’s redemptive plan.

David E. Crutchley

Praxis. Praxis is the outgrowth of a commitment to a dynamic hermeneutical methodology that interacts with the concrete historical reality on the one hand and the biblical text on the other. This dialectical process is foundational to respond adequately in an integral manner to the spiritual and physical needs of hurting people.

The motivation for such a contextual hermeneutic likely finds its roots in Aristotle’s distinction between pure contemplation and human action which, expressed in concrete terms, forms the intention to put theory into action. Later, praxis was discussed as one of the early themes of LIBERATION THEOLOGY by theologians such as GUSTAVO GUTIÉRREZ and JUAN LUIS SEGUNDO. These two theologians, and others, enlarged the theme along two significant lines. First, practice should correspond with integrity to God’s liberation of humankind. Fidelity to an interplay between theology and action provides the framework for Christian vocation. Second, praxis is rooted in efficacious love toward the poorest and most downtrodden. Praxis will unmask the unjust ideological basis for the existing social structures by promoting actions that are in accord with the authentic values of faith and theology. Thus liberation theology aimed to put praxis theology to the service of social transformation.

Theologians like Segundo candidly admit the debt that liberation theology and their perspective of praxis owes to Karl Marx. Most liberationists, however, shy away from the idea that they accepted wholesale use of Marxist categories. Still, the lurking presence of Marx in liberation theology frequently has caused evangelicals to understand this type of praxis as Marxism garbed in theological language. Several perceive unacceptable implications that generally accompany this process, including the poor being the initial and often the only point of involvement (see OPTION FOR THE POOR), and the use of SOCIAL SCIENCE analysis heavily influenced by Marxist categories. Evangelicals contend that insufficient emphasis has been placed upon the fallen nature of humankind. They may view the process as offering a situational hermeneutic that forces an application of the social context upon Scripture rather than seeking a theology produced by a reading of Scripture.

It is critical, then, to define carefully and precisely the way in which praxis may be used in evangelical theology. The underlying spiritual reality of a God who acts in human history provides a dynamic model which can and should be accepted as a legitimate point for theological reflection and basis for action on the part of evangelicals.

The purpose of praxis is to allow the Bible to speak to the ever-changing world in which action on behalf of others takes on concrete form. Further, the interplay between human action and theological reflection rooted in Scripture allows the Bible itself to stand as an authority over previous human-made interpretations of the Scripture and frees the Bible to shed fresh light on, and provide renewed motivation for, engaging in this dialectical process. Evangelicals can find a certain “praxis of faith” related to their social and personal conditions, a way of enacting or putting to work this faith experience nurtured by a constant reading of the Bible. Such faith is at the same time examined by the efficacy of what Christians do in everyday life. More specifically, praxis cannot be seen as mere pragmatic action, nor a praxis that evaluates individual action as it solely relates to personal morality and holiness. Praxis moves beyond this limited though invaluable personal action to reflect theologically upon, and relate to, economic and social structures that sustain unacceptable conditions as well. Theology and practice are mutually supported, tested and corrected by the other. A praxis theology recognizes the need for a more distinctive ethic where the message of the biblical text and the compulsion of the Spirit directs one to respond creatively to the context in whatever form that may take.

It is possible that evangelicals can find in this praxeological hermeneutical method a way to keep their theological reflection integrally tied to concrete human experience, to the meaning of Scripture, and to pastoral action. Praxis moves beyond a theoretical agenda to the very essence of theological ethics.

Prayer. Recently God has been awakening the church to the need for less talk about prayer and more actual prayer. Mission and denominational agencies have appointed full-time prayer coordinators whose sole job is to pray and organize prayer. Prayer and praise rallies have been held in urban centers around the world. Annual pilgrimages of praying through cities in the 10/40 Window have been organized, with millions participating. The practice of walking through a target area and praying as prompted by the Spirit (known as prayer-walking) is being developed. More controversially, some advocate the engagement of TERRITORIAL SPIRITS in what has been called strategic-level warfare prayer as a new key to world evangelization. As signs of greater emphasis on prayer, all these efforts are welcomed in the missionary work of the church. At the same time, they must be evaluated not simply on the basis of reported effectiveness, but on fidelity to the scriptural picture of the prayer life of the church.

True prayer begins with God. It is the Lord who invited his disciples to pray (Matt. 7:7–11). It is also a command of God that people pray continually (1 Thess. 5:17). Prayer is the primary means that God uses to accomplish his work. God places prayer burdens on the hearts of his people in order to prompt prayer; through which he works. Historian J. Edwin Orr, after decades of researching revivals around the world, concluded that they both began and were sustained in movements of prayer. The missionary's prayer is not limited to the revival itself; Jesus commanded us to pray for the very laborers to work the fields that were ripe for harvest (Matt. 9:36–38).

Every individual Christian and every local church lives under the command to be devoted to prayer (Col. 4:2). As missionaries pray to the Lord of the harvest, we open ourselves to any attitudinal or behavioral adjustment that God wants us to make. Confessing sin is one important aspect of prayer (Ps. 66:18; Prov. 21:13; 28:9; 1 Peter 3:7). Our humility before God underscores that the purpose of prayer is not ultimately to achieve our agenda but the accomplishment of God's purposes in a way that honors his name (James 4:2). His ultimate purpose is the gathering of those who worship him at least in part in response to the missionary prayers and through the missionary efforts of his church.

Jesus' life was characterized by prayer. He prayed before and after the significant events in his life. He prayed when he was overwhelmed with the needs of people. He prayed when his life was unusually busy. His prayer aimed toward the Father's glory (John 17:1, 5), emphasized in the honoring of God's name as the first petition of the Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:9). All of mission is to be driven by this supreme goal.

Characteristics of Prayer. Any activity that is stamped with God's full approval is to be motivated by love (1 Cor. 13:1). This will certainly include following Jesus' example by submitting our will to God's will (Matt. 26:39, 42, 44). It also involves imitating his fervency in prayer; and continually dealing with the anger and bitterness in our life and replacing it with forgiveness. This was taught by Christ in his instruction and by his example. It is for this reason that true prayer extends to our enemies (Matt. 5:44). This type of loving prayer is foundational to the mission of the church, for through it our enemies may be won to Christ.

Of particular importance for the missionary's personal prayer life is the fact that prayer was never intended to be a mechanical discipline. It is an expression of an abiding relationship and of a life of communion with God undergirded by a heart of faith. This faith is placed in the revealed character of God, whose omniscience (Matt. 6:7–8) and goodness (Matt. 7:9–11) enable us to pray with confident expectancy in God's ability to accomplish his missionary purposes. Prayer is to be continual (1 Thess. 5:18) and to pervade all of our missionary work. The trials the missionary faces are not to hinder prayer life but to be used of God to deepen it (Acts 16:25).

Prayer and missions are inextricably intertwined in the Book of Acts. Prayer preceded the Spirit setting aside Paul and Barnabas as missionary candidates (13:2–3) and the missionary journeys themselves. Elders in newly established churches were prayed for and committed to God. The missionary trial of saying good-bye to loved ones is aided by committing them to the care of God in prayer (20:32).

Dynamics of Prayer. Missionaries and mission agencies have emphasized prayer throughout church history. At the same time, however, there is always a temptation to talk about prayer and state that it is important but not to actually pray. Mission agencies can fall into the trap of planning, organizing, leading, and then remembering to pray. Such prayer is really only asking God's blessing on our human efforts rather than seeking to align our organizational identity and plans with his ongoing work in the world and his call in our lives.

On the personal level, God aids the missionary in sustaining our prayer life through the crises we face. True prayer is exemplified by an attitude of helplessness and faith. God uses culture shock, language learning difficulties, relational conflicts, spiritual warfare, lack of receptivity, and seemingly insurmountable obstacles to draw us to himself in prayer. He also has given us the Holy Spirit to motivate, guide, and empower our prayer. In times of weakness the Holy Spirit prays for us (Rom. 8:26–27).

God ordained that our prayer be persevering to accomplish his sovereign work (Luke 11:5–8; 18:1–8). God uses persevering prayer to purify his church, prepare it for his answers, develop the lives of his people, defeat spiritual enemies, and give to his church the answer—intimacy with himself. This is especially important for missionaries working where the response to the gospel is limited.

William D. Thrasher

Pre-evangelism. Many well-intentioned witnesses for Christ employ evangelistic strategies that assume every unbeliever is potentially ready to respond to the gospel upon first hearing. Such strategies encourage Christian witnesses to get right to the point to attempt to bring unbelievers, without delay, to repentance and faith in Christ, regardless of their background or lack of prior exposure to Christian truth.

In contrast to this direct approach, others prefer a more indirect style of evangelism, employing strategies that assume most unbelievers are initially not ready to respond meaningfully to the gospel. Proponents of the indirect approach are convinced that, in most instances, they need first to establish a relationship of trust with those to whom they are witnessing and to demonstrate their own credibility. They also argue that it generally takes time for unbelievers to become fully convinced that the gospel is true, relevant, and worth accepting, no matter what the cost. It is felt that unbelievers need first to process the new information they have received, to seek clarification, to abandon previously held views and presuppositions, and to weigh the potential ramifications of a decision to follow Christ. Otherwise, the new converts may make only a superficial, premature decision for Christ that fails to result in authentic conversion. Advocates of the indirect approach often characterize direct evangelism as a one-size-fits-all strategy that treats everyone essentially alike and thus fails to demonstrate appropriate respect for human dignity and individuality.

Over the past generation, James Engel had greater impact than any other person on evangelical thinking about the need for what is often called pre-evangelism. Elaborating on a model first advanced by Viggo Søgaard, Engel developed what has come to be known as the Engel Scale, which sees conversion as an often lengthy process, only one part of which is the actual moment of regeneration. As Engel notes, recipients of Christian witness frequently begin their spiritual journey from a point at which they lack even an awareness of the existence of a supreme being. Then, often quite gradually and tentatively, they begin to move from initial exposure to Christianity to a vague awareness of their own personal spiritual need. Eventually, they may begin to develop at least a measure of interest in the gospel, but it often takes time for them to become fully aware, first of its essential details, and then of its implications for them personally. Typically, it takes additional time for unbelievers to develop a fully positive attitude toward the gospel and to recognize that it is indeed capable of meeting their deepest felt needs. It is only after they reach this point that they are ready to make a meaningful decision to repent and place their faith in Jesus Christ.

The Engel Scale helps us to see, therefore, that we really need to adjust the content and focus of our witness to persons as they are along the conversion continuum. Instead of immediately urging someone to make a definite decision for Christ, it is often more appropriate first to employ a variety of pre-evangelistic techniques, helping him or her gradually to move along the scale to the point where he or she is fully ready to follow Christ.

Premillennialism

Predestination. See Divine Election.

Preferential Option for the Poor. See Option for the Poor.

Prejudice. See Ethnocentrism.

Premillennialism. Belief that Jesus Christ will return to earth in glory, ushering in a thousand-year reign of peace, after which a new heaven and earth will replace the old ones, as foretold in the Book of Revelation. The exact nature of events such as the battle between the forces of righteousness and the forces of Satan (the battle of Armageddon), the “rapture” of believers to meet Christ in the air, and the features of the millennial kingdom vary according to different interpretations of the Bible. Although various interpretations of the second coming have existed throughout church history, modern premillennialism emerged during the mid-1800s from British and American movements to interpret biblical prophecies literally.

While millennialism of different types has encouraged missionary activity, premillennialism became a hallmark of evangelical missions from the late nineteenth century on. Prominent American pastors, including A. B. Simpson, A. T. Pierson, A. J. Gordon, Dwight L. Moody, Martin Wells Knapp, and C. I. Scofield, concluded from their study of the Scriptures that preaching the gospel worldwide was vital preparation for Christ’s second coming. With the second coming believed imminent, believers felt compelled to evangelize non-believers, both to save all the souls they could before Christ’s return cut off opportunities for salvation, and to fulfill the conditions outlined for his return in Matthew 24:14, “And this gospel of the kingdom will be preached in all nations, and then the end will come.” Premillennial support for missions gained a wide audience through YMCA and Christian conventions, Bible studies, periodicals, and the best-selling book Jesus is Coming (1878) by Chicago businessman William E. Blackstone. Jesus is Coming sold over a million copies in forty-eight languages.

Premillennial thinking not only encouraged verbal proclamation in denominational missions like the Presbyterians and Baptists, but it caused the formation of numerous faith missions and independent agencies from the 1880s to the present. Premillennialists tended to focus their energies on evangelism rather than on teaching, medicine, or other aspects of Protestant missions. Non denominational faith missions such as the

AFRICA INLAND MISSION and the Central American Mission stressed cross-cultural evangelism among specific groups such as Jews, the unreached interiors of Africa and Asia, or nominal Catholic lands. When Pentecostalism emerged in the early twentieth century, its adherents also adopted premillennial motivations for missions. Early Pentecostals believed that the Holy Spirit had endowed the gifts of tongues to complete the task of world evangelization in preparation for the second coming. For example, the Azusa Street Revival (1906–13) under pastor William J. Seymour sent Pentecostal missionaries around the world (see PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENT).

During the twentieth century, premillennialism remained a powerful motivation for world evangelization. For example, the Oriental Missionary Society (see OMS INTERNATIONAL) under Charles and then Lettie Cowman stressed house-to-house evangelism of every villager in Japan, and later “Every Creature Crusades” in Latin America, hoping to proclaim the gospel to the entire world before Jesus’ return. CAMERON TOWNSEND, founder of the WYCLIFFE BIBLE TRANSLATORS, believed that translating the Bible into every language would help finish world evangelization and hasten the second coming. Founding student participants of the Urbana Missions Conventions (1946) sought to complete the GREAT COMMISSION in preparation for the second coming. Premillennial motivations for mission received worldwide recognition when in 1974 three thousand evangelical leaders adopted the Lausanne Covenant, which became a basic statement of faith for evangelical missions. The last article of the Lausanne Covenant states, “We believe that Jesus Christ will return personally and visibly, in power and glory, to consummate his salvation and his judgment. This promise of his coming is a further spur to our evangelism, for we remember his words that the Gospel must first be preached to all nations. We believe that the interim period between Christ’s ascension and return is to be filled with the mission of the people of God, who have no liberty to stop before the End” (see also LAUSANNE MOVEMENT).

As evangelicalism and Pentecostalism spread throughout the non-Western world, many indigenous Christians adopted premillennial motivations for missions, such as those expressed at the COMIBAM (Congreso Missionero Ibero Americano) missions conference of Latin American evangelicals in 1987. Just as in the late 1800s when many American evangelical Christians hoped to evangelize the world by the year 1900, an idea captured in the slogan “the evangelization of the world in this generation,” so also in the late 1900s evangelicals worldwide sought to complete the task of world evangelization by the year 2000. Under international leadership, the AD 2000 and Beyond Movement held a series of global consultations to encourage “A Church for Every People and the Gospel for Every Person by the Year 2000.” The idea of planting a church in every people group by the year 2000 carried premillennial overtones for many who believed that world evangelization was a prerequisite for the second coming.

Presbyterian Missions. The first Presbyterian missionaries from the United States went to Syria and Lebanon under the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in 1823. Others were appointed to India, Siam (Thailand), and Africa. In 1832 the Synod of Pittsburgh organized the Western Foreign Missionary Society and the following year sent a missionary to Liberia. In 1837 the General Assembly of the Old School Presbyterian Church (PCUSA) took over that society, forming its own board of foreign missions. At that time it had forty-four missionaries either overseas or under appointment. The United Presbyterian Church of North America (UPCNA), formed in 1858, soon began to send missionaries, especially to the Muslim world, and eventually sent more to that field than did any other Protestant denomination. The Southern Presbyterian Church (PCUS), having divided from the Northern Church in 1861, soon began its own work, sending missionaries first to China and then to Brazil. Among the countries where Presbyterians would have the greatest number of missionaries were China, India, Thailand, the Philippines, Korea, Japan, Brazil, Guatemala, Mexico, Ethiopia, Cameroon, the Congo (Zaire), Egypt, Sudan, Pakistan, and Lebanon.

The Presbyterian understanding of mission focused first of all on Evangelism and Church Planting, with a strong emphasis on the preparation of indigenous leadership. This was especially true in Korea, where the first national pastors were ordained twenty-two years after the arrival of the first missionary, and Brazil, where a seminary was established five years after the arrival of ASHBEW GREEN SIMONTON. The NEVIUS PLAN, which stressed the importance of an indigenous church from the beginning, would be a strong factor in the growth of the church in Korea, where today there are more Presbyterians than in any other country of the world.
Education was a second focus, seen as a means of preparing leadership for the church, evangelizing students, and aiding in the transformation of society (see also Educational Mission Work). Educational institutions from the primary through the university level were established in a number of countries. Yon Sei University in Seoul and McKenzie University in São Paulo are examples. Schools were important in most fields but especially in countries where there was little evangelistic success, especially the Middle East and Thailand. Some remained clearly Christian while others gradually became secularized.

A third focus was medical work, with clinics, hospitals, and eventually medical and nursing schools established. Medical Mission Work was effective in ministering to women, who usually had no access to medical care until women physicians and nurses arrived. The ministry to women was carried on in other ways. Often mission schools provided the only opportunities for girls to study; eventually females would be encouraged to study through the university level and enter professions, especially nursing and medicine. Presbyterian missions employed Bible women in evangelistic work, and they became another factor in raising the status of women. Their ministry was especially significant in the Middle East, Korea, and China. A number of separate women’s boards were established in the nineteenth century; these were absorbed into the male-dominated boards in the 1920s.

Presbyterian missionaries also established Agricultural Mission projects designed to raise the economic level of the rural poor. The best known was the Allahabad Institute, established by Sam Higgenbottom, India’s pioneer scientific agriculturist. At times missionaries clashed with colonial governments and commercial enterprises that exploited the indigenous peoples. This was especially true in the Congo, where the rubber companies and the Belgian government forced the people to work at a less than subsistence level to produce rubber and ivory. Presbyterian missionaries publicized the situation, leading to an international incident in which the missionaries were brought to trial and vindicated. This eventually resulted in some improvement of the conditions of the people.

Presbyterians had leadership roles in various cooperative movements. Robert E. Speer, the greatest of the Presbyterian mission leaders, and John Mackay, a secretary of the board of foreign missions of the PCUSA and later president of Princeton Seminary, were leaders in cooperative efforts including the International Missionary Council. Presbyterians encouraged church union in China, the Philippines, Thailand, and Japan. Presbyterian churches grew quite rapidly in some areas, notably Korea, Brazil, the Congo, and Guatemala. In other areas, for example, Japan, growth was slow.

Major changes came after World War II. In 1956 the PCUSA recommended the full integration of missions into the national churches within five years. In 1958 the PCUSA and the UPCNA merged to become the newly designated United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (UPCUSA) and formed a Commission on Ecumenical Mission and Relations. This resulted from a major shift in thinking: the relationship between the sending and the receiving church should be direct, instead of through the mission of the American church. While this aided in ending missionary Paternalism, it often left the missionaries, now integrated into national church structures, without clearly defined roles, and was a contributing factor in the decline of the number of missionaries.

The PCUS merged with the UPCUSA in 1983, becoming once again the PCUSA; their mission boards merged in 1988, becoming the Worldwide Ministries Division.

The missionary strength of the Presbyterians peaked around 1927, with 1,606 workers under appointment by the PCUSA, 553 by the PCUS, and several hundred more by the UPCNA. This number had fallen to 425, serving in 56 countries, in 1996. Several smaller Presbyterian denominations are also involved in mission. The most important of these is the Presbyterian Church in America, which divided from the PCUS in 1973. By 1995 it had approximately 450 missionaries serving in 53 countries.

Up to the middle of the twentieth century, American Presbyterians were leaders both instrumentally and numerically in the missionary movement. At the end of the century the PCUSA, with a serious decline in numbers, was searching to rediscover its role in world mission. It was the only mainline denomination to affirm support of the AD 2000 Movement, which sought to plant churches among every people group by the end of the century.

Presence Evangelism. We often think of evangelism as consisting entirely of words, as being exclusively the verbal communication of a message. Frequently, however, the Christian message will have its intended impact only if our verbal communication of the gospel is accompanied and enhanced by our good deeds. Information alone is typically insufficient to persuade people that the gospel is true; it matters to them who is transmitting the information. Before accepting the message as credible, they must first be convinced of the credibility of the messenger. As Marshall McLuhan put it in the 1960s, in many respects the medium is the message. Christian presence, therefore, must accompany Christian proclamation.

In New Testament times, presence and proclamation typically functioned together to bring people to faith in Christ. As Jesus proclaimed the Kingdom of God, he “went around doing good” (Acts 10:38). The believers in Jerusalem sold their possessions in order that they might share with all who were in need; as a result, they “enjoyed the favor of all the people,” and “the Lord added to their number daily those who were being saved” (Acts 2:45, 47). The apostle Peter counseled believers to live such good lives that, after seeing their good deeds, pagans would glorify God (1 Peter 2:12). New Testament evangelism, therefore, consisted not only of proclamation (kerygma), but also of fellowship (koinonia) and service (diakonia). And today, also, as Christians demonstrate love, unity, good works, and a commitment to justice, their witness becomes more convincing. The fruits of the gospel in the lives of Christians serve to authenticate the gospel. It is appropriate, therefore, that Christian missionary efforts have often included medical and educational components, as well as efforts to combat social injustice.

Presence alone, however, is insufficient. St. Francis of Assisi once said, “Preach the gospel at all times, and, if necessary, use words.” But if people are to experience salvation in Christ, they must be told the way of salvation; it is always necessary, at least eventually, for words to accompany our good deeds. During the early part of the twentieth century large numbers of mainline Protestant missionaries began to opt for presence alone, apart from proclamation, which they equated with sectarian proselytization. Many in conciliar circles today similarly advocate humanization without proclamation. In reaction against this unbalanced approach to mission, evangelicals sometimes swing to the opposite extreme, advocating proclamation without presence, and accusing those committed to social concern of succumbing to theological liberalism. A consensus is growing among evangelicals, however, that, to be balanced, mission must include both dimensions. Paragraph 5 of the 1974 Lausanne Covenant declares that “we should share [God’s] concern for justice and reconciliation throughout human society and for the liberation of [people] from every kind of oppression.” It goes on to argue that, rather than being mutually exclusive, social concern and evangelism are both part of our Christian duty. An official commentary on this paragraph of the Lausanne Covenant argues that social involvement is both a bridge to evangelism and the partner of evangelism. “They are like the two blades of a pair of scissors or the two wings of a bird.” Jesus’ words explained his work, and his works dramatized his words.

Gospel content, therefore, is most compellingly communicated within a context of credibility.

Priesthood of Believers. Common identity of all Christians as priestly members of the church of Jesus Christ. In 1 Peter 2:4–5 believers are referred to as a “holy priesthood” whose task it is to offer “spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ.” In virtue of their unity with Christ in his priestly ministry, all Christians are constituted priests (Rev. 1:5–6; 5:9–10). This is unlike the old covenant priesthood, in which a special priestly tribe was appointed to exercise a mediatorial ministry under the leadership of human high priests. Now, the new covenant priesthood is the privilege and responsibility of all the faithful under the headship of the one High Priest, Jesus Christ.

As a priesthood, believers are directed to offer various sacrifices, and each of these has important implications for the missionary enterprise: (1) The offering of oneself (Rom. 12:1) entails the sacrifice of all that one is and does: personal ambitions, life goals, and activities in surrender to God’s design. This sacrifice constitutes the foundational step of missionary endeavor as a radical commitment is undertaken to go anywhere and do anything that God should command. (2) The offering of a “sacrifice of praise” to God (Heb. 13:15; 1 Peter 2:9) involves both confession of the majesty, sovereignty, goodness, power, and excellency of God, and thanksgiving to God for his wondrous acts of creation, providence, and redemption. The Missionary Task reaches, prepares, and mobilizes new priests who are dedicated to the worship of God through Jesus Christ. (3) The ministry of intercession, paralleling the intercessory ministry of Jesus the High Priest (Heb. 7:24–25), involves believers in prayer for family and friends, for the church, for missionaries already laboring in the harvest, and for those who need to be reached for Christ. (4) The offering of service entails serving God and others through the faithful and responsible exercise of one’s vocation in society. Whatever the job may be to which God has called a believer (including the most mundane, everyday tasks), work should be seen as an opportunity to live out one’s priesthood in the world. In so doing, the believer is enabled to do good and share what he or
Primal Religions

Primal Religions. Primal religions are indigenous local traditional or tribal religions that are nonuniversal. They existed before the more widely practiced mainstream religious traditions such as Hinduism, Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam. They are also referred to as folk religions, though that term encompasses local varieties of syncretistic mainstream religions (e.g., folk Islam, folk Buddhism, or folk Christianity). Primal religions lack sacred scriptures and are passed orally from one generation to another. They deal with the pragmatic considerations of daily life.

Primal religions are one expression of the desires and deep longings people have for a relationship with a power, a spiritual being, or someone beyond themselves. In primal religions, all of life is religious and it is not possible to separate it into distinct parts. There is no distinction between the sacred and the secular. Often there is no word in the language for “religion” per se; rather there are sacred traditions. Primal religion often has a sacred lore or metaphysic related to the natural environment. For example, Nom is the word for God in Ham (also known Jaba), an ethnic group in Nigeria. Nom translates as “sun” or “creator of the sun” (as well as creator of all else). The Bajju, a neighboring group, use Kadza for God, a word that means “rain” or the “one of the rain,” “creator of the rain.”

Such religions display an incredible diversity. They are best described locally or regionally of like religious systems rather than generically of things characteristic of all of them. For example, the Australian aborigines speak of the dreaming or dreamtime, which draws together linear time and the mythical time of their totemic animal ancestors.

In sub-Saharan Africa among speakers of Benue-Congo languages, including all the Bantu languages, there is widespread belief in God as the creator, with lesser spirits who traditionally were prayed to as intermediaries between humans and God. It also includes belief in other spirits who inhabit parts of nature, such as trees, snakes, rocks, rivers, and certain areas. This intermediate level includes the ancestral spirits who are believed to dwell with the living, watching over them and giving blessings or curses to people. People venerate or respect them and pray to them, pour libations and offer sacrifices to them (see ancestral practices). People’s spirits live prior to birth and continue following death, with reincarnation purported to occur for many. These ancestral spirits appear from time to time as masquerades who speak to people and bless or punish people according to their deeds. Traditionally some groups, such as the Yoruba, believed in a pantheon of gods, while many others believed in one good god, the creator and sustainer of life.

The goodness of God in sub-Saharan Africa relates to a basic problem, namely, why people suffer misfortune, become ill, and die. The answer derives from their theology of God as being good. It deals with the widespread belief that individuals have an innate spiritual power that they can use to affect others in the supernatural realm, causing misfortunes, illnesses, and death. Evans-Pritchard, an early British social anthropologist, termed this explanatory system witchcraft. It is a system with its own internal logic. Use of spiritual power is a more accurate term, to distinguish it from Western definitions of witchcraft. There is a recognition both of the immediate cause (e.g., a person is hurt in an automobile accident) and an ultimate spiritual cause (e.g., someone is harming another in the spiritual realm). Diviners often use some form of divination to ascertain the spiritual cause of a problem (see divination, diviner).

The primal religion of Benue-Congo speakers contrasts with that of Nilotic language speakers, for whom the high god is of central importance with the ancestors and other spirits being insignificant. Speakers of Nilotic languages include the Maasai, Luo, Dinka, Nuer, and many others within the East African cattle complex of ethnic groups.

Most primal religions mark important times in the annual seasonal cycle, such as cultivating, planting, and harvesting (e.g., celebration of the first produce harvested). Religious rituals also mark rites of passage of individuals, such as birth, puberty, marriage, and death rituals. Other rites of passage are celebrated as well, depending on the culture. For example, in Kerala state in India there was the tali tying, an early marriage ceremony for a girl with a boy. He might or might not become her husband following puberty. In some cultures the first pregnancy was marked with religious celebrations (see Rituals and Ceremony).

If we were to look for commonalities among different primal religions, we can use analytic categories such as beliefs, rituals, symbols, sacrifices, prayers, taboos, and trances (altered states of consciousness). Whereas from a Western perspective beliefs are central, from the perspective of many who hold primal religions practices are central. These religions are more often danced out than believed. Beliefs must be implied and extracted from religious practices.

Today there are revitalization movements in many primal religions worldwide. Some of these movements have received impetus from outsiders who encourage a resurgence of belief and practice of primal religions.

When missionaries come into an area, they need to understand the local religious system. Failure to do so results in traditional religion answering one set of questions and Christianity answering another set. The local Christians feel it necessary to retain both the primal religion and Christianity to address these differing issues, and thus Christianity becomes an overlay on the traditional religion. If Christianity is to become truly relevant and transformative, it must address the same issues as the primal religion. This means the Christian missionary must understand the local primal religion and its means of dealing with specific issues, then together with local Christians search the Bible for a Christian perspective on those issues.

People who practice primal religions are often open to the gospel of Jesus Christ. Their pragmatic approach to life allows them to try whatever religious system might help them solve their daily problems. Further, some will see a more mainstream religion as helping them integrate into the system meeting practical needs, giving affirmation, and unconditional Christian love, 92 percent of the Christian ex-offenders do not return to crime. Currently, however, 80 percent of the Christian ex-offenders do not find a church. Without a church support system, the "born again" ex-offenders’ recidivism rate is 67 percent (compared to a normal 15% to 25%).

The estimated 15,000 volunteers in 1977 had increased substantially from 214 in 1977 to 1,200 in 1997, with some 30 of them serving nationwide.

The Impact of Prison Ministry. With over 100,000 active ministry volunteers evangelizing in jails and prisons, record numbers of inmates are making decisions to follow Jesus Christ. Yet the challenges are formidable, as there are over 1.5 million adults and 350,000 juveniles currently incarcerated.

Over 100,000 prisoners in the United States each year make a decision to follow Jesus Christ; 95 percent of them will be released within a three- to five-year period. When churches welcome these former inmates and help create a support system meeting practical needs, giving affirmation, and unconditional Christian love, 92 percent do not return to crime. Currently, however, 80 percent of the Christian ex-offenders do not find a church. Without a church support system, the "born again" ex-offenders’ recidivism rate is 67 percent (compared to a normal 15% to 25%).

Of the 1,200 small organizations who faithfully visit local facilities, roughly 450 have an organizational structure. These ministries can be seen to fit into four basic categories: evangelistic, chaplaincy, discipleship, and aftercare.

Evangelistic. Clearly leading the evangelism forefront is former professional football player and prison ministry evangelist, Bill Glass. On weekends, Bill Glass Ministries (BGM) enters prisons with an average of 300 evangelist volunteers accompanied by special guests that include champion athletes. BGM now holds monthly evangelistic events in some 180 institutions. Heading the evangelistic effort to incarcerated juveniles is Bunny Martin, a friend of Bill Glass and former team member. His organization RAY (Reaching America’s Youth) has focused efforts on the nearly 350,000 incarcerated juveniles in prisons and juvenile boot camps and detention centers nationwide.

Chaplaincy. Chaplains are essentially the “pastors” in prisons and are strategic in facilitating the presence of other ministries in institutions. They often serve as powerful witnesses for Christ among correction administrators and officers. Since 1961, Good News Jail and Prison Ministry has set the standard for professionalism in chaplaincy, and they currently have 116 chaplains in over 110 institutions across 25 states. The Federal Bureau of Prisons has approximately 70 chaplains with high professional and educational standards. Not all federal chaplains, however, are evangelical. Their numbers include chaplains of other faiths, as well as Roman Catholic priests.

Discipleship. The most significant discipleship ministry is Prison Fellowship, established in the early 1970s by former White House counsel, Charles Colson. Prison Fellowship presents seminars in prisons across American that help inmates in practical areas such as communication in marriage, life skills, and continuing education. Prison
Problem of Evil and Mission, The

Religious worldviews all sense the need to explain suffering and moral evil, although some give greater attention to this than others. There is no single problem of evil that applies to all religions; the reality of suffering, combined with other beliefs about the cosmos, the religious ultimate, and the human person, produce distinctive problems within the various traditions.

Evil in World Religions. Monotheistic religions such as Judaism, Christianity, and Islam place evil in a subordinate relationship to God, the righteous Creator of all that exists. The task then is to account for evil without making God directly responsible for it. Islam, for example, recognizes evil as the product of human moral failure. But whereas in Christianity evil is a problem because it is perceived to conflict with God's love and goodness, in Islam it is a problem because it seems to conflict with God's omnipotence. Thus the Qur'an and later Islamic theology stress that Allah is in control of all that occurs; in some sense, even suffering and evil come from him.

Religious traditions stemming from the Indian subcontinent (Hinduism, Buddhism, Jainism) look to karma as an explanation for present sufferings and evil. Living things are said to be continually being reborn. One's state in this life is determined by one's behavior and dispositions in previous existences, just as present actions will shape future lives. Karma, the impersonal principle that regulates such rebirths, is said to provide an explanation for the great disparity in our world—why some people suffer so much and others relatively little. On a popular level, dissatisfaction among Hindus and Buddhists with strictly philosophical explanations for suffering is reflected in the widespread belief in many demons, spirits, and gods who are responsible for our ills.

Common to the Hindu and Buddhist traditions is the view that evil and suffering are rooted in ignorance. This is related to an ontology that distinguishes between levels of reality and truth, ascribing evil and suffering to lower or penultimate levels. Thus in Advaita Vedanta Hinduism and Zen Buddhism suffering and evil are regarded as the result of introducing a false duality into an essentially nondualistic reality. "Evil" dissolves when dualistic categories are overcome. But this relativizes evil by making the good-evil distinction applicable only on a lower level of reality; ultimately there is no duality between good and evil.

Perhaps no religion concentrates so directly upon the experience of suffering as does Buddhism. Although suffering seems to be a universal and inescapable phenomenon, Buddhism claims that there is a way to eliminate it. Suffering is rooted in desire or craving, and by eliminating desire suffering is eradicated as well. In Buddhism there is no problem of reconciling evil with an all good and all powerful God, for there is no such God in Buddhism. Both the problem and its solution are offered in strictly naturalistic terms of cause and effect.

In Folk Religions worldwide evil is dealt with by invoking the realm of spirits, demons, ancestors, and gods—both as explanations for our problems and as powers for controlling evil and suffering.

The Problem of Evil in Christian Theism. The problem in Christian theism is to reconcile evil with the biblical picture of God as all good and all powerful: If God is perfectly good, he must want to abolish all evil. If he is limitlessly powerful, he must be able to abolish all evil. But evil exists. Therefore, either God is not perfectly good or he is not limitlessly powerful.
Problem of Evil and Mission, The

It is helpful here to distinguish several issues. The existential or pastoral problem of evil must be distinguished from strictly philosophical or theological problems. The pastoral problem is concerned with providing appropriate resources and support for one who is struggling with the reality of suffering or evil in his or her own experience.

The logical problem of evil maintains that there is an implicit contradiction among the following statements: (1) God is omniscient, omnipotent, and all good; (2) God exists; (3) God created the world; and (4) the world contains suffering and evil. If so, then orthodox Christian theism is falsified. But clearly the statements are not explicitly contradictory. The burden thus lies with the critic to provide missing premises which, when combined with the above, would produce clear contradiction.

Much more influential is the evidential problem of evil, which maintains that the mere presence of evil suffering, or the amount of evil in our world, while not logically inconsistent with the existence of God, nevertheless provides strong evidence against the existence of God. Some critics claim that the mere presence of any evil in our world counts against theism; others hold that the degree of evil, or the apparently gratuitous nature of evil, counts against Christianity.

One can respond to the evidential problem in various ways. Some theologians are content with demonstrating: (1) that evil is not logically incompatible with Christian theism; and (2) that belief in God is not implausible or unreasonable given the reality of evil. Others go beyond this to offer a theodicy, which attempts to show why God allows evil, offering an explanation for evil and suffering within Christian theism.

It is important to note that evil and suffering are phenomena every worldview—not simply Christian theism—must address. The viability of any worldview depends in part upon its ability to account for evil satisfactorily. Furthermore, in assessing the case for Christian theism, the problem of evil should not be treated in isolation. Evil is one of a large set of factors relevant to the question of God's existence. The reality of evil does provide negative evidence against theism, but this must be evaluated along with a variety of other factors providing positive evidence for God's existence.

Although the struggle with suffering is a recurring theme in Scripture (Job, Psalms, Habakkuk, Romans, 1 Peter, James), nowhere are we given a complete explanation concerning the origin of evil or why God chose to create a world in which such suffering would ensue. Scripture never denies the reality of evil or glosses over its horrible consequences. Yet God is righteous and is not the direct cause of evil. Ultimately, the origin of evil is hidden in God's sovereign will and the mystery of moral freedom.

Christian theologians have generally responded to the challenge of evil by emphasizing three themes. First, since the time of Augustine many have stressed that moral evil is due to the misuse of human free will. Evil and suffering are the result of sin, the abuse of freedom. Second, Christians hold that God permits evil for the sake of achieving a greater good. As Augustine put it, "God judged it better to bring good out of evil than to suffer no evil to exist." A world in which persons can make moral choices and mature spiritually, even if this results in significant evil and suffering, is better than a world without such freedom. Related to this is the "soul-making" theodicy, which emphasizes that God's purpose for his creatures is conformity to the image of Jesus Christ and that it is precisely an environment in which there are real moral choices and struggles with adversity that allows for such spiritual development.

Third, the heart of the gospel lies in the staggering claim that the power of evil has been broken in the incarnation, the cross, and the resurrection of Jesus Christ. The infinite and holy God has identified with evil humanity by becoming a man, suffering evil at the hands of sinful men, being put to death on the cross, and then demonstrating God's victorious power over evil through the resurrection of Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 15). The same power that raised Christ from the dead is available to believers today (Rom. 8:11).

The Problem of Evil and Missions. Central to Christian missions is leading others to Jesus Christ, the only one through whom there is victory over evil and suffering. It is only as persons are given new life in Christ and are liberated from the dominion of darkness and brought into the kingdom of God (Col. 1:13) that they can experience victory over evil. Evil is an enemy that already has been defeated at the cross (Col. 2:15), although for a limited time its influence continues.

The problem of evil is particularly acute today, after a century of unprecedented violence and suffering. Few criticisms of Christianity appear more frequently, or in as many diverse contexts, than the problem of evil. Secularists claim that evil falsifies Christianity. Hindus and Buddhists assert the superiority of their own traditions because of the alleged inability of Christianity to account for evil. A culturally sensitive apologetic that responds to the challenges presented by the problem of evil is essential to missions.

Proclamation Evangelism. Proclamation is at the very heart of New Testament evangelism. People need to be told the gospel. In the GREAT COMMISSION, Jesus sent his followers not only to be salt and light in the world, but to preach repentance and forgiveness of sins to all nations and to function as his verbal witnesses (Luke 24:47f.). And after asking, “How can [people] believe in the one of whom they have not heard? And how can they hear without someone preaching to them?” the apostle Paul replied that “faith comes from hearing the message, and the message is heard through the word of Christ” (Rom. 10:14, 17).

But what exactly is to be included in the message that we have been commissioned to proclaim? Paul preached that of first importance was the death of Christ for our sins, along with his burial and resurrection, as verified by his postresurrection appearances (1 Cor. 15:1ff.).

And how ought we to proclaim the gospel? Scripture makes it clear that there is no one best way to tell others about Christ. Rather, we need to look for the way that is best in each given situation. Jesus’ approach was unique in each of the twenty-eight different evangelistic encounters recorded in the Gospel of John. The apostle Paul, too, regularly tailored his approach to fit his audience, becoming “all things to all [people] so that by all possible means [he] might save some” (1 Cor. 9:22). There simply is no “one-size-fits-all” evangelistic strategy that is equally effective in every situation and with all kinds of people. Our proclamation needs to be personalized, contextualized, and keyed to people’s felt needs.

We often tend to associate proclamation especially with public preaching to large audiences. The New Testament, however, gives examples not only of mass evangelism, but also of small-group evangelism, household evangelism, and personal evangelism, each having its appropriate place. There are scores of additional methods and combinations of methods that we can utilize to proclaim the gospel, including the printed page, audio and video recordings, the MASS MEDIA, STORYTELLING, and drama. However, when deciding on a particular method or medium for the proclamation of the gospel, it is important that we assess its appropriateness for a given audience and its likely perceived credibility and degree of impact in a given context.

Much debate has taken place in recent years concerning the relative merits of confrontational versus relational evangelism (see also LIFESTYLE EVANGELISM). Research clearly indicates that unbelievers most often respond to the gospel within the context of a personal relationship with a Christian believer. The more impersonal and interpersonal the witness, the lower the rate of positive initial response and long-term followthrough. Actually, the function of an impersonal witness to the gospel tends often to be more pre-evangelistic than evangelistic; that is, seeds are planted which might only later bear fruit within the context of a more relational witnessing situation (see PRE-EVANGELISM).

Proclamation is frequently contrasted with two other approaches to evangelism: presence and persuasion. Evangelism is typically most effective when all three approaches are utilized consecutively. Before we ever open our mouths, it is often essential that we demonstrate by our lives and our good deeds what it means to be a Christian, establishing the credibility of both the message and the messenger. Then, having earned the right to be heard and having aroused people’s interest, we can begin to proclaim to them the gospel of Christ. However, proclamation alone is insufficient. We want not simply to communicate truth on a take-it-or-leave-it basis, but to persuade people to act upon the truth. We want not only to be faithful in proclaiming the message, but to be successful in actually making disciples. Using the terminology of DONALD MCGAVRAN, we want our witness to be based not just on a theology of search, but on a theology of harvest. And this is where persuasion comes in.

In 2 Corinthians 5:11 Paul wrote, “Since we know what it is to fear the Lord, we try to persuade [people].” Then later in the same chapter he wrote, “We implore you on Christ’s behalf: Be reconciled to God” (v. 20). We see in this passage that Paul accompanied his proclamation with passion. And we, too, need both to proclaim the gospel, so that people will hear and understand, and to engage in persuasion, so that people might actually believe and be converted.

We need to be careful, of course, that our persuasion does not become manipulation; that our pleading does not become coercion. We need always to respect the integrity of the person and not apply undue pressure in order to secure results at any cost. Also, although in our witness there is a place for emotion, we need to guard against allowing emotion to degenerate into shallow emotionalism, lest people make only superficial decisions for Christ, based strictly on the emotion of the moment, rather than on a deliberate, well-thought-out act of the will.

Profession of Faith

Profession of Faith. Public declaration of faith in someone or something. The word profession appears in the KJV as a translation for homologia (1 Tim. 6:12; Heb. 3:1; 4:14; 10:23). The term denotes “confession, by acknowledgment of the truth” (Vines). Hebrews 10:23 (KJV) provides the source for the phrase “profession of faith.” Here it indicates the truth that the church has held to and should continue to hold.

The phrase may also be used interchangeably with “confession of faith” or “statement of faith.” In this sense it is a concise written statement of belief. Therefore, to profess one’s faith may mean simply a public recital or declaration of the accepted creed of a church or body of believers.

God’s Word commands us to “hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering” (Heb. 10:14 KJV). The public declaration of faith should not be confused with a one-time event or regular recitation of a creed. Rather, it should be a continual demonstration unfolding from the life of the believer, and of the church.

This is important missiologically, because the contextualization of the gospel must consider what it looks like for a new believer in a specific context to publicly declare his or her faith. This will take on various forms, and may include public statements, demonstrations (baptism, walking to the altar), changed behavior; restitution, or charitable deeds. In whatever way it is expressed, it must not be limited in concept to a single event or a doctrinal statement, but must be evident in the daily life of the believer.

As a church, the faith we profess must be real and vibrant. The profession of our faith is the continual, personal, practical and public demonstration of our adherence to the unchanging truths found in the Word of God.

Prokhanov, Ivan Stepanovich (1869–1935). Russian evangelical church leader. Born into a family of Molokan (a Protestant denomination indigenous to Russia) believers who had recently moved to the Caucasus to avoid persecution, he was baptized in January 1887.

In 1888, he entered the St. Petersburg Institute of Technology to study mechanical engineering. Before graduating in 1893, he began to form his role as leader of the evangelical movement in Russia.

In 1889, he started clandestinely publishing and distributing Beseda (Symposium) to encourage Russian believers. This launched his prolific career in religious publishing, which included the periodicals Khristiantin (Christian) and Utrennia Zvezda (Morning Star), several hymnals (he wrote 614 hymns), and numerous other religious works.

He traveled to Europe to avoid exile and studied theology there from 1895 to 1898, but he was later arrested and imprisoned twice. In 1913, he formed a Bible School in St. Petersburg, but he is best known for his formation of the All-Russian Union of Evangelical Christians in 1910, which grew to over 30,000 members by 1923 and which later merged with the Baptists to form the All-Union Council of Evangelical Christians-Baptists in 1944. In 1928, Prokhanov heeded a warning from a kind government official and left the country never to return. He died having left behind a legacy that remains today.

Promotion of Mission. In the New Testament we do not see the kind of promotion of the missionary enterprise we find today. The command of Christ and the working of the Holy Spirit in the local congregation were enough to make a church send and support missionaries—at least in Antioch. Jerusalem, however, needed some proactive promotion.

The strongest sending bodies among twentieth-century American churches were born as mission sending agencies in the nineteenth century: the Christian and Missionary Alliance and the Southern Baptist Convention. It takes less than 200 CMAers to send out a missionary, for example, while it takes 1,800 evangelicals in general to send one missionary. Probably no more than 10 percent of evangelical congregations in North America have a strong missions promotion program, such as an annual Church Missions Conference. Given this track record, God seems to have raised up other means of promoting his purposes of world evangelism—parachurch organizations, mission sending agencies, conventions, student movements, Bible colleges, and, of late, “mobilizers.”

Of the hundreds of mission sending agencies, several have been so successful in recruiting that they dwarf the average denominational mission boards: Wycliffe Bible Translators (6,000+), Campus Crusade for Christ (15,000+), Youth With a Mission (7,000+), and Operation Mobilization (2,000+). All these are specialized: translation, campus, or short-term. Conventions in this century have been the catalysts for mission promotion, beginning with Edinburgh (1910), continuing through the triennial Urbana student conventions under InterVarsity Fellowship (1946 and following), advanced by the congresses initiated by Billy Graham (Berlin [1966] and Lau-
Prophetic and Identity Movements

Social renewal movements through which people seek identity in the midst of dislocation. While the distinction between the two terms is typically blurred, generally speaking those that are dominated by charismatic and visionary prophets or prophetesses are called prophetic movements. They typically are seen in regions of the world newly impacted by the forces of modernization or colonialism. In traditional societies, modern change agents provoke an unavoidable need for social, cultural, and religious readjustment. In these times of great upheaval, prophets often emerge who are able to reinterpret the sociocultural and religious order.

The great majority of prophetic movements has occurred in sub-Saharan Africa. Two of the continent’s best-known and most influential prophets were William Wade Harris of Liberia (1850–1929) and Simon Kimbangu of Congo (1889–1951). In 1910, Harris, in obedience to a vision, set off on a preaching tour that led him across coastal Côte d'Ivoire and Ghana. By 1914, an estimated 120,000 people had responded to his call to embrace the “one true and living God” by discarding fetishes and other religious traditions. The movement swelled the ranks of Methodist and Catholic missions alike, and spawned independent movements such as the Harrist Church and the Church of the Twelve Apostles. Kimbangu’s faith was nurtured in a British Baptist mission, but after a cataclysmic three months of public ministry in 1921 he had broken with some traditional ways, particularly those concerned with magic. (3) Rituals and symbols emerge that contain elements of both the traditional and modern religious systems. (4) The typical concerns of folk religions, such as healing, protection from evil powers, and divine guidance, are retained. (5) The movement promotes moral reform, spiritual renewal, and identity-recovery for a people undergoing profound cultural change, often with political ramifications. (6) A remarkable missionary zeal propels the movement across tribal and national boundaries.

Prophetic and Identity Movements

Some are clearly syncretistic and heretical, yet have moved significantly away from primal animism. Others could be labeled Hebraic by their ambivalence toward the New Testament gospel and their identity with the culture and prophetic themes of the Old Testament. Some, however, have emerged as independent Christian churches that confess the primacy of the Scriptures and the person of Jesus Christ. In the postcolonial age, church and mission leaders have increasingly voiced their conviction that the latter type of prophetic movements may indeed be culturally authentic expressions of the universal Church of Jesus Christ.

Proselytism. The term “proselyte” derives from a Greek word, proselutos, often translated as “one who comes over.” It is not a word from classical Greek, but is a Septuagintal term, being found who comes over.” It is not a word from classical Greek, but is a Septuagintal term, being found among the men, stopped short of the final commitment of conversion but dedicated themselves as much as possible to the Jewish faith and practice. The term “proselyte” came to be used in a more technical sense for such people.

In more common usage, however, the term came to mean someone who converted from any one faith to another. Proselytism became a general term for the propagation of one’s faith, and people and religions were referred to as proselytizing if they gave high priority to trying to persuade those of other faiths or ideologies to convert. In contemporary Judaism it is still used to describe non-Jews who convert to Judaism, and is employed without value judgments of any kind, although the Jewish people would not see themselves as a proselytizing community. In everyday Christian contexts, it has remained, more or less, a description of highly motivated, high-profile, and well organized Evangelism.

In the specific context of Christian missiology, however, the term has become one that is used in certain quarters to refer to unethical behavior in the attempt to persuade others. The first negative use of the word comes from post-Enlightenment eighteenth-century writers who associated it with those who, in their view, claimed to have a monopoly on truth. It was then associated with the type of person who aggressively tries to win converts to a cause or ideology (including religion). In the wake of the two World Wars of the twentieth century, and in particular since the 1960s, we have seen a further development of this use of the term in the writings of European and American theologians.

The documents of Vatican II include the following statement: “Proselytism is a corruption of Christian witness by appealing to hidden forms of coercion or by a style of propaganda unworthy of the gospel.” The World Council of Churches endorsed this same definition: “Proselytism embraces whatever violates the right of the human person, Christian or non-Christian, to be free from ... whatever ... does not conform to the ways God draws free men to himself.”

In other words, in spite of the ongoing assumption by most Christians that proselytism is simply a synonym for evangelism, albeit of a planned and organized nature, it is now being used in a more technical sense by certain missiologists and others to refer only to a specific type of “evangelism.” It refers to the abuse of people’s freedom and the distortion of the gospel of grace by means of coercion, deception, manipulation, and exploitation. This type of “recruitment of members” does go on in a number of cults and New Religious Movements, and so there is clearly a need for some term to describe such unacceptable behavior, but confusion has certainly been created by the use of this existing and well-established word.

Christians need to be alert to this issue of appropriate and inappropriate methods of sharing their faith with others, but they must also be aware of the agenda of those who wish to present the very desire to share one’s faith as unacceptable in principle. In particular, the church must resist the growing tendency in Western cultures to label all Christian evangelism as, by definition, an expression of the arrogance and insensitivity presupposed in this new understanding of proselytism.

A major task of missiology as we approach the twenty-first century is to facilitate a confident motivation to share the gospel that is scrupulously ethical in its every expression.

Walter Riggins

Providence of God. Christians everywhere confess, "And we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose" (Rom. 8:28). This simple conviction concerning God's sovereign control over us and our world reveals belief in what theologians have called the doctrine of God's providence.

The providence of God was long ago defined in the Westminster Shorter Catechism as "his most holy, wise and powerful preserving and governing all his creatures and all their actions." Scripture teaches that God is in sovereign control, yet not in an arbitrary or fatalistic way. His preservation and governing of all God's creatures is based on his unchanging nature of love, justice, wisdom and power (see Pss. 145:9, 17; 104:24; 103:19; 135:6; Rom. 11:36; Col. 1:16, 17). In his sovereign governing, God displaces neither the activity nor the responsibility of humans (see Acts 2:23; 1 Cor. 15:10; Gal. 6:7, 8; Phil. 2:12, 13). And though in control, he must never be conceived as the Author or Cause of evil (James 1:13, 14; 1 John 2:16), even though he may turn it for good (Gen. 50:20).

The truth of God's providential care over his children and world has strengthened missionaries through many trials. The following quotations (all from World Shapers) illustrate, in just three areas, how belief in God's providence has benefited missionaries.

Concerning Safety. "One cannot help feeling a deep, inward, peaceful consciousness that though we are absolutely shut off from every human help, yet we have protection more secure than any consuel can afford—the omnipotent arm of Jehovah" (Alexander Mackay, 1991, 76).

"Safety does not depend on our conception of the absence of danger. Safety is found in God's presence, in the center of His perfect will" (T. J Bach, 1991, 73).

"The safest place for yourself and the children is in the path of duty" (Jonathan戈福司, 1991, 73).

Concerning Mental Health. "The abiding consciousness of the presence and power of my Saviour preserved me from losing my reason... I had my nearest and dearest glimpses of the face and smile of my blessed Lord in those dread moments when musket, club, or spear was being leveled at my life" (John G. Paton, 1991, 71).

"If God be for us, who can be against us? We may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me (Ps. 118:). The effect of these words at such a time was remarkable... My soul seemed flooded with a great peace; all trace of panic vanished; and I felt God's presence was with us. Indeed, his presence was so real it could scarcely have been more so had we seen a visible form" (Rosland Goforth, 1991, 74).

Concerning Finances. "God's work done in God's way will never lack God's supplies" (J. Hudson Taylor, 1991, 74).

"Wants are things we think we need; necessities are things God knows we need. God will supply our needs, not our wants" (T. J Bach, 1991, 75).

"Financially, I have almost nothing to show for my 44 years of labor on behalf of the Indians. We own an automobile that you folks gave us two years ago, a home in the jungles of Peru, five hundred dollars in savings for the education of children and that's all. In the wealth of friendship, however, we are millionaires" (William Towsend, 1991, 76).

It is hard to conceive of the missionary enterprise, with all of its trials and victories, apart from a belief in God's providence. Knowing their sinfulness and weakness, together with the immeasurable opposition that confronts them, what missionary can long stand in the pathway of service without a firm conviction in the providence of God? Do missionaries ever despair? Yes. Why? One reason is that, like Peter, they take their eyes off of Christ, the reigning Lord to whom "all authority in heaven and on earth has been given" (Matt. 28:28; 14:22–33). They temporarily forget or doubt the wonderful truth of God's providential control. What can we do to help? First, pray that the work of Christian missions will be carried out with an unshakable faith in the providence of God. Then share with your missionary friends some verses from God's Word that will encourage them with the promises of God's constant love, support, and guidance (e.g., Prov. 3:5, 6; 16:9; 21:1; Dan. 4:34–37; 1 Cor. 10:13; Phil. 4:13; Heb. 13:5, 6; 1 Peter 1:6, 7).

Psychology. Mission agencies began utilizing the services of psychology in the late 1920s to assist with screening and Candidate Selection. It was nearly another forty years, however, before they began discovering additional uses for applied psychology. During the later 1960s through the mid-1980s, the missions-psychology interdisciplinary focus broadened to include such concerns as preparation for Culture Shock, training in personal and family Adjustment to the Field, training in Interpersonal Communication and Conflict Resolution, team development, crisis intervention in emergency situations, and personal and family counseling as needed (sometimes on the field, sometimes during home leave). This was the era in which a few psychologists began taking trips to various mission fields as short-term consultants, workshop leaders, and...
Psychology
counselors. It was also a time in which a few master's level counselors began to go to various fields as short-term or career missionaries.

The 1980s saw an increasing number of Christian psychologists become aware both of the potential contributions they could make to missions and of the fact that as believers they, too, were under the mandate of the Great Commission. There was also an increased awareness of new ways that psychologists could contribute to the work of missions. A major impetus to this awakening occurred in 1983 when two integrative journals Journal of Psychology and Theology (JPT) and Journal of Psychology and Christianity (JPC) each published an issue focusing entirely on psychology and missions. The JPT later produced two additional issues devoted to psychology and missions.

Another stimulus to the missions-psychology collaboration came by way of the three International Conferences on Missionary Kids (ICMK). The first was held in Manila in 1984, the second in Quito in 1987, and the third in Nairobi in 1989. These conferences were convened because of increasing interest in the uniqueness of the experience of Third Culture Kids (TCKs) and particularly the missionary kids (MKs; see Missionary Children). Missionary parents, mission personnel, school personnel, psychologists, and both adolescent and adult MKs came together to try to understand better both the blessings and the difficulties of being an MK/TCK and how to begin to address some of the difficulties.

From these conferences came an awareness of the need for research to try to answer important questions. Ten mission agencies linked up with six psychologists to form a research group: MKCART (MK Consultation and Resource Team). The missions prioritized the questions and the psychologists began the research. A major focus was on the boarding school experience, addressing questions such as the most important characteristics to seek in boarding school personnel to create healthy and positive experiences for the students.

Yet a third influence on the expansion of the psychology-missions alliance was the springing up of various interdisciplinary conferences such as the Mental Health and Missions Conference held each November since 1980 in Angola, Indiana. For the most part, such conferences have not been related to any specific organization but have simply been comprised of an informal network of mission leaders and mental health professionals who desire to interface with each other in order to stimulate each other, learn from each other, grow together, and work together to further the cause of missions.

Another influence in the growth of the missions-psychology alliance was the establishment of “care centers” to minister to bruised, broken, traumatized, or burned out missionaries—centers such as Link Care in Fresno, California, and Tuscarora Resource Center in Mount Bethel, Pennsylvania, where psychologists counseled missionaries in pain. As missionaries were restored to personal wholeness and effectiveness in ministry others took note, which resulted in greater openness on the part of missionaries and member care personnel to seek help when it was needed.

All of these influences worked together to bring about a rapid expansion of the missions-psychology interface in the 1980s and 1990s. Perhaps the greatest expansion took place in the area of member care (see Member Care in Missions). More missions began to place a higher priority on ministering to their missionaries’ psychological needs, seeing the relationship between psychological and spiritual well-being and the relationship between such well-being and missionary effectiveness. In nearly all mission agencies, the personnel departments began to become increasingly sensitive to the psychological well-being of missionaries, as evidenced by the focus of discussion taken at the annual IFMA/EFMA Personnel Conferences. A number of mission agencies began to form member care departments or create new positions, such as member care director, to oversee the overall wellness of their missionaries. A few missions created intra-agency counseling departments to help care for their missionaries. One of the biggest concerns facing those involved in member care has been finding ways to provide for the needs of missionaries pioneering among the least evangelized people groups, missionaries who are in places where few member care resources are available or even feasible.

In the late 1980s and the 1990s, the collaboration of missions and psychology took on some new challenges. A few doctoral-level psychologists became overseas career missionaries to develop programs to provide more fully for the emotional health of missionaries on the field. Other psychologists went overseas as missionaries to utilize their professional skills to point people in pain to the Wonderful Counselor. Yet others went abroad to help establish Christian schools of psychology to train Christian counselors to provide biblically and psychologically sound counseling for their compatriots. These last two missionary efforts have highlighted the need to understand Cross-Cultural Counseling and to help national believers develop counseling models that adequately reflect their culture while remaining thoroughly biblical. This challenge is especially great in non-Western cultures.

Another challenge in the international expansion of the missions-psychology partnership is working with the newer sending countries to incorporate member care into their mission practices. Helping multinational teams work together in a healthy and effective manner also remains a major endeavor. As they move into the twenty-first century, missions and psychology continue to inform each other in facing the challenges of the internationalization of their alliance.

Psychology of Religion. Psychologists have been studying various dimensions of religious commitment for more than a century. Those with a vision for promoting the practice of evangelism and discipleship in every culture of the world might find it helpful to reflect on the growing consensus of thought emerging in the field about a number of relevant topics. As Paloutzian (1996, 2) has noted, a “small glance at the prevalence, scope, and effects of religion reveals how sweeping are its influences and how important it is to learn what psychological research has to say about it.”

Definition. Broadly defined as the study of religious beliefs and behaviors from a social science perspective (Hood, Spilka, Hunsberger, and Gorsuch, 1996), the field raises many important questions that should especially interest those committed to the task of making Jesus Christ known, loved, and believed throughout the world. These include: (a) how do people differ in the ways in which they are religious? (b) what factors appear to facilitate the development of religion across the life span? (c) how can we best understand the process of religious conversion? and (d) how might religion relate to health and well-being? (see Malony, 1995).

Although the bulk of the empirical research in the psychology of religion has been limited to the broad Judeo-Christian tradition, scholars have differed widely in how they conceptualize or study religious beliefs and behaviors. Some have chosen to focus primarily on religion at the personal level (how an individual finds a sense of wholeness or completeness in life). Others prefer to study religion at the social or societal levels of analysis (the collective beliefs and practices of a group). Generally speaking, scholars tend to emphasize religious function (individual or group processes) rather than religious substance (individual beliefs or doctrinal statements). Further, researchers and theoreticians tend to emphasize one or more of the dimensions of religious commitment in their endeavors: (a) religious belief (ideological); (b) religious practice (ritualistic); (c) religious feeling (experiential); (d) religious knowledge (intellectual); and (e) religious effects (consequential). Unfortunately there is no widely agreed-upon definition of religion, nor is there widespread consensus on the best study approach (see Paloutzian, 1996 or Wulff, 1997 for helpful discussions).

Religious Orientation. Those who are deeply involved and invested in Christian ministry recognize that people have different expressive styles in their faith. Perhaps one of the most enduring distinctions in the field is between those individuals who appear to live their faith (truly informed and consistent believers), and those who seem to use it (belief and effects of religion in practical life are widely inconsistent). For decades, researchers have been comparing and contrasting intrinsic (committed) and extrinsic (consensual) religious orientations, especially as they relate to morally relevant attitudes and behaviors (see Kauffmann, 1991 or Clouse, 1993).

There is little debate now whether religious variables can be good (even powerful) predictors for some important human behaviors, including altruism, cognitive complexity, dogmatism, prejudice, and subjective experience (Hood, Spilka, Hunsberger, and Gorsuch, 1996). Numerous complex and highly sophisticated scales are now available that measure important dimensions of religious orientation or styles of faith (see Malony, 1995 for useful examples).

In light of the available evidence, it no longer seems helpful to merely state that someone is a Christian unless a concerted effort is made to clarify the precise manner in which that individual internalizes (incorporates) specific Christian beliefs and behaviors. Obviously, this can be a complex and even daunting challenge. As Malony (1995) has clearly demonstrated, it is certainly possible to show ways in which such diverse variables as age, gender, personality, and race can all significantly impact religious beliefs and behaviors without being condescending, patronizing, or reductionistic. Coupled with anthropological insights for missionaries (Hiebert, 1986) or overseas workers (Kohls, 1984), these useful social science findings have important implications for effective and sustained ministry.

Religious Development. Certain religious beliefs and behaviors appear to change considerably in the course of a person’s life span. For example, the religion of children often develops from the vague to the concrete to the abstract, often following almost predictable stages of increasing cognitive and emotional sophistication (Paloutzian, 1996). In addition, more recent research on adolescents and young adults (Kauffmann, 1991) has raised important questions about the meaning of religious commitments in these formative years. Specifically, how can we best understand the ways in which emerging developmental capacities and significant life events potentially impact the striving for a sense of wholeness or completeness?

Astley and Francis (1992) offer many keen insights on faith development and spiritual formation from a Christian perspective. Adolescence, especially in highly industrialized societies, might best be viewed as a period of intense religious interest, experimentation, and doubt, moderated significantly by parental, peer, or other important socializing influences (e.g., religious education). Frequency of Bible reading and private prayer appears to increase with age beyond adolescence well into late adulthood. Many other important generational differences have been noted in this literature and possible explanations for those changes have been the focus of intense discussions and lively debates. In the course of development, particular religious practices may be performed for quite different reasons at different ages, reflecting complex and intertwined personal and social influences. Ideally, this development results in a more mature, holistic, and integrated Christian faith—where beliefs and behaviors are woven together in a manner that truly shapes the formation of Christian character, convictions, and community (see Garber, 1996).

Our efforts to go and make disciples among all peoples will be significantly thwarted if we fail to consider the ways in which individual differences and developmental realities potentially impact the ability of people to hear and respond to all aspects of the Christian gospel (see Gangel and Wilhoit, 1994).

Religious Conversion. Probably no topic has received more careful attention in this literature during the last century than the study of religious CONVERSION. Generally speaking, three types of belief acquisitions have been described. The sudden conversion type occurs in a very brief time span (minutes, hours). Emotional factors are assumed to play an important role. Conversion is usually followed by a period of intense religious activity that gradually fades over time. The gradual conversion type occurs in a much longer period of time (days, months, years). Intellectual factors are assumed to be of the utmost importance. Involvement in religious activity is much slower and more deliberate, and never reaches the peak of the sudden type. Finally, the religious socialization type is related to an individual’s entire life (she or he cannot recall a time of not believing). It is assumed to be related to learning, modeling, and reinforcement. Involvement in religious activity also tends to be gradual and seldom reaches the levels of either the sudden or gradual conversion types. In actual practice, the distinctions are often blurred, perhaps suggesting considerable overlap in the typology. What is clear, however, is the lingering suspicion in the literature that sudden conversions are highly volate, and more prone to recidivism and relapse (see Malony, 1991).

There are some helpful models of conversion that have been offered in recent decades (see Benner, 1988). It might be best to view conversion as an on-going process of holistic and integrated transformation, mediated by complex and intertwined affective, intellectual, and interpersonal variables. At a minimum, the existing typology might suggest more flexible and inclusive strategies for evangelism and discipleship that respect the mind, minister to the “heart,” and seek to promote peace and justice. Finally, Paloutzian (1996) has offered some keen insights on the characteristics of cult leaders, on the process of “snapping” and brainwashing in new converts, and on ways to build immunity and resistance to the most destructive aspects of new religious movements (see pp. 163–73).

Health and Well-Being. There is little debate in the literature that religion has the potential for being an important resource when coping with the demands of everyday living—and especially so when an individual faces severe health difficulties or life-threatening situations (Hood et al., 1996). At their best, religious beliefs and behaviors offer people meaning, some measure of control, and a sense of self-esteem (efficacy). Prayer, ritual, and social support all have the potential to offer real hope in the midst of intense pain and suffering.

Attempts to demonstrate that there is a distinctive type of personality that lends itself to being religious have been largely unsuccessful. Furthermore, no consistent trends have emerged that would suggest that a general state of non-well-being or abnormality can be significantly correlated with religiosity (Paloutzian, 1996, 259). Only recently have significant efforts been made to determine whether or not distinctly Christian beliefs and behaviors significantly influence health and well-being (Wulff, 1997). A responsible conclusion in the interim would be that religious persons are generally neither better off nor worse off than other persons.

How we define health and well-being is extremely important. It is certainly possible for an individual to be a paragon of psychological wholeness as this is traditionally defined, and yet be living without faith in God through Jesus Christ. While it seems reasonable to assume that Christianity will enhance an individual’s health and well-being, it would be hard to conclude from a more careful reading of the Scriptures that there could be any guarantees (see Jones and Butman, 1991).

Conclusion. The attempt to look for psychological processes that might underlie certain religious beliefs and behaviors has been a major emphasis in this field of scholarly endeavor for more than a century. To reduce Christian faith and ex-
In 1958, Pudaite became the president of the Indo-Burma Pioneer Mission, which by 1970 had established 65 village schools, a high school, and a hospital and commissioned some 350 national missionaries. At one point, over 80 percent of the Hmar professed to be Christians.

In 1971, Bibles for the World was founded in Wheaton, Illinois. Its initial goal was to send copies of the Bible to everyone listed in the Calcutta and New Delhi phone books. The first fifty thousand copies sent out brought more than twenty thousand responses. Since that time over 14 million Bibles have been distributed throughout the world.

The original mission work (now called Partnership Mission) grew enormously until today it has 240 churches, established as the Evangelical Free Church of India, of which Pudaite was the moderator in 1996.

Puerto Rico (United States Dependent Area) (Est. 2000 pop.: 3,825,000; 9,100 sq. km. [3,514 sq. mi.]). The beginnings of Protestantism in Puerto Rico are identified with the liberalism of intellectuals and the Americanization of the island after the 1898 war with Spain. Thereafter, in the 1920s and 1930s, a large number of fundamentalist groups established a foothold, along with a number of Pentecostal churches. The largest of these, the Iglesia de Dios Pentecostal, was founded in 1916 by expatriate Puerto Ricans who had become involved with Pentecostals first in Hawaii and then in California before establishing congregations in their homeland. In turn, the Puerto Rican groups established Hispanic churches in the cities of the eastern seaboard of the United States. It is believed that 30 percent of the Puerto Rican population are evangelical Protestants, and an estimated 85 percent of the evangelical Protestants are Pentecostal. Baptist and Seventh-Day Adventists each account for an estimated 5 percent of the total, and Methodists 2 percent. Puerto Rican evangelicals have been responsible for sending missionaries throughout the Caribbean and the mainland Latin American countries. Puerto Rican preachers have been among the most effective evangelists in stadium crusades throughout the Latin American mainland republics in recent decades.

Pure Land Buddhism. Devotional schools of MAHAYANA BUDDHISM that focus on the Buddha
Pure Land Buddhism

Amitabha and his transcendent realm known as the Pure Land. The origins of Pure Land Buddhism are in India, but it gained its largest following in East Asia, after the Pure Land scriptures were translated into Chinese. From China, where it was known as “Ching Tu,” the Pure Land traditions passed on to Japan, where the largest schools are the “Jodo Shu” (Pure Land) and the “Jodo Shinshu” (Pure Land True Sect). The Pure Land schools are the most popular form of Buddhism in Japan today.

Three aspects of the Pure Land tradition are especially significant. First, Pure Land Buddhism teaches that rebirth in the Pure Land (culminating in nirvana) is attained by reliance on the grace and merit of the Buddha Amida (Japanese for Amitabha). Unlike other forms of Buddhism, Pure Land rejects “self-effort” in attaining liberation. Believers, while holding a rosary with 108 beads supposedly left by Amida, chant the “nembutsu,” a prayer of faith and gratitude to Amida. The Japanese Shinran Shonin (1173–1263), founder of the Pure Land True Sect, emphasized that anyone could reach the Pure Land at death by relying solely on the merits of Amida Buddha. Amida, while still a Bodhisattva, had vowed that he would not become a Buddha until he had accumulated sufficient merit to save all who would call on him for rebirth in the Pure Land. Shinran, sometimes called the “Buddhist Martin Luther” for his doctrine of salvation by grace alone, composed the following hymn:

Although the great chilliocosm may be filled with flames,
Yet he who hears the Holy Name of the Buddha,
Always in accord with steadfastness, Will freely pass to the Pure Land.
Have ye faith in Amida’s vow which takes us in eternally,
Because of him, of his great grace the light superb be thine.

However, there is a fundamental difference between Pure Land Buddhism and Christianity in that whereas Amida is understood to be a human being who attained divinity through his own efforts, and thereby earned sufficient merit to transfer to others, Christianity maintains that Jesus Christ is the incarnate Son of God. The grace of Amida, then, is fundamentally different from that of Jesus Christ, because true grace must originate from the almighty God himself.

Second, the notion of the Pure Land has some similarities to the concept of heaven or paradise in Christianity. Pure Land believers maintain that heaven (the Pure Land) is the destiny of believers and that hell awaits unbelievers. Closer inspection, however, reveals that the Buddhist Pure Land is substantially different from biblical eschatology and the scriptural accounts of heaven and hell.

Third, it is significant that Pure Land Buddhism has been most popular among the lower strata of society. Followers of the Pure Land traditions are aggressive in outreach to the common people. Thus the form of Buddhism that evangelicals in Asia are most likely to encounter is Pure Land Buddhism. Significant similarities between aspects of Pure Land Buddhism and Christianity offer possibilities for points of contact with Pure Land Buddhists, thereby facilitating evangelism. However, Christians must be careful to emphasize the very clear differences between Pure Land Buddhism and the gospel of Jesus Christ as well.

Qatar (Est. 2000 pop.: 605,000; 11,000 sq. km. [4,247 sq. mi.]). Qatar, a small protrusion jutting northward from the eastern edge of the Arabian Peninsula, is a barren desert not far from Bahrain. This peninsula was almost uninhabited for most of the Christian era. Nomadic Christian tribes passed through the area hundreds of years ago, such as the Ghasannid tribe. However, there was little of value there and the population was extremely small. Now there are perhaps fifty thousand people living in the country. Qatar, with the discovery of oil in 1939, became one of the leading producing areas of southwestern Asia. Its rainfall is less than four inches per year and there are few wells, which makes agriculture nearly impossible. Before oil was discovered people lived on the pearl industry or camel trading.

With the discovery of oil many from different nationalities flooded into the country to work in the oil fields. Among this group of workers were a number of Christians. They began small group meetings and in a quiet way have shared a witness. The Roman Catholic Church has a school there mostly for children of this outside work force and religious activities with it. A number of evangelical believers also have had employment and worship together in small groups or homes. At present a regular church is not permitted to exist. There are no resident missionaries working there. In addition any tent makers would be severely restricted and deported if they attempted an open witness. Some young men have studied abroad and been exposed to the Christian message. They are not permitted to express an opinion regarding their response to that message.

The several Arabic radio programs beamed in this direction may make an initial impact as well as the new Christian television satellite program. A number of people have written asking for the Bible and asking questions about Christianity. It is hoped that in the future the continued pressure on the peninsula by Qataris who have studied abroad and the regional democratization, and new concerns for individual rights and freedoms will lead to an easing of the restrictions and the possibility of opening up a regular church.

Qualifications for the Missionary. The most important qualification for the missionary is an attitude of submission and obedience (Phil. 2:5–8). Spiritual disciplines (prayer, fasting, Bible study) are closely related to such an attitude, and thus are primary qualifications for missionary service. Ultimately, missions is a matter of the heart; spirituality is thus a bedrock necessity for one involved in the endeavor. The fruits of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22–23) have specific applications in cross-cultural ministry and are most essential.

In addition to spiritual qualifications, it is also important for the candidate to have sound physical and emotional health. The rigors and stresses of missionary ministry will usually heighten or increase weaknesses. This is especially true in the arena of interpersonal relationships.

In another era, physical hardships in various world areas may have been a formidable barrier to overcome, but in the twenty-first century, getting along with co-workers and working under indigenous leadership represent far greater hurdles. The leaders of many denominations and mission boards cite personal incompatibility as the number one cause of missionary failures. Versatility, humbleness, adaptability, good humor, and a willingness to take orders are especially needed when working in another culture. These psychological qualifications are indispensable.

Increasingly, churches and mission agencies recognize that there must be education for missionary service. This training is being provided at colleges and seminaries throughout the world. Anthropology is a discipline that is invaluable for Qualifications for the Missionary

the missionary. Knowledge about other cultures and customs and the ability to critique one's own culture are very important. Candidates learn about Ethnocentrism (valuing other cultures by their own) and racism (the condemnation of other groups) and how harmful attitudes like these can devastate the growth of the church.

The prospective missionary should learn how to enter another culture (CULTURE LEARNING), learn another language (SECOND LANGUAGE ACQUISITION), and minimize CULTURE SHOCK. A global perspective should be developed, including a knowledge of WORLD RELIGIONS. A thorough understanding of the Christian faith and the ability to communicate that faith through culturally sensitive EVANGELISM are essential.

Some missionary training programs now include an internship component, in which the candidate is placed in a cross-cultural setting within the home nation. He or she is then guided by a mentor in adapting to different customs and language, while at the same time learning the proper missiological principles in the classroom.

Current strategy and sound doctrine learned in a suitable training program must be combined with submission to Christ and obedience to his will. Only then will "the sent one" be an effective conduit through which God's love can flow to a fractured world.

Qualitative Research. Qualitative research refers to the tradition that is concerned with human behavior and function as observed primarily in natural social situations. Eclectic in nature, qualitative research methods draw from the social and behavioral sciences. The common characteristic of qualitative research is an extended period of fieldwork. As applied to missiology, qualitative research is concerned with questions of meaning at the worldview level.

Qualitative Research Methods. Within the complex world of human interactions, qualitative research must begin with a research problem that is sufficiently narrow in focus. Common sources of research problems include: discussions with others who are working in the area; literature dealing with specific problems that require further research; and personal experience that raises concerns over specific issues. From the perspective of missiology, research problems often emerge from either personal or collective field experience. Once the problem has been identified, the researcher develops a research question that will determine the nature, boundaries, and method of the study. A practical consideration for missiology is the applicability of the potential findings to the wider missions community, which in turn justifies the allocation of resources.

In qualitative methods the researcher is the research instrument for the whole process. As such, the researcher becomes part of the lives of the participants, interacting with them in their social world. Accessibility and practical considerations must therefore be evaluated before the project begins to assure its viability. Beyond the issues of access are the ethical issues that are ultimately determinative, particularly in missiological research. Due to the nature of missionary work, determining the feasibility of a research project is a matter for careful consideration at many levels. Once a decision to conduct field research has been made, the researcher begins the process of gaining access to the context(s) required for the study. Again, this will be determined both by the nature of the research problem and by the sensitivities necessitated by the mission strategy. It is important to note that in most settings, a degree of reciprocity with participants is required to establish both cooperation and sustainable relationships.

The research problem and the role of the researcher generally determines the qualitative method used in the study. Four primary methods are used: (1) observational studies; (2) textual analysis; (3) interviews; and (4) recording and transcribing. While each method is distinct, they are often combined or used sequentially during the research process. In most cases, observation and interviews are used extensively. Data generated in the research are recorded as fieldnotes, which are analyzed for both linguistic and cultural categories. In addition to pencil-and-paper records, audio and video recording are increasingly used in qualitative research. Documents are another valuable source of data, including written records, minutes, correspondence, literature, and biographical material. The analysis and interpretation of data is an integral part of the research process that continues throughout the study. Although quantification of data may be used, the basic analyses of qualitative research are nonmathematical.

The final stage of research is the written or verbal reports that present the findings. The form of the report will vary depending on the audience, but usually includes a written document that may be published for internal or external use. The extent of the use of a research document has a direct bearing on the form and content of the report. This is particularly true of missiological research, where the nature of the missionary task goes beyond the acquisition of knowledge. Due to the nature of qualitative research, ethical considerations are crucial both at the level of research viability and in the distribution of the findings.

Contemporary Relevance. Interest in mission research has grown rapidly in the past several decades, as seen in publications such as the Evangelical Missions Quarterly, Missionalia, Missiology, International Bulletin of Missionary Research, and the publications of MARC. The statistical work of D. Barrett and the country profiles of P. Johnstone have been particularly influential at the level of stimulating missionary interest, prayer, and strategic planning. Among the other significant contributions have been qualitative studies by researchers combining their work with the pursuit of advanced degrees in seminaries and schools of world mission.

Missiological research is the interaction of at least four elements: the theological foundations of missionary praxis; the historical study of Christian missions; the strategic quantitative knowledge of social phenomena; and the qualitative understanding of contextual realities. As the fourth element, qualitative research makes its unique contribution through extensive contact with people in their own worlds. Through in-depth studies of specific contexts, researchers focus on meaning and the construction of social worlds. Hampered by the length and style of reporting, widespread use of qualitative research has been limited. However, as technology improves, qualitative information will be more accessible to missiologists in order to better interact with the other elements of missiological research.

Quantitative Missiology. Application of quantitative measurement and data analytic methods and modeling to understanding and applying missiological concepts in the practice of mission. The rightly celebrated advances in computer-assisted research, even if held in database format, are not by definition automatically quantitative.

Every major movement in modern missions has been associated with data gathering and analysis, however rudimentary. WILLIAM CAREY’S An Enquiry into the Obligations of Christians to Use Means for the Conversion of the Heathens contained extensive world demographic data. The 1907 Egypt conference on Muslim evangelism led by SAMUEL ZWEMER reviewed global data comparing Muslim and non-Muslim populations. The WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE (EDINBURGH 1910) preparatory materials included world survey data. Regional action flowing from Edinburgh expanded these data as a basis for cooperation. From just before the midpoint of this century, Leslie Brierley published the World Christian Handbook series, and this incubated the monumental World Christian Encyclopedia (WCE), edited by David Barrett. In between, the useful and informative prayer/data Operation World (OW) series edited by Patrick Johnstone has been a rich source of global information. The Missions Advanced Research and Communication (MARC) Division of World Vision published both the North American Protestant Overseas Directory, subtitled The Mission Handbook, begun by the Missionary Research Library, and the Unreached Peoples series, all containing some measure of raw data.

Extensive data are gathered yearly by churches, denominations, and mission agencies (Barrett, 1995). Several centers exist that have at least a part-time research function and that gather and report some implications of this raw data, although surprisingly little analysis is ever done on these rich sources.

In what sense are the above and other missions data research truly quantitative? Most initiatives have proceeded from the North, where activism has propelled intuitional rather than rigorous data reduction and analysis. Analysis does not move beyond variable measurement on the name and count level. Merely counting or ordering does not constitute quantitative analysis, even when the result is numeric.

Secular research, since 1939, has distinguished four levels of measurement that determine the appropriate use of data analysis and modeling techniques. And the simple truth is that very little has been done in missions that goes beyond the first two levels, namely, nominal, naming a category, unit of analysis, or phenomenon; or ordinal, ranking units (agencies, nations, etc.) in some ordered sequence. Further, very few attempts are made to relate variables to one another in conditional or causal hypotheses, even at these modest levels of measurement, usually referred to in research literature as qualitative methods. One reason for this is that the data collected are fodder for building dependent variables. Counting the results has absorbed missionary activists.

Missions researchers seldom collect data on explanatory variables. And, since the data collected rarely can be treated as interval or ratio scales, sophisticated correlation techniques and models or simulations are inappropriate or nonexistent. One exception to this rule is the almost unpublished research (Myers, 1996) in correlational analysis done by MARC in support of the development activities of World Vision International. Quantified relations among variables seldom appear in missions periodical literature. Even qualitative correlational analysis has been quite limited. The use of some limited data reduction techniques has occurred in missions periodicals and, in a rare case, inter-item correlation used to build variables. For example, most studies done in the church growth tradition have plotted growth against time, and then hypothesized about reasons for inflections in the plot, without introducing variable building measurement and analysis of possible conditional or causal variables with rigorous statistical models and tests. Seldom are data collected that could falsify the resulting speculation and conclusions. Data on nongrowing churches are rarely collected to compare with the growing congregations by means of even the simplest existing tests. The exclusion of the nongrowing congregations and comparative measurement on conditional or causal variables vitiates or at least leaves unsupported the conclusions advanced. Since data are not there, it may be that nongrowing churches are doing the things that allegedly are producing growth.

How much more helpful it would be if data were gathered and analyzed by correlation. This could thoroughly test whether and under what crisis conditions (for example, during recession or high unemployment, radical people displacement, such as migration, disaster, or refugeeism), accessions to the faith are affected.

Communications research surpasses other missions research in refining data to segregate markets and craft appropriate strategies utilizing the insights gained in the analysis. At its most straightforward, such research discovers what media are in use and therefore appropriate for the communication of the gospel. As practiced by James Engel, Viggo Søgaard, and their students, it may be the one instance of missions research that reasonably employs the possibilities of variable formation through data reduction tools. Such research may, therefore, qualify to be noted as quantitative. Other variable building seems to rely almost completely on face validity (i.e., I believe given items measure what I say they measure because they appear to me to do so).

Currently, the WCE is undergoing revision, as is OW. The AD 2000 Movement and related efforts continue the identification and adoption of people groups, as cooperation among researchers globally is promoted. In a spin-off from Global Mapping International and early MARC efforts toward cooperation, know-how is being widely disseminated and cooperation spurred toward greater information sharing.

In missions research, extensive data may exist, but sophisticated variable building, statistical hypothesis testing, modeling, and simulation are virtually nonexistent at this time. SAMUEL WILSON

Quaque, Philip (c. 1741–1816). Ghanian Anglican missionary to Ghana. Quaque was chosen with two other Ghanaians to be sent to England in October of 1754 to be educated for the purpose of returning to Ghana as workers among their own people. One companion died of smallpox and the other of incurable madness.

In January of 1759, Quaque was baptized. With his ordination and appointment as “missionary, schoolmaster, and catechist to the Negroes on the Gold Coast” on May 17, 1765, he became the first non-European ordained in the Church of England.

Quaque arrived back home in February of 1766. He founded a school in his home, and thus began the work he would diligently perform until his death. Unfortunately, despite his ordination, he experienced continual opposition to his labors. He sought to perform his priestly duties among the European colonialists, but their debauchery and ridicule made his work difficult to carry out and, not surprisingly, also discouraged African response to his efforts. Another negative factor was that he had lost his first language while in England (a letter written in 1769 encouraged him to recover it).

Over his fifty years of ministry, Quaque baptized only a handful of people. Despite the relative paucity of results, his pioneering of African leadership and pastoral responsibilities stands as one of the early landmarks in missionary work in Africa.

Qur’an. The Qur’an (from an Arabic verb meaning “to read” or “recite”) is regarded by Muslims as the word of God, sent down to the lower heavens during Ramadan and revealed from there to the Prophet Muhammad. Islamic theology declares that the Qur’an was not created; it is instead the earthly expression of the Well-Guarded Tablet (al-lawh al-muhfuz), which is with Allah. It is held to be untranslatable; one reads the Qur’an only in the original Arabic. The science of Qur’anic interpretation (tafsir) is extremely important in Islam.
Muslims believe that additional revelation became necessary after the Tawrat (the Torah, or Old Testament) and the Injil (the Gospels, or New Testament), revealed to Moses and Jesus respectively, were corrupted before their canonization was completed late in the fourth century A.D. The Qur'an is now considered to be the only reliable revelation of God, collected as it was within twenty years of Muhammad's death and allegedly transmitted through succeeding generations without alteration. Roughly equivalent to the New Testament in length, it is divided into 114 chapters, arranged from longest to shortest.

The Qur'an's major themes include the nature of God, the nature of humanity, the establishment of a worldwide Muslim community, the day of judgment, and the separation of humans into paradise and hell. A substantial amount of legal material is included as well, covering moral precepts, dietary regulations, and standards for community life.

Christians today are divided over whether specific portions of the Qur'an may be used to witness to Muslims. Some believe that certain narratives indicate the superiority of 'Isa (Jesus) over Muhammad. That the second coming of 'Isa rather than Muhammad forms a vital part of Islamic eschatology is a case in point. Presented properly, it is claimed, such passages may be used as a bridge to speaking of Christ's lordship. Others insist, however, that the overall teaching of Islam regarding the person and nature of Jesus (that he is merely a prophet and not part of a triune God) is so deeply ingrained in the Muslim mind-set that such an approach will inevitably fail. Further, it is claimed that to hold only certain passages as truthful runs the risk of raising the question why Christians accept only the passages with which they happen to agree, but consider the Qur'an as a whole to be the work of men, not a divinely inspired book.

Rather than attempting to show the similarities between Qur'anic teaching and biblical doctrine, it is perhaps best to emphasize the contrasts between the two. The Muslim scriptures display a sub-Christian view of Jesus, denying his divinity, crucifixion, and resurrection; they alter considerably the narratives dealing with the Hebrew patriarchs; and they substitute a work oriented soteriology for the biblical teaching of salvation by grace through faith alone.

Race Relations. The reality of race and race relations has been central to the missions movement in the United States from at least the early nineteenth century. The combinations of increased scientific interest in race as a category (as evidenced in books as disparate as David Hume’s Of National Characters in 1748 and Charles Darwin’s Origin of Species in 1859) and the growing American dilemma of dealing with the enslavement of Africans and their descendants in this country helped focus the attention of people interested in missions, especially with respect to Africans and their descendants in the Western Hemisphere, on how to—and even whether to—evangelize people of other races.

Race as an ethnic designation has a rather recent history. By the dawn of the nineteenth century, Johann Friedrich Blumenbach’s five-category typology of races—Caucasian, Mongolian, Ethiopian, African, and Malayan—had not only gained ascendancy, but also reified racial categorization into a static, biological system, rather than a dynamic movement within human history. If race were to be seen as a static category, then race mixing could be rightly deemed “unnatural” and for Christians “sinful.” Because of the presence of Africans and their descendants in the Western Hemisphere due to chattel slavery, these concerns took on special significance for black-white relations in the United States.

Christians engaged these issues in the early missions movement by (1) evangelizing Africans and African American slaves as equal members of the human family; (2) evangelizing Africans and African Americans slaves, but limiting their Christian freedom to the “spiritual realm” and denying their full human capacities and rights; (3) ignoring, denying, and even fighting against efforts to Christianize blacks out of a denial of their humanity and even fear of the power of the gospel to breed insurrection against the slavocracy. Of course, some slave missionary efforts reflected a basic compatibility between Christian faith and slavery, noting in a threefold defense of Christian slavery: “Abraham practiced it, Paul preached it, and Jesus is silent on the issue.” In fact, some missionary efforts to slaves revolved around the text “Slaves, obey your earthly master” (Eph. 6:5).

In the evangelization of Africa, race relations played a crucial role. Early efforts to send black Americans to Africa combined with efforts to repatriate freed blacks to Africa in colonization efforts was resisted by some free blacks who claimed America as their home. In the late nineteenth century, some missionary agencies declined to send blacks on African missions for fear of intermarriage with white missionaries. Others were concerned that blacks’ interpretation of the recent Civil War in the United States as God’s judgment against slavery would be dangerous baggage in evangelizing colonized Africans. As segregation became part of American denominational life, black denominations formed their own separate mission agencies and the work of missions became another reflection of American segregation.

The impact of the Civil Rights Movement and the changing patterns in American race relations affected missions work in bringing more blacks into the mainstream of home and foreign missions, and making visible to the larger society the steady stream of missionary activity sponsored by black churches at home and abroad. Contemporary efforts at racial reconciliation are building on the work of intergrationists in the 1950s and 1960s. The reconciliation accords reached between black and white Pentecostals in 1994 as well as ongoing conversations between the National Association of Evangelicals and the National Black Evangelical Association reflect the churches’ sense that racial reconciliation is a part of kingdom work. Some missions organizations, such as Youth With a Mission, have even incorporated notions of identificational repentance and reconciliation as part of their missions strategies, noting the need for contemporary Christians to confess the sins of their forbears as part of the healing process.
Radio Mission Work. Radio is used extensively in mission. The first wireless broadcast sent out to the world was an informal Christian program on Christmas Eve, 1906. The program included a solo, "O Holy Night," as well as a reading of the Christmas story from the Gospel of Luke. Christian radio broadcasting as such began on January 2, 1921, when a church service was broadcast in Pittsburgh.

The first missionary station, HCJB, "The Voice of the Andes," began broadcasting in 1931 from Ecuador. The Far East Broadcasting Company (FEBC) was founded in 1946, to be followed by Trans World Radio (TWR), Radio ELWA, and others. Today powerful Christian shortwave radio stations cover the world, broadcasting in numerous languages. There are also a few powerful medium-wave international stations, including TWR broadcasting from Monte Carlo in Southern Europe and FEBC from a powerful medium wave station covering a large section of China.

There are numerous local Christian stations, broadcasting on FM or medium wave to a single city or community. Some are commercial stations with professional staff, others are small and simple stations that depend on volunteers. For all, a high level of commitment is required.

Christian radio broadcasters are today on the air in some 200 different languages with 1,000 hours of transmitter time per week from major international broadcasters alone. This does not include local in-country stations, commercial time, and public broadcast time. The English (34%), Spanish (22%), Mandarin (8.6%), and Russian (6.4%) languages dominate on the international broadcasts; with the remaining 190 languages and dialects accounting for only 29% of the total. For example, there are ten million English speakers in India, and a total of more than 102 hours of broadcasting each week is in English, but the fifty million Marathi speakers only get three hours a week, and the thirty-three million Urdu speakers get less than four hours per week.

In the hands of Christian communicators with the knowledge, means, and courage to use it creatively, radio has proven to be a powerful and effective tool in the task of world evangelization. Programs such as The Old-Fashioned Revival Hour, Back to the Bible, and others have made a significant contribution to the religious life of America. It is estimated that CHARLES E. FULLER had twenty million listeners a week up until his retirement in 1967.

In the international context, most of Southeast Asia’s mountain-dwelling Hmong people have been almost completely cut off from any direct cross-cultural contact. Yet, on rare occasions when outsiders were able to visit, some reported strong indications of thousands of Hmong conversions to Christianity. In the early 1990s, the Vietnamese government conceded (somewhat regretfully) that hundreds of thousands of Hmong had become Christians. Far East Broadcasting Company’s radio programs in the Hmong language offered the only available means by which most of these Hmong converts could have possibly heard the gospel. Indeed, in 1995 when two Hmong expatriates were able to conduct an extraordinary journey to several Hmong villages in northern Vietnam, they were greeted by multitudes of Hmong believers who welcomed them to impromptu open-air worship services which included original Christian songs exclusively featured on FEBC’s Hmong broadcasts. Most had never met a Christian from outside their village, yet many were quite familiar with the Hmong songs heard only in FEBC’s broadcasts.

In 1985, mindful of radio’s potential impact among many of the world’s hardest-to-reach peoples, the leaders of HCJB World Radio, Far East Broadcasting Company, Trans World Radio, and SIM (operator of radio station of ELWA in Liberia) launched the cooperative World by 2000 initiative to provide every man, woman, and child on earth the opportunity to hear Christian radio broadcasts in a language each can understand. Soon thereafter, broadcasters FEBA Radio and Words of Hope became active partners in the World by 2000 effort, which fostered an unprecedented level of cooperation among the various partner organizations.

The World by 2000 strategically targeted large language groups which had not been previously served by daily missionary radio broadcasts. These groups included many of the world’s least evangelized peoples. By 1997, the World by 2000’s list of megalanguages (each spoken by at least one million people) covered by Christian broadcasting increased by 80—raising up new groups of believers and planting new churches among many of these previously unreached peoples.

Because little or no broadcast media of any kind had been available in many of these languages, the sheer novelty factor of these newly launched programs attracts positive attention almost immediately. Although many of these peoples are relatively media-poor, the advent of regular radio broadcasts in their language has attracted considerable interest. Early on, listening among such media-starved peoples has tended to be avid, regular, and often a group experience. In northern Mozambique, for example, clusters of Lomwe listeners gather each night around one of the few radios to be found in their village. As the gospel message is thus regularly heard in a group setting, listeners often linger to discuss the program content after the conclusion of each Lomwe broadcast. In time, such a listening group can naturally become the nucleus for a new Christian congregation. As the Holy Spirit enables such newly formed fellowships to expand, each may blossom into a larger church, and/or start a daughter congregation. Evidence abounds that during the first seven years of Lomwe broadcasting from Trans World Radio/Swaziland to northern Mozambique, over 300 new churches were thus started by listeners. Church planting progress has since been reported among other Mozambican peoples who began receiving first-ever gospel broadcasts during the 1990s, including the Makhulu, Makonde, and Sena.

Similarly, new churches have sprung up among listeners to many of the other pioneering radio broadcasts launched through the World by 2000 effort. The Banjara of India, the Gypsies of central Europe, the Bariba of Benin, and the Chuvash of central Asia are just some of the notable examples. Although daily gospel broadcasts are still needed for dozens of megilanguage groups who remain unreached by Christian radio, steady progress continues to be made toward the World by 2000 goal. The accompanying examples of churches planted bear witness to the reliability of the Lord’s promise that his Word will never return void. In addition, recent political developments such as the fall of communist regimes in Europe and the end of apartheid in South Africa have led to the added availability of many powerful international radio transmitters which had previously been used exclusively for the broadcasting of political propaganda. As a result, transmitters in Russia, Albania, Armenia, Poland, and South Africa have been added to the available inventory of super-powered international transmitters which are available for missionary broadcasting.

Radio can readily adapt to changing social and cultural conditions, and it has several advantages for Christian mission. It requires listening only, making it possible to reach all, including the more than one billion nonliterate. Radio uses sound only, which makes programming fairly inexpensive. It has wide coverage and can reach most people through the estimated 1.2 billion radio sets in use around the world. It crosses religious and political barriers. Furthermore, radio can handle a variety of program formats, limited only by the creativity of the producer.

Most Christian broadcasters ask for letter response from the listeners; in 1988, FEBC alone received approximately 615,000 letters from listeners. Unfortunately, most Christian radio ministries have not developed feedback systems that do not require mail, and thus non- and semi-literate are excluded.

Ramabai, Pandita (1858–1922). Indian pioneer in educational and medical missions. Ramabai was one of the most popular native missionaries in India, an excellent example of indigenous mission to women in the Two-Thirds World. Having spent her early life in teaching pilgrimages with her family, once her parents and sister died, she and her brother continued their pilgrimages. She was called "Pandita" because of her knowledge in the Hindu scripture.

Married to a lower caste lawyer and widowed in her early twenties, she experienced the grief and agony of women in India. She went to England in 1883 to learn how to educate Hindu women and there came know Christ as her Savior.

Ramabai was involved in evangelism, education, Scripture translation, literature and social work, founding a mission, and organizing medical work. She ministered to women who were outcasts in society, giving them not only food and shelter, but also training for jobs and spiritual guidance. In addition to translating the Bible, she developed a Marathi concordance and lexicon and wrote many books. She was also deeply concerned to contextualize the gospel. For example, she utilized ideas from Hindu scriptures to communicate biblical truths, as well as Indian music and Indian forms of worship to make worship relevant to Hindu converts. In all of these ways God used Ramabai to bring many women of India from physical, emotional, mental and spiritual bondage into Christian freedom.

Reached and Unreached Mission Fields. Since the mid-1970s intense debate has raged over what a mission field is and what it means for a field to be reached. In general, since the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelism of 1974, the concept of a People Group, defined by common language and culture, has displaced the older idea of a nation-state. There continues to be a discussion of whether the people groups to be evangelized should be defined more in terms of language or dialect (with over 12,000 in the world) or of culture (over 20,000). But leaving some latitude for those definitions, the chief ethnolinguistic groups have been identified.
But how do we determine when a group has been “reached”? In the mid-1980s there were said to be 12,000 unevangelized groups, but by 1990 that estimate was reduced to 6,000. With the advent of the AD 2000 and Beyond Movement, this was reduced to 2,000, then by 1995, to 1,600. Did the missionary enterprise advance that rapidly? No, the definition of “evangelized” or “reached” changed. Does “evangelized” mean that every person would hear with understanding the way to life in Christ as Mark 16:15 and Acts 1:8 seem to indicate? Or, as the objective set by some in recent years, does “evangelized” mean that every person would have access to the gospel? That is, when a church is near enough or there are radio broadcasts or book shops, the Bible has been translated into their language—everyone could hear the gospel if they wanted to. This greatly reduces the number of unevangelized people groups. Others opt to focus on Matthew 28:18–20 and Luke 24:47–48 and the goal of evangelism is said to be discipling the “nations” or people groups. But what is it to “disciple”? Some have said that when there is a witnessing church movement, the missionary task is complete. Others point out that a witnessing church movement in a tribe of 1,000 may mean the group is evangelized or “reached,” but what if the group is 40 million in size? So others add the phrase, “capable of reaching its own people.” If there is such a church movement, no more outside help would be needed to complete the task of evangelism, however defined. Still others define a reached people as those which are majority Christian. If Christian is used in an evangelical sense, however, no more than a handful of very small ethnic groups could be considered “reached” on that definition.

This debate is not academic nit-picking; it is very pragmatic, defining the task that remains and targeting those areas in which a church or mission should invest precious, limited resources. The consensus that seems to be emerging at the end of the twentieth century is to have a scale from “least reached” to “most reached.” On this basis it can be said that there are at least 1,600 people groups larger than 10,000 in size in which there is no witnessing church movement capable of reaching its own people. If smaller groups are included, the number of unreached escalates to at least 6,000, including many with no gospel witness at all.

The majority of the least reached groups fall within the 10/40 Window, a band of ethnic groups stretching east between the 10th and 40th degree latitudes (north) from the Atlantic Ocean to Indonesia in the Pacific. This embraces nations in northern Africa, the Middle East, and the Far East in which the least reached religious groups are concentrated: Islam, Hinduism, and Buddhism. These are not only the least reached, they are the least reachable, the most resistant. In fact, because of religious, political, and cultural barriers, they are also the least accessible (see Creative Access Countries).

If “Christian” is defined as one who has a personal relationship with God through faith in Jesus Christ, and “mission field” is defined as any ethnolinguistic group in which there is no witnessing church movement capable of evangelizing that group, perhaps half the people groups of the world have been “reached.” The other half need outside assistance, commonly called missionaries. If those groups with fewer than 10,000 were excluded from the tally, then the majority of the remaining people groups have been reached.

If, on the other hand “reached” focuses on individuals rather than ethnic groups, and “access to the gospel” is the criterion, perhaps more than half the individuals of the world have been reached. If, however, “reached” means they have actually heard the gospel with understanding, far less than half could be considered reached.

The most succinct, reliable, and easily understood data on the reached or unreached status of each nation is found in Operation World. The most sophisticated composite of the efforts of the major research groups is found in Status of Global Evangelization: Model and Database Design, put out by Southern Baptist Convention, FMB and updated periodically.

Receptivity. The dynamic state of a person or people in which, if presented with the Christian gospel in terms they can understand, they will respond favorably to this gospel.

Receptivity or responsiveness to the gospel is obviously demonstrated when people respond to the gospel by a faith commitment to Jesus Christ, are incorporated into congregations, and become responsible, reproducing believers. The degree of receptivity can be measured easily after a population has been presented with the gospel over time. However, it is more difficult to measure in advance.

The prediction of receptivity is one of the major concerns that faces missions in making decisions about either opening a new ministry or closing an existing one. Individual missions have developed research instruments for evaluating receptivity. Many of these instruments share a set of common assumptions. Two key assumptions include: (1) If some people in a community are responding to the gospel, others may be expected to respond as well. (2) If the people are experiencing significant worldview change or worldview dissonance, or if they have experienced significant social, economic, or political changes, they may be expected to be receptive to the gospel (see also Anomie).
Receptivity

Receptivity is a dynamic condition that changes over time with a given person or a whole population. The variables that lead to one’s being open to begin to move through the process of change to become a mature Christian vary over time. Two key sets of variables interact, but need to be assessed differently. The first set of variables relate to sociocultural concerns and the second to spiritual concerns.

Sociocultural concerns relate to a wide range of issues, including homogeneity/heterogeneity of the community, the rate of worldview change, previous knowledge of and attitude toward the Christian gospel, past experience with people who are perceived to be Christian, and the level of satisfaction/dissatisfaction with the present religious system.

Spiritual issues relate to the kinds of spiritual commitments the people have made. The history of the spiritual commitments of a person or a people sets the stage for the receptivity of the person or the people.

Receptivity affects the whole conversion process. David Krawthwol provides a descriptive sequence of the attitudinal change process. At each stage of the change process—receiving, responding, valuing, organization around values, and characterization by a set of values—the person or the community makes decisions (see also CHANGE, SOCIOLOGY OF). While the term “worldview” was not widely used when Krawthwol described this process, the process could be described as worldview change or the process of conversion. At each stage a person must be willing (receptive) to continue in the process. One may in the accepting of a new idea or in the acceptance of the gospel stop or stall the process, or may accelerate the process.

Reconciliation. The Christian faith is fundamentally relational. It affirms that God has acted once and for all—decisively—in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ to bring the created order back to its original purposes. Pastor and homiletician Gardner C. Taylor argued that “the Bible has but one theme, that is, that God gets back what belonged to him in the first place.”

This involves not merely the restoration of persons, the environment, and even the cosmos, but also the quality of relationships that they enjoyed at creation—the divine order in the heart of God as revealed in the Genesis account of beginnings.

In the beginning, God enjoyed full fellowship with humanity, unmarred by Sin. So too, there was harmony and PEACE in the relationships between humanity and CREATION, and between the first man and woman in the Garden of Eden. When sin entered the world, all of these relationships were damaged—sin separated humanity from a holy God. It also brought alienation between humanity and the ENVIRONMENT. Finally, it brought estrangement among people themselves, substituting blame and distrust for mutuality and complementarity (see also FALL OF HUMANKIND).

Reconciliation describes the process through which God works to restore these relationships. In the Book of Colossians, it is depicted as a cosmic process through which God in Jesus Christ reconciled “to himself all things, whether on earth or in heaven, making peace by the blood of his cross” (1:20). Here God brings nature into right relationship with himself through Christ, as well as showing his victory over demonic ‘principalities and powers.’ The souls of sinners are reclaimed as they trust the merits of Christ’s blood.

The apostle Paul also depicts his ministry as a ministry of reconciliation. In 2 Corinthians 5:17–19 he affirms that there is new life in Christ, and that this life is “from God, who through Christ reconciled us to himself and gave us the ministry of reconciliation; that is, in Christ God was reconciling the world to himself, not counting their trespasses against them, and entrusting to us the message of reconciliation.”

He goes on to describe his ministry as that of an AMBASSADOR OF GOD, representing him and pleading with persons on his behalf to be reconciled to God. In this sense, the missionary enterprise is one of representing Christ to a world in need of reconciliation to God, not merely the inculcation of doctrine or the spread of propositions. Rather it is the full-fledged acceptance of one’s role as an ambassador for God’s kingdom, preaching the gospel of reconciliation with God—the invitation to follow Christ as he brings all things into subjectio to God. Missions at its core involves the proclamation and demonstration of the LOVE OF GOD for his creation, and the invitation to respond to his love through accepting his Son as Lord and Savior.

If reconciliation is a cosmic process, then missions involves the invitation to participate fully in the whole of the process. That is, the restoration of right relationships in the created order—the environment and surrounding interplanetary and interstellar space—and right relationships between human beings.

Paul recognizes this in pointing to the new fellowship created between Jew and Gentile in the body of Christ. This reconciliation in Christ he also calls “peace” (Eph. 2:14). Christ has “broken down the dividing wall of hostility by abolishing in his flesh the law of commandments and ordinances, that he might create in himself one new man in place of the two, so making peace.” (vv. 14–15) To the Galatians, he wrote that in Christ
“there is neither Jew nor Greek . . . slave nor free . . . male nor female” (3:28).

These latter passages have assumed great importance in contemporary conversations concerning missions because of the increased relevance of cultural contextualization in missions studies. As we have given greater weight to cultural contexts and become more clear about imperialism and power relationships, we have witnessed the need for a more sophisticated conversation about reconciliation across ethnic and cultural lines. Indeed, in the United States, missions organizations are looking at issues of cultural context not merely as a concern in overseas missions, but also working on how racial and ethnic reconciliation is to be sought within their own country.

At one level, the issue is, in the words of theologian Miroslav Volf, the “sacralization of cultural identity,” the literal merger of cultural and religious commitments that gives people more of a sense of belonging to their cultural group than to Christ. Among racial and ethnic minorities, oppression can give the sense that loyalty to one’s ethnicity is a stronger bond than that to other believers. And to those in the majority, the wedding of religion and culture often appears matter of fact, since they are the group in power and lack the critical distancing that comes from marginalization (see marginal, marginalization).

Some suggest that Christian faith is color-blind, in that God is “no respecter of persons.” Others point to cultural difference as something to be celebrated—a rich diversity reflecting the creative genius of God. Few would opt for a segregated church which overemphasizes cultural or ethnic norms (see also homogenous unit principle). Indeed, it may be that the ways in which Christians engage in the process of interpersonal and interethnic reconciliation within the church set an important agenda for worldwide missions on a planet beset by ongoing ethnic strife. Recent attempts at contextualizing theology, owning up to imperialistic cultural theologies, and the confession of our “ghettoization” of marginalized ethnic churches (by persons in both the majority and the minority) are steps in the right directions.

More radical ideas such as the recent practice of identificational or representational repentance (seeking the forgiveness of entire groups—such as the 1995 Southern Baptist apology for its attitudes on race and slavery—are still being debated (see also powers, the). What cannot be debated is the ongoing work of God in Christ, as laid out in Scripture, to bring back what belonged to him in the first place.

Redemption and Lift. Donald McGavran introduced the phrase “redemption and lift” to the field of missiology in his classic work, Understanding Church Growth. McGavran defined redemption as “Christ’s saving activity in the human heart,” in which Christ enters, makes a person a new creation, and leads the individual to repentance (1980, 296). This new life brings the person into church fellowship and mission activities, creating a secondary improvement, “lift.” McGavran described lift as the great benefits new Christians gain from a congregation which provides medicine, education, technology, wealth, protection, and loving friendships. New Christians become middle-class members of the Christian community who “share in the general sense of well-being” even though they had not done so well in times past. This is what McGavran called “lift” (1980, 297).

McGavran warned of the danger of the “redeemed and lifted” becoming socially separated from former community relationships. While new converts may be persecuted and pressured by their former communities, McGavran warned that it is the church that often insists on a Christian’s separation from the world. Having done mission work among people trapped in the Hindu caste system of India, McGavran seemed concerned about the dangers of a Christian caste system. On the mission field he observed that new Christians tended to become personally “cleaner” and acquire new attitudes toward germs, dirt, flies, and waste disposal. As they avoided civic affairs and non-Christian festivals, the gulf between Christians and former associates deepened to the point that effective communication ceased (1980, 298–99).

McGavran thus pondered: How might the church redeem and lift Christians without separating them from receptive sections of society? His solution was twofold: (1) Stress the open Bible and Spirit-filled life as essential aspects of redemption. Rather than rely on ivory tower specialists, put the Bible in the hands of people through literacy classes in churches. (2) View “lift” as a derivative aspect of redemption and, although a necessary derivative, the emphasis should be placed upon redemption (303).

McGavran described redemption and lift as a universal phenomenon not limited to the church geographically. David Barrett has since reported that about one-third of the world is made up of Christians who receive nearly two-thirds of the world’s annual income and spend 97 percent on themselves (Barrett, 1983, 148). This trend continues as we approach the twenty-first century.

Redemption in Other Faiths. The common biblical words for “redemption” refer to deliverance from some evil by payment of a price. However, the Hebrew pdh and *g*l occasionally seem to have a broader significance: God’s deliverance from adversity without payment of a price (2 Sam. 4:9; 1 Kings 1:29). But while a wider sense of redemption is sometimes seen in the Hebrew Scriptures (e.g., in Ruth), the climactic event of redemption is the deliverance of Israel in the exodus. The New Testament develops this further. Although redemption still has a national application (Luke 24:21) and a wider meaning (e.g., Heb. 11:35), it refers primarily to the atoning work of Jesus Christ through his sacrificial death for the sin of the world. Other faiths contain parallels to the wider biblical concept of redemption, and even to some extent to the specific saving work of Christ at the price of his sacrificial death. But such parallels are only a shadow of the unique redemption in Jesus Christ.

Modern Judaism believes in the redeeming triumph of good over evil both nationally and individually. The Talmud uses pdh to speak of ransom, while *g*l signifies redemption dependent on the covenant people’s repentance and obedient good deeds. Thus a price is paid, deliverance is achieved for the nation and for the believer, God triumphs in his goodness over all evil.

In Islam the Qur’an admonishes people to ask forgiveness for sin (40:55; 47:19; 48:2). The word for deliverance relates to the Hebrew for “cover” and thus to the atonement, which “covers” sins. Sura 37:107 talks of the sacrifice of Ishmael as a ransom; this is in keeping with the annual qurban sacrifice offered by Muslims on Eid-ul-adha, but seems to contradict 22:37 with its teaching that animal sacrifices are not propitiatory.

In Brahmanic Hinduism, sacrifice (ajna) generates cosmic power and plays a meaningful part in stimulating the gods to bring blessing to the cosmos. But ajna does not entail expiation of sin and bears little if any idea of propitiation of the righteous anger of God or the gods. Yet such sacrifices do deliver from the effects of evil, bringing blessings and material benefits to the world. Through animal sacrifices individual worshipers may also look to the gods to answer prayers, deliver from evil, and bring good things into their lives.

In Chinese and Japanese traditional religions sacrifices were propitiatory rather than expiatory; they were the means of approach to the gods and to the ancestral spirits of the nation. In Japan people also believed that sacrifices could supply the material needs of the gods and thus induce them to produce material blessings for the people. We may note in this a resemblance to earlier traditional religions in pre-Christian Europe, where the annual sacrifices of maidens satisfied the sexual needs of male deities and thus brought about increased fertility in humans and cattle as well as good crops. In contemporary traditional religions animal sacrifices may be used as a means toward reconciling opposing tribes or families. The shed blood delivers from the evil of hostility and brings the blessing of peace.

We conclude that parallels with Christian redemption do exist in other faiths (see also Redemptive Analogies). Sacrifices are used to appease deities, just as propitiation is a means of access to the Christian God. And many peoples believe in a redemption that delivers from evils and brings blessings both nationally and individually. But Christian redemption is also unique. There is no equivalent in other faiths to the God-initiated atonement through his own Son. The Jesus Christ who serves as an effective vicarious sacrifice for sin and brings the fullness of salvation to God’s people has no parallel.\footnote{Martin Goldsmith}

Redemptive Analogies. A concept introduced in Don Richardson’s Peace Child (1974) and further developed in his Lords of the Earth (1977) and Eternity in Their Hearts (1981). Richardson surmises that God, who ordained facets of Hebrew culture (e.g., animal sacrifice, the brazen serpent) to pre-figure Jesus as “the Lamb of God” and as one to be “lifted up,” providentially plants Christforeshadowing elements in other cultures as well.

An example of this is found in John’s Gospel, where Jesus personifies “Logos,” a Greek philosophical name for a principle of constancy hidden behind all that is changing in the universe. In Acts 17, Paul links the biblical Elohim with “Agnosto Theo,” the “unknown god” of pagan Athens. Elohim historically has found numerous expressions of the Creator God in various cultures worldwide. For example, he who became “Deus” in Latin and “Dios” in Spanish became also “Gott” in German, “Shangti” in Chinese, and “Hananim” in Korean.

Redemptive analogies may be either general to many cultures or special to one culture. The apostle Paul, who constantly moved from one cultural context to the next, naturally favored general redemptive analogies: farmer/crop, athlete/prize, soldier/armor, teacher/pupil, and the like. General redemptive analogies communicate to a wider audience but are less potent cultural bridges.

John, ministering primarily to Jews and Greeks, chose analogies unique to Jewish and Greek culture respectively, such as those mentioned above. An analogy that people recognize as special to their own culture can have greater impact among them.

Special redemptive analogies occur in two categories: (1) those indigenous symbols linked to monotheism, that is, the nearly universal sky-god traditions which yield already familiar aliases for Elohim in Gentile languages worldwide, and (2) those pertaining to indigenous ethics, that is, requirements of Old Testament law that are found “written on the hearts” of Gentiles who have never heard of Torah. Richardson cites Yali places of refuge in Irian Jaya, Dayak “scape-boats” in Borneo, and the Chinese way of writing “righteous” using symbols which mean “I under the lamb.”

Richardson finds that most writers on people movements miss the role of redemptive analogy as the cultural catalyst God often uses to trigger such movements. Missionaries who know how to find and employ redemptive analogies, he claims, are more likely to experience the mass response a people movement brings. Many conservative theologians downplay the importance of general revelation. They credit it only with a negative role of bringing enough knowledge to condemn, but not enough to save. Richardson perceives redemptive analogies as evidence that God has been making a positive communication through general revelation. Indeed, Acts 14:17 and Romans 2:14, 15 clarify general revelation as the progenitor of gospel-foreshadowing redemptive analogies in cultures around the globe. Is general revelation’s contribution ever so positive as to generate saving faith apart from knowledge of special revelation? That, Richardson maintains, is a separate question.

Reed, Mary (1854–1943). American missionary to India. Born the second of nine children to a prosperous family in Lowell, Ohio, she came to Christ at age sixteen. Two years later she finished her education and then taught in public schools for ten years. At that time she sensed God’s call on her life, and, with her parents’ approval, applied to the Woman’s Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. She was accepted and appointed to India, where she arrived in November 1884. Shortly after her arrival, she became sick and was sent to the Himalayas to recover and give time to language studies. It was there that she first saw a leper colony and sensed that God wanted her to work among them. She recovered, and returned to the work to which she had originally been assigned for the next five years. In January 1890 she again became ill, and this time was sent to the United States for diagnosis. The doctors in Cincinnati were baffled until God revealed to her that she herself had contracted leprosy. The diagnosis was confirmed by doctors in both New York and London. This cemented in her mind God’s earlier call. She returned to India, not telling her parents her real condition out of fear that they might forbid her from going. Once she arrived, she informed them by mail and began her work as a leper among lepers. She served in a dual appointment with the Methodists and the British Mission to Lepers until 1898, when health issues forced her to give undivided service to the leper ministry. Under the sovereignty of God, the disease was held from its normal course, giving her more than fifty years of active service among the outcasts of society. She took one furlough in 1912, and then remained with her ministry until her death.

The Reformation and Mission. Sixteenth-century Lutherans and Calvinists have been criticized for showing little or no interest in mission, while their Anabaptist contemporaries have been praised for their missionary activity. This oversimplification distorts the true picture. Mission in the Reformation was complex, and its form depended primarily on one’s understanding of the church. Luther adopted the medieval model of a territorial church, with the prince taking the leadership of its reformation. Thus mission was seen as the re-establishment of the church in a given area on the foundation of Reformation theology and structure (see Lutheran Missions). Calvin’s model was similar (see Calvinism). The Anabaptist view of the church led to a different understanding: all, Catholics and Protestants alike, are called into communities of adult baptized believers that are separated from the state.

Another factor was the rejection of monasticism by Protestants for theological reasons, even though monastic communities had been the primary vehicle of mission since the fourth century (see Monastic Movement). This left Protestant churches with no adequate structure for mission beyond their own territories. As Lutheranism and Calvinism struggled to survive in the chaotic situation, the process of reformation and mission was mixed with politics and war. Many rulers accepted or rejected Protestantism for political motives, while others did so out of deep religious conviction.

The ideas of the Reformers were spread first of all through their writings, taken from one part of
The Reformation and Mission

Europe to another by scholars, but also by merchants and tradesmen who visited Reformation centers and spread the new ideas. The most significant missionary activity of Lutherans and Calvinists took place through former students at Wittenberg or Geneva. Lutheranism was established in areas where the rulers accepted it, and Bible translation was important in the process. This was true in the Scandinavian countries. Hans Tausen, a leader of the Reformation in Denmark, translated the New Testament in 1524. Johannes Bugenhagen led the reorganization of the Danish Church. The Reformation was introduced into Iceland by Oddur Gottskalkson, who translated the New Testament in 1540. Olaf and Lars Petersson were the leaders of the movement in Sweden. Michael Agricola led the Reformation in Finland, translating the New Testament, the Psalms, and some of the prophets. Matthias Devay began his ministry in Hungary in 1531, and along with Ganos Erdosy translated the New Testament into Magyar. Others took the Lutheran Reformation to Poland, Moravia, and the Baltic states. All of them had studied in Germany, most of them in Wittenberg.

Calvin was more intentional in encouraging mission. In some areas Calvinism became the religion of the state; in other areas local churches were established amidst persecution. Pastors were trained in Geneva and sent as missionaries; many were martyred. The 161 pastors who went from Geneva to the Reformed churches of France were a Protestant counterpart to the Society of Jesus. The movement was taken to the Low Countries by Protestants fleeing from persecution in France. In 1561 Guido de Brès, who had studied in Geneva, drafted the Belgic Confession, which bound together the congregations in the Low Countries. Calvinism exerted significant influence on English Protestantism through refugees who studied in Geneva and Zurich during the reign of Mary (1553–58) and then took Reformation ideas back to Britain after her death. John Knox established Presbyterianism in Scotland; others laid the foundations of Puritanism. The only Protestant mission outside of Europe in the sixteenth century was the Calvinist mission to Brazil in 1555, which eventually ended in betrayal and martyrdom.

The Anabaptists, beginning in Zurich in 1525, spread their faith as they fled from persecution. They also intentionally sent out missionaries to many areas of western Europe: southern Germany, upper Austria, Moravia, Hungary, and the Low Countries. Many of their greatest leaders, including Jacob Hutter and Balthasar Hubmaier, were burned at the stake. The Hutterites sent out scores of missionaries, some designated as servants of the Word, while others were ordinary brethren. Perhaps the most effective Anabaptist leader was Menno Simons, baptized as an adult in 1535; traveling widely in the Low Countries and northern Germany, he organized communities of believers. The Mennonite churches take their name from him.

Although the Reformers can be criticized for an inadequate ecclesiology with little place for mission in their church structure, they did lay the theological foundation for the later missionary movement. Calvin affirmed that God wills to offer the gospel to all peoples without exception. The Reformers also encouraged a considerable amount of missionary activity within western Europe even as they struggled for survival. With the exception of the Calvinist expedition to Brazil, Protestants would not be involved in mission outside of Europe until the Puritans went to Native Americans in the seventeenth century.

Reformed Missions. Reformed missions encompasses the missiological reflection and action of churches with roots in the sixteenth-century Protestant Reformation who followed particularly the teaching of John Calvin (see Calvinism). Reformed missions includes a Trinitarian perspective on the church’s missionary call and action that is kingdom-oriented, concerned with all of life, and governed by Scripture alone. Ecclesia reformata semper reformanda (a Reformed church is continually reforming) is a Reformed principle that holds true for both church and society. Following this line of thought, Dutch Reformed missiologist Johannes Verkuyl defined missiology as “the study of the salvation activities of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit toward this world. In dependence on the Holy Spirit and by word and deed the church is to communicate the total gospel and the total divine law to all (humanity)” (Verkuyl, 1978, 5).

Reformed theory of missions has its roots in the thought of Calvin and was subsequently articulated in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries by those who followed him: Dutch thinkers like Adrianus Saravia (1531–1613), Gisbert Voetius (1588–1676), J. Heurnius (1587–1651); and Americans John Eliot (1604–90), David Brainerd (1718–47), and Jonathan Edwards (1703–58). Gisbert Voetius was the first Protestant to develop a comprehensive “theology of mission.” Dutch Reformed mission work began in Formosa in 1627. From 1622 to 1633 there was a seminary in Leyden for training missionaries (who were sent mostly to Indonesia and Ceylon). In 1648, J. Heurnius wrote An Exhortation Worthy of Consideration, to Embark upon an Evangelical Mission among the Indians, a work that would find surprising parallels in William Carey’s Enquiry more than 170 years later. Heurnius himself went to Indonesia as a missionary.

In spite of the fact that Calvin was in touch with the establishment of a French colony in Brazil and that some German Reformed persons attempted something with the Slavs and the Turks, it would be a fair judgment to say that the Reformers did not have a missionary zeal like that exhibited by much of Protestantism in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Yet there is much in Reformed theology that forms the foundation for all subsequent Protestant missions. Samuel Zwemer asserted that “the very principles on which the modern missionary movement had its origin are to be found in Calvin’s theology” (Zwemer, 1950, 207). Three major emphases of the sixteenth-century Reformation were the sovereignty of God, reality of grace, and a rediscovery of hope.

In the New England colonies, the best-known Protestant missionary pioneer was Puritan (and Reformed) John Eliot (1604–90), who ministered from the 1640s until his death among the Native Americans of Massachusetts. In developing his missionary theology, Jonathan Edwards drew from the work and thought of John Eliot and the ministry and diary of David Brainerd, among others. Edwards was himself a missionary from 1751 to 1757 to a Native American settlement in Stockbridge, Massachusetts.

During the twentieth century, Western mission theory has been deeply affected by Reformed missiologists, including Abraham Kuyper, J. H. Bavinck, Hendrik Kraemer, J. C. Hoekendijk, Johannes Blauw, David Bosch, Lesslie Newbigin, Johannes Verkuyl, Arthur Glasser, and Harvie Conn, to name a few.

Coupled with “the priesthood of all believers,” a number of Reformed concepts have been essential in the construction of modern mission theory. Edmund Clowney suggested themes such as “the glory of God; the goal of missions; the grace of God, the source of missions; the Kingdom of God, the power of missions; and the Word of God, the message of missions” (Clowney, 1977, 128).

Reformed theology of mission affirms the sovereignty of God over all of life. This emphasis on God’s sovereignty calls for a Trinitarian approach to mission that sees God the Father as the Creator and initiator of mission, Jesus Christ the Son as the Sent-one in whose mission the Body of Christ participates, and the Holy Spirit as the motivator, agent, and guide of the church’s participation in God’s mission. On the negative side, a rationalist and hyper-Calvinist stream of thought emerged that insisted that if God predestines individuals for salvation and others to perdition (double predestination), then Christians should leave it to him to save whom he wishes to save, according to his own pleasure. At times, this concept of predestination has had an unfortunate paralyzing effect on Reformed mission.

A second major aspect of Reformed mission is its strong christological emphasis. However, during the late seventeenth century a controversy arose between Theodore Beza, Calvin’s successor in Geneva, and Adrian Saravia (1531–1613). Saravia contended that the Great Commission had abiding validity for the church in all times, while Beza and much of Calvinism of the time affirmed that the Great Commission was a special labor uniquely given by Jesus to the apostles and limited to them and their time.

Third, Reformed mission stresses the unique and indispensable role of the church in mission: church-focused, but not church-centric. Seeing the church as a gathering of those who believe in Jesus Christ by grace through faith, Reformed mission perceives the whole church, including the laity, to be apostolic in its sentness and catholic in its universal extension. Negatively, sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Calvinism maintained a close, almost medieval, relationship between the church and the state, and thus mission was assumed to be the responsibility of civil government, as one can see, for example, in Article 36 of the Belgic Confession.

Finally, Reformed mission emphasizes the critical role of the Scriptures in evaluating and guiding mission. “The Church must in every generation be ready to brings its tradition afresh under the light of the Word of God. But not only must we examine our methods. The structures of the congregations; the relations between Western churches and those in Asia, Africa, and Latin America; the nature of the (missions of the churches) today; and the plans for future projects must also be (placed) under the examining light of God’s Word” (Newbigin, quoted in Verkuyl, 1978, 5). Reformed mission seeks to be reformed and always in the process of reforming according to the Word of God.

On every continent there are churches that derive their histories from the efforts of Reformed missionary organizations and personnel. Today two of the most significant global fellowships of Reformed churches are the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (WARC) and the Reformed Ecumenical Synod. Both organizations seek to foster mission vision, initiative, and cooperation among Reformed and Presbyterian churches and mission organizations worldwide.

Refugee Mission Work. Refugees are those who are displaced from their natural residence and who fear (for whatever reason) to return. They may be uprooted because of systematic genocidal campaigns, religious or political persecution, denial of fundamental civil rights, and so on. Refugees often lack the most basic necessities of food, water, and shelter. Typically defenseless, they are at the mercy of those in power over the territory in which they seek refuge. They often fear revealing what they have experienced because of repercussions from those in power. Even mission agencies working among them may be unable to publicize the stories since they depend on permission from governments to continue their work.

The Old Testament enjoins providing sanctuary for outcasts and refugees, including cities of refuge for those who commit accidental manslaughter (Num. 35:6–15). Israel became a nation of refugees because of Israel’s apostasy (as promised in Deut. 28:63–68). Their repentance, however, resulted in a promise of being regathered and restored (Deut. 30:3–5; Isa. 11:11–12; Jer. 30:12–22). The nations around Israel also suffered as outcasts (Moab, Isa. 16:3 and Jer. 30:16). While the New Testament has no direct reference to refugees, we do see that Christians will be judged in light of their work on behalf of the poor and the oppressed (Matt. 25:31–46), which certainly includes refugees.

Prior to the twentieth century, with international travel relatively unrestricted, and the right of asylum taken for granted, there were generally less problems of dislocation. As the twentieth century progressed, however, new requirements (e.g., passports, visas, and qualifications for asylum), complicated the problems of repatriation and settlement. Today refugees are often people not only without a home, but like the Palestinians, they may also be without a country for decades. In emotional and physical shock at having to leave their homes, refugees often have nothing more than the clothing they wear. Typically by the time they are forced to evacuate they have been witnesses to incredible atrocities committed against friends, neighbors, and immediate family members. Women and children are particularly vulnerable and are all too often the favored targets of attack.

Since most displacement presently takes place in third world contexts, those fleeing are typically perceived by the countries of asylum as bringing unbearable demands on strained economies. Consequently, they may receive little if any assistance and may even be repelled (e.g., the boat refugees from Cambodia, China, or Cuba) or forcibly repatriated.

Four mission organizations directly working among and on behalf of refugee populations today may be noted. Christian Aid was founded in 1945 to help European refugees after World War II, and is now active in over 70 countries. The World Council of Churches is also active. There were ecumenical efforts to help Jews escaping Nazi persecution even before the formation of the WCC in 1948; at one time refugee work was the single largest operation in the WCC, though now the work has been decentralized among regional (e.g., Action by Churches Together and Church World Service) and denominational (e.g., United Methodist Committee on Relief, Church of the Brethren Refugee/Disaster Services, Presbyterian Disaster Assistance, etc.) organizations. Refugees International was founded in 1979 in response to the Cambodian and Vietnamese refugee plight, and they actively promote refugee issues and situations in political circles in the United States. World Relief, founded in 1979 as the relief arm of the National Association of Evangelicals, is now working in more than 25 cities in the United States helping refugees cope with settling and gaining citizenship.

The total refugee population can fluctuate dramatically from year to year; the UN statistics show a decrease from 15.4 million refugees in 1995 to 13.2 million in 1996, primarily because of the repatriation of 1.6 million African refugees. The total number of UN recognized refugees, displaced, and at risk for 1996 was 22.7 million, of which only 11.7 million received assistance. Jesus’ emphasis on the response to the naked, the thirsty, the hungry, the outcast, the sick, and the imprisoned (Matt. 25:31–46) still stands as a foundation for our moral obligation to participate in meaningful ways in the lives of refugees.

Reincarnation and Transmigration. The hope for release from the world of travail and toils is as old as humanity since Adam’s fall. The belief in transmigration is in part an expression of this aspiration. Even though the belief that the soul is repeatedly reborn in different bodies is found in many ancient cultures, the concept as we understand it today owes much to Hinduism, in particular the Upanishads and the Bhagavad Gita.

According to Hindu thought, the soul (Atman) is immortal. It has neither beginning nor end. It exists in one of three states: dormancy, incarnation, or liberation from the wheel of existence. The soul, though eternal, takes numerous transient physical bodies during its sojourn in order to realize its true spiritual nature. Once a body is dead, the soul then migrates to a higher or lower form of life depending on the law of karma, the principle of cause and effect, sowing and reaping. This process of rebirths can go on indefinitely until the karmic energy is stopped, that is, all the bad deeds have been recompensed by good ones. A person’s present existence is not necessarily a direct result of actions from the immediate past, but most likely from unknowable previous incarnations. Salvation is not birth into a better life, but total release from the wheel of transmigration.

Relativist, Relativism. The term “relativism” is used in various ways. Descriptively, relativism merely indicates the fact of diversity. Thus “cultural relativism” is sometimes used to mean that various cultures have different beliefs, practices, and values, the function and significance of which must be appreciated from within the framework of the culture itself.

In a normative or ideological sense, relativism (whether cognitive, cultural, ethical, or religious) maintains that ultimately rationality norms, or truth, or criteria for assessing alternative perspectives all arise from particular contexts (sociocultural, historical, linguistic, conceptual) and thus are only applicable within those contexts. There are no universally valid truths or principles. This clearly conflicts with the Christian gospel, which affirms that there are truths that hold universally and apply to all people in all cultures.

Relativism in some form has always been an attractive option, especially at times when people are exposed to the great diversity in human cultures. It is a small and often easy step from the observation that people do in fact have different beliefs and values to the conclusion that there are no universally valid truths. In the modern West, relativism has been encouraged not only by increasing awareness of diversity but also by a pervasive skepticism concerning ethics and religion. Eastern traditions such as Hinduism and Buddhism have long emphasized the relativity and limited nature of human knowledge.

However, ever since the time of Plato it has been pointed out that relativism is a self-defeating position. Any statement of relativism, if intended to be more than “relatively true,” implicitly appeals to the falsity of the central thesis of relativism. Furthermore, the price of accepting relativism is not only loss of the right to make universal truth claims but also forfeiture of the right to criticize any alternative perspective as false. The challenge for Christian missions is to maintain a proper appreciation for the great diversity in human cultures while upholding truths, expressed in God’s revelation, which are binding on all peoples in all cultures at all times.

Relief Work. Mercy to and relief of the sufferer has been part of Christian practice from the early church to the present. Jewish culture, on which so many of the early church practices were based, structured acts of charity into the life of the people. The Old Testament contains numerous laws and practices regarding response to the poor and weak (Exod. 22:25–27; Deut. 15:7–11; 24:19–21). The conflicts that arise in Acts 6 really emerge out of the Jerusalem church’s attempt to live compassionately in response to needy widows.

The history of Christianity from Francis of Assisi to Martin Luther, from the Wesley brothers to the modern missionary movement, is replete with accounts of outstanding men and women who have represented Christ by bringing relief and wholeness physically to the tragedies and crises of various societies. However, without serious reflection on the larger socioeconomic context in which poverty and crisis occur, well-intended compassionate efforts can really be nothing more than the phenomenon of “rice Christianity,” which is the tendency to use efforts of compassion as a means to an end by dangling goods and services in front of people as a carrot for acceptance of the Christian faith.

A current definition of relief is “urgent provision of resources to reduce suffering resulting from a natural or human-made disaster.” It is, in essence, immediate and temporary, prolonged only when self-reliance is impossible. The United States has over 250 Christian agencies which spe-
Relief Work

Socialyze in relief efforts around the world. These organizations are diverse theologically; some are governmentally subsidized and some are privately funded. Definitions of the term "relief" vary widely among these organizations.

While relief should never be completely distinct from development, these two related functions must be differentiated. Relief seeks to salvage human life and prolong survival in crisis circumstances. Development is a process that enables a community to provide for its own needs, above previous levels. Development must be indigenous, comprehensive, and aimed at improved self-reliance.

Christian relief work must ultimately rise above traditional reactive methods and plan proactively. Natural disasters and regional crises will inevitably impact poverty or frustrate the progress of the poor to reach self-reliance. Learning the method of contingency planning can dramatically reduce losses in crises necessitating relief intervention. The key to relief is to address potential needs before disaster occurs.

Relief from a Christian perspective is not just alleviating the effects of war, natural disasters, or tragedy. Christian relief involves the whole person who is introduced to new life under the rule of God's kingdom.

The following are some key objectives in a theology of relief: (1) Engagement in disaster relief must be efficient and effective, meeting real needs in a God-honoring way. (2) Relief efforts must be done with genuine care, compassion, and respect for a people and their culture. (3) The lifestyles and manner of relief workers must evidence that the Good News is true. (4) There should not be any attempt to proselytize, capitalize on tragedy, or discriminate in distribution of supplies. (5) The presentation of the Christian message must be adapted to the degree of knowledge and understanding of Jesus Christ in the context being served. (6) Finally, long-term effects on the people in their journey with Jesus Christ should always be considered.

Religion. Religion is a word/concept that attempts to cover a type of human experience as it relates to a transcendent reality. Religion is a familiar word that communicates a commonly recognized content. But for all its familiarity, it is a difficult word to define. This difficulty of definition has three main sources.

The first is a common and unavoidable one. As a word, "religion" is a Western creation from the Latin root, religia, meaning "to unite." As a Western word, religion has accumulated meaning that is often more in concert with the structures of Western religions such as Judaism, Christianity, and Islam (where the task of religion is to "unite" the human and divine spheres), than with Eastern religions such as Hinduism and Buddhism (where the task of religion is to recognize the oneness of all being) or indigenous religions (where the task is to live in harmony with the god-imitating structures of tribe or ethnic group). Still, although the Westernization of the word/concept must be recognized, these origins have sometimes been overemphasized to the point that an essential idea is lost: some word must be used to describe this seeming universal class of human experience and a word whose root means to join or unite is not that far off from the task of religions, be they Western, Eastern, or indigenous.

The second source of difficulty in defining religion stems from a general uncertainty over where exactly the essence of this common class of human experience is located. "Theologians" or professors of a particular religious tradition locate the essence of religion in the reality of the God, gods, or transcendent principle of their religious belief. For theologians, then, religion becomes the set of beliefs, and institutions that relate, identify, or explain that transcendence to human beings and the material realm. Others locate the essence of religion in a common human nature, although they tend to assign different aspects of human nature as the locus classicus of human religious experience. Some, like Anders Nygren, see religion as a function of rationality: "Religion is belief in divine beings." Friedrich Schleiermacher, on the other hand, found religion’s root in human emotions: "Religion is the feeling of absolute dependence." Still others locate religion in a set of volitions: "Religion is what the individual does with his own solitariness" (Alfred North Whitehead). Social scientists locate the essence of religion in a function of human social behavior, whether personal/psychological or social: "Religion is the feeling, acts, and experiences of individual men in their solitude, so far as they apprehend themselves to stand in relation to whatever they may consider the divine" (William James). "When a certain number of sacred things sustain relations of coordination or subordination with each other in such a way as to form a system, having a certain unity, but which is not comprised within any other system of the same sort, the totality of those beliefs and their corresponding rites constitutes a religion" (Emile Durkeim).

Each of these locations—transcendence, human nature, human society—produces valid and useful definitions of religion. Their diversity, however, means one must be clear in their use. Clearly stating the definitions one is using, and the purposes of those definitions, is mandatory. The diversity also points out the complexity of the word/concept. "Religion" is an attempt to bring under one broad umbrella an incredible diversity of religious ideas and practices.

The third source of the difficulty of defining religion is positing transcendence itself. Most definitions of religion recognize, if not the reality of, then the belief in, an entity that is above and beyond the mundane world of everyday existence. Yet by definition such an entity is beyond definition. When it comes to a definition of religion, this poses different yet related problems for all three of the approaches to religion we discussed in the last section. For the teachers of a particular religion, this transcendent principle is usually a presupposition, not only in terms of existence but in terms of qualities and nature. Any definition of religion in such a context, then, is heavily influenced by the nature of the presupposed transcendent. For those who locate religion in a common human nature, transcendence takes on a dual role of creator and created of the essential human nature. For social scientists, transcendence is reduced to a psychological or sociological construct, at least in so far as their study of religion is concerned. For all three, the reality of transcendence is lost as soon as it is defined.

For evangelicals, none of these three categories of definitions—and their attendant problems—should be considered out of bounds. Religion is ultimately a confessional enterprise, even for the a-religious. But religion may also with profit be viewed as a facet of human nature and an observable social construct. That the roots of each of these may be interpreted differently need not diminish their descriptive value.

Religious Freedom. An attitude and conduct of tolerance for another person’s or group's religious beliefs and practices. This involves respect for the opinion and practices of other faiths that may be in conflict with one’s own. Diversity threatens the unity of orthodoxy and has been the foundation for such confrontations. The problem of religious freedom and Christian mission is prominent in church history.

Jesus and the early church suffered persecution by the Romans yet the spontaneous expansion of the Christian church flourished. Missionary bands traveled the Roman roads encountering sporadic and localized persecution. This continued until the fourth century because the church was seen to be politically subversive to the state and a threat to Roman unity (e.g., Acts 16:19–24). The situation was reversed when Constantine and the Edict of Milan (313) gave religious equality to Christianity. The church then became the persecutor and Christian mission faced new dangers. Instead of mission being guided by the Holy Spirit and penetrating culture, it became politically and militarily motivated and lost evangelistic force.

Through the Middle Ages the idea of the Christian state remained and became entrenched with the establishment of the Holy Roman Empire by Charlemagne in 800. Church membership and citizenship of the empire were inextricably connected. Thus, enemies of the church were enemies of the empire and were duly prosecuted, forcing the conversion of conquered peoples. This not only happened to non-Christians, but also to Christians who believed differently from the institutional church. Perhaps the most important renewal mission movement between the sixth-century Celts and the thirteenth-century Friars were the Waldensians. The people movement begun in France by Peter Waldo (1140–1218) sent out itinerant missionaries to preach the gospel and administer baptism and the Lord’s Supper. They spread very rapidly to Italy, Austria, Bohemia, Moravia, Germany, Hungary, and Poland. The Waldensians were seen as heretics and suffered severe persecution because they had a different view of the gospel and the church.

In fourteenth-century England another Christian mission group to suffer under the hands of the established church was the Lollards. At the beginning John Wycliffe’s biblical teaching formed a student movement as he sent out preachers to the common people to teach them the Scriptures in their own language. The church condemned Wycliffe in 1382, yet the Lollards continued sharing the truths of Scripture through the following century despite persecution. At the same time in Europe, John Huss (1373–1415) preached the centrality of Christ with a combination of nationalistic and religious passion. He was eventually burned at the stake by the Council of Constance for his attacks on the church’s corruption.

Lack of religious freedom continued with the Protestant Reformation. Since the Christian state was still seen to be valid, Protestantism was not tolerated in Catholic countries and Catholicism was not tolerated in Protestant nations. Those who did not conform to either were seen as dissenters and were persecuted as heretics. Such a group was the Anabaptists, who did not believe that infant baptism was scriptural and so performed adult baptism. They felt that Luther and Calvin had not gone far enough in reforming the Catholic Church and rejected even more of the medieval church practices. Their understanding of mission was to win people to their way of viewing Christianity. Some of these evangelical Anabaptist groups were passionate missionaries and traveled all over Western Europe sharing their faith in areas of Moravia, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Holland, and Belgium (see ANABAPTIST MISSIONS). Many were martyred since the wider society believed that religious uniformity was essential for social unity and that religious separatism would cause the disintegration of the social fabric.

Another Christian renewal movement that suffered a lack of religious freedom was Puritanism in sixteenth-century England. Influenced by the continental reformers, they wanted to reform the Church of England. In 1593 the Puritans were forced by a series of acts to submit to the Anglican Church. This eventually led to the Puritan Revolution, where Parliament and the Puritans fought against the monarch and the Church of England. This movement had a significant effect on Pietism in Germany through its devotional writings. The first Western missionaries to the Native Americans of North America were the Puritans JOHN ELIOT and Samuel Mayhew. The pietists responded by sending the first Protestant missionaries from Europe to Asia—Heinrich Plutschau and BARThOLOMAUS ZIEGEBALG who went to India.

Moravianism and Methodism were two similar reform movements that wanted to remain in the institutional church as a renewing element, but were rejected by the state church. Zinzendorf’s Moravians mobilized for mission and went to the West Indies (1732), South Africa, Greenland, Labrador, Egypt, Surinam, Guiana, and twenty-one other countries in the same number of years (see MORAVIAN MISSIONS). Eventually Zinzendorf was banished from Saxony and the Moravians were forced to separate from the Lutheran Church. Moravianism became a major catalyst of the whole missionary movement and influenced JOHN WESLEY, the founder of Methodism. Again the Methodists suffered religious intoleration from the Anglican Church and wanted to remain within its borders. This was not to be the case and eventually Wesley was forced into a de facto relationship in 1784 by ordaining his own Methodist preachers and missionaries.

Religious freedom for modern missions has much to learn from church history. Such courage to share the gospel has weakened the bigotry of the wider society, but there are still many areas of the world where religious freedom is seen as a human right. However, current trends of religious fundamentalisms in the Middle East, changes in the policies regarding religion of many European socialist states, and an increase in political-religious conflict in Asia continue to make Christian missionary endeavors ever reliant on the guidance and strength of the Lord of the church.

Religious Scriptures. The word “scripture” comes from a Latin term meaning “that which is written.” A vast amount of sacred literature (the BIBLE, QUR’AN, the Vedas, Tao Te Ching) is preserved in written form. Oral tradition (story, poem, song, proverb, etc.) also occupies a similar place among the sacred lore of certain societies. Scriptures are a powerful source of meaning, cohesiveness, and self-identity for a particular community, shaping its worldview and providing moral guidelines.

Nature of Sacred Scripture. Although there is considerable diversity among religious traditions concerning the nature and function of sacred scripture, some common themes emerge.

Sacredness. Religious scriptures are regarded as sacred due to their connection with the divine. Within oral traditions a special power is sometimes regarded as being inherent within the sounds of certain sacred words or symbols. The sacred power is said to be released through proper singing or incantation of the words (e.g., the mantra in Vedic HINDUISM).

Authority. Written scriptures are regarded as authoritative because of their connection with the divine or transcendent. But the nature of such authority varies: Christianity and ISLAM ascribe definitive authority to their scriptures, whereas some traditions of Hinduism and Buddhism have less strict understandings of authority for their scriptures. But for most traditions the scriptures are normative for worship, doctrine, and behavior.

Revelation. MONOTHEISTIC traditions regard their scriptures as specially revealed by God, although Christianity and Islam have very different views on the nature and content of such revelation. Hindus distinguish between smriti (“that which is remembered”) and sruti (“that which is heard”), the latter being regarded as texts specially revealed to the sages. Buddhist scriptures are not regarded as products of divine REVELATION so much as the authoritative insights of “enlightened ones.”

Inspiration. The sacred writings of most traditions are regarded as inspired in a general sense, although monotheistic traditions have more clearly defined notions of divine inspiration. For Islam divine inspiration of the Qur’an means there is no human contribution to the writing of the Qur’an; it was dictated in Arabic to Muhammad. Christians maintain that the Bible is fully inspired by God, but that God used the distinctives of human authorship in putting his Revelation in writing.
Religious Typologies

Religious Typologies. A religious typology is a means of classifying different religious systems. A number of religious typologies have been proposed, including the following.

Auguste Comte (1798–1857) posited three stages in the evolution of thought: (1) the theological stage, with spiritual beings; (2) the metaphysical stage, with abstract invisible forces; and (3) the positivistic stage, where causes are sought in a scientific and pragmatic manner. E. B. Tylor (1832–1917) proposed five stages: (1) Animism, belief in spiritual beings and an afterlife, (2) fetishism, (3) belief in demons, (4) Polytheism, and (5) Monotheism. Sir James Frazer (1854–1941) postulated that humans began with Magic. When they found magic ineffective, they turned to religion, and finally to science. This schema, especially the belief that science if pursued far enough will yield ultimate answers, is held by many today. R. R. Marett (1866–1943) believed animatism is basic to a religious system. His theory is based on his learning about mana, supernatural power that is present in certain men, spirits, and natural objects, in some Pacific cultures, and similar concepts in other cultures. Karl Marx (1818–83) theorized that the disappearance of religion would result in a classless society. He viewed religion as a tool of exploitation of the people. He predicted that as cultures and societies become more modernized and industrialized, Secularization would eventually eliminate religion.

Each of the above theories has failed under reality checks. Fieldworkers found that people in technologically primitive cultures believe in God, the sustainer and creator of life. Thus many groups have been monotheists for centuries. Wilhelm Schmidt (1868–1954), who conducted field research in South America among people in Tierra del Fuego, in Africa (Rwanda), and on the Andaman Islands in the Indian Ocean, provided data that contradict these early theories.

Wallace proposed four typologies: (1) individual religious systems, (2) communal religions, (3) ecclesiastical institutions, and (5) universalistic religions. A possible fifth category is secularism, including secular humanism. Each of the more complex religious systems, with the possible exception of secularism, encompasses all that are below it. Traditionally the type of religious system often correlated with the level of sociopolitical complexity of the society. For example, hunter and gatherer societies tend toward individual and communal religious institutions while state societies tend to have ecclesiastical and universalistic religions.

In individualistic religious systems, individuals function as their own religious specialists (e.g., the vision quest by North American plains Indians). Communal religions have great diversity. Ecclesiastical religions have creeds, sacred scrip-
Religious Typologies

... and religious specialists who are organized hierarchically (e.g., the religions developed in Egypt, China, Mesopotamia, Rome, Greece, Mesoamerica, South America, and Africa; examples include the religions of the Aztec, Maya, and Inca). In universalistic religions, adherents claim that their religious messages apply to all of humanity (e.g., Judaism, Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, and Buddhism). These are known as the great religious traditions.

In secularization and accompanying individualism, religion becomes a private affair, separate from social, political, and economic institutions. Secular humanism is the dominant ideology in many modern states. One problem with this perspective is that it is not possible to abstract religion from the rest of culture. To do so undermines a culture’s moral and ethical foundations. Religion, with its moral and ethical principles, is essential for a stable healthy society.

Religious Ultimacy. Most religions identify a being or state as ontologically ultimate. The religious ultimate provides an explanation for the cosmos, gives life its meaning, and defines the spiritual goal of religion. Yet religions disagree on the nature of the religious ultimate.

Monotheistic traditions ascribe ultimacy to the one eternal God, a personal being who acts and is the Creator of all that exists. Christianity understands God to be a Holy Trinity, with Jesus Christ being God incarnate. Judaism and Islam both reject the deity of Jesus Christ, but they disagree over the nature of God’s revelation to humankind. There are also theistic traditions within Hinduism, focusing on Shiva or Vishnu, as well as in Pure Land Buddhism, with its devotion to the Amida Buddha. Sikhism regards the one God as the True Name.

Monistic traditions identify religious ultimacy with the one true reality. Advaita Vedanta Hinduism regards nirguna Brahman (Brahman beyond all attributes or dualism) as the sole reality; Vishisht-Advaita Vedanta holds that the one reality, Brahman, is a personal being with distinctions and attributes. In Mahayana Buddhism the religious ultimate is thought of as the Dharma-kaya (the Buddha as the absolute, formless, ineffable reality underlying all phenomena) or as sunyata (Emptiness, the Void). Chinese Taoism regards the ultimate as the Tao (the Way), the source and pattern of the cosmos.

Some traditions are atheistic, denying the reality of any deities. Although Jainism recognizes higher beings on various celestial levels, they are finite beings subject to rebirth. Theravada Buddhism ascribes ultimacy to nirvana, which alone is unconditioned and permanent.

In polytheistic and animistic traditions there are many deities and supernatural beings, usually with no single ultimate deity. Japanese Shinto holds that the many kami include phenomena of nature, ancestors, living persons, and animals. In some primal religions and African traditional religions there is recognition of a High God, a supreme deity who rules over all but who may be far removed from the affairs of daily life.

Renewal Movements. Change is an inevitable part of life. All cultures and religions experience times of decline and decay. In order for them to survive, revitalization and renewal are necessary.

Cultural Revitalization. Revitalization movements are a deliberate effort to construct a more satisfying culture. Though they may include religious elements, their major focus involves the entire cultural system. When reality provides no escape from the frustration of social deterioration, revitalization movements offer a way out.

The Ghost Dance of the American Indians, the Mau Mau of Africa, and the Cargo Cults of Melanesia longed for the defeat of an enemy, freedom from slavery, and arrival of utopian riches. These dreams were nurtured by anxiety that reached an explosive intensity. In each case, the anticipated overthrow of an existing system—and inauguration of a replacement—was an attempt to reduce stress.

According to Anthony Wallace, a common sequence in revitalization movements involves: (1) the normal state in which needs are adequately met by existing components in the society; (2) a period of increased stress, where frustration is amplified by outside domination or lack of material goods; (3) a time of cultural distortion when normative methods of releasing tension are laid aside; and (4) the rise of a revitalization movement, a dynamic group within a community dedicated to overcoming degradation in their midst. Often these movements are out of touch with reality, doomed to failure from the start. Sometimes revitalization movements stir a latent power within a culture whereby satisfying correctives are generated. As a result, further decline is avoided, achieving a new normal state.
Spiritual Renewal. Religions remain viable only as they periodically experience renewal. The divine side of renewal is called revival. The human manifestation is labeled nativistic, messianic, millennial, or renewal movements. Though they differ in form and content from place to place and from time to time, renewal movements typically emerge when religions lose their vitality. Where renewal furnishes a system of meaningful beliefs and practices—a system useful in dealing with the realities of life—old beliefs and practices are altered or abandoned (depending on the extent and immediacy of the need for change). Under such circumstances, teachers, leaders, messengers, prophets, or messiahs provide supernaturally sanctioned reinterpretations of traditional ideologies, establish a new sect within the old religious system, or begin a new religion. Spiritual renewal usually involves both burning and inventing, a reworking of old and adding of new religious elements.

Renewal is instigated by various conditions and implemented through different processes. Religion grows stale when excitement, sacrifice, and commitment give way to cold, mechanical, and impersonal performance. What began as a vibrant movement hardens into a lifeless organization. Vision is lost. Focus shifts from people to programs, from flexibility to rigidity, from ministry to administration. The shell of religiosity no longer satisfies the human need to meet the holy. A seedbed for change, the conditions for renewal are present.

Religion should be an intensely personal matter expressed in a closely knit community. When these are absent, renewal will focus on individuals and organizations. Individual renewal is needed when religious fervor wanes. Spiritual refreshment comes from above (chants, sermons, prayer, meditations, songs, and pilgrimages help fan the dying embers of a sagging faith into the glowing warmth of a new life). Newness expresses itself in two areas. First, individual renewal will result in personal restoration. People will rededicate themselves to their religion, recommit themselves to their God or gods. A personal restoration includes abandoning an old life and adopting a new life that brings knowledge, healing, liberation, purity, salvation, or forgiveness. Second, individual renewal will express itself in ritual rejuvenation. Ritual is a way of acting out religion, a way of escaping the secular routine of daily living to enter spiritual realms. The solution to dead rituals is not rejecting but regenerating them. Renewal reestablishes the sacred in worship. A confrontation with the holy restores a sense of awe, mystery, or respect for the divine.

Organizational renewal is needed when an institution imposes dehumanizing rules and procedures on its members. Since some sort of religious system is essential, the solution is not destroying but renewing organization. Reforming churches, monasteries, fellowships, orders, agencies, and movements will minimize their evil and maximize their good. Organizational renewal takes two forms. First, it manifests itself in para-institutions. Those organizations that stand alongside existing institutions address particular issues that have been neglected, lost, or deemphasized by the older organizations. Such groups attract talented people with high commitment. As older organizations lose members and resources, they either die, create rivalries, or renew themselves. Recent Christian para-institutions include Focus on the Family, Promise Keepers, InterVarsity Christian Fellowship, Christian Businessman’s Club, Youth for Christ, Navigators, and Campus Crusade for Christ (see PARACHURCH AGENCIES). Non-Christian para-institutions include the Rastafarians, Radhasoami, Eckankar, Theosophy, and the Anthroposophical Society.

Organizational renewal reveals itself in new structures. When bureaucratic inertia and membership nominalism deaden an organization, those who retain the commitment of the “founders” may begin anew. Reshaping the old seems hopeless. New structures become a viable option. Catholic orders and Protestant denominations are salient Christian examples of this phenomenon. Black Muslims, New Thought Movement, The Self-Realization Fellowship, Soka Gakkai, Great White Brotherhood, and the Bahai faith are new structures that grew out of non-Christian religious organizations.

Culture and religion provide a worldview that describes and explains the nature of the universe, humanity, and the holy. As circumstances render elements of WORLDVIEW impracticable, new beliefs and practices are required. Where change is slow, there is usually time for gradual adjustments. Where change is rapid, traditional beliefs and practices fail to help adherents adjust quickly enough. As a consequence, cultural revitalization and spiritual renewal often develop. When these adaptive efforts succeed, new cultural and spiritual expressions are born that will last until they also become irrelevant to the ever-changing ways of life.

Repentance

Repentance. Repentance is the central message that the church is to bring to the world (Luke 24:47). It is a characteristic of the life of the curch, and is one of the primary goals of the church's mission.

The key terms in the Old Testament are nāham and shûbh. The former word carries the root idea of "to pant, sigh, or groan." It speaks of lamenting and grieving and when it is aimed at one's own character it has the idea of repenting. The latter word speaks of turning from sin to righteousness (2 Chron. 7:14). Through Israel, God calls all nations to repent.

The key New Testament terms are metamelomai, metanoēo, and epistrephô. Metamelomai stresses the emotional aspect of care, concern, and regret. It can refer to genuine repentance (Matt. 21:29, 32) and may also refer to a regret and remorse that is not accompanied by an abandonment of sin (Matt. 27:3). Metanoēo is used to note the need to "have another mind" by changing one's opinion and purposes (Matt. 3:2; Mark 1:15; Acts 2:38). The dominant idea of epistrephô is a change of mind that may result in accompanying emotions and consequent reformation.

Elements of Repentance. True repentance has intellectual, emotional, and volitional elements. Intellectually it involves a change of mind about God, sin, Christ, and oneself. The resultant change of mind views God as good and holy; sin as evil and injurious before God and people; Christ as perfect, necessary, and sufficient for salvation; and oneself as guilty and in need of salvation. Such repentance is an essential element of missionary proclamation.

Repentance involves a change of view, a change of feelings and a change of purpose. The emotional aspect may be seen in the passionate pleas found in David's repentance (Ps. 51:1, 2, 10, 14), and in Jesus' testimony of the tax-gatherer's feeling of remorse that led to faith (Matt. 21:32). However, when the emotional element stands by itself it is not true repentance (Matt. 27:3; Luke 18:23, cf. 2 Cor. 7:9–10). The sorrow that leads to repentance is a sorrow for sin, not only for its consequences. The volitional aspect of repentance is seen in the turning to God in faith (1 Thess. 1:9), and is an anticipated outcome of the church's mission among the nations.

Elaboration of Meaning. Repentance may be defined as a change of mind that is produced by the Holy Spirit leading to trust in God. Repentance is a part of true faith (Acts 20:21). It is not meritorious in itself, for Christ's death fully satisfies God's righteousness (Rom. 3:25). While repentance may lead to such outward acts as confession of sin and restitution, these are evidences of repentance and not the repentance itself. Repentance is an inward act that results in outward manifestations. Psalm 51 is an illustration of true repentance. The resulting attitude of repentance is reflected in Jesus' call to become like a child (Matt. 18:2–4) as well as in the first four Beatitudes (Matt. 5:3–6).

Subjects and Objects of Repentance. God has commanded the world to repent in order to avoid his judgment (Acts 17:30). His patience and kindness move him to be slow to wrath (Rom. 2:4; 2 Peter 3:9). God does not repent in the sense of changing his immutable perfection (1 Sam. 15:29), but his roused emotion may prompt him to a different course of action in carrying out his sovereign plan (Exod. 32:14; Jonah 3:10). It may imply God's sorrow or grief over humanity's sin (Jer. 6:6).

Unbelievers and believers may be appropriate subjects of repentance. The mission of the church is to carry out God's declaration to the world to repent and trust in Christ. The church is to exemplify a repentant lifestyle (Ps. 119:128). Jesus' command to take up one's cross is another way of describing this attitude, elaborated in Romans 6:11–13.

Repentance may have a variety of objects. Scripture speaks of repenting from trusting in money (Acts 8:22) as well as from a lack of trust in God's Word (Zech. 1:6). It also speaks of repentance from dead works (Heb. 6:1), idols (Ezek. 14:6), and leaving one's first love (Rev. 2:4–5). Repentance involves dealing with anything that hinders one from living under the authority of God (James 4:1–10) and being reconciled to other believers (Luke 17:3–4). Biblically, missionary proclamation must include a call to unbelievers to "repent and be baptized" (Acts 2:38; 3:19; 17:30; 26:20).

Preaching of Repentance. Repentance is a key theme in the proclamation of the church to a lost world that stands in need of the Savior. It was characteristic of the prophetic preaching (Jer. 8:6; Ezek. 14:6), John the Baptist (Matt. 3:2), Jesus (Matt. 4:17), the Twelve (Mark 6:12), Peter (Acts 2:38), and Paul (Acts 20:21). It is a message that is to be proclaimed to all peoples (Luke 24:47).

Reformed theology stresses the fact that repentance is a gift of God and a result of regeneration (Acts 5:31; 11:18; 2 Tim. 2:22). Arminian theology stresses the human element in repentance and regeneration. God is recognized in the latter as the primary cause and the person as the less principal cause. In both theologies the human responsibility of declaring God's Word is embraced as the means that God's Spirit uses to work repentance (Luke 10:30).

Results of Repentance. Christ's commission to the church to declare the message of repentance is motivated by God's kindness as God yearns for all peoples to taste the benefits that result from repentance. The Scriptures give the sad examples of the impenitent who refuse to live in agreement with God. Those who do repent become special objects of God's compassion. Repentance leads one to the experience of life (Acts 11:18), joy (2 Cor. 7:9), truth (2 Tim. 2:25), forgiveness (Acts
2:38), and the rule of God (Matt. 4:17). Repentance averts the wrath of God (Jonah 3:4–10) and leads to rejoicing in heaven (Luke 15:7, 10). An unrepentant church will no longer reflect the light of Christ (Rev. 2:5) that alone can lead the world to repentance.

Research. Disciplined inquiry suggesting a diligent search. Research involves investigating, inquiring, confirming, exploring, examining, inspecting, or collecting information about what can be known about a given topic. It goes beyond the casual observation or the ordinary human inquiry. Missiological research is a disciplined approach to collect data, analyze these data, and present them in service of the Missio Dei. Missiological research typically involves multiple academic disciplines because of the complexity and breadth of the issues involved.

Missiological research typically serves to develop theory, test theory, or employ theory to provide useful information for action or decision making. The development of theory allows one to explain what has been observed, predict what is likely to occur, provide bases for action, and provide means for validation of what is believed to be true. These theories depend on sets of assumptions or paradigms and ultimately on a person’s worldview. Paradigms provide the perspectives or assumptions from which one views. Theories differ from facts. Facts are observed phenomena whereas a theory is a systematic explanation of the facts. Theories also differ from laws that are “universal generalizations” about classes or categories of facts such as the “law of gravity” (Babbie, 51).

Types of Research. Research may be categorized in a variety of ways that depict differing aspects of its methods and purpose. Descriptive research seeks to describe what is or has been. The outcome is theory or a systematic explanation of what has been observed. Descriptions may range from perceptions or attitudes to behaviors and outcomes. Methods may arise out of history, sociology, anthropology, theology, or other academic disciplines and may be inductive or deductive.

Experimental research serves to test theory and is characterized by the control and manipulation of the variables and observation of the outcomes.

Evaluative research depends on the data collection methods of other approaches, but adds the element of values. The collection of data, the measurements of the data, and the interpretation of the data are all done in the light of a set of values. The outcome of this kind of research is useful information for decision making or value-based information.

Qualitative or Quantitative Research. Most simply the difference between qualitative and quantitative research is the difference between non-numerical and numerical data. That which can be counted is quantitative. That which cannot be counted is qualitative. One can count ten apples, for example—quantitative data. However, one cannot count another person’s attitude toward those ten apples. That is qualitative data. Both kinds of research are important, but require different kinds of attention. Often the qualitative issues are the more significant and the more difficult to ascertain.

Inductive or Deductive Research. Inductive research moves from the particular to the general. Inductive research often does not explain the “why” but rather the “what” of the patterns of the phenomena being examined. Deductive research, on the other hand, typically moves from a generalization (a theory) to the particular or specific case. Deductive research moves from what would be expected to be observed to what actually happens. It begins with the “why” and moves to the “whether” or “what” of the occurrence. Both ways of doing research provide valid approaches.

Primary or Secondary Research. Primary research addresses the subject at hand by examining the original documents, observing the participant, and interviewing the actors. It treats the original information. Secondary research, on the other hand, searches what has already been studied about the topic. One might do primary exegetical research by reading a biblical text and then describing what the text means. Or, one may do secondary research about the same text to see what someone else has written about it. One might read an ethnography about the Maasai people as secondary research or go to observe and interview Maasai people directly as primary research.

Two primary issues arise when doing research. They appear in somewhat different ways, depending on the academic discipline and method from which one approaches the inquiry. These two issues are validity and reliability. Validity relates to the collection of the right information, whereas reliability has to do with consistency in the production of findings. One may be reliable, but miss the point. However, for one to have a valid study, it must also be reliable. One may accurately describe the pattern of aging among career missionaries (reliability), but that pattern will not answer the question about how many short-term missionaries will become career missionaries (a question of validity).

Significance for Missions. The usefulness of research for missions can hardly be overestimated. Biblical and theological research provides the “why” for missions as well as direction about the undergirding values, the how, who, where, when, why, how much, and in what social contexts. Several general points of significance may emerge from a single piece of missiological research, including: theory development, the testing of theory, value(s) identification, and ministry enhancement. Missiological research, like other research that depends in part on the social sciences, does not aim to “prove” anything in an absolute way, but rather to investigate and describe. These investigations may serve to provide useful information for decision making, strategic planning, and action, but not proof.

Missiological research does not aim to prove, but to investigate. Proof requires a standard of validity and reliability that is not possible with the kinds of issues treated in missiology. The limitations of the methods available reduce the kinds of conclusions (level of proof) that can be established. The “proof” level is different from a chemistry study in which timing, temperature, and other conditions may be held constant. Some of these missiological constraints include the complexity of the subject matter, particularly in intercultural contexts, as well as difficulties in observation. Motives, values, and attitudes are difficult to measure and assess even in one’s own culture. When one crosses a cultural boundary, not only will these differ; their indicators will also differ. Exact replication is seldom if ever possible. Generally, one may expect interactions between the observer and the subjects. This interaction almost always colors the outcomes. Full control of the research situation is seldom if ever possible. Generally, the more significant the issues, the more difficult they are to measure. More trivial and insignificant issues are generally more easily quantified. One can easily count the people who live in a household, village, or city, but to describe their attitudes or to develop a full description of their worldview is very difficult. Even when all of the measures have been done, and done carefully, difficulties arise because each person’s worldview perspectives will guide the way that person interprets the data and this will differ from another’s. For example, when someone from the United States asks how old a person is, the responder will count from the time of birth. A Chinese will count from the time of conception. One’s perspective makes a difference. With these kinds of complexities, one can hardly claim to “prove” anything.

Contemporary Missiological Research. In contemporary missiology, research may be typically divided into two broadly related, but differing arenas: academic missiology and applied missiology. Academic missiology generally seeks to broaden the theoretical bases of missiological research. Various forms of historical and theological research typically come in focus in this kind of missiological research. Broad encyclopedic studies often constitute major goals of this kind of research. Some outstanding examples of this would include works such as David Barrett’s World Christian Encyclopedia and the annual updates to statistical estimates of the world Christian population published in IBMR; Patrick Johnstone’s Operation World, in which current reasonable descriptions are given of individual countries, their Christian populations, and prayer needs; Kenneth Scott Latourette’s monumental A History of Christianity; and J. Edwin Orr’s works about the history of awakenings and revivals. David J. Bosch’s Transforming Mission serves this genre from a theological perspective. All of these works have required an enormous amount of research leading to the development of missiological theory.

On the other hand, applied missiology takes on a much more immediate and practical sense. One could cite many outstanding examples of applied missiology. Linguistic research done by Wycliffe Bible Translators or developmental research done by World Vision would fit well in this genre. Applicational missiological research has focused on such diverse issues as church planting, curriculum improvement for leadership training, contextualizing theology, Bible translation, leadership emergence patterns, cross-cultural communication, and power ministries.

Both academic and application-oriented research have contributed to the other arena. However each researcher must clarify which of them is the researcher’s focus. Each broad approach has developed a set of risks. A risk that commonly accompanies academic missiology is its occasional overemphasis on the theory with little thought to the application or relevance of the theory to real-life missiological situations. A parallel risk from the more applicational side of missiological research involves too strong an emphasis on contemporary action without a firm rooting in what could have been learned from other situations (theory).

Research continues to serve the missio Dei. Research does not replace the work of the Spirit but may be used as a means of discerning the leading and work of the Spirit. Research is not a substitute for prayer. It is a disciplined way of doing inquiry into the world around us and the revelation that God has provided.

Resurrection of Christ. The resurrection of Christ from the dead determines the nature of Christianity and defines its uniqueness. Of all religious systems, Christianity alone has made the bodily resurrection of an historical person the centerpiece of its message and faith. Mission as a centrifugal activity traces its dynamic directly from the resurrection. Resurrection and mission cannot be separated.

Resurrection and Scripture. The resurrection finds its origins deep in salvation history, even if there are very few verbal references to it in the Old Testament outside Daniel 12:2. Paul, as a Jewish scholar, was the first Christian to write about the resurrection. Paul’s salvation experience, the mission to Jews and Gentiles, and discipling have their origins in his belief in and experience of the resurrection.

If the truth of the resurrection finds few verbal references in the Old Testament, how can Paul say that his preaching of the resurrection is “according to scripture” (1 Cor. 15:4)? For Paul and the early church the gospel is a salvation-history story, that is, the theme of resurrection is implicit in Israel’s story of promise and fulfillment. The resurrection is at the heart of this story and gives the story significance and meaning.

Paul preached the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The longest chapter in all of Paul’s epistles is on the resurrection (1 Cor. 15). His confidence in the resurrection was grounded in the testimony of numerous witnesses. Paul mentions witnesses such as Peter, the Twelve, James, the apostles, and more than five hundred, most of whom were still alive when he wrote. Finally, he was convinced of the resurrection because of having personally seen the risen Jesus (cf. 15:8 with 15:5–7). For Paul, an historical bodily resurrection was the bedrock of Good News. “If only for this life we have hope in Christ we are to be pitied more than all men” (1 Cor. 15:19).

All the New Testament writers agree with Paul this emphasis on the resurrection. All of the Gospel writers conclude their accounts of the life and ministry of Christ with accounts of the resurrection of Jesus from the dead (Matt. 28; Mark 16; Luke 24; John 20–21). Luke takes the story one step further and recounts how the resurrection message was preached. For instance, Luke’s summary of Peter’s first sermon on the day of Pentecost gives more space to the resurrection than to any other subject (Acts 2:22–36).

Mission and Resurrection. For many the best proof of the historical resurrection is the existence of the Christian church. Within three centuries of the resurrection Christianity had become the dominant religion within the Roman Empire. This growth has continued unabated and today the Christian church numbers almost 2 billion, larger than Islam and Hinduism combined.

The biblical records intertwine resurrection and mission. The resurrection is both the green light for centrifugal missions and the impetus to carry out mission. Paul ties his apostolic commission as an apostle to the Gentiles with his experience with the resurrection of Christ (Gal. 1:16; 1 Cor. 15:8). John, Luke, and Matthew make it clear that mission was Jesus’ central concern after his resurrection. Matthew shows the resurrected Jesus royally enthroned as the Lord of the nations, commissioning the apostles in Galilee with authority to engage in discipling the nations (Matt. 28:16–20). John reveals Jesus almost breathlessly rushing back to the upper room, and, after a hurried shalom says, “As the Father has sent me, I am sending you” (John 20:21).

Luke relates resurrection and mission in a number of ways. First, he shows its relationship to all of Scripture and to Jesus’ incarnation (Luke 24:19–27, 37–44). Second, the resurrected Jesus blesses the commissioned apostles as he ascends to heaven (Luke 24:45–51). Third, Jesus appears to the apostles over a period of forty days, thereby confirming his resurrection as he expounds on their future mission. He concludes this period of time by giving as the fundamental consequence of the resurrection, not the founding of a kingdom with Israel as its center, but the founding of a worldwide mission with Spirit-empowered believers at the center (Acts 1:1–11). Finally, Luke concludes by showing that apostleship included preaching the resurrection and fulfilling the call of worldwide mission (Acts 1:12–26).

Scripture places the greatest importance on the relationship of resurrection and mission. Without the resurrection there is no gospel. Without mission the resurrection remains useless. The resurrection of Jesus makes mission and message possible.

TODD M. JOHNSON

Revelation, General. Apart from revelation, there is neither genuine knowledge of God nor Christian faith. The core idea of revelation comes from the Hebrew gamlāh and the Greek ἀπόκαλπτω, whose basic meaning is “to uncover” or “to disclose.” Revelation is the activity of God whereby he “uncovers” or discloses what was previously not known nor could be known.

The Scriptures speak of two kinds of revelation: general and special. General revelation is distinguished from special revelation in mode, content, and function. Special revelation is that divine activity whereby God discloses himself (knowledge, will, and purposes) to specific persons at particular times in history for the purpose of redemption. The inspired record of this is given in the Bible. On the other hand, general revelation is God’s universal self-disclosure. Through general revelation a general knowledge of God has been made available to all humanity at all times. The main biblical passages which relate to general revelation are Psalm 19:1–6; Job 36:24–37:24; Romans 1:18–32; 2:14–15; Acts 14:15–17; and Acts 17:16–34 (many include John 1:9).

These passages speak of four ways (modes) in which general revelation is conveyed. First, the most evident mode of general revelation is the created order (Ps. 19:1–6; Rom. 1:19, 20). Something of the greatness, majesty, and nature of the Creator is disclosed by what he has made. Second, God’s continuing care for what he has made testifies to his reality and goodness (Acts 14:17). Prayer and sacrifice during difficult times and thanksgiving during plentiful times have been a universal human experience, indicating a natural awareness of human dependence upon God. That God provides for human needs discloses his care and kindness. Third, human moral CONSCIENCE is another source of general revelation (Rom. 2:14, 15). God has created human beings with the ability to know moral right and wrong. This sense of right and wrong, at least partially, corresponds with God’s moral nature. Fourth, the innate awareness of God, or what John Calvin called the divinitatis sensum (sense of divinity), is another way in which God is disclosed. This innate awareness is the seed of religion. Though this seed has germinated differently in the many and diverse religions of the world, these religions testify to the internal awareness of the reality of God and the desire to know him. History is possibly a fifth mode of general revelation. Traditionally many have held that God discloses himself through the course and events of history. Certainly God acts in history and is directing the course of history. However, significant questions have been raised concerning our ability to discern God and his purposes in history. Even with the benefit of special revelation, the significance of particular historical events are often ambiguous and open to differing interpretations.

Dealing with the concrete content of general revelation is more problematic. The question of what can be known about God on the basis of general revelation alone (natural theology) has received considerable attention. The views of this have varied widely. Pluralistic theology, a contemporary form of liberal theology, contends that any knowledge or experience of God has its source in some form of general revelation only. It denies special revelation and rejects the uniquely inspired status of the Bible.

Thomas Aquinas is representative of a second approach that has had wide acceptance traditionally. Aquinas argued that God’s existence could be proved and some knowledge of God attained through rational reflection on the created order. Such knowledge is not sufficient for salvation but was deemed to be adequate to prove the existence of God. The limitations of this view have become increasingly evident. The ability of these arguments to convince largely rests upon one’s presuppositions and worldview.

A third approach is provided by John Calvin, who saw general revelation as having the ability to supplement and deepen the knowledge of God provided by special revelation, but only as general revelation was viewed through the “spectacles” of special revelation. Calvin insisted that because of sin it is not possible to develop a systematic and reliable knowledge of God. At best one gains bits and pieces of knowledge of God. In the twentieth century, Karl Barth’s complete denial of general revelation represents the other extreme of the continuum of views. For Barth, the infinite qualitative distinction between God and humanity (God’s total otherness), humanity’s sinfulness, and Barth’s tendency to equate any revelation with salvific experience of God led to a complete negation of the possibility of true knowledge of God, however minute, through general revelation. While this approach has appealed to many, it does contradict the testimony of Psalm 19, Romans 1:19f., and Romans 2:14–15.

Some of the difficulty in determining the precise content of general revelation rests in the fact that Scripture itself does not deal exhaustively with the issue. However, some indication is given of what can be known of God in general revelation. Psalm 19:1 states, "The heavens declare the glory of God; the skies proclaim the work of his hands." God intended creation itself to reveal the great intellect, wisdom, creativity, and ability of the One who made it all. Romans 1:20 declares that God's "eternal power and divine nature" can be known through that which he has made. It should be evident that he has the abilities and power necessary to effect that which he has made and that he possesses the attributes normally associated with deity.

Other considerations, however, mitigate against the attainment of concrete and consistent knowledge of God through general revelation. Human finitude (i.e., the natural limitations on human perception and understanding), and the fact that creation itself suffers under God's judgment (Rom. 8:20, 21), all contribute to the human inability to derive a natural theology. Special revelation is necessary to overcome these barriers to knowledge of God. Although general revelation potentially and in principle yields a definite knowledge of God, the actual attainment of such knowledge is severely limited and can only be attested through consistency in Scripture. General revelation points to God's abilities but is less clear on his character and purposes. The same creation that points to God's kindness because of his provision for human needs (Acts 14:17) also is the cause of great suffering through catastrophes, droughts, and the like. Calvin rightly asserted that we must look at general revelation through the "spectacles" of Scripture. Special revelation provides the necessary interpretive framework from which one can more clearly discern the abilities, character, and purposes of God witnessed to by general revelation.

What then is the function of general revelation for us today? Scripture suggests two ways in which it continues to serve God's purposes. On the one hand, it is an evidence of God's continuing love and mercy toward humankind. God continues to provide a witness to himself (Acts 14:17) and to stir humanity to seek him (Acts 17:27). On the other hand, general revelation serves God's redemptive purposes. Human rejection of general revelation demonstrates both God's justice in judging human sin (Rom. 1:19ff.; 2:12–16) and the need for special revelation and the gracious provision of redemption through his Son, Jesus Christ.

Implications for Missions. One's understanding of general revelation has important implications for several areas that pertain to the church's obligation to and practice of missions.

View of Other Religions. This is particularly true in relation to non-Christian religions. Religious pluralism presupposes that some form of a universal, general revelation is the ground of all religions, Christianity included. Karl Rahner's "Anonymous Christian" thesis represents an inclusivist approach which, while maintaining the superior and definitive nature of special revelation, allows for the possibility of true knowledge and redemption in other religions. As such, other religions are not hostile or in competition with Christianity. Rather, they are limited attempts to respond to God's general revelatory activity that need to be completed or corrected by special revelation. Evangelical theology's perspectives have ranged between seeing religions as well-intentioned but erroneous means of responding to God to being the product of active rebelliousness to what has been revealed by God in general revelation.

Religious expression is the consequence of the fact that God reveals himself and that humanity has both the innate ability and urge to know him. The only source of knowledge of God available to non-Christian religions is general revelation. However, the fallen state of creation and human nature results in the corruption of truth available in general revelation. Scripture's teaching on false worship, the inevitable and willful distortion of general revelation (Rom. 1:19ff.), Satan's deceptive activities, as well as redemption, all indicate that, whether well-intentioned or not (humanly speaking), non-Christian religions cannot attain true knowledge of God or accomplish reconciliation with God. Christianity must regard other religions as inadequate (at best) forms of worship which must be replaced by indigenous and culturally relevant forms of true worship based on special revelation (cf. Acts 17:22ff.).

Nature and Source of Salvation. Basing themselves on general revelation, many today hold that salvation is possible apart from the proclamation of the gospel. The pluralist maintains that all religions are equally ways of salvation and the source of knowledge for salvation (usually understood as some form of moral life) is general revelation, to which all people have equal access. Inclusivists maintain the necessity of Christ's atonement for salvation, but not the necessity of knowing and confessing Christ. If one responds to what knowledge of God is made known in general revelation, this faith is just as efficacious a saving faith as that faith which is consciously placed in Christ and the proclaimed gospel.

Scripture may permit an openness to the possibility that some may find full acceptance by God apart from the knowledge provided by special revelation or the gospel (e.g., Melchizedek). However, Scripture is silent concerning how such individuals came to faith so we must be careful about drawing conclusions from such exceptions. Scripture is more clear that humanity has willfully distorted what truth is given in general revelation and that the proclamation of the gospel is needed for salvation (cf. Rom. 10:14, 15). Therefore, an important element in the church’s motivation for mission is the recognition that general revelation is not a sufficient source for salvation. In obedience to the Lord’s command and in light of human estrangement from God because of Sin, the church is compelled to go to all the world with the gospel of salvation.

Contextualization. Contextualization is concerned both with communicating the gospel to other cultures and with the development of culturally relevant theology. The universal nature of human beings, of their religious need and experience, and of general revelation make contextualization of theology possible. Therefore, we both expect to find areas of common ground from which to communicate the gospel and some points of truth and experience in other cultures which can deepen our understanding of God and help shape culturally relevant theologies. We should avoid the extremes of radical discontinuity between the gospel and culture, as in neo-orthodoxy, and radical continuity between gospel and culture, as in liberal and pluralistic theologies. The Syncretism of the latter is avoided only by subjecting the ideas, insights, and practices of culture to the criteria and authority of Scripture. Those elements in culture that are consistent with Scripture can be utilized in contextualizing the gospel and theology.

Dialogue and Cooperation. The postmodern spirit and religious pluralism have been leading advocates of religious Dialogue. They presume the basic equality of all religious expressions and seek to grow in knowledge of God through mutual dialogue and cooperation. A biblical understanding of general revelation, Scripture, Christ, and salvation cannot approach other religions in this way. True worship and knowledge of God comes only through submission to Christ and the revelation provided in Scripture.

The doctrine of general revelation does allow for the possibility of interreligious dialogue in areas of mutual concern (moral, social, ecological, etc.). Further, dialogue is a legitimate way to gain mutual understanding and respect and may even cause the Christian opportunity to reflect differently on his or her faith in such a way as to gain new understanding. But Scripture is the sole authoritative and reliable source of knowledge of God. Truths gained through reflection upon general revelation are at best partial and must always be judged by Scripture.

Reverse Culture Shock. The psychological, emotional, and even spiritual adjustment of missionaries who return to their home culture after having adjusted to a new culture. This shock is parallel to the culture shock experienced in initial adjustment to the mission field, but may be even more difficult because it can hit so unexpectedly. Also referred to as reentry shock, adjustment is necessary because both the missionary and the home culture have changed while the missionary was away. In addition, the home culture may have been idealized in the missionary’s mind and no longer fits one’s expectations.

The changes that have taken place in the missionary can be manifold. A major consideration here is that the nature of friendships and relationships varies dramatically from culture to culture. Missionaries who have crossed that divide often find that the way they look at relationships has fundamentally shifted, making readjustment to their home culture difficult. The missionary had to learn a host of new rules in the new culture; though initially strange, they have become comfortable ways of life that must be unlearned in the home culture.

The home culture (especially in the urban setting) also changes while the missionary is away. Changes may range from the relatively mundane (new television shows, new music, new stores) to deeper innovations (new church worship forms or even new religions, new expectations of tolerance, new views on truth). All of these combined can make for a bewildering experience for one who is seeking security in what home was like before departure.

Reentry shock can be particularly acute for the children of missionaries (see Third Culture Kids and Missionary Children), some of whom may be entering the parents’ home culture for the first time or have no real memories of that culture. Particular care should be taken to help them adjust to life in what for them was never really home.

Revival, Revivals. The term “revival” means different things to different people. It has been used to describe renewed spiritual life, a series of evangelistic meetings, unbridled religious emotionalism, wild frontier religion, and fanaticism. How should the term be used?

Definition. The word “revival” means to wake up and live. The basic idea of revival is the returning of something to its true nature and purpose. It is a special movement of the Spirit of God in which he renews the hearts of believers. Earle Cairns defines revival as “the work of the Holy Spirit in restoring the people of God to a more vital spiritual life, witness, and work by prayer and the Word after repentance in crisis for their spiritual decline” (1986, 22).

The following points summarize this understanding of revival. First, revival comes from God. It is a work of the Holy Spirit. Second, revival primarily affects believers, those who have already experienced spiritual life. Third, revival presupposes declension. Fourth, prayer and the Scriptures are central in bringing and sustaining revival. Fifth, revival brings change, most specifically renewed spiritual life and witness. Isaiah's “revival” experience, described in Isaiah 6:1–8, serves as a paradigm for genuine revival. Isaiah encountered the presence of God and God's holiness overshadowed everything else. Isaiah recognized his sin and need for cleansing. This sense of brokenness in the presence of a holy God is an important characteristic of genuine revival. In Isaiah 5, we read of Isaiah pronouncing “woes” on others six different times. He could clearly see the sin in others' lives, and in his role as prophet he forthrightly said, “Woe to you.” Yet when overcome by a deep awareness of God's holiness, Isaiah is not pointing his finger at anyone else. All he can say is, “Woe is me!”

When believers find themselves in the presence of a holy God during a time of revival, they become acutely aware of even the smallest sin. When God powerfully makes his presence known, anything out of keeping with his holiness is immediately brought to the surface. Sins which have been tolerated or excused as “little things” are suddenly brought to light and the fear of exposure pales in comparison with the need for confession and cleansing.

It is after conviction, repentance, and God's cleansing that joy comes (cf. Ps. 51). Conviction followed by confession and repentance leads to a freedom and joy in the experience of forgiveness. Joy comes through God's cleansing and ultimately leads to service.
