Evangelical Dictionary of World Missions
A. Scott Moreau (D.Miss., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School) is associate professor of Missions and Intercultural Studies at Wheaton Graduate School. While working with Campus Crusade for Christ in Africa, he taught for eight years at the Nairobi International School of Theology and served as a Deputy Administrator for the Accrediting Council for Theological Education in Africa. Dr. Moreau has numerous publications to his credit, including several books such as The World of the Spirits, Essentials of Spiritual Warfare, and Twentieth-Century Dictionary of Christian Biography for which he acted as associate editor.

Harold Netland (Ph.D., Claremont Graduate School) serves as Associate Professor of Philosophy of Religion and Mission. He is also the director of Trinity’s Doctor of Philosophy in Intercultural Studies Program and holds the Naomi A. Fausch Chair of Missions. Prior to coming to Trinity, Dr. Netland served for a number of years on the faculty of Tokyo Christian University. He also served as a missionary with the Evangelical Free Church of America in Japan for nine years. Among Dr. Netland’s numerous published works is the book, Dissonant Voices: Religious Pluralism and the Question of Truth, along with many articles on mission, apologetics, and East Asia.

Charles Van Engen (Ph.D., Free University of Amsterdam) is the Arthur F. Glasser Professor of Biblical Theology of Mission at Fuller Theological Seminary. Before coming to Fuller he taught missiology at Western Theological Seminary in Michigan. Dr. Van Engen also served as president of the General Synod for the Reformed Church in America in 1997 and is widely traveled with his many responsibilities. His wide-ranging publications include God’s Missionary People, Mission-On-the-Way: Issues in Mission Theology, and Footprints of God: Mission OF, IN, and ON the Way.
Dedicated in loving memory of

Harvie Conn

a colleague who encouraged, inspired, and constantly challenged the rest of us to keep our eyes faithfully on the eternal Word as we struggle to understand the realities of our changing worlds
In the more than twenty-five years since the last comprehensive mission dictionary (Concise Dictionary of Christian World Mission, 1971) was compiled the field of mission and missiology has undergone considerable changes. One of the changes has been a strengthening of evangelical involvement not only in missionary practice but in the study of mission on the formal level. The evangelical commitment to missionary work has been supplemented by a host of evangelical scholars who are studying the missionary task in new and fresh ways, bringing better analytical tools to our task without losing sight that it is the Bible which is the foundation of our work.

In recent years a plethora of new research materials has been produced, including biographical dictionaries, handbooks of mission agencies, encyclopedias of missionary statistics, prayer guides of missionary work around the globe, and dictionaries from a broader theological spectrum. However, there has been no reference work with an admittedly evangelical orientation encompassing the issues of missionary work and reflection into a single resource, and thus the motivation for the Evangelical Dictionary of World Missions.

The EDWM was designed to provide a readily accessible overview of mission which is irenic toward differing perspectives, interdenominational in outlook, and still firmly committed to the inspiration and authority of the Bible in orienting us to the task God has entrusted to the church. This is not a dictionary of evangelical missions, but a dictionary on world missions from an evangelical perspective.

This work is intended for educated lay people, pastors, students, students, missionaries, and mission specialists. It is part of the Baker Reference Library series, which includes The Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, The Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology, Baker Encyclopedia of Psychology and Counseling, Evangelical Commentary on the Bible, and Baker Encyclopedia of Apologetics. It has the same orientation, format, and style as these works.

The EDWM was also designed to be comprehensive without being exhaustive. Literally thousands of possible entries were initially considered for inclusion. The approximately 700 content articles finally included represent the entire discipline and practice of missions. Including the articles on people and countries, there are over 1,400 entries, with an additional 250 cross-reference listings to enable easier access to the particular topics of interest to the reader. Opinions will always vary as to which articles may have been added or removed, and the reader is humbly requested to bear in mind the impossibility of pleasing everyone with the final list.

Features to Note. For the most effective use of the EDWM, several features need to be understood. First, the authors were asked to stress the missiological aspect of each subject. For the theological articles, for example, they were asked not only to outline the general theological idea but also to incorporate issues, discussion, and application of mission significance. Where appropriate, critical evaluations were also to be included.

Second, to ensure access to the non-technical reader, the authors were asked to keep the language used at the popular level rather than the technical level. Our goal was that the scholar will find that what is said is fair and correct, while the lay reader will find it understandable.

Third, we worked hard to make the full breadth of the work accessible to the reader. There are three means by which this is accomplished. (A) Within each article we mark words on which entries appear elsewhere in the dictionary in SMALL CAPS. It should be noted that we were not exhaustive in this process, assuming that readers would be aware that words such as “God,” “Jesus,” “Mission,” “Missiology,” “Islam,” and so on would be found as articles elsewhere in this type of dictionary. (B) There are cross-listings at the end of many articles which are intended to supplement the use of small cap cross-references within each article. (C) Finally, we included one index (persons) as well as a complete outline of all of the content articles (i.e., non-biographical and non-geographical). It is expected that mission educators will find the outline and the index particularly helpful, as they allow the educator to read on and also readily point students to a variety of appropriate articles for use in any missions-related class.

Fourth, we intend that the work will stimulate and enable further research and reflection. Toward that end, most of the articles include short bibliographies. These are selective rather than exhaustive. As with all of the reference works in this Baker series, the publisher has chosen to limit the bibliographies to readily available English resources.
Preface

Fifth, as in any work with some 330 contributors, there will be differences of opinion and terminology. We made no effort to harmonize or force an artificial uniformity on such differences, as they are a reflection the breadth of approach of evangelicals toward mission. This applies not only to ideas but to certain terms, three categories of which should be noted. It was our decision in these cases to allow the authors latitude to use the term(s) they preferred rather than forcing an artificial uniformity. (A) Terms such as developing world, non-Western world, Third World, and Two-Thirds World, are some of the designations used to refer to African, Asian, Latin American, and Oceanic countries and cultures. (B) In missiological circles there is still some fluidity concerning “intercultural” and “cross-cultural.” Technically they refer to two distinct ideas: intercultural generally refers to the interaction of people of diverse cultures, while cross-cultural refers to the study of the same phenomena in different cultures for purposes of comparison and contrast. However, these two terms are not used consistently in the missiological literature. (C) Finally, the terms mission and missions are not used uniformly in the literature. There is ongoing debate within the evangelical community as to the appropriate term to use (see the article Mission and Missions), and we generally left the term as used by the author in recognition of that debate.

Sixth, there are 483 biographical articles scattered throughout the dictionary. To attempt to reflect the two-way flow of missions, 92 of our the subjects originated from non-Western contexts. To emphasize the role women have taken in missionary efforts, 105 are chronicled here. On a continental basis, 239 of our subjects came from Europe, 152 from North America, 48 from Asia, 22 from Africa, 12 from Latin America and the Caribbean, and 10 from Oceania. On the other end, 196 served in Asia, 94 in Africa, 66 in Europe, 53 in North America, 49 in Latin America and the Caribbean, and 25 in Oceania. In part because evangelical missiology is relatively young as a discipline, even though we consciously sought to limit the number of living people included in the Dictionary to a minimum, at the time of this writing, 52 of the subjects are still alive. To limit the proliferation, a cut-off birth year for the inclusion of living people in the Dictionary was set at 1930, with four exceptions made for particularly important non-Western leaders (Panya Baba, David Yonggi Cho, Rene Padilla, and Luis Palau).

Seventh, and finally, authors were given latitude to cover what they wanted in the country articles. Not all included statistics; and the statistical variations among the articles were not harmonized with two exceptions: (A) All population figures are taken from the United Nations 1994 projections for the A.D. 2000 populations, and (B) All country areas (square miles and kilometers) are from the MacMillan Centennial Atlas of the World (1997). Additionally, when countries are mentioned in non-country articles, they are generally referred to by contemporary names rather than names in history (e.g., Gold Coast is Ghana; Siam is Thailand). One exception is that of the former Zaire (now Democratic Republic of Congo), the name of which changed too late in the project to allow for name changes to be made throughout.

Acknowledgments. As with any project of this magnitude, the list of those who deserve thanks is longer than the space allowed to name them. In particular I extend my deepest gratitude to J. D. Douglas and Walter A. Elwell, both editors of numerous parallel projects, whose advice and encouragement helped throughout the years of labor this work entailed. The Associate and Contributing Editors have been invaluable resources and references throughout the life of the project. They sharpened the thinking in the beginning, helped carry the load throughout, and were essential to the success of completing this project. Special thanks go to David Barrett for the UN population statistics, and to the various graduate assistants at Wheaton whose involvement over the years of the project made things go much more smoothly than they would have otherwise: Wendy Larson, Penny Mason Gushiken, Tracy Smith, Gary Lamb, Grace Klein, Jackie Busch, Sheri Skinner, Vicki Cairns, and Nicole Feria. The people at Baker Book House, especially Jim Weaver, Maria denBoer, and Rebecca Cooper, have been particularly helpful in making important administrative decisions, keeping the project on track throughout, and encouraging me to keep to the course.

Finally I offer deep appreciation for the support and advice supplied by my colleagues in the Missions and Intercultural Studies department at Wheaton College, including John Gratton, Doug McConnell (now with Pioneers), Evvy Campbell, Robert Gallagher, Alan Seaman, Cheri Pierson, and Carol Fowler. I also express my gratitude to those who provided guidance and encouragement at needed junctures, especially Ken Mulholland and Ken Gill. Finally, I would like to express my appreciation to Wheaton College and the environment of support it offers which enabled this task to be taken from the stage of a dream to the work you now hold in your hands.
Contributors

Adeney, Miriam. Ph.D., Washington State University. Research Professor of Mission, Regent College, Vancouver, Canada; Associate Professor of Cross Cultural Ministries, Seattle Pacific University, Seattle, Washington.

Akins, Clinton M. D.Min., Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. Professor of Missiology and Religion, Indian Ocean Training Center, Madagascar.

Allison, Gregg. Ph.D., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Assistant Professor of Theology and Church History, Western Seminary, Portland, Oregon.

Allison, Norman E. Ph.D., University of Georgia. Director, School of World Missions, Toccoa Falls College, Toccoa Falls, Georgia.

Anderson, Gerald H. Ph.D., Boston University. Retired. Former Director, Overseas Ministries Study Center, New Haven, Connecticut.

Anderson, Justice C. Th.D., Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary. Professor of Missions; Director, World Missions Center, Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Forth Worth, Texas.

Arnold, Clinton E. Ph.D., Cambridge University. Associate Professor of New Testament Language and Literature, Talbot School of Theology, LaMirada, California.

Askew, Thomas A. Ph.D., Northwestern University. Professor and Chair of History, Gordon College, Wenham, Massachusetts.

Baker, William H. Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary. Professor of Theology, Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, Illinois.

Barrett, David. Ph.D., Columbia University, New York. Research Professor of Missiometrics, Regent University School of Divinity, Richmond, Virginia.

Barro, Antonio C. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. President, South American Theological Seminary, Londrina, Brazil.

Baumgartner, Erich W. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Associate Director, Institute for World Mission and Associate Professor of World Mission, Andrews University, Berrien Springs, Michigan.

Beals, Paul A. Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary. Professor of Missiology, Grand Rapids Baptist Seminary, Grand Rapids, Michigan.

Beougher, Timothy K. Ph.D., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Billy Graham Chair of Evangelism, Associate Professor of Evangelism, and Associate Dean, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky.
Contributors

Bevans, SVD, Steven B. Ph.D., University of Notre Dame. Director, Chicago Center for Global Ministries and Associate Professor of Doctrinal Studies, Catholic Theological Union, Chicago, Illinois.

Bonk, Jonathan J. Ph.D., University of Aberdeen. Associate Director, Overseas Ministries Study Center, New Haven, Connecticut.

Breshears, Gerry. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Professor of Theology, Western Seminary, Portland Oregon.

Brewster, Elizabeth. Ph.D., University of Texas. Assistant Professor of Language/Culture Learning, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Bruce, Janet Sue. MS. Ed., Purdue University. Department Coordinator, Christian Education/Educational Ministries, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

Bundy, David. Ph.D. Cand., Catholic University, Louvain. Associate Professor of Church History, Christian Theological Seminary, Indianapolis, Indiana.

Burnett, David. Ph.D., Bradford University. Academic Dean, All Nations Christian College, Ware, Herts, United Kingdom.

Buss, Siegfried A. Ph.D., Vanderbilt University. International Representative, Ochanomizu Christian Center, Tokyo, Japan.

Butman, Richard E. Ph.D., Fuller Graduate School of Psychology. Professor of Psychology, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

Campbell, Evvy Hay. Ph.D., Michigan State University. Associate Professor of Missions and Intercultural Studies, Wheaton Graduate School, Wheaton, Illinois.

Chancellor, James Darrell. Ph.D., Duke University. W.O. Carver Professor of World Religions and Missions, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky.

Clouse, Robert G. Ph.D., University of Iowa. Professor of History, Indiana State University, Terre Haute, Indiana.

Coggins, Wade T. LL.D., Nyack College. Retired Executive Director, Evangelical Foreign Missions Association, Kensington, Maryland.

Coleman, Robert E. Ph.D., University of Iowa. Director, Billy Graham Institute of Evangelism Wheaton, Illinois; Director, School of World Mission and Evangelism and Professor of Evangelism, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois.

Couchell, Dimitrios G. B.A., Holy Cross Greek Orthodox School of Theology. Executive Director, Orthodox Christian Mission Center, St. Augustine, Florida.

Covell, Ralph. Ph.D., University of Denver. Senior Professor World Christianity, Denver Seminary, Denver, Colorado.

Crutchley, David. Ph.D., Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary. Senior Lecturer, Baptist Theological College, Cape Town, Republic of South Africa.

Cunningham, Scott. Ph.D., Dallas Theological Seminary. Administrative Secretary for Accreditation, Accrediting Council for Theological Education in Africa (ACTEA), Charlotte, North Carolina.

Dale, Kenneth J. Ph.D., Union Seminary, New York. Professor Emeritus, Japan Lutheran Theological Seminary, Japan.

Davidson, Allan K. Ph.D., Aberdeen University. Lecturer in Church History and Pacific Studies, St. John's College, University of Auckland, Auckland, New Zealand.

Davies, Ron E. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Associate Lecturer, All Nations Christian College, Ware, Herts, United Kingdom.

Deiros, Pablo A. Ph.D., Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary. Professor of Mission History, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Dekar, Paul R. Ph.D., University of Chicago. Professor of Evangelism and Missions, Memphis Theological Seminary, Memphis, Tennessee.

Dollar, Harold E. Ph.D., Fuller School of World Mission. Chair of the Department of Mission, Biola University, LaMirada, California.

Dunavant, Donald R. Ph.D., Mid-America Baptist Theological Seminary. Pastor, Bartlett, Tennessee.

Dyrness, William A. D.Theol., University of Strasbourg. Dean of School of Theology and Professor of Theology and Culture, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California.

Eitel, Keith E. D.Theol., The University of South Africa. Professor of Christian Missions,
Contributors

Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary, Wake Forest, North Carolina.

Elliston, Edgar J. Ph.D., Michigan State University. Provost, Hope International University, Fullerton, California.

Enroth, Ron. Ph.D., University of Kentucky. Professor of Sociology, Westmont College.

Eshleman, Paul A. M.B.A., Michigan State University. Director, Jesus Film Project, Campus Crusade for Christ, Laguna Niguel, California.

Eyring, Margot O. Ph.D., University of Tennessee at Knoxville. Adjunct Professor, American Studies Program, Washington, D.C.

Fiedler, Klaus. Th.D., Heidelberg University. Professor, University of Malawi, Zomba, Malawi.

Finley, Thomas John. Ph.D., University of California at Los Angeles. Professor of Old Testament and Semitics, Talbot School of Theology, LaMirada, California.

Forgette, Adrienne M. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Assistant Professor of Psychology, Northwestern College, Orange City, Iowa.

Freundt, Jr., Albert H. D.Min., McCormick Theological Seminary. Professor of Church History, Reformed Theological Seminary, Jackson, Mississippi.

Friesen, Paul H. Ph.D. Cand., University of St. Michaels College/Toronto School of Theology. Professor of History, Ontario Bible College, North York, Ontario, Canada.

Fuller, Daniel. D.Theol., University of Basel. Senior Professor of Hermeneutics, Fuller Theological Seminary.

Gailey, Charles R. Ph.D., University of South Africa. Director, School of World Mission and Evangelism, Nazarene Theological Seminary, Kansas City, Missouri.

Galadima, Bulus Y. Ph.D., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Academic Dean and Lecturer, Jos ECWA Theological Seminary, Jos, Nigeria.

Gallagher, Robert. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Assistant Professor of Missions and Intercultural Studies, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

Gibbs, Eddie. D.Min., Fuller Theological Seminary. Professor of Church Growth, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Gill, Kenneth D. Ph.D., University of Birmingham, UK. Associate Director, Billy Graham Center, Wheaton, Illinois.

Gilliland, Dean. Ph.D., Hartford Seminary Foundation. Professor of Contextualized Theology and African Studies, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Glasscock, L. E. Th.D., Grace Theological Seminary. Associate Professor, Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, Illinois.

Glasser, Arthur F. Ph.D., Union Theological Seminary (New York). Dean Emeritus of Fuller School of World Mission, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.
Gnanakan, Ken. Ph.D. General Secretary, Asia Theological Association, Bangalore, India.

Goldsmith, Martin. M.A., Oxford. Retired Associate Lecturer, All Nations Christian College, Ware, Herts, United Kingdom.

Greenway, Roger S. Th.D., Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary. Professor of World Missiology, Calvin Theological Seminary, Grand Rapids, Michigan.

Groothuis, Douglas. Ph.D., University of Oregon. Assistant Professor of Philosophy of Religion and Ethics, Denver Seminary, Denver, Colorado.

Gross, Edward N. D.Miss., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Adjunct Faculty in Missions, Biblical Theological Seminary, Hatfield, Pennsylvania.

Harber, Frank. Ph.D., Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary. Evangelist and Apologist, Frank Harber Evangelistic Association, Fort Worth, Texas.

Harvey, David P. D.Min., Columbia Biblical Seminary and Graduate School of World Missions. Associate Professor of Missiology, Toccoa Falls College, Toccoa Falls, Georgia.

Harvey, John. Th.D., Toronto School of Theology. Associate Professor, Columbia Biblical Seminary and School of Missions, Columbia, South Carolina.

Harvey, Richard S. M.A., University College, London. Lecturer, All Nations Christian College, Ware, Herts, United Kingdom.

Hayward, Douglas J. Ph.D., University of California Santa Barbara. Associate Professor, School of Intercultural Studies, Biola University, LaMirada, California.

Hedlund, Roger E. D.Miss., Fuller Theological Seminary. Professor of Mission Studies (Research), Serampore College, Madras, India.

Hertig, Paul. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Vera B. Blinn Assistant Professor of World Christianity, United Theological Seminary, Dayton, Ohio.

Hertig, Young Lee. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Vera B. Blinn Assistant Professor of World Christianity, United Theological Seminary, Dayton, Ohio.

Hiebert, Paul G. Ph.D., University of Minnesota. Professor of Mission and Anthropology, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois.

Hille, Rolf. Ph.D., University of Munich. Principal, Albrecht-Bengel-Haus, Tubingen, Germany.

Hoke, Stephen. Ph.D., Michigan State University. Vice President of Staff Development and Training, Church Resources Ministries, Upland, California.

Howard, David M. M.A., Wheaton Graduate School. Retired; former President, Latin America Mission, Miami, Florida.

Hsu, John D. L. Ph.D., Aquinas Institute of Theology. President, Evangel Seminary and Chairman, Asia Theological Association, Hong Kong. People’s Republic of China.

Hunsberger, George R. Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary. Professor of Missiology, Western Theological Seminary, Grand Rapids, Michigan.
Contributors

Hutchinson, Mark P. Ph.D., University of New South Wales. Director, Centre for the Study of Australian Christianity, Sydney, Australia.

Iadonisi, Joe C. M.A., Wheaton College. Missionary, Bogota, Colombia.

Inagaki, Hisakazu. Ph.D., Tokyo Metropolitan University. Professor of Philosophy, Tokyo Christian University, Tokyo, Japan.

Jackson, Eleanor M. Ph.D., Birmingham University. Senior Lecturer in Religious Studies, University of Derby, Derby, United Kingdom.

James, Violet. Ph.D., University of Aberdeen. Lecturer, Singapore Bible College, Singapore.

Jennings, John Nelson. Ph.D., Edinburgh University. Assistant Professor of Japanese Studies, Tokyo Christian University, Tokyo, Japan.

Jensma, Jeanne L. Ph.D., Biola University (Rosemead School of Psychology). Clinical Director, Tuscarora Resource Center, Mt. Bethel, Pennsylvania.

Johnson, Todd M. Ph.D., William Carey International University. Researcher, Global Evangelization Movement, Richmond, Virginia.

Johnson, Wayne. Ph.D., Trinity International University. Academic Dean and Lecturer, Nairobi International School of Theology, Nairobi, Kenya.

King, Roberta Rose. Ph.D., Fuller School of World Mission. Missionary, CBInternational, seconded as Senior Lecturer in Ethnomusicology, Daystar University, Nairobi, Kenya.

Klaus, Byron D. D.Min., Fuller Theological Seminary. Professor of Church Leadership and President, Assemblies of God Theological Seminary, Springfield, Missouri.

Kopp, Thomas J. D.Th., University of South Africa. Professor of Missions and Intercultural Studies Department Chair, Multnomah Bible College, Portland, Oregon.

Köstenberger, Andreas J. Dr. rec. soc. oec., Vienna University of Economics; Ph.D., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Associate Professor of New Testament, Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary, Wake Forest, North Carolina.

Kraft, Charles H. Ph.D., Hartford Seminary Foundation. Professor of Anthropology and Intercultural Communication, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Kraft, Marguerite. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Professor of Intercultural Studies, Biola University, LaMirada, California.

Kuzmic, Peter. Dr. Theol., Catholic Faculty of Theology. Distinguished Professor of World Missions and European Studies, Gordon Conwell Theological Seminary, South Hamilton, Massachusetts.

Lee, David Tai Woong. D.Miss., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Director, Global Missionary Training Center; Seoul Korea.

Lewis, James F. Ph.D., University of Iowa. Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

Limpic, Ted. M.Div., Talbot Theological Seminary. Assistant Field Director; OC International, Sao Paulo, Brazil.

Lineham, Peter. D.Phil., University of Sussex. Senior Lecturer in History, Massey University, Palmerston North, New Zealand.

Ling, Samuel. Ph.D., Temple University. General Director, China Horizon, LaMirada, California.

Lingenfelter, Judy. Ph.D., University of Pittsburgh. Director, Ed.D. Program in Cross-Cultural Education, Biola University, LaMirada, California.

Lingenfelter, Sherwood. Ph.D., University of Pittsburgh. Dean and Professor of Anthropology, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Lodwick, Kathleen L. Ph.D., University of Arizona. Associate Professor of Asian History, Penn State University; Allentown, Pennsylvania.

Luter, A. Boyd. Ph.D., Dallas Theological Seminary. Adjunct Professor of Biblical Studies, Golden Gate Baptist Theological Seminary, San Francisco, California.

Maruyama, Tadataka. Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary. President, Tokyo Christian University, Tokyo, Japan.

Mathews, Edward. D.Miss., Fuller Theological Seminary. Professor of Missions, Abilene Christian University, Abilene, Texas.

McConnell, C. Douglas. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. International Director, Fuller Theological Seminary.

McElhanon, Ken. Ph.D., Australian National University. Missionary, Wycliffe Bible Translators and Adjunct Faculty, University of Texas, Dallas, Texas.

McGee, Gary B. Ph.D., Saint Louis University. Professor of Church History, Assemblies of God Theological Seminary, Springfield, Missouri.

McIntosh, John Alan. D.Miss., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Associate Professor of Missions, Reformed Theological Seminary, Jackson, Mississippi.

McKinley, Edward. Ph.D., University of Wisconsin. Professor of History, Asbury College, Wilmore, Kentucky.

McKinney, Carol V. Ph.D., Southern Methodist University. Associate Professor; Graduate Institute of Applied Linguistics, University of Texas at Arlington; SIL International Anthropology Consultant, Wycliffe Bible Translators and the Summer Institute of Linguistics, Dallas Texas.

McQuilkin, Robertson. M.Div., Fuller Theological Seminary. General Director; Evangelical Missiological Society and President Emeritus, Columbia International University, Columbia, South Carolina.

McReynolds, Kathy. M.A., Talbot School of Theology. Free lance writer; La Mirada, California.

Medeiros, Elias dos Santos. D.Miss., Reformed Theological Seminary. Chair and Associate Professor of Mission, Reformed Theological Seminary, Jackson, Mississippi.

Molyneux, Gordon. Ph.D., London University. Lecturer and Course Director for the Bachelor of Arts Program, All Nations Christian College, Ware, Herts, United Kingdom.

Monsma, Tim. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Africa Director of Action International Ministries; Professor, Africa Bible College, Lilongwe, Malawi.

Contributors
Contributors

Muck, Terry C. Ph.D., Northwestern University. Professor of Comparative Religions, Austin Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Austin, Texas.

Mulholland, Kenneth B. D.Th.P., Fuller Theological Seminary. Dean and Professor of Missions, Columbia Biblical Seminary and School of Missions, Columbia, South Carolina.

Murray, Jocelyn M. Ph.D., University of California Los Angeles. Free lance writer, London, United Kingdom.

Nassif, Bradley. Ph.D., Fordham University. Director of Academic Programs, Fuller Seminary, Southern California Extension, Irvine, California.

Netland, Harold A. Ph.D., Claremont Graduate School. Associate Professor of Mission, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois.

Neumann, Mikel. D.Miss., Fuller Theological Seminary. International Resource Consultant, CBInternational and Associate Professor, Western Seminary, Portland, Oregon.

Nygquist, John W. Ph.D., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Associate Professor of Mission and Evangelism, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois.

Osborne, Grant R. Ph.D., University of Aberdeen. Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois.

Park, Timothy Kiho. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Associate Professor of Asian Mission, Fuller Theological Seminary School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Patterson, James A. Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary. Professor of Christian Studies, Union University, Jackson, Tennessee.

Pemberton, Sherman S. M.A., California State University (Fullerton). Inter-Cultural Studies Chair, Hope International University, Fullerton, California.

Perez, Pablo E. D.Miss., Fuller Theological Seminary. Translator, In Touch Ministries, Suwanee, Georgia.

Peterson, Wendy. M.A., Providence Theological Seminary. Director, Religious Movements Resource Center, Providence College and Theological Seminary, Otterburne, Manitoba, Canada.

Phillips, James M. Ph.D., Princeton University. Associate Director, Overseas Ministries Study Center, New Haven, Connecticut.

Pierard, Richard V. Ph.D., University of Iowa. Professor of History, Indiana State University, Terre Haute, Indiana.
Pierson, Paul E. Ph.D., Princeton. Dean Emeritus, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Pierson, Steven J. Ph.D., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Adjunct Lecturer, Wheaton College, Illinois.

Pocock, Michael. D.Miss., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Professor and Department Chair of Missions and Intercultural Studies, Dallas Theological Seminary, Dallas Texas.

Pont, Arthur. Retired General Secretary, Interserve, Middlesex, United Kingdom.

Porter, David. M.A., University of Ulster. Director, Evangelical Contribution on Northern Ireland (ECONI), Belfast, Northern Ireland.

Poston, Larry A. Ph.D., Northwestern University. Professor of Religion, Nyack College, Nyack, New York.

Priest, Robert J. Ph.D., University of California, Berkeley. Associate Professor of Missions and Intercultural Studies, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois.

Prigodich, Raymond P. M.Div., Denver Seminary. Assistant Professor of World Christianity/Department Chair, Denver Seminary, Denver, Colorado.

Rainer, Thom S. Ph.D., The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. Dean, Billy Graham School of Missions, Evangelism and Church Growth, Louisville, Kentucky.

Rascher, Len. Ph.D., Northwestern University. Director, Practical Christian Ministry Department, Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, Illinois.

Raupp, Werner. Dr. Theol., Author and Lecturer in Church History and Philosophy, College for Social Affairs, Reutlingen, Germany.

Richardson, Don. D.Litt., Biola University. Ambassador-at-Large, World Team, Woodland Hills, California.

Riley, Terry J. B.S., Mankato State University. Associate Director, Adopt-A-People Clearinghouse, Colorado Springs, Colorado.

Ro, Bong Rin. Th.D., Concordia Lutheran Seminary. Director of Overseas Ministry, Torch Center, OMF International, Seoul, South Korea.

Robert, Dana Lee. Ph.D., Yale University. Professor of International Mission, Boston University School of Theology, Boston, Massachusetts.

Rogers, Juan D. Ph.D., Virginia Polytechnic Institute. Assistant Professor, School of Public Policy, Georgia Institute of Technology, Atlanta, Georgia.

Rommen, Edward. Dr. Theol., Munich University. Deacon, Orthodox Church of America, Columbia, South Carolina.
Contributors

Roxborogh, John. Ph.D., Aberdeen. Head, Department of Mission Studies, Bible College of New Zealand, Waitakere City, New Zealand.

Roy, Kevin. Ph.D., University of South Africa. Lecturer, Baptist Theological College, Cape Town, South Africa.

Russell, Tom. Ph.D., Vanderbilt. University Lecturer, Western Kentucky University, Nashville, Tennessee.

Sakurai, Kunio. Th.M., Fuller Theological Seminary; LL.M., University of Nagoya. Director, Kyoritu Christian Institute for Theological Studies and Mission; Associate Professor of Theology and Law, Tokyo Christian University, Tokyo, Japan.

Satyavrata, Ivan Morris. Th.M., Regent College, Vancouver, Canada. Assistant Professor; Chair, Department of Theology and Ethics, Southern Asia Bible College, Bangalore, India.

Schirrmacher, Thomas. Th.D., Johannes Calvin Foundation (Theological University), Kopen/ Netherlands. Professor of Missions, Philadelphia Theological Seminary and Director, Institut für Weltmission und Christliche Gesellschaft (Institute for World Mission and Christian Society), Bonn, Germany.

Scott, Lindy. Ph.D., Northwestern University. Associate Professor of Spanish, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

Seaman, Alan A. Ph.D., University of Virginia. Assistant Professor of TESL, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

Seruyange, Lazarus. D.Min., Western Conservative Baptist Seminary. Principal, Nairobi International School of Theology, Nairobi, Kenya.

Shaw, Daniel. Ph.D., University of Papua New Guinea. Professor of Anthropology and Translation, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Shaw, Mark. Th.D., Westminster Theological Seminary. Lecturer in Theology and Church History, Nairobi Evangelical Graduate School of Theology, Nairobi, Kenya.

Shenk, David D. Ph.D., New York University. Academic Dean and Professor of Theology, Lithuania Christian College, Klaipeda, Lithuania.

Shenk, Wilbert. Ph.D., Aberdeen. Associate Professor of Mission, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Shepherd, David H. Ph.D., Mid-America Baptist Theological Seminary. Associate Professor of Theology/Practical Theology, Northeast Campus of Mid-America Baptist Theological Seminary, Schenectady, New York.

Shuster, Robert D. M.A., University of Wisconsin. Director of Archives, Billy Graham Center, Wheaton, Illinois.

Silzer, Peter James. Ph.D., Australian National University. Program Director—SIL at Biola, Summer Institute of Linguistics/Wycliffe Bible Translators, LaMirada, California.

Smith, A. Christopher. Ph.D., Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. Vice-President for (College) Academics and Professor of Intercultural Studies, Providence College, Otterburne, Manitoba, Canada.
Contributors

Smith, Donald K. Ph.D., University of Oregon. Chair, Division of Intercultural Studies, Western Seminary, Portland, Oregon.

Smith, Ebbie C. Ph.D., Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary. Professor of Christian Ethics and Missions, Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Fort Worth, Texas.

Smith, Eric D. Th.M., Talbot Theological Seminary. Field Director, OC International, Pasig City, Philippines.

Smith, Gordon T. Ph.D., Loyola School of Theology. Vice President, Dean and Associate Professor of Spiritual Theology, Regent College, Vancouver, Canada.

Søgaard, Viggo B. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Associate Professor of Communication, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Spindler, Marc R. Ph.D., State University of Strasbourg. Emeritus Professor of Missiology and Ecumenics, Universities of Leiden and Utrecht, Talence, France.

Spradlin, Michael Ph.D., Mid-America Baptist Theological Seminary. President and Professor of Old Testament, Hebrew, and Practical Theology, Mid-America Baptist Theological Seminary, Northeast Branch, Schenectady, New York.

Spruance, F. David. D.Min., Denver Seminary. Retired; Adjunct Professor, International School of Theology, Manila, Philippines.

Stanley, Brian. Ph.D., Cambridge University. Director of North Atlantic Missiology Project, University of Cambridge, Cambridge, United Kingdom.

Stansell, Ronald G. D.Miss., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Professor of Religion and Missions, George Fox University, Newberg, Oregon.

Starr, J. Barton. Ph.D., Florida State University. Chair and Professor of History, Hong Kong Baptist University, Hong Kong, People’s Republic of China.

Steffen, Tom A. D.Miss., Biola University. Associate Professor of Intercultural Studies, Biola University, LaMirada, California.

Steyne, Philip M. D.Miss., Fuller Theological Seminary. Professor of Missions, Columbia Biblical Seminary and School of Missions, Columbia, South Carolina.

Sywulka, Stephen R. Ph.D., Syracuse University. Director, Ration Station TGNA, Guatemala City, Guatemala.

Tan, Che Bin. Ph.D., University of Manchester. Pastor-In-Charge, River of Life Community Church, San Gabriel, California.

Tanner, John. D.Miss, Fuller Theological Seminary. Director of Missions Interlink, The Missions Commission of the Australian Evangelical Alliance, New Farm, Queensland, Australia.

Taylor, William D. Ph.D., University of Texas. Director of Missions Commission, World Evangelical Fellowship, Austin Texas.

Terry, John Mark. Ph.D., Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary. Associate Professor of Missions, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky.

Thomas, Harold. Ph.D. Cand., Fuller Theological Seminary School of World Missions. Student, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Thrasher, William D. Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary. Professor of Bible and Theology, Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, Illinois.

Tienou, Tite. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Professor of Missions, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois.

Tiersma, Judith. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Assistant Professor in Urban Mission, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.
Contributors

Tinder, Donald. Ph.D., Yale University. Academic Dean, Tyndale Theological Seminary, Badhoevedorp, Netherlands.

Trulear, Harold Dean. Ph.D., Drew University. Vice President, Church Collaborative Initiatives, Public/Private Ventures, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Van der Heyden, Ulrich. Doctorate, Humboldt University, Berlin. Research Fellow, Center for Modern Oriental Studies, Berlin, Germany.

Van Engen, Charles. Ph.D., Free University of Amsterdam. Associate Professor, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Van Rheenen, Gailyn. D.Miss., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Associate Professor of Missions, Abilene Christian University.

Wagner, C. Peter. Ph.D., University of Southern California. Donald A. MacGavran Professor of Church Growth, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Wagner, William L. Th.D., University of South Africa. Professor of Missiology, Evangelical Theological Faculty, Leuven, Belgium.

Wan, Enoch. Ph.D., State University of New York at Stony Brook. Professor of Missions and Anthropology, Director, Ph.D. Intercultural Studies Program, Reformed Theological Seminary, Jackson, Mississippi.

Wardner, Timothy M. Ed.D., Indiana University. Senior Vice President for International Ministry, Freedom in Christ Ministries, Fort Wayne, Indiana.

Wenzel, David R. Ph.D., Loyola College. Associate Professor of Pastoral Counseling, Western Seminary, Portland, Oregon.

Wickstrom, David. Ph.D., Rosemead Graduate School of Psychology. Clinical Psychologist; Researcher with MK-CART/CORE; Adjunct Professor of Psychology and Missions, Columbia International University, Columbia, South Carolina.

Wilson, Everett A. Ph.D., Stanford University. President, Bethany College, Scotts Valley, California.

Winter, Ralph. Ph.D., Cornell. President, William Carey International University and General Director, U.S. Center for World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Wisely, Thomas N. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary, Division Head, International Christian Studies, Tokyo Christian University, Tokyo, Japan.

Wong, Hoover. D.Min., Fuller Theological Seminary, Senior Associate Professor, Director of Chinese Studies, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Wong, Timothy Man-Kong. Ph.D., The Chinese University of Hong Kong. Assistant Professor, Department of History, Hong Kong Baptist University, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.

Woodberry, J. Dudley. Ph.D., Harvard University. Dean and Professor of Islamic Studies, Fuller School of World Mission, Pasadena, California.

Wright, Christopher J. H. Ph.D., Cambridge. Principal, All Nations Christian College, Ware, Herts, United Kingdom.

Yu, Carver Tatsum. D.Phil., Oxford University. Vice President, China Graduate School of Theology, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.

Contributors
Abbreviations

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>ABCFM</td>
<td>American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Mission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ABD</td>
<td>Anchor Bible Dictionary, ed. David N. Freedman</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ADLR</td>
<td>Abingdon Dictionary of Living Religions, ed. Keith Crim</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AEF</td>
<td>African Evangelical Fellowship</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AFC</td>
<td>Ambassadors for Christ, ed. John D. Woodbridge</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AIM</td>
<td>Africa Inland Mission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ASV</td>
<td>American Standard Version</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BaMS</td>
<td>Basel Mission Society</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BDCM</td>
<td>Biographical Dictionary of Christian Missions, ed. Gerald Anderson</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BDEB</td>
<td>The Blackwell Dictionary of Evangelical Biography, 1730–1860, ed. Donald Lewis</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BEB</td>
<td>Baker Encyclopedia of the Bible, ed. Walter A. Elwell</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BDT</td>
<td>Baker's Dictionary of Theology, ed. Everett F. Harrison</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BibSac</td>
<td>Bibliotheca Sacra</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BM</td>
<td>Basel Mission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BMS</td>
<td>Baptist Missionary Society</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cen</td>
<td>Christian Century</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CEI</td>
<td>The Concise Encyclopedia of Islam, ed. Cyril Glassé</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CIM</td>
<td>China Inland Mission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CMA</td>
<td>Christian and Missionary Alliance</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CMS</td>
<td>Church Mission Society</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CT</td>
<td>Christianity Today</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DAB</td>
<td>Dictionary of American Biography</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DAC</td>
<td>Dictionary of the Apostolic Church, ed. James Hastings</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DAWN</td>
<td>Discipling a Whole Nation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DBA</td>
<td>Dictionary of Baptists in America, ed. Bill J. Leonard</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DCA</td>
<td>Dictionary of Christianity in America, ed. Daniel G. Reid</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DCSRO</td>
<td>Dictionary of Cults, Sects, Religions and the Occult, ed. George A. Mather</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DEM</td>
<td>Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement, ed. Nicholas Lossky</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DJG</td>
<td>Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. Joel B. Green and Scot McKnight</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DPCM</td>
<td>Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, ed. Stanley Burgess and Gary B. McGee</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DPHL</td>
<td>Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, ed. Gerald Hawthorne and Ralph P. Martin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DSCHT</td>
<td>Dictionary of Scottish Church History and Theology, ed. Nigel de S. Cameron</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DWCH</td>
<td>A Dictionary of Women in Church History by Mary L. Hammack</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DWME</td>
<td>Division of World Mission and Evangelism</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EB</td>
<td>Encyclopedia Britannica</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EBC</td>
<td>The Expositor's Bible Commentary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EDBT</td>
<td>Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed., Walter A. Elwell</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EDT</td>
<td>Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, ed. Walter A. Elwell</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EFMA</td>
<td>Evangelical Fellowship of Mission Agencies</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EI</td>
<td>Encyclopedia of Islam, ed. B. Lewis, V. L. Ménage, Ch. Pellat, and J. Schacht</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EJ</td>
<td>Encyclopedia Judaica</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EMA</td>
<td>Evangelical Missionary Alliance</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EMIS</td>
<td>Evangelical Missions Information Service</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EMQ</td>
<td>Evangelical Missions Quarterly</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ER</td>
<td>Encyclopedia of Religion, ed. Mircea Eliade</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ERE</td>
<td>Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ERT</td>
<td>Evangelical Review of Theology</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ESB</td>
<td>Encyclopedia of Southern Baptists</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Abbreviations

EWM  Encyclopedia of World Methodism,
ed. Nolan B. Harmon

FJII  From Jerusalem to Irian Jaya, Ruth Tucker

GCOWE  Global Consultation of World Evangelization

GGC  Guardians of the Great Commission,
Ruth Tucker

GNB  Good News Bible

HBD  Harper's Bible Dictionary, ed.
Madeline Sweeny Miller

HCM  A History of Christian Missions,
Stephen Neill

HEM  A History of the Ecumenical Movement,
Ruth Rouse and Stephen C. Neill

IAMS  International Association for Mission Studies

IBMR  International Bulletin of Missionary Research

ICETE  International Council for Evangelical Theological Education

ICHR  Indian Church History Review

IDB  Interpreters Dictionary of the Bible, ed.
George A. Buttrick

IEM  India Evangelical Mission

IFES  International Fellowship of Evangelical Students

IFMA  Interdenominalational Fellowship of Mission Agencies

IJFM  International Journal of Frontier Missions

IMC  International Missionary Council

IRM  International Review of Mission

ISBE  The International Standard Bible
Encyclopedia, ed. James Orr

ISBE Rev  The International Standard Bible
Encyclopedia, revised edition, ed.
Geoffrey Bromiley

JBL  Journal of Biblical Literature

JETS  Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society

JBP  J. B. Phillips Translation

JPC  Journal of Psychology and Christianity

JPT  Journal of Psychology and Theology

KJV  King James Version

LMS  London Missionary Society

MAF  Mission Aviation Fellowship

MARC  Mission Advanced Research and Communication Center

ML  Mission Legacies, ed. Gerald H. Anderson

MS  Mission Studies

NAE  National Association of Evangelicals

NBD  New Bible Dictionary, ed.
J. D. Douglas

NCC  National Council of Churches

NCE  New Catholic Encyclopedia

NDT  The New Dictionary of Theology, ed.
Joseph Komonchak, Mary Collins, and Dermot A. Lane

NeRM  New Religious Movements

NIDCC  The New International Dictionary of the Christian Church, ed.
J. D. Douglas

NIDNTT  The New International Dictionary of the New Testament, ed. Colin Brown

NIDOTTE  New International Dictionary of Old Testament Theology and Exegesis, ed.
Willem A. Gemeren

J. D. Douglas

NIV  New International Version

NLB  New Living Translation

NRSV  New Revised Standard Version

ODCC  Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, ed.
F. L. Cross

ODS  Oxford Dictionary of the Saints, ed.
David H. Farmer

OMF  Overseas Missionary Fellowship

OW  Operation World, ed. Patrick Johnstone

PA  Practical Anthropology

PWCM  Perspectives on the World Christian Movement: A Reader, ed.
Ralph D. Winter and Stephen C. Hawthorne

RSV  Revised Standard Version

SCM  Student Christian Movement

SIM  Society for International Ministries

SPG  Society for the Propogation of the Gospel

TCDCB  Twentieth Century Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed.
J. D. Douglas

TCKs  Third Culture Kids

TDNT  Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, ed. Gerhard Kittel

TDOT  Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament, ed. G. Johannes Botterweck

TEAM  The Evangelical Alliance Mission

TEE  Theological Education by Extension
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>TEFL</td>
<td>Teaching English as a Foreign Language</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TESL</td>
<td>Teaching English as a Second Language</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TESOL</td>
<td>Teaching English to Speakers of Other Languages</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TWOT</td>
<td>Theological Wordbook of the Old Testament, ed. R. Laird Harris</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WCC</td>
<td>World Council of Churches</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WCE</td>
<td>World Christian Encyclopedia, ed. David Barrett</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WEF</td>
<td>World Evangelical Fellowship</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WmTJ</td>
<td>Westminster Theological Journal</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WSCF</td>
<td>World Student Christian Federation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WWCH</td>
<td>Who's Who in Church History, ed. William Pierson Barker</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ZPBD</td>
<td>Zondervan Pictoral Bible Dictionary, ed. Merrill C. Tenney</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ZPEB</td>
<td>Zondervan Pictoral Encyclopedia of the Bible, ed. Merrill C. Tenney</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Abolitionist Movement. The abolitionist movement in the United States had a great impact on the home and overseas missionary movement. During the 1820s and 1830s antislavery and proabolition activity put pressure on mission agencies to sever all relationships with slaveholders: not to appoint them as missionaries, receive their donations, place them on their boards, or receive them as members in their home mission churches. As a result, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM) from 1840 to 1860 repeatedly was presented with petitions that called it to deal with issues of slaveholding and slaveholders in connection with its work among the Cherokee and Choctaw people in the United States. Tensions within the churches and the board itself between moderate and radical proabolition factions made it difficult for the agency to solve these disputes to everyone’s satisfaction.

Such adjustments that the ABCFM and other mission agencies made did not satisfy the radical abolitionists. Therefore, the antislavery American Home Mission Society was formed in 1826, and by the early 1840s a number of “comeouter” groups separated from denominational boards. For example, the American Baptist Free Mission Society (ABFMS) was organized in 1843 and no longer worked with the Triennial Convention of northern Baptists. This society, which existed until 1868, became the means through which antislavery Baptists engaged in missions at home and abroad. During the years of their existence the ABFMS had personnel in Japan and Burma. It also agitated in Baptist state associations in the north on behalf of slaves, as well as in slaveholding areas in Kentucky and Virginia.

Similar to the ABFMS in all but a denominational name was the American Missionary Association (AMA) formed in Albany, New York, in 1846. Strongly proabolition, the AMA at its founding integrated into itself three antislavery missionary organizations—the Union Missionary Society, the Committee for West India Missions, and the Western Evangelical Society. It promoted already existing mission activities and many new ones. By 1856 it had a total of seventy-nine missionaries working among North American Indians and in Africa, the Sandwich Islands, Jamaica, Siam (Thailand), Egypt, and Canada. The AMA began work among Chinese in America in 1852, and this led to the formation of the California Chinese Mission by 1875. With the beginning of the Civil War the work of the AMA began to focus almost exclusively on the freedmen in the South, and it ceased broader missionary efforts at home and abroad. Important leaders in the work of the AMA included such evangelical abolitionists as Lewis Tappan and Joshua Leavitt.

RALPH R. COVELL

Aboriginal Religions. Aboriginal religions in Australia share many similarities with other primal religions, yet they are as distinctive and as different as the variety of aboriginal languages.

In traditional aboriginal cosmology there was awareness among some tribes of a deity, such as the All Father or All Mother, although these have not generally been important. A lesser, but more significant being is the widely known Rainbow Serpent. This Rainbow Serpent and a variety of formative spirit-beings were responsible for the formation of the present world order.

The foundation for the aboriginal view of reality is the primeval, mythical epoch called the Dreaming. The Dreaming events are recounted in the aboriginal myths. In the Dreaming a variety of formative spirit-beings emerged from the earth or sea and took on part plant or animal and human forms. They moved across the featureless landscape, forming the various topographical features, plants, animals, and humans. Some of the formative spirit-beings then returned to the earth, forming various topographic phenomena that are regarded as sacred sites.
Aboriginal Religions

While the initial creativity of the Dreaming is complete, the Dreaming is ever present to the people through participation in ritual, ceremonies or “corroborees,” art, and song. The Dreaming myths give rise to the aboriginal understanding of their relationship with the land, animals, and plant life. Aboriginal people see themselves sharing a common ancestry with the plants and animals, being of common spiritual essence. Each group is obligated to others to perform the ceremonies relevant to their particular totemic ancestors to ensure the continuity and sustenance of the species.

The main religious activity is associated with keeping alive the Dreaming creativity in the present to ensure renewal or renovation of the cosmic order. In the ritual reenactment the primordial events are made present and the performer becomes the totemic ancestor. Some rituals are solely for initiated men and held in secret; some are exclusively for women; others are shared by both genders with separate responsibilities. The Dreaming spirit-beings provided a precedent for all ceremonies and social customs as well, so all of life is seen to be sacred; their responsibility is to keep them alive and productive. To the aboriginal living is a religious activity. Human life begins and ends in the spirit world.

The change brought about by acculturation and white encroachment has been cataclysmic, resulting in widespread desacralization and demoralization of society. Consequently there have been few recorded revitalization movements, yet aboriginal religions have survived and changed dramatically among the tribal people.

Whether aboriginal religious tradition is still an important reality for individuals or not, aboriginal thinking processes, basic concerns, and needs expressed in the myths remain. For this reason missions and church need to treat aboriginal religions seriously, irrespective of how their significance is understood, and assist the aborigines in recapturing the gospel that addresses their needs. There remains a great need to explore the use of indigenous art, music, and corroboree to communicate the gospel.

Abraham Mar Thoma (1880–1947). Indian church leader and promoter of evangelism. Popularly known in the West as Bishop Abraham, Abraham Mar Thoma was born in Kallooppara in Travancore, a state in southern India. He was raised by an uncle who belonged to the Syrian Mar Thoma Church, an indigenous denomination. He committed his life to Christ at age 13 and was ordained in 1911. After education at Madras Christian College, Toronto University, and Wycliffe College (also in Toronto), he had a parish ministry for a brief time. In 1917 he was consecrated suffragan (or assistant) metropolitan to help the head of the denomination, Titus II. The church at this time probably had a little more than one hundred thousand members. For more than a quarter of a century, the two worked together to strengthen the spiritual life of the church and to make it an active participant in the spread of the gospel. In 1924 Abraham helped formally organize the Voluntary Evangelist's Association, a lay organization that encouraged Christians to study and pray together and to go out regularly witnessing to individuals and groups. His passion for spreading the gospel was an encouragement and example to many in the church, as was his personal piety. On Titus's death in 1944, he became metropolitan. The church by the time of Abraham's death three years later had grown to about two hundred thousand members and was known for its evangelistic outreach. E. Stanley Jones, in paying tribute to his friend, called him “the greatest Christian in India.”

ROBERT SHUSTER

Abrahamic Covenant. God's initial call to Abraham to leave his family and his country in order to follow wherever the Lord would lead him and the promises God made to Abraham constitute the core of the Abrahamic covenant (Gen. 12:1–3). Throughout the story of Abraham these promises are reiterated or expanded (Gen. 12:7; 13:14–17; 15:1–21; 17:1–27; 22:15–18), and Abraham demonstrates his commitment by his obedience, culminating in his willingness to sacrifice Isaac (Gen. 22:1–18). The same promises are repeated, in whole or in part, to Abraham's descendants (Gen. 21:12, 13, 18; 25:1–6; 28:3–4, 12–15), and the covenant then becomes a central part of the rest of the Bible.

God's call of Abraham parallels his creation of humankind in his own image (Gen. 1:26–28). The first two chapters of Genesis depict a harmony between God and humanity, between man and woman, and between humanity and the rest of creation. That harmony was severed when the original pair chose the path of autonomy from God (Gen. 3:1–19), but God invited Abraham to surrender to a new path that he would mark out for him (Gen. 12:1).

See also Primal Religions.

The Abrahamic covenant has a key role within God's plan to get the gospel to all the world. First, God's dealings with Abraham have the seed of the gospel within it. As with his promise of salvation to all who receive the Son by faith (John 1:12), the promise to Abraham was unconditional. Abraham opened himself to God's grace, reorienting his life to God's new work on his behalf. In that act he became both an example for all future generations of believers and the channel through which God mediated his promise of reconciliation to all the world (cf. Gen. 12:3 with Rom. 4 and Gal. 3).

Second, the land that God promised to Abraham and his descendants became the central point from which the gospel would spread to the rest of the world (Acts 1:8). God created the physical world and its people with their physical bodies, and he began his plan of reconciliation with a real place.

Third, when God promised to give Abraham countless descendants, he established him as the human source of Jesus Christ, the Savior of all humanity (Matt. 1:1). Also Israel, the nation that came from Abraham, became the first of the nations that God purposed to reach with the gospel (Matt. 28:19–20; Rom. 1:16).

Fourth, God's promise to make Abraham's name great becomes an evidence of the restored relationship between God and humanity. When we try to gain a name for ourselves it results in alienation from God (Gen. 11:1–9), but when God establishes our identity for us, it results in a new life that is much better than any we could have imagined for ourselves (Matt. 19:39; Rev. 2:17).

Fifth, and finally, God promised Abraham that “all peoples on earth will be blessed through you” (Gen. 12:3). This promise moves the focus of God's plan from an individual to the entire world. God's heart was for the world, but he began with choosing one person.

Thomas J. Finley

Abrams, Minnie F. (1859–1912). American missionary to India. Abrams had attended the Chicago Training School for Home and Foreign Missions and went to Bombay in 1887 with the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. She helped establish and supervise a Christian girls' school and worked with children in orphanages. In 1898 she followed the Lord's leading in becoming affiliated with the Muktì Mission, Pandita Ramabai's home for Indian widows, in Kedgaon.

Early in 1905 seventy volunteers at the mission responded to Ramabai's call for prayer for revival. Six months later the Spirit was poured out among them, the praying band having swelled to 550, meeting twice daily. The revival, weeping, praying, and confessing of sins continued almost uninterrupted for days, and then during the following year spread to other Indian mission sites.
In her book The Baptism of the Holy Ghost and Fire (1906) Abrams recorded the revival she witnessed and her own experience. With biblical references and theological explanations she described the fire accompanying (or following) the spirit baptism as a burning that brought both pain over one’s sin and joy over its cleansing. The baptism was often accompanied by an urgent desire to reach souls, a boldness for service, and some gifts of the Spirit. Abrams called every Christian to seek the fire, the baptism, and continued refilings of the Spirit (Acts 4:23–31). Abrams advocated faithfulness to the Word of God as the constant in the Christian’s life. Sending a copy of her book the following year to a former classmate serving in Valparaiso, Chile, greatly influenced the beginnings of the Pentecostal movement there.

After a year back in the United States, Abrams returned to India in 1910. Determined to take the gospel to unreached peoples, she led a party of seven single women missionaries to evangelize in the United Provinces, Fyzabad, and Bahraich. She died of malaria undertaking this work.

Absoluteness of Christianity. See Theology of Religions.

Academic Associations of Mission. In the nineteenth century there was very little research in the field of missions and the confrontation of beliefs and cultures in the modern world. Major steps were taken following the World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh (1910): the launching of the International Review of Missions in 1912 and the founding of the Missionary Research Library in New York in 1914. These initiatives stimulated the inclusion of mission instruction in programs of theological education.

The first society to be established for the academic study of missions was German, the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Missionswissenschaft (German Society for Missiology). Founded in 1918, it initially concentrated on publishing and on assisting the development of missiology as an academic discipline in German Catholic faculties. After the Second World War, the German Society for Missiology became more active in supporting research projects and the development of missiological documentation.

On the other side of the Atlantic, the 1920s witnessed high-quality discussion by a fellowship of leading missiologists. The Lux Mundi group on the east coast of North America broke new ground and may be said to have sharpened concepts that came to full bloom in the founding of the American Society of Missiology (ASM) fifty years later.

The years after the Second World War found mission studies in deepening difficulty at academic institutions. This was the case until the early 1970s, when a renaissance in mission studies coincided with growing awareness that Christianity was becoming a predominantly non-Western religious phenomenon. Highly significant here were Olav G. Mykelbust’s mid-1950s volumes on The Study of Missions in Theological Education. The director of the Egede Institute of Missionary Study and Research (Oslo) called for creation of an international institute of scientific mission research. This eventually led to the official founding of the International Association for Mission Studies (IAMS) in 1972. The IAMS was to function as an umbrella covering a worldwide network of national and regional missiological associations.

In North America the Association of Professors of Missions (APM) was formed in Louisville, Kentucky, in 1952 in the face of critical challenges to the very existence of missiological studies in the academy. Discussions ensued about the need for a new professional society to promote mission studies in the United States, a society broader, more comprehensive, and more inclusive than APM. The result was a gathering of missiologists at Nashville, Tennessee, in June 1972 to found the ASM, which would include Christian missiologists of all denominations and traditions. Its goal was to reinforce the place of missiology as a bona fide academic discipline. After much serious debate, an inaugural assembly was held in St. Louis in June 1973. A new journal, Missiology: An International Review (see Journals of Mission and Missiology), was established with the editorship rotating among evangelical, conciliar Protestant, and Roman Catholic mission scholars. This reflected the tripartite, balanced nature of the association’s leadership.

The ASM quickly achieved a membership of five hundred, with the result that the fledgling Association of Evangelical Professors of Missions was soon eclipsed. The AEPF had been conceived by fifteen missions professors in 1967 at the Urbana student convention. Officially formed at a meeting of the Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association (IFMA) and the Evangelical Fellowship of Mission Agencies (EFMA) at Winona Lake, Indiana, in October 1968, its purpose was to provide a forum for interaction between teachers of missions in Bible schools, Christian colleges, and seminaries.

From 1974 onwards, the ASM was an affiliate member of the IAMS. Two years later, it was admitted to membership in what is now known as the Council of Societies for the Study of Religion. Following presentations by officers of the ASM, the Association of Theological Schools (ATS) in 1987 recognized the legitimacy and value of missiology as a field of learning in its own right. The ATS proceeded to accept the doctorate of missiology as worthy of endorsement and inclusion within the roster of professional degrees. This was an important achievement.

The ASM has normally met in conjunction with the annual meetings of the APM. Since 1980, the ASM has published a monograph series through Orbis Books. Dozens of titles have been issued. In 1993 a new ASM dissertation series began in cooperation with the University Press of America.

In 1988 the IAMS Secretariat was based in Hamburg, Germany, and the journal Mission Studies was inaugurated. Assemblies have been held around the world every three or four years since 1972. IAMS has also sponsored international working groups and consultations on such vital issues as biblical research for mission studies (BISAM), healing and mission, and mission bibliography, documentation, and archives (DAB).

In November 1990 the AEPM broadened its base and changed its name to the Evangelical Missiological Society (EMS). The goal of the new organization was to serve the needs and interests of missionaries, agency executives, students, and professors of mission. It was particularly concerned to include conservative evangelical administrators and field missionaries in its membership so as to enhance communication between the academic world and the sending agencies. Its meetings synchronize with North American meetings of the Evangelical Theological Society, IFMA, EFMA, and the Association of Canadian Bible Colleges (ACBC). Proclaiming its intention to serve as a launching pad for biblical missiology in the twenty-first century, the EMS purposed from the beginning to provide avenues for publication of evangelical missiological monographs and books that otherwise might not see the light of day, such as Edward Rommen’s Spiritual Power and Missions and David Hesselgrave’s Scripture and Strategy. The EMS also publishes an Occasional Bulletin to communicate its news and views.

The British and Irish Association for Mission Studies (BIAMS), which was founded in 1990, keeps in tune with the initial vision of the IAMS. A key catalyst in this development was ANDREW F. WALLS, the founding secretary of the Scottish Institute for Missionary Studies (SIMS, 1967) and a specialist in intensive IAMS and European missiological networking. Another precedent for missiological consultation in Britain was the English-based Evangelical Fellowship for Missionary Studies, which had been founded in 1968 to provide opportunities for evangelicals working in the whole area of missionary studies and to encourage further research and publication. The EFMS was closely connected with the London-based Evangelical Missionary Alliance (EMA).

In continental western Europe, various associations have arisen to serve mission studies. Prominent among them are two associations of French-speaking mission scholars. The Centre de Recherches et d’Échanges sur la Diffusion et l’Interculturation du Christianisme (CREDIC) was founded in 1979 to provide a common forum for Catholic mission scholars and institutes. More recently, the Association Francophone Oecuménique (AFOM) was established in Paris in 1994 by Roman Catholic and Protestant missiologists for dialogue on the intercultural and intercontinental expressions of Christian faith in today’s world. The more specialized Berlin Society for Mission History was founded in 1994.

Farther afield, it is important to recognize initiatives in Africa, Asia, and Latin America. In the Southern Hemisphere, the Southern African Missiological Society (SAMS) was founded in 1968 under the pioneer leadership of David J. Bosch. Based in the department of missiology at the University of South Africa, Pretoria, SAMS produced Missionalia and carried on an important abstracting service. In south Asia, the Fellowship of Indian Missiologists (FOIM), founded at Purnodaya, Bhopal, in June 1991, is worthy of note. The South Pacific Association for Mission Studies (SPAMS) was founded in Australia in the 1980s, while the Associaçao de Professores de Missoes no Brasil, an association of mission professors in Brazil, was founded in 1992. All of these are active in fostering and publishing scholarly research and writing in their area.

The loose network of national and international professional associations of mission has grown significantly over the last two decades. It has done much to facilitate global communication and cross-pollination in missiological thought, with the result that the field of mission studies was much stronger at the end of the twentieth century than at mid-century.

A. CHRISTOPHER SMITH

Accommodation. Missionary practice of accommodating the rituals, practices, and styles of the missionary’s sending church to those of the recipient culture. It indicates what are generally conscious processes of adaptation, done with the willingness to adopt some of the forms of the receiving culture and at times to leave aside some of the prior Christian church’s customs considered to be an impediment to embracing Christian faith in the receiving culture.

As a technical term within the history of mission in the Roman Catholic Church, accommo-
Accommodation identifies a series of specific experiments in this direction during the sixteenth through eighteenth centuries, around which a great amount of controversy gathered. Most of these were undertaken by Jesuits, the two most notable of whom were Matteo Ricci in China and Roberto de Nobili in South India.

Ricci’s efforts (from 1583 until his death in 1610) to lodge the Christian faith among people closely associated with the imperial palace led him to accommodations to Chinese practice in language (the use of the term Tien [‘heaven’] as a term for deity), in veneration of Confucius (considering the term applied to him, Sheng [‘holy’], to be a term of honor for anything venerable), and in the veneration of ancestors (taken to be symbolic of the cohesion of the family and not religious worship). These issues persisted into the eighteenth century in what became known as the “Rites Controversy.” In 1704, limitations were placed on the accommodations Ricci had made, but this was followed in 1720 by a number of concessions or permissions granted by a legate of Rome. Finally, in 1742 a papal bull issued by Benedict XIV swept away those permissions and required Roman practice in every detail as the law for the missions. This stood until 1938.

In the case of the work of Roberto de Nobili in South India from 1605 until his death in 1656, the controversy arose around his efforts to become as Indian as possible, adopting the lifestyle and practices of a holy man of the Brahman caste. That involved refusing customs that gave offense (such as eating meat or wearing leather shoes). It also meant not requiring converts to break with caste rules except where directly idolatrous. De Nobili’s refusal to identify with the already existing church, which was viewed by Indians as the caste of the parangi (Portuguese), led to charges of schism. A papal bull in 1744 dictated essentially the same requirements for India as for China.

Accommodation as mission policy and strategy represented an advance over “imposition” by which the missionary church’s culture entirely displaced the recipient culture in the definition of Christian life and community. But when compared with more recent notions of CONTEXTUALIZATION (a term more common among Protestants) and INCULTURATION (a term preferred among Roman Catholics) there remain inherent dilemmas. First, the missionary church remains in charge of the transaction and decides what adaptations are appropriate, this instead of the full participation of those receiving and believing the message. Second, it tends to give attention to external practices and rituals and fails to engage the more deeply felt meaning structures of the culture. Third, it leaves untouched the question of the culture of the missionary by which the Christian faith has thus far been shaped.

The notion of accommodation has re-emerged in recent missiological reflection, now more as missionary problem than strategy. In this respect, the term speaks of the way churches in the West have by stages taken into themselves post-Enlightenment culture that places a high premium on the rational, autonomous self, a belief in the inevitability of progress, and confidence in technology and technique for managing the world and constructing social order. The question arises whether, and to what extent, churches in the societies of a waning Christendom have lost their distinctive character as communities of witness by becoming overly accommodated to such a culture’s assumptions, values, and instincts. This question fuels the challenge put so directly by Lesslie Newbigin to imagine what would be involved in the missionary encounter of the gospel with Western culture.

Accra Conference (1957–58). The final assembly of the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL took place in Accra in December 1957 and January 1958. In the context of the conviction that “the Christian world mission is Christ’s, not ours,” it was decided to recommend the integration of the work of the missionary council with that of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC), with the intention that this would place mission, including clearly identified evangelism, at the heart of World Council life. Some missionary leaders, however, feared the marginalization of these concerns, which historically had been promoted by independent missionary agencies enjoying considerable independence from denominational bureaucracies. Two national missionary councils (Norway and Congo), in fact, did not immediately associate with the new integrated Division of World Mission and Evangelism of the WCC. Other critics have subsequently questioned whether the Accra hope has been properly fulfilled within the life of the WCC.

From the point of view of the World Council there was an issue of credibility, given its judgment that unity and disunity were essentially issues that challenged the missionary effectiveness of the church: mission and unity belonged together in one organization. There was also a need to recognize that Christian missions, whatever their origins, had established churches that might be younger than the historic churches of Western Christendom but were still churches. If they were churches, then their fellowship was needed in the World Council and as churches they, too, were called to mission. On the other hand, there were voices in the council, including those of some of the Orthodox members, mindful of what they took to be the proselytizing activities of some Protestant groups, who pointed out that the WCC was a council of churches, not Christian agencies, however benevolent their intention. Accra represents a turning point in the history of the ecumenical movement, for by opening the way for younger churches to join the World Council it marked the end of northern dominance in the life of that body, a change that the historic churches have sometimes been slow to recognize.

At Accra the Theological Education Fund was successfully set up. Generously endowed by J. D. Rockefeller Jr., who offered $2 million to be matched by the mission boards, the Fund has sought to remedy the grave weaknesses in ministerial formation programs evident among the younger churches.

JOHN A. Y. BRIGGS

SEE ALSO World Council of Churches Conferences.

Accreditation. A procedure for certifying the appropriateness of an educational institution and its instructional programs; also, the recognition awarded to an institution or program thus certified. In missions, accreditation often refers to certification of theological education in the Third World.

A concern for appropriateness assumes both a system of values and criteria by which implementation of those values can be assessed. Theological educators often find it easier to define accreditation criteria than to clarify the qualities that distinguish appropriate ministry training.

Accreditation affords significant benefits, but also entails real dangers. Accreditation certifies the compliance of ministry training institutions and programs with assessment criteria; it facilitates communication and cooperation among similar institutions; it enables students to select appropriate programs; and it can provide a stimulus for program improvement. Nevertheless, the prestige attached to accreditation appeals almost irresistibly to elitist motives and the quest to attain and retain accreditation may tempt theological educators to compromise the contextual appropriateness of their programs. When issues of appropriateness and worth are slighted, accreditation may promote Western structures and programs without sensitivity to the non-Western church's training needs or to its economic realities.

In Europe, assurance of educational quality is entrusted to universities chartered by the national government. In the United States, accreditation is a self-monitoring function of non-governmental—but government recognized—associations of colleges and schools. In much of the world, educational quality is assured by a national “Ministry of Education,” which assesses and certifies educational institutions. Because Ministries of Education in many nations view theological schools as religious (versus educational) institutions, theological educators have developed peer-accrediting structures. Since these structures lack the benefit of government sanction, their credibility depends on the appropriateness and implementation of their accrediting procedures.

In most regions, accreditation is a five-step process. (1) A national or regional agency defines the programs and awards it will accredit, and adopts standards for accrediting theological schools. When a theological school indicates its desire to seek accreditation, a review process is initiated. Normally this includes (2) institutional self-assessment on the basis of standards of the accrediting agency, plus (3) review and assessment by a panel of external visitors. The external visitors report their assessment and recommendations. (4) This report, with the institution's self-assessment, is reviewed by the agency's accrediting commission, and (5) an accreditation decision is taken—either to grant or to deny accreditation.

Two associations promote communication and coordination among regional theological education accrediting agencies. The INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL FOR EVANGELICAL THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION (ICETE) was founded in 1980 as a project of the Theological Commission of the WORLD EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP. Member agencies include the Accrediting Association of Bible Colleges (North America), the Accrediting Council for Theological Education in Africa, Asia Theological Association, Caribbean Evangelical Theological Association, European Evangelical Accrediting Association, the Evangelical Association for Theological Education in Latin America, and South Pacific Association of Bible Colleges. A conciliar counterpart, the World Conference of Associations of Theological Institutions (WOCATI), founded in 1989, lists twenty national and regional associations, some of which (e.g., the Association of Theological Schools in the United States and Canada) provide accrediting services.

ROBERT W. FERRIS

Acculturation. See Culture Learning.

Acosta, José de (1540–1600). Spanish Jesuit early missiologist and missionary to Peru. Having taken Jesuit vows in 1570, Acosta arrived in De Procuranda Indorum Salute
Spain.
1587 ill health forced his permanent return to served Catholic work and local populations. In Council of Lima (1582–83), and traveled and observed Catholic work and local populations. In 1587 ill health forced his permanent return to Spain.

Acosta is best known for two of his works. In De Procuranda Indorum Salute (On How to Bring about Indian Salvation; 1588) he deals with proper ways to evangelize Indians in the New World. This was the first systematic treatment of missionary work and problems in dealing with the New World and greatly influenced Catholic missionary efforts in the Americas. In it Acosta emphasized the learning of indigenous languages, cultural adaptation, and the establishment of educational institutions. Historia Natural y Moral de las Indias (Natural and Moral History of the Indies; 1590) presented his systematic perspectives of the philosophical impact of the New World on the natural order of life and history. He carefully presented his observations on the environment and history of the Indians, arguing forcefully that they were just as human as the Europeans. While he did not hold their traditional religious beliefs and practices in high regard, he still respected them as people bearing God’s image whose lot in life could be significantly improved through education.

Together these two books provided a formative and thorough treatment of the encounter of the church with the people of the Americas. Advanced in relation to the thinking of their times, they stand as foundations of early systematic missiological reflection.

Bibliography. ODCC; E. N. Johnson, Speculum 9 (1934): 147–79; R. Kay, NCE, 1:112; S. Neill, HCM.

Adaptation. A term belonging to a cluster of ideas linked to CONTEXTUALIZATION, which includes concepts such as ACCOMMODATION and IN-DIGENIZATION as well as related ideas such as TRANSLATABILITY, IDENTIFICATION, and (in an opposing sense) SYNCRETISM. The basic idea is that of changing the form of Christian theological ideas and practice (e.g., adaptation of the liturgy in high church contexts) so that they can be understood in a cultural context different from that of the communicator. It has as its foundation the reality of culture’s role in human reasoning and actions and the resulting culture-embeddedness of religious ideas, even though theological truths are transcultural.

Adaptation and accommodation are often used interchangeably; attempting to nuance the differences between them so as to distinguish them is unacceptably stretching their use in the literature and in practice. Adaptation has typically been used more in Catholic circles than in Protestant, especially before the term contextualization was popularized in the early 1970s. Though proponents of contextualization sought to go beyond the other terms, the core ideas inherent in contextualization build on the previously established concepts and cannot be completely separated from them.

Adjustment to the Field. Rapid, authentic adjustment to the field is an important key to effective cross-cultural communication of the Christian faith. During preparation, and especially on arrival, the missionary family must be aware of this challenge. The problems of adjustment must be anticipated and then positively experienced. The number one problem is CULTURE SHOCK. Basically, culture shock is an emotional and mental stalemate brought about by experiences in a culture that contrast too much with the culture a person is accustomed to. No missionary is exempt from culture shock; everyone will suffer from it to a certain extent. Like most ailments, it has its own symptoms, causes, and cures. Some never recover from it; others live in a constant state of such shock; many recover beautifully. Positive handling of culture shock is the first step toward genuine adjustment to the new field and its people.
Culture shock is precipitated by the anxiety that results from losing familiar signs and symbols of social intercourse. When the missionary enters a strange culture, all or most of these familiar cues are removed; feelings of lostness and frustration are not uncommon. Rejection and regression result and strange reactions are common. Some symptoms are excessive washing of hands; excessive concern over drinking water, food, and bedding; fits of anger over delays; refusal to learn the language; and excessive fear of being cheated, robbed, or injured. A sequence of four stages is common: curious fascination; a hostile and aggressive attitude; a superior attitude to the people; and gradual acceptance that brings enjoyment and understanding. The stage of culture shock in which the missionary family lives will have great bearing on its cross-cultural witness.

What can be done to reduce culture shock’s downward spiral? Usually missionologists recommend three things: empathy, observation, and experimentation. Empathy helps missionaries get to know the people of their host culture, to feel as others feel. How missionaries relate to others is the basis of cross-cultural effectiveness. Can they trust others? Can they accept help from others? Empathy leads to a mutually dependent relationship that results in a nonjudgmental attitude. Intentional observation makes missionaries break out of their cultural cocoon and become alert to what is going on around them. Experimentation, or, in other words, “trying out something and seeing what happens!” is the way a child learns a culture, by inquiry and discovery learning. Like the child, the missionary finds out through trial and error.

Adjustment comes as the missionary family learns to cope with culture shock. Coping comes through building a knowledge background of the culture, which includes the language; through copying a reliable model in the new culture; and through creatively acting on one's best insights and making appropriate adjustments. Like any healthy learning experience, mastering culture shock is an enriching experience. It produces a deeper sense of human values; it conquers harmful ethnocentrism; it earns a freedom to constructively criticize; and it builds immunity to further serious cases. Those missionaries who have successfully passed through culture shock and have successfully adjusted to their fields of service emerge different people, in many ways healthier and better adjusted than before.

JUSTICE C. ANDERSON

See also Culture Shock; Extent of Missionary Identification.

Adopt-a-People. It is difficult to sustain a mission focus on the billions of people in the world or even on the multitudes of languages and cultures in a given country. Adopt-a-people is a mission mobilization strategy that helps Christians get connected with a specific group of people who are in spiritual need. It focuses on the goal of discipling a particular people group (see Peoples, People Groups), and sees the sending of missionaries as one of the important means to fulfill that goal.

Adopt-a-people was conceptualized to help congregations focus on a specific aspect of the Great Commission. It facilitates the visualization of the real needs of other people groups, enables the realization of tangible accomplishments, develops and sustains involvement, and encourages more meaningful and focused prayer. A people group focus helps Christians to maintain an emphasis on the goal of reaching a people group and then discipling Christians from within that people. Churches in the people group are also helped to evangelize their own people and eventually to send out their own missionaries.

Adopt-a-people does not mean that a church or mission organization is adopting a group into their own organization or that no other churches or groups can work with that particular people. Rather, the goal of adopt-a-people is to be used by God to see a people adopted into his heavenly family. Thus, the implementation of the adopt-a-people concept requires maintaining a commitment until the Great Commission is fulfilled in the targeted group. In pragmatic terms, the minimal involvement for a church (or fellowship) using the adopt-a-people idea is to provide informed, dedicated prayer for the targeted people group. Other levels of involvement range from logistical or research help to financial support to short-term projects among the targeted people group and even the commissioning and support of long-term missionaries from the adopting organization.

TERRY J. RILEY

Adventist Missions. The Seventh-Day Adventist (SDA) Church is an evangelical denomination with 10 million members (1998) working in 205 countries. It is rooted in the renewal movement of William Miller, a Baptist farmer in New England, who preached the impending second advent of Christ in the 1840s.

Background. When Christ did not return by October 22, 1844, the Millerite movement disintegrated into several groups. The SDA church eventually developed from one of these groups as a missionary movement with a strongly evangelical theological core (e.g., primacy of the Scriptures, salvation through Christ), a set of distinct doctrines (e.g., seventh-day Sabbath, premillennial eschatology, spiritual gifts, tithing), and a definite lifestyle (e.g., healthful living). After a formative period under the guidance of influential leaders like James and Ellen White, Joseph Bates, and Uriah Smith, Adventists cultivated a global missionary consciousness that grew out of the Adventist understanding of biblical prophecies (cf. Rev. 14:6–12).
Adventist Missions

The SDA insistence on a healthy lifestyle that reflects personal holiness, the keeping of the seventh-day Sabbath, and the acceptance of Ellen White as a prophetic messenger to the church have sometimes caused other Christians to criticize the SDA church as a cult. But a review of SDA theology reveals that Adventists are firmly committed to the Reformation principles of sola scriptura and righteousness by grace through faith. Adventist practices such as Sabbath-keeping, tithing, and a commitment to world mission are understood to grow out of the believer’s response to Christ’s transforming grace.

Missionary Expansion. At first Adventist missionary efforts were directed largely toward those who had shared their experience in the Millerite movement. But soon Adventist immigrants in the United States were also sharing their convictions with friends and relatives, some of them on other continents. Michael Czechowski (1818–76), a former Catholic priest from Poland, eventually went back to Europe in 1864, starting SDA groups in Switzerland, Italy, and Romania. The existence of such groups led the church to send John Andrews to Europe in 1874 as the first official missionary. While Adventists were latecomers to the Great Century of Missions, their missionaries were soon working on all continents. The SDA practice of tithing and a system of sharing financial resources upwardly throughout the organization gave mission strategists means to boldly move the church forward around the world. Today the church is organized into twelve world divisions and growing at a decadal rate of about 75 percent (lower in Western countries) with 90 percent of its members in non-Western countries. This growth testifies to a firm commitment to the task of world evangelization which is part of the Adventist identity.

Mission Practices. In addition to the strong missionary vision of the church there are several elements that have consistently contributed to the solid growth of the missionary enterprise of the SDA church, such as the church’s use of media (especially publishing), a global financial and organizational structure, and a network of service and educational institutions.

The publishing work initially served to link the rather dispersed group of Adventist believers, discuss and clarify theological positions, share experiences, and unite believers. Soon it also became an effective instrument to spread the Adventist missionary vision and propagate the faith in many different settings. As of 1998 the church runs over 50 publishing houses, printing literature in almost 230 languages. It also uses radio and television to broadcast the gospel on all continents.

The backbone of the worldwide growth has been the organizational structure of the church. Early Adventists resisted formal organization. But the global mission of the church made a functional structure necessary. The first step was the creation of the General Conference (GC) of Seventh-Day Adventists in 1863. The current representative four-tier church structure (local churches, conferences, union conferences, and the general conference with twelve world divisions) goes back to 1901, when the church reorganized its administrative structure to adapt to the enormous global growth. The current departmental structure throughout all organizational levels focusing on different concerns such as Christian education, family, healthful living, missionary outreach, social ministries, stewardship, and so on, was adopted at about the same time.

Another element of Adventist mission practice is the medical and other social ministries of the church which grow out of a holistic view of the nature of human life and the lordship of Christ over all aspects of life. Adventists promote a healthful lifestyle with wholesome nutrition, abstinence from harmful substances, often vegetarianism, and a balanced life expressed through the regular keeping of a work-free Sabbath. The modern breakfast cereal industry started with a simple Adventist invention: the cornflakes of John H. Kellogg. As of 1998 the church employed over 60,000 persons in over 580 healthcare institutions. The Adventist Development and Relief Agency (ADRA) is working in 143 countries.

The constant expansion of the mission of the church also demanded the continual development of educational facilities to train men and women. Adventists believe that education should prepare students not only academically but also spiritually and practically for a life of service. The first college was established in Battle Creek in 1874. While some of its 4,400 primary schools, 975 secondary schools, and 87 colleges and universities were established through grant-in-aid programs, they were all built on an Adventist ideal that has touched millions with the transforming power of the gospel.

Current Challenges. Despite the fact that the SDA church has grown consistently for the last 150 years it is facing a number of challenges. One of them is the task to maintain unity and identity across multiple cultural barriers. Another is to resist the temptation to let the enormous institutional network absorb all available financial and human resources and neglect the millions yet unreached. In response to this pressure the church in 1990 established the office of “Global Mission” focusing on reaching unreached peoples (see Peoples, People Groups) and has encouraged the emergence of Third World missions (see Non-Western Mission Boards and Societies), other supportive ministries, and volunteer missions. The Adventist “1000 Missionary Movement” in the Philippines has sent out more than one thousand short-term missionaries (see Short-Term Mission) all over the world. “Adventist Frontier Missions” in Michigan, a private SDA mission agency started in 1985, focuses on planting the church in new territories. But the church is not only celebrating successes. Maybe the greatest challenge today is the church’s need to reaffirm its missionary identity in the Western world where Secularism and Postmodernism have eroded the church’s traditional missionary identity.

ERICH W. BAUMGARTNER

Aedesius (4th century). Syrian pioneer missionary to Ethiopia. Aedesius and his brother Frumentius were traveling on a ship with their father from Tyre to India when the ship was wrecked. All on board except the two brothers were killed; they were found by representatives of the Ethiopian King Ella Amida and taken into his stead and they introduced the king and his young son to the Christian faith. When Aeizanas, the prince, became king he and his court gave themselves to Christ. Eventually Aedesius returned to Tyre, while Frumentius was appointed bishop and returned to Ethiopia.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Bibliography. S. C. Neill, HCM.

Affluence. See Missionary Affluence.

Afghanistan (Est. 2000 pop.: 26,674,000; 652,090 sq. km. [251,772 sq. mi.]). The country occupies a strategic place in central Asia for the meeting of cultures and has existed as an autonomous entity since the eighteenth century. Christians entered the territory by the fourth century. A bishop from Herat attended the Council of Seleucia in 424, and a Nestorian bishop served in Kabul until the late Middle Ages. However, serious rivalry between two Christian traditions, Jacobite (monophysite) and Nestorian (dyophysite), and the rise of Islam seriously weakened Christian witness. The name Afghanistan dates from 982, by which time Christian missionary activity was already in decline. With the rise of the Mogul dynasty in the sixteenth century, the area was closed to Christianity. Subsequently, no missionaries have been allowed into the country. Under Islamic law, shari’ah, it is a capital offense for a Muslim to convert to Christianity. As the penalty for apostasy from Islam is death, indigenous Afghan Christians tend to leave the country. A small Armenian church of about a dozen members existed in Kabul, but the church was destroyed in 1898 and the group exiled.

In this century, some Christian activity has existed. In 1933, the governments of Afghanistan and Italy signed an agreement which led to creation of the Work of Spiritual Assistance to Catholics of Afghanistan. The constitution of 1964 guaranteed non-Muslims freedom of worship, but Christian evangelization was forbidden. In July 1973, a military junta overthrew the monarchy and suspended the constitution of 1964. Among its first decrees was the provision, “Afghanistan is a republican state in accordance with the true spirit of Islam.” As a result, expatriates compose the Christian community almost exclusively.

PAUL R. DEKAR

Africa. The growth of the church in Africa is one of the most surprising facts of twentieth-century church history. From an estimated 4 million professing Christians in 1900 African Christianity has grown to over 300 million adherents by the year 2000. What accounts for such growth? The common notion that nineteenth-century missionary efforts explain African Christianity’s recent explosion is an oversimplification. The true story behind these statistics reaches back to the very earliest centuries of Christian history.

Beginnings. The roots of African Christianity are to be found in the four regional churches of Africa in the Roman era—Egypt, North Africa, Nubia, and Ethiopia. The origins of Christianity in Egypt are obscure. The first documentary evidence of the existence of an Egyptian church dates from A.D. 189 with Bishop Demetrius. Persecution in the third century caused the faith to spread down the Nile into rural Egypt among the Coptic-speaking population, where it found a new champion in Antony, the father of monasticism. After a period of syncretism in the fourth century, mature Coptic churches emerged in the fifth century under the leadership of independently minded monastic leaders such as Shenout. The signs of an indigenous Christianity rooted in the language and life of the people were everywhere evident, including Coptic-speaking clergy and Coptic liturgies together with Scripture translations.
Africa

North Africa. While Egyptian Christianity was a testimony to the importance of a contextualized Christianity, North Africa was a sober reminder of the fragility of a faith insufficiently rooted in the life of the people. The Roman segment of North Africa embraced the gospel with vigor but the Punic and Berber peoples were never adequately reached. The brilliance of North African Christianity cannot be doubted. The genius of Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine is well known, yet even their brilliance could not prevent the decline of a church troubled by separatism and persecution. Despite the failure of North African Christianity to contextualize the faith, Augustine's observation that the story of the African church is the story of the clash of two kingdoms, the City of God and the earthly city, continued to illuminate African church history.

Ethiopia. Solid evidence for the conversion of Ethiopia appears in 350, when King Ezana begins to ascribe his victories to the "Lord of All . . . Jesus Christ who has saved me" rather than to the traditional gods. Crucial to this change was the ministry of Bishop Frumentius, who had been commissioned by Athanasius of Alexandria as a missionary to Ethiopia. The precedent set by Athanasius became entrenched and the Ethiopian Orthodox Church continued to receive its abben (bishop) by appointment of the Egyptian Coptic patriarch. By Ezana's death in 400 Christianity was firmly rooted at court but had made little impact on the countryside. That changed in the sixth century with the coming of a new missionary force from Syria. The tesseatou Kidousan ("nine saints") established monasteries in the rural areas and engaged in widespread evangelism. Linked with the Egyptian Coptic Christianity and armed with the Scriptures in the vernacular the Christians of Ethiopia entered the Middle Ages, where they "slept near a thousand years, forgetful of the world, by whom they were forgotten" (Gibbon).

Nubia. Like Ethiopia, Nubia (modern Sudan) was never part of the Roman Empire. The Christianity that infiltrated Nubia began a religious revolution in Nubia that transformed both people and prince by the sixth century. Archaeological evidence that came to light only in the 1960s has revealed the vigor of Nubian Christianity. Two sixth-century missionaries from Byzantium, Julian and Longinus, are credited with officially introducing the Christian faith, in its Monophysite form, to this kingdom along the Blue Nile.

The African Middle Ages. These four original sources of African Christianity faced their greatest challenge during the African Middle Ages. The first challenge, which inaugurated the African Middle Ages, came from a new religion—Islam. The second challenge, which brought the African Middle Ages to an end, came from the kingdoms of European Christendom represented by the Portuguese and the Dutch.

North African and Nubian collapse. The rise and spread of Islam across Africa's northern shore in the seventh and eighth centuries was followed in the tenth and eleventh centuries by a southward expansion led by the merchant and the missionary. North Africa was most dramatically affected by this expansion of Islam. The decline of North African Christianity was nearly total by the sixteenth century. Attempts by the fourth crusade (1215) to liberate North Africa politically and Franciscan attempts to revive it spiritually ended in failure. A faith only lightly rooted in the life of the people faded into memory.

Nubia proved more resistant. During the eighth through tenth centuries, while Islam continued to expand in Africa, Nubian Christianity reached its height. But in 1272 Muslim Turks sent by the legendary Saladin overthrew northern Nubia. In 1504 the southernmost kingdom, Alwa, was conquered by a tribe from the south recently converted to Islam. The last word from Nubian Christianity occurs in 1524 when they wrote to the Coptic patriarch of Egypt for help to meet their critical shortage of clergy. The lack of indigenous church leaders combined with the failure to evangelize the peoples to the south conspired to undermine Nubian Christianity.

Egyptian and Ethiopian survival. Christianity survived the onslaught of Islam but not without losses. Caliph Umar had forbidden new churches or monasteries but under the Umayyids (661–750) this law was not enforced. Other forms of pressure, however, were applied. In 744 the Muslim governor of Egypt offered tax exemption for Christians who converted to Islam. Twenty-four thousand responded. Throughout the African Middle Ages the Coptic church suffered from a lack of trained leadership, discriminatory laws, and a stagnant ritualism in worship. Nonetheless, it survived. By 1600 Egypt was a "country of dual religious cultures."

Ethiopian Christianity also followed the path of survival. After a crisis in the tenth century when the pagan Agau nearly toppled the king, Ethiopian clergy began to work for reform and revival of the national faith. One movement of renewal brought a new dynasty to the imperial throne of Ethiopia. The most popular leader of the Zagwe dynasty, Lalibela, strengthened Ethiopia's religious patriotism by building a New Jerusalem in the Ethiopian highlands and strengthening the belief that Ethiopians were the new Israel through whom God would bring light to the nations. Under the missionary monk Tekela-Hanmanot, Ethiopian Christianity experienced revival. New missionary efforts among the Shoa of the south met with success. Emperor Zara-Yaqob (d. 1468) brought Ethiopia to new heights of glory but by 1529 the kingdom was in decline. Ahmad Gragn, a Muslim, successfully overthrew the Christian kingdom of Ethiopia but his reign was short-lived. Within a few years Christian Ethiopia was restored, this time with the help of a new player on the African stage—the Portuguese.

The Portuguese. Inspired by their visionary leader, Prince Henry, the Portuguese embarked on a campaign of aggressive expansion between 1450 and 1700. This expansion led to the European “discovery” of Africa and the establishment of a trading empire that spread from Lisbon to India. Christian communities were established in West Africa and in port cities along the southern and eastern coasts but Portuguese missions enjoyed its greatest success in the ancient kingdom of Congo, where the king Afonso I promoted the new faith aggressively. Yet the missionary efforts of the Catholic missionaries were eventually undermined by the commercial interest of Portuguese merchants who quickly saw potential for a profit in the slave trade. Hatred of the Portuguese trader soon was directed at the Portuguese priest. By the time of Livingstone’s travels in the mid-nineteenth century few vestiges of Portuguese Christianity could be found.

Dutch Expansion. In 1652, one hundred representatives of the Dutch East India Company landed on Africa’s southernmost tip and proceeded to establish a way station for the company ships traveling from Amsterdam to Batavia in the Pacific. From this modest beginning came Cape Town and the beginnings of the nation of South Africa. The first church established was that of the Dutch Reformed Church but by 1900 Lutherans and Moravians had also begun their work. The churches of the settlers soon came into conflict with a missionary Christianity spawned by the wave of Great Awakenings that were sweeping North America, England, and Europe in the eighteenth century. An early representative of this new evangelical movement was the Moravian Georg Schmidt, who began work among the Khoisan of the Cape in 1738. He soon came into conflict with the established church and was stopped from further mission work in 1748.

African Christianity in the Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Centuries. The Antislavery crusade. While Schmidt was struggling with the stubbornness of his Dutch hosts, English evangelicals began to struggle with the issue of slavery. John Wesley condemned slavery in a pamphlet of 1774, and a number of his followers took up the cause. Early opposition to slavery came from Granville Sharp, Thomas Clarkson, and William Wilberforce through the support of his upper-class evangelical friends (the Clapham Sect). The first breakthrough came in 1807 with the passage of a bill prohibiting the slave trade but allowing ownership. By 1833 legislation was passed abolishing slavery everywhere in the British Empire. British evangelicals had opposed slavery both on humanitarian grounds as well as missiological ones. They realized that their desire to engage in missions in Africa would be seriously thwarted by the existence of slavery. The missionaries that English societies sent out to Africa were therefore equipped with the dual message of “Christianity and commerce.” It was thought that Western-style commerce would make slavery economically unnecessary, thus permitting the message of Christianity to make its way deep into the lives of the hearers.

The growth of Christianity in Western Africa. In 1877, 411 freed blacks left London to found a community called Freetown in what is now Sierra Leone. It became a haven for freed slaves and an outpost for the spread of the gospel. Like the Puritans who settled New England, these early settlers burned with religious zeal. Freetown became a Christian commonwealth that inspired similar Christian communities farther down the coast in the Nigerian towns of Abeokuta and Badagry. “Recaptives” (slaves liberated by the British Navy) added to the population of Freetown. Many converted to the Christian faith and found an opportunity for training at Freetown’s Fourah Bay college, established in 1827.

One of the most outstanding graduates of the college was a young recaptive named Samuel Ajayi Crowther. Crowther was ordained in 1843, and in 1864 became Africa’s first Anglican bishop. The Church Missionary Society (CMS) recognized in Crowther the leader they needed to further the spread of Christianity in Africa. Under Henry Venn, an aggressive program of Africanization was adopted that called for the immediate building of self-supporting, self-propagating, and self-governing local churches. Crowther was asked to implement this strategy in the Nigerian interior. Through the failure of some members of his team and through the hostility of white missionaries opposed to Venn’s policies, Crowther was forced to resign. Leadership of the CMS work in West Africa fell into white hands. This led to a number of African-initiated churches. In addition to Nigeria, work went on in Liberia, Ghana, Cameroon, Gabon, Senegal, and Zaire, which was the main arena for Catholic missions.

Southern Africa. While West Africa was evangelized largely by Africans returning to their motherland, South Africa from the very earliest
A second expression of South African church life in the nineteenth century was that of “missionary Christianity,” which made major inroads into the Xhosa community and produced outstanding believers such as the hymn writer Ntsikana and the African Presbyterian leader, Tiyo Soga. Such African leaders encouraged the missionary-dominated churches to engage in programs of training, including Lovedale College and Fort Hare University. David Livingstone’s fame exceeded that of all other nineteenth-century missionaries despite his failure as evangelist (he saw only one convert, who eventually fell away). His achievements as an explorer, an antislavery crusader, and missions promoter established his place in history. Though missionary Christianity tended to emphasize an inward piety and a broadly evangelical theology that stood in contrast with the more reformed Afrikaners by the late nineteenth century, attempts were made to bridge the gap. Most successful was Andrew Murray Jr., moderator of the DRC and champion of both evangelical piety and missions. His emphasis on “Absolute Surrender” and the formation of new agencies such as the South Africa General Mission (now African Evangelical Fellowship) acted as a corrective to the Afrikaner Christianity.

A third expression of South African Christianity was that of the social gospel championed by people like the Anglican bishop John Colenso and John Jabavu. The emphasis of this form of Christianity was upon economic and political justice. Colenso opposed the Afrikaner and English messianic nationalism, which he saw at the root of injustice in South Africa. His clash with Bishop Robert Gray of Cape Town ended with the formation of an independent Anglican communion in South Africa. Like Colenso, John Jabavu regarded politics as an appropriate arena for Christian involvement. A tireless campaigner for African rights, he founded his own independent newspaper. This third expression of Christianity would become a major force in the years following South Africa’s Sharpville massacre of 1960.

Despite the fragmented witness to the kingdom of God provided by South African Christianity, this region entered the twentieth century as one of the most Christianized regions in all of Africa. Yet white domination of the churches would eventually spawn a vigorous movement of “Ethiopianism”—separatist churches that demanded respect from the Westerner and a greater share of church leadership.

East Africa. The nineteenth century witnessed the reintroduction of Christianity into the former Nubia (Sudan) and in Mombasa (Kenya). Ethiopian Christianity was also revitalized during the century. Additionally the lands of Tanzania and Uganda saw the initial introduction of this ancient African faith among their own people. Ethiopia and Sudan. In 1830 the CMS arrived in Ethiopia. Originally working within the Coptic church, Protestant missionaries such as J. Ludwig Krapf clashed with Coptic church authorities, leading to expulsion in 1843. Under Emperor Menelik II, Ethiopian Christianity experienced a new surge of life and entered the twentieth century carefully guarding its dearly won political and religious independence. In Sudan, Catholic work under the leadership of the Verona Fathers was swept away by the Islamic Mahdist movement.

Kenya. Krapf began work in Kenya in 1844 after his expulsion from Ethiopia. Together with his colleague Johann Rebmann, Krapf envisioned a chain of mission stations across the continent, linking up with Freetown in West Africa. His vision would guide numerous mission agencies for the next century. Though he attempted to establish the eastern link of this chain at Rabai Mpyia, it was the later formation of Freetown in 1874 as a refuge for runaway slaves that gave Christianity its firmest foothold in British East Africa. Outstanding Christian leaders came from the community at Freetown, including David Koi, Kenya’s first Protestant martyr. These missionary efforts on the coast were soon augmented by a new thrust inland. James Stewart, a Presbyterian missionary at Lovedale College, was recruited by Livingstone to establish an industrial mission in the Kenyan interior in 1891. The CMS began work among the Kikuyu of Kenya’s central highlands in 1901. Peter Cameron Scott and his newly founded Africa Inland Mission began churches among the Kamba people in 1895. The Holy Ghost Fathers began work in Nairobi in 1899.
Tanzania. Catholic missionary efforts centered around the formation of a “Christian Village” at Bagamoyo (1868), where three hundred freed slaves found a place of refuge. Protestant work was conducted by the Universities Mission to Central Africa (UMCA), who were vigorous in their opposition to the Arab slave trade that was decimating the inland peoples of Africa’s Great lake region, where the LMS and CMS had established a presence. Through the intervention of Germany the Arab slave trade was broken and a number of German mission agencies introduced Lutheranism.

Uganda. More dramatic than in any other part of East Africa was the response to the gospel in Uganda. Christianity was introduced by the CMS in 1877 and flourished under the zealous leadership of Alexander Mackay. White Fathers introduced Catholicism in 1879. Despite the indifference of King Mutesa I and the violent hostility of his son Mwanga, Protestant and Catholic Christianity eventually produced a religious revolution in Uganda that spilled beyond the borders of the kingdom of Buganda into the smaller kingdoms that make up the modern-day nation of Uganda.

The missionary factor. The colonial era (1885–1960) brought sweeping changes to African Christianity. The most notable change was the proliferation of missionaries and agencies from the West and the corresponding growth of African Christianity. In 1900 there were an estimated 4 million Christians spread throughout the continent compared to 60 million Muslims. By the autumn of colonialism in 1950 the number of African Christians had reached 34 million.

The missionaries of the colonial era were, on the whole, a remarkable lot. Like Rowland Bingham of the Sudan Interior Mission (SIM; now Society for International Ministries), they were a tough-minded breed who often buried their colleagues and kept going. Like George Grenfell of the Baptist Mission Society of Congo, they were tireless explorers and enemies of the slave trade. Like Albert Schweitzer of Gabon they were often humanitarians. Like Mary Slessor of the Calabar mission many were single women who gave their entire lives to the work. Like P. A. Bennett, acting secretary of the CMS in Nigeria, they were sometimes incorrigible racists. But like Archdeacon Dennis, also of the CMS in Nigeria, they more often opposed racism with equal vigor. Like Father Shanahan of Nigeria they aggressively founded schools. Most important, like Carl Christian Reindorf of Ghana, they mastered the vernacular languages of the people and like George Pilkington of Uganda, they translated the Scriptures and trained indigenous evangelists. This last factor, vernacular translations and the training of national evangelists, accounts for the remarkable church growth that took place during the colonial decades.

Independent religious movements. One reaction to the missionary factor was the birth of the African Initiated Church Movement. The independent churches that were founded tended to fall into distinct groupings. Some were primarily concerned with African leadership and only secondarily concerned with changing missionary theology or worship. A second grouping emphasized healing and the supernatural. Armed with Scriptures in their own languages they struck out on their own, like William Wade Harris of Liberia, whose preaching in West Africa between 1913 and 1915 claimed over one hundred thousand adherents. Others like Simon Kimbangu of Zaire catalyzed separation from missionary churches into new denominations. In some cases these prophet churches moved clearly outside the bounds of orthodoxy. Such was the case with Isaiah Shembe and his Church of the Nazarites in South Africa. After his death in 1935 his followers proclaimed that he had risen from the dead and was in fact the true Christ for Africa. A third category covers movements of revival within established denominations. The passion in these types of movements was the discovery of a vital Christianity to replace a numbing nominalism in the church. The outstanding example of this third type of movement is the East Africa Revival that swept much of East Africa from 1930 onwards.

Christianity in Independent Africa. In 1960, fourteen African nations achieved selfhood and inaugurated a new era within African Christianity. Henry Venn’s vision of an African Christianity that was self-governing, self-propagating, and self-supporting was at last realized. In denomination after denomination African leaders replaced missionaries. The new leaders faced a number of new challenges in the modern era. Five challenges in particular have dominated African Christianity in the closing decades of the twentieth century.

Church and state. The overarching fact of modern African life since the late 1960s was widespread disillusionment with the nation-state. As the promise of the new African ruling elite turned sour, criticism began to mount. The common response of the ruling elite to the growing chorus of criticism was tightened control, promotion of personality cults and messianic nationalism, and growing conflict with the church. Kwame Nkrumah’s tragic rise and fall in Ghana was all too typical. Zaire’s Mobutu Sese Seko, Liberia’s Samuel Doe, Uganda’s Idi Amin, and Ethiopia’s Mengistu Haile Mariam were typical of leaders who saw the church as a dangerous independent voice. Church responses have varied from silent partnership with the ruling elite (Roman Catholicism in Rwanda, DRC in South Africa) to critical protest of state injustice (Desmond Tutu in South Africa, NCCK in Kenya). Occasionally the state has lashed out violently against the church as in the cases of the martyred Archbishop Janani Luwum of Uganda and the numerous imprisoned pastors of Mengistu’s Ethiopia.

Unity and diversity: Over six thousand different independent churches were documented in Africa by the late 1960s. Organizations like the All Africa Conference of Churches (AACC), the Organization of African Instituted Churches (OAIC), and the Association of Evangelicals in Africa (AEA) have sought to bring some unity to the fractured body of Christ in Africa. A series of Pan-African Christian Leadership Assemblies (PACLA) have sought additional harmony by bringing leaders of the AACC and AEA together. Parachurch agencies have also played their part in bridging denominational dividing lines, some by working with the independent churches.

Theology and culture. In Roman Catholic as well as Protestant circles great effort has gone into the formation of a Christian theology that would adequately address the modern African context. The varieties of theologies within the African context range from theologies of identity to traditional evangelical formulations to radical liberation theology. African evangelical theology is still emerging, but important voices include Tokunboh Adeyemo, Kwame Bediako, Byang Kato, Lamin Sanneh, and Tite Tienou.

African missions and church growth. In the 1970s Kenyan Presbyterian leader John Gatu called for a moratorium on Western missionaries in order to foster “selfhood” within the church. The outcome of this debate has been a decrease in “mainline” missionaries (5,000 in 1959 to 3,000 in early 1970). At the same time there has been a resurgence of missions in three other groups. In 1974 a Synod of Bishops at Rome rejected the call for moratorium and pledged 100,000 new missionaries by the year 2000. Evangelical missionaries from the faith missions grew from 11,000 in the 1970s to over 16,000 in the late 1980s. In addition dozens of new African mission agencies emerged in the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s. The most dramatic story of church growth in Africa, however, was the expansion of Pentecostal and charismatic preachers, evangelists, and missionaries in the closing decades of the twentieth century. The gospel of health, wealth, and wholeness accounted for much of the appeal of this form of Christianity.

Discipleship, leadership, and nominalism. The greatest challenge facing African Christian leadership was the challenge not of the unreached but of the undiscipled. If one accepts the statistics that African Christianity has grown from an estimated 4 million professing Christians in 1900 to some 300 million adherents today then one is forced to ask how these huge numbers of people can be discipled. Though the promise of African Christianity is great, the church of Africa must wrestle with the dilemma of a Christianity that may be “expanding at the periphery” even while it is “collapsing at the center” (Roland Oliver). Leadership development and the training of the laity seem to be the crucial needs of this continent “shaped like a question mark” (Ali Mazrui).

Mark Shaw

Africa Evangelical Fellowship. Founded in 1889 by Martha Osborn-Howe, Spencer Walton, and Andrew Murray for the purposes of spiritual renewal and missionary outreach, Africa Evangelical Fellowship (AEF) was initially known as the Cape General Mission and later the South African General Mission. The name was changed to its current designation in 1965. By the turn of the twentieth century work had expanded from South Africa to Swaziland and Zimbabwe; Malawi was entered in 1901 and Zambia in 1910. By 1930 work was present in Angola and Mozambique as well. Work presently has extended to Botswana, Namibia, Gabon, Tanzania, and the Indian Ocean islands of Reunion, Madagascar, and Mauritius. The American branch was started in 1906. AEF was loosely organized until 1941, when a constitutional organization was adopted that provided for a general director and appropriate administrative personnel. The international office is in Newbury, England, with additional branches (known as Sending Councils) in the United States, Canada, South Africa, and Australia.

An interdenominational faith mission, AEF services include the areas of education, health, and church planting. Educational ministries include Bible schools, elementary schools, correspondence courses, literacy training, and publishing work. Health ministries include a school for the blind, clinics and hospitals, and leprosaria. Currently AEF has 291 long-term and 41 short-term missionaries.

A. Scott Moreau

Africa Inland Mission, International (AIM). In 1895 Peter Cameron Scott, a young man who had given himself fully to the task of reaching Africa for Christ, founded the Africa Inland Mission. Scott, who died in Africa only a year after his arrival, had a vision of establishing a line of mission stations from Mombasa, Kenya, up to Lake Chad in hopes of hampering the spread of Islam to the south. Following the deaths of Scott and several of the other founding missionaries, AIM’s future was in serious question. But the words of ARTHUR T. PIERSON, a council member, kept AIM pressing onward: “Gentleman,” he said, “the hallmark of God on any work is death. God has given us that hallmark. Now is the time to go forward.” And so they did.

Today, over one hundred years later, Scott’s vision has come to fruition. AIM now has five sending councils worldwide and over eight hundred missionaries serving in fourteen African nations and in various urban centers throughout the United States. AIM’s primary goal is to plant churches through the evangelization of Unreached Peoples and effective training of church leaders. The methodology involves identifying and filling perceived needs in order to establish relationships based on trust and caring; after such relationships are established, Christ can be appropriately shared. The growth of the planted churches requires trained indigenous leaders, and Bible schools have been established to that end.

AIM offers a variety of support services such as AIM AIR, AIM TECH, and AIM SERV. They provide air transportation as well as logistical and technical assistance to both the mission body and nationals in the local church. In 1906, AIM established the Rift Valley Academy (RVA), which provides a quality education for close to five hundred students whose parents serve in ninety different mission organizations and twenty-two African countries.

Further, AIM established the Training in Ministry Outreach (TIMO) program to provide training for new missionaries. The program couples a team of new missionaries with a more experienced missionary for a period of two years. During those two years the team studies a curriculum and simultaneously puts it into practice on the field. Some of these teams have planted viable ongoing churches during their two-year ministries.

AIM also challenges its constituents to involve themselves at a deeper level by adoption of an unreached people group. The Adopt-A-People program encourages churches, small groups, and families to commit themselves to pray for, financially support, or even go as missionaries to one of sixty-one people groups that it identifies.

African Initiated Church Movement. Originally an unanticipated product of the modern mission movement in Africa, the African Independent Churches (AICs) today number 55 million church members in some 10,000 distinct denominations present in virtually all of Africa’s 60 countries. This title is the most frequent descriptive term in the current literature of some 4,000 books and articles describing it. However, because Western denominations and Western-mission related churches in Africa regard themselves also as “independent,” African AIC members have since 1970 promulgated the terms African Institited Churches, or African Indigenous Churches, or locally founded churches. Some Western scholars still use the older terms African Separatist Churches or New Religious Movements.

These movements first began with a secession from Methodist missions in Sierra Leone in 1817. Spreading rapidly across Africa by means of virtually unrelated but similar schisms and secessions, by 1900 there were a hundred thousand members of these churches, by 1935 two million, by 1968 six million, and by 1997 55 million. Countries most heavily involved are, in order of number of members, South Africa, Congo-Kinshasa, and Nigeria. The largest distinct denominations are: Zion Christian Church (12 million in 10 countries), Church of Jesus Christ on Earth through the Prophet Simon Kimbangu (8 million), Cherubim and Seraphim (3 million), Deeper Life Bible Church (2 million in 40 countries worldwide). Earlier movements closely copied their parent bodies in name, polity, titles, dogmas, liturgies, and ecclesiastical dress, and were frequently seen as merely Pentecostal imitations. But from 1980 onward, newer bodies became much more dynamic, postdenominationalist, charismatic, and apostolic, with a majority of their leaders being highly educated professionals avoiding ecclesiastical dress and similar trappings, often leading megachurches with thousands of enthusiastic young people as deeply committed members.

After decades of fruitlessly trying to join ecumenical councils of churches, evangelical councils or alliances, or Western confessional bodies, almost all of which rejected such applications, the AICs began their own conciliar movement and today have over 100 AIC councils of churches across the continent and in several cases even worldwide. In 1978 the major continent-wide body was formed, OAIC (Organization of African Independent Churches, later renamed Organization of African Instituted Churches), in collaboration with the Coptic Orthodox Church of Egypt as the original African independent church. By 1998, however, the sheer weight of numbers, Christian commitment, and credibility had become such that OAIC was invited to become, and became, an associate council of the World Council of Churches, as well as a member council of the All Africa Conference of Churches.
African Initiated Church Movement

Bibliocentric and christocentric throughout their history, these churches are now producing radically new Christian theology and practice. A notable example is earthkeeping, a blend of theological environmentalism or caring for God’s creation, especially in relation to land, trees, plants, natural resources, and in fact the whole of God’s creation.

David B. Barrett

African Mission Boards and Societies. A study of the general landscape of African mission boards and societies reveals that the majority of the work to date has taken place in the Anglophone countries, particularly West Africa (Nigeria and Ghana). In Eastern and Central Africa, largely Christian churches seem to assume either that most people have already heard the gospel or that Western missionaries are the only ones to tackle the job. For the Francophone church, African missionaries crossing international boundaries in large numbers remains a dream to be fulfilled in the future.

Perhaps most notable for zeal for internal cross-cultural evangelism is Zaire, a country which could legitimately claim to be “too poor” to afford international missions. However, Christians not hindered with a vision of missions requiring a four-wheel-drive vehicle and a salary seem to be accomplishing the most for the kingdom, much of it undocumented.

As an outstanding example of an indigenous missionary movement, Nigeria’s Evangelical Churches of West Africa (ECWA) church and its Evangelical Missionary Society (EMS, headed by Panya Baba), is premier. A mighty mission force with 541 couples and 15 single missionaries, EMS has been instrumental in the growth of the church. One of the more successful campaigns of Muslim outreach is Uganda’s version of Here’s Life, adapted from Campus Crusade for Christ in America. In Mozambique, the Deeper Life Christian Ministry, led by Nigerians, has been especially successful. It works in thirty countries across Africa.

Chad deserves imitation for its successful implementation of saturation mission. Association of Evangelicals of Africa (AEA) Secretary for Missions and Evangelism Bayo Famonure reports that 24,000 Chadian Christians were mobilized to reach 2,193 villages in a six-day period, aiming to plant a church in every village. Costs were virtually limited to food and transport for the volunteers.

Most African mission boards are run separately from Western agencies. There seems to be space to operate without the need to cooperate, though a few boards are experimenting with partnering such as Timo Teams, jointly sponsored by Africa Inland Church (AIC) and Africa Inland Mission (AIM). Some boards are modeled after Faith Missions with no guaranteed salary or retirement fund, no special schools for their children, and no work account funds. A few, like Sheepfold, Kenya’s largest interdenominational board, pool their income so that all missionaries get an equal share of whatever comes into the mission that month. Others receive directly whatever comes in from their supporters. One trend can be seen everywhere: sinking local currencies have greatly hurt development of the international element of the African missionary movement.

Generally speaking, accountability and supervision structures in African mission societies are loose. Financial support is typically low, erratic, and often based on only one or two special offerings a year. Fragmentation of efforts is the norm. Each denomination or group sets its goals without any overall plan or sometimes even awareness of where the unreached are, according to the AEA. Sometimes the dominant motivation seems to be the desire to plant a denominational church in an urban center rather than to take the gospel to those who have not yet had an opportunity to hear.

Language learning is often done informally at the destination, and with much less trauma and fuss than for Western missionaries undergoing Language School. Children of missionaries are educated in the local schools until high school age, sometimes to their detriment educationally.

Some mission boards and missionary training colleges belong to a particular denomination, such as the AIC Mission Board in East Africa or Nigeria’s ECWA-EMS. Some denominations once had a missionary sending agency which has subsequently died out, such as the Church of the Province of Kenya (Anglican) Diocesan Mission Association. Others are interdenominational and indigenous, such as Agape Missions, Calvary Ministry (CAPRO, with over 300 full-time missionaries), and Christian Missionary Fellowship (CMF). Together, these form the three largest interdenominational mission agencies in Nigeria, but there are also seventy other smaller mission boards there (see Nigerian Mission Boards and Societies). Some African mission boards have virtually become church denominations, such as the CMF.

But probably the most remarkable contribution of Africans to the missionary movement has been the migration of Christian traders, businessmen, and professionals, such as university professors and doctors, to other countries or neighboring tribes where Christianity is not yet firmly established. These men and women leave home because of economic privations, but by the working of the Holy Spirit have become church planters in their host countries. The fellowships they end up planting are not always denominational or ethnic and become broad-based churches. Their secular jobs support them, and they have no professional... missionary training apart from the modeling of healthy churches they have seen while growing up in their home country. At this time, economic translocation rather than the formation of formal mission boards appears to be the most widespread and effective means of spreading the gospel currently practiced by the African church.

SUE DEVRIES

SEE ALSO Non-Western Mission Boards and Societies.

African New Religious Movements. See AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCH MOVEMENT.

African Theology. The year 1956 symbolizes the official beginning of African theology, as it is usually understood. Two important publications, one Catholic and one Protestant, mark that year an important milestone for African theology. The Catholic publication, entitled Des prêtres noirs s’interrogent et suggèrent, was the collective work of black priests from Africa and Haiti. They suggested a real africanization of the church. For the Protestants, Paul D. Fueter’s article “Theological Education in Africa,” published in the International Review of Missions (45 [1956]: 377–95), signaled the recognition of the need to develop an African expression of theology.

Recognizing 1956 as a pivotal year for African theology does not mean, however, that all discussions related to the africanization of Christianity begin with that date. It is likely that the first African converts to the Christian faith embarked on intuitive and unconscious “African theologizing” (see Walls). Toward the end of the nineteenth century, however, people such as Mojola Agbebi (1880–1917) were deliberately calling for the integration of Christianity and African culture. On April 7, 1889, Agbebi declared: “To render Christianity indigenous to Africa, it must be watered by native hands, pruned with the native hatchet, and tended with the native earth” (Ayandele, p. 18). Since “rendering Christianity indigenous to Africa” is an important aspect of African theology, regardless of how one defines it, Mojola Agbebi may be considered one of its precursors.

Missiologists and theologians have devoted much time and energy to defining African theology, especially in the early discussions of the subject. Noting the lack of consensus among scholars regarding the meaning of African theology, Ghanian J. K. Agbeti suggested that “Christian Theology . . . expressed by African theologians using African thought forms” should be distinguished from “African Theology”; the latter being “the interpretation of the pre-Christian and pre-Moslem African peoples’ experience of their God” (1972, p. 6). Scholars have not adopted Agbeti’s distinction as a general practice. In fact Agbeti’s attempt at clarification has generated confusion and drew sharp criticism from Nigerian Byang H. Kato.

Kato pointed out, correctly, that Agbeti’s definition of African theology fits African Traditional Religions better than it does Christianity. Kato contends that Agbeti’s “basic concern . . . is an attempt to synthesize Christianity with African traditional religions” (Theological Pitfalls, p. 55). It should be noted, however, that the views of Agbeti and Kato are not as diametrically opposed as it may seem. Both agree that Christian theology should be made indigenous to Africa. When, for instance, Agbeti states that “Christianity and its theology will remain essentially the same universally, even though the expression of the faith may differ from place to place” (Agbeti, p. 7), he expresses one of Kato’s basic convictions. One may also compare Agbeti’s call to African Christian theologians to indigenize Christian theology with the following statement from Kato: “The noble desire to indigenize Christianity in Africa must not be forsaken. An indigenous theology is a necessity” (Theological Pitfalls, p. 16). It is therefore somewhat unfortunate that Kato’s depiction of African theology is the basis on which many evangelicals evaluate the whole movement. Evangelicals may prefer a different terminology, such as “African Christian Theology,” for example, and they should not conclude that everyone using the term “African theology” advocates Syncretism.

There may be disagreement about what name to give to the process of indigenizing Christian theology in Africa; nevertheless, the various families of the Christian faith recognize the legitimacy of seeking ways to develop Christian theologies related to African realities. This represents a major step forward in light of the dissenting voices, warning of the dangers of such a search, often heard in the 1950s and 1960s. In the broadest sense, African Christian theology “is done in Africa, . . . to a certain degree arises out of the identity of African people, draws on African categories of thought and speaks to the historical situation of African people” (Dickson, Kalilombe, and Presler, p. 94). Taking into account the four characteristics of locality, identity, cognition, and history in producing theology can minimize foreignness. These characteristics also provide theologians with a basis from which to generate the relevant issues.

An examination of the literature on African theology indicates that the authors tend to deal with the following major issues: culture, color, poverty, and nation building/reconstruction. The trends and contents of African theology relate to the issue chosen by the theologian and how that issue is treated. The focus on culture leads to African contextual or inculturation theologies while making color the primary concern leads to black theology. Similarly, liberation theology wrestles with the issue of poverty and the theology of reconstruction seeks Christian solutions to the present political, economic, and social crises of the continent.
African Theology

Contextual or inculturation theologies represent the oldest kind of African theology. Much of the theological output in Africa can be classified in this category. Here African cultures and religions are taken seriously in the formulation of Christian theology. Mbinti's proposal that eschatology be built on an African concept of time, Sawyer's and Sündker's focus on the African concept of the Great Family as the basis for ecclesiology in Africa, or Christology portraying Christ as Ancestor or Master of initiation (Nyamiti, Bujo, and Sanon) are all examples of this kind of theology. Evangelicals have generally expressed reservations and criticisms over some of the un-biblical excesses contained in these theologies. They are not, however, against the judicious usage of elements of African cultures, religions, and thought forms. Kato, who is often cited for his extreme evangelical negative views of African cultures, states clearly: "Every effort should be made to make the gospel indigenous in the local culture where it has been introduced. . . . I am fully in favour of the ever-avoiding gospel being expressed within the context of Africa, for Africans to understand" (African Cultural Revolution, p. 54).

Scholars have not devoted the same time and energy to black theology, liberation theology, and the theology of reconstruction as they have given to contextual theologies. Black theology is primarily a movement in South Africa during the apartheid years and its concerns make it similar to black theology in the United States. Jean-Marc Ela, from Cameroon, has vigorously and consistently articulated an African liberation theology but liberation theology has not acquired the same status in Africa as it has in Latin America.

The theology of reconstruction is rather recent since it originated in the decade of the 1990s. Many of the proponents of the theology of reconstruction have connections with the All Africa Conference of Churches. The initial impetus was provided in essays presented at the March 1990 General Committee of the All Africa Conference of Churches. Kenyan J. N. K. Mugambi’s book From Liberation to Reconstruction: African Christian Theology After the Cold War was published in 1995. Advocates of the theology of reconstruction also include Congolese Kä Mana and Rwandan André Karamaga. It is difficult to ascertain the specific contents of this theology. It appears to be more a program for Christian involvement in the renaissance of African nations. The theology of reconstruction will likely be the subject of much debate in the future.

Theological currents come and go in Africa as in the rest of the world. For African theology the challenge is to serve the church in Africa without being a footnote of Western theology or an exotic mixture of Christianity and African culture.

African theology is not a program or a process for crafting new Christian doctrines. It is rather an attempt to state biblical teaching and Christian doctrine in language and thought forms understandable to contemporary Africans. In that sense, African theology is not very different from efforts at contemporizing the Christian message in the world and through the generations. In their quest for securing the Christian faith firmly within African realities, African theologians have been forced to reexamine the nature of Christian theology and its purpose. In this process of reexamination, they “have recaptured the character of theology as Christian intellectual activity on the frontier with the non-Christian world, and hence as essentially communicative, evangelistic and missionary” (Bediako, p. 259). In an era of transition for both missiology and theology, this contribution of African theologians has significance for Africa and global Christianity.

TITE TIÉNOU

African Traditional Religions. General designation for the religions of the ethnic groups of Africa. It does not describe a specific religion. It does not refer to the religious system of any particular group. By using expressions such as “African Traditional Religions,” “African Primal Religions,” or “African Religion,” scholars seek to distinguish the indigenous religions of Africa from foreign and imported ones such as Christianity, Islam, Hinduism or Buddhism.

Scholars of religion in Africa do not agree among themselves on the use of the plural for the term chosen to group together and describe the indigenous religious beliefs of African peoples. They also disagree on the necessity of keeping adjectives like “traditional” and “primal.” There is, however, near unanimity about the fact that certain terms used in the past are no longer adequate or appropriate. For example, African religions have been called primitive, savage, native, tribal, pagan, animistic, or heathen. This way of describing African religions is now found mostly in older studies. Occasionally, in polemical literature, one may still see references to idolatry and fetishism as the main characteristics of African religions. "African Traditional Religions" and "African Religion" are, nevertheless, the terms most commonly used in current studies. The preference for African Traditional Religions, African Religion, or an equivalent term represents an important shift in understanding African religious beliefs and systems. This shift in understanding and depicting the religions of Africa is a recognition of the fact that these religions must be studied in their own right. They are not varieties of primitive religion. They must be viewed as major living religions. In that sense, African religions belong in the category "world religions." One should not think, therefore, that "traditional" in African Traditional Religions indicates that these are dead or dying religions. They are the beliefs and practices of contemporary Africans. Their present vitality is best suggested by the use of African Religions or Religion since the adjective "traditional" may imply that these religions are either "past" or practiced by "non-modern" Africans.

Should one approach the study of religion in Africa with the assumption of unity or multiplicity? Are we faced with many ethnic religions or are these religions different manifestations of a coherent African religion? If a single coherent African religion does not exist, how useful is the linking together of all indigenous African religions? These questions have fueled much debate among students of religion in Africa. There seems to be a growing consensus that unity is a crucial for understanding the essence of African religions. "African Traditional Religions" and Christianity since "the idea of intermediary deities," helps explain why it is nearly impossible to solve the nature of theism in African religions. One cannot categorically state that African

African Traditional Religions

The preference for African Traditional Religions, African Religion, or an equivalent term represents an important shift in understanding African religious beliefs and systems. This shift in understanding and depicting the religions of Africa is a recognition of the fact that these religions must be studied in their own right. They are not varieties of primitive religion. They must be viewed as major living religions. In that sense, African religions belong in the category "world religions." One should not think, therefore, that "traditional" in African Traditional Religions indicates that these are dead or dying religions. They are the beliefs and practices of contemporary Africans. Their present vitality is best suggested by the use of African Religions or Religion since the adjective "traditional" may imply that these religions are either "past" or practiced by "non-modern" Africans.

Should one approach the study of religion in Africa with the assumption of unity or multiplicity? Are we faced with many ethnic religions or are these religions different manifestations of a coherent African religion? If a single coherent African religion does not exist, how useful is the linking together of all indigenous African religions? These questions have fueled much debate among students of religion in Africa. There seems to be a growing consensus that unity is a crucial for understanding the essence of African religions. "African Traditional Religions" and Christianity since "the idea of intermediary deities," helps explain why it is nearly impossible to solve the nature of theism in African religions. One cannot categorically state that African
African Traditional Religions

Religions are either monotheistic or polytheistic. Belief in God, the One and Supreme High Being, is widespread. Yet, the Supreme Being may not be approached without the help of intermediaries. This means that theism in African religions can be described as ontological monotheism with liturgical polytheism. It is liturgical polytheism that makes African religions pragmatic, anthropocentric, and resilient.

The utilitarian characteristic of African religions and their anthropocentric spirituality make them appealing to many modern Africans, especially those who want to live in continuity with Africa's indigenous cultures and religions while embracing modernity. African religions have shown a remarkable ability for adapting to change. They have not disappeared in the encounter of African peoples with modernity, secularization, and missionary religions such as Christianity or Islam. The capacity for adaptation has assured survival for African religions over the years. More recently, survival has given way to resurgence. The resurgence of African religions means that they will continue to be an important dimension of the context of Christian mission in Africa for the foreseeable future. Christian missionaries, evangelists, and theologians who are interested in Africa cannot, therefore, afford to ignore or neglect the study of African religions.

TITE TÉNOM

Aggrey, J. E. Kwegyir (1875–1927). Ghanaian educator in the United States. At the age of 13 Aggrey joined other youth and a missionary on preaching trips. A year later, he made his own decision for Christ. He began teaching first in a village and then at Wesleyan Centenary Memorial School, where he also taught Sunday school and preached. He developed as a scholar and a teacher, retranslating portions of the Fanti Bible and helping to prepare a book of Fanti hymns.

In 1898 Aggrey was asked to become headmaster; but chose instead to leave for further education in the United States. He attended Livingstone College in Salisbury, North Carolina, earning the B.A. and M.A. He also received a D.D. from Hood Theological Seminary. Years later he took another M.A. degree and completed Ph.D. course work at Columbia University.

From 1902 to 1920 Aggrey was a faculty member at Livingstone; he also took on responsibilities as a pastor from 1914 to 1920. His ability to articulate clearly African issues to white audiences led to appointment as the only nonwhite member of the prestigious Phelps-Stokes Committee to study education in Africa. In 1924 he accepted an appointment as the first staff member and one of the vice-principals of Achimota College in Ghana, an institution designed to remedy the faults in African education pointed out by the Commission's report. In 1927 he returned to the United States to continue his Ph.D. work but died of meningitis before it was completed. An early African voice for recognition of African capabilities, Aggrey excelled as a scholar, professor, pastor, and international spokesman for relevant African education.

DONALD K. SMITH

Agnew, Eliza (1807–83). American missionary to Sri Lanka. Born in New York City, Agnew dedicated her life to missionary service while she was still a girl, but she did not actually sail from Boston to Sri Lanka until 1839, after the death of her parents. She is believed to be the first single woman missionary to Sri Lanka.

Agnew served for forty years as principal of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions’ Uduville girls’ boarding school. Founded in 1824, the school had ninety-five students when Agnew arrived to help overworked missionary wives. During her tenure, Agnew instructed and influenced about 1,300 young women, more than 600 of whom made professions of Christian faith. Her three and four generations of pupils often returned to their homes as Christian wives and teachers.

Agnew never left Sri Lanka. During vacations, she visited many of her former students, encouraging them in their faith. Weathering setbacks to the school prompted by the “Three Self” movement toward the indigenousization of missions, Agnew retired in 1879, a stalwart supporter of female education. She died, having established a reputation as the “Mother of a Thousand Daughters” for her work in Uduville, Jaffna province.

STANLEY M. GUTHRIE

Agnosticism. Refusal to attempt answers to certain religious questions and specifically to the question of the existence of God. Such a perspective is usually justified by appeal to the lack of sufficient evidence on which to base a meaningful answer.

The term itself, which calls to mind the reference to the “unknown [agnosto] god” in Acts 17.23, appears to have been coined by Thomas Huxley in 1869. The concept was affirmed by twentieth-century logical positivism, a short-lived philosophical movement building on the empiricism of David Hume. Since it appeared to be impossible to specify a circumstance in which the religious proposition "God is love" could be falsified (an explanation could always be found for any apparent contraindication), the proposition itself was, in positivist terms, "meaningless." Friedrich Engels, in a celebrated comment, dismissed the agnostics as "shamefaced atheists."

There is, of course, a place for a thoughtful agnosticism on some religious issues, most obviously where competent theologians are themselves divided. The nature of heaven and the duration of Hell are clear examples. More radical religious agnosticism leads inevitably to the elimination of explicit doctrinal beliefs.

Agnosticism as related to belief in the existence of God, however, is a more complex matter. Muslim radical agnosticism at this point, for example, leads to a negative hypostatization: when applied to God, language is emptied of meaning. Furthermore, that the consequences of belief or unbelief are discernible both in undoubted time and in prospective eternity brings into question the very possibility of agnosticism. Our conduct unequivocally demonstrates belief or unbelief. As Blaise Pascal insisted, we began our journey in life years ago (vous êtes déjà embarqué) and have already been compelled to make moral and ethical decisions, and in making those decisions we have inescapably demonstrated either our belief or our unbelief.

F. PETER COTTERELL

Bibliography. R. A. Armstrong, Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century; R. Flint, Agnosticism.

Agricultural Missions. Agriculture is the main means of livelihood for 65 percent to 90 percent of the population in most African, Asian, and Latin American countries. Even for industrialized countries such as the United Kingdom, where farmers represent less than 2 percent of the workforce, agricultural mission is vitally needed.

The practice of agriculture involves caring management or stewardship of land and natural resources in order to satisfy several objectives, including food production, maintenance of the environment (e.g., the soil and habitat), conservation of genetic resources (of both domesticated and wild species), provision of creative employment for people, sustenance of strategic stocks of food against poor harvests, and the integration with other uses of land for human welfare.

Aims of Agricultural Mission. Agricultural missionary work aims to present the good news of Jesus Christ in rural areas so that this gospel transforms not only individuals and their social relationships, but also the way they farm. In short, agricultural missions seek to promote living and farming to the glory of God. In effect, God has provided two means of conveying how this should be done—creation and the Bible—which are perceived through the senses and conscience, and which require the motivation of the Holy Spirit to enable us to farm accordingly. The creation mandate given to humankind is expressed in Genesis 1:26–31, notably the assignment of "dominion" (meaning in Hebrew, "complete authority") and the subsequent description of plants "pleasant to the eyes and good for food" (Gen. 2:8). Wisdom and discernment are needed to pursue a course of development that is not only economic, but also social, and which addresses the whole person, body, mind, and spirit.

The right pursuit of agriculture, specific to each locality, has a crucial part to play in managing change and increasing well-being of the local people. The local principle is extremely important: experience is the treasure of years, and generations of local farmers have accumulated much wealth of this kind. It is the task of the agricultural missionary to learn, respect, and operate within this fund of local experience, knowledge, and wisdom, introducing new ideas from elsewhere only if technically, economically, and socioculturally appropriate. It may also be the missionary's task to help people discern local beliefs and practices that may run counter to the will and purposes of God. While some non-Christian beliefs may leave people in undeveloped bondage, uncontrolled materialism leads to overexploitation of land, plants, animals, and people. Agricultural missionaries need not only technical agricultural competence and wholistic biblical understanding, but also humility to learn from local farmers and cultural sensitivity to facilitate beneficial changes.

Activities. Agricultural missions comprise a wide variety of activities. In Latin America missions have developed demonstration farms managed at orphanages, and engage in land right work for justice and reconciliation. In many countries of Africa, farmers' savings clubs and cooperatives assist farmers financially and help train leadership. Services are also operated to enable farmers to combine responsible Christian principles in their farming practice. Additionally, rural development counseling is provided by RURCON (Rural Development Counselors for Christian Churches in Africa). In Europe, the "Farm Crisis Network" was set up to help stressed European farmers, and the Christian Farmers' Association was established for united action. In North America, agricultural communities run by Christians have been established, some of which are designed to provide a place where the needy such as ex-convicts can rehabilitate and develop marketable work skills. In countries in Asia, tree-planting services and alternative farming schemes have been established. Around the world, teaching agriculture in schools, colleges, and universi-
Agricultural Missions

Ties provides the opportunity to develop appropriate agricultural techniques.

Summary. In addition to the development of appropriate agricultural techniques and land stewardship, agricultural missions involve at least three critical thrusts. The first is contextual evangelism, communicating the gospel to and through people who live and work in an agricultural context. The second is church growth, seeking to help improve and manage agricultural development as part of the life and witness of local churches. Finally is pastoral care, which includes ministry to those engaged in agriculture, and/or agricultural ethics and assisting the application of biblical principles to farm practice and agricultural policy formulation.

JOHN WIBBERLEY

Aidan of Lindisfarne (d. 651). Irish missionary to northern Britain. Oswald, king of Northumbria, came to Christ in 634 after a vision in which Columba of Iona assured him of victory in battle. Victorious, he requested someone from the monastery at Iona to revive the faith initially established in Northumbria by Paulinus but since lapsed. The first monk sent, traditionally named Corman, returned unsuccessful. Aidan was subsequently commissioned to the work. He walked to his assignment, evangelizing as he went. Given space on the island of Lindisfarne, he established a monastery. Aidan and his followers (Wilfred was instructed there) carried the message of Christ throughout northern England and south-west Scotland.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

AIDS and Mission. A Global Overview. AIDS (acquired immune-deficiency syndrome), as a global pandemic, has provided a unique challenge and opportunity to the church: a challenge to deal with life’s most fundamental moral and ethical issues, and an opportunity for service to those in need.

Appearing in the late 1970s, AIDS is currently one of the most critical health problems in the world. By 2020 there will be an estimated 55 million cases of HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) infection. In African countries with advanced HIV/AIDS epidemics life expectancy at birth has declined—to 37 years in Uganda, for example, the lowest global life expectancy. By 2010 a decline of 25 years in life expectancy is predicted for a number of African and Asian countries. In Zimbabwe it could reduce life expectancy from 70 to 40 years in the next 15 years. Sub-saharan Africa, with less than 10 percent of the world’s population, has 70 percent of the world’s population infected with HIV.

Asia, the world’s most populous region, is poised as the next epicenter of the epidemic. Initially spread in the region primarily by drug injection and men having sex with men, heterosexual transmission is now the primary cause of infection. It is expected that child mortality in Thailand, where the sex-tourism industry has fueled the epidemic, will triple in the next 15 years without a sharp decline in the rate of HIV infection. Latin America and the Caribbean, with 8.4 percent of the world’s population, have 11.5 percent of the HIV infection. Primarily a homosexual and bisexual epidemic initially, heterosexual contact is becoming the primary mode of transmission, with needle sharing also being common.

Of the 8,500 new cases of HIV infection which occur daily, 90 percent are in the developing world. Much of Eastern Europe and most countries in the former Soviet Union, relatively free of AIDS prior to the political shifts of the late 1980s, are in the earlier stages of the epidemic, as are Bangladesh, the Philippines, parts of China, and India.

Key Issues. The economic and social impact of AIDS in the developing world is profound because it characteristically affects adults during the most economically productive ages of 15 to 25. A Kenyan study estimated labor costs for some businesses could increase by 23 percent due to absenteeism, the cost of training new workers, death benefits, and health care costs by the year 2005. Service agencies strain to meet demands created by the epidemic, and extended family systems stagger under the burden of increased dependents and decreasing numbers of providers. In heavily affected areas of Asia and Africa 30 to 50 percent of household income is devoted to care of family members with AIDS and funeral expenses may cost a year’s income.

Populations with behaviors that put them at high risk for HIV infection include prostitutes and their clients, prisoners, long-distance truckers, homosexual and bisexual men, soldiers, police officers, and migrant workers. Sexual transmission of the virus is more efficient from men to women than from women to men. Women also have higher levels of undiagnosed sexually transmitted diseases. Worldwide, these two factors mean that women are becoming infected at faster rates than men.

Wealthy countries have access to the antiretrovirals and other drugs that prolong the lives of HIV-positive individuals. Worldwide 90 percent of those infected are not aware of their infection, due to lack of access to costly AIDS tests. The rise of tuberculosis (TB) rates is directly correlated to HIV prevalence and inversely correlated with the quality of TB programs.

Responding to the AIDS Pandemic: International Agencies, Governments, NonGovernment Organizations (NGOs), and Churches. The World Health Organization’s Global Program on AIDS, under the dynamic leadership of Jonathan Mann, initiated a global response to HIV/AIDS during the first decade of the epidemic. Subsequently, UNAIDS has been the United Nation’s agency coordinating the global response. Ministries of Health throughout the world, often dealing with multiple discreet epidemics in their countries, have become deeply involved in responses to AIDS as their populations have been affected by the epidemic. USAID (United States Agency for International Development) has provided strategic leadership and significant funding through AIDSCAP (AIDS Control and Prevention Project). NGOs have also played a crucial role in responding to AIDS. MAP International, a Christian NGO working to build the capacity of churches in East and southern Africa, partnered with the Association of Evangelicals in Africa and the Evangelical Association of Uganda in 1994 to bring 150 participants from 28 countries for the All Africa AIDS and the Church Consultation, held in Kampala, Uganda. A powerful declaration to the church resulted from the conference, urging that AIDS issues become a priority on the agenda of the church. Local initiatives, such as the Kenya Christian AIDS Network (Kenyan CAN or KCAN), with more than 30 branches meeting regularly, sprang up within two years after the conference.

A number of Christian AIDS programs are linked to mission hospitals. Under the leadership of Major Ruth Schoch, a Swiss Salvation Army office nurse and midwife who had already served twenty years in the Republic of Zambia, a Bethany Ward for the terminally ill was established in 1987 and a significant community-based initiative addressing AIDS was initiated at the Salvation Army’s Chikankata Hospital. Similarly, the Vanga Evangelical Hospital—a 400-bed hospital with eight full-time physicians under the administration of the Baptist Community of Western Zaire—offers whole-person care, including counseling, prayer, and group meetings, to those with HIV/AIDS through an HIV care program. In Nigeria the SIM AIDS Project (SIM International) is helping Christians know how to minister to those affected by AIDS and is developing biblical teachings on sexuality, marital relationships, and being made in God’s image. Campus Crusade’s Youth at the Crossroads has developed Life at the Crossroads, a substantial educational curriculum program that addresses AIDS from a positive biblical viewpoint.

Agencies promoting networking among the many Christian AIDS initiatives, often modest programs linked to a local church or as free-standing grass-roots organizations, have been particularly valuable in strengthening the global response of churches. AIDS Intercessors, for example, provides a monthly prayer diary with updates on the AIDS programs of more than forty Christian groups. Others agencies have multiple affiliates. AIDS Care Education and Training (ACET), based in London and started by Patrick Dixon, has prevention and care programs in Romania, Thailand, Tanzania, Uganda, and throughout the United Kingdom.

HIV/AIDS has unquestionably provided the church with one of its greatest challenges and most significant opportunities for ministry—and the church is responding.

---

Aitolos, Kosmas (1714–79). Greek Orthodox missionary evangelist in the Balkans. Born in the Greek province of Aitolia, Kosmas Aitolos was raised in a poor family with no opportunity for education. Kosmas’s search for an education and his thirst for God led him to the Philotheu monastery on Mount Athos in 1743. For seventeen years, Kosmas lived a life of seclusion and studied diligently. Through his study he realized that Christians should be concerned not just with their own salvation, but also with the salvation of others.

Thus motivated, Kosmas left the monastery in 1760 and became an itinerant preacher throughout northern Greece, Albania, and southern Serbia. For twenty years, he traveled from village to village preaching the gospel in a simple, contemporary form that villagers could understand. He helped found more than two hundred elementary schools and ten “higher” schools. His ultimate purpose in starting schools was for people to overcome their illiteracy and begin reading the Bible and church fathers. Kosmas’s life and work are considered one of the greatest influences in helping to preserve and strengthen Christianity in the Balkans during the eighteenth century. Kosmas was martyred by hanging in the village of Kalinkontasi.

---

Albania

Albania (Est. 2000 pop.: 3,624,000; 28,748 sq. km. [11,100 sq. mi.]). Albania, one of the poorest countries in Europe, located in the southern Balkans with a population of 3.6 million people, has experienced tremendous religious persecution in the past. Albania’s political history has strongly influenced the efforts of missionaries to evangelize. In spite of a Christian presence as early as A.D. 200, prior to the communist regime. Islam was the major religion of Albania. The Orthodox and Roman Catholic Churches also had a strong presence. Overall, the country was accepting of the religious influences that existed. The tolerance level changed dramatically when the Communists took over in 1945.

Enver Hoxha, the communist dictator, began an active campaign against religious institutions. Despite the adoption of a communist constitution that guaranteed freedom of religion, he issued decrees that allowed the government to control the activities of religious institutions. Many clergy and believers were tried, tortured, and executed by the government. All formal worship was eventually eradicated.

Upon Hoxha’s death in 1991, a two-party democratic form of government was elected to run the country. Ramiz Alia, the successor to Hoxha, took a tolerant stance toward religious practice. The ban on religious services was lifted and 95 percent of all mosques and churches that had been damaged during the communist rule were restored. The drastic change in attitude toward religion has been very significant for Christian mission efforts in Albania.

After the fall of communism, a number of missions entered the country to evangelize and plant churches, many of which reported excellent results in their evangelistic efforts. More recently, the Christian Broadcasting Network broadcast the first programs with a Christian message over government-owned television, with a viewership of 1.8 million, over half of the population. The future of evangelical missions in Albania is questionable, however, due to the fact that the Catholics, Orthodox, and Muslims are suffering from government control over religious institutions. Many clergy and believers were tried, tortured, and executed by the government. All formal worship was eventually eradicated.

Algeria (Est. 2000 pop.: 31,158,000; 2,381,741 sq. km. [919,590 sq. mi.]). “I see many knights going to the Holy Land beyond the seas, and thinking that they can acquire it by force of arms. . . . It seems to me that the conquest . . . ought to be attempted . . . by love and prayers, and the pouring out of tears and blood.” These are the words of Raymond Lull, who became a missionary martyr in Algeria in 1315.

Since then, the largest continuous Protestant mission effort pouring out tears and blood among the Algerians has been the North Africa Mission (now the Arab World Ministries), established in 1881 by a Briton, a Swiss, and a Druze. Other missions include the Plymouth Brethren Mission (1885), Wesleyan Methodists (French) (1886), Algiers Mission Band (1888; merged with NAM in 1964), Rolland Mission (French) (1908), and Methodist (1908).

A Bible Society was established in 1881, and Bible reading rooms have attracted great interest when they have been allowed, though literacy is only 50 percent. Evangelizing through the desert as early as 1893, Lillias Trotter reported again and again the great longing of the desert men for books. Today radio, Bible correspondence courses, the JESUS FILM in Kabyle Berber, Arabic and French languages, and locally produced music and Scripture tapes are received hungrily if clandestinely. Production cannot keep up with demand. Postal censorship is severe, however. Recipients may be interrogated by the police.

52
The gospel may have come to Algeria in the first century through believers in the large Algerian Jewish community. By the fourth century, North Africa had given birth to some of the finest Latin Christian theology, written by men like Augustine, Tertullian, and Cyprian. Vandals in the fifth century and Muslims in the eighth erased much of the church. Yet in the eleventh century five bishops remained. In 1645 the French Lazarists established a mission to ameliorate the suffering of the thousands of Europeans who had been captured by “Barbary pirates.” By the nineteenth century, Catholic bishops, orders like the White Fathers and White Sisters, and hermits like Charles Foucauld sought to evangelize Algerians. But the French colonial government deported evangelists, removed crucifixes from mission hospitals, and forbade Muslims to enter the cathedral. During this century European Protestants immigrated in large numbers, bringing their churches and pastors. However, these showed little concern for Algerians, and departed at independence in 1962. After the bloody eight-year war for independence, Catholic and Protestant missions including the Salvation Army, Mennonites, and Friends helped rebuild the country.

In particular, the Berbers have responded to the gospel. Numbering perhaps 25 million across Africa, in Algeria Berbers may comprise 30 percent of the population. Somewhat independent in mountain villages, thousands have come to Christ. Indigenous leadership is vigorous and creative.

Since 1992 an uprising of Islamists has massacred 75,000 civilians. The outcome could significantly influence the rest of the Arab world toward radical or moderate governments. Meanwhile, as social trauma makes people more open to the gospel, believers meet in small Bible study groups. There is no seminary, though THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION by EXTENSION is conducted.

Allan, George

Alienation. Alienation describes the sense of deprivation and marginalization of persons who perceive that their once-fulfilled lives, or the lives to which they aspired, have lost their sense or possibility of personal fulfillment and satisfaction. Alienation may be attributed to a loss of norms, values, and a reassuring worldview, often brought about by abrupt change. This state corresponds to the condition denoted by the term ANOMIE. But alienation may also be linked to other disadvantages, including discrimination, exclusion, dislocation, the ravages of war and other human conflict, changes in technological and social organization, and oppressive political systems—which refer not just to subjective states but to concrete conditions. The concept of alienation derives from related theological and philosophical terms used from the times of Plotinus and Augustine to those of Hegel (“alienated spirit”), Feuerbach (“Man’s alienation from his own material nature”), and Marx (“alienation labor”).

In each case these terms carry the sense of estrangement and incompleteness resulting from one’s separation from elements essential to personal realization. The cure is implied in the diagnosis: Hegel thought in terms of alienation from God, but saw religious forms and organization as themselves inhibiting spiritual wholeness; Feuerbach sought to restore humans to their rightful place in the material world; and Marx identified alienation primarily as social injustice. While evangelical use of the term “alienation” may be invested with these precedents, evangelicals generally apply alienation in the theological sense of viewing human sin (alienation from God) and redemption (reconciliation with God) as being the cause and antidote for all other human ills. People who respond to the gospel are primarily those who in some sense feel alienated—unfulfilled or dissatisfied. Evangelicalism at its roots is a promise of wholeness, LIBERATION from the bondage of sin, restitution to a community of transformed (born-again) believers, and an eschatological assurance of ultimate salvation.

Allan, George (c. 1870–1941). New Zealand missionary to Argentina and Bolivia and founder of Bolivian Indian Mission. Both Allan and his wife, Mary Stirling, were raised in South Otago and in Southland, New Zealand, in evangelical Presbyterian homes, and trained for missionary service at the Angus Missionary College in Adelaide, Australia. They became interested in service in South America, and were sent out to Buenos Aires in 1899 with the South American Evangelical Mission, which was based in Toronto. Allan’s work took him on itinerant visits to Bolivia. His mission amalgamated with the Regions Beyond Missionary Union in 1903, but the Australasian committee and its eight workers became independent. In 1908 they formed a new body, the Bolivian Indian Mission, which was based in the small town of San Pedro.

The Allans initiated educational and evangelistic work for the Quechua and several Australians and New Zealanders joined their team of workers. The translation of the New Testament into Quechua was one of their achievements. In 1915 Allan founded a U.S. board of the mission, which resulted in a new influx of American missionaries. In 1930 the mission center was moved to Cochabamba and the work broadened to embrace Spanish-speaking Bolivians. Here Allan died, preceded by his wife in February of 1939. With quiet determination he had built a mission which later merged with SIM to create one of the great world missions.
Allen, George

PETER LINEHAM

Allen, Roland (1868–1947). English missionary to China and Africa and missions theorist. Roland Allen was born in England, studied at Oxford University, and was ordained in the Anglican Church in 1892. He went to China with the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts in 1895, but returned for health reasons in 1904 to serve as a parish priest. He resigned in 1907 in a dispute over baptism, but served as a chaplain on a hospital ship during World War I.

From the 1920s on he was something of an international missions consultant, working with groups trying to revive missionary vision. He visited churches in Canada, India, Kenya, Zimbabwe, and South Africa. Allen finally settled in Kenya in 1931 and lived there until he died. After observing what he considered the drawbacks of traditional missionary work, he revived the teachings of Rufus Anderson and Henry Venn and became a strong proponent of the so-called Three-Self theory, which holds that churches started by foreign agencies should become self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating (see also Indigenous Churches). Allen's somewhat iconoclastic approach to missions attracted wide interest among evangelical mission agencies. Largely because of his book, Missionary Methods: St. Paul’s or Ours (1912), he ranks among the most influential when it comes to applying biblical principles to missionary work.

Allen was a prolific writer of letters and articles. His second most influential book was The Spontaneous Expansion of the Church and the Causes Which Hinder It (1927). There his deep commitment to the work of the Holy Spirit in missions came to full flower. He is credited with being the first to develop the connection between the Holy Spirit and missions.

In that context he challenged what he saw as an overreliance on professionalism, money, and organization in mission. For example, he wrote: “There is a horrible tendency for an organization to grow in importance till it overshadows the end of its existence, and begins to exist for itself” (p. 98). This system rooted in the material and the professional actually squelches propagation of the gospel, he believed. His brief summation, Missionary Principles, expounds the principle that the presence of Christ in the missionary is the source from which all ministry springs. “The missionary spirit of Christ in us cannot rest until it finds an expression in some form of service,” he wrote (p. 105).

Allen was an unusual blend of the pragmatist (trying to lose the church overseas from foreign control) and the preacher; driving missionary work back to first principles of biblical discipleship.

JIM REAPSMO

Ambassador of God. A missionary's task is to represent God and his message to an alien world. This shows the special relationship between the Creator and the messenger, who is dispatched as an envoy, an ambassador of God. An ambassador is an official diplomatic agent of high rank who is sent out by a ruler or government as a public representative. A missionary is one who is sent out to work as a citizen of the Kingdom of God, representing truth and light in a world of deceit and darkness.

In the Old Testament there are numerous examples of God's ambassadors. Noah represented God's righteousness to unbelievers. Moses proclaimed God's power and justice in pharaoh's court. Joshua showed the might and strength of the Lord before the Canaanites. Both Gideon and Deborah were mediators between God and the rebellious and defeated Israelites. God's special agents, called to proclaim and to direct people to obedience, lived lives that were testimonies of faith and commitment. Daniel and Esther served in alien governments as ambassadors of God through their words and actions.

In the New Testament, Christ tells a parable of a ruler sending an emissary, a select delegation to negotiate peace (Luke 13:32). God's ambassadors are a select, chosen few who challenge the enemy and seek to negotiate eternal peace in the hearts of humanity. The apostle Paul wrote to the church at Corinth stating that "we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God were making his appeal through us" (2 Cor. 5:20). To the church at Ephesus he wrote, "I am an ambassador in chains" (Eph. 6:20). This refers to his imprisonment for openly proclaiming the good news of Jesus Christ. Paul measures himself as personally commissioned by Christ to present the gospel to the entire world. The Greek word presbeto literally means a senior, one who is aged. However, Paul brings new meaning to the term. He is an elder statesperson representing the kingdom of...
God before the rulers and their subjects on this earth. Missionaries serve as ambassadors of God. They are believers in Jesus Christ to whom God imparts certain spiritual gifts, and calls and sends out to make disciples and preach the good news (Matt. 20:18–20; Rom. 10:15). As citizens of the kingdom of God, they are subject to God’s laws and are under the authority of the Lord they represent before the rest of the world.

JOHN EASTERLING

American Bible Society. See Bible Societies.

American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM). The ABCFM was the first and most important nineteenth-century American mission board. Samuel Mills, a child of the Second Great Awakening, led a group of students at Williams College to pledge themselves to missions in the “Haystack Prayer Meeting” in 1806. In 1810, as students at Andover Seminary, the group proposed to the Congregational Association of Massachusetts the formation of a foreign mission board.

In 1812 the ABCFM was incorporated, and its first five missionaries sailed for India. Out of the first group the Judsons and Luther Rice became Baptists, the Judsons going on to Burma (now Myanmar) while Rice returned to the United States to form the Baptist Missionary Union.

The Board’s purpose was to propagate the gospel in “heathen” lands by supporting missionaries and diffusing the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. Evangelism and church planting had the highest priority, with Bible translation important and social concerns subordinate. About half of its missionaries were Congregationalists; most of the others were Presbyterian or Reformed. The Board worked in thirty-four fields, most of the others were Presbyterian or Reformed. The Board worked in thirty-four fields, which included indigenous Americans. When the Cherokees were expelled from their land in Georgia, two missionaries went to prison in protest; others accompanied the people on the “Trail of Tears.” Traders had arrived in Hawaii by 1800; as a result, the native population had fallen by half, its culture disintegrating. In 1820 the missionaries came, and by 1840 the language was reduced to writing, most of the Bible translated, literature produced, schools established, and twenty thousand people, a fifth of the population, had become church members. The local rulers passed laws against prostitution, gambling, and drunkenness.

In the Middle East the goals were to work with Muslims, ancient Christian churches, and Jews. Success among Muslims was limited, and although the missionaries did not plan to proselytize members of the older churches, converts to evangelical Christianity were expelled from those bodies, leading to the establishment of Protestant churches.

In Sumatra the first two missionaries were killed and eaten by the Bataks, but a church was later established among them by European missionaries.

The Bible was translated into a number of languages, many of which were first reduced to writing. Educational institutions from the primary to university levels were established, while Peter Parker and John Scudder were acclaimed for their medical work in China and India.

Rufus Anderson, a secretary of the Board from 1823 to 1866, was America’s most outstanding mission leader and theoretician of the nineteenth century. He is best known for his formulation, along with Henry Venn of the CMS, of the “Three-Self” formula, which stated that the goal was to establish churches that were self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating. He also advocated Christianization over civilization—Westernization—in an important debate.

The theological shift in New England Congregationalism in the last third of the nineteenth century greatly affected the Board and contributed to its eventual decline. But by 1959 it had sent out over 4,800 men and women. With the union of the Congregational and Evangelical and Reformed Churches in the 1950s the ABCFM became the United Church Board of World Ministries.

PAUL E. PIERSON

American Samoa (Est. 2000 pop. 63,000; 197 sq. km, [76 sq. mi.]). American Samoa consists of five islands and two atolls, 2,300 miles south of Hawaii and 1,600 miles northeast of New Zealand. Complex rivalry between British, German, and American strategic interests in Samoa in the nineteenth century resulted in American Samoa becoming an unincorporated territory of the United States in 1900. Fifty percent of its 63,000 people are members of the Christian Congregational Church (formerly LMS), 20 percent are Roman Catholics, with Methodists and Mormons also prominent.

ALLAN K. DAVIDSON

See also Polynesia.

American Society for Church Growth. The American Society for Church Growth (ASCG) was founded in 1984 as the North American Society for Church Growth. C. Peter Wagner served as the society’s first president. The ASCG describes itself as "a professional association of Christian leaders worldwide whose ministry activities are based on the basic and key principles of church growth as originally developed by the late DONALD McGAVRAN." Membership in the ASCG includes those who specialize in monocultural contexts, as well as those who minister cross-culturally. It is open to professors, theologians, and practitioners, including pastors and denominational or parachurch leaders in the United States. The ASCG's activities include an annual meeting and publication of the Journal of the American Society for Church Growth.
American Society for Church Growth

CHARLES VAN ENGEN

See also Church Growth Movement.

American Society of Missiology. The American Society of Missiology is a professional association for mission studies in North America. It was founded in 1972 and grew out of a concern to provide "a community of scholarship, fellowship and mission" that would draw together not only professors of mission but mission administrators and missionaries as well. Its purpose is to maintain an interdisciplinary approach to the study of mission, giving attention to the historical, social, cultural, biblical, theological, and methodological aspects of mission. It does this within a conscious commitment to be inter-confessional, incorporating within its structures of governance a balance of representation from three major streams: Roman Catholic, conciliar Protestant, and independent/evangelical. The society's publications and presentations at its meetings reflect this tripartite constituency as well.

The society sustains publication efforts along several lines. It publishes one of the leading journals in the field of mission studies, Missiology: An International Review, a quarterly journal that picked up the heritage of Practical Anthropology when that journal ceased publication at the end of 1972 (see also Journals of Mission and Missiology). Missiology continues the distinctive contributions of that prior journal within an expanded range of issues in the field of missiology. The journal represents the interdisciplinary approach of the society itself, giving attention to history, theology, anthropology, communication theory, religious encounter, ecumenics, and methodology.

In addition, monographs on critical issues in mission are published in the ASM Series, a series produced collaboratively with Orbis Books. In the first nineteen years since the initiation of the series in 1979, over twenty-five volumes appeared. In addition, another series was begun in the late 1990s to make available doctoral dissertations of importance in the field. The ASM Dissertation Series, published through University Press of America, produced its first volume in 1997.

From the outset, the ASM has maintained a close relationship with the Association of Professors of Mission which normally holds its meetings in conjunction with those of the ASM. The ASM is a constituent society of the Council of Societies for the Study of Religion and an affiliate society in the International Association for Mission Studies.

GEORGE R. HUNSBERGER

Amerindian Religions. See Indigenous American Religions.

Amillennialism. As a term, amillennialism, like premillennialism and postmillennialism, was not coined until the 1840s. But, in fact, all three views are represented through the long history of the church. And they have shared much in common. Shared Perspectives. Dominating those common features has been a confidence in the personal, visible, and glorious return of Jesus Christ to consummate his work of redemption and restoration begun with his life, death, and resurrection.

Also shared, with varieties of interpretation, has been the neo-Augustinian perception of this age stretching between the first and the second coming of Christ as a day of divine grace offered to the sinner.

In the years following the sixteenth century, that understanding combined especially with the colonialist expansion of Europe. An expanded knowledge of the world called for an expanded effort to announce that divine word of grace and forgiveness in Christ. And sadly, in that expansion, Western ethnocentrism often had difficulty in extracting “Christianizing” from “civilizing.” Eschatology as Christ-centered hope too often began to look strangely like Western-centered progress.

Restraining this tendency toward the nationalization of eschatology were other beliefs shared in common by the three millennial viewpoints. The expectation of a full exhibition of the glorious reign of God on earth with Christ's appearance, of the physical resurrection from death, of the gathering in of “the fullness of the Gentiles” (Rom. 11:25), and the salvation of “all Israel” (Rom. 9:26) had long standing in the church. These shared perspectives often create difficulties in too sharply dividing pre-nineteenth-century ‘millenarianism’ into specific schools (Murray, 1971, 48–49).

Missiological Trajectories. What are those particular features of amillennialism (sometimes called realized or inaugurated millennialism) that nurture the accomplishment of the missionary task?

First, the movement remains relatively unencumbered by the elaborate chronological details needed to insert a literal 1000-year period into an eschatological sequence. Its understanding of the millennium as the gospel age separating the first and second coming concentrates more on Christ as the center of history and Christ's return as the ultimate outcome of history. Its eschatological center thus tends to orbit more around Christology than around specific details immediately surrounding the second coming of the Lord.

Second, amillennialism, with postmillennialism, traces many of its theological roots to Puritanism's earlier emphasis on the sovereign rule of God in history. Missions, particularly in its Reformation understanding (the 'already') and to be consummated by his coming again (the 'not yet').

And for the amillennialist the missionary preaching of the kingdom's good news to all becomes a divine requirement given to the Christian community on its way to eschatological fulfillment (1 Cor. 9:16). Empowered by the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:8), the church is “under obligation” (Rom. 1:14) to announce that Christ has come to inaugurates the kingdom through his redemptive work (Mark 1:14–15; Luke 4:18–21).

Fourth, amillennialism sees eschatology ("the last days") as initiated by the redeeming work of Christ (1 Cor. 10:11; Heb. 1:2). This pleads for a strong element of continuity between our life in the Spirit in "the present age" and "in the age to come" (Eph. 1:21).

This continuity becomes a powerful incentive for a holistic understanding of missions as both word and deed, evangelism and socio-cultural involvement (Matt. 25:31–46). Because perfect righteousness and peace will characterize the kingdom's future we seek also their beginnings in the kingdom's present, yet imperfect, manifestation (2 Peter 3:11–14; Matt. 6:10).

Fifth, and finally, this same perception of amillennialism as missions "between the times" also underlines a sense of discontinuity. There is still the reality of sin to bar missionary enthusiasm and promote the nations' obstinate refusal of Christ. Over-optimism concerning the course of human history toward the gospel's consummation is restrained by the reality that "many are called but few are chosen" (Matt. 22:14).

History's Modifications. Amillennialism, like its counterparts, has not escaped reshaping in the history of the church. And that reshaping has not always strengthened its missionary dimensions.

Its strong emphasis on continuity and the church's eschatological role “between the times” can sometimes lead its supporters to a kind of church imperialism that blurs the line between the church and the kingdom of God. Its sensitivity to discontinuity can find the church's missionary role reduced to that of guerrilla action within an institutional remnant. In doing so, its understanding of the presence of the kingdom in Christ can become a "world-avertive" shelter instead of a "worldforming" intrusion. And, in common with other millennial viewpoints, it can become so lost in chronological debates with those alternatives that it falls into eschatological paralysis.

Harvie M. Conn

SEE ALSO Millennial Thought.

Amsterdam Assembly (1948). On August 23, 1948, the World Council of Churches came into being by action of its first general assembly. This gathering, held from August 22 to September 4 in Amsterdam, culminated a process initiated in 1937 to bring together two streams of ecumenical life, the Faith and Order Movement and the Life and Work Movement, into a fully representative global assembly of churches. A total of 351 delegates from 44 nations and 147 denominations participated. The assembly adopted as its basis: "The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches which accept our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Savior." Deliberations focused on the church as the agency through which God would accomplish his purposes.

The theme of the Amsterdam Assembly, “Man's Disorder and God's Design,” was considered in four sections: the universal church in God's design; the church's witness to God's design; the church and the disorder of society; the church and the international order. The second section in particular addressed issues related to mission and evangelism. Recognizing the existence and growth of the younger churches, it called for the whole church to set itself to the task of winning the whole world for Christ. Also, it stressed the close relationship between unity and inner renewal, and declared invalid the distinction between Christian and non-Christian nations.
Amsterdam Assembly

The third section developed the concept of the responsible society, one which seeks to maintain the balance between justice and freedom. It criticized the assumption of laissez-faire capitalism that justice will follow automatically the exercise of free enterprise, and the communist assumption that freedom will come once economic justice is established. Since no civilization can avoid the judgment of God's Word, none is to be accepted uncritically.

At Amsterdam, the assembly, which is the supreme legislative body of the World Council of Churches, adopted a constitution, set conditions for membership, outlined programs, defined structures and policies, made decisions about how to relate to other ecumenical bodies, established offices in Geneva, and elected a central committee, which in turn named W. A. Visser 't Hooft as the first general secretary. Apart from highlighting the vital role of the laity in the ongoing witness of the church, the Amsterdam Assembly did not contribute substantial new material to the reflection on mission. It did, however, create a new context in which common concerns could be discussed. While the World Council of Churches and the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL were considered to be in close association with each other, emphasis fell upon the essential unity of the church as distinguished from its missionary obligation.

KEN MULHOLLAND

Anabaptist Missions. “Anabaptist” (“re-baptizer”) is a cover name given to a movement of splinter groups initiated at the time of the Reformation. They denied infant baptism, instituting a restriction of baptism to believing adults. Though not thinking of themselves as rebaptizers, this pejorative label (given by the Catholics and Reformers who persecuted them) has through historical use become the accepted term of reference.

In addition to believer’s baptism, Anabaptist groups were characterized generally by personal devotion to Christ, passionate commitment to evangelism, and radical separation of church and state. Several groups also lived communally, preached eschatological urgency, and were pacifists. The blend of unswerving evangelistic fervor and persistent refusal to take oaths of loyalty to earthly rulers resulted in the perception that they were insurrectionists. They were thus outlawed almost everywhere they went.

Literally thousands were martyred, many by drowning as a cruel parody of their baptismal practice. The sheer number of martyrs, however, attests to the movement’s vitality. Long before WILLIAM CAREY, and in contrast to the Reformers, Matthew 28:19–20 was a central text in Anabaptist mission motivation. A primary goal was reestablishing the biblical model of the church, which they felt had been lost in the mixed marriage of church and state. Generally they gathered people in homes rather than ecclesiastical structures and policies, made decisions about how to relate to other ecumenical bodies, established offices in Geneva, and elected a central committee, which in turn named W. A. Visser ‘t Hooft as the first general secretary. Apart from highlighting the vital role of the laity in the ongoing witness of the church, the Amsterdam Assembly did not contribute substantial new material to the reflection on mission. It did, however, create a new context in which common concerns could be discussed. While the World Council of Churches and the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL were considered to be in close association with each other, emphasis fell upon the essential unity of the church as distinguished from its missionary obligation.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Anarchist Beliefs and Practices. Throughout the world, cultures recognize the continuance of life after death. Wherever this is true, such recognition often results in the belief that the departed ancestors are still alive and correspondingly need to be recognized or acknowledged in some fashion. Though this basic belief is commonly found around the world, the formal manifestations and means by which this belief is acted out are represented in a staggering variety of beliefs, ethical codes, and rituals.

Beliefs and Ethics. In parts of Asia where CON-FUCIANIST thinking undergirds culture, the obligation of filial piety undergirds the ethical need to respect the ancestors. Maintaining one’s place in life, and (in the case of the eldest son) carrying out the role of supporting the departed in their place in ongoing life is critical. The cult of the ancestors has critical social functions, such as maintaining order in society through sustaining respect for the elders and adherence to social roles. In many parts of southern Africa no important family decision would be made without hearing from the ancestors through divination, dreams, or possession. The dead are thought of as the living dead, and local ethical codes demand that they be granted the same respect in death that they enjoyed as elders while alive. When times are troubling, whether from drought or disease, the ancestors may be called upon to protect the living. Among indigenous peoples of Latin America, as also in Africa, the ancestors are still seen as participating in the community of the living, even though their attention may not always be welcome. In all these contexts, failure to acknowledge the dead may result in retribution by the dead on the living. Thus, the obligation to participate in the practices and beliefs is often seen as a cultural necessity. Even in the materialistic West the popularity of attempts to reach the dead, whether through seances or mediums, shows that the need for ongoing connection with the departed remains an important felt need.

Rituals. The rituals associated with the ancestors vary widely. They include personal devotions, household rituals, rites of the extended family or clan, and rites of the whole people on behalf of all the ancestors. Rites of transition may be necessary to ensure that the departed is accepted by the spirit realm, and great funerals may be the means by which this is done. Cyclical rites, such as recognition on the departed’s birthday or death date, may be needed to cement the family together. Rites of crisis enable the living to beseech the dead for protection or deliverance from their troubles. They ensure that the living do not join the dead before the appropriate time!

Missionary Response. A perplexing problem for missionaries is understanding exactly what the beliefs are, what the roles of the ancestors are, and why the living feel they need to relate to them. Initially missionaries considered the relationship to be one of worship. More recently it has been recognized that worship, in the sense of paying homage to deity, is not always an appropriate word to use and “ancestral veneration” has become the accepted term. However, the reality is that the problem is not just one of vocabulary, but of finding ways to enable Christian communities to obey the fifth commandment (honoring mother and father) in their cultural context without violating warnings against contact with the dead (e.g., Lev. 19:31; 20:6, 27; Deut. 18:9–14; 1 Sam. 28:3–20). Proposed answers have ranged from simply declaring ancestral practices Christian to abolishing them altogether. The missionary’s main role is not to make decisions for the local community, but to assist that community in going to the Scriptures for guidance in evaluating the cultural beliefs and practices in light of God’s revelation.

---

Anderson, Gerald H. (1930– ). American missiologist, advocate, and missionary in the Philippines. After graduation from Grove City College with a degree in business administration, Anderson chose to follow God’s calling to enter the ministry and pursued theological studies at Boston University School of Theology. After completion of his master’s degree, and with the help of a Fulbright scholarship, his studies took him to universities in Germany, Switzerland, and Scotland. He received his Ph.D. in church history from Boston University in 1960.

His work in the Philippines was at Union Theological Seminary, where he taught church history and served as academic dean (1963–66) and director of graduate studies (1968–70) before returning to the United States to take the post of president at Scarritt College for Christian Workers (Nashville; 1970–73). After a one-year appointment as a senior research associate at Cornell University, Anderson became the associate director of the Overseas Ministries Study Center (OMSC; 1974).

The Theology of the Christian Mission (1961) was the first of more than a dozen major edited works and it exemplified both the level and breadth of scholarship which characterizes Anderson. Bringing together a spectrum of voices from conservative to liberal and engaging them in fruitful dialogue is a unique hallmark of his scholarship and ministry. This has been seen through his collaborative editorial work on books (Concise Dictionary of Christian World Missions, the Mission Trends series, Biographical Dictionary of Christian Missions) and the widely acclaimed International Bulletin of Missionary Research (1977) as well as his roles in the founding of the American Society of Missiology and the International Association of Mission Studies and in his work as OMSC director (1976–2000). In 1995 he received an honorary D.D. degree from Moravian Theological Seminary. He retired in 2000, after 26 years at OMSC.

---

Anderson, John

Anderson, John (1805–55). Scottish pioneer missionary to India. Born in Galloway, Scotland, in the parish of Kilpatrick-Durham on May 23, 1805, he studied at parish schools and at age twenty-two entered Edinburgh University, where he distinguished himself as a student. He was ordained and sent as a missionary of the Church of Scotland in 1836. He devoted his work to evangelism through education of the Indians in Madras. He began his work by taking over a small school that had been started by two chaplains for the East India Company. His first priority was to move the school into the heart of Madras where it could establish an academic reputation and attract higher-caste Hindus. The school grew, but suffered setbacks because of community pressure after students came to Christ and lower-caste students were admitted. The first two to come to faith were baptized in 1836. In 1843 funds from Scotland were disrupted and the school came under the authority of the Free Presbyterian Church of Madras. Anderson did not marry until 1947, when he joined with Margaret Locher of Zurich who had come to teach the younger women. By 1850 Anderson was experiencing health problems that were severe enough that he returned to Scotland with an early convert by the name of Rajahgopal. He returned to India the next year but died only four years later on March 25, 1855. Under the direction of William Miller the school Anderson founded was developed into Madras Christian College, a school that has provided over a century of Christian witness in India.

Anderson believed that mission compounds and reliance on foreign missionaries hindered the growth of the national church. He was firmly committed to the training and ordination of national pastors. His theories were published in 1856 by the ABCFM as the Outline of Missionary Practice.

JIM REAPSMONE

Bibliography. R. P. Beaver, To Advance the Gospel: Selections from the Writings of Rufus Anderson.

Andorra (Est. 2000 pop.: 81,000; 453 sq. km. [175 sq. mi.]). Andorra is a small autonomous principality in the southern Pyrenees between France and Spain. Over 90 percent of the population is either Spanish or Catalan. The vast majority of these are Roman Catholic. Jehovah Witnesses number about 400 and evangelical Protestants, mainly Seventh-Day Adventists, are less than 100. Most evangelistic mission work is limited to literature distribution.

TODD M. JOHNSON

Andrews, Charles Freer (1871–1950). English missionary to India. Born in Carlisle, England, son of a Catholic Apostolic Church minister, at nineteen he had an intense conversion experience. He graduated brilliantly from Cambridge, became an Anglican, worked in the London slums (1896–1900), and was vice president of Westcott House, Cambridge (1900–1904). He then went to India under the Cambridge Mission and, dismayed by British arrogance and the caste system, became a champion of the deprived classes. He counted Hindus, Muslims, and Buddhists among his dearest friends, saw "the Spirit of Christ" in those who did not call themselves Christians, and wondered whether he could draw the boundaries of Christian thought as sharply as he once did. He rejected the literal interpretation of Scripture and the damnatory clause in the Athanasian Creed. He disliked aggressive evangelism and held that Christianity was often more professed than practiced.

Invited in 1913 to help the oppressed Indian community in South Africa, he became a close friend of Mahatma Gandhi. Andrews severed his missionary connection with mutual goodwill in 1914, became chairman of the Indian Trades Union Congress, was a longtime mediator between Indians and Europeans, and spent long meditative stays at Rabindranath Tagore’s ashram. He campaigned against all forms of racial prejudice, but eventually spent most of his time striving for the abolition of indentured Indian labor, a long-entrenched evil. Before the battle was finally won, he had visited South and East Africa, Fiji, Australia, North America, and the Caribbean area.

His What I Owe to Christ (1932) tells how through the many difficulties and changes he had known, a simple, joyful faith in Jesus Christ was the very center of his life. Andrews wrote a biography of Sundar Singh, as well as social and humanitarian works.

J. D. Douglas

Anglican Missions. The Anglican Church will seem to have an eccentric history and theology of missions if it is seen only through the prism of modern Protestant denominationalism. For well documented political, religious, and cultural reasons the Roman Catholic Church in England broke communion with the pope during the continental reformation under the direction of the English king Henry VIII (1509–47). After hesitations and compromises it emerged as the Church of England under Elizabeth I (1558–1603), with the monarch as its governor and the aristocracy and gentry as its patrons. Anglicanism, then, was susceptible to Erastianism and tended strongly to Protestantism in its key theological claims and to Catholicism in regard to sacraments, sensibilities, and ecclesiastical organization. So “protestant” and “catholic” (and later conservative and liberal) Anglicans learned early to tolerate, if rarely sometimes, each other’s presence in the church. Anglican protestantism has given bishops significant ecclesiastical freedom in their own jurisdictions and the sometimes unwelcome political council of powerful local laity. Anglican catholicity has rendered most of its adherents respectful of sacramental acts and wary of schisms: it has also often made its missionaries hesitant to seek converts from the Orthodox and Roman Catholic Churches. These realities helped forge Anglicanism, over the years, into a network of dioceses with a shared culture and a wide tolerance. Yet it could not have been anticipated that Anglican missions would lead to an international, multilingual communion of some 60 million on all continents by the end of the twentieth century.

In the latter sixteenth century, when the Church of England first saw itself as a reformed, national church, its leaders saw its chief mission to be the spiritual care of all those subject to the English Crown, their education in Anglicanism, and the gaining of their loyalty to the established order as the ordinance of God. Yet it was only after Puritan emigration to the American colonies, a religious and political civil war in England, and the act tolerating religious “non-conformists” in the country (1689) that the limits of the mission were admitted, and its basics in any sense accomplished in England and Wales. Scotland and Ireland being extremely resistant to English power, the church planted there was far more tenuous and unpopular. Anglican clergy up to this point did not venture out of the nation as missionaries, but as chaplains to wealthy emigrant families and commercial companies.

It was 1701 before the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG), the first overseas Anglican mission, was formed. Instigated by Anglican priests, generously supported by the gentry and aristocracy, and blessed by the Anglican archbishop of Canterbury, its mission was for the most part in America. Its goal was to bring colonists back into the Anglican Church and to evangelize the native population by planting the self-sufficient parish system of the mother country. Yet even its limited success was suddenly cut short by the American Revolution. Yet there was a silver lining to the cloud. American Anglicans were urgently propelled into establishing a ground-breaking autonomous Episcopal church with its own mission (Samuel Seabury, the first American and first overseas Anglican bishop, being forced to seek consecration in 1784 at the hands of Scottish Episcopal bishops), and the SPG was pushed to take up other fields of endeavor. Both unintended consequences of the Revolution stretched the definition of Anglican missions.

Within a few years (1787) the archbishop of Canterbury consecrated the first Canadian bishop (Nova Scotia), and the pattern was set for colonial Anglicanism as Anglican missions entered the nineteenth century. Anglican missionaries went wherever the British Empire led, and began to concentrate more and more on indigenous peoples. The formation of the second Anglican mission agency, the very evangelical Church Missionary Society (CMS) in 1799, was not destructive of Anglican unity and effectiveness. Both the SPG and the CMS recruited missionary-clergymen, raised their support, and helped build independent Anglican dioceses throughout the growing British commonwealth. Markedly protestant or catholic Anglican agencies that sprouted up in the following years—the Colonial and Continental Church Society (1823), the South American Missionary Society (1844), the Universities’ Mission to Central Africa (1857), and others—quarreled, but did not cause schisms. They fed their efforts into new and far-flung dioceses that were closely governed by autonomous bishops and able to function quickly as independent parts of a rapidly growing Anglican communion.

In the late nineteenth century Anglican missions were sent not only from Britain, but from American and colonial dioceses as British immigrants concentrated on natives in what was now...
Anglican Missions

their hinterland and on indigenous peoples in more remote British and other European possessions. Anglican missions also continued their diversifying tendencies, and began to encompass everything from direct evangelism to medical, educational, and agricultural projects, learning the value of challenging or even defying imperial authority to accomplish their mandate. But in the years following the great World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh (1910) in which they optimistically participated, Anglican missions met tough new challenges. The national independence movements that followed, the trend to democracy in all societal institutions, the rapid theological changes that emerged in Western theology, and the consequent plunge in missionary vocations shook their self-understanding.

But several encouraging trends have emerged. The accelerated ordination of indigenous clergy and bishops has encouraged the self-sufficiency of even more recent Anglican mission areas, and put Anglicans of European descent in the role of requested consultants. More recently, non-European Anglican missionaries have become consultants to moribund Anglicanism in Europe and North America. The episcopal system has continued to avoid schisms and it has become more responsive to the laity as a whole, which has generated its patrons and voting members for its elections and synods and has given new energy and leadership to the Anglican communion. And though theological controversy, secularism, and growing pluralism have sapped Anglican mission of much of its vitality in the West, Anglicans have become more sympathetic to their co-religionists in countries dominated by other world religions or Western economies. Finally, Anglicans responded to their predicament by supporting a communion-wide “Decade of Evangelism” (1988–98), run between its global Lambeth conferences.

Paul H. Friesen

Angola (Est. 2000 pop.: 13,074,000; 1,246,700 sq. km. [481,351 sq. mi.]). Angola, a country more than twice the size of France with a population of about 13 million people, situated on the west coast of southern Africa, had its first contact with Christianity through the early Portuguese navigators who arrived in 1483. In 1491 the Portuguese established the first Catholic mission to Angola in the north. Jesuits, Capuchins, and Carmelites were the first to evangelize the area. The church grew rapidly at first. The king of the ruling Kongo kingdom accepted Christianity, and his son became the first African bishop. This early growth, however, was not sustained. Malaria and dysentery killed many priests. Furthermore, Portugal became deeply involved in the world slave trade. Bishops and priests would baptize groups of slaves before they were shipped to foreign lands, and this involvement with the slave trade caused the people to become disillusioned with the church. It was not until the late nineteenth century that the Roman Catholic Church began to establish itself, beginning to work in the interior of Angola.

Protestant work in Angola was pioneered by the British Baptists, who arrived in 1878 to work among the Bakongo people in the north. Shortly after their arrival, the American Board Mission sent a party to work among the Ovimbundu. In 1884 the Brethren began their labors in Angola, pioneered by Frederick Arnot. William Taylor brought a party from America and founded the United Methodist Church. Others followed, and some of the largest Protestant communities in Angola today are the fruit of these early pioneers.

Under Portuguese Catholic rule Protestant churches and missionaries experienced some degree of discrimination, although the Constitution allowed freedom of worship. This became worse with the onset of the struggle for independence after 1961 since the leaders of all three nationalist movements were the sons of Protestant church leaders. Many Protestant churches were closed and missionaries were expelled.

When the Portuguese formally withdrew from Angola in 1975, the MPLA, one of three main liberation movements, gained control of the central government with the assistance of Cuban troops, setting up a one-party Marxist state. In the first ten years after independence, Christians suffered considerable persecution; many pastors and believers were martyred and many churches were destroyed. Independence was also followed by almost twenty years of civil war between the MPLA government (backed by the former Soviet Union and Cuba) and UNITA (backed by the United States and South Africa). In 1988 a treaty among Angola, Cuba, and South Africa led to the withdrawal of all foreign troops, a ceasefire between the Angolan government and UNITA, and preparations for multiparty democratic elections in 1992. MPLA won the elections but civil war resumed when UNITA refused to accept the results as valid. In 1995 an agreement to bring UNITA into a government of national unity gave promise of achieving a more lasting peace.

Through all the fiery trials of decades of war, bloodshed, suffering, famine, and hardship the church in Angola has grown rapidly. Bodies include Congregationalists, Christian Brethren, Methodists, Seventh-Day Adventists, and Assemblies of God.

KEVIN ROY

Anguilla (Est. 2000 pop.: 8,000; 91 sq. km. [35 sq. mi.]). An island in the Lesser Antilles. Anguilla’s population is 95 percent Afro-Caribbean. Aridity has kept this member of the British Commonwealth dependent on fishing and tourism, leaving it with one of the lowest per capita incomes in the region. The population is 96 percent Protestant, mainly Anglican and Methodist, of whom 18 percent are evangelical.

EVERETT A. WILSON

See also Caribbean.

Animism. The term “animism” was coined by the early anthropologist E. B. Tylor and defined as belief in spiritual beings. From dreams and death early humans inferred the idea of the soul, Tylor argued. And if humans had souls, then perhaps so did animals, plants, and mountains. From the idea of a soul that survives the death of a body evolved the idea of disembodied spirits, gods, and eventually God. Animists impute human attributes to the world, and religious practice is characterized by attempts to manipulate the physical world to control spirits.

At one level, animism is a term linked to an outdated theory about the primordial core of religion. Yet many anthropologists still use the term. They use it, first, as a synonym for traditional, tribal, folk, or primal religion, as opposed to major world religions. Second, they use the term where religious belief focuses on spirits that interpenetrate the physical material world, and religious practice is characterized by attempts to manipulate the physical world by recourse to spirits and spirits by recourse to the physical world.

ROBERT J. PRIEST

See also Folk Religions; Primal Religions; Spiritism.

Annihilationism

Annihilationism. Proponents of annihilationism maintain that God’s judgment utterly obliterates the wicked. Recently annihilationism has made inroads among evangelicals. These annihilationists dispute the extent of punishment due the sinner. They affirm God’s punishment in hell is eternal in its effects, but not in its length. Sometimes this position is linked with an anthropological view called conditional immortality, which holds that humans have only potential immortality. The issue of annihilationism and hell’s extent has occasioned much debate in recent scholarship. Four major points are in contention.

A Punishment with Eternal Results. Some annihilationists argue that when the Greek adjective for eternal, aïðònios, is used with nouns of action, it refers to an occurrence with eternal results, not an eternal process (Fudge). So “eternal punishment” denotes a punishment that occurs once with everlasting results. But this argument is weak. For “everlasting salvation” (Heb. 5:9) refers not simply to Christ’s work long ago. Scripture describes believers, even in the age to come, as existing “in Christ” (2 Cor. 5:17; Col. 2:6, 7; 2 Tim. 2:10). So aïðònios soteria refers to salvation that is everlasting in action and its result. Similarly, “everlasting punishment” should be interpreted as everlasting in process and result. Confirming this meaning, Jesus uses the same adjective (aïðònios) for eternal life and eternal punishment, indicating that in his mind the extent of each future is identical (Matt. 25:46).

Destruction. Some annihilationists insist that the biblical imagery of destruction and a consuming fire implies the cessation of life (Stott). However, the Greek verb “destroy” (apollumi) and its cognates range in meaning from “lost” (Luke 15:8, 24) to “ruined” (Matt. 9:17). Even when referring to physical death, “destroy” does not suggest extinction; for Jesus cautions that those who kill the body cannot kill the soul (Matt. 10:28). Jesus’ juxtaposing the two destinies of “life” and “destruction” (Matt 7:13–14; John 3:16) is not contrasting survival and extinction. Rather these are two qualitatively different types of life, one involving a loving communion with God and another lacking it and in a state of “ruin” (John 8:12; 10:10; 1 John 5:11–12).

The annihilationists’ argument that fire totally consumes what it burns ignores that Jesus’ portrayal of hell’s fires are not literal descriptions. These are metaphors for God’s retributive punishment (Luke 17:29) which must cohere with the other biblical accounts. Elsewhere Jesus pictures hell as a place where “their worm does not die,” suggesting that this worm is endlessly linked to the damned as their due; so “their worm” has traditionally been interpreted as the soul’s internal torment (Mark 9:48). Other Scriptures explicitly teach that the wicked are punished with “everlasting torment” (Rev. 20:10, 15; 14:10–11).
Annihilationism

_Justice of God._ While acknowledging God's retributive judgment, annihilationists insist that this punishment must be commensurate with the evil deed. Why should sins committed in time require torment throughout eternity? Is not everlasting torment vindictive, and incompatible with the _LOVE OF GOD?_ The punishment due to the sinner is the central challenge of the annihilationists.

Scripture is the norm for delineating the penalty for sin, not our own self-justifying assessments. Scripture identifies Christ's priestly work of _ATONEMENT_ as the penalty necessary for sin. For God in Christ became our substitute to bear the punishment for our sins: "He did this to demonstrate his justice . . . so as to be just and to be the one who justifies those who have faith in Jesus" (Rom. 3:21–26; 2 Cor. 5:21; 1 Peter 2:24). If Christ was only a human, his substitutionary work would suggest that the penalty is simply a finite loss. Suffering a finite penalty as extinction is consistent with that scenario. But Christ was simply not human. God himself was present at the cross establishing this _RECONCILIATION_ by accepting the punishment due us (1 Cor. 2:8). Jesus' priestly work indicates that the penalty for sin against the Infinite is infinite. As Scripture testifies, God's punishment of the damned is infinite, and of everlasting duration.

_Annihilationism's Theological Shift._ Annihilationism does not simply mute hell's horror; it represents an anthropocentric reading which places in motion decisive theological changes. Denying that sin is an infinite offense against the infinite God requiring an infinite punishment undercuts the gravity of humanity's rebellion as well as God's lordship. Just because we are finite does not entail that sin is finite offense. Rather sin's gravity is established by the one to whom we are accountable, God our Creator (Rom. 2:6–16; 1 Peter 4:5). Moreover, rejecting an everlasting hell disparages the cost of our salvation. It renders the sacrifice of the God-man in and of itself unnecessary. Nor is it accidental that in mainline circles annihilationism has historically gone hand in hand with a denial of Jesus' deity (Socinianism and non-universalist liberals). But ultimately annihilationism's anthropocentric focus fails. For historically the commitment to _EVANGELISM_ of even evangelical annihilationist institutions has faltered after the second or third generation. Underemphasizing the importance of hell tends to diminish the motivation for missions.

_TIMOTHY R. PHILLIPS_

_Anointing._ Ritual application of a substance to a person or an object. As well as having diverse secular uses (e.g., cosmetic, aesthetic, medicinal, festive) anointing is almost universal in the history of ancient and modern religions, although the substance used (usually fat, oil, or water) and the details of the cultic practice vary considerably.

In religious contexts anointing has the general purpose of symbolically transferring spiritual or divine presence or power on the anointed object or person. The more specific meaning attributed by its practitioners may be summarized in three distinct, though related, categories. (1) _Healing:_ The physical healing properties of oil often cannot be separated from the magical or supernatural conceptions often associated with anointing since disease is often attributed to the power of malevolent spiritual beings. (2) _Consecration:_ People or objects may be consecrated for a particular sacred purpose or task through anointing, which symbolizes the focusing of divine presence, pleasure, power, or protection. (3) _Ordination:_ Anointing also occurs in many cultures when certain individuals are appointed to positions of prominence and leadership associated with sacred duty.

When used in a religious context, anointing in biblical texts generally falls into these categories. In the Old Testament anointing is at times connected with the Spirit of God (1 Sam. 16:13; Isa. 61:1) and thus the anointing of Israel's priests (Exod. 28:41), kings (1 Sam. 10:1), and prophets (1 Kings 19:16) symbolized their separation for the task and divine empowerment for it. Objects associated with the worship of Yahweh were also consecrated through anointing (Exod. 30:26–29).

The Hebrew title “messiah” (Greek, _christos_ ) means “anointed one” and its New Testament application to Jesus stems from the prophetic tradition associating the coming messiah with King David. Besides references to Jesus, who was anointed by the Holy Spirit (Luke 4:18), the few other religious uses in the New Testament associate anointing with divine healing (James 5:14) and anointing by the Holy Spirit which is true of every Christian (1 John 2:20, 27).

These biblical allusions to anointing have led to its diverse uses in various Christian traditions throughout history. In the Roman Catholic Church it became the sacrament known as “extreme unction” (after Vatican II, “anointing of the sick”) with the intention of effecting remission of sin and restoration of bodily health. In reaction to Roman Catholic practice, Reformation churches have largely suppressed the practice. Perhaps because of the cultural distance of the symbolism, it appears to be less common in culturally Western churches. However, it is more frequent among churches influenced by charismatic and Pentecostal traditions, which emphasize the linkage to the Holy Spirit. Christian churches in non-Western cultures may find anointing more meaningful due to its use in non-Christian religious contexts with which they are familiar as well as their appreciation of anointing in Old Testament contexts, an understanding that stems from similarities to their own cultures. In these situations caution should be exercised so that such practices as the anointing of new church leaders and the sick are biblically (and not just culturally) informed and interpreted.

Scott Cunningham

Anomie. The concept of anomie originated in Emile Durkeim’s Suicide, and was developed by R. K. Merton in Social Theory and Social Structure and later by Peter Berger and Thomas Luckman in The Social Construction of Reality.

Anomie has generally been described as a condition in which values, norms, and worldview that give stability to the individual and collective life break down, and people are left without a sense of self-image, dignity, and social identity. Further dislocation brought about by economic deprivation and the breakdown of traditional society culminate in the consequent loss of traditional values. Social relations and ethical norms are shattered. It has been suggested that a significant majority of the Two-Third World’s poor and displaced people have experienced some degree of anomie—a social reality that leaves them bereft of any meaningful social structure. These conditions, accelerated by rapid demographic and economic change after World War II, provoked crises that forced the displaced masses to grope for solutions to an anomistic existence.

There seems to be little disagreement with the concept of anomie, although the use of the term has become so accepted that it often lacks precision. Further, different contexts may allow considerable latitude in definitions. Though probable, the conclusion generally offered, namely, that anomie leads directly to loss of “self-image, dignity, and social identity,” may apply more to the disintegration of society than to the pathologies of a person. Whether the majority of the world’s poor have experienced anomie depends upon criteria upon which there may not be agreement. For example, many people seem to survive well in the midst of a crisis even though apparently they do not have good reason to feel confident. On the other hand, Durkeim used anomie to show how socially well-established people also suffer from rapid change when, for instance, a family suddenly comes into wealth.

However correct some scholars may have been in relating the rise of religious experience among the masses to emotional and economic crisis, their viewing of the movement as simply a reactionary crutch to deteriorating conditions—a “haven of the masses”—obscures and abuses one of its most characteristic features. Religious conversion is not a negative reaction but rather is an action that results in positive transformation—an antidote in the midst of upheaval that produces a radical shift in worldview. The experience is not a “refuge” from the world but rather a strategy by which to live successfully in the world. The secret of this religious experience in an individual is receiving divine love, resulting in empowerment. The power of love in the struggle for social transformation prompts a resocialization, an adaptation or transformation of the person. The “nonperson,” who hears and receives the message of transformation, personally experiences the reality of an intimate relationship with God in his or her life. Converts are immediately thrust into a loving and caring community. Dignity, value, personal worth, and identity are collectively celebrated. Salvation within the “non-person” culminates in a radical transformation to self-acceptance and self-love. The new believer, who receives spiritual conversion, professes that he or she has been accepted by God and now belongs to the community of love. To be “in Christ” means not just to have received eternal life, but also to have the privilege to be a participant in a loving and caring community. By being incorporated into such a community, the believer regains dignity and self-acceptance and therefore becomes a meaningful participant in the further creation of the community both in individual and corporate terms.

Doug Peterson

Ansgar (801–865). Early French missionary to Sweden. Known for his humility, courage, and initiative, he was born in northwestern France. Displaying serious Christian commitment at an early age, his missionary zeal came most likely from the Corbey monastery, which found spiritual roots in Columban and Irish monasticism (see CELTIC MISSIONARY MOVEMENT). Later he helped found a monastery in Westphalia (New Corbey) for newly converted Saxons, holding the office of preacher and first master.

Ansgar’s first mission was to Denmark (c. 823), accompanying recently baptized King Harald to establish converts in Schleswig. In 829 Swedish officials arrived at the court of Louis the Pious (successor to Charlemagne) asking for missionaries. Ansgar responded, leaving Denmark. He and his companions endured hardships and piracy, eventually arriving in Birka on the island of Björkö in Lake Mälar, west of present-day Stockholm.
Ansgar

Among Ansgar’s first acquaintances were Christian slaves, brought to Sweden from Viking raids. These and others (including members of the royal court) were organized into Ansgar’s first congregation. Ansgar left Sweden to assume the archbishopric of Hamburg. His return to Sweden was delayed nearly twenty years by pagan reactions to Christianity. Upon returning, he reorganized the congregation, later abandoned when commerce moved from Birka to Uppsala. Ansgar’s legacy is that of a harbinger. Although his personal efforts yielded little lasting fruit, Christianity would be established in Sweden some 250 years later with the destruction of the pagan temple at Uppsala.

Steven J. Pierson

Bibliography. K. S. Latourette, The Thousand Years of Uncertainty; R. Murray, A Brief History of the Church of Sweden; Rimbert, Anskar, The Apostle of the North.

Anthropology, Biblical. See Humankind, Doctrine of.

Anthropology, Missiological Anthropology.

The relationship between anthropology and world missions has been a long and profitable one with the benefits flowing both ways. Though for philosophical reasons recent generations of anthropologists have tended to be very critical of missionaries, much of the data used by professional anthropologists from earliest days has come from missionaries. Anthropological pioneers such as E. B. Tylor (1832–1917) and J. G. Frazer (1854–1954) in England, L. H. Morgan (1818–82) in the United States, and Wilhelm Schmidt (1868–1954) in Austria were greatly indebted to missionaries for the data from which they constructed their theories. Such early anthropological pioneers as R. H. Codrington (1830–1922), Lorimer Fison (1832–1907), Diedrich Junod (1863–1934), and Edwin Smith (1876–1957) were missionaries for part or all of their careers.

The first of the numerous Protestant missionary conferences in the English-speaking world to include formal discussion of anthropological matters was the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE in Edinburgh (1910). Roman Catholics led the way on the Continent, sponsoring several workshops on missions and ethnology. A notable center for ethnological research was established in Vienna by Schmidt, who devoted his professional life to researching, teaching, and writing on languages and cultures in order to help missionaries. For this purpose he founded the journal Anthropos in 1906 and the Anthropos Institute in 1932.

Though the influence of professional anthropology on missionaries was small during this era, some impressive anthropological writing by missionaries emerged. Fison with A. W. Howitt published The Kamileroi and the Kurnai, still considered a basic work on Australian aboriginals. Codrington’s Melanesians contributed to anthropology its understanding of mana. Junod’s two-volume Life of a South African Tribe was years later still regarded as one of the finest anthropological monographs. And Schmidt’s twelve-volume study of the origin of religion did much to dissuade the academic community from their commitment to an evolutionary explanation.

The most notable early British advocate for missiological anthropology was Edwin Smith. Born in Africa of missionary parents, Smith for three decades wrote and taught widely on African cultures. His most famous book is The Golden Stool. Two other British missionary anthropologists to note are W. C. Willoughby, who published The Soul of the Bantu, and Denys Shropshire, who wrote The Church and Primitive Peoples.

In America, with the exception of Hartford Seminary Foundation’s Kennedy School of Missions, where Willoughby taught from 1919 and Smith lectured from 1939 to 1943, little was done to provide anthropological instruction for missionaries before World War II. Wheaton College (Illinois) had begun an anthropology department, and the Wycliffe Bible Translators’ Summer Institute of Linguistics, though primarily focused on linguistics, was serving to alert many to the need to take culture seriously.

Though Gordon Hedderly Smith had published The Missionary and Anthropology in 1945, it was Eugene Nida who sparked the movement to make anthropology a major component in missionary thinking. He used his position as secretary for translations of the American Bible Society to demonstrate to missionaries and their leaders the value of anthropological insight. His lectures on anthropological topics in the 1940s and early 1950s, published as Customs and Cultures in 1954, contributed greatly to an awakening within the missionary community to the need for and benefits of anthropological insight. By the mid-1950s Nida had surrounded himself at the Bible society with four very perceptive, anthropologically oriented translation consultants, W. A. Smalley, W. D. Reyburn, W. L. Wonderly, and J. A. Loewen. As these men worked with translators around the world, they demonstrated the value of anthropology. In 1955, Smalley took over the editorship of the bimonthly journal PRACTICAL ANTHROPOLOGY (PA), which Robert Taylor had started in 1953 at Wheaton with the aim of applying anthropology to missions. The writings of Nida, Smalley, Reyburn, Wonderly, and Loewen in PA were formative for a generation of anthropologically oriented missionaries working in the 1950s and 1960s.
Anthropology, Missiological Anthropology

From 1965 on, another stream of missiological anthropology was developing under DONALD McGAVRAN at Fuller Seminary’s School of World Mission. McGavran’s first faculty appointee was ALAN TIPPETT, an Australian anthropologist who had worked for two decades in Fiji. The Nida stream merged with this stream under McGavran’s next two appointees, RALPH WINTER and Charles Kraft, both anthropologists strongly influenced by Nida and the other PA contributors. These events of the 1950s and 1960s laid the foundations for validating missiological anthropology within the professional subdiscipline of applied anthropology. Important publications of the 1960s included Nida’s Message and Mission and LOUIS LUZBETAK’s Church and Cultures, which focused helpfully on the dynamics of cultural change. Tippett’s Solomon Islands Christianity showed how competent anthropology could be used to analyze Christian witness and practice. KENNETH PIKE’s Language in Relation to a Unified Theory of the Structure of Human Behavior, though long and technical, contributed important insights concerning the relationships of language and culture. Many of the PA articles were collected by Smalley in Readings in Missionary Anthropology, which was followed by Culture and Human Values, a collection of perceptive articles by Loewen.

In 1973, PA, then edited by Charles Taber, an anthropologist teaching at Emmanuel School of Religion, was merged into Missiology, the fledgling journal of the newly formed AMERICAN SOCIETY OF MISSIOLOGY. Tippett became the first editor. This journal has maintained a strong focus on anthropology.

Currently, anthropology plays an important part in the majority of missionary training programs in evangelical institutions. The primary attention of missiological anthropology is directed toward understanding the nature of culture and the pervasiveness of its influence on those we approach with the gospel. A second concern is to understand the influence of culture on the missionaries themselves. To this has been added the recognition that since the Bible is a cross-cultural book, those who would understand and interpret it correctly need cultural insight. The articles in PA provided understanding of these and many other important areas.

Over the years, missiological anthropology has sometimes followed the vogue of secular anthropology, sometimes resisted them. Missionary anthropologists have found congenial such secular anthropological insights as the focus on specific cultures, the strengths of research based on participant observation, certain aspects of the functionalist emphasis on the internal workings of culture, the dynamics of cultural change, and the necessity to understand WORLDVIEW. On the other hand, certain secular emphases have stirred up the opposition of Christian anthropologists. Among them are the overextension of evolutionary and relativistic thinking. Early on, one of Schmidt’s motivations was to combat the simplistic evolutionary theory concerning the origin and development of religion. His Origin of the Idea of God was so successful that most secular anthropologists dropped the theory. Christians have not been so successful in convincing the anthropological establishment that though certain aspects of evolutionary and relativistic thinking make sense, they need to be balanced by the recognition that someone started things and established certain absolutes.

There are four general areas in which the insights of anthropology are enabling greater effectiveness in Christian ministry. First, the two-way flow of influence between missiological anthropology and BIBLE TRANSLATION continues to be significant, especially in the United States. Nida has had a lot to do with this. A second significant application of anthropology relates to the influences of culture on the communication process. Nida’s pioneering Message and Mission brought this topic forcefully to our attention. MARVIN MAYERS, a Wycliffe translator who taught at Wheaton and later at Biola, both highlighted and broadened this theme in his important book Christianity Confronts Culture. A third important area of application is the contextualization or in-culturation of Christianity. Kraft in Christianity in Culture creatively used linguistic and Bible translation theory as well as basic anthropology and COMMUNICATION theory to produce a cross-cultural perspective on theology. This book did much to show both that an anthropological approach can positively influence theologizing and that CONTEXTUALIZATION should be an evangelical issue, not merely an ecumenical theory. A fourth important area presently in focus is that of WORLDVIEW.

In addition, we should mention Homer Barnett’s psychological anthropology and especially his ideas on cultural change, which have had a strong influence on Tippett and Luzbetak. More recently, the symbolic anthropology of Clifford Geertz and Mary Douglas has influenced the perspectives of Paul Hiebert and Sherwood Lingenfelter. Important recent books by missiological anthropologists include Tippett’s Introduction to Missiology, Darrell Whiteman’s Melanesians and Missionaries, Hiebert’s Anthropological Insights for Missionaries and Anthropological Reflections on Missiological Issues, Daniel Shaw’s Transculturation (1988), Lingenfelter’s Transforming Culture (1992) and Agents of Transformation (1996), Hiebert and Eloise Meneses’ Incarnational Ministry (1995) and Kraft’s Anthropology for Christian Witness (1996). A lifetime of dealing with the Bible in cross-cultural perspective is summarized in Jacob Loewen’s masterful The Bible in Cross-Cultural Perspective (1997).
Anthropology, Missiological Anthropology

CHARLES H. KRAFT

Anthropology of Religion. The anthropological study of religion is related to the sociological, psychological, and comparative studies of religions. Its unique contribution lies in its data—mainly the study of non-Western tribal and folk religions—and its use of in-depth ethnographic descriptions and cross-cultural comparisons. Anthropological studies of religion fall broadly into four periods, each characterized by particular questions and theories.

Evolutionary Theories of Religion. Like medieval Christian theologians, nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century anthropologists sought to account for religions in a single comprehensive history, but unlike theologians they did so in naturalistic terms. They postulated the evolution of religion from simple animistic beliefs and practices to the complex religions of the present. They attributed this to the growth of human rationality, and divided it into three stages—animistic, metaphysical/philosophical, and scientific. Central to their debate were two questions: what were the origins of religion, and what role did it play in the evolution of human thought?

E. B. Tylor (1871) attributed the origins to an early belief in spirit beings that arose when primitive humans, reflecting on the nature of dreams and death, concluded that humans have invisible souls which leave the body and wander to distant places. Later they extended this notion of spirit or soul to animals, plants, and even inanimate objects. From a belief in spirits, Tylor argued, it is only a small step to belief in the “continuance” of these spirits beyond death in an after-world, their “embodiment” in objects, their “possession” of living persons, and the existence of powerful “high gods.” Robert Marett argued that belief in spirits was preceded by a stage in which humans experienced a sense of awe at the great forces of nature, and came to believe in a mysterious impersonal power or mana. Sir James Frazer (1922) posited that religious beliefs are rooted in prelogical beliefs in magic based on two mistaken notions of causality, namely, that of similarity (pouring water produces rain), and contagion (acts performed on one part of a person’s body, such as hair clippings, affects that person). Cultural evolutionists took religious beliefs seriously, but discounted these as prelogical and metaphysical attempts to understand the universe, which, in time, would be displaced by rational, empirical science.

Opposition to evolutionary theories of religion came from two quarters. In Vienna, Father Wilhelm Schmidt of the Kulturkreis School of Anthropology showed from missionary reports that most simple societies believe in an all-powerful creator God, a belief evolutionists attributed only to advanced universalistic religions. In the United States Franz Boas and his students called for empirically based history to replace the “armchair speculation” that had characterized evolutionary theories.

The theory of cultural evolution influenced the modern mission movement in several ways. First, many missionaries assumed the superiority of Western civilization and peoples. Members of other races might share in their goodness and wisdom, but Westerners were the leaders and would remain so for a very long time. Missionaries considered their task to be to “civilize” and “Christianize” the people they served. They built schools and hospitals alongside churches, and saw science as essentially a part of the curriculum as the gospel. This equation of the gospel with Western culture made the gospel unnecessarily foreign in other cultures.

Second, many missionaries saw traditional religions, with their fear of spirits, witchcraft, and magical powers, as animistic superstitions, and assumed that these would die out as people accepted Christianity and science. They saw little need to study these religions. Consequently, many of the old beliefs went underground because the missionaries had not dealt with them or provided Christian answers to the problems they addressed. Today these underground beliefs are resurfacing around the world and creating havoc in young churches (see also Animism).

Social-Functional Approaches to Religion. During the period between the World Wars, anthropologists were heavily influenced by sociology which held that social phenomena, like natural phenomena, obey laws discoverable by empirical observation and human reason. Emile Durkheim (1915) argued that religion plays a vital role in maintaining cohesion and moral order in a society. He saw religion as a set of symbols that refer not to supernatural beings, but to the society itself. Gods, spirits, and other religious symbols represent segments of a society, or its whole. By ordering these symbols in rituals, the social order is affirmed; and by declaring these symbols sacred, the authority of the society is validated, and the egocentric impulses of individuals that threaten to destroy it are suppressed. As individuals participate in religious rituals, they affirm their place in and subordination to the society. Religions, therefore, serve vital positive functions in maintaining societies, but their explicit beliefs cannot be taken as true statements about the nature of reality, or even of how the people view reality.

The central question social anthropologists asked was, What functions do religions serve in a society? In England A. R. Radcliffe-Brown, who studied tribal religion in Sri Lanka, R. F. Fortune, who studied sorcery among the Dubu, and Raymond Firth, who investigated the ritual cycle of the Tikopia, believed that religions help maintain social cohesion and order by declaring sacred those things that were directly or indirectly essential for their survival.

Bronislaw Malinowski (1935) went a step further. He refused to treat people as anonymous individuals trapped in social webs and their ideas as merely social projections, and recognized the importance of religious beliefs qua beliefs. All people, he said, have folk sciences by which they seek to meet their human needs through understanding of how the world works. Religion and magic, he noted, are rational responses to the universally experienced emotions of stress that arise when these sciences fail. The difference between religion and magic is one of purpose. Magic is utilitarian and instrumental. It is used to influence events such as unforeseen calamities that are beyond normal human control. Religion, on the other hand, is an end unto itself. It provides people with an explanation for suffering, crisis, and death, and thereby assures them that the world is indeed orderly and meaningful. Malinowski argued that we must understand the world as the people see it to understand why they act as they do.

Social anthropology has had a deep impact on missions in recent years. Earlier, mission leaders used geography to order their strategies. Missionaries went to India, Africa, or other ‘countries,’ and divided these into ‘mission fields.’ Donald McGavran, Peter Wagner, and the CHURCH GROWTH MOVEMENT showed how social dynamics play a major role in the growth and organization of the church. They introduced concepts such as homogeneous groups (see HOMOGENEOUS UNIT PRINCIPLE), people movements (see MASS MOVEMENTS), and RECEP TIVITY/resistance. The Unreached People movement shifted mission strategies based on geography to ones based on social organization (see PEOPLES, PEOPLE GROUPS). Both were in danger, however, of social reductionism, where success is based merely on understanding and applying social principles and measured largely in quantitative terms.

American Historical Approaches to Religion.

A second theoretical challenge to the theory of cultural evolution emerged in North America, and came to be known as American historicism. It was pioneered by Franz Boas (1858–1942), A. L. Kroeber (1876–1960), and their disciples. They studied the North American Indians whose cultures had been shattered and who were now living largely on reservations. Their central questions had to do with religious change, and their chief contributions were a series of historical accounts of nativistic and messianic movements that often emerge where traditional peoples are overrun by modernity. Ralph Linton studied the Ghost Dance of the North American Indians, and Glen Cochrane the Cargo Cults of Melanesia. From such studies A. F. C. Wallace (1956) developed a broad theory explaining these revitalization movements. American anthropologists were also influenced by Sigmund Freud, who saw religion as a projection of authority figures, and William James, who examined the personal emotional dimension of religion.

The American school influenced missions through the writings of Alan Tippett, Louis Luzbetak, Jacob Loewen, and other missiologists dealing with CONVERSION and religious change, and through the work of Harold Turner and those studying the African Independent Churches (see AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCH MOVEMENT) and other new emerging religious movements (see NEW RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS).

Symbolic and Cognitive Anthropology. Before World War II, some anthropologists rejected the reduction of religion to social dynamics, and argued we must take religious beliefs seriously as beliefs because they are what people believe to be the true nature of reality. Their central question was how religions give humans a sense of meaning.

L. Levy-Bruhl (1926) saw primal religions as reflections of a “primitive mentality” which has its own rationality, one that is radically different from that of modern science. Primitive logic, he argued, is mystical, and governed by emotions, dreams, and notions about supernatural entities. John Taylor (1963) captured this approach in his study of African religions. These scholars overestimate the rationality of Western thought, and ignore the fact that in much of their lives, all people use natural common sense.

E. E. Evans-Pritchard also moved from “function to meaning” in his study of magic and witchcraft among the Azande (1937) and Nuer (1940) of Africa. He argued that the Azande have sound empirical knowledge of nature which they distinguish from the ‘mystical’ workings of magic and witchcraft, and that the latter are rational systems of thought, given the assumptions the Azande have about the world. He held that cosmological beliefs provide people with their categories of thought, and noted that tribal religions are this-worldly religions concerned with “abundant life and fullness of years.”

Edmund Leach, Mary Douglas, Victor Turner, and Claude Lévi-Strauss opened the door further to cognitive structural approaches to the study of religion. Douglas (1966) argues that religions create symbolic systems about purity and pollution, sacred and profane that reflect and reinforce so-
Anthropology of Religion

Sociocultural orders, Victor Turner (1974) analyzed the structure of religious rituals and showed how they serve as boundary markers, setting off various types of social reality and transforming persons from one status to another (see also Rites of Passage). Lévi-Strauss (1966) affirmed that behind the empirical diversity of religions, human minds are fundamentally the same everywhere. He contended that religion, like science, provides humans with a sense of meaning by mentally ordering the world in which they live, and that this meaning is generated by the universal unconscious processes of the human mind.

Social and symbolic approaches examine the underlying structures of religions, but do not study the content of their beliefs. Taking a problem-solving approach, Clifford Geertz argues that religion provides answers to three fundamental human experiences that threaten to make life meaningless: the problem of bafflement when human explanation systems fail, the problem of suffering and death, and the problem of injustice or feeling of moral disorder and chaos. Religion answers these by appealing to higher realities outside of daily experience. Robin Horton (1964) goes further and examines the content of African religious beliefs. He sees them as theoretical models of reality, like those of science, but that they transcend the everyday world of common sense. Daryl Forde, Marcel Griaule, and others show that religions are philosophical systems that shape peoples’ worldviews.

Symbolic and cognitive anthropology has much to contribute to missions, most of which has yet to be mined. These approaches take traditional religions seriously, and help us to provide religious responses to the questions Folk Religions ask rather than ignoring them as superstitions. They help us understand the importance of rituals (see RITUAL AND CEREMONY) and myths (see MYTH, MYTHOLOGY) in religious life, and the importance for missionaries influenced by the modern denigrating of these to rediscover their importance in the life of the church. However, while taking the religious beliefs of people seriously, most intellectualists fail to raise the ontological question of the truth of these religious beliefs. It is here that Christian anthropologists must go beyond the current approaches, and lead in new ways of studying religions.

Paul G. Hiebert

Antigua and Barbuda (Est. 2000 pop.: 68,000; 442 sq. km [171 sq. mi.]). Antigua, an arid, volcanic Caribbean island, and nearby Barbuda, a coraline island, formed a British dependency of nearly 100,000 inhabitants until it became independent in 1981. The inhabitants rely on tourism and light industry. The population of the two islands, 98 percent Afro-Caribbean, is in large part nominally Protestant, of whom 12 percent are evangelical.

Everett A. Wilson

See also Caribbean.

Apartheid. See Ethnocentrism.

Apologetics. Definitions and Distinctions. In a general sense apologetics (from the Greek apologia, “a defense”) can be understood as the defense of the distinctive beliefs or practices of a particular religious tradition against criticisms from those outside that tradition. As such, apologetics can be found among a variety of religions and usually occurs when a particular religious tradition is confronted with different religious or nonreligious perspectives that call into question some of the central beliefs, values, and practices of that tradition. Although the term is usually associated today with Christianity, the history and literature of Judaism, Islam, Hinduism, and Buddhism are replete with examples of apologetics directed at alternative religious and philosophical perspectives.

Christian apologetics is the response of the Christian community to criticisms of the truth-claims about God, human beings, sin, salvation, and Jesus Christ, which are said to apply to all people in all cultures at all times. This inevitably brings Christian faith into conflict with alternative worldviews that assume quite different beliefs. The history of Christian missions is in part the story of very different peoples worldwide coming to modify their worldviews and to accept central Christian beliefs as true. An integral element in this process has been successful Christian apologetics, which helps people eliminate obstacles to belief and resolve questions of doubt.

Theoretical apologetics, or “problem solving” apologetics, is concerned with the objective justification of the Christian faith irrespective of any human response. The purpose here is to answer satisfactorily certain fundamental questions about the truth of the Christian worldview: How do we acquire religious knowledge? Can we know whether God exists, and if so, how? Are the Scriptures a reliable revelation from God? Did Jesus in fact rise from the dead? Discussion on this level involves highly technical issues in disciplines such as philosophy, history, archaeology, the sciences, biblical criticism, and so on.

Applied apologetics, or apologetics as “persuasion,” is very much concerned with human response to the proclamation of the gospel. It actively seeks to persuade others to accept Christian faith as true. Applied apologetics involves appropriate and culturally sensitive justification procedures and data in the actual defense of the truth-claims of Christianity to a particular target audience. Effective applied apologetics must be creative, flexible, and sensitive to the distinctives of each audience. Applied apologetics builds on theoretical apologetics; answers to questions raised on the applied level (How can I be sure that God really exists?) are logically dependent upon answers to corresponding questions on the theoretical level (does God exist?). But applied apologetics is person- and culture-specific in a way that theoretical apologetics is not. The kinds of issues raised in an Islamic context will differ from those emerging from Buddhist or post-Christian secularist contexts. Appropriate levels of sophistication in apologetic response will vary with individuals, depending on educational background. Appropriate means of persuasion will also vary with cultures; vigorous public debates on religious issues might be acceptable in one culture but counterproductive in others.

A further distinction is often made between positive (offensive) and negative (defensive) apologetics. Negative apologetics is primarily concerned with responding to direct attacks on the Christian faith, showing that the criticism is unjustified. Positive apologetics goes beyond merely responding to attacks and attempts to demonstrate that the unbeliever also ought to accept the claims of Christianity as true. Positive apologetics tries to show that there is adequate reason or justification for accepting the truth-claims of Christianity.

Theological Guidelines. Some biblical guidelines for apologetics should be noted. Scripture teaches that the mind and thinking processes are tainted by sin, and that the mind is used to distort what we know to be true about God (Rom. 1:18–20; 1 Cor. 1:14; 4:4). But the effects of sin should not be exaggerated. For even the unregenerate retain the image of God and can know some things to be true about God (Rom. 1:19–21).

Furthermore, the essential role of the Holy Spirit in effective apologetics must be acknowledged. Apologetics, just like evangelism, is ineffective apart from the work of the Holy Spirit on the heart (1 Cor. 12:3; Titus 3:5–6). It is the Holy Spirit who convicts of sin, removes spiritual blindness, and produces new birth (John 3:3–8; 16:8–11; 1 Cor. 2:14–16). But this does not make apologetics unnecessary any more than it renders evangelism optional. Although ultimately it is the Holy Spirit who produces confidence in the truth of the gospel within the believer (Rom. 8:16; 1 John 3:24; 4:13), the Spirit uses various means in bringing about this conviction of truth. By removing obstacles to belief and also showing positive grounds for belief, apologetics can be used by the Spirit to produce confidence in the gospel.

Scripture indicates that appeal to evidential factors in support of the truth-claims of Christian faith is legitimate. The examples of the Old Testament prophets, our Lord Jesus Christ, and the apostles all illustrate appropriate use of evidential factors in support of one’s claims. When challenged on his authority to forgive sins Jesus responded by providing visible evidence of his authority in healing the paralytic (Mark 2:1–12). Paul frequently appealed to various forms of evidence in support of his claim that Jesus was the Messiah (Acts 9:22; 13:16–41; 17:2–3, 22–31) and the bodily resurrection of Jesus (1 Cor. 15:3–19).

Apologetics is not the same thing as Evangelism. Evangelism, understood as the COMMUNICATION of the gospel of Jesus Christ, has a certain priority over apologetics. But where appropriate, evangelism should be supplemented by an informed and sensitive response to criticisms and questions, demonstrating why the unbeliever ought to accept the gospel as truth. Both apologetics and evangelism should be conducted with much prayer and conscious reliance on the Holy Spirit.

Christian theologians do not agree on the nature of appropriate Christian apologetics. Virtually all thinkers would accept that negative apologetics is appropriate and necessary; erroneous views should be refuted and specific criticisms of Christianity should be answered. But not all theologians endorse positive apologetics. For some, any attempt to demonstrate the truth of the Christian faith is to subject God and his revelation to a higher norm for truth and thus must be rejected. God’s self-revelation is held to be self-authenticating and in need of no external corroboration. Others regard this position to be epistemologically confused and contend that this view ultimately reduces to a cognitive relativism that is incapable of either justifying its own claim to truth or rejecting alternative perspectives as false.

Apologetics and Missions. Apologetics has a long, if not always distinguished, history in Christian missions. The early church produced some brilliant apologists (Justin, Tertullian, Clement, and later Augustine) who effectively addressed criticisms arising from Hellenistic culture and Roman paganism. During the twelfth through fifteenth centuries writers such as Peter the Venerable and Raymond Lull wrote significant apologetic works directed against Islam. Thomas Aquinas' enormously influential Summa contra gentiles was intended in part to be a training manual for Christian missionaries among Muslims in Spain. Matteo Ricci in seventeenth-century China produced impressive and effective writings directed to the cultural elite influenced by Confucianism. Nineteenth-century Protestants such as W. A. P. Martin in China and Joseph Edkins in Japan wrote influential works defending Christianity and raising questions about opposing perspectives.
Apologetics

Some issues have been of perennial concern throughout various cultures and times. The problem of evil/suffering, for example, is a classic problem for apologetics, which finds expression in writings from ancient Hellenism as well as in Hindu, Confucian, and Buddhist critiques of Christianity. The Renaissance and Enlightenment in Europe placed a new set of issues on the table. Christian apologetics in the West in the past three centuries has been dominated by the post-Enlightenment agenda, focusing on issues such as the existence of God, faith and reason, the relation between science and Scripture, the question of miracles, the resurrection of Jesus, and the reliability of Scripture. Given the increasingly global spread of Modernity and Secularization, non-Western churches will need to develop appropriate responses to these issues as well. However, each culture also presents a unique set of challenges to the gospel. Thus Christian communities in various cultures will need to study their own cultures, discern the particular challenges to Christian faith that arise within those contexts, and respond in a biblically sound and culturally appropriate manner to those issues.

A particularly urgent problem facing the church worldwide is the increasingly vigorous attack on the Christian claim to the uniqueness and sufficiency of Jesus Christ as the only savior for all humankind. Resurgence of the great religions of Islam, Hinduism, and Buddhism, combined with a sense of nationalism and anti-Western sentiment, has made the exclusive claims of Christianity highly problematical in many cultures today. The West itself is increasingly characterized by ethnic and religious diversity. Such pluralization, combined with growing disenchantment with Christianity in the West and increased relativism in ethical and religious matters, makes religious Pluralism an extremely attractive ideology. Thus, whether in the West or in non-Western contexts, the church must be prepared to show why it can claim that in Jesus alone can we find the Way, the Truth, and the Life (John 14:6).

Harold A. Netland

Apostasy. The deliberate abandonment of the beliefs and practices of a religion by one who was formerly an adherent. The concept entered Christianity through Judaism, where Old Testament examples of individuals (2 Chron. 29:19) and corporate Israel (Jer. 2:1–9) turning from Yahweh are found.

The New Testament contains examples of apostasy and warnings against it. Judas is the prime example, but others are also named (1 Tim. 1:19–20; 2 Tim. 4:10). In the "warning passages" the writer of Hebrews reminds the readers of the consequences of apostasy (6:4–8; 10:26).

Missionaries today likewise reckon with the possibility of apostasy among converts, a possibility often aggravated by persecution or false teachers. In this context the church must wrestle with a number of different issues, most of which have been given a variety of instructive responses during the early history of the church.

What is essential to Christianity such that its denial indicates a denial of the faith? How far can one depart before becoming apostate? Apostasy should be distinguished from heresy in both kind and degree, although in practice the line is not always easily drawn. Heresy is denial of one or more tenets of the faith while still claiming to be Christian, whereas apostasy is a total rejection of the faith itself. Apostasy should also be distinguished from a temporary lapse in faith such as that manifested by the apostle Peter's denials (Matt. 26:31–35, 69–75).

How should apostasy be theologically understood? Is it possible for a true believer to cease to believe and fall from salvation? Calvinists point to God's purpose and power to preserve his chosen (John 6:37–39; 10:28–29) and to the eternal nature of regeneration in support of the view that the apostate has not lost his or her salvation, but was rather never genuinely saved in the first place. Apostasy reveals the unbelief earlier masked by an outward profession and association with the believing community (cf. Judas, Matt. 7:21–23; 1 John 2:19). Others point to the biblical warnings against departure, scriptural examples, and anecdotal evidence in saying that an apostate actually loses his or her salvation.

Once apostatized, is restoration possible? This question was important to the church in its first several centuries due to intense persecution and frequent apostasy. In the early church restoration was only possible beginning in the third century and then only through conditions of penitence. Before that time apostasy was usually considered unpardonable. Church leaders sometimes made distinctions among apostates, such as between those who apostatized voluntarily and those who did so under compulsion.

How should apostates be treated by the faithful? In the Reformation period both Catholics and Protestants used civil power to punish those charged with apostasy. However, it later became widely accepted that persuasion rather than coercion was the Christian ideal.

Missionaries working among Muslims give special consideration to Islam’s law of apostasy in understanding the spirit of intolerance and persecution and the consequent fear of conversion to Christianity. The general dictum of Muslim tradition is, “He that adopts any other religion shall be put to death.”

SCOTT CUNNINGHAM

Apostle, Apostles. The numerous appearances of the word apostle in the New Testament compared with its relative absence from all other literary sources can be traced in part to its intimate relationship to the mission of the early church. The New Testament writers, especially Luke and Paul, picked up on Jesus’ rare usage of the word to give importance to the missionary dynamic of the church. Apostle is almost synonymous with mission. The word is primarily used of the twelve men chosen by Jesus to accompany him and of Paul the missionary to the Gentiles. These, along with a small number of other apostles, were vanguard missionaries as the gospel moved from Jewish particularism to multicultural universalism.

According to the Synoptic Gospels, Acts, and the Epistles, Jesus specifically designated at least these thirteen people to be his apostles. The Twelve came out of Jesus’ own sociocultural context, accompanying him on his mission to the Jews (Matt. 10:1–2; 15:24; John 20:21). One of the Twelve abandoned his apostolic office and was replaced by Matthias (Acts 1:16–26). Jesus chose a thirteenth apostle a few years after his ascension to continue Jesus’ mission. The Twelve functioned to authenticate Jesus’ mission and message of the inclusion of the Gentiles (Gal. 2:1–10; Acts 1:16–26); Paul was chosen especially to implement and clarify the mission to the Gentiles.

Biblical Study of Apostleship. Apostle (apostolos) is defined by its use in the New Testament and its relationship to the three words apostello, pempro, and the Twelve. Apostello (“to send”) is used frequently in the Gospels, Acts, and the Epistles when referring to an authoritative commission. John never uses the word in a formal sense; rather, he uses the words apostello and pempro as synonymous terms describing Jesus’ authoritative mission and commissioning (John 20:21).

Apostlos is used eighty times in the New Testament and rarely used outside the New Testament. Josephus used it only once in any comparative sense. Eighty-six percent of these 80 occurrences are found in the writings of Paul (35x) and Luke (34x). The 11 other uses are found throughout the New Testament.

The word apostle is indebted to the Hebrew term shaliach. A shaliach, as used by the Jews, was someone sent by one party to another to handle negotiations concerning matters secular (such as marriage) or matters religious (such as liturgical decisions between Jerusalem and the diaspora). But the universal mission of Jesus determined the precise New Testament definition and prominence of the term.

The New Testament use of apostle arose out of the need to authenticate a mission that reversed the particularistic nature of salvation history. This definition would stress (1) the relationship to Jesus and his incarnation, and (2) the Christian’s participation in extending the mission begun by Jesus.

In its broadest sense the word apostle can refer to a church sending members on a mission (1 Cor. 8:23; Phil. 2:23; Acts 14:4, 14). This mission can include preaching the gospel, raising money, or ministering to another missionary. The number of those included in this broader sense are unknown.

Apostles and Mission in Paul. From a literary and theological standpoint, the first definition of apostle can be traced to Paul’s writings. He uses the word throughout his writings (35x), with its usage concentrated in 23 references in Romans (3x), 1 Corinthians (10x), 2 Corinthians (7x), and Galatians (3x). Paul’s polemical use of this term can be traced to his Gentile mission (Rom. 1:5; 11:13; Gal. 1–2). The radical nature of Paul’s preaching elicited opposition from Jews within and outside the church. How was Paul going to legitimate his mission and message? He was compelled to clarify his own special calling and commission. Thus, Paul’s use of the term apostle was fundamentally missiological.

Paul’s nonpolemical and even general use of this term in 1 Thessalonians 2:6, when compared with its use in his other early Epistles, shows the extent to which his use of the term is tied to his need to authenticate his mission. Paul allowed for a general use of the word apostle while clearly defending a technical use for an exclusive few. While he calls a number of people apostles, he sees the Twelve (1 Cor. 15:3) and himself (Gal. 1:1) as apostles in a special sense.

Paul’s use of apostle in his discussion of his mission to the Gentiles shows the direct relationship between apostle and mission. The Twelve and Paul were responsible for clarifying the nature of the church’s mission (Gal. 2:1–10). Jesus specifically chose the Twelve to extend his mis-mission into the Jewish world and authenticate the Gentile mission. Paul's personal mission was to implement, defend, and clarify the mission to the Gentiles. Even when Paul stresses the revelational dimensions of the word apostle, the missiological implications remain prominent (Eph. 3:1–13).
Apostle, Apostles

Luke's view of apostleship as seen in Acts is rooted primarily in his missiology and only secondarily in his ecclesiology. The decision of the 120 in choosing an apostolic replacement for Judas is the central event between the ascension and Pentecost (1:12–26). Why does this decision on an apostolic replacement occupy such a prominent place in Luke's narrative? Luke accentuates its importance by giving the qualification and the definition of an apostle and by recording only this event between the ascension and Pentecost (1:21–25). An apostle is defined as someone who has followed Jesus from the time of John the Baptist until the resurrection. Second, his function is to bear witness to the resurrection (cf. Acts 1:15–26 with 1 Cor. 9:1ff.; 15:7–11).

The following conclusions can be drawn from Acts 1:15–26. The apostles are twelve in number; they must have accompanied Jesus since the time of his baptism; and their basic function is witnessing about the resurrection. Judas' betrayal of Christ and abandonment of his office were prophesied in the Old Testament. Second, God directed the entire electoral process, even in the casting of lots (24–26). Third, Matthias is “chosen” just as the eleven were (Acts 1:2, 13). These twelve Spirit-filled apostles chosen by Jesus will extend the mission begun by Jesus.

But why is it so important that Luke establish the apostolic Twelve as a unique group and what relationship does this have to the mission to the Gentiles? Luke's definition of apostleship is found in the context of his overall purpose in writing a two-volume narrative of early Christianity. For Luke, the inclusion of the Gentiles takes place, not as an aberration involving some marginal Christians, but through an unbroken procession that begins with Jesus and continues through the Hellenists and Paul. Luke wants to establish these twelve apostles chosen by Jesus as successors of Jesus, thus legitimizing the Gentile mission.

These twelve lay the foundation of the mission in their ministry in Jerusalem. They, then, confirm the strategic ministry of the Hellenists (Acts 6:1–7; 8:14–14). Peter's paradigmatic mission to the Gentiles reflects the nature of the church (Acts 10:1–11:18; 15:1–35; 16:4). All other witnesses who come after them are part of this chain of events that results in the inclusion of the Gentiles. The apostles' strategic role in salvation history is both missiological and ecclesiological. Out of their missionary ministry arises a church whose fundamental calling is to constantly push forward into those areas where the gospel has yet to be heard.

Luke's use of the word apostle for Paul (14:4, 14) merits a brief comment. In both of these instances Barnabas is equally linked with Paul, and in one instance (v. 14) the order of their names is reversed. Luke, like Paul, uses apostles in a secondary sense, that is, Barnabas and Paul are apostles of the Antiochene church. Does Luke's failure to call Paul an apostle in the primary sense indicate some tension between Paul's definition and Luke's? For Luke the Twelve are unique (with this Paul agrees, 1 Cor. 15:9; Gal. 2:1–10), but Paul receives even greater prominence in Acts than do they. Paul's authority, mission, and effectiveness are, if anything, superior to those of the Twelve. But for Luke each has a special role to play in world evangelization.

Summary and Conclusion. The early church found in the word apostle a key concept for describing the unique nature of its mission. But it was Paul and Luke in particular who unpacked this term and left us with a rich theology of apostleship. An apostle is a person who was with Jesus during his incarnation (a Lukan concept), witnessed his resurrection, and participated in authenticating and engaging in worldwide missions.

While Paul and Luke have unique developments of apostleship, both agree that the twelve apostles chosen by Jesus became missionaries to the Jews and laid the foundation for a mission to the nations. Both Luke and Paul agree that Paul had a unique role in this mission. Paul's preference would be to use the term apostle to describe his authority and mission. Although Luke uses this for Paul only in a secondary sense, he would readily agree with Paul that his mission and calling are unique. The word apostle may be used in this secondary sense today, yet not without clarifying its meaning.

There is, then, a fundamental relationship between the concept of apostleship and the mission to the world. Any definition of the term apostle that neglects its missiological dimensions has missed a central ingredient, without which the term loses some of its dynamic.

Harold E. Dollar

Archives, Mission. See Mission Libraries.

Argentina (Est. 2000 pop.: 36,648,000; 2,780,400 sq. km. [1,073,512 sq. mi.]). A nation with a strong European culture, nominally Roman Catholic (85%), but with a sizable minority of Protestants (8%), and an important Jewish community, Argentina occupies a long stretch in South America, sharing borders with Chile (West); Bolivia and Paraguay (North); Brazil and Uruguay (Northeast).

One of the most remarkable features of Argentina’s religious history has been the endurance and the stability of the Roman Catholic Church. Throughout the colonial period (to 1810), the Church remained unchallenged and monolithic in its dominance of public religion. Church officials breathed the spirit of the Roman religion into the structures of the Spanish colonial administration, and Catholic cultural hegemony became an inevitable fact of life. Three centuries thus passed between the beginning of Roman Catholic evangelization and the introduction of Protestant Christianity. Apart from isolated cases, Protestant penetration did not begin until the first third of the nineteenth century.

The advance of liberal ideas from France and the growing political and economic influence of the Anglo-American powers fostered such penetration. These liberals saw in Protestantism an ally with which to confront the regalist and clerical order inherited from Spain, and looked to the Protestant countries as their political models. With the struggles between church and state that followed independence, the power of the Roman Catholic Church began to wane and Protestantism made inroads into Argentina. During this period (1810–50), Roman Catholic relations with the state were marked by acrimony. The Church lost the support of the state, which sought to restrict the religious sphere of influence by introducing civil registration and marriage, secularized cemeteries, abolishing tithes, and expropriating the Church’s lands. In spite of these troubles, however, Catholicism retained the loyalty of the masses and the Church continued to have structural links with the state.

Because it was thus planted in a culturally hostile environment, Protestantism grew very slowly during the first decades of its presence. It appeared in the country via three routes. At the beginning, it was an importation brought by European immigrants who came to the country as part of the colonizing efforts on liberal governments. Leaders such as Domingo F. Sarmiento saw in Protestantism an ally against ignorance and superstition and against the excessive power of the clergy, and welcomed European immigrants. Dozens of groups settled in Argentina: British Anglicans (1824), Scottish Presbyterians (1825), Welsh Baptists (1865), Italian Waldensians (1859), German Lutherans (1843), and Dutch Reformed. These immigrants tended to settle close to each other in order to preserve their ethnic, cultural, and linguistic identity. They generally did not engage in missionary work.

A second path of early Protestant penetration in Argentina was the work of the American and British Bible societies. Many colporteurs (see Colportage) traveled throughout the country following a common pattern: “First the Bible, then a convert, then a church.” A third, later pattern of penetration came with missionary activity fostered by the Protestant churches of Europe and North America. Many of the missions came late to Argentina because Protestant missionary societies of the period considered the country to be already Christianized. As late as 1910, for this reason, the country as well as Latin America as a whole was not included in the agenda of the World Missionary Conference held in Edinburgh. The needs of the region, however, were increasingly recognized, and in 1916 the continent was officially considered to be a mission field by the Congress on Christian Work in Latin America, which met in Panama that year (see Panama Congress). By then, Protestant missionary efforts in Argentina, though limited, were eighty years old.

With the work of European and especially North American missionary societies, a new phase of Protestant expansion began, through conversion rather than immigration, as first the Presbyterians and later the Methodists, Baptists, Plymouth Brethren, and Seventh-Day Adventists arrived. In this way, Protestantism gained a foothold in Argentina toward the close of the nineteenth century and, through the establishment of mission churches and institutions, began to develop and grow in size.

In the twentieth century, Protestant missionary penetration in Argentina has occurred most regularly and effectively in the urban areas. The rate of urban growth in Argentina, especially in the past fifty-five years, has been very significant. In this urban context, new evangelical denominations have found extraordinary opportunities for mission, especially the Pentecostals. Today, Pentecostal denominations represent 75 percent of the Protestants in Argentina.

Most converts to Protestantism in Argentina are nominal Roman Catholics. They integrate into congregations that will receive the generic qualification of “evangelical,” in the sense of non-Catholic or Protestant. The different churches or denominations in the country generally tend to be strikingly heterogeneous and to reflect three influences: the social environment in which they are developing, their particular ecclesiastical and theological tradition, and their overseas links.
Argentina

The first type corresponds to mainline Protestantism, which is also called historical Protestantism, because it is related to the churches of the Reformation. It is found in the ethnic communities of immigrant origin and in the churches founded by the missionaries of these groups, mostly from the United States and Europe, that followed the settlers. With them, the historical churches opened themselves to the native community. These churches are suffering a deep crisis of identity and mission.

However, today’s most characteristic form of Argentinean Protestantism is evangelical Protestantism. Evangelicalism in Argentina corresponds to a current inside the great Protestant confessions associated with the “free church” tradition. This type includes both denominational and non-denominational missions. The majority of these ecclesiastical institutions reached Argentina through missionary work from the United States. So influential are these denominations that “evangelical” is today practically synonymous with “Protestant” in Argentina. This Protestantism is fundamentally conservative in doctrine and firmly committed to zealous evangelization.

A third expression of Argentinean Protestantism is Pentecostalism, represented either in autochthonous Pentecostal movements that emerged from the evangelical denominations or in movements that originated in the missionary work of European and American Pentecostals in the first decades of the twentieth century. In the second half of this century a new type developed, noted by the term “charismatic movement” or “charismatic renewal movement,” which has drawn members from classic Pentecostalism as well as from both the historical and missionary churches. An even more recent development and in many ways the most dynamic one, is a post-denominational movement that Wagner calls the new apostolic reformation (see New Apostolic Reformation Missions). Interestingly, this movement is growing among the more traditional evangelical churches.

Pablo Deiros

Argue, Andrew Harvey (1868–1959). Canadian Pentecostal pioneer, pastor, and evangelist. Reared in a Methodist family in Ontario, he received a sixth-grade education before moving west to Winnipeg, where he became a successful realtor and a lay preacher in the Holiness Movement Church. In 1907 he went to Chicago to hear William Durham and received the Pentecostal experience. Returning to Canada he introduced others to Pentecostalism, emphasizing divine healing, the baptism of the Holy Spirit, and the premillennial return of Christ. He founded Calvary Temple in Winnipeg, which became one of Canada’s largest Pentecostal churches. From this center he encouraged the establishment of other charismatic churches in the major cities of his homeland. He was also instrumental in the emergence of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada (1910–20). Leaving his business and ministry, he became a traveling evangelist with his daughter Zelma and his son Watson during the 1920s and 1930s. Among his many publications, the most notable was a magazine, the Apostolic Messenger. His preaching, leadership, church founding, and writings led to the growth of the Pentecostal movement in Canada. However, even more important than these activities was the inspiration that his children and their spouses provided for the movement of the Holy Spirit in their native land.

Robert Clouse

Armenia (Est. 2000 pop.: 3,813,000; 29,800 sq. km. [11,506 sq. mi.]). Armenia is a landlocked, mountainous republic of the former Soviet Union, located in the southern Caucasus region. Armenia was evangelized during the third century and is considered to be the world’s first Christian state. More than 75 percent of the population claims allegiance to the Armenian Apostolic Church, including nearly one hundred thousand people who participate in a significant autonomous evangelical movement known as the Brotherhood. Protestant evangelicals, the majority of whom are Pentecostal, are growing in numbers but make up less than one percent of the population. Few expatriate missionaries serve in Armenia.

Raymond P. Prigodich

See also Commonwealth of Independent States.

Arminian Theology. Arminianism is an influential movement within Protestant Christianity founded by Jacobus Arminius (1560–1609), a Dutch Reformed pastor, professor, and theologian.

The Founder. Arminius lived during the revolt of the Netherlands against the domination of Spain, a conflict led by William, Prince of Orange, conducted intermittently from 1566 to 1609. During this time, the Dutch Reformation was taking shape in the Netherlands. In 1581, Leiden University sent Arminius to study in John Calvin’s Academy in Geneva, at the time the prin-
Arminian Theology

The Remonstrants. In 1610 a group of forty-four ministers of the Dutch Reformed Church signed a theological statement known as the Remonstrants, supporting the emphases of Arminius. In 1618, representatives from most of the Reformed churches in Europe convened the Synod of Dort in Dordrecht, the Netherlands. The Synod condemned Arminianism and followers of Arminius were excommunicated. They responded immediately by establishing a new denomination known as the Remonstrant Brotherhood, with church laws based on tolerance, peacefulness, and “knowledge of the truth which accords with godliness” (Titus 1:1).

Theological Emphases of Early Arminianism. Solidly Reformed, the Remonstrants nevertheless vehemently opposed the Dutch Calvinist view of predestination that before the fall, even before creation, God had already determined the eternal destiny of each person. The Remonstrants emphasized the following five major points: (a) “that those who believe in Christ are saved and those who do not are damned, and that neither is the result of divine predestination; (b) that Christ died on the cross for the redemption of all (people), not just the elect; (c) that (humans) receive saving faith not from their own free will but from the grace of God by rebirth and renewal; (d) that all good works are solely due to the grace of God; and (e) that although humans can remain in a state of grace and will be sustained and protected by the Holy Spirit, it is possible for them, through their own negligence, to lose that state” (Lambetus Jacobus van Holk, in G. McCulloch, 1962, 28).

Wesleyan Methodism. During the next two centuries Arminianism became a primary stream in Protestantism in England, continental Europe, and North America, due especially to the work and ministry of two of the most famous Arminians, John and Charles Wesley. English Methodists regard Arminianism as their communion’s special heritage.

Arminianism’s Missionary Zeal. In The Marks of a Methodist, Methodist Bishop Gerald Kennedy writes, “Sometimes I think the GREAT COMMISSION was given with the Methodists in mind. For if there has ever been a Church with the word ‘go’ at the center of its life, it is the Methodist Church. . . . Any church must be missionary in spirit or it dies. But this is particularly true for Methodism because its whole spirit and polity are not proper for a finished institution. We must march or lose our life. . . . This devotion is the mark of a Methodist” (1960, 37–44).

Samuel Wesley, the father of John and Charles, was so committed to missionary zeal that in 1705 he presented Queen Anne of England a comprehensive scheme for the evangelization of the East, offering to go himself as a missionary to Abyssinia, India, or China (G. Smith, History of Wesleyan Methodism, 1:1859, 81). It is no wonder, then, that six months after their father’s death, John and Charles were on their way to the distant colony of Georgia, on the American continent. John Wesley’s famous saying, “The world is my parish,” expresses the missionary and evangelistic concern which was Wesley’s deepest passion—a passion Wesley received from his Arminian roots (see also Wesleyan/Holiness Missions).

“The theology of Calvinism arises, naturally and properly, as a theology of the people of God within the household of God. An Arminian theology arises equally naturally and properly as a theology of mission to the unbeliever . . . Wesley’s Arminianism . . . was an Arminianism of the heart, a precondition of the missionary activity undertaken that all (people) might be saved by the power of Christ” (G. Nutall in G. McCulloch, 1962, 59–61).

Arminian Contributions to Mission Theology. Arminian thought has contributed to mission theology in at least the following five major areas. First, the insistence that Christ died for all peoples (not only the elect) has provided a fundamental and strong motivation for mission on the part of those churches grounded in Arminian theology. Second, the emphasis on the experience of conversion and a personal relationship with Jesus Christ provided a powerful impetus for evangelism, support for revivalism and a call for the transformation of all of life. Third, Arminianism’s stress on prevenient grace (differing from Roman Catholic natural theology and Calvinist general revelation) emphasized that God’s grace heals the disorders caused by sin and perfects everything that can be called good (in humans). Thus, all good works, without exception, are to be attributed to God alone, and to the operation of his grace. This perspective provided a remarkable openness to differing cultural forms around the world, providing a foundation for a very creative approach to cultural analysis and contextualization.

Fourth, the Arminian call for religious freedom of the church in relation to the state provided a free-wheeling, creative approach to mission that was relatively unencumbered by the control of colonial governments. Finally, the Arminian view of human freedom and responsibility in synergistic cooperation with God, coupled with Wesleyan and later Methodist emphases on disciplined Christian activism as God’s agents of mission, provided the people and forms that powerfully contributed to world evangelization and social reform on every continent during the last two centuries.
Arminian Theology

CHARLES VAN ENGEN

Arnold, Annie Walker (1850–1938). American missions activist. “Miss Annie” was born in Baltimore, Maryland, the fourth child of James D. and Mary E. Armstrong. Annie’s father died when she was an infant; her mother’s convictions about Christian missions and the influence of her pastor, Richard B. Fuller, profoundly stimulated young Annie to missions activism.

She was a uniquely successful missions mobilizer, promoter, and supporter. One historian has labeled her a “Dreamer in Action.” She led in the formation of the Woman’s Missionary Union (WMU) of the Southern Baptist Convention (SBC), establishing mission support networks and stimulating nationwide production of missions educational literature for local SBC churches.

Baltimore’s urban plight aroused Armstrong’s social involvement. She demonstrated keen leadership abilities and held several positions related to home mission causes in the Convention. Her talents were nationally recognized in 1888 when she became corresponding secretary of the Convention’s newly formed Woman’s Missionary Union, serving without pay until 1906.

Armstrong’s lasting influence was the establishment of one-week prayer and offering emphases for foreign and home missions. Charlotte Moon wrote from China requesting an offering just before Christmas to support new missionaries. The campaign succeeded largely due to Armstrong’s tireless efforts and still continues among Convention churches. A similar effort was launched in 1895 to support Home Missions and is likewise still in effect. The latter bears Armstrong’s name as a lasting tribute to a life well spent for mission causes.

KEITH E. EITEL

Arnot, Frederick Stanley (1858–1914). Scottish missionary to Africa. Born into a Free Church family in Glasgow that later transferred to the Christian Brethren, he was converted in his teens and much influenced by David Livingstone, whose family he knew. He attended Livingstone’s funeral in Westminster Abbey in 1874, and was to edit his Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa (1899). Arnot went to South Africa in 1881 and began the first of his many journeys into the hinterland. He was a peacemaker to King Lewanika of the Barotse, and dissuaded him from attacking the white settlers. After working in Angola he went in 1885 to the Belgian Congo, invited by King Mushidi of Garenganze (in modern Zaire), and there established a mission station.

Like Livingstone, Arnot was criticized both for his independence (he was linked to no missionary society and happily helped colleagues of other denominations) and for doubling as an explorer—which brought him a fellowship of the Royal Geographical Society. Arnot nevertheless established many mission stations, despite multiple obstacles including disease and lack of food and water. His example brought other workers, including Dan Crawford and the physician Walter Fisher, and led to the founding of the Christian Mission in Many Lands.

He published two volumes on Garenganze (1889, 1903) and wrote Missionary Travels in Central Africa (1913).

J. D. DOUGLAS

Bibliography. E. Baker, The Life and Explorations of Frederick Stanley Arnot.

Aroolappen (Arulappan), John Christian (1810–67). South Indian (Tamil) churchman and evangelist. Born in Ukkirramankottah, Tinnevelly (Tamil Nadu), John Christian Aroolappen converted from Roman Catholicism to the Anglican Church under Christian Friedrich Schwartz. The Aroolappen family later came under the influence of Karl Rhenius. Although trained as a catechist under Rhenius, Aroolappen by 1833 had accepted the ecclesiology and eschatology of the Plymouth (Open) Brethren through the instruction of Anthony Norris Groves.

Along with Groves, Aroolappen believed that Christians should follow the apostolic methods of evangelism portrayed in the New Testament. Furthermore, he believed that the gifts of the Holy Spirit remained available for the growth of the church. When news of spiritual awakenings in America and the United Kingdom reached Tinnevelly, Aroolappen and his followers in Christianpettah prayed for the outpouring of the Spirit (Joel 2:28–29) there as well. Revival began in March 1860 with phenomena that included speaking in tongues, prophecy, and visions. Other notable features included prayer for the sick, helping the poor, women preachers, and the evangelization of non-Christians, which Anglican missionaries noted as the first entirely indigenous effort on the part of Indian Christians. Though the revival, which peaked in 1865, was criticized by missionaries for its unusual phenomena and indigenous leadership, it did contribute to remarkable church growth in Tinnevelly.

GARY B. MCGEE

Art. From the time of the New Testament Christians have used the various arts to express their faith in Christ, often appropriating and—in the process—transforming art taken from the cultures where they have proclaimed the gospel, as Paul did on Mars Hill. As the church spread throughout the Roman Empire, Christians developed particularly the visual arts and architecture, and later, during the Middle Ages, music and drama. These were all vitally connected with the worship of the church and marked the Christian presence wherever it appeared. Nestorian Christianity in China in the eighth century is marked by a monument making use of fine calligraphy, and carved crosses near Peking date to the fourteenth century.

After the Reformation, Catholic missions, with their strong liturgical traditions, continued to feature the arts. MATTEO RICCI not only introduced foreign influences into Chinese indigenous arts but adapted Chinese ceremonies for Christian purposes, stimulating a debate that finally led to a papal decision against him in 1704. Christians in early-seventeenth-century Japan fashioned holy pictures to grace their homes. In Latin American and Filipino churches sculpture serves as a visual record of the spread of Christianity. Similarly, Orthodox missions have carried with them their consecrated icons that defined the sacred space of orthodox worship.

Modern Protestant missions inherited the iconoclastic and word-centered theology that stems from the Reformation. As a result, while many missionaries made use of music and some, such as WILLIAM CAREY, made special contributions to the advance of literature, the visual arts were largely undeveloped. Even the verbal arts and music were, with a few exceptions, imported from home rather than adapted from local materials—a practice that was, as often as not, encouraged by the attitudes of national Christians. This did not keep Christianity from having in many places a profound impact on indigenous art, as in the case of the so-called Hindu renaissance in India and the presence of Christian artists in most exhibits of contemporary African art.

Happily the growing understanding of culture and its role in faith and worship in our century has made many missionaries sensitive to the importance of the arts. Again the Catholic missionaries have taken the lead in founding centers and artists’ guilds where the arts have flourished throughout the world, an advance that was chronicled especially between the wars in the pages of the journal Liturgical Arts. Notable among Protestant efforts are the Church Art Society (Episcopal) founded in Nanking, China, in 1934; the Kado Art Association founded after World War II in Japan; the Christian Literature Society in Madras; and the wonderful work of the Protestant church in Bali, Indonesia. All these efforts give promise that the younger churches and their mission activity will show us ways to bring the honor and glory of the nations into the heavenly kingdom.

WILLIAM DYRNES

Bibliography. W. A. Dyrness, Christian Art in Asia; A. Lehmann, Christian Art in Africa and Asia; M. Takezaka, Christian Art in Asia; R. Taylor, Jesus in Indian Paintings.

Arthington, Robert (1823–1900). English missions philanthropist. Born on May 20, 1823, he gave generously to causes fostering frontier evangelistic initiatives among humanity’s millions without the gospel. After his death, his estate accrued approximately £1,000,000 for mission causes. The will allowed no endowments and by 1936 his trust ceased. The impact of his giving affected evangelical mission causes throughout Africa and Asia.

Arthington inherited £200,000 from his father in 1864. He rarely engaged in business himself, relying instead on investment managers to increase his wealth. Living meagerly and alone, he became “the miser of Headingley” because of his reluctance to give to local charities.

Yet he was charitable to causes he preferred. Arthington favored evangelical missions rather than humanitarian ones, as well as those that resisted creating social institutions in order to expedite advancing the gospel in unreached areas. While Arthington gave to various causes, the London Missionary Society (LMS) and the Baptist Missionary Society (BMS) received the most benefit because of their policies, not because of denominational preference.

Distinctly premillennial eschatological convictions invigorated his missiological ideas and shaped his aim of spreading the gospel among all nations to hasten Christ’s return. Arthington helped form strategic policies by his giving. Policies he inspired lend credibility to the claim that some evangelical organizations tended to limit their social entrenchment and resisted aligning with secular governments that were bent on accomplishing temporal imperialist aims. Eccentric for his day, he nevertheless was an early champion of UNREACHED PEOPLES, deinstitutionalization, interdenominational cooperation, and BIBLE TRANSLATION.
Arthington, Robert

Keith E. Eitel

Aruba (Netherlands Autonomous Area) (Est. 2000 pop.: 73,000; 193 sq. km. [75 sq. mi.]). An arid, low-lying Dutch island just off western Venezuela, Aruba, together with nearby Bonaire and Curaçao, was governed as an integral part of the Kingdom of the Netherlands prior to its secession in 1986. Aruba was for a time the site of an oil refinery. Most Arubans are Antillean Creoles who speak Papiamento, a Creole language that includes many Spanish, Portuguese, and Dutch words. The majority of the population is Roman Catholic; 10 percent is Protestant.

Everett A. Wilson

See also Caribbean.

Asbury, Francis (1745–1816). English missionary to North America. Born to Joseph and Elizabeth Rogers Asbury in Handsworth near Birmingham, England, he had little formal education, but apprenticed himself to John Wesley. Upon arrival in America, he set himself to the task of evangelizing and establishing churches among the migrant pioneers of the emerging country. During the American War for Independence, Asbury was the only one of Wesley’s missionary ambassadors to remain. Throughout his itinerant preaching ministry, he traveled the rugged regions by horse, approximately three hundred thousand miles from Canada to Georgia and the Atlantic coast to Kentucky.

In 1784 Wesley appointed both Asbury and Thomas Coke to the office of superintendent. Soon Asbury assumed the title of bishop contrary to Wesley’s wishes. His independent spirit became a hallmark of his ministry, and his single-minded mission led to the firm founding of American Methodism. In 1771, when Asbury arrived, there were approximately three hundred Methodists; by the time Asbury died in 1816, there were over two hundred thousand. Asbury contributed greatly to this amazing growth. When sailing for America, Asbury made a journal entry pondering his motives for going to the rough frontier territory. He concluded, “I am going to live to God, and to bring others to so do.” If the statistics are any indication, he certainly became the maker of a movement in his adopted land.

Keith E. Eitel

Asceticism. Asceticism is a virtually universal phenomenon in world religion found in various locations and periods in both ancient and modern worlds. Its roots may be located in the earliest stages of Indian civilization, probably dating from the third millennium B.C., although some of the world’s best-known ascetic traditions from this region such as Buddhism and Jainism emerged in a later period. In the Western world, Christian culture is the only one which has recognized asceticism as a legitimate way of life, Christian asceticism having had its beginnings with St. Anthony in Egypt at the end of the third century B.C.

Its varied religious and cultural expressions make asceticism a complex phenomenon difficult to define. In broad terms, however, asceticism involves rigorous self-discipline and the habitual renunciation of natural human desires in order to cultivate the spiritual life or attain a higher spiritual state. The principal traits of the alternative lifestyle which asceticism represents include withdrawal from society, mystic contemplation, and such austere practices as fasting, poverty, sexual abstinence, and self-inflicted physical or mental pain.

Throughout the history of the church Christian ascetics have usually gravitated toward ascetic communities or monastic orders, through which much of their spiritual energy has been channeled toward missionary activity and social service. While sincere seekers may be found among various groups of non-Christian ascetics, attempts to reach them are often hindered by their lack of accessibility and sense of self-sufficiency.

Ivan Satyavrata

Asia. Asia covers thirty independent nations in the vast areas of land from Japan in Northeast Asia, numerous other nations in Southeast Asia and South Asia, and up to Turkey in West Asia. Asia represents three major cultural blocs (Mesopotamia, India, and China) and the birthplaces of the major living WORLD RELIGIONS of Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, and Buddhism.

80
The region’s population of approximately three billion represents 60 percent of the world’s total population. Its five thousand years of history have made it a continent of rich cultural heritage. The major wars of the past four decades have been fought in Asia, bringing much suffering to millions of Asians but also awakening them to their need for spiritual values.

Historian Arnold Toynbee once stated, “The changing events of Asia will decide the future of the world tomorrow.” With the rapid modernization and economic dynamism of Asian nations, particularly in the Asia-Pacific basin (Japan, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Singapore, and China), many are saying that “the 21st Century will be the Age of Asia.”

Changing Patterns of Asian Societies: Political Changes. Politically, there are three major factors affecting Asia and the Asian church. First, every nation in Asia except Japan and Thailand have experienced bitter foreign colonial domination, especially from the Western nations. But today all nations in Asia are politically independent. National independence from political colonialism has brought enormous changes in the political structures of the national governments as well as many internal conflicts and wars among different ethnic groups in many Asian nations. Related to independence and strong nationalism is the withdrawal of Western powers, finalized for Britain in July of 1997 when Hong Kong reverted back to China. The mass exodus of British troops from the former colonies in South and Southeast Asia, the French defeat in former French Indo-China (Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos), and the American military withdrawal from South Vietnam, Taiwan, and the Philippines have created a political vacuum in many regions.

In the past it was the foreigners who controlled the internal as well as foreign affairs of their colonies. The expatriates regulated missionary activities according to their own national interests. In contrast today an increasing number of Asian nations have used political pressures against foreign missionary activities in their countries, especially in the communist (China, North Korea, Vietnam, Kampuchea, and Laos) and Islamic (Indonesia, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Malaysia, and Central and Middle Eastern) nations. Hindu nations (India and Nepal) and Buddhist nations (Sri Lanka, Thailand, and Myanmar) also bring pressure against Christian activities. In 1997 more than 83 percent of the Asian population resided in countries where the acquisition of a missionary visa was very limited. A creative access strategy is needed in order to facilitate alternative ways of carrying on missionary activities (see CREATIVE ACCESS COUNTRIES).

Second, as a result of this self-control, Asian nations are experiencing a resurgence of nationalism and traditional values. This resurgence which derives from chauvinistic, patriotic passion has been expressed in cultural, linguistic, and religious ways. A common motto throughout Asia is “Import Western technology, but retain your own traditional culture.”

Third, the rise of the communist threat was real throughout Asia during the Korean War (1950–53) and the Vietnam War (1964–75). Communist ideology still controls over two billion people in China, North Korea, Vietnam, Kampuchea, and Laos. In these countries the activities of national churches and of foreign religious workers are restricted.

Economic and Social Changes. One word that describes Asia the best is “changes,” for Asia is rapidly changing in social and cultural patterns as well as in economic living standards. New building construction sites for high-rise apartments, department stores, and government offices are commonly observed in major cities of Asia. Rapid urbanization, traffic congestion, air, noise, and water pollution, drugs, prostitution, and crime have marred the dreams of many Asians. The lifestyle of the urban cities is getting more materialistic, secularistic, and Westernized. However, rural people are still living as they always have for hundreds of years. There is a widening gap between urban and rural and between rich and poor. With the increase in economic power, many Christians in Asia are not only able to manage their churches financially but also to support their own missionaries within and outside their borders.

With the rise of living standards and the rapid modernization of Asian society, Asians are facing many social and cultural changes. The influx of Western cultures into Asia through mass media by introducing Hollywood movies into theaters and TV, rock music, fashion shows, and other secular and hedonistic events along with fast food chains have made a tremendous impact upon Asian lifestyles. Consequently, there is an increasing gap between the older and younger generations. Young people today care much less about traditional culture, have no memory of the wars and the sufferings of their parents’ generation, and readily accept new ideas and practices.

Religious Resurgence. There are three large non-Christian religious groups which constitute the majority of Asia’s three billion people: one billion Muslims, 700 million Hindus, and 300 million Buddhists (see ISLAM, HINDUISM, BUDDHISM). There has been a resurgence of major religions in Asia and religions are used by the national governments to promote unity among different tribes, cultural groups, and languages. The influence of Islam, seen in the reintroduction of Shari’a and the rise of Islamic fundamentalism, is growing. Malaysia exemplifies this. The Federation of Malaysia consists of West Malaysia, Sarawak, and Sabah. It has 22.3 million people,
Asia

52.5 percent of whom are Malays, 30 percent Chinese, 8.1 percent Indians, and 8.9 percent tribals. The Federation is trying to unite these different races through the unification of language and religion. The Malaysian government enforced the Bahasa Malaysian program in which the Malay language is used, instead of the vernaculars. Consequently, there has been a gradual assimilation of the Chinese and Indians into the Malay Islamic culture.

Buddhism, too, has been revived in Thailand, Myanmar, Taiwan, Sri Lanka, and other Buddhist nations. Throughout urban cities and rural communities one can observe thousands of devout Buddhists worshiping the statues of Buddha and offering food and burning incense in Buddhist temples.

In India, Hinduism was also revived through its reform movements such as Bramno Samaj, Akṣa Samaj, and Rama Krishna Mission of the nineteenth century. Radical Hindu followers of the Rāṣṭrīya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS) and the Vīshva Hindu Parishad (VHP) contributed significantly to rejuvenate Hinduism and Hindu nationalism in India and make minority communities of Muslims and Christians feel threatened and insecure by insisting that a true Indian must be a Hindu.

In Japan, there is a renewed interest in traditional religious traditions, including some signs of increasing links between the state and Shintōism. Nevertheless, with rapid church growth in many nations in Asia, there has been an increasing confrontation between Christianity and other traditional religions of Asia. Therefore, it is crucial for the Asian church to learn how to deal with the traditional religions of Asia.

Asia: The Least Evangelized Continent. Asia is the least evangelized continent in the world, with approximately 3 percent of the three billion people following Christ. Johnstone provides statistics of seven large Asian nations which have small Christian populations, including China, Taiwan, India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Japan, and Thailand. The vast majority of the unreached people today reside in these countries.

The AD2000 and Beyond Movement has emphasized the evangelization of unreached peoples in the 10/40 Window. These countries cover the whole continent of Asia from Japan to India, and from Central Asia to North Africa. The Adopt-a-People Campaign of the U.S. Center for World Mission in Pasadena reports that there are approximately two billion people in 11,000 unreached people groups (out of a worldwide total of 24,000).

The vast majority of these two billion are found in four major blocs. The Islamic world contains over one billion Muslims, most of whom reside in Asia, with over 4,000 unreached Muslim people groups in the world. The Hindu world of India and Nepal represents more than 700 million Hindus in 2,000 unreached groups. Most of the 300 million Buddhists are found in Southeast and Northeast Asia, representing approximately 1,000 unreached people groups. The Chinese in China today represent by far the largest number of unreached peoples in the world with 1.2 billion people, living in some 1,000 unreached people groups. There are millions of other people who belong to 3,000 small individual tribes. Therefore, Asia still presents the greatest challenge to Christian missions today and in the next century.

Most nations in the 10/40 Window do not easily grant visas for foreign missionary work. Approximately 20 percent of the total missionary force in the world works in these restricted nations in Asia. This means that the future focus of world missions in the twenty-first century must be on the two billion unreached peoples of Asia. With the development of modern transportation and mass media through television, film, radio, telephone, fax, and e-mail service, we can now know the background of these unreached peoples in Asia (see also INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY, MEDIA, and MASS COMMUNICATION). The GLOBAL CONSULTATION OF WORLD EVANGELIZATION (GCOWE '95) which met in Seoul, Korea, with 4,000 participants from 186 nations in May 1995 adopted a motto, “A church for every people and the gospel for every person,” and challenged all participants to pray especially for the unreached peoples of the world within the 10/40 Window.

Expansion of Christianity in Asia. The history of Christianity in Asia goes back to the first century. According to the Acts of Thomas, St. Thomas came to the Malabar coast of Kerela, South India, to preach the gospel to the Indians and became a martyr near Madras in A.D. 72. The Christian message penetrated into the regions of Media, Persia, Parthia, and Bactria (modern Iraq, Iran, and Afghanistan) by A.D. 150. According to the Nestorian Tablet which was discovered in the city of Sian in central China in 1625, a Nestorian missionary from the Syrian church, Alopen, went to China in A.D. 635. During the Mongolian Empire of the twelfth to thirteenth centuries, several Roman Catholic friars such as John of Plano Carpini, JOHN OF MONTECORVINO, and William Rubruck went to China as missionaries.

With the historic voyage of Vasco Da Gama to Capetown, South Africa, in 1498 and to Malabar, India, two years later; the Western colonial age known as “the Vasco Da Gama Age” began in Asia, Africa, and South America. FRANCIS XAVIER, a Jesuit missionary, came to Kagoshima, Japan, in 1549 and ministered to the Japanese for more than two years, moved to South China in 1552, and died there after four months. Since then, thousands of other Roman Catholic missionaries have been commissioned to Asia.
The beginning of the Protestant missions in the early eighteenth century heralded another era in Asia’s mission history. In 1706 the first Protestant missionaries arrived in South India from Europe. The Danish-Halle Mission sent Bartholomeus Ziegenbalg and Henrich Plutschau to Tranquebar to work among the Tamil-speaking Indians. In 1792 the Baptist Missionary Society in England commissioned William Carey to Calcutta, and in 1807 Robert Morrison of the London Missionary Society came to Macao and translated the Bible into the Chinese language. In 1784 the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions sent Adoniram Judson from the United States and Robert Morrison to the Burmese for thirty-seven years. Since then, thousands of other Protestant missionaries from Europe, North America, and Australia/New Zealand have followed these pioneers to work in different parts of Asia.

Church Growth in Asia. The amazing church growth in Asia since the end of World War II has been widely reported throughout the world. Several countries have experienced dramatic rates of church growth. The Christian population in South Korea has reached 12 million Protestants (25% of the population) and 2.4 million Roman Catholics (6% of the population) among 47 million people since the arrival of the first Protestant missionaries in Korea in 1884. China, the most populous nation in the world, had never exceeded one percent Christian population until the Peoples’ Republic of China was established in 1949. Since the modernization of China began in 1979, the Christian population has sharply increased. Some China watchers in Hong Kong report that there are between 50 million and 70 million Christians and 50,000 house churches (see Chinese House Church Movement), even though the Three Self Patriotic Movement (TSPM) and the Communist Party only acknowledge the growth of the church from one million Protestant members in 11,470 churches in 1949 to 7,000 state churches with 6 million Christians and 20,000 registered home meetings in 1995.

The Philippines, which is the only Roman Catholic nation in Asia, has a growing number of Protestant believers. Indonesia, with the largest Muslim population in the world, has also experienced rapid church growth. After the communist coup failed in Indonesia in 1966, President Suharto’s government guaranteed religious freedom to five major religions (Islam, Hinduism, Buddhism, Protestantism, and Roman Catholicism) according to the “Pantasila” policy in the Constitution. Singapore, known as the crossroads of Asia with a multiracial and multireligious background, has Protestant and Roman Catholic populations of 8 percent and 5.7 percent respectively, particularly among educated Chinese and Indians. Nepal, the only Hindu kingdom in Asia, was very hostile to the gospel until a multipolitical party system developed in 1991. It has experienced remarkable church growth from only a handful of believers to over 52,000 Protestant members (0.56% of the population) and 2,100 Roman Catholics (0.02% of the population) today.

Slower growth has been seen in countries such as Japan, Taiwan, Thailand, and India. Minimal growth has been experienced in nations where there are tremendous struggles and resulting pressures from unsympathetic governmental and religious leaders, such as Pakistan, Bangladesh, Malaysia, Sri Lanka, and the Middle Eastern nations.

Seven Basic Issues of an Asian Church. Many Asian church leaders and theologians have discussed various issues of the Asian church through different consultations. With the rapid growth of the church in different parts of Asia, the Asian churches are facing seven important issues: (1) grassroots evangelism must be emphasized in order to reach the vast number of non-Christians in Asia; (2) leadership training for both full-time Christian workers and lay leaders is needed since there is a tremendous shortage of trained leaders at the local church level; (3) since lay Christians play a very important role in church growth, there has been an increasing demand for lay training programs; (4) national Christians must seriously evaluate their own contextual situation in order to find the most effective indigenous ways to communicate the gospel of Jesus Christ (see Contextualization); (5) theological issues emerging from various kinds of Asian theologies, religious Dialogue, Religious Pluralism, and Human Rights have created theological confusion in the Asian theological arena; (6) Christian social responsibility with its holistic approach must be emphasized to help the poor and to alleviate the suffering from social injustice and discrimination; and (7) spiritual renewal within the church is desperately needed to bring spiritual revival among the members of the church. There must be a discernible difference between the lifestyles of Christians and their non-Christian neighbors.

The Asian Missionary Movement. It is encouraging to observe that many Asian churches particularly since 1970 have been sending their own cross-cultural missionaries. Many Asian church leaders who attended the international missions congresses were deeply challenged for the task of world evangelization, and as a result organized their own national and regional evangelism congresses and missions consultations (see Asian Mission Boards and Societies).

Consequently, the Asia Missions Association (AMA) was organized in 1973 to coordinate missions agencies throughout Asia. In 1990 the First Asian Missions Congress was held in Seoul.
Asia

Korea, sponsored by the Missions Commission of the Evangelical Fellowship of Asia (EFA) with 1,200 participants from different parts of Asia. The theme of the congress was "World Missions: The Asian Challenge." The Second Asian Missions Congress was held in Pattaya, Thailand, in 1997 with 350 participants with the theme, "Into the 21st Century: Asian Churches in Missions." In 1997 approximately 30,000 Asian missionaries from India, Korea, Japan, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Singapore, Malaysia, the Philippines, Indonesia, and others joined their hands with Western missionaries for world evangelization. Two nations in Asia which sent out the largest number of cross-cultural missionaries were India and South Korea with 20,000 and 5,500 cross-cultural missionaries respectively.

Challenge of Asia to Christian Missions Today. As Paul had his missionary concern for the Jews and Gentiles in Palestine, Asia Minor, Macedonia, Achaia, and Rome in the first century, so Asian Christians today must have their deep prayerful concern to reach their own people with the gospel of Christ on the grassroots level. How Paul evangelized the largest city of Ephesus in Asia Minor in the first century provides a very significant missiological lesson to the Asian church today. There are a number of similarities between the Ephesus of Paul's time and urban cities in Asia today and between the Ephesian church then and the Asian church in our time. If Paul were to come to Asia today and walk on the streets of Bombay, Singapore, Jakarta, Bangkok, Hong Kong, Shanghai, Taipei, Seoul, and Tokyo, what kind of ministry would he launch to bring the good news of the gospel of Jesus Christ to Asians?

The city of Ephesus of the first century and Asian cities today have three main similarities. First, Ephesus, which was the largest city in Asia Minor with a population of 500,000, had a great harbor, emporium, library, commerce, education, and culture. Likewise, Asian cities are crowded with the masses of people and many high-rise buildings developed in modern surroundings. Second, as Ephesus was the religious city with the temple of Artemis (Acts 19:23–41), so is Asia today filled with spirits, idols, and superstitious beliefs of traditional religions of Hinduism, Buddhism, Taoism, Shintoism, and Islam. Third, Ephesus was a sinful city, as Paul described it as "having lost all sensitivity, they have given themselves over to sensuality so as to indulge in every kind of impurity, with a continual lust for more" (Eph. 4:19). Likewise, Asian cities are filled with sin, crime, drugs, sexual immorality, bribery, and injustice.

When Paul faced the great task of evangelizing Ephesus and many other cities in Asia Minor and Europe in his time, he concentrated on the leadership training of the Ephesian church by emphasizing the spiritual gifts: "It was he who gave some to be apostles, some to be prophets, and some to be evangelists, and some to be pastors and teachers, to prepare God's people for works of service, so that the body of Christ may be built up" (Eph. 4:11–12). There is a Chinese proverb that teaches a similar lesson, "Give a man a fish and he will eat for a day. Teach a man to fish and he will have food for a lifetime." It was imperative, therefore, for Paul to train the leaders of the Ephesian church in order that they would be able to train others to bring the gospel to 500,000 people in the city of Ephesus. Likewise, the training of national church leaders in the Asian church today is also imperative in order to reach three billion Asians with the gospel. These spiritual leaders will be able to mobilize the laity of the church at the grassroots level in order to penetrate into the non-Christian Asian society with the gospel of Christ.

Therefore, three important proposals need to be stressed for the evangelization of Asia. First, the burden of communicating the gospel and making disciples in Asia today must rest primarily with the national Christians. Therefore, the national church must implement the concept of "Christianization of the nation" among the national Christians. Second, effective church growth in Asia depends on the creative and spirit-filled leadership of pastors and lay leaders. Third, and finally, the top priority of the Asian church in the twenty-first century must be the training of national church leaders in order that they would be able to mobilize the laity of the church.

God has always worked through his chosen people in the history of redemption. Peter says in 1 Peter 2:9–10, "But you are a chosen people, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people belonging to God, that you may declare the praises of him who called you out of darkness into his wonderful light. Once you were not a people, but now you are the people of God; once you had not received mercy, but now you have received mercy." In centuries past God has used the churches in Europe and North America to bring the gospel to Asia, Africa, and South America. Asia, known spiritually as the darkest continent in the world with the least Christian population of any continent, is experiencing God’s spiritual awakening among its peoples. God has chosen Asia and the Asian church in the twenty-first century to proclaim his wonderful light to millions of Asians and around the world.

BONG RIN RO

Asian Mission Boards and Societies. General Description. Though Asian missionary activity is recorded as early as 1884, it was not until the 1970s that the rest of the Christian world began to notice this activity. In 1972, there were over 100 mission agencies in Asia. Growth continued so that out of the 1,541 Non-Western Mission Boards and Societies known in 1995, more than 825 were Asian. The most active countries are India (with an estimated 281 agencies in 1995), Korea (113 agencies in 1994), Japan (63 agencies in 1995), and the Philippines (20 agencies in 1995). Well-known agencies include the Indian Mission Association, which in 1995 included 81 member mission boards with some 10,000 Indian missionaries (with as many as 200 other Indian mission agencies not yet part of the Indian Mission Association). These numbers do not include workers who operate independently within their own country. In the Philippines alone, it is estimated that 2,000 nationals serve in this capacity.

Characteristics. One important characteristic of Asian missions is the phenomenon of missionaries crossing cultural boundaries within their own country. Following Caste divisions, some estimate that India has at least three thousand People Groups. The vast bulk of Indian missionary work is carried out within India. This is also seen in other major Asian missionary-sending countries such as Indonesia and Myanmar.

A second characteristic is that Asian mission boards cannot be equated with Western agencies, which have elaborate structures and management systems. Many of the Asian boards are still simple with inexpensive systems, relying more on faith than man-made management structures. This is especially true with the mission agencies that send people within their own country. Administrative overhead expenditures are therefore very low in comparison with Western agencies.

A third characteristic is that Asian boards are focusing their deployment into the 10/40 Window. Indian mission boards have sent approximately five hundred missionaries into Nepal, Bhutan, and Uzbekistan. Most of the Myanmar missionaries stay within their own country, which is part of the 10/40 Window. There are exceptions, such as Korea, Japan, and Hong Kong, where the boards have greater financial resources to send missionaries into non-Asian contexts and out of the 10/40 Window.

Fourth, with some exceptions, there seems to be tremendous creativity in Asian mission boards. With very little support, for example, Korean missionaries are being sent to remote places in China. Their boards, lacking the elaborate communication and management structures of Western boards, have no choice but to allow a great deal of freedom to the missionaries. This means that the missionaries must be more able to stand on their own and be willing to suffer more than the average Western missionaries. Additionally, without senior missionaries on hand to provide supervision, oversight, and pastoral care, the new missionaries are forced to exercise great creativity sometimes just to survive the rigors of the field.

Fifth, there is a surprisingly high rate of financial autonomy among Asian mission boards. Recent estimates indicate that 91 percent of the Asian boards are funded by indigenous sources. This is particularly true of Japanese and Korean boards, and most missionaries from these countries are well supported by sponsoring churches and agencies. Missionaries from India, the Philippines, and Indonesia have generally not fared as well.

The final characteristic is the mix of denominational and parachurch sending agencies. In countries such as Korea and Japan denominational boards are the major contributors to the mission board scenario. In Korea, both Hap Dong and Tong Hap Presbyterians are the two largest sending agencies. Between them they send out more than one-fourth of the missionaries from Korea. By way of contrast, the vast majority of the members of the Indian Mission Association are parachurch organizations.

Relationships with International Agencies. Some of the early attempts to send out Asian missionaries were through indigenous mission agencies. An Indian Methodist was sent to Malaysia in 1884. The Korean Presbyterian Foreign Mission Board sent out the first team of cross-cultural missionaries to Shantung, China, in 1913. International mission agencies began to formulate sending bases in Asia during the 1960s. The Christian and Missionary Alliance (CMA) and the Overseas Missionary Fellowship (OMF) were pioneers in this endeavor. Pate estimates that somewhat more than 6 percent of the total Third World mission force serves with international organizations. One of the advantages of utilizing international agencies is the enjoyment of the benefit of already well-established field structures.

At the same time, however, there are prices to be paid for these inconveniences. The high cost of supporting missionaries to equalize pay scales between Westerner and non-Westerner is one. Additionally, the cultural differences within a multinational team (and organization) can be a source of problems. Finally, the fact that the non-Western missionaries often have to learn the organization's language (often English) in addition to the vernacular of their field of service raises an extra barrier to the development of true partnership.

Conclusion. The Asian missionary movement is still young. For the time being, Asian mission boards can afford to be simple without elaborate support systems, such as retirement plans, a complicated pastoral care system, and large

85
Asian Mission Boards and Societies

Schools for missionary children (MK). The honeymoon period, however, is rapidly disappearing. Missionaries from countries such as Korea, Japan, and India are struggling with the education of their children. The cases are so complex for Korean mission boards that it has taken almost a decade to get a consensus on the objectives for MK education. Additionally, field structures also present tremendous challenges. So far, a scattered effort without much teamwork among the Asian missionaries satisfied some Asian churches. Currently there is a need for field structures to coordinate and encourage a team effort. It will take time and effort to creatively formulate infrastructures that are new, affordable, and flexible enough for the ever-changing world.

Maintaining the momentum of the Asian missionary movement is a heavy burden that Asian mission boards must carry. Logically this burden should be borne by the Asian church. However, the Asian church is being bombarded with secularism and is threatened by major traditional Asian religions. Can the Asian mission boards still afford to do missions, even when it is becoming more costly and risky? Probably not without the initiative taken by Asian churches. The well-being of the Asian mission movement and the future of Asian mission boards will greatly depend on how the Asian church tackles these challenges.

David Tai Woong Lee

See also Non-Western Mission Boards and Societies.

Asian New Religious Movements. During the past 150 years, a wide variety of popular religious movements have emerged throughout Asia. In some countries, such as Japan, these appear in organized form as “new religions,” but in other countries they are amorphous and unorganized. Thus, the discussion of religious phenomena in countries other than Japan must deal with popular religion in a somewhat broader sense than new religious organizations as such. “New” is relative, and must be used in contrast to the ancient established traditions of Hinduism, Buddhism, Confucianism, and so on, referring to movements mainly, but not confined to, the twentieth century.

With the exception of Japan, little literature is available on these movements in most of the Asian countries. Their newness and their fluid and changing nature makes them a difficult object of study. Also, there is a tendency on the part of most Western Christian observers to view such movements with indifference or disdain.

In Korea, popular folk religion is polytheistic, claiming eight million gods, including nature gods and the spirits of the living and dead. Divination, fortune telling, geomancy (religious significance in the orientation of buildings), ancestor worship, and shamans (mudang) and shamanic rituals (kat) with their elaborate dances and songs are all important elements in popular folk religion.

Nationalism is also a significant element. This is eminently true of the first post-Pacific War new religious group, the Tonghak (Eastern Learning) movement. Some of the new religions teach that Korea will become chief among the world’s nations. Most new religions are directed toward alleviating economic and health problems; they anticipate a utopia on earth. Some new religions, such as Won Buddhism, are close to traditional Buddhism. Others, such as Sun Myung Moon’s Unification Church, are similar to Christianity, yet alien to orthodox Christianity.

The South Korean government’s statistics put total membership at about one million in 1983 (3% of the total population). The number of adherents has not grown greatly because, unlike neighboring Japan, Christianity has proved to be more powerful in attracting the masses.

In modern Taiwan, prior to 1949, the year of the communist takeover in mainland China, many Buddhist and Taoist clergy, including renowned leaders like the Taoist Heavenly Master, moved to Taiwan from the mainland, creating a strong Buddhist influence there. Many new temples were built and old ones refurbished.

In popular religions, belief in ghosts and worship of ancestors is the backbone. One of the most popular observances is the Pho To festival (Universal Salvation). It is so widely celebrated that it is considered to be a force of unity in the country. At this festival the suffering souls in the underworld are released to enjoy a month of freedom. People give offerings and join in celebrating the climactic “ghost-feeding” ritual, ghosts being the departed spirits of strangers.

Among the new religious groups are Li Chiao and Hsuan-yuan Chiao. One of the more aggressive Buddhist sects is Hsi Lai. It claims to be a return to the pure teachings of the Buddha. “Hsi Lai” literally means “coming to the West,” and this sect has visibility on the West Coast of the United States.

In Hong Kong, as in Taiwan, Buddhist, Confucian, and Taoist influence is prevalent, but the extreme secular materialism of Hong Kong’s commercialism precludes the development of influential new religious movements. Popular Folk Religions of the common people are centered in ancestor worship, but even this is losing... its religious meaning, leaving only its social significance.

Both Malaysia and Indonesia are predominantly Islamic in background, and in recent decades have seen new thrusts of "Islamization." Since Malaysia gained independence from Great Britain, there has been renewed effort to instill the ideals of Islam: peace, love, cooperation, honesty, hard work, honor, and abstinence from licentious behavior.

In Indonesia a new Islamic association, Sarekat Islam, was formed in 1912 and spread like wildfire into a million-member group which eventually came to lead a nationalist movement.

In the Philippines, tribal religion has produced many movements and cults that are separate from the mainstream of Roman Catholicism. For instance, tribes in northern Mindanao are known for their strong belief in the invisible forces of the spirit world and their peculiar rituals. In 1931 a violent anticlerical sect called Colorums of Central Luzon arose, aiming to establish an independent Philippine government.

There are numerous modern native cults in the Melanesian Islands of the South Pacific. Life here, lived in a half-way world between ancient paganism and envied modern Westernization, has given rise to some bizarre cults. For example, in 1939 a European missionary agitated for the need for a chairman and rules of procedure in formal meetings. He was misinterpreted, and a new religious movement called the "Chair and Rule Movement" arose in the Solomon Islands, which elevated a flag, a wooden chair, and a wooden ruler into a place of ritual importance.

In India, exposure to nineteenth-century British colonialism and modernization, along with Christian missions, stimulated various Neo-Hindu reform movements and new religious movements. After the introduction of Christianity by William Carey in 1793, there was a call for religious and ethical reform among Hindu intellectuals. This resulted in the Samaj (Society) movement. In the nineteenth century, under the leadership of Keshab Chandra Sen, there arose the Brahmo Samaj (Theistic Society), seeking a religious synthesis of Hinduism and Christianity. The Ramakrishna Mission, founded by Ramakrishna Paramahamsa, has now spread throughout India and also to 120 locations abroad. It teaches the essential unity of all religions and the potential divinity of humans (see also HINDU NEW RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS).

In Japan there have been a great number of organized modern sects technically called Shinko Shukyo (New Religions), and more recently a new phenomenon called Shin-shinko Shukyo (new New Religions, sects of the past decade, which generally focus on immediate benefits combined with mystical experience). Even under government control in the early decades of this century, the number of groups grew to 414 in 1930. The end of the Pacific War, when official state Shinto was dismantled, brought religious freedom, so by 1950 there were 742 New Religions registered with the government. This number has been greatly reduced since then.

The New Religions usually arose as a response to some kind of social crisis, the major crisis being the defeat of Japan in the Pacific War. Typically, they are founded by charismatic leaders, often a female who could be identified as a shaman. They tend toward monotheism, having one deity, one founder; and one revelation which sets the doctrine. They have a definite body of teaching, which usually takes a simplistic, optimistic view of the human situation. They are syncretistic, drawing from several strands of religion and culture, along with the worldview of Western science. They hold a this-worldly eschatology—they see that society can change toward a utopian goal. They offer concrete, material blessings and prosperity to their followers. They have an elegant sacred center, a national headquarters which functions as a foretaste of paradise for the believers who gather there. There is an emphasis on health and healing of sickness, and an emphasis on the power of positive thinking to solve life's problems. They have effective propagation methods and are easy to join, and have ways of getting sizable offerings from members once they have joined.

We may classify a few of the large representative groups in Japan into the following three categories. The "old New Religions," or those founded before the Meiji Restoration, are represented by Tenrikyo (Religion of Heavenly Wisdom), founded by Miki Nakayama in 1838, who identified the deity as "God the Parent."

The Omoto Group. (1) Seicho on Ie (House of Growth), established by Masaharu Taniguchi in 1930, is a cross between Japanese spiritual tradition and American "New Thought." (2) Sekai Kyoseikyo (World Messiah), established by Tokuchika Miki in 1930, is a cross between Japanese spiritual tradition and American "New Thought." (3) Perfect Liberty Kyodan, founded by Makiguchi in 1946, takes as its motto, "Life is art": live in a balanced, creative, esthetically expressive way. Sports and crafts are an important part of their religious practice.

The Nichiren Group includes the largest and strongest organizations: (1) Soka Gakkai (Value-creating Society), founded by Tsunesaburo Makiguchi in 1937, claimed to be the fastest growing religion in the world in the 1950s, numbering 750,000 households. A later leader, Daisaku Ikeda, also established a political party, Komeito (Clean Government Party), which he claimed would usher in a time of peace and plenty all over the world. (2) Rissho Koseikai, now counting more than six million members, was established through the efforts of Nikkyo Ninwano and Myoko Nagazuma in 1938. Their emphasis has been on happy living, taught in small groups called hozail and on world peace and interreligious cooperation (see also Japanese New Religious Movements).
Asian New Religious Movements

Although the new religious movements of Asia are too varied throughout time and culture to make any general statement, at least it can be said that they are a clear sign of the hunger of the human spirit for something beyond physical and economic life. With this comes a challenge to Christian mission to satisfy that hunger.

We also are made aware of the intricate relationship among religion, culture, politics, and superstition. To be a truly redeeming influence in this complex situation, the church must realize its own cultural biases, strive to understand the dynamics of the new spiritual phenomena into which it is thrust, and at the same time discern the essence of the Christian faith, being willing to let go of nonessentials for the sake of contextualizing the meaning of Christ in any particular cultural setting.

KENNETH J. DALE

SEE ALSO New Religious Movements.

Asian Theologies. Asia is a complex continent with many diverse cultures. These cultures are directly linked with major religions such as Hinduism, Buddhism, and Islam as well as with a variety of animistic religions. Christianity in most parts of the continent is a minority religion although the influence of Christian missionaries has been significant. Christian theology has had to interact with these religions and their contexts and in recent decades numerous theologies have evolved.

The complexity of Asia includes more than religion. A contrast of rich and poor, rural and urban, and ancient and modern make the people a diverse mass. Within such a context, a variety of theologies have developed—some remaining local while others have made a worldwide impact. Kitamori’s “pain of God theology” and Koyama’s “water buffalo theology” are familiar to theologians all over the world. But there are many others that are local. Common to all these theologies is the concern that Western theological concepts are sometimes incomprehensible and irrelevant to the Asian context. They need to be relevant and expressed in the language of the common people, addressing the situation they confront.

Poverty and suffering have been rampant in Asia. An Asian response came from the Japanese scholar Kazoh Kitamori. He wrote of the “pain of God” that heals our pains, developing his study from Jeremiah 31:20, where God speaks of his heart yearning for Ephraim. Kitamori understood the reality of God through the pain of God, which is seen to be essential as well as eternal. God’s revelation of his love through Jesus Christ was the revelation of this pain. Theology in these terms certainly addresses the suffering context of Asia, but could easily tend to justify or even deify suffering.

Kosuke Koyama, a Japanese professor, after many years in Thailand, proposed “water buffalo theology.” He incorporated Christian beliefs into Thai thinking by using their daily experiences with life, nature, and habits alongside teachings of Buddhism. Koyama was also concerned to communicate the gospel effectively to a people caught in a technological revolution and culture. He emphasized that God worked “slowly” and so we, too, must slow down to a walk. Only then can we hear God speaking. Koyama’s theology is not systematic and needs further development. His concern for the communication of the gospel to common people in Asia is commendable but the tendencies toward Syncretism and Universalism minimize the uniqueness of the Christian gospel. Minjung, meaning “people,” is a people’s theology developed in Korea (see also Minjung Theology). Like its Latin American counterparts, it is a political theology describing a struggle to free common people from the domination of the ruling class. Accordingly Minjung theologians focus on two main realities of the people—their social history and economic condition. They try to relate the gospel of Jesus to the struggles and aspirations of the people of Korea in their sociopolitical situation. There are three main sources of Minjung theology. First is the Bible and a new interpretation of the biblical truths to show how God dealt with the people. It recognizes the Deuteronomic code and the covenant code in the Old Testament were given to protect the rights of the poor people. The second source is the history of the church, noting that the early beginnings of Christianity were among people who were a minority in their own communities. The third is the people’s struggle for Liberation.

Although lacking a sound biblical basis, theologies like Minung are taking root in other Asian countries wherever there are peoples’ struggles. For instance, Aloysius Pieris of Sri Lanka, concerned for the millions of poor people on the continent and the numerous religions they belong to, affirms that Christianity must give an answer. Pieris advocates an Asian theology of lib-
The process of INCULTURATION must confront Asia's churches in Asia to become churches of Asia. Among other concerns, Pieris believes that for solutions become partial fulfillment of the KINGDOM of God. Proclaiming the gospel also becomes "witness to Jesus Christ as source, the judge, and redeemer of human spirituality." These revolutions in such a way that we may struggle for liberation. This will enable an integration of Christian love with Buddhists and Christians together in their common struggle for liberation. Such a classless society is not possible where religion becomes a potential force for strife. Therefore, interreligious dialogues are important channels for a Christ-centered SYNCRETISM, where the whole religious systems and ideologies, not just individuals, are converted to Christ. The mission of the church will result in a Christ-centered Hindu church. The church's mission is primarily that of humanization and not evangelization. Although M. M. Thomas is acknowledged as an outstanding scholar and thinker, some critics show his work to be political and sociological rather than theological. His works are seldom biblical. Thomas attempted to find revelation in revolutions. Important aspects of theology dealing with God, Jesus Christ, and the Holy Spirit are undermined except with reference to human action.

Stanley Joseph Samartha is an Indian theologian of religion. He proposes that Hindus have positively responded to Christ in their own way and accordingly asks the vital question, "What does it mean to affirm that Jesus Christ is Lord and Savior today in India?" Recognizing various levels of Hindu response to Christ, Samartha says that the church needs to appreciate this fact rather than being unduly suspicious. The Hindu must be considered a fellow citizen in the commonwealth of Christ and not as a recruit to the kingdom of God. Samartha identifies the Hindu anubhava (experience) as the main source of knowledge and our starting point. But anubhava should be controlled by the historical fact of Christ and it should have a social dimension that is sustained, strengthened, and transmitted to others in the fellowship of the church. Thus, according to Samartha, Christ can be expressed as Brahman. Samartha's question is a valid starting point but like others he surrenders the uniqueness of Christ as portrayed in the Bible. He offers new interpretations of the cross, resurrection, deity of Christ, and the meaning and purpose of the death of Christ have little justification from the Bible.

Evangelicals in Asia have not been known for major theological contributions. Most evangelical theologians in Korea, Japan, Singapore, and India tend to follow generally Western forms of theologies that restrict mission to proclaiming the gospel. But recently people like Vinay Samuel and Ken Gnanakan have developed biblical theologies that make the Christian faith strongly relate to the Indian context. Samuel has addressed mission in terms of total transformation. Gnanakan advocates the actualization of the gospel in sociopolitical, economic, and environmental demonstrations of mission. Both maintain the uniqueness of Christ while exploring newer ways of demonstrating God's mission in Asia.

The 1980s saw the development of the so-called Dalit theology. Dalit is a Sanskrit word that...
Asian Theologies

means oppressed, broken, or downtrodden. In a broad sense it is a concern for all the oppressed sectors of people in the society, but Dalit theology is particularly concerned for a huge mass of people (about one-fifth of the total population of India) who were referred to as Harijans or “children of God” by Mahatma Gandhi. The Harijans are outside the traditional caste system of India, and are considered to be out-castes, ritually impure, and therefore untouchables. They have a long history of oppression, an unsuccessful struggle for justice, and they continue to constitute the poorest of the poor.

Many Dalits became Christians during the Mass Movements in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries and comprise an estimated 70 percent of the Indian church. The advocates of Dalit theology strongly feel that hitherto the development of Indian Christian theology ignored this reality and wrote theologies addressing the higher castes, particularly the Brahmans. Various forms of Dalit theologies are making their mark both within ecumenical and evangelical churches, strongly underscoring the need to relate theologies to the needs of these masses.

All Asian theologians have one thing in common. There is a strong desire to address the context within which their people live. There is a missiological focus in their theologies, but this focus varies with one’s definition of mission. Evangelicals will stress the need to directly make known the redemptive message of Jesus Christ in the diverse context of Asia.

KEN GNANAKAN

Association of Evangelical Professors of Mission. See Evangelical Missiological Society.

Association of Professors of Mission. The Association of Professors of Mission (APM) was organized in 1954 by professors who were teaching mission in seminaries in the United States. R. Pierce Beaver was instrumental in its formation. The purpose of the association is to promote among its members fellowship, spiritual life, and professional usefulness in the study, teaching, and mobilization of mission.

The APM normally holds one annual meeting, usually the second week of June, often scheduled to coincide with the annual meeting of the American Society of Missiology (ASM). The annual meeting usually includes presentations, workshops, discussion groups, and sharing of experiences and resources related to the teaching of mission. Once every four or five years there is a presentation of the syllabi that members have developed for the teaching of mission.

Membership is open to professors of mission at member institutions of the American Association of Theological Schools and, by invitation of the executive committee, to other qualified persons. Members represent conciliar Protestant, Roman Catholic, evangelical, Pentecostal and charismatic traditions.

CHARLES VAN ENGEN

Association, the Socio-anthropology of. Of vital importance to the church’s mission in general and urban missions in particular is the study of voluntary associations or common interest groups that have accompanied rapid social change and urbanization. Not only should mission strategists capitalize on this, but anthropologically speaking, mission societies need to recognize that they themselves exist as part of this phenomenon.

At least thirty different disciplines, including missiology, sociology, and anthropology, currently recognize the significance of this topic. Distinct from what social scientists call primary groups or involuntary associations, which organize around such principles as age, sex, kinship, and territory, voluntary associations are secondary groupings, which organize around the principle of common interest or pursuit. In general, all of the above are subsumed under the larger subject known as social organization. Whereas involuntary groupings have existed universally as fundamental to the nature of society, voluntary groups have varied in nature and distribution depending upon the freedom of association allowed in the societies concerned (see also Sociology).

Mission agencies should carefully study common interest organizations as forms of social critique or dissent. This would help to surface some key perceived needs and tensions socially existing during the lifetime of a given association. In some contexts associations will exist as political buffers mediating between governments with their demands and citizens with their common desires. In other situations common interest organizations will serve to expand services that the members deem lacking in the society and larger world. In this context it is instructive to note that social scientists often classify associations functionally as being either expressive or instrumental. The former signifies that a group exists primarily to meet felt needs common to its members. Contrastingly, the latter is more extroverted in that its mission is to influence and change the larger world outside its own membership.

Additionally, a mission body should recognize its identity as a common interest, voluntary association and as such study itself in the same way it would analyze a target affinity group. This would function to heighten its own sensitivity and discernment, thus allowing it to better identify with and serve other groups.

An “association” can be defined anthropologically as any common interest group. An adequate theory of association should at least include such areas as: (1) workable definitions allowing for wide comparative study; (2) a knowledge of the formative conditions that give rise to organizations; (3) knowledge of common types and classifications of associations; (4) organizational structures; (5) assumptions, values, and expectations; (6) functions; (7) membership recruitment process; and (8) visibility profile.

The formative conditions of modern associations are best summed up under the rubrics of rapid sociocultural change and urbanization. In urban contexts associations often reflect perceived deficiencies of city life and the desire for the continuity of rural services such as ethnic identity, mutual aid, and bereavement support of minorities, immigrants, and migrant laborers. With respect to rural communities the growth of common interest organizations often mirrors a growing awareness of the larger world outside and a desire for elements of it.

Social scientists appeal to four major criteria in setting up taxonomies of associations: cultural domain, stated purpose, practical function, and organizational structure. Under cultural domain, groups may be classified as being religious, economic, political, educational, recreational, and so on. Using the criterion of manifest purpose, we might classify them as professional, welfare, pressure, prestige, or philanthropic. Practical function classification involves the expressive-instrumental dichotomy. Instrumental groups may be further classified as majoral, minoral, or medial associations depending on whether they serve the major interests of society, focus on minorities, or mediate between institutions, respectively. Organizational structure is the final classificatory criterion. Groups may be either corporate in that they are autonomous and representative, or they are federal, operating in a centralized fashion in accordance with the sentiments of their founders. In this regard, it is interesting to note that many associations ideally claim to be the former, but in reality conform to the latter.

A study of the core values and the associated assumptions and social expectations is vital in taking one to the very heart or ethos of a common interest group. Identifying and distilling these makes explicit the driving motivations behind any association. Further, it reveals two cardinal objectives of many voluntary associations; namely, those of influencing cultural transformation and cultural transmission. These are vital in validating an organization’s current existence as well as assuring its future continuity.

How associations recruit their membership and the visibility profile they maintain in the larger society are two valuable lines of inquiry. It is in this context that the subject of secret societies is often discussed. Even though the existence of secret societies is almost universal, cultures do differ as to the significance and meaning they attribute to the values of secrecy and exclusivity. Whereas in one context secrecy reveals the fear of oppression, in others it may serve to safeguard sacred cultural knowledge or to reinforce special social statuses.

Another fertile area of research is that of studying common interest groups in Scripture, such as Israel, Christ’s band of disciples, and the church itself. Technically, the church, while fulfilling the criteria of a secondary or voluntary association, could also be viewed as a primary or kinship group in the sense of it being a spiritual family with a common Father and culture.

Research in this area is of vital importance to the growing field of urban missions. There is also the need to identify and understand voluntary affinity organizations in broader national and international contexts as well. The recruitment process for associations should also be examined carefully to determine how one can effectively penetrate them for the sake of God’s kingdom. Manifest as well as latent values should be identified, realizing that in so doing one uncovers the objectives that serve to ensure the organization’s survival and impact. Such study should enable a more relevant incarnation of the gospel. The study of guilds, clubs, and secret societies in rural or traditional settings also has value for missionaries in terms of reflecting indigenous perceptions of the home culture as well as the world outside. Valuable insights about contextualization can be gained from study of the success or failure of local citizens’ attempts to organize around new ideas and activities.

DAVID A. NESS
Association, the Socio-anthropology of

Assurance of Salvation. The subjective confidence which genuine Christians are privileged to possess that they truly belong to God as his children and heirs of eternal life. Wesleyan-Arminian theology focuses on the reality of the present state of grace of Christians and the assurance that engenders, while Calvinism adds that this assurance includes the confidence that they will continue as believers throughout their life and when they die they will certainly go to be with Christ in heaven forever.

Calvinism closely links assurance to divine election and the perseverance of the saints (or ETERNAL SECURITY). Those whom God has predestined, he also saves, and this includes the initiation, continuation, and consummation of salvation (Rom. 8:28–30). God's persevering work in the lives of all true believers powerfully keeps them through the exercise of their faith for a waiting salvation (1 Peter 1:3–9). Grateful recognition of this results in assurance.

To this may be added Christ's own pledge to protect believers (John 6:37–40; 10:27–30), biblical promises of God's faithfulness and love (Phil. 1:6; Rom. 8:31–39; 2 Tim. 1:12), and assurances that Christians are privileged to know that they possess eternal life (1 John 5:13; John 3:36; 5:24). Trust in this testimony of the Word of God produces assurance.

Scripture also speaks of the fruit of transformed lives that may generate confidence. Entitling this the “witness of one's own spirit” (Rom. 8:16), Wesleyan theology points to the biblical descriptions of character qualities and good works which believers are expected to manifest. These include love for one another, obedience, and the fruit of the Spirit. When believers compare their lives with these marks of authentic Christian testimony and a favorable judgment is rendered, this witness of transformed lives gives a measure of assurance. Some forms of Calvinism also embrace this introspective approach.

Romans 8:16 and Galatians 4:6 present the Holy Spirit as another source of assurance of belonging to God. Distinguishing the “witness of one's own spirit” from the “witness of the (Holy) Spirit,” John Wesley affirmed this witness to be a direct testimony of the Spirit upon the hearts of believers, attesting to their being children of God.

Despite these several grounds of assurance, many Christians lack a subjective confidence. On the one hand, this may be due to persistent sin, grieving the Holy Spirit, or demonic deception; on the other hand, depression, personal anxiety, inability to appropriate the biblical promises of assurance, or simply ignorance of this scriptural teaching may result in an absence of assurance. Calvin noted that “Satan has no more previous or dangerous temptation to dishearten believers than when he unsettles them with doubt about their election.” As Barth affirms, however, “There can be no doubt that the Christian can and should have assurance of his faith and salvation.” Believers throughout history who have possessed a strong sense of assurance have stood fearlessly in giving testimony for Christ. Lucian, a pagan (second century), complained that Christians “have persuaded themselves that they will live forever, so they don't despise death.” In Calvin’s day, Geneva produced a “race of martyrs” spreading the gospel despite the threat of death. Convincing that their eternal destiny is secure, believers will forsake their comfortable and familiar life, cross into unknown cultures, adopt new languages and customs, face overwhelming confusion and stress, and even risk their lives for the sake of proclaiming the gospel of Christ. The history of Protestant mission during the last two hundred years is filled with the stories of thousands of cross-cultural missionaries whose assurance of salvation enabled them to give their lives, literally, for gospel proclamation.

Gregg R. Allison

Astrology. Form of divination that regards the stars and planets as powers that influence the lives and affairs of people and nations and seeks to predict what those influences will be. Astrology seems to have originated in Mesopotamia in the third millennium B.C., where it spread to India and appeared in Hinduism. Eventually it spread to Greece, where it reached its fullest development during the Hellenistic period. It was through Hellenistic influence that the Arab world was introduced to astrology and it persisted there in spite of the later prohibitions of the Qur’an. Forms of astrology also appeared in pre-imperial China, probably through Arabic influences, and it existed even in meso-American Mayan and Aztec cultures, though its sources there are uncertain.

Hindu astrology was part of the ancient Vedic literature and was also a part of medicine as well as a means of plotting the soul's likely plan in the present incarnation through natal charts that represented the individual's past karmic patterns. Chinese astrology is uniquely independent from Mesopotamian influences in its different zodiac and twelve animal signs that delineate human characteristics. It was Arabic astrology that eventually spread to the Western world in spite of biblical prohibitions through the translation of some Muslim works into Latin.

Several problems with astrology can be noted: (1) people who live above the Arctic Circle (66 degrees latitude) where the zodiac is not visible, can have no horoscope and thus were astrologically never born; (2) astrology is based on pre-Copernican astronomy and thus involves an untrue conception of the solar system; (3) before A.D. 1500 several planets like Uranus were never seen; thus if planets have influence then all previous horoscopes were invalid; (4) according to astrological logic identical twins should live identical lives, but they do not; (5) if planets that are closest influence more greatly, there should be mention of planet Earth's great influence; and (6) how can people with different horoscopes all die in a mass tragedy?

William H. Baker

See also Divination, Diviner.

Atheism. The English term “atheism” is derived from the Greek atheos, “without God,” and refers to a position that denies the existence of God. It is to be distinguished from agnosticism, which is the view that we cannot know whether God exists. In modern Western cultures atheism usually means denial of the existence of the Judeo-Christian God. In other religious contexts atheism means denial of the prevailing understanding of deity. Thus, Christians in the Roman Empire were accused of atheism for denying Greek and Roman polytheistic views. “Informal” or “practical” atheism occurs when, although belief in God is not explicitly denied, God is not allowed a significant place in one’s life.

Historically, Democritus and Epicurus advocated a form of materialistic atheism, and in modern Western thought atheism has been advanced by thinkers such as Karl Marx, Ludwig Feuerbach, Sigmund Freud, Friedrich Nietzsche, J. L. Mackie, and Antony Flew. The philosophical and scientific school of logical positivism earlier in this century embraced atheism, dismissing language about God as cognitively meaningless. Modern secular humanism is another pervasive form of atheism, at least to the extent that it finds “insufficient evidence for belief in the existence of the supernatural” and affirms that “no deity will save us; we must save ourselves” (Humanist Manifesto I).

Some religious traditions are atheistic as well. Theravada Buddhism, Zen Buddhism, and Jainism are atheistic in that they deny the reality of any transcendent supreme Being. Other traditions, such as some branches of Hinduism, philosophical Taoism, and certain schools of Mahayana Buddhism, view the religious ultimate in monistic or pantheistic terms. In a loose sense, these traditions can be regarded as atheistic from the perspective of monotheism.

William H. Baker

Atheistic Humanism. See Atheism.

Atlases, Mission. See Mission Atlases.

Atonement. The biblical concept of atonement refers to a God-provided and -approved means of paying the penalty for human violations of God’s law; a means which alleviates individuals from assuming that responsibility themselves. The need for atonement arises as a result of human sinfulness. Scripture teaches that all have sinned (Rom. 3:23). For that reason, human culpability is universal (Rom. 2:1). No one can claim exemption, regardless of culture, tradition, previous religious activities, or commitments. As a result, every individual ought to be made to pay the full price of her or his own sin, which is death and eternal separation from God (Rom. 6:23). However, Scripture also teaches that God has provided a way to fulfill the demands of divine justice which is reasonable and effective, but does not demand that the penalty be exacted from the individual.

The way in which God has chosen to resolve the problem of sin is by providing an alternative means of payment. In the Old Testament this was achieved primarily by means of animal sacrifice. The substitutes which will be accepted include the burnt offering (Lev. 1:4), the sin offering (Lev. 4:20; 7:7), and the offerings made on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:1–34). The clear teaching of the Old Testament is that unless some God-approved means of atonement is provided, individual sinners will themselves be required to pay the penalty.

In the New Testament the idea of atonement is focused on the person of Christ (Rom. 5:10). Reconciliation between God and humans is no longer achieved by animal sacrifice (Heb. 9:26; 10:4), but by the death of Christ (2 Cor. 5:19). The death of Christ was a reasonable and effective solution to the problem of human guilt because Christ was fully human and fully divine (Mark 10:45; 2 Cor. 5:21). Because Christ was fully human he was able to fully identify with the human state, was tested in every way as we are, yet without sin (Heb. 4:14–16). Because he was fully God, he was able to provide a payment
Atonement

(Rom. 3:25–26) of sufficient value to cover the transgression of all humanity (Heb. 10:5–10). The two poles of God’s salvific method are most evident on the cross. There he suffered death as any of us would have suffered it and at the same time experienced a suffering of immeasurable intensity, since he, the Son of God, had never sinned, but was separated from the Father by voluntarily taking upon himself the sins of the many and turning away the wrath of God (Rom. 3:25).

There is relatively little disagreement concerning the basic principles outlined above. Any individual who expresses faith in Christ is covered by this payment. However, since Scripture does not clearly specify the scope or extent of the atonement, this issue has precipitated considerable debate. The basic question is whether the atonement should be viewed as limited to a certain subset of the human race, the elect, or whether it should be viewed as a provision intended for all of mankind.

Those who suggest that the atonement is limited do so on the basis of a combination of biblical passages and the use of logical arguments. They point out that there are some passages which do define a limited group of recipients. Christ died for his own people (Matt. 1:21), his sheep (John 10:11), the church bought with his own blood (Acts 20:28), and those whom God predestined and called (Rom. 8:28–35). Further, they argue that since God’s will can never be countermanded, if he had intended for all to be saved, all would be saved. In addition, they point out that Christ did not die simply to make salvation possible, but to actually save certain individuals (Eph. 1:7; 2:8). They also fear that any other understanding of the atonement necessitates universalism.

The case for general atonement is made by appealing to Scripture passages and the history of doctrine. Scripture clearly states that Christ died for all and for the whole world (Isa. 53:6; 1 John 1:9; 2:2; 1 Tim. 2:1–6; 4:10, Heb. 2:4). There are no exegetical reasons for ascribing to these passages meanings other than the plain and inclusive sense they communicate. Proponents of general atonement also seek to demonstrate that it is the traditional position of the church. From the early church until today most of the fathers, reformers, exegetes, and theologians believed that Christ died for all. As for the danger of universalism, since salvation is only effective for those who express faith, suggesting that Christ made salvation possible for all in no way implies that all will be saved (John 3:16).

Whichever position is taken on the extent of the atonement, the evangelical understanding of the general principles of atonement have two significant implications for missions. First, if the problem of sin is universal then the message of atonement should be addressed to all. This presents no problem to the defenders of general atonement, but some have suggested that one of the consequences of a limited atonement would be to discourage the universal, urgent proclamation of the gospel. However, since there is no way for us to identify the elect ahead of time, the gospel message should still be addressed to all. If that is the case, we are under obligation to proclaim the message of Christ’s atoning work without reservation. It is to be proclaimed to all, in all places, and at all times.

Second, the method God chose to provide atonement will cause some to stumble. The message of the cross will lead to opposition, cause offense, and even be ridiculed (1 Cor. 1:18–29). The messengers will, of course, experience resistance. Blinded by sin, many will find the notion of a substitutionary death on the cross either offensive or foolish. That cannot be avoided. No manner of contextualization, effective communication, or marketing techniques can remove the offense of the cross. However, care should be given so that any offense occasioned by the person or the work of the messenger be kept to a minimum.

EDWARD ROMMEN

Attributes of God. See Divine Attributes of God.

Attrition. Departure from field service by missionaries, regardless of the cause. There are two general categories. Unpreventable attrition (understandable or acceptable) includes retirement, completion of a contract, medical leave, or a legitimate call to another place or ministry. Preventable attrition occurs “when missionaries, because of mismanagement, unrealistic expectations, systemic abuse, personal failure, or other personal reasons, leave the field before the mission or church feels that they should. In so doing, missionaries may reflect negatively on themselves, but of greater concern is the negative impact on the specific mission structure and the cause of world missions” (Taylor, 1997, 18).

Attrition has been a critical issue facing the church through its history. In the New Testament, Stephen is martyred, John Mark abandons the apostolic team but is later restored to ministry through Barnabas, and Demas apparently leaves for good without known restoration. Throughout mission history, attrition has been evident, reflecting the high cost of “sending mission,” whether through sickness, change of heart, inability to sustain cross-cultural ministry, or death on the field.

Facing the contemporary attrition challenges, the WORLD EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP Missions Commission carried out during 1995–97 a 14-nation study of attrition in 6 Old Sending Countries (OSC) and 8 New Sending Countries (NSC). This study generated significant data on attrition in 454 agencies (and some mission-sending churches) with some 23,000 long-term missionaries (one-sixth of the global missionary force, according to Patrick Johnstone). In terms of the global long-term missions force, one missionary in twenty (5.1% of the mission force) leaves the field yearly. Of these, 71% depart for preventable reasons. In other words, if we establish a global missionary force of 140,000, 5.1% overall annual attrition would be 7,140 people, and 71% of that figure suggests that 5,070 missionaries are returning home for what is called “preventable attrition.”

There are at least four perspectives regarding the causes of any specific case of attrition: (1) the reasons agency and church leaders believe they have heard and understood; (2) the recorded reasons in agency files; (3) the reasons missionaries hold in private or may share with closest friends; and (4) the reasons one can live with in public knowledge. The true human picture is always complex and no single perspective will be totally accurate.

Recent studies suggest that preventable attrition may be reduced by more and/or better (a) initial screening and selection procedures, (b) appropriate pre-field equipping/training for the task, and/or (c) field-based strategizing, shepherding, and supervising. Inadequate attention in any of these areas may result in unwanted attrition or, worse, the case of missionaries who should go home, for their own good and the good of the ministry, but do not.

Reducing attrition engages seven strategic missions stakeholders: missionaries (current, previous, future); missions mobilizers (the prime motivators); church leaders (pastors and committees); missionary trainers (regardless of type, size, or level of equipping program); mission sending bodies (churches and agencies); national receiving churches (where they exist); and member care providers (pastors, medical and mental health personnel). While attrition cannot be totally eliminated, it can be significantly diminished.

WILLIAM DAVID TAYLOR

SEE ALSO Drop Out.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

W. D. Taylor, Too Valuable to Lose: Exploring the Causes and Cures of Missionary Attrition.

THOMAS SCHIRMACHER

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Austine of Canterbury (d. c. 604). Churchman and missionary to England. Augustine was prior of St. Andrews monastery in Rome when he was commissioned by Gregory the Great in 596 to convert the pagan English and “refound” the church in England. He was a reluctant missionary, but one of duty who led a band of thirty monks to England. He was well received by Ethelbert, king of Kent, whose wife was already a Christian before their marriage. Within one year of his arrival, Augustine had converted the king and many of his people. In 597 Augustine traveled to Arlis, France, to be consecrated archbishop of Canterbury. Gregory then made him metropolitan bishop of England and established England’s independence from the French see. Augustine failed to regain the allegiance of the ancient Celtic church and was insensitive to local customs. He did, however, lay a firm foundation for the church in England through the establishment of the see at Canterbury and building of the monastery of Saints Peter and Paul in that city. Augustine’s evangelistic effort was limited primarily to Kent and the surrounding region, but led eventually to the conversion of all England.

KENNETH D. GILL

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bede, Ecclesiastical History; M. Deanesly, Augustine of Canterbury; V. L. Walker, EDT, p. 105.

Augustine of Hippo (354–430). Seminal African theologian and apologist. Aurelius Augustine, bishop of Hippo Regius in North Africa, is the most important Latin theologian of the Roman Catholic Church and the spiritual father of all the major Reformers. In many of his voluminous writings Augustine discusses problems of significance to missions, as he was actively involved in reaching African people as well as Roman citizens. Augustine held both a strong belief in God’s predestination of people and a strong conviction that it is the will of God to preach the gospel everywhere. He denied that the Great Commission was already achieved by the apostles on the basis of his personal awareness of barbarian tribes in Africa to whom the gospel had not yet been preached. He recognized that God had not promised that Abraham would be a blessing to the Romans alone, but to all the nations. Augustine held that the majority of the nations and people would become Christians before the return of Christ, a postmillennial element in his otherwise amillennial eschatology.

THOMAS SCHIRMACHER

BIBLIOGRAPHY

AUSTRALIA (Est. 2000 pop.: 19,222,000; 7,713,364 sq. km. [2,978,130 sq. mi.]). Though suspected of existence since classical times, and reconstituted in the seventeenth century, European settlement in Australia did not begin until a British penal settlement was founded at Port Jackson (Sydney) in 1788. "Almost as an afterthought," Pitt's government allowed placement of an evangelical Anglican chaplain, Richard Johnson, a nominee of the Eclectic Society and member of the CLAPHAM SECT. For the first fifty years of the colony, evangelical Anglicans would dominate the jail chaplaincy with the avowed intention of developing Australia as a base for mission. The second chaplain, Samuel Marsden, like Johnson a Yorkshireman with Eclectic links and Methodist sympathies, launched and coordinated the mission to New Zealand, from which activity he became known as the "Apostle to the Maoris." He has been less well treated by Australian historians, and it is clear that the policing functions of clergy in Australia defeated their missionary activities among the convicts.

The expulsion of LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (LMS) missionaries from Tahiti (1798) greatly strengthened Marsden's hand, and the Hassall, Lawy, and Marsden families would become closely related in developing Anglican and Methodist missions to the Pacific. Marsden's granddaughter, Eliza Hassall, started the first CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS) women's missionary training home in Sydney (1892), and worked closely with the British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS) and Scripture Union. Mary Hassall married Walter Lawy, and assisted him in Tonga, New Zealand, and the Pacific for the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society (WMMS). Australian overseas missions were restricted from large-scale development, however, by distance, small population, lack of wealth, and (until the 1860s) rudimentary church organization. While Sydney became a major "break of bulk" port for intentional missionaries routing through to Asia and the Pacific, both internal and foreign mission was inhibited by the flow of funds and personnel from European churches to higher profile destinations in Canada, Asia, and Africa. The trickle of Australian-born missionaries tended to join international agencies, such as the WMMS, which sent John Watsford to Fiji in 1841 and commenced Pacific missions in 1855. Emphasis on "civilization before Christianization," strongly held by Marsden, also restrained early missionary development.

Internally, missions to the indigenous peoples of Australia also progressed slowly. The first mission, begun at Lake Macquarie (1825), was suspended by the LMS after an argument between the missionary, Lancelot Threlkeld, and Marsden. Though resurrected on public subscriptions and state support, and despite success of translation, it was closed in 1841 with the decimation of Aboriginal populations by white squattting and dis-tions, local affiliates of the CMS which were later renamed, emerged from Marsden’s first attempt in 1825. In many of these, people of Brethren background, such as the Kitchens of Melbourne, the Decks and Youngs of New Zealand and Sydney, and philanthropists such as J. B. Nicholson, have had an influence disproportionate to their numbers.

In support of this upsurge of agencies, and following evangelical reactions against liberalization of theological training in university colleges, dedicated missionary training institutions arose through the 1910–40 period. Based on an earlier “Training Home for Missionaries, Kew,” in 1902 the tea merchants, the Griffith family, supported the opening of the Hiawatha training college for women (1902), almost at the same time as C. H. Nash opened St. Hilda’s deaconness training institute (1901), which went on to train for CMS and CIM purposes. Nash and a key circle of Melbourne evangelical businessmen were also fundamental to the opening of Ridley College (1910), Melbourne Bible Institute (1920, later BCV), and a chain of missionary agencies. In Adelaide, Angas College (1893) and Chapman-Alexander College (1913–26) trained for the CIM and interdenominational missions, a role filled in Sydney by the Sydney Missionary and Bible College (1916). These proliferated with the spread of sectarianism and the relocation of population, such that by 1990 there were some 135 colleges (including theological colleges such as Whitley and Moore Colleges) serving an Australian church-going population of no more than 3 million. Many of these operate within theological consortia, and numbers are being pressed toward merger as such realities as the aging of the evangelical population, de-denominationalism, and Pentecostalization bite into traditional arrangements.

With Canada and New Zealand, Australia has tended to be a high-level missionary sending country (per capita), though depending on the finance and organization flowing out of North America and Europe. Due to the dominance of evangelical Anglicanism in Australia, the CMS has been a particularly important agency, especially in East Africa, while Baptists have long-running work in India, and Presbyterians in Asia and the Pacific. All agencies have maintained work in New Guinea and Melanesia. Turnbull suggests that by 1990 there were over 2,700 full-time missionaries in the field, and many thousands more active in Tent Making and Short-Term Missions. Practical and down-to-earth, such missionaries have been particularly adapted to Faith Mission work, around the indigenizing principles first put into practice by William Carey. They have also shown an ability to internationalize and rise to leadership, examples being Kevin Dyer (International Teams); Colin Tilsley (Gospel Literature Outreach); Alan Adams (Operation Mobilization ship Logos); James Duffecy (Open Air Campaigners); Edward Gault (Christian Medical College, Vellore); Stacey Woods (International Fellowship of Evangelical Students); and Vincent Craven (Inter-Varsity Fellowship). Alan Tippett’s missiology has also had a significant impact, particularly through Fuller Seminary.

At the close of the twentieth century, Australia’s evangelical missionaries were working all around the globe, and its missions were partaking in the global trends toward mission partnerships, short-term missions, growing numbers of Pentecostal missionaries, and missionary exchange with former receiving cultures. Piggin and others have demonstrated the extent of the “reflex” impacts of missions on Australian society, seen in the importation of Solomon Islands spirituality, the growth of ethnic churches (particularly Chinese, Korean, Vietnamese, Samoan, Fijian, etc.), an increasingly pluralistic Australian culture, the training of leaders, and the development of an Australian political and economic profile in the Pacific. Missionary numbers continue to rise, suggesting a continuing influence in global evangelical missions.

Mark Hutchinson

Australian Evangelical Alliance. A national body designed to assist churches, associations, and individuals to share God’s love for a suffering world, preach the gospel, and make disciples, the Australian Evangelical Alliance works at both national and state levels. Most of the national ministries operate through four commissions: The Evangelical Alliance Response (TEAR) Fund, Missions Interlink, the Theological Commission, and the Commission on Women’s Concerns. Branches of the Alliance function in five states in the form of volunteer committees. The Alliance is a member of the World Evangelical Fellowship and regional fellowships in Asia and the Pacific. In 1959 a coalition of one hundred leading evangelicals formed the Evangelical Alliance of Australia with the purpose of inviting Billy Graham. This organization was significant because it represented an attempt to work nationally instead of state by state. The Graham crusades made an immediate impact on Australians. A high profile was gained for evangelicals, and thousands of people were converted and joined the churches. The clergy were encouraged to preach the gospel within their churches, and so the effects of the crusades continued for a prolonged period of time. The Alliance fulfilled its objectives and, with no major task on its agenda, decided to disband.
Australian Evangelical Alliance

However, some evangelicals perceived a need to work together in their home states. Ten years after the Graham visit, state evangelical alliances had been formed in New South Wales, South Australia, Tasmania, and Victoria; and evangelical missionary alliances were formed in New South Wales and Tasmania. These state organizations met in Canberra, the national capital, in May 1972 and formed the Australian Evangelical Alliance. The decision to form a national body to represent evangelicals at a time when Australians did not really possess a national mind-set either politically or ecclesiastically was both courageous and significant for the future. No structural continuity existed between the old Evangelical Alliance and the new, but many of the same people were actively involved. Howard H. E. Knight was one of the mission leaders of the day who played a significant role in the inauguration of the Alliance and the launching of TEAR Fund.

While the Alliance offers a variety of services to its members and maintains a number of projects and communications, its major contribution to the nation and the world is through its commissions. The activities of TEAR Fund in the United Kingdom inspired the establishment of a TEAR Fund in the State of Victoria in 1970. When the national Alliance was formed in 1972, the state quickly devolved the TEAR operation, recognizing that it properly belonged to the national body. The existence and operations of TEAR demonstrate that evangelicals are concerned about the welfare of the whole person. TEAR provides a credible and Christian alternative for evangelicals to channel development and relief funds to areas of great need. In recent years, TEAR has made a significant contribution by providing programs designed to educate people concerning the biblical and practical issues involved in development ministries.

The Missions Commission, now known as Missions Interlink, was not formed until January 1986. Prior to that time, a missionary fellowship had been established in New South Wales and an interdenominational missionary fellowship in Victoria. These two bodies functioned reasonably well at a state level for fifty years. However, national mission leaders and other influential Christians perceived that national and international needs were not being met. Ron Clough, the executive secretary of the Alliance, was a catalyst in bringing the New South Wales and Victoria fellowships together with other mission leaders in a national forum, where the decision was taken to form a national commission. In 1996, the membership of Missions Interlink was composed of sixty national missions, seven training institutions, and five related organizations. Ten denominational agencies were among the sixty member missions. Interlink records revealed that another thirty smaller agencies held membership in state branches but not in the national body. Member missions supported 1,850 missionaries working overseas and 1,485 home staff. The home staff included individuals working as missionaries to aboriginal people in Australia, workers among university students, and the employees of large Christian aid agencies. Since 1995, member missions have been cooperating to provide training and educational resources to the churches in an attempt to raise the level of missions awareness.

The two remaining commissions are in the early stages of their operation. The Theological Commission is cooperating with a Christian publisher to produce materials that present a biblical viewpoint on contemporary issues. The Commission on Women's Concerns has drawn together women from various Christian organizations with a view to enabling more women to become actively involved in kingdom ministry.

The evangelical movement within Australia is much wider than the Evangelical Alliance. It includes groups such as AD 2000, the Lausanne Movement, the Awakening Movement, March for Jesus, Reclaim Easter; and significant prayer and evangelism associations in all of the state capitals. Dialogue between a number of these groups may result in a grand coalition of evangelicals on a national scale. What this will mean for the Evangelical Alliance remains to be seen.

The church and community are waiting to see a united effort. At present, the church in Australia is undergoing significant change as leaders strive to make the church and its message relevant within the second most multicultural society on earth. A renewed church will emerge with fewer traditional and denominational restrictions. If the many evangelical groups can find a common purpose and integrate their valuable resources to serve the church, then we may see a repeat of the harvest times experienced when Billy Graham preached the gospel in 1959.

Australian Mission Boards and Societies. Overview. Australian churches have been sending and supporting missionaries for more than a century. Each of the ten evangelical denominations have mission boards and/or societies. In addition, Australia has at least ninety interdenominational agencies. Thirty of these are either new or small and are not registered as members of Missions Interlink, the national missions association.

The Australian missions family is diverse. Some missions have a long, rich heritage; others carry the zeal of a new vision. Some have strong international linkages; others have only a small local committee of volunteers. Some have more than one hundred missionaries; others support indigenous church workers. In 1995, Australian missions who were members of Missions Interlink supported 1,850 overseas workers and 1,485 home staff. These figures do not include overseas indigenous church workers who are also supported by Australian churches and societies.

The Path to the Present. Australia is an island nation. Before the days of relatively cheap and fast jet travel, most Australians did not venture out of the country. They lived in a country where the churches exercised considerable influence and where every child was taught religion in school. The Second World War ended the isolation. Young Australians fought in a war far from home. While some returned home embittered and sad, others brought with them a new understanding of the needs of the world and of other peoples and cultures. This awareness strengthened the missionary cause and resulted in a new wave of voluntarism. In the fifty years since the war, the advent of television, overseas travel, and access to modern technology have further reduced the insularity of many Australians. Modernity has brought a negative side as well, which hinders the efforts of both churches and mission societies.

Along the path to the present, the mission societies have been forced to change and adapt to ensure their long-term viability. Some changes have been of great significance. Formerly, missionaries received financial support by one of three methods—a salary from the mission, a share of gifts made to the general fund of the mission, or whatever the Lord supplied through churches and friends. While some denominational boards still pay salaries, most boards have introduced a system of team support for their missionaries. The change has meant a better income for most missionaries, but it has negatively impacted their time for rest during home assignment, as well as the general funds of their mission.

A second bittersweet change has been the change in relationships with emerging national churches. It has been satisfying to see the young churches come of age, but it has also been painful for the mission to deal with the transition in relationships from parent to partner. Problems have surfaced regularly around requests from the new church for workers and funding which appear to the society to be unwarranted.

Other areas of change include the struggle to keep up with available technology; the inroads of modernity; the frustration of having to process and prepare candidates who come from dysfunctional families or immature churches; the realization that the gospel has a holistic application (see Holistic Mission); the need for Contingency Plans to safeguard missionaries in an increasingly hostile world; the need to prepare tentmakers for ministry in creative access countries (see Tentmaking Mission); and the urgent need to recruit people under thirty years of age as career missionaries and board members.

Contemporary Challenges. Underlying most of the contemporary challenges facing Australian mission boards and societies is the need to understand the thinking of young people under thirty years of age, in order to recruit them as long-term career missionaries and board members. Missions Interlink has set a goal of identifying one thousand young people who have decided to become missionaries in the future and to nurture them toward meaningful involvement in the missionary movement.

A second challenge relates directly to the need to recruit young people. At least 20 percent of Australian societies cannot remain viable with their current level of staff or finances. Some have reduced home staff in order to lessen expenditure. The way societies finance their operations is under review by those societies who have the expertise. The concept of team support will be challenged and reviewed. Some larger churches are challenging the concept now, by fully supporting their own workers but not allowing for the societies’ costs. Some societies are in dialogue with possible compatible partners with a view to amalgamation. Unless the size of the resource base can be enlarged, it seems inevitable that some societies will soon cease to exist.

One way of increasing the level of support for the missionary task is to mount an effective education program in the churches about the biblical basis for the mission of the church and the ways in which the church can be involved in changing the world. Many pastors cannot undertake this task, so the missions must. The small number of missions who already have church education programs cannot meet the demand.

Proper care of the missionary family will be a prime responsibility, especially for the younger generations who demand this. Care begins with proper candidate processing, orientation, and training. Care continues to be a responsibility through a term of missionary service, and extends through debriefing and reentry to the home scene (see Member Care in Missions).

Finally, Australian boards and societies will face the dual challenges of completing the task with the churches they have already started and finding the keys to successful church planting in the more resistant Hindu, Buddhist, and Islamic cultures.

John Tanner

Austria

Austria (Est. 2000 pop.: 8,148,000; 83,853 sq. km. [32,376 sq. mi.]). This small country in the heart of Europe, roughly the size of Maine (32,368 sq. miles) and populated by about 8 million people, has made a significant contribution to Western culture out of proportion to its size. While most Americans know the country from the movie The Sound of Music, several Austrians, including S. Freud, the father of modern psychoanalysis, the artists E. Schiele and G. Klimt, the composers W. A. Mozart, J. Strauss, J. Haydn, and G. Mahler, and L. Wittgenstein, one of this century's greatest philosophers who is noted particularly for his work on language, excelled in their respective fields.
Austria

History. Austria consists of nine provinces and shares borders with eight other countries: Germany, Czech Republic, Slovakia, Hungary, Slovenia, Italy, Switzerland, and Liechtenstein. The native language is German. Vienna, the country's capital since 1156, is located at the crossroads of Eastern and Western Europe. A diplomatic hub, it has been one of the permanent seats of the United Nations since 1979. The local university, one of the oldest in Europe, was founded in 1365. Once the center of the large Austro-Hungarian Empire (1867–1918), the city hosts cultural treasures in its many museums, churches, and palaces. Politically, Austria was ruled by two major dynasties: the Bavarian house of the Babenbergs (976–1282) and the Habsburgs (1282–1918). In 1919 Austria was constituted as a federal republic (“First Republic”), organized as a parliamentary democracy with a bicameral legislative body. The country was annexed by Hitler's German army in 1938 (Austria's role during World War II remains ambiguous and the subject of debate). The territory was occupied by the Allied forces from 1945 to 1955 and obtained its status as an independent nation (“Second Republic”) with the obligation of permanent neutrality on May 29, 1955. The fall of the Soviet Empire in 1989 enabled Austria to join the European Union (EU) on January 1, 1995. In 1996 Austria celebrates the millennium of its existence (first extant reference to “ostarrîchi” in 996). Termed by its own inhabitants as an “island of the blessed,” Austria is indeed privileged with breathtaking scenic beauty, particularly the Alps, and a rich cultural heritage. On the dark side, however, Austria has Europe's highest per capita consumption of alcohol, one of the highest abortion rates, and high instances of suicides and illegitimate births (26% in 1993).

Religion. The predominant religion of Austria is Roman Catholicism (78%), with a small contingent of Protestants of whom most are Lutheran (5%). Other legally recognized religions include various branches of the Orthodox Church, Judaism, Islam, Buddhism, the Old Catholic Church (which split from the Roman Catholic Church in 1871 over the doctrine of papal infallibility), the Methodist Church, and the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter-Day Saints (Mormons). Among other privileges, the Austrian Constitution grants these religions the right to public worship, the right to administer their own internal affairs, and the entitlement to religious instruction at public schools. Relations between the Roman Catholic Church and the state were regulated by the Concordat of 1933–34 (renegotiated between 1957 and 1962). A similar arrangement was enacted with the Protestant Church in 1961. Evangelicals, numbering less than one percent of the population, are not officially recognized and are frequently considered to be a cult, along with the Jehovah's Witnesses and the Mormons, both of whom maintain a strong presence. The veneration of Mary continues at the many Marian shrines. A sizable number of Austrians are also involved in the occult, including white and black magic, witchcraft, fortune-telling, and other practices. The New Age movement and other esoteric involvements, likewise, exercise considerable appeal.

Mission. The gospel was first brought to the territory occupied by Austria today by Roman legionnaires and merchants (Vienna's name was Vindobona). Florian and forty others were the first Austrians to suffer Christian martyrdom in Lauriacum (near Enns) during a period of persecution under Diocletian. Severin (d. 482) worked as a missionary in the Danube area during the time of great migration. Later, population shifts erased all traces of Christianity. After the migrations, the west of present-day Austria was christianized by the Bavarians. The diocese of Salzburg was founded as early as the seventh century owing to the initiative of Rupert (c. 650–718). Irish missionaries and Bavarian monks reevangelized the region during the eighth century. Increasingly, the Christian faith in Austria was tied to the pope in Rome, but in the course of the sixteenth century, the Reformation swept through Austria, and by 1570 Austria had largely become Protestant. The Habsburg Counter-Reformation, however, forcefully reconverted Austria to Roman Catholicism. At the apex of persecution in the winter of 1731, twenty thousand Protestants were driven out of the province of Salzburg. Only in 1781, Joseph II, son of the famous Austrian Empress Maria Theresa, issued an Edict of Toleration, ushering in a period of greater religious freedom. More recently, the Baptist church was founded in 1869; the Methodist church followed in 1870. The years following World War II witnessed a steady increase in evangelical missionary activity. In 1981 an Austrian Conference of Evangelical Churches (ARGEGÖ) was formed. However, this association lacks government recognition, and the Roman Catholic Church remains by far the most visible religious body in Austrian public life. While renewal (including charismatic) movements are found in parts of the Roman Catholic and Lutheran state churches, nominalism looms large, and the country is in urgent need of evangelization.

Andreas J. Köstenberger

Authority (of the Bible). See INERRANCY.

Aviation Mission Work. Every four minutes a small airplane takes off somewhere in the service of evangelical churches and missions. Two-thirds of these planes are operated by Mission Aviation Fellowship (MAF) and most of the rest by Wycliffe, AIM, or New Tribes. From a peak of nearly three hundred aircraft in 1985, the number of mission aircraft has slowly declined. Two or three missionaries used airplanes briefly before World War II. After the war, Christian military pilots came together with a vision to use their skills in world evangelization. In 1945 former test pilot Betty Greene became the first MAF field pilot, serving Wycliffe in Mexico. By the early 1950s airplanes were serving several missions in Sudan, Central America, Amazonia, and New Guinea. A few individual missionaries flew their own planes. Airplanes saved travel time. A one-hour flight replaced two or three weeks of land travel. Airplanes helped locate unreached jungle peoples and supported missionaries in places where they could not otherwise survive. Medical emergencies and war and famine relief have also played major roles. MAF cut costs by combining service to all the missions in a region, eventually providing regular service to over 160 different mission boards. At first airplanes primarily served Western missionaries but as the Third World church grew, service increasingly shifted to indigenous leaders.

Over half of all mission pilots and mechanics have trained at Moody Aviation, a department of Moody Bible Institute. Wild terrain, primitive airstrips, and lack of navigational aids make the work treacherous and over two dozen mission pilots have died in crashes.

Most mission aircraft are simple four- or six-passenger machines, but a few helicopters and larger planes are also being used. AirServ International, an MAF spinoff, has used huge Russian assault transports to fly thousands of tons of food to war and famine victims in Africa.

Charles Bennett

Azariah, Vedanayakam Samuel

Azariah, Vedanayakam Samuel (1874–1945). Indian missions promoter. Born to an evangelical Anglican pastor and his wife at Vellalanvillai in the Tinnevelly district of Madras state, he graduated from Madras Christian College and was appointed secretary to the YMCA of South India. In 1902 Azariah had an encounter with an indigenous mission society that convinced him that India had to take responsibility for its own evangelization. He is credited with being founder of the Indian Missionary Society of Tinnevelly in 1903 and the National Missionary Society of India in 1905.

Azariah was ordained as the first Indian bishop in the Anglican Church in 1909 and attended the World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh in 1910. There he made a plea for greater freedom for Indian church leaders. In 1912 he was placed in charge of the diocese of Dornakal. The six pastors under his care worked mainly with outcasts. He promoted evangelism and Christian unity in India and was determined that Indian Christianity should be indigenous. He lived to see a diocese of over one hundred thousand members where forty years before there had been only eight thousand.

Azariah participated in several international ecumenical gatherings, including the TAMBARA Conference of 1938, where he delivered one of the major addresses. He was one of the faithful who paved the way for the formation of the United Church of South India and the World Council of Churches.
Azariah, Vedanayakam Samuel

KENNETH D. GILL

Azerbaijan (Est. 2000 pop.: 7,969,000; 86,600 sq. km. [33,436 sq. mi.]). Azerbaijan is an oil- and mineral-rich republic of the former Soviet Union located in the southern Caucasus region on the Caspian Sea. The dominant ethnic group, known as the Azeris, are a Turkic people, closely related to most of the major ethnic groups of ex-Soviet Central Asia. At least 80 percent of the people are at least nominally Muslim (70 percent Shi’a; 30 percent Sunni), and although religious freedom is officially guaranteed, foreigners are barred from engaging in “religious propaganda.” Evangelicals are extremely few, probably numbering less than one thousand, most of whom are ethnic Russians.

RAYMOND P. PRIGODICH

SEE ALSO Commonwealth of Independent States.
Baba, Panya (1932– ). Nigerian missions organizer and advocate. Born in Karu in north-central Nigeria of converted animist parents, he came to personal faith in Christ as an early teen. His education included study at Karu Bible Training School, Kagoro (Nigeria) Bible College, All Nations Christian College (U.K.), and Fuller School of World Mission (U.S.). Baba’s many accomplishments were recognized in the rewarding of an honorary doctorate by Igbaja Theological Seminary (Nigeria).

Baba’s ministry experience has included pastoral service and church administrative office, including two terms as president of Evangelical Church of West Africa (ECWA) denomination (1988–94). His primary contributions to missions have come as director of the Evangelical Mission Society of ECWA, Africa’s largest indigenous mission society (1970–88), and as mission consultant and foreign missions director for ECWA (1994– ). He had a major role in establishing the Nigeria Evangelical Missions Association, a coordinating body for indigenous Nigerian missions agencies, and served as its first chairman. Other international missions committee memberships have included the WEF Missions Commission, Third World Missions Advance Steering Committee, and the International Board of the AD 2000 Movement. As a respected spokesman on all aspects of cross-cultural missions, particularly African issues, he has been a primary contributor at numerous missions consultations worldwide.

Baba is an outspoken advocate of cooperation and partnership between indigenous churches and indigenous mission agencies and between Western and non-Western mission agencies. In 1996, as a direct result of his vision and initiative, twelve SIM-related national church denominations on three continents (Africa, South America, Asia) formed the Evangelical Fellowship Missions Association for the purpose of stimulating prayer and information sharing, the formation of national missionary movements, and coordinating joint mission efforts. He has helped develop cooperative strategies for the training, sending, and sponsorship of missionaries by Western and non-Western mission agencies in partnership, an important trend in evangelical missions in the future.

Babel. Genesis 11:1–9 is a sharp polemic against the pretensions of the collective human self-sufficiency in rebellion against God. Its missionary and missiological relevance can be seen from noting its place in the history of God’s redemptive work and revelation.

This is a representative episode of opposition to the purpose of the Lord following the judgment of the flood. The nations descended from Noah (Gen. 10) were implicitly required to disperse over the earth to fulfill the creation mandate (Gen. 1:28), reiterated in the covenant of preservation (Gen. 8:15–9:17). This was with a view to the redemptive purpose encapsulated in the prophecy of Noah (Gen. 9:25–27), to be fulfilled by the coming of Christ. But the line of Nimrod (“Let us rebel”), the descendant of Ham, founds Babel (Babylon[ia]) (Gen. 10:8–10), which meant “Gate of God” in its Babylonian form (but, mockingly, “confusion” in Hebrew).

The self-aggrandizing aim and motive of “making a name” for themselves and resisting dispersion was not only disobedience; it also implied a spurning of the promise given to Noah that the true intent of Eden would be restored. Artificial sacred mountains (ziggurats) in the Babel area, according to the later versions of Babylonian myths, aimed at idolizing humanity were the very antithesis of the goal of the city of God. Babel therefore epitomized the universal resistance of fallen humanity to God. If unthwarted it threatened to produce the demonic counterpart of the kingdom or rule of God. As by the eating of the tree of knowledge people became, in an ironic sense, like God (Gen. 3:22), so now, with equal irony, humans are potentially omnipotent, and (implicitly) evilly so (v. 6). Therefore the Lord comes in judgment, but also in grace, to confuse and disperse: he prevents any preemipping triumph of self-sufficient, self-determining human society, and so averts the necessity of destroying humankind.

This common-grace restraint of sin and its effects preserves humankind for the redemption to come (v. 9).

The immediately following focus on Shem (Gen. 11:10), associated with blessing (9:26–27), and then on Terah, the father of Abraham and his kin (11:27), is not accidental: through Abraham all peoples will be blessed (12:3).

The reversal of both the confusion-scattering of Babel and its sinful human assertion is Pentecost. There the special redemptive grace, applying the work of the risen Christ, is symbolically and representatively poured out on all the nations, through the Jews and proselytes present. They are gathered, not scattered now, and all hear what God has done in Christ in the language of their own region; they repent and are baptized for the forgiveness of their sins. This prefigures the “purifying the lips of the peoples” and the “gathering” home of God’s people (Zeph. 3:9, 20), of which the missionary task is the instrument.

JOHN A. MCINTOSH

Bachelor’s Degrees in Mission. Bachelor-level educational programs served as one of the primary training grounds for missionaries in the twentieth century. Bible colleges and to a smaller extent church-related Christian colleges and universities have contributed to the stream of missiological training. North Americans and Northern Europeans dominated this training for the first three-quarters of the century. However, in the last quarter of the century the picture changed.

Raymond Windsor in the World Directory of Missionary Training Programs states that prior to 1975 only thirty non-Western training programs existed. However, since 1975 more than 125 new programs have emerged in the non-Western world. In 1995 at least 117 bachelor’s programs in thirty-six countries were catalogued. This listing, however, while a substantial and representative sample, should not be seen as comprehensive.

Three institutions stand out among the North American options during the first half of the century. Their alumni accounted for about 40 percent of the North American missionary force during that era. These three institutions include: Moody Bible Institute, Prairie Bible Institute, and Columbia Bible College (now Columbia International University).

The emergence of the importance of the Bible College movement as a significant training arena for missions coincided with the Student Volunteer Movement and the Faith Mission movement. The Student Volunteer movement served as the motivating force while the Faith Mission movement served as the receiving context for the ministries of the graduates. The Bible College movement followed the rise of the Bible Institutes of the late nineteenth century and early twentieth century, providing four essential components of their training. Kenneth Mulholland suggests that the biblical, practical, contextual, and spiritual development of these colleges served to well equip the surge of North American missionaries. Similar emphases were present in institutions in the United Kingdom as well in such institutions as All Nations Bible College, London Bible College, and Glasgow Bible College.

The multiplication of missionary training programs in the non-Western world parallels the growth of evangelical and Pentecostal churches in the same regions. Now more missionaries are being sent from non-Western missions than from Western missions. They are being sent from a correspondingly larger non-Western Christian community than is found in the West.

This brief survey has not considered the scores of postsecondary-level programs that do not necessarily eventuate in a bachelor’s degree. This survey similarly has not considered the many programs offered in many universities both Christian and secular. Some secular universities have evangelical faculty who take initiatives to assist in the training of missionaries at a bachelor’s level. And some colleges still offer degrees assist in the training of missionaries at a bachelor’s level.

While other higher level educational programs including master’s and doctoral programs also proliferated during the twentieth century, bachelor’s degrees served as the backbone of Western missionary training through the period. It appears that given the present proliferation of non-Western bachelor’s degrees in mission the trend will continue in the non-Western world in the early part of the twenty-first century.

EDGAR J. ELLISTON

Baedeker, Friedrich Wilhelm (1823–1906). German-born English missionary to Russia. Baedeker was born in Witten in 1823. He lost his first wife in 1852 after a few months of married life, moved to Britain, traveled to Tasmania, then settled in Weston Super Mare in 1859, and remarried there in 1862. The Baedeckers led a respected but worldly upper-class life. Their conversion through evangelistic meetings led by Lord Radstock in 1866 drastically changed their lives.

His German background made Baedeker a transmitter of the Holiness Revival message to his native country, where he became one of the leading figures in the annual Blankenburg Alliance Conference and also one of the founders of the Alliance Bible School in Berlin (1905).

His main ministry was in the Russian Empire (1887–89) and other Eastern European countries. In St. Petersburg he was one of God’s instruments in the revival among the Russian nobility. His initial intention was to reach the millions of German Russians, but his evangelistic vision expanded to include all the nationalities of the vast empire. His most intensive ministry was among prisoners, whom he visited even in the most remote locations of Siberia and Sachalin. He combined his evangelistic work with assistance to the needy, also looking after those who were imprisoned for their faith and working for religious freedom. He died in 1906 in Weston Super Mare.

KLAUS FIELDER

Bibliography. R. S. Latimer, Dr. Baedeker and His Apostolic Work in Russia; J. Marchant, ed., Deeds Done for Christ.

Baha’i. Although the Baha’i religion emerged from the Shi’ite sect of Islam, it has suffered more persecution from Shi’ites in Iran—especially since the 1979 Islamic revolution—than from any other group. This persecution is due largely to the fact that Baha’i believes in a later divine revelation that supersedes the QUR’AN. Baha’i has an estimated 5 million adherents, most of whom are located in Asia and Africa, and appears to be growing worldwide.

The fundamental teaching of Baha’i, from which other teachings stem, is the unity of the human race. Baha’i also teaches that, in spite of minor differences among them, all religions share a basic unity and have a common origin. All of the major religions are regarded as partial messengers of truth. Religion, science, and education should work together to produce a harmonious world in which the extremes of wealth and poverty are abolished. Baha’i is one of the few religions apart from Christianity to teach the absolute equality of the sexes. Baha’i believe that each person should search independently for truth, without influence from superstition or tradition. In addition, the emphasis upon world unity in Baha’i leads to concern for one common universal language and compulsory education for all.

Shi’ite Islam had taught that Ali, Muhammad’s son-in-law and legitimate successor, was succeeded by a series of descendants, the last of whom disappeared in the ninth century A.D. It was believed that he would reappear someday as a messiah. In 1844 Ali Muhammad declared that he was the promised imam or successor of Ali and called himself Bab ud Din (“the gate of faith”). He became a reformer, advocating radical changes such as raising the status of women, which raised the ire of the political leaders in Persia. The Bab, as he was called, was executed in 1850, but before his death he predicted that another would come and establish a universal religion.

One disciple of the Bab, Husayn Ali, was imprisoned in Tehran and then exiled to Baghdad for ten years. During this time he came to the conclusion that he was the predicted founder of the new religion. He assumed the name Bahá’ Ulláh (“the glory of God”), and surviving followers of the Bab (called Babís) became known as Baha’ís. After years of being driven from one Middle Eastern city to another, the Baha’ís were imprisoned in a Turkish prison at Akko, in modern Israel.

From this prison Bahá’ Ulláh sent out missionaries to spread his teachings and wrote many books and letters before his death in 1892. His son, Abdul Bahá, carried on his program and in 1908 was released from prison. He traveled widely in Europe and North America, spreading his teachings of peace, for which he received the honor of knighthood of the British Empire. Upon his death in 1921, his grandson Shoghi Effendi continued the work. Although there are no priests in Baha’i, the community builds temples in various locations for worship. The principal center is in Haifa, Israel, near the graves of Bahá’ Ulláh and the Bab.

WILLIAM H. BAKER

Bahamas (Est. 2000 pop.: 295,000; 13,878 sq. km. [5,358 sq. mi.]). An archipelago of seven hundred coral islands, the Bahamas lie between Florida and Cuba. Although there is little agricultural potential, the group’s proximity to the United States has made it a useful staging area for offshore economic activities, rum-running in the 1920s, and more recently banking, oil refining, tourism, and drug trafficking. More than two-thirds of the population is Protestant, about half of whom are evangelicals.

EVERETT A. WILSON

See also Caribbean.

Bahamas
Bahrain

Bahrain (Est. 2000 pop.: 633,000; 678 sq. km. [262 sq. mi.]). A group of islands twenty-five miles off the east coast of Saudi Arabia and recently connected to the mainland by a causeway comprise the country of Bahrain. The population is composed of the original Bahraini, Iraqi, Palestinian, Egyptian, and Saudi Arabian Arabs. These people make up 72 percent of the population. The rest of the inhabitants have come from Iran, India, Korea, and Western countries.

The discovery of oil changed the economy from pearl diving and fishing to one of refineries and a center for international banking. Bahrain has become the strategic center for all of Arabia.

Stewart, The Nestorian Enterprise, mentions that there was a bishopric in A.D. 225. In modern times the first American missionaries secured an upper room near the pearl bazaar in 1892. People were hostile at the time to all outsiders and unwilling to rent to Christians. They had no medical or surgical help. There did not appear to be any desire for progress. Stagnation reigned and self-satisfaction with Islam quenched hopes of development.

Samuel Zwemer arrived in 1895 and began medical missions. He reached out from Bahrain to other parts of Arabia. The Reformed Church of America continued there, developing their Bahrain station as one of their largest outposts. It includes an excellent hospital, high standard schools, and the church founded by Zwemer. This church now hosts eight different congregations worshiping in as many languages. In the whole of the country there are now more than forty-five groups or fellowships with the majority of believers belonging to the Anglican and evangelical groups.

Among the expatriate workforce are Christian believers from Iraq, India, Egypt, Korea, and Western countries who make up the 7 percent Christian minority. With the new causeway connecting the islands with the mainland many Saudis go over to shop and enjoy entertainment in the less restrictive atmosphere of Bahrain. Many Bibles have been distributed and a large Christian bookstore affords a good selection of books in Arabic as well as other languages. Bahrain has become a center for tours into Arabia and the Gulf areas. With the large number of believers in the country and the moderate outlook of the ruling family there is a possibility of the church there being the staging area for further penetration of the peninsula.

George E. Kelsey

Baker, Amelia Dorothea (Kohlhoff) (1801–88). German missionary wife and widow in South India. Born in Tanjore, she was the granddaughter of a German Lutheran missionary, and married the young CHURCH MISSION SOCIETY (CMS) missionary, Henry Baker, in 1818. They served in Cottayam, in Travancore, where, in addition to bearing and bringing up a large family she commenced and managed a girls’ school. In 1866, after her husband’s death, she continued, now as a widow and with acknowledgment, the work she had already been carrying on for over forty years. She remained at Cottayam until her death. Her son (b. 1819) became a CMS missionary, and three daughters married CMS missionaries. Five granddaughters and a grandson also worked for the Anglican Church, and female descendants were engaged in girls’ education well into the twentieth century. In addition to the great contribution made by her family, Amelia Baker deserves to be remembered as one of the many missionary widows who, continuing to work on after their husbands’ death—in her case for eighteen years—proved to the missionary society the worth of a woman’s contribution, and in fact opened the way for a greater use of single women.

Jocelyn Murray

Baldwin, Mary Briscoe (1811–79). American missionary to Greece and Palestine. Though she felt that the lofty calling of becoming a missionary was one too high for her and reserved for only the most spiritual of people, God made it distinctly clear to this Virginian teenager that he had chosen her for such a task. While helping a friend investigate possible missionary openings, Baldwin discovered that the only opening, an overseas position, was one that she herself ardently desired. Having met the missionaries already working in Greece a year earlier while attending a conference, she applied and was approved to go to Greece to help educate the Greek and Cretan refugee peoples. She became the first female overseas missionary to come from Virginia.

In order to meet the physical and spiritual needs of the people, the veteran Greek missionaries envisioned an education system that would teach students both a skill and the message of Christ. Baldwin facilitated this vision by teaching a sewing class—a novelty in itself, considering there were no professional seamstresses in Athens at that time. Her enthusiasm and commitment to these women won her the title of “Good Lady Mary” from her pupils as well as the community.

Baldwin became the legal guardian of her sister’s three children. This ignited her desire to open a boarding school, especially for Cretan upper-class girls. Because the mission was unable to support such a venture financially, Baldwin used her own inheritance to start the school. While realizing her students’ need for a good education, an understanding of Christ took precedence. Together with the other missionaries in the area, she opened her home to serve as a church on Sunday mornings. Later, the boarding school idea expanded to establishing district schools as well.

PENNY GUSHIKEN

Baltic States. In the armed conflicts involving Orthodox, Catholic, and Lutheran Europe, few regions have suffered as have the Baltic states. Yet their strong commitment to ethnic identity and will to survive have allowed these peoples to endure and flourish. Finno-Ugric peoples apparently settled in Estonia and Finland in the third millennium B.C. Others of Indo-European linguistic origin settled in Latvia and Lithuania a thousand years later. Earliest accounts included Tacitus’s reports of pagan “Aestii” living on the eastern shore of the Baltic. Later reports indicate formidable Baltic pirates during the early Middle Ages.

During the later Middle Ages (1147–1500), European military forces mounted unceasing attempts to establish control over the region, making the Baltics the scene of continuous armed struggle. In 1343 the final peasant rebellion in the Northern Baltics was crushed, leaving the territory under the control of German nobility. Further south pagan Lithuania successfully resisted the Teutonic Knights in repeated engagements. By the mid-1300s, the well-organized and influential Lithuanian had become the largest European state. By 1400, however, Lithuania had been incorporated into Catholic Europe, allying with Poland against the Knights. During this time, the Hanseatic League was also founded, Tartu (1632).

The Treaty of Nystadt (1721) at the end of the Great Northern War ceded old Livonia to Russia. Russians reestablished the German nobility, stripping the peasants of rights gained under Swedish rule. Although repressed, the Northern Baltics experienced a time of relative peace, while in the south the Lithuanians continued their alliance with Poland and Catholic Europe. The Lithuanian alliance continued until the eighteenth century, when it was divided between Prussia and Russia.

Around 1730 Moravian Pietists arrived in Riga. The movement grew among the peasants, prompting a visit in 1736 by Herrnhut founder, Count Nikolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf. By 1738 revival had spread throughout the northern region and the movement flourished in spite of Russian persecution. By 1748 Moravian missionaries from the Baltics were sent to the New World, primarily to Pennsylvania. Moravian Pietism produced significant social reforms, including friendlier relationships between the peasants and ruling Germans.

Recent history has seen a return to violence and repression, but not without hope. In 1918 Balts took advantage of a destabilized Bolshevik Russia by declaring independence. After defeating the Soviet counterattack, the Northern Baltics gained independence for the first time in nearly seven hundred years. By the late 1920s, all three nations had constitutional democracies, membership in the League of Nations, and independent currencies.

Nineteen years of freedom and relative prosperity ended in August 1939 with the Molotov–Ribbentrop Pact. This agreement sparked the German invasion of Poland and the Russian takeover of the Baltics. In the 1941 attack on the Soviet Union, German armies marched through the Baltics, welcomed by many as liberators from Stalinism. The Russian advance against the Germans in 1944–45 again brought war to the region.

Fearful of reprisals, many Balts fled during World War II. Stalin later deported, displaced, or murdered hundreds of thousands, leaving the population decimated. The Cold War years were marked by persistent attempts to “Russianize” the region through deportation of ethnic Balts and importation of Russians. The policy created a near majority Russian population in Latvia, where some fear the eventual disappearance of ethnic Latvians. Estonia increased to about 40 percent Russians (compared to 8 percent pre–World War II), while in Lithuania, the population of Russians remained less significant.
Baltic States

The Baltics declared independence from the Soviet Union in 1991 and received immediate recognition by the international community. After years of repression and stagnation, Balts are eager to modernize and create healthy economies. The church finds new possibilities within its grasp but often experiences difficulties coping with rapid change. In addition, signs of a pagan revival provide cause for additional concern. The recent establishment of several theological training centers gives hope for the future health and growth of the church throughout the region.

STEVEN J. PIERSON

Bangkok Conference (1973). Taking the theme “Salvation Today,” the WCC met in Bangkok in January of 1973. The three sections of the conference focused on (1) culture and identity, (2) salvation and social justice in a divided community, and (3) churches renewed in mission. Influenced by theologians committed to exploring the meaning of liberation, the conference asserted the indissolubility of the social and individual aspects of salvation. In its search for a holistic understanding of salvation, Bangkok opened itself to a charge of reductionism, supplanting biblical concepts of salvation, as one evangelical author put it, with “a secularized this-worldly version of social action as the mission of the church.” The evangelical voices were not unified, however, as others found common ground between their thinking and that of the ecumenicalists committed. Indeed, it has been widely argued that at Bangkok there was no real polarization between those who stressed the social dimensions of salvation and those who underlined the personal.

A second source of controversy at the conference was its placing on the agenda of churches and mission agencies the confessedly radical concept of Moratorium, the suggestion that mission agencies in the north, as a possible strategy in certain situations, cease for a period the sending of personnel and finances to the churches of the south. Though the language at Bangkok was measured and restrained, the tone of the debate became overheated. Underlining the dramatic language was the need, in a largely postcolonial world, to move from patterns of missionary Paternalism to Partnership in mission. This new emphasis alarmed some conservative evangelicals to the extent that they called for withdrawal from ecumenical agencies. Ecumenical thinkers claimed that a new era of mission (not missions) was ushered into being at Bangkok; evangelicals made the same claims for Lausanne. Both, however, agreed that the hallmark of the new era would be a genuine partnership in world mission.

JOHN H. Y. BRIGGS

Bangladesh (Est. 2000 pop.: 134,417,000; 143,998 sq. km. [55,598 sq. mi.]). December 16, 1971, marked a new beginning for the people of Bangladesh, who are ethnically referred to as Bengalis. They had suffered through the indignities of the colonial period which was followed by West Pakistan’s domination. Only in 1971, after a bloody civil war, did the Bengalis receive their independence. Political freedom has not meant internal peace. Various intrigues have left two presidents assassinated along with an economy which is only marginally viable. Recurring floods, cyclones, and tornadoes have contributed to the ongoing sufferings of the people.

Approximately 134 million Bengalis are divided into communities of 85 percent Muslim, 14 percent Hindu, with less than one-half of one percent being Christian. The majority of these Christians are from a Hindu background. Therefore their cultural and linguistic preferences are more Hindu-influenced. This reality places a natural barrier between Bengali Christians and the majority Muslim community.

Protestant missionary work among Bengalis was pioneered by William Carey in the early nineteenth century. The Bible translated by Carey is still widely used today. Other Bible translations have followed, most notably the Simplified Version, as well as the popular evangelistic New Testament known as the Injil Sharif (Sacred Gospel). These have been produced by the Association of Baptists for World Evangelism (ABWE) in cooperation with the Bangladesh Bible Society.

ABWE’s Literature Center is the leading producer of materials for Christians as well as for specialized tracts designed for the non-Christian. Another ministry of ABWE that has served the missionary and Bengali community is their well-equipped hospital in the south of the country.

Since 1971, many nongovernment organizations have worked extensively throughout Bangladesh. All mission societies are now re-
Baptism

Although reckoned by almost all branches of Christianity as a sacrament, its mode, subjects, and significance have historically been issues of sharp doctrinal controversy.

While some practice affusion (pouring of water) or aspersion (sprinkling), the Baptist position has generally called for immersion. This is primarily defended on the grounds that (1) the Greek word transliterated “baptize” in the New Testament means “to dip, immerse”; (2) immersion best illustrates the significance given to baptism by the apostle Paul (Rom. 6:1–11)—the believer’s identification with the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ; and (3) immersion was practiced by the Jews, John the Baptist, and the early church.

However, the primary dispute of the Anabaptists with the other Reformation traditions concerned who was to be baptized. Calvin and Luther continued the Roman Catholic practice of infant baptism (although certainly with different theological justification), whereas the Anabaptists rejected this in favor of believer’s baptism, that is, that personal confession of faith was a prerequisite for the one to be baptized. Thus the Baptist tradition has generally reserved this rite for individuals old enough to express conscious faith in Christ. The Reformers argued that baptism is analogous to infants receiving circumcision in the Old Testament. It is a sign of God’s covenant promise and grace administered to Abraham and climaxing in the new covenant. It is not primarily a sign of faith/repentance on the part of the believer (as the Baptist position); rather it is a seal of the work of God that precedes and makes possible the person’s response.

Protestants as a whole have disagreed with the sacramental significance assigned to baptism by Roman Catholics. Protestants view baptism as being an outward, visible manifestation of inward spiritual reality. For Catholics, baptism does not simply illustrate, but it actually effects that spiritual reality through its very operation. Thus, baptism infuses the grace of the new birth (hence, baptismal regeneration) even in infants.

The spiritual reality signified by baptism is itself variously interpreted and nuanced by Protestants. However, the following ideas are generally included: the cleansing from sin; union with Christ in death and resurrection and thus the death of the old self and its way of life and the rising to new life in Christ; and incorporation of the Christian into the Body of Christ.

Missionaries often must deal not only with the spiritual dimensions of baptism but also the social implications. In many societies where Christians are a distinct minority baptism is viewed with greater significance by Christians and non-Christians alike as it publicly marks the convert’s decision to associate with the Christian community.

Baptism

Christian rite of initiation using water. The origin of its practice is usually traced specifically to John the Baptist and through him to Jewish practices of ceremonial washings. Qumran purification rites (initiates into the Essene sect of Judaism underwent a ritual washing), and proselyte baptism (Gentile converts to Judaism).

It is almost universally practiced by Christians based on the precedent set by Christ in his own baptism (Matt. 3:11), his command to baptize (Matt. 28:19), and testimony in the Acts of the Apostles and the New Testament Epistles of its practice by the early Christian community.

required to engage in development work. Foreigners are not allowed to be involved in direct evangelism among Muslims. There is, however, no such restrictions placed on Bengali Christians.

In 1975, International Christian Fellowship (now SIM) pioneered a contextualized approach to presenting the gospel to Muslims. This style of outreach has been followed by various groups in Bangladesh. Results have been encouraging, with estimates of several thousands of Muslim background believers being formed into small worshipping cells. Most of these believers have remained within their communities (see Muslim Mission Work).

The Bangladesh Baptist Fellowship in cooperation with the American Southern Baptists, New Zealand Baptists, and Australian Baptists has significantly impacted Hindus with the gospel. Other mission agencies have been successful in evangelism among the small tribal minorities in Bangladesh.

Since 1958, the major effort in literature distribution to non-Christians has been spearheaded by SIM's Bangladesh Bible Correspondence School. Hundreds of thousands of students have first heard the Christian message through receiving these lessons. Much of the publicity of the correspondence school has been done by young Christian workers.

Aid and development projects from the West have been both a blessing and a curse to Christian Bengalis. All too often this assistance has been both a blessing and a curse to Christians alike as it publicly marks the convert’s decision to associate with the Christian community.
Baptism

The practice of baptism has given rise to special difficulties in contexts where great value is given to family relationships and societal unity and where baptism by the established church has come to signify in practical terms the convert’s repudiation of his or her previous social, political, and cultural loyalties. This misconception of the spiritual significance of baptism, it is said, has arisen from a perceived association of Christianity with Western culture as well as misguided efforts in winning individual converts even at the expense of separating them from their communities. Some missiologists have therefore suggested in view of such a misunderstanding of the true meaning of baptism by the non-Christian society that the insistence of baptism by the new convert be dispensed with in order to minimize his or her cultural dislocation and to allow the Christian to remain within his or her community while continuing to discreetly share Christ by life and witness from within it.

While recognizing the biblical mandate to baptize but in view of the difficulties of baptism as it is normally practiced, missionaries in Muslim fields have considered variations, such as the delay of baptism until a number of converts can be baptized together; secret baptism with a limited audience; self-baptism; or the substitution of a contextually appropriate initiation ceremony that would retain the biblical meaning of baptism but have a different form and thus reduce offense to the onlooking Muslim community.

SCOTT CUNNINGHAM

Baptist Missionary Society (BMS). The BMS was founded in Kettering, Northamptonshire, England, on October 2, 1792, and was the first of the missionary societies founded as a result of the Evangelical Revival. Formed by a group of Particular Baptists including ANDREW FULLER (1754–1819), who was appointed secretary, and WILLIAM Thomas and William Carey, to Bengal in 1793. After the death of Andrew Fuller, relationships between the Serampore missionaries and the society at home deteriorated, so that from 1827 to 1837 the Serampore mission operated independently from the BMS. The BMS also began work in Sri Lanka (1812) and the Caribbean, beginning with Jamaica in 1814, where its missionaries, notably William Knibb (1803–45), were instrumental in securing the abolition of slavery in 1834. The Baptist cause among the former slaves flourished as a result, and black Jamaican Baptists played a key role in initiating the BMS mission in Cameroon in 1841. Following the German annexation of Cameroon, this mission was handed over to the Basel Mission in 1886. The Congo mission (1879) was maintained with lavish financial support from the Leeds philanthropist, ROBERT ARTHINGTON (1823–1900), for whom the rapid Baptist advance up the Congo River was part of a wider vision for the evangelization of Central Africa. The BMS began work in China in 1859, where TIMOTHY RICHARD (1845–1919) developed broadly conceived mission strategies that challenged many of the evangelical orthodoxies of the day. In 1891, the smaller General Baptist Missionary Society (formed in 1816), which worked mainly in Orissa, merged with the BMS as part of the coming together of the previously separate General (Armenian) and Particular (Calvinistic) strands of Baptist life in England. BMS missionary numbers reached their peak in 1921–22. As a result of the society’s work, Baptist Christians are now particularly numerous in northeast India (Orissa and Mizoram), Jamaica, Zaire, and Angola. The BMS also assists Baptist communities planted by other missions, as in Brazil, which it entered in 1953. Since the late 1980s, the Society has been active in a number of European countries, to the extent that Europe now accounts for 25 percent of the mission force and budget. The BMS in the twentieth century combined participation in ecumenical mission bodies with a firmer commitment to evangelistic priorities than has been true of some of the historic Protestant mission agencies. This commitment has strengthened in recent years in response to the conservative evangelical resurgence among British Baptists. The BMS remains active as a voluntary society supported by Baptists in England, Wales, and Scotland.

BRIAN STANLEY

Baptist Missions. Within the family of Christian denominations, Baptists have been a missions people. In spite of their theological controversies, ecclesiastical independence, and geographical provincialism, world missions has been the integrating center that has given them corporate life. All of their major unions, conventions, and parachurch entities have sprung from their commitment to world missions. Their cooperative efforts for world missions have brought them to the forefront of the modern missionary movement. The missions story of the Baptist denominations can be divided into five periods.
Baptist Missions

Early English Beginnings (1792–1814). The Baptists trace their denominational origins back to seventeenth-century English Separatism. The first Baptist congregations in England were no doubt greatly influenced by the Anabaptists of the sixteenth century on the Continent, but developed an ecclesiology that featured a moderate Calvinistic theology, baptism of believers by immersion, and a congregational polity. Their free-church polity, reactionarily attitude, dissident reputation, and sometimes hyper-Calvinism caused them to be very provincial. Although they participated in the transatlantic Concert of Prayer for world evangelization promoted by pietistic Europeans and Jonathan Edwards in the second half of the eighteenth century, their participation in world missions was unheard of until one of their humble pastors, William Carey (1761–1834), through study of the Bible and geography, derived a deep conviction for world evangelization.

Carey, an obscure pastor and sometime shoecobbler, came to the conclusion that the hyper-Calvinism of his denomination, which frowned on human instrumentality in evangelism, was spurious. He discovered the missionary mandate in the Bible and became aware of its necessity through his study of geography and Captain Cook’s explorations.

Against the theological and practical thought of his own denomination, he wrote his famous treatise, An Enquiry into the Obligation of Christians to use Means for the Conversion of the Heathens (1792), which became the constitution of the modern missionary movement. The title indicates one of the difficulties with which Carey had to contend, namely, the hyper-Calvinism of the day had convinced many that the conversion of the heathen would be the Lord’s own work in his own time, and that nothing could be done by human beings to hasten it. Carey’s answer is a patient, methodical survey of the world and of the whole history of Christian efforts to bring the gospel to it. Christ, he held, has a kingdom that is to be proclaimed in its power to the ends of the earth; it is the duty of all Christians to engage in the proclamation of this kingdom in spite of the eschatological speculations of the day about God’s agenda.

The appeal of his Enquiry was reinforced by Carey’s sermon to a group of Baptist ministers at Nottingham in May 1792. Starting from Isaiah 54:2–3, “Lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes,” he laid down his two great principles of action: “Attempt great things; expect great things.” Four months later the Baptist Missionary Society was formed, and the Baptist denomination became truly missionary. In June 1793 Carey left for India with his family as the Society’s first missionary, arriving in the Hooghly River estuary in November. As Stephen Neill comments, “the day of the English-speaking peoples in overseas missions had begun.”

The small Baptist beginning, with its modest, unwieldy Society, evoked an unexpected notoriety among the other English-speaking denominations. Carey’s dedicated example, coupled with his prolific letter writing, stirred missions interest among the Anglicans, the Congregationalists, and even some of the Continental Protestants. The result was a proliferation of missionary societies after 1793, including the famous London Missionary Society of the Congregationalists and the Church Missionary Society of the Anglicans. The Baptists had unwittingly set in motion the modern missionary movement, and William Carey had unconsciously earned the title of “Father of Modern Missions.”

The Baptist Missionary Society (BMS) focused on India as its principal mission field, but in 1812 sent missionaries to Ceylon (now Sri Lanka) and in 1814 to Jamaica. It was in Jamaica that the BMS missionaries, especially William Knibb, became well known for their litigation, which eventually led to the abolition of slavery in the British Empire. Since then, the BMS has increased its investment in India, Jamaica, and Sri Lanka. Subsequently, it opened work in Pakistan, the Congo, Angola, Trinidad, and Brazil. It celebrated its bicentennial in 1992.

North American Adherence (1814–45). At the beginning of the nineteenth century, the saga of Carey was well-known among Baptists and Congregationalists in the United States. Carey maintained constant correspondence with Baptist leaders such as William Stoughton, a pastor in Philadelphia who had been a charter member of the BMS, and Thomas Baldwin, a pastor in Boston. Carey’s letters were published in the denominational bulletins. BMS missionaries frequently spent time in New England on their way to their respective fields. Female and student societies were organized and began to pray and give to the Serampore Mission of Carey.

From this seedbed, a group of outstanding Congregationalist students at Williams College and Andover Seminary felt led to dedicate themselves to foreign missions. After many vicissitudes, they persuaded the Congregationalists to form the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in 1810 and to appoint them as missionaries to India. Among them were Adoniram Judson and Luther Rice. Realizing that they would have to debate the question of infant baptism with Carey and his companions, they studied their Greek New Testaments on the long journey on separate ships. They both became Baptists by conviction and were baptized upon their arrival in India.
Baptist Missions

Luther Rice returned to America to break amicably with the Congregationalists and to seek support for the Judsons, who, due to visa problems, were forced to go to Burma (Myanmar) to work with Carey’s son, Felix. Carey wrote letters of recommendation to New England Baptists, and Rice rallied the scattered Baptist congregations of the Eastern seaboard. On May 18, 1814, at the First Baptist Church of Philadelphia, thirty-three delegates met to form the General Missionary Convention of the Baptist Denomination in the United States for Foreign Missions (popularly known as the Triennial Convention). Although called a “convention,” in constitution and function it was basically a society for foreign missions modeled after the BMS. Judson and his wife, Anne Hasseltine, became its first missionaries. In this indirect way, Baptists in America became a missionary denomination.

It is significant that this missionary society was the first organization of national scope for Baptists in America. It was the missionary impulse that integrated the fiercely independent and widely scattered congregations and brought into being the Baptist denomination of the United States. Practically all the present-day Baptist entities in the United States trace their history back to this original entity.

From 1814 to 1845 Baptists in America were united around the challenge of missions. A Home Missions Society was formed in 1832 and began a profitable work among indigenous Americans and pioneers on the Southwestern frontiers. The Triennial Convention continued to evolve into a foreign missions society. Two bases for Baptist missions organizations began to polarize: the society basis and the convention basis. Baptists in the North generally favored missionary societies; those in the South favored a more centralized convention of churches. All Baptists had no problem with the “why” of missions, but increasingly debated the “how” of missions.

In the meantime, a remarkable increase in funds and personnel was noted after 1826. New missions were opened in France, Germany, Greece, and China. By 1844 there were 111 missionaries—10 in Europe, 6 in West Africa, 63 in Asia, and 32 in North America, mostly among ethnic groups that continued under the foreign society.

Southern Baptists’ Separation (1845–1945). Another milestone in Baptist missions history was the separation between Northern and Southern Baptists in the United States in 1845. The missions question was one of the principal causes of the separation. In fact, the new Southern Baptist Convention came into being in order to appoint southerners for home and foreign missions. The already growing polarization over missions polity in the United States was fueled by the ABOLITIONIST MOVEMENT, which later resulted in the Confederacy and the Civil War (1860). Sectional estrangement had been growing in Baptist life since the 1830s. The Northern Baptists (principal the middle states and New England) favored the society basis for missions; the Southern Baptists (Virginia to the South and West) favored the more centralized convention basis modeled by the South Carolina state convention.

The occasion for the separation was the involvement of the majority of Southern Baptists with slavery, which was the basis of the South’s economy. When the Abolitionist Movement heated up and invaded the South, it added to the widening rift. In the early 1840s it permeated the missions entities and became an issue in the appointment of missionaries. The Triennial Convention, now a foreign missions society, gradually fell under northern dominance along with the Home Missions Society. Southern churches, which still contributed heavily, felt they were being neglected and that their candidates were being spurned. Leaders of the Baptist missions societies sought to work together despite their differences on slavery. In 1841 both home and foreign societies pledged to remain neutral on slavery in the interest of unity. These efforts to maintain neutrality proved fruitless.

Militant abolitionists in the North, and equally militant proslavery Baptists in South, drowned out the more moderate voices. As the rhetoric became more inflamed, cooperation became more difficult and, finally, schism became imminent. In 1844 test cases were presented to both the Home and Foreign societies by Georgia and Alabama Baptists that confirmed the fears of the South that their candidates were being rejected because of the slavery question. The Southern brethren then called for a constitutional meeting in Augusta, Georgia, in May 1845, which resulted in a new Southern Baptist Convention.

The Southern Baptist Convention justified its existence on the basis of missions. Its churches felt they were prohibited from being faithful to the GREAT COMMISSION because their candidates were being rejected by the predominantly Northern society. Therefore, they felt compelled to organize a new missionary organization. This they did. The naming of a Foreign Mission Board and a Home Mission Board was the first order of business. At the same time, they incorporated a new basis of missions organization. For some time they had been dissatisfied with the society method of the Northern churches, based on the voluntary cooperation of individuals; therefore they adopted the convention method, based on the voluntary cooperation of local churches. Thus, a new, cooperative way of missions was born.
In spite of the unseemly circumstances that occasioned the founding of the Southern Baptist Convention (SBC), an effective missions organization resulted; over the years it has produced one of the largest missions sending bodies in the history of Christianity. The new Convention languished during the Civil War years and the Reconstruction period, but began to flourish near the turn of the century.

The Northern Baptists continued their missions through the American Baptist Missionary Union and the American Baptist Home Mission Society. Although sectionally separated, Baptists in North America continued to grow in foreign and home missions through two World Wars and an economic depression. Northern Baptists organized a Convention in 1908, which they renamed the American Baptist Convention in 1949. They have gradually moved away from the societal methodology, but have not experienced growth in number or in mission advance like the Southern Baptists.

Post-World War II Growth (1945–80). Baptist mission efforts have universally burgeoned since World War II. The BMS has expanded its program at home and abroad to include work in India, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, and the Republics of Zaire, Angola, Tanzania, Jamaica, Trinidad, Brazil, and Hong Kong. The majority of the missionaries are in Africa and Brazil. In addition to planting churches, the BMS has worked in the areas of Christian education, ministerial training, medical work, agricultural work, and other social ministries. The missionary motif spread to British Commonwealth Baptists also, and strong Baptist missions have emanated from Nigeria, Korea, Taiwan, Argentina, and many others, are forming missionary societies and boards and sending out their own cross-cultural missionaries. They are targeting the unreached people groups found in the 10–40 Window of the world, which spans North Africa, the Middle East, Central Asia, the subcontinent of India, and China. The internationalization of Baptist missions is taking place rapidly. Brazil would be an apt example. Several Baptist mission boards have been working in Brazil for years, and continue to work there, but Brazilian Baptists have a Home Mission Board with over 120 missionaries working there, but Brazilian Baptists have a Home Mission Board with more than 500 missionaries and a Foreign Mission Board with over 120 missionaries working in 19 countries. These entities are growing so rapidly that missiologists are recognizing that the base for world mission is moving from the Northwest to the Southeast. The rise of these two-thirds world missions is by far the most exciting, encouraging fact in Baptist missions today.

In summary, Baptist missions, home and foreign, have had, and do have, a prominent place in the evangelical Christian missionary enterprise. If united, they would easily constitute the largest sector of that enterprise. They join with other Christians who take seriously the Great Commission.
sion in the pursuit of that elusive goal—the evangelization of the world in this generation.

Justice C. Anderson

See also Southern Baptist Convention, IMB.

Barbados (Est. 2000 pop.: 268,000; 430 sq. km. [166 sq. mi.]). The most easterly of the Leeward (southern) Islands of the Caribbean, Barbados acquired its independence from Britain in 1966. Its relatively rich resources have made the island more prosperous than most. It has one of the more stable economies and one of the larger proportions of evangelical Protestants in the area (25 percent).

Everett A. Wilson

See also Caribbean.

Barclay, Thomas (1849–1935). Scottish missionary to Taiwan. He was born and grew up in Glasgow, Scotland, where he attended both the University of Glasgow and the Free Church Divinity College. When sixteen years of age, he wrote a covenant of commitment to Christ, renewed annually, which guided him throughout his life. He was sent to Formosa (Taiwan) as a missionary by the Foreign Mission Committee of the Free Church in 1875 and served there until his death on October 5, 1935. His time in Formosa may be divided into three periods: 1875–92, when he learned the language, taught in the Presbyterian Theological College in Tainan, developed a romanized script for publishing literature in Taiwanese, and helped establish a boys’ middle school and girls’ school; 1895–1912, when he continued his teaching and helped organize the first presbytery and synod for the Presbyterian Church; 1913–35, when he translated and later helped revise both the New Testament and Old Testament, the major work of his distinguished career. He also prepared a dictionary and literature for use in the church. At the time of the Japanese conquest in 1895 his peacemaking efforts saved the city of Tainan from being bombed. He was awarded a Doctor of Divinity degree in 1919 by the University of Glasgow.

Ralph R. Covell

Bibliography. E. Band, Barclay of Formosa.

Barth, Christian Gottlob (1799–1862). Early German mission thinker and promoter. A native of the city of Stuttgart from 1824, Barth acted as a Protestant pastor in the small village of Möttlingen in the Black Forest. In 1838 he moved near Calw and worked as a writer, publicist, and leader of the Calwer Verlag, which he founded in 1833. Versatile, talented, and energetic, Barth developed a worldwide reputation and labored tirelessly as a popular author (with no less than twelve books for young people), an enthusiastic preacher, hymn writer, and promoter of mission. He founded the widespread Calwer Missionsblatt (1828–1918) and also a missionary letter for children (1842–1918). His work Barth’s Bible Stories (1832–1945) went through 483 German printings, numerous English editions, and approximately 90 translations as a worldwide best-seller. His books for adults include Bible commentaries and overviews, world and church histories, and missions treatises. He was a distinguished collector of natural history exhibits, by which he also pursued missionary aims. Rooted in the Pietism of J. B. Bengel and F. C. Oetinger, Barth’s theology is characterized as an apocalyptic history of salvation approach to God’s kingdom.

Werner Raupp

Basel Mission. With roots in early German Pietism and revival movements, the Basel Mission (Evangelische Missionsgesellschaft in Basel) was established in 1815 out of a desire to provide training for German-speaking missionaries going abroad. Christian Blumhardt provided early leadership, opening a seminary for young missionaries in Basel in 1816, which continued until 1955. Initially missionaries with the Basel Mission (BM) served under other agencies such as the Church Missionary Society, but beginning in 1821 the BM sent out its own missionaries, starting work in southern Russia (1822), which was soon discontinued; Ghana (1825); India (1834); Hong Kong and south China (1846); Cameroon (1886), where the BM took over work from the English Baptists; North Togo (1912); Borneo (Kalimantan) (1921); North Borneo (Sabah) (1952); and among hill tribes in North Cameroon (Nigeria) (1959).

By 1914 there were 450 missionaries in five countries, but World War I caused a temporary hiatus in the work. Karl Hartenstein served as director of the BM from 1926 to 1939, when it was decided to make the Swiss home base alone responsible for the mission, in order to facilitate...
continued operation during World War II. In 1954 a separate German branch was established, with headquarters in Stuttgart. The BM is an integral part of the Swiss Mission Council and cooperates with the division of mission and evangelism in the WORLD COUNCIL of CHURCHES. Through the German branch the BM is also connected with the German Mission Council.

From the beginning the BM has been non-denominational and ecumenical, drawing support from churches of Lutheran, Reformed, and Free Church traditions, and cooperating with various other missions organizations. Its support comes primarily from south Germany, German-speaking parts of Switzerland, and Austria. BM missionaries have been involved in a wide variety of ministries—from evangelism and church planting to theological education, education and literacy work, translation, medical missions, establishing orphanages, development of vocational skills, and so on.

Bavinck, Johan Herman (1895–1964). Dutch missiologist and missionary to Indonesia. Born to a minister’s family in Rotterdam, Bavinck grew up in a deeply spiritual home. Studies at Free University and University of Erlangen (Ph.D., 1919) developed his interest and skills in the psychology of religion, an orientation he maintained throughout his life.

Bavinck’s career involved pastoral duties in Sumatra (1919–21), Bandung, Java (1921–26), and Heemstede, Netherlands (1926–29). His pastoral work in Indonesia prepared him for the call to serve there as a missionary, which he did in Solo (1929–33) and at Jogjakarta (1935–39). For his final career phase he returned to the Netherlands to serve as part-time professor at Kampen Theological College and the Free University of Amsterdam (1939–55) and then full-time at the Free University until his death (1955–64).

Throughout his career Bavinck was a productive scholar. His initial focus in psychology and philosophy (e.g., An Introduction to Psychology, 1926) was augmented by a fascination with the mystical orientation of the Javanese (Christ and Eastern Mysticism, 1934) and a thorough grounding in biblical scholarship (e.g., People around Jesus, 1936). In missiological circles, he is perhaps best noted for his An Introduction to the Science of Missions (1954). Though a product of its times in terms of the one-way orientation to missionary work, it is still a masterful blend of Bavinck’s psychological, biblical, and religious interests.

Beaver, Robert Pierce (1906–87). American missions scholar and missionary to China. Born, raised, and educated in Ohio, he went on to Cornell University and obtained a doctorate in history in 1933. After pastoring several Evangelical and Reformed churches, he and his wife, the former Wilma Manessier, went to China in 1938 under the Evangelical and Reformed Church, where he taught at the Central China Union Theological

Bayne, Margaret (1795–1835). See Wilson, Margaret Bayne.

Beach, Harlan Page (1854–1933). American missionary, professor, and missions librarian. Born into a deeply religious farming family of modest means, Harlan graduated from Yale in 1878 and taught for two years at Phillips Andover before entering Andover Theological Seminary, from which he graduated in 1883. On June 29, 1883, he married Lucy L. Ward and later that year went to North China under the AMERICAN BOARD of COMMISSIONERS for FOREIGN MISSIONS. Harlan was associated with a school in Tungchow, where he founded one of the first YMCAs in China. He mastered five thousand Chinese characters and was assigned to a committee to revise the Mandarin Bible. The Beaches left China in 1889 due to Lucy’s failing health.

From 1892 to 1895 Harlan was in charge of the School for Christian Workers in Springfield, Massachusetts. He was then appointed educational secretary for the STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT. He promoted mission classes in colleges and seminaries, trained teachers, and wrote a series of simple yet accurate textbooks.

Harlan was the first incumbent of the professorship of missions at Yale Divinity School and concurrently librarian of the Day Missions Library. A major accomplishment was the development of the library into one of the two finest collections in the world on Protestant foreign missions. Another accomplishment was his statistical study of foreign missions. He produced a Geography and Atlas of Protestant Missions (1901–3), and co-edited World Statistics of Christian Missions (1910) and World Missionary Atlas (1925). Beach was for years considered to be the outstanding scholar in the United States on foreign missions. His primary concern in missions was world evangelization.

Beaver, Robert Pierce (1906–87). American missions scholar and missionary to China. Born, raised, and educated in Ohio, he went on to Cornell University and obtained a doctorate in history in 1933. After pastoring several Evangelical and Reformed churches, he and his wife, the former Wilma Manessier, went to China in 1938 under the Evangelical and Reformed Church, where he taught at the Central China Union Theological Behavior Patterns. Christian missionaries have always concerned themselves with the behavior of other peoples. Disobedience to even the most basic of God's laws constitutes evidence of their sinful condition. Prescribed behavioral change affords evidence of their conversion. However, with the development of the social sciences, German missiology since the latter part of the nineteenth century and American missiology since World War II have reflected increased understanding of human behavior.

Most prominent in this matter have been the contributions of the behavioral sciences—sociology, psychology, and cultural anthropology (including linguistics and cross-cultural communication). As part of a process termed socialization by the sociologist and enculturation by the anthropologist (see culture learning), people consciously and unconsciously learn which behavioral patterns are expected and which are not acceptable in their respective cultures. It is these learned action patterns, as opposed to reflexive and instinctive patterns, that are of special importance to missiologists. Taking many of their clues from the sciences, missiologists have attempted to integrate new understandings with Scripture and the missionary experience. These attempts have not always been completely valid (indeed, social science theories themselves are in flux), but on the whole this process has resulted in insights into human behavior that have greatly enhanced missionary theory and practice.

Reacting to earlier psychological studies that emphasized the study of inner experiences or feelings by subjective methods, early in this century John B. Watson proposed that psychologists confine their study to observable behavior that can be studied by objective procedures yielding statistically significant results. While not agreeing with Watson's reductionism, B. F. Skinner nevertheless focused on controlled experiments and postulated a type of psychological conditioning called reinforcement. Skinner's learning theory is reflected in certain aspects of theological education by extension with its programmed textbooks and learning. Behaviorism as such, however, yielded center stage to the humanism of Abraham Maslow and others in the 1950s, and Maslow's hierarchy of needs has exerted a greater influence in mission theory.

Of greater missiological importance has been the influence of anthropologists such as Edward T. Hall and linguists such as Eugene A. Nida. Hall proposed that human behavior can be understood in terms of ten "primary message systems," only one of which is verbal. Hall's overall theory has not met with widespread understanding or approval, but his ideas on the "silent language" and the communicative aspects of such things as time and space have captured the attention of American missionaries for over a generation.

Among missionary theorists, Nida has perhaps exerted the most influence in recent years. In addition to his impact on the understanding of language learning and translation, Nida has written insightfully on the relationship between belief systems and behavior, the symbolic nature of religious behavior, social structure and communicative behavior, and more.

As a result of studies such as the foregoing, contemporary missionaries can be far better prepared to deal with behavioral issues encountered when working in another culture. Culture shock can be ameliorated when the missionary is prepared for the encounter with behavioral patterns that have meanings entirely foreign to her or him. Culture change is most readily initiated by discovering what is happening at the informal "imitation of models" level of learning, bringing it to the level of awareness, and introducing change at that point. Conversion is best understood, not first of all as change at the behavioral outer layer of culture, but at its basic belief system or worldview inner core.

Belarus (Est. 2000 pop.: 10,069,000; 207,600 sq. km [80,154 sq. mi.]). Belarus is a landlocked, predominantly agricultural republic in the western region of the former Soviet Union. Its population is 98 percent Slavic, and most people speak Russian as their primary language. Belarus has suf-
Belief Systems

Belief Systems. Belief systems are thought of in at least two different ways in missiological literature. First, as a level of mental construction they are understood to determine the legitimacy of questions, generate conceptual problems, and perform a constraining, heuristic, and justificatory role. Second, and more commonly, systems of belief are understood as an integral part of worldview. In this latter case, the study of religious belief systems has generated considerable interest among field missionaries.

Anthropologists have described two types of belief systems: instrumental beliefs, which are related to the concrete tasks necessary for survival, and transcendental beliefs, which involve states and elements of existence that cannot be learned directly from human experience. These categories are useful, but as yet anthropologists have not been able to agree on the meaning of some of the most basic concepts they use to investigate transcendental belief systems—concepts such as religion, the supernatural, magic, and witchcraft. Even though the transcendental-instrumental dichotomy seems to be derived more from the perspective of Western anthropologists than from categorical differences and distinctions made by people in actual cultural contexts, ethnographic data have been useful in the study of religious belief systems in many societies.

Belief Systems are thought of in at least two different ways in missiological literature. First, as a level of mental construction they are understood to determine the legitimacy of questions, generate conceptual problems, and perform a constraining, heuristic, and justificatory role. Second, and more commonly, systems of belief are understood as an integral part of worldview. In this latter case, the study of religious belief systems has generated considerable interest among field missionaries.

Anthropologists have described two types of belief systems: instrumental beliefs, which are related to the concrete tasks necessary for survival, and transcendental beliefs, which involve states and elements of existence that cannot be learned directly from human experience. These categories are useful, but as yet anthropologists have not been able to agree on the meaning of some of the most basic concepts they use to investigate transcendental belief systems—concepts such as religion, the supernatural, magic, and witchcraft. Even though the transcendental-instrumental dichotomy seems to be derived more from the perspective of Western anthropologists than from categorical differences and distinctions made by people in actual cultural contexts, ethnographic data have been useful in the study of religious belief systems in many societies.

Belief Systems are thought of in at least two different ways in missiological literature. First, as a level of mental construction they are understood to determine the legitimacy of questions, generate conceptual problems, and perform a constraining, heuristic, and justificatory role. Second, and more commonly, systems of belief are understood as an integral part of worldview. In this latter case, the study of religious belief systems has generated considerable interest among field missionaries.

Anthropologists have described two types of belief systems: instrumental beliefs, which are related to the concrete tasks necessary for survival, and transcendental beliefs, which involve states and elements of existence that cannot be learned directly from human experience. These categories are useful, but as yet anthropologists have not been able to agree on the meaning of some of the most basic concepts they use to investigate transcendental belief systems—concepts such as religion, the supernatural, magic, and witchcraft. Even though the transcendental-instrumental dichotomy seems to be derived more from the perspective of Western anthropologists than from categorical differences and distinctions made by people in actual cultural contexts, ethnographic data have been useful in the study of religious belief systems in many societies.

Belief Systems are thought of in at least two different ways in missiological literature. First, as a level of mental construction they are understood to determine the legitimacy of questions, generate conceptual problems, and perform a constraining, heuristic, and justificatory role. Second, and more commonly, systems of belief are understood as an integral part of worldview. In this latter case, the study of religious belief systems has generated considerable interest among field missionaries.

Anthropologists have described two types of belief systems: instrumental beliefs, which are related to the concrete tasks necessary for survival, and transcendental beliefs, which involve states and elements of existence that cannot be learned directly from human experience. These categories are useful, but as yet anthropologists have not been able to agree on the meaning of some of the most basic concepts they use to investigate transcendental belief systems—concepts such as religion, the supernatural, magic, and witchcraft. Even though the transcendental-instrumental dichotomy seems to be derived more from the perspective of Western anthropologists than from categorical differences and distinctions made by people in actual cultural contexts, ethnographic data have been useful in the study of religious belief systems in many societies.

Belief Systems are thought of in at least two different ways in missiological literature. First, as a level of mental construction they are understood to determine the legitimacy of questions, generate conceptual problems, and perform a constraining, heuristic, and justificatory role. Second, and more commonly, systems of belief are understood as an integral part of worldview. In this latter case, the study of religious belief systems has generated considerable interest among field missionaries.

Anthropologists have described two types of belief systems: instrumental beliefs, which are related to the concrete tasks necessary for survival, and transcendental beliefs, which involve states and elements of existence that cannot be learned directly from human experience. These categories are useful, but as yet anthropologists have not been able to agree on the meaning of some of the most basic concepts they use to investigate transcendental belief systems—concepts such as religion, the supernatural, magic, and witchcraft. Even though the transcendental-instrumental dichotomy seems to be derived more from the perspective of Western anthropologists than from categorical differences and distinctions made by people in actual cultural contexts, ethnographic data have been useful in the study of religious belief systems in many societies.

Belief Systems are thought of in at least two different ways in missiological literature. First, as a level of mental construction they are understood to determine the legitimacy of questions, generate conceptual problems, and perform a constraining, heuristic, and justificatory role. Second, and more commonly, systems of belief are understood as an integral part of worldview. In this latter case, the study of religious belief systems has generated considerable interest among field missionaries.

Anthropologists have described two types of belief systems: instrumental beliefs, which are related to the concrete tasks necessary for survival, and transcendental beliefs, which involve states and elements of existence that cannot be learned directly from human experience. These categories are useful, but as yet anthropologists have not been able to agree on the meaning of some of the most basic concepts they use to investigate transcendental belief systems—concepts such as religion, the supernatural, magic, and witchcraft. Even though the transcendental-instrumental dichotomy seems to be derived more from the perspective of Western anthropologists than from categorical differences and distinctions made by people in actual cultural contexts, ethnographic data have been useful in the study of religious belief systems in many societies.
Belief Systems

interpretations of reality because of the authority of the supernatural being(s) or powers involved. A belief system tends to make explicit the implicit assumptions of the worldview in which they are found and in which they function, and to apply these assumptions to behavior.

Each society, then, has a more or less systematically structured religious belief system that can be studied and learned. Myths and Rituals have been key areas of culture studied by anthropologists, and such data have done much to enhance missiological understanding of the deep structures of religious belief systems in various cultures.

Norman E. Allison

Belize (Est. 2000 pop.: 245,000; 22,965 sq. km [8,867 sq. mi.]). The country of Belize, independent since 1884, was known as British Honduras until 1973. Throughout its history, Belize has struggled with identity problems, developing more ties to the British Caribbean than to the rest of Central America. Occupied by the Mayan Indians in pre-Columbian times and explored by the Spanish conquistadors, it became a shelter for the British buccaneers who preyed upon Spanish shipping. European immigrants, Creoles of African origin, Black Caribs, and Indian and Spanish-speaking mestizos have melded to create a heterogeneous, multiethnic population. English is the primary language and Christianity is the dominant faith.

Christianity arrived with the Spaniards in the sixteenth century. The first Catholic missionaries arrived in 1851. Catholic testimony prospered chiefly among the Indian and mestizo population in rural areas. By the end of the nineteenth century (1893), the Roman Catholic Church constituted about two-thirds of the population. More recently, that has decreased to roughly 40 percent.

Protestantism came to Belize in 1863, when a group of shipwrecked English sailors (other sources read "buccaneers") settled. Under British protection, Belize became a Protestant enclaves in Central America. In 1776, Robert Shaw introduced the Anglican testimony that was later continued by William Stanford. Evangelical Anglicans became influential in religious education. The Baptists began their testimony in 1822 with James Bourn and, under Alexander Henderson in the late 1840s, became an autonomous body. Methodists arrived in 1824 and grew in numbers through difficulties. By 1838 Protestant denominations claimed approximately 16 percent of the population. Church growth, however, was challenged by the prevailing differences of race and culture. Protestantism was conceived as the religion of the white people in a country where 90 percent of the population was black or colored.

Independence in 1884 meant an increasing nationalization of the Christian testimony in Belize. Spanish-speaking immigrants, with the arrival of the Jesuits in 1851, increased the numbers of Roman Catholics. The Anglicans lost their privileged position as other Protestant groups were established. By 1990, the Protestant community of Belize totaled just over 25 percent of the population. Operation World reported in 1993 seventeen missionaries from Belize in three agencies.

Pablo A. Deiros

Bell, Lemuel Nelson (1894–1973). American medical missionary to China. Born in Virginia, he abandoned his first ambition to be a lawyer and committed himself to becoming a medical missionary. He took his training at the Medical College of Virginia in Richmond. Nelson married Virginia Leftwich in June 1916, and, shortly after, they were appointed missionaries with the Southern Presbyterian Foreign Mission Board, arriving in China later that year. Most of Bell's years as a medical missionary were spent in the Presbyterian hospital at Tsinchingangpu, along the Grand Canal in Jiangsu province. He expanded this facility by 1930 to be the largest Presbyterian hospital in the world. Beyond his medical duties, he engaged in evangelism and many church activities. Life in China was unsettled for the Bells as civil war, Japanese invaders, and communist guerrillas wrecked China. This constant turmoil led to their return to America in 1941. During the next thirty years Bell continued to practice medicine, founded the Southern Presbyterian Journal, was active in church and mission endeavors, and served for many years as both executive editor and columnist of Christianity Today, a prestigious journal he had helped to found in 1956.

Ralph R. Covell

Bender, Carl Jacob (1869–1935). German-American missionary to Cameroon. Born in Eschelbach, Baden, Germany, in 1869, Bender emigrated with his family to the United States at age twelve and located in Buffalo, New York. He was working in a dry goods store when he was converted in an evangelical church and later joined a German Baptist church. Compelled to share his faith with others, Bender often held street meetings. He felt called to full-time ministry and at age twenty-four entered the German Baptist Seminary in Rochester, New York. Following his graduation and ordination in 1899, Bender accepted a missionary assignment to Cameroon under the German Baptist Missionary Society. He married Hedwig Klöber on May 7, 1904, during his first furlough. Bender’s American citizenship allowed him and his wife to continue their mission work when all of the other German missionaries were imprisoned during World War I. In addition to successful evangelistic work, several churches and schools were started during the war years. The Benders left Cameroon after the war in 1919 when the work was taken over by the British and French. However, after many years of lobbying by Bender, the German Baptists resumed their work in Cameroon and he was allowed to return. On November 8, 1935, Carl Bender died in Soppo, Cameroon, where he was buried.

KENNETH D. GILL

Benin (Est. 2000 pop.: 6,266,000; 112,622 sq. km. [43,483 sq. mi.]). The Republic of Benin, whose population is comprised of fifty-seven ethnic groups, is a long, narrow country wedged between Nigeria and Togo in French-speaking western Africa. It is one of Africa’s poorest nations and the world’s least developed countries. The majority of the people (55 percent) practice tribal religions, while some 17 percent embrace Islam.

The Catholic Church built a chapel at Ouidah in 1680, which was served by Portuguese and French priests during the 1700s. Not until 1860, however, when the work in Dahomey was turned over to the African Missions of Lyon, did missions become active in the interior. The Methodist Church, still the largest Protestant denomination, was the first Protestant church to enter Benin, arriving in 1843. Historically, the Methodist churches in the south have struggled, but since 1987 both evangelicals and Catholics have seen rapid church growth. After gaining independence from France in 1960, and a brief affair with communism, the people of Benin now enjoy religious freedom.

Opportunities for evangelization abound. While translation teams are working in twelve languages, twenty-four languages still remain without a New Testament. Audio recordings are available in thirty-four languages for use in evangelism and teaching. There is one Christian radio station, Radio Parakou, which broadcasts the gospel daily.

GARY LAMB

Berlin Congress 1966. See World Congress on Evangelism.

Bermuda

Berlin Mission Society. The Pietism and revivals of early-nineteenth-century Switzerland and Germany produced a keen interest in missions, resulting in the formation of several new missions organizations such as the Basel Mission (1815). Founded in 1824 initially as a supporting agency of the Basel Mission, the Berlin Mission Society (Berliner Missionsgesellschaft) sent out its own missionaries beginning in 1833. In 1829 the Berlin Society established its own seminary. The first missionaries were sent to South Africa, and work in Africa has been the Society’s principal focus, although missionaries were also sent to India (1842) and China (1882). The period from 1913 to 1949 was very difficult for the Society, as two World Wars disrupted the work and missionaries had to leave the fields or were interned.

From the beginning the Berlin Mission Society has been an interdenominational agency emphasizing spirituality and piety, strong lay involvement, and organizational independence from denominations. Although its support base includes Reformed and Lutheran churches, Lutheran influences remain strong within the Society. The Society’s seminary has been closed since 1945, with missionaries now receiving training in church institutions. Missionaries with the Society have been involved in evangelism and church planting as well as a variety of other ministries such as education and medical ministries. The Berlin Mission Society continues as one of the largest German missionary societies.

EDITORS

See also German Mission Boards and Societies and Basel Mission.

Bermuda (Est. 2000 pop.: 65,000; 54 sq. km. [21 sq. mi.]). Unlike most of the Caribbean islands, the citizens of the Bermuda group, a British colony, enjoy prosperity. The economy is based on tourism and offshore financial activities. The per capita annual income compares favorably (126%) with that of the United States. While two-thirds of the population is Afro-Caribbean, many residents are from Britain, the United States, or Canada. In fact, one in every four Bermudians is foreign-born. The modest evangelical community (17%) is overwhelmingly Pentecostal.

EVERETT A. WILSON

See also Caribbean.

Berntsen, Annie Skau

Berntsen, Annie Skau (1911–92). Norwegian missionary in China. Born in Oslo in a secular family, as a teen Berntsen was an active leader in a Karl Marx club. Her grandmother’s faith was an important element in Berntsen’s conversion; she carried a vivid memory throughout her life of her grandmother praying with her for the conversion of Annie and her parents when Annie was seven years old. The prayer that Annie would come to faith was answered while she was in nursing school.

Following a call to missionary service, and having received her missionary training through China Inland Mission, Berntsen traveled to China in 1938 and worked as a nurse in the Shensi province until 1951. After the Communists took over China and the missionaries were expelled, she worked in Hong Kong at a refugee camp. In 1955 she founded “The Hope of Heaven” hospital which served the Chinese fleeing the mainland.

Berntsen was recognized widely for her sacrificial faith and service. She received the Florence Nightingale Medal and Norway’s Order of Saint Olaf and was named a member of the British Empire for her efforts in Hong Kong. She died in peaceful anticipation of her union with Christ in 1992.

A. Scott Moreau

Beyerhaus, Peter (1929– ). German professor, evangelical spokesman, and missionary to South Africa. Born into the home of a minister and his wife in Berlin, Germany, he felt called to the ministry and responded by studying theology at Upsala University. While completing his doctorate, he married a Swedish woman who aspired to be a missionary. Together they worked for many years among the Black population of South Africa. Forced to return to Germany in 1965 because of his oldest daughter’s ill health, Beyerhaus joined the theology faculty at Tübingen University as professor of missions and became director of its Institute of Missiology and Ecumenical Theology. Concerned about the liberal environment of the university, he helped establish the Albrecht Bengel House, a dormitory/lecture hall where Christian students could get spiritual help. He also mentored students by taking them with him on evangelistic preaching trips.

Beyerhaus became an international spokesman for evangelical Christianity, opposing the drift away from the biblical mandate for world evangelism that he detected at both Tübingen and the World Council of Churches. In 1970 he was one of the chief architects of the Frankfort Declaration, a critical assessment of the situation, which became the symbol of a worldwide evangelical thrust for world evangelization. Beyerhaus has produced numerous publications in German, many of which have been translated into English. Kenneth D. Gill

Bhengu, Nicholas Bhekinkosi Hepworth (1909–86). South African evangelist. Known as the “black Billy Graham,” Bhengu was born in the Zulu kingdom the son of a Lutheran evangelist and grandson of a Zulu chief. He graduated in 1937 from South Africa General Mission Bible Training School in Dumisa, Natal. Called to the ministry, he became an evangelist and conducted “Back to God Crusades,” having been inspired in a dream by a voice that said, “Africa must get back to God.” He later joined the Assemblies of God in South Africa (AGSA).

Bhengu traveled extensively, preaching and raising funds for his evangelistic endeavors in South Africa, which proved to be quite successful. Preaching tours in 1954 and 1958 took him to the United States, Canada, Scotland, and Norway, making him a prominent figure in the Pentecostal World Conference. Eventually AGSA came to be governed by several “apostles,” including Bhengu, who directed evangelism and church planting. His ministry focused primarily on individual conversion and strongly impacted the spiritual and moral values of South Africans. In 1974 he served as a Fellow at Selby Oak Colleges in England, and taught about evangelism. At his death, the nation mourned and over 20,000 people attended his internment.

Gary B. McGee

Bhutan (Est. 2000 pop.: 1,842,000; 47,000 sq. km. [18,147 sq. mi.]). A small Buddhist kingdom in the eastern Himalayas between India and Tibet (now part of China). The capital is Thimphu, where Jigme Singye Wangchuk has reigned as king since 1972. Education is free and all schools are government-subsidized, but there is not adequate space for all the children and there are no private schools. Consequently, the literacy rate is around 18 percent. English is taught in all schools, but Dzongka is the official language. There are eleven languages overall.

Lamaistic Buddhism was introduced in the eighth century and is the state religion. All public worship, evangelism, and proselytization by other religions are illegal. Since 1965 that has not been as strictly enforced, allowing slow growth of the church. Seventy percent of the Bhutanese are Buddhist. The second largest religion is Hinduism (24%).
Christians comprise only 0.33 percent of the population. There are seventy-two Protestant missionaries representing eleven agencies and ten Roman Catholic missionaries to the nation. Missionaries operating leprosy hospitals or involved in health, agriculture, and education programs are welcome, but evangelistic work is outlawed. Because of the evangelistic restrictions, several mission agencies have been working from just outside the country in India.

JAMIE FLOWERS

Bibliography. R. C. Dogra, Bhutan; P. Johnstone, OW.

Bible. The ultimate task of all forms of Christian missions is to tell of the Judeo-Christian God (Yahweh-Jehovah) and to report the salvation made available by his grace through the life and mission of Jesus Christ. This includes the proclamation of the call to repentance, faith for the forgiveness of sin, and life in fellowship with him. Christ’s representatives also provide guidance for believers who seek to live worthy of and pleasing to him. All this information comes, not through human search or invention, but from God himself. The word “revelation,” from the verb “to reveal” or “make known,” names the doctrine that deals with God’s showing or disclosing himself, his works, expectations, and provisions.

Theologians speak of both “general” and “special” revelation. The former refers to that knowledge of God available to all people, in all places, at all times. The latter is the knowledge of God available to only some people, in some times, and in some places.

General Revelation consists of that which can be known about God in creation, nature, and the affairs of humans as a whole. Psalm 19:1–4 speaks eloquently of the evidence of God in nature. Romans 1:20–25 asserts that the created order demonstrates the fact of God’s existence, power, and goodness. Humans, however, refused to pay heed to this evidence and did not honor him as God; they worshiped that which was created rather than the Creator. Consequently, “God gave them up to degrading passions” (1:26) and almost unspeakable degrading acts. Paul, before Athenian officials, says that God made all nations from a single ancestor; gives life, breath, and all things; allots the time and boundaries of human habitation “so that they should seek God; . . . he is not far from each one of us” (Acts 17:27). Indeed, observation of humanity itself, people created in the Image of God, should be a persuasive argument for the existence and power of God. Hebrews 11:6 affirms that to please God one must accept his existence and knowability; this, by implication, is available through general revelation.

Those who fail to acknowledge this message are, says Paul, without excuse (Rom. 1:26).

Special Revelation consists first of all in God’s work through the nation Israel, her history and prophets. Micah calls to remembrance events of the nation’s past “that you may know the saving acts of the Lord” (6:5). It should, however, be noted that God’s special revelation to and work through Israel had a missionary purpose. It is through her that “all the nations of the world shall be blessed” (Gen. 12:3); as a “priestly kingdom” (Exod. 19:6) she is to mediate between God and others. In Exodus 34:10 God says, “I will do marvels, . . . and all the people among whom you are shall see the work of the Lord.” Isaiah affirms that God’s servant will be “a light to the nations” (49:6; cf. Acts 13:46–47). The supreme act of God’s special revelation came in Jesus Christ through whom the Word “became flesh and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth; we have beheld his glory, glory as of the only Son from the Father” (John 1:14). In Jesus we become aware of the person, nature, and character of God, see him at work, learn that God loved the world so much that he gave his Son that believers might have life (John 3:16). In Christ we hear his invitation “come to me” (Matt. 11:28). God, in Jesus, shows himself as the holy and just judge of sin, the loving God, the dying-rising Savior, the King whose kingdom will never end and who one day will reign supreme over all. God’s revelation in Israel and in Jesus also involves the work of God’s close human associates, specially called, Spirit-filled persons, designated as “prophets” in the Old Testament and as “apostles” in the New. These were sent, commissioned, and authorized to speak for him. Their task was to report the facts of God’s revelation and also to explain and show how to apply God’s message in the affairs of daily life.

The doctrine of revelation must also include discussion of the Bible. The word “Bible” means “books”; it is a book composed of a collection of books. Together these comprise a religious book. Although it contains information on a number of topics and issues, its primary purpose, like that of many religious books, is to relate facts about God, the universe, and especially human beings in it, and their relationships. Christians believe that this is the only true religious book. All others speak of nonexistent deities and provide incorrect and even dangerous information.

The Bible is, above all, the record of the various forms of special revelation just described. Old Testament prophets and New Testament apostles wrote down virtually all we know of God’s revealing work. This was not by human instigation. From Exodus 17:14 on we are told of God’s command to “write.” Because it is the usual source of information about God, this record is also revelation itself; it is the word of Bible

God. As the word and Spirit work together, God’s revelation of himself in the past is his contemporary self-disclosure and message. It is just because of its inclusion within God’s revelation that missionaries have given much time and effort to make the Bible available in the languages of the peoples with whom they work.

There are a number of terms used to describe some important facts about the origin, nature, and character of the Bible. “Inspiration” or the phrase “inspired by God” occurs in 2 Timothy 3:16. Literally it means “God-breathed,” hence, it came out of God. Second Peter 1:21 describes the communication and process of recording Scripture even more explicitly by stating that “holy men” were “moved,” literally “borne” or “carried” along by the Holy Spirit. “Inspiration,” then, affirms that Scripture originated with God, it was given to specially chosen individuals, and God, through his Spirit, remained active in the writing process.

“Canon,” meaning literally “measuring rod,” refers to an authoritative standard against which other things are measured. When referring to the Bible, canon designates those individual documents or books that are rightfully a part of Scripture, written authority. Protestant Christians traditionally acknowledge a total of sixty-six books—thirty-nine in the Old Testament, twenty-seven in the New. Roman Catholics, Orthodox, and Anglican Christians also include additional books, the Apocrypha or Deutero-canonical books. These writings seem to have come largely from the Intertestamental period (c. 400 B.C. – A.D. 70) and were included in the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Old Testament, but apparently were not in the Hebrew Bible used in Palestine and Hebraic-speaking synagogues. The exact number of apocryphal books acknowledged varies among Christian groups who include them in their canon.

It is much easier to relate what the church did with regard to the canon than the basis upon which it acted. The Old Testament was taken over from Judaism. The three divisions of the Hebrew canon (Law, Prophets, and the Writings [in which division Psalms always stood first]) is implied in the words of Jesus in Luke 24:44. Early Hebraic-speaking Christians seemed to have used the shorter canon while those who read their Old Testament in Greek used the longer. Early Christian writers refer to three divisions of books which were put forward for inclusion in the New Testament: those acknowledged by all, those rejected by all, and those which were disputed. There seems to have been no question about twenty-two New Testament books. Hebrews, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, James, Jude, and possibly Revelation were among the books of the present New Testament canon about which questions seem to have been asked by one or another group; the noncanonical books of Barnabas, Hermas, Didache, Gospel of the Hebrews, and the Revelation of Peter were regarded highly, if not actually regarded as canonical, by some.

Evidence for the basis of canonicity is inconclusive. Traditionally much emphasis has been put upon the assumed author of a book. The word of an authentic spokesman for God, prophet or apostle, or someone closely associated with such a person (Baruch in the Old Testament, Mark and Luke in the New) is assumed to have been regarded as inspired whether it was issued orally or in writing. Additional criteria have been set forth on the basis of later examinations of what the early church did rather than its own statement of them. Evangelical Christians assume, primarily by faith, that the same God who inspired Scripture remained as superintendent to assure the reliability of the recognition of the canon.

An important controversy centers upon the role of the church in the canonical process. It asks whether the church authorized, gave authority to the New Testament canon, or recognized the authority that is inherent within these writings because of their divine inspiration. The answer to this question must come from historical research. The practical implication is whether the church sits in judgment upon the Scriptures or the Scriptures upon the church.

The issue of canon is particularly important for missions, not only because of the claim that Scripture is the word of God, but because several groups advocate that additional material must be added to it. Islam, for example, makes this claim for the Qurʾān and Mormonism for the Book of Mormon. Christians insist that in showing himself personally in human form and by actually providing for the greatest need of humans in the ministry, death, and resurrection of Jesus, special revelation reached its climax and conclusion; nothing more can be added.

Two additional words often used in discussions of the Bible are “infallible” and “inerrant.” The former designates the teachings of the Bible as absolutely authoritative and true. Inerrant means “without error,” but those who use the term often disagree on whether they mean without error of any kind or in accomplishing God’s purpose (see INERRANCY).

One final comment must be made regarding the Bible. Of almost equal importance with what one affirms about its nature is the question of how it is to be interpreted. Christendom, including its missionary endeavors, has all too often denied in practice the authority claims for Scripture by interpreting it in ways which fail to seek to grasp what the original writers (divine and human) intended and what the original readers understood. This must be a guide as one seeks to apply Scripture to the different geographical, cultural, and temporal settings of the contemporary world. Those concerned with HERMENEUTICS seek those principles involved in the art and science of making meaningful and relevant in one time and place that which was originally communicated in another time and place. This definition of hermeneutics is also a brief description of another term much used by missiologists, CONTEXTUALIZATION.

Modern missionaries, following the apostle Paul, may properly begin with general revelation and then move to special revelation. It is through these that God has made available the message, the only legitimate message, about himself, the universe, and their relationship which is at the heart of the missionary endeavor.

J. JULIUS SCOTT JR.

Bible and Medical Missionary Fellowship.

See INTERSERVE.

Bible Societies. Organizations with the primary aim of making the Bible available to all people. The activities that Bible societies carry out today—TRANSLATION, production of Bibles, and distribution of material—have their prototypes in the ancient world. Old Testament portions were copied, stored, and distributed to Jewish synagogue leaders. In New Testament times the Gospels and the letters of the apostle Paul were copied and circulated. Through the early church ages, Christians painstakingly produced copies of the Scriptures for distribution. During the period of the Reformation, the Bible was translated, printed, and distributed in numerous European languages.

A forerunner of the Bible Society movement was the von Canstein Bible Institute of Halle, organized in 1710 to supply inexpensive Scriptures to the poor in Germany. By the end of the eighteenth century 3 million low-cost Bibles and New Testaments had been circulated.

The British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS) was formed in 1804 with the intention to serve not only the churches in Britain, but all of Europe and the British colonies. As early as 1811, work was started in Calcutta, India. The American Bible Society, founded in 1816, worked in areas where American missionaries were serving. By the end of the nineteenth century, BFBS and ABS spanned the world with a network of agencies and associations. Many other Bible societies were founded in the nineteenth century.

The United Bible Societies (UBS) was formed in 1946 with the aim of making the Bible available in a form that all can understand and all can afford. Today UBS consists of 135 Bible societies covering more than 200 countries and territories. Apart from printed Bibles, the societies produce Scripture material on audiocassettes, in videos, and in braille. A network of highly trained consultants in the areas of translation, production, media, and marketing is available to the individual Bible societies. Translation is presently going on in over 600 languages.

In 1995 a total of 564,436,267 items (including Bibles, New Testaments, and single books thereof) were distributed all over the world by Bible societies related to the UBS. In cooperation with the Amity Press in Nanjing, more than 2 million Bibles are now printed annually in China. It is estimated that less than half the world's people are readers, so Bible societies are today making the Scriptures available on audiocassettes and in videos, and new developments are taking place with other electronic forms.

Bible societies have traditionally been supported by the Protestant churches, but a movement of biblical renewal in the Roman Catholic Church after the Second Vatican Council (1965) resulted in increasing involvement by Catholics. Relations with the Orthodox Church have also grown, and some Bible societies have Orthodox staff and board members.

Other Bible societies include the International Bible Society, which sponsored the production and distribution of the New International Version. In response to the LAUSANNE CONGRESS II ON WORLD EVANGELISM (MANILA 1989) fourteen diverse organizations formed the Forum of Bible Agencies. The aim of this new pooling of resources is the traditional goal of Bible societies worldwide, namely, making the Word more available to the world.

VIGGO SØGAARD

Bibliography. E. H. Robertson, Taking the Word to the World: 50 Years of the United Bible Societies; J. Roe, History of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

Bible Translation.

The primary objective of Bible translation is to make God's Word available to all the people of the world in the language they know best—their mother tongue. TRANSLATION has been central to communicating God's Word from the beginning of time.

Translation Throughout History. In the beginning God spoke, and what he said was manifest in the creation—the first translation (Gen. 1; Rom. 1). Throughout the ages, whenever God interacted with human beings, he used their language within a particular cultural context. When that language was not adequate for communication, the Word was translated so it would have maximum impact (Ezra, Nehemiah, and Acts 2). In the Greek-speaking world of the intertestamental period it became evident that the Hebrew Torah was not understood by the Jews of the Diaspora (nor by the Romans and barbarians), so the Septuagint (LXX) came into being. The necessity of understanding what God had to say was most evident in the Holy Spirit’s enabling the apostles to declare the wonders of God in the languages of those who heard (Acts 2:11). Furthermore, the apostle Paul and the other New Testament writers used the language of the day not only to communicate their message to their particular audiences, but also to clarify Old Testament passages.
Bible Translation

In the first four hundred years of Christianity, translations of the Scriptures into Syriac, Coptic, Gothic, and Latin contributed to reaching the peoples of the Near East, Egypt, northern Europe, and the Roman Empire respectively. More recently, the impact of the Reformation can be traced in part to the availability of Scripture in the languages of the people (Old English, German, French, and Italian). The concept of the translatability of Scripture is central to understanding biblical history as well as modern missions.

At the turn of the nineteenth century, William Carey was instrumental in the translation of Scripture into many of the languages of India. Despite incredible odds, Robert Morrison was able in sixteen years to translate the entire Bible into Chinese. Bible societies were formed at the beginning of the nineteenth century to provide funds for the printing of vernacular Scriptures. Their work continued in the twentieth century under the Wycliffe Bible Translators, an organization that has been central to the story of mission expansion to unreached peoples throughout the world. In short, translation has been part of God’s communication to human beings from the time of creation. God wants all people (whom he created) to know what he says and to understand his Word within their particular context, wherever and whenever that may be (see Translation Theory).

Translation as Mission Strategy. Bible translation as a mission strategy greatly impacted evangelization, church planting, and growth in both numbers and maturity during the last half of the twentieth century. In 1950, the entire Bible was available in 105 languages and the New Testament in 229. The decade of the 1960s saw the number of languages in which the whole Bible was available more than double, while the decades of the 1970s and 1980s saw a steady 50 percent increase in the number of languages into which the New Testament had been translated. By 1995 the numbers had grown to 349 and 841 respectively, with at least one book of the Bible available in 2,092 different languages.

The Growing Number of Languages with Complete Translations

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>The Entire Bible</th>
<th>The New Testament</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1950</td>
<td>105</td>
<td>229</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1960</td>
<td>123</td>
<td>260</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1970</td>
<td>249</td>
<td>329</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1980</td>
<td>275</td>
<td>495</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1990</td>
<td>318</td>
<td>726</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1995</td>
<td>349</td>
<td>841</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The availability of the Scriptures has enabled people to build the church on the foundation of God’s Word, to apply it to their own theological development, and to guard against heresy in their particular context. While not a tool kit for church growth, vernacular translation does help to create an environment for church growth. Never before in the history of humankind have people had the freedom to search the Scriptures for themselves in their own language. A vernacular Scripture provides nurture and witness that impacts the way people live—it is a tool for conversion and relevant Christian living, not a colonial formula for coercion.

The Impact of Linguistics and Anthropology. During this same period, the science of linguistics and the work of anthropologists brought new insight to the translation effort. Eugene Nida’s landmark work Toward a Science of Translation (1964) paved the way for the development of translation as an academic discipline in its own right. New understandings of communication theory and its applicability to translation theory became evident. And just as translations must “talk right” to be understood, translators came to realize that the people whose lives are presented in the translations must also “act right.” Therefore, studies of the social context and cultural activity are important to translators as they seek to communicate in a particular language and culture. Studies indicate that the inferences people make about what is being said come out of their cultural expectations. Unless they are told otherwise, these basic assumptions constrain them to associate the meaning of a text with the behavioral forms therein, thereby biasing their understanding of what God intended.

The basic problem in translation throughout the colonial period was that well-intentioned missionaries brought their own theological and cultural biases to the interpretation of Scripture. Often they inadvertently passed on their misunderstanding of the original linguistic and cultural setting. This resulted in a clash of worldviews between the contexts of the Bible, the translator, and those who received the translation. In this way people came to understand God from the perspective of the missionary-translator—and Scripture, for them, was often foreign. Ironically,
Bible Translation

The majority of people around the world understand the cultural contexts in the Bible much better than do Western missionaries. Their kinship and social structures, as well as economic, political, and religious concerns, are much more similar to the biblical context than to the context of translators impacted by the ENLIGHTENMENT. The growing awareness of the importance of both language and culture raises the questions of who should be translators and what is the role of consultants in this process. There has been a rising interest in training national translators.

Translation Training. People with expertise in their own cultural context are asking to be involved in the translation process. For too long, translations have been viewed as the end product of a highly technical process that can be mastered only by linguistically and theologically trained experts. This perspective is changing to a focus on translation as being the responsibility of the church and an ongoing work in the process—a part of over four thousand years of biblical history.

With the increase in education, self-awareness, and sophistication, nationals want to be involved in the translation process to ensure local awareness of what God in fact said. On the other hand, the exegetical and linguistic skills necessary for understanding what God said in the original texts and contexts are not quickly learned and passed on. Accordingly, there is an increasing emphasis on making translation a team enterprise implemented from within the church. The Bible societies have long encouraged utilizing national translators, while missionaries supervise the projects and international consultants ensure the exegetical faithfulness of the translation. Wycliffe and other translation-oriented organizations are developing aids that will facilitate the understanding of source texts. Programs are being designed to train nationals to translate into their own languages or into another language spoken in their country. This provides opportunity for all segments of the church to contribute to the process and to collaborate to benefit the entire church and the community. It also becomes the

The Impact of Translation. With national independence, a political phenomenon throughout the world in the latter half of the twentieth century, has come a growing sense of religious independence. Rather than do things the way the colonials did, people increasingly desire to express themselves in ways appropriate to their own values and beliefs. As they read Scripture in the major languages of the world, or a regional trade language, they may come to think of God as foreign to their vernacular context. However, when God’s communication to human beings is couched in their own language and culture, its power and authority come to them directly.

Desmond Tutu maintains that the Bible is a revolutionary text because it helps people understand that God created all human beings for relationship with him and with each other. The Bible empowers the powerless and forces the powerful to recognize their own weakness before God. Such knowledge enables people to exercise personal freedom while at the same time recognizing the plurality of contexts in which God interacts with all peoples. Hence vernacular Scripture provides people with spiritual understanding and encourages harmony. It promotes a celebration of differences rather than a focus on difference—unity in plurality, not division based on contrast (Gal. 3:28–29). Thus no people group can be truly independent, but needs to recognize its interdependence with others, even as they express mutual dependence on God. Through translated Scripture people are able to develop an awareness of God and understand their relationship to him. Because of the Word they are able to establish their own Christian priorities and responsibility for nurture, growth, and witness. No longer bound by what others say, they can develop their own theology and apply it to daily living.

Inasmuch as God speaks every language regardless of the number of its native speakers, we must apply God’s message to each language and culture. Translators must utilize the entire assemblage of communication style and genres necessary for people to appreciate God’s message to them. This suggests that translation must go far beyond the print media utilized by translators from the West and employ a multiplicity of media (audio, video, drama, mime, etc.) with a plurality of formats (stories, comedy, art, musical presentations and dance) recognized and used by the people of the society. External experts must combine their skills with internal experts to produce a translation that effectively communicates to a particular community. To this end translation organizations have established an international consortium with the express purpose of training translators and making God’s Word available to every people group.

Once a translation is available, it takes on incarnational identity within the target community. God’s truth and the truth of the culture interact to establish Christian truth for that particular context. Vernacular Scripture both affirms local behavior and traditions and critiques other behaviors and practices with which God would not be pleased in any human context. It also critiques cultural practices that the people themselves often recognize as going against their cultural conscience (Rom. 2:14–16). Jesus affirmed that he came to give abundant life (John 10:10), which is possible only as people live up to their own cultural expectations. Further, translated Scripture provides authority for Christian doctrine and the development of theology within the church and the community. It also becomes the standard for both determining appropriate discipline and avoiding heresy.
Bible Translation

God’s Word, available in the cultures and languages of the world, has resulted in changed lifestyles and new allegiance to him who created, loves, sustains, and speaks to all human beings. This provides the basis for that wonderful scene described by the apostle John: “a great multitude that no one could count, from every nation, tribe, people and language, standing before the throne and in front of the Lamb . . . And they cried out in a loud voice: ‘salvation belongs to our God who sits on the throne and to the lamb’” (Rev. 7:9–10). It takes the multiplicity of views expressed in all the languages of the world to adequately give honor and praise to God. To that end may we diligently seek to make the sparks of divine truth known to the nations through the availability of translated Scripture. Through the Word made known, through creation, church history, and the application of cultural, exegetical and linguistic tools, people can grasp the significance of God in their midst and use that understanding to build his body, the church.

R. Daniel Shaw

Biblical Anthropology. See Humankind, Doctrine of.

Biblical Criticism and Mission. The distinction between lower and higher biblical criticism offers a useful starting point for discussion. The term “lower criticism” is sometimes applied to the discipline of textual criticism. Textual criticism seeks to establish the text of Scripture by evaluating evidence supporting differences in wording (textual variants) in order to reconstruct the most likely original reading. It is higher criticism which, potentially, has the more significant impact on thinking about mission.

“Higher criticism” is a comprehensive term designating multiple techniques used to analyze the text of Scripture. One type (historical criticism) tests the reliability of the historical witness of Scripture. Certain types (source and form criticism) examine the background of the biblical text. Other types (redaction and rhetorical criticism) focus on the author and the circumstances of the original audience. Still others emphasize the literary techniques used to communicate the message (literary criticism) and the interpreter’s response to the text (reader–response criticism). Two relatively recent methods (sociological and canonical criticism) focus on the “community of faith” that produced Scripture. There are a number of ways in which the indiscriminate use of these techniques can affect mission theory and practice.

First, historical criticism is most frequently applied to the Gospels. The result is often a reduced set of “authentic traditions” regarding the words and works of Jesus. At the least, questions are raised about the extent and purpose of Jesus’ mission and about his instructions to the disciples regarding the continuation of that mission. At the worst, Jesus is portrayed as having no sense of mission and no expectation that his followers would be involved in mission.

Second, source, form, redaction, and rhetorical criticism tend to deflect the focus of interpretation away from the central missionary message of Scripture by focusing on the background of the text. Furthermore, the strong historical consciousness reflected in these techniques tends to heighten the differences between “then” and “now” and, consequently, to reduce the incentive to apply the biblical teaching on mission to today’s historical setting.

Third, literary and reader–response criticism often tend toward hermeneutical relativism, in which the author’s original intent is deemed to be irretrievable and the interpreter’s response to the text becomes determinative. If any “coherent” interpretation of the text is acceptable, then questions about the appropriate application of the text must follow. The potential result is uncertainty about how and when the biblical teaching on mission may be applied today.

Fourth, emphasis on the way in which the early Christian community functioned (sociological criticism) or the way in which its beliefs shaped the material that is included in Scripture (canonical criticism) leads to a final product that is primarily descriptive. Not only is the focus of interpretation deflected away from the message of the text, but the extent of the authoritative teaching on mission that can be retrieved from the biblical text is minimized.

Each of the higher critical techniques sketched out above can be used constructively to sharpen the understanding of the biblical text and the factors that brought it into existence. Yet they must be brought under evangelical presuppositions regarding inspiration and inerrancy if the authoritative biblical mandate for mission is to be seen clearly.

John D. Harvey

Biblical Education by Extension. Biblical Education by Extension (BEE) was organized in 1979 in Vienna, Austria, by a number of mission organizations in Eastern Europe with the purpose of training church leaders in geographical areas where formal models of theological education were disallowed or restricted by governments hostile to the growth and spread of the Christian church. Joseph Dillow was appointed general director and Al Bridges as managing director. Fred Holland and Lois McKinney served as educational advisors.

In 1989 the name BEE was changed to BEE International to expand the BEE ministry to other countries. In 1996 BEE International became Church Leadership International with a focus exclusively on the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

BEE World was launched by Jody Dillow to extend the original BEE ministry to China, Vietnam, Korea, the United States, and eventually, worldwide.

Following Theological Education by Extension (TEE) methodology, programmed instruction textbooks and workbooks were prepared over the seventeen courses that comprised the curriculum. Biblical subjects, evangelism, some methods courses, and study of the church formed the core. Western philosophical and historical understandings were purposefully replaced with culturally sensitive and contextualized forms acceptable in the “closed” countries of the world.

BEE was interdenominational from the beginning. Students from a number of constituencies were invited to participate in the classes—laypastors, teachers, elders, deacons, layleaders, and university students. Instruction was offered at the university level. Program graduates received a diploma roughly comparable to a Master of Arts in Biblical Studies.

Biblical Theology of Mission

The only rule of faith and practice that God has given is the Bible. It has the force of law. Because mission embraces “the totality of the task he sent his church to do in the world” (Bosch, 1978), we must select a theme that is prominent in both Testaments.

That theme is the Kingdom of God. It dominated the ministry of Jesus and provides linkage to all “the many and various ways” by which God had earlier spoken to his people by the prophets (Heb. 1:1). “Missiology is more and more coming to see the Kingdom of God as the hub around which all of mission work revolves; one can almost speak of a consensus developing on this point” (Verkuyl, 1978). In our day evangelicals are finding that the biblical base for mission is far more complex than previous generations envisioned. Gone is the single focus of an overwhelming concern for the spiritual condition of the HEATHEN. Nor can credibility be gained by supplementing this concern with appeals to the GREAT COMMISSION (e.g., Matt. 28:18–20; etc.), or by prooftexts supporting such related themes as the sending character of God, the compassionate compulsion of the Spirit, the example of the apostolic church, and the relation between missionary obedience and the second coming of Christ. These themes are important, but one cannot build a comprehensive biblical theology of mission on them. The kingdom or “rule” of God must be the dominant motif since by it God touches every aspect of the human condition: past, present, and future (see KINGDOM OF GOD).

When we explore the relationship of the kingdom of God to world mission, we begin with the reminder that God’s kingship is both universal and covenantal. When God created the heavens and the earth by his Word and created the first human couple in his own image and likeness, it was inevitable that he would exercise a loving and preserving control over his creation and particularly over the human race. This can be described as his universal kingship. Both Old and New Testaments teach this universal kingship, but in the Old Testament we also find God’s kingly rule identified with Israel, a people with whom he established a covenant relationship.

The Old Testament Contribution (see also OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY OF MISSION). In the opening chapters of the Old Testament we find the first reference to mission as defined above. God said to the first man and woman: "Be fruitful and increase in number; fill the earth and subdue it" (Gen. 1:26–30; 2:15, 18–25; Ps. 8:5, 6). This command is frequently termed “the CULTURAL MANDATE.” By it God called Adam and Eve to accept responsibility for this world as his vice-regents, to serve and control it under his direction and for his glory. Its details pertained to their social existence, and mark the beginning of a stream of obligation—a mandate for family and community, culture and civilization—that widens and deepens as it courses throughout Scripture. We are not surprised to find that in the messianic age that Christ will later inaugurate, these many obligations will be made even more explicit as part of his missionary mandate that the church proclaim and demonstrate “the good news of the Kingdom” to the nations (Matt. 24:14). And such has proved to be the case. We might regard the cultural mandate as the prelude to the “Great Commission.”
Biblical Theology of Mission

At the outset the expectation was that because God is sovereign, he will be obeyed. But this was not to be. Early on God imposed a moral test on Adam and Eve (the "trees"—2:16, 17). In granting them freedom of choice, God was running a great risk. Would they freely choose to remain under God's control or would they seek an existence separate from God? Sadly, they chose the latter and their fall (3:1–7) brought them under the dominance of "the tempter" and forged linkage with his hostile spirit-power and open opposition to the rule of God (see also FALL of HUMANKIND). More was involved. Although they continued to carry out the cultural mandate, their obedience was now shaped by selfish impulses arising from their abdication of responsibility for the world and their surrender to the one who had now gained control of the world ("the god of this world"—John 12:21 and 2 Cor. 4:4; see also SATAN). Subsequent chapters (Gen. 4–11) record the effects of the Fall, ranging from fratricidal murder to worldwide violence; from God's judgment of all antedeluvians to the tragedy that came to the one family that was delivered (Noah's); and from human arrogance attempting to establish a universal kingdom with its defiant tower to further judgment, the linguistic confusion and scattering of the people (BABEL).

Since the cultural mandate was no longer being carried out under God's direction, God then began via DIVINE ELECTION and covenant to unfold a redemptive purpose that would deal with the problem of human rebellion and alienation from his fellowship. He called a man named Abram out of Ur within the complex of Babel, and began to train him to live by faith that through his seed (Israel), "all peoples on earth" would "be blessed" (Gen. 12:1–3; see also ABRAHAMIC COVENANT). His gracious desire was via Israel to bring fallen people "by repentance and faith" to break with Satan's control (1 John 5:19; Acts 26:18, etc.) as co-laborers with their Messiah, to regain control of the world and those within it who would respond to his love.

But Old Testament history records repeated failure on Israel's part. Actually, over the years only a remnant within Israel believed and obeyed God. At the same time, however, their prophets predicted that God would ultimately realize the covenant goal he had set for a believing remnant in the nation: "to restore the tribes of Jacob" and "Israel"—strangely, the One "who was despised and abhorred by the nation" (49:7). Despite this, Israel went ever deeper into spiritual infidelity, open rebellion, and prolonged captivity, with only infrequent periods when through national repentance the blessing of God became partly evident in the life and worship of his people. The tragedy is that in the end the various contending parties within Judaism, though often at loggerheads with one another, united to participate in the final tragedy of standing against the One who came as the self-confessed "Son of Man" of Daniel, the "Suffering Servant" of Isaiah, and the "Smitten Shepherd-King" of Zechariah.

Old Testament Axioms of Mission. Five major axioms in the Old Testament are inherent in the New Testament unfolding of the kingdom of God in relation to the church's mission to the nations. They can be traced within this tragic history of Israel's experience with God.

1. God is sovereign in his kingship. His rule over individuals and nations is always righteous and just. He is the moral Governor of the universe (Ps. 22:27, 28; Dan. 4:34, 35; see also SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD).

2. God seeks the personal commitment of his people. God's HOLINESS demands righteousness on the part of all Israelites who would be in covenantal relationship with him (Isa. 55:6, 7).

3. God's people are to constitute a "serving" community among the nations by example and through personal outreach. They are to oppose "by word and deed" all that demeans people (Mic. 6:8).

4. God's purpose through his people is relentlessly opposed by the inveteracy of human evil and the implacable hostility of Satan and his hosts (Job 1, 2; 2 Chron. 36:15, 16).

5. God's purpose for Israel and the nations always moves beyond present matters, and is invariably directed toward his future and ultimate triumph in history (Isa. 2:2–4; Zech. 14).

Specific Old Testament Contributions. Within the record of Israel's long history the Old Testament touches on themes that are relevant to mission outreach today: the issue of slavery and political liberation (Exodus and Ezra); the relation of God's people to secular power and secular events (Genesis and the Prophets); the mystery of suffering and redemption (Genesis, Exodus, and the Servant Songs of Isaiah); the lifestyle of God's people (Leviticus); the perils of religious pluralism (Hosea); the issue of racism and the disease of anti-Semitism (Esther); the basic problems encountered in serving God (Haggai and Zechariah); religious encounter and the non-negotiability of truth (Jeremiah); the pursuit of personal and national spiritual renewal (Nehemiah and Malachi); the role of the believing remnant within Israel (Amos and Isaiah); the possibility of becoming useless to God through ethnocentrism (Jonah); the function of wisdom literature as a bridge to the nations that know not God (Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes); and the missiological implications of Israel as a diasporal people.

Although the Old Testament is replete with insightful material related to issues inherent in mission, on the one crucial issue it is silent. In the Old Testament God has not revealed “the mystery hidden for ages and generations” whereby Gentiles through the gospel would become fellow heirs with the people of God. Biblically informed Jewish people know that their future Golden Age will not take place without a massive ingathering of the nations to the worship of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. But how this would come about remained a mystery until Jesus Christ inaugurated the messianic age (Eph. 3:3–9).

The New Testament Contribution (see also New Testament Theology of Mission). The unity of the Bible is nowhere more clearly seen than in the way in which the Old Testament kingdom axioms mentioned above were amplified and increased in the New Testament. With the advent of Jesus Christ these axioms are directly related to world mission.

First, God’s sovereignty focuses on Christ’s lordship. “We preach Jesus Christ as Lord” (2 Cor. 4:5). This is the heart of the good news of the kingdom (Rom. 10:9, 10). Through the cross he conquered all his foes and obtained salvation for his people. His present rule over the redeemed adumbrates his coming rule when “every knee” bows to him and “every tongue” confesses his lordship (Phil. 2:6–11). The worship of other gods is utterly abhorrent to him.

Second, Christ’s lordship demands personal commitment. The New Testament stresses the necessity of faith, the new birth, the inner witness of the Holy Spirit, and its outward expression in love and kingdom service. Only “new creatures in Christ” shall enter the kingdom of God (John 3:5). Those who possess his lordship but whose lives do not reflect his values and perspectives are challenged to examine themselves to determine whether they are truly his (2 Cor. 13:5).

Third, the community of the King is the Body of Christ. Kingdom people, whether Jews or Gentiles, are custodians of the kingdom and share oneness in the church. Their common life is expressed through corporate worship, mutual sharing, united confession, and outgoing service. They live by prayer and the confession of sin. Although the Church as Christ’s body is of divine creation, its visible, structured presence is a flawed mixture of God’s grace, human falleness, and demonic penetration. Its only glory is the presence of Christ in its midst, realized by faith.

Fourth, the church is called to mission. Only after Christ had completed his redemptive work did he issue the call to world mission: to proclaim and demonstrate “by word and deed” the “good news of the kingdom of God.” Its details strikingly endorse but significantly supplement the Old Testament injunction to “do justice, and to love kindness and to walk humbly with God” (Mic. 6:8). After he sent the Holy Spirit upon his disciples, they consciously began to sense that they possessed a universal faith for all nations and began to go beyond the bounds of Israel to Gentile peoples to proclaim this gospel. Mission’s central and irreplaceable task is persuading people to become Christ’s disciples and gathering them into local congregations (see also Missionary Task).

Fifth, obedience to mission involves suffering. The New Testament is replete with the record of conflict and suffering precipitated by the advent and proclamation of gospel of the kingdom. Jesus himself experienced the world’s rejection and the devil’s fury, and learned obedience through what he suffered (Heb. 5:8). In much the same way the church, claiming the victory of Christ over the powers (Col. 2:15), will experience the sifting of Satan (Luke 22:31) and fiery trials (1 Peter 1:6–8) that it too might be perfected, the better to perform its mission. This process will continue and even intensify as the age draws to an end.

Sixth, the future remains bright with hope. God’s redemptive purpose will be fulfilled (Acts 1:8). What he initiated will be consummated. Through the missionary obedience of his disciples God will call out a completed people from the nations. Then he will “judge the world in righteousness by a Man whom he has appointed, and of this he has given assurance to all by raising him from the dead” (cf. Acts 17:30, 31 with Matt. 25:31, 32). The climax of Christ’s redemptive purpose will take place at his second coming “when all things are subjected to God. Then the Son will also be subjected to God who put all things under him that God may be everything to everyone” (1 Cor. 15:28; see also Parousia).

Israel Confronts Her Messiah. In the Old Testament God frequently sent prophets to Israel to remind the people of their covenantal relationship to him and the service he expected of them (Jer. 7:25). And yet, God’s sending of Jesus was unique. The fallen condition of humanity was so acute and the need for redemption so great that only the Incarnation of God the Son and the Atonement of the cross could avail to provide for the redemption of God’s people. Previous “sendings” set the stage for this final “sending” of the Messiah to Israel. This event marks the great hinge of salvation history: the end of “the old” and the beginning of “the new.”

When Jesus came to Israel he almost immediately began to question the traditional piety of the Pharisees. He also turned to the outcasts of society and set before them a quality of life dom-inaugurated by the love of God. In this connection Bosch states: "It is remarkable to note how these people to whom Jesus turned are referred to in the Gospels. They are called the poor, the blind, the lame, the lepers, the hungry, sinners, those who weep, the sick, the little ones, the widows, the captives, the persecuted, the downtrodden, the least, the last, those who are weary and heavily burdened, the lost sheep" (1978). In other words he embodied the kingdom of God as a countercultural presence in society and offended the Pharisees who could only sneer and scornfully comment: "This mob that knows nothing of the law—there is a curse on them" (John 7:49). They did not sense the significance of his redemptive purpose despite their study of the Scriptures (John 5:39). The Sadducees also opposed him because they knew neither the Scriptures nor the power of God (Mark 12:24).
Biblical Theology of Mission

This redemptive purpose began with John the Baptist, the Messiah's herald ("Elijah has come!"; Mal. 4:5; Matt. 17:12) and Jesus' incarnation, baptism, and divine attestation by God as to his true identity (Matt. 1:23; 3:7). Then followed his confrontation and triumph over satanic temptation. With the execution of John, their joint ministry of renewal came to an end. From that point onward Jesus began to confront the Jewish people as their Messiah (Luke 4:16–30), gathered a community of disciples around himself (9:23), and inaugurated the kingdom of God in its initial hiddenness. He explained: "The Law and the Prophets were proclaimed until John. Since that time, the good news of the Kingdom of God is being preached, and everyone is forcing his way into it" (16:16).

Jesus' miracles should not be simply regarded as humanitarian acts of compassion. Actually, they were messianic "signs" which Isaiah had predicted (chs. 35, 61) would precede the decisive act of God in redeeming his people. They pointed to the reality of the kingdom of God as "already" in the midst of Israel by virtue of who he was and what he did. On one occasion he said, "If I drive out demons by the finger of God, then the Kingdom of God has come to you" (Luke 11:20). At first the crowds were drawn by the expectations he kindled and by his messianic signs. When he fed the multitudes they wanted to make him their king (John 6:15). But when it became apparent that his kingdom demanded moral transformation, the crowds melted and opposition grew.

After a brief ministry of three years devoted to preaching the kingdom by using parables loaded with mission insights, feeding the hungry, healing the sick, and liberating the demonized, Jesus was seized by the religious establishment, subjected to an unjust trial, condemned to death for blasphemy, and then turned over to the Roman authorities to be crucified. He died as a Redeemer "taking away the sin of the world" (John 1:29) and rose from the dead the third day as Victor over sin and death, as the Old Testament had predicted (Luke 24:44–49). In his post-resurrection ministry Christ stressed four realities: (1) his bodily resurrection (Acts 1:3); (2) himself as the key to understanding the Old Testament (Luke 24:25–27, 32); (3) his missionary mandate (lit. "when you go"—of course, you will go) "make disciples of all nations," incorporating converts into local congregations via baptism; and training them in discipleship, as he had trained them (Matt. 28:18–20); and (4) his order to remain in Jerusalem for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, without whose power their missionary task would prove impossible to achieve (Luke 24:49 and Acts 1:8). He then ascended into heaven. This act was the final witness to his divine Sonship (Acts 1:9–11).

Mission Begins: Proclaiming the Kingdom.

The Holy Spirit on the Day of Pentecost transformed mission from preoccupation with a particular people (the Jews, Matt. 10:5, 6; 15:24) to all peoples (Acts 2:17, 21, 39). But it took time for the early disciples to sense the full implications of Jesus’ messianic Jewish movement being transformed into a universal faith—the beginning of a new era under the New Covenant. At first, believers in Jesus were largely regarded as a messianic sect within Judaism. Their evangelistic method was deeply rooted in the Old Testament (13:14–43). But when Gentiles began to come to faith, the apostles did not feel that they should be transformed into Jews by circumcision and Law observance, according to the older pattern of Jewish proselytism. This produced a crisis that was partially resolved at a special council of Jewish proselytism. This produced a crisis that was partially resolved at a special council of "apostles and leaders" (ch. 15). This also influenced their evangelistic approach to non-Jewish people (17:16–34; 26:18). This provoked a growing consciousness, particularly among Jewish believers, that a "parting of the way" was taking place within Jewry between rabbinic Jews and those Jews who upon believing in Jesus were increasingly finding spiritual oneness with the growing number of Gentile believers.

This massive shift precipitated much theological debate. Fortunately, God’s gift to the early church was his provision of a "task" theologian, through the conversion of the Apostle Paul (Acts 9; 22; 26, esp. 9:15). From that time onward Paul's missionary activities and the problem-solving letters they provoked greatly enlarged the movement's awareness of the complexity of the task of worldwide mission (see also PAUL AND MISSION). Notable is his letter to the vigorous, largely Gentile church in Rome that he sought to transform into a missionary base for operations in Spain, and throughout the western Mediterranean world. He began with an appalling portrayal of the abounding sinfulness of all people, whether Jews or Gentiles (1:18–3:20). He folfollowed this with a comprehensive presentation of the abounding grace of God to all sinners through "the righteousness of God, the Lord Jesus Christ" (3:21–5:21). Justification is by grace through faith. But Paul could not stop. He had to delineate the amazing grace of God to all who had believed. Victorious living for Christians is gloriously possible through the Cross and the Holy Spirit. These resources are such that although sin is always possible, it is not necessary (6:1–8:39) Then, Paul reviewed the tragic record of Israel's national experience. The nation was never intended by God to be an end in itself. Rather, Israel was chosen for worldwide ministry, but through its failure had to be set aside—neither totally nor permanently—for Israel shall yet enter its Golden Age through repentance and faith in her Messiah at his second coming (9:1–11:36). The final sections of this letter focused on practical matters related to Paul's concern that the church at Rome be transformed into a missionary-sending community eager to participate in mission outreach, particularly in the evangelization of Spain (12–16).

The Kingdom of God: A Sign of God's Tomorrow. The New Testament deals with many important mission matters such as insight into the validity of mobile mission teams as well as fixed church structures; the essentiality, diversity, and exercise of GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT; the issue of the POWERS in relation to spiritual conflict; the phenomena of ethnic religion and spiritual conversion; the eternal separation between the saved and the lost (see HELL); and the end of the age: the ultimate triumph of God.

But what should concern us particularly is to see the full significance of making the kingdom of God the dominant hub about which all mission activities are related. Ours is an age in which people all over the world are losing all sense of hope touching the future. But the reality of the kingdom means that God has a glorious future for Israel and all the nations. There is going to be God's tomorrow. And every Christian is called to be a "sign" of God's tomorrow in the world of today.

It follows then that the Christian community is to be countercultural, not captured by the status quo, by the privileged, the exploiters, the powerful. Its members march to the beat of a different drum, for they seek to embody all of the elements of the kingdom of God in their lives. Like Christ, their concern is the poor, the blind, the disadvantaged, the despised, the captives, the persecuted, the imprisoned, the downtrodden, the bearers of heavy burdens, indeed, all those unaware of God's love. They proclaim Jesus Christ as Liberator, Savior, Friend, and the One who grants forgiveness, newness of life, unspeakable joy, and hope. Their God is the One who makes "all things new." Their yearning for his "new heavens and new earth" constrains them to love and serve others on Christ's behalf. Their concept of the gospel is not confined to proclamation, for it involves both word and deed. Their struggle is to make sure that the good news of Jesus is not denied to any human. This is what mission is all about!

ARTHUR F. GLASSER

Biculturalism. Ability to live comfortably in two differing cultural perspectives, crossing freely from one to the other as occasion merits. However, this ability may be conceived as ranging across a scale measuring the depth of identification. On one end, it simply indicates the ability of a person to understand both cultures, which might be termed cognitive biculturalism. At a second level, it refers to the ability to operate comfortably and without conscious consideration in each cultural setting. This may be called functional biculturalism. At the deepest level is the ability of the person to truly and naturally identify at the root level of both cultures emotionally and cognitively, which may be called root biculturalism.

While there is little doubt that short-term cross-cultural workers experience culture stress and some may experience changes in the way they view the world, only rarely if at all will they progress beyond cognitive biculturalism. Even though they may have many of the basic facts of the new culture, they simply do not have the time and exposure to internalize those facts as "natural" to themselves. Their biculturalism is generally limited to cognitive awareness and emotional attachment to their idealizations of the new culture, but only time and continuous exposure enable progress beyond that.

Those who grow up in a single cultural environment but who sojourn in another culture for an extended period often reach the stage of functional biculturalism. However, they can be said to be bicultural only to the extent that the new culture becomes a second "home" to them and they are able to identify with both cultures as "natural." For those who do not leave their culture until adulthood, moving beyond the functional to the deepest level of root biculturalism is unattainable simply because, as recent brain research indicates, the windows of opportunity to identify at the deepest levels linguistically, psychologically, socially, and emotionally with the new culture have passed. Their level of adaptation, which may be truly remarkable and take decades to accomplish, simply cannot match those of indigenes in the second culture.

Biculturalism

SEE ALSO Theology of Mission.

Biculturalism

Simply growing up in a bicultural environment, however, does not guarantee the development of root biculturalism. Children who do not grow up bilingual, for example, will miss an essential element of the culture whose language they do not speak, and will not be bicultural at the deepest level. The children of missionaries are often bicultural at the functional level, but less often at the root level. The same can be said of immigrant families, whose children likewise grow up in a family of one culture but in an environment of another. At times in searching for their own identity they struggle to amalgamate elements of both cultures into a new “third” cultural framework unique to them as individuals, giving rise to the term THIRD CULTURE KIDS (TCKs).

A. SCOTT MOREAU

See also Culture Learning and Extent of Missionary Identification.

Bill, Samuel Alexander (1864–1942). Irish missionary to Nigeria. Bill came to Christ as an eighteen-year-old at a D. L. Moody crusade in his native hands. He received missionary training at Harley College and there, in June 1887, presented himself in response to an appeal for a missionary to work in Nigeria. Arriving in Nigeria in September, he settled along the Qua Iboe River and began learning the language among the Efik-speaking Ibuno. Archie Bailie, a childhood friend who remained at Harley and did the initial work of organizing the Qua Iboe Mission, arrived on site in 1888. Over the next fifty-five years, Bill worked faithfully in the delta area. His efforts resulted in a denomination of eight hundred churches and ninety thousand affiliated people (1980). By the early 1990s, there were only fourteen Qua Iboe Mission expatriate personnel working in Nigeria, down from almost fifty in the late 1930s, the bulk of the work being in indigenous hands.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Bingham, Hiram (1789–1869). American missionary to Hawaii. Born in Bennington, Vermont, he was raised by pious Calvinist parents. During a revival in 1811, he felt called to the ministry. From 1813 to 1816, he attended Middlebury College, where he helped direct Middlebury’s Concert of Prayer, an intercollegiate expression of concern for missions. While at Andover Seminary, he was challenged to become a missionary.

In the spring of 1819, Bingham was appointed to the Sandwich Islands by the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS. He was single, and the ABCFM insisted that missionaries to Hawaii be married. On September 19, the day of his ordination, he met Sybil Mosely, a woman who shared his call to missions. Within two weeks they were married and, with six other missionary couples, sailed to Hawaii.

Hawaiians traditionally worshiped spirits, but in the providence of God a new king had recently outlawed idolatry and human sacrifice. Politically and socially, conditions seemed ripe for the introduction of Christianity. Bingham seized the opportunity, and great numbers began to embrace Christianity. Schools and churches multiplied as Western civilization advanced together with the gospel. Due to Sybil’s ill health, the Bingham’s left Hawaii after two decades of work, their goals largely accomplished. Hostile forces, however, were already doing damage.

Back home, Hiram wrote a history of the mission, entitled A Residence of Twenty-One Years in the Sandwich Islands (1847).

ROGER S. GREENWAY

Bibliography. C. Miller, Fathers and Sons: The Bingham Family and the American Mission; idem, Selected Writings of Hiram Bingham 1814–1869: To Raise the Lord’s Banner; R. A. Tucker, FIJI.

By 1893, sensing God’s call to missionary work, he linked up with Walter Gowans and Thomas Kent in an ill-fated attempt to evangelize the interior of the central Sudan (present-day Nigeria). Gowans and Kent died of fever within a year and Bingham returned to Canada in broken health. He then pastored a Baptist Church in Newburg, New York, and studied at A. B. Simpson’s Missionary Training College.

In 1898 the SIM was formally reconstituted under a board and bylaws. Bingham was named its director, and remained so until his death in 1942. Under his leadership SIM (now SOCIETY FOR INTERNATIONAL MINISTRIES) became what was arguably the largest Protestant presence in Africa, with over four hundred mission members and hundreds of established churches.

Bingham’s other areas of influence are no less impressive. From 1904 until his death he edited the Evangelical Christian, Canada’s only interdenominational evangelical magazine. From this platform he not only spoke to the pressing theological issues of the day, but tirelessly promoted both foreign and domestic mission and outreach organizations. To these ends he also established Evangelical Publishers (1912) and Canadian Keswick Conference Center (1924).

GARY R. CORWIN

Biographies of Missionaries. For the past 140 years, missionary biography has been a staple in the diet of information nourishing, shaping, and conditioning Western perception and practice of missions. For example, Appendix IV of the [1860] Conference on Missions held at Liverpool . . . consists of a 13-page bibliography of "Modern Works on Christian Mission," a significant proportion of which are autobiographical or biographical in nature. Likewise, the "Missionary Biography" section in the first volume of the Report of the Centenary Conference on the Protestant Missions of the World held in Exeter Hall (June 9th–19th), London, 1888, runs to some 40 pages in length, 37 of which are devoted to biographical or quasi-autobiographical 'travel' literature. The 28-page (double-column) bibliography prepared by Harlan Beach for the New York Conference of 1900 is likewise strong in biography, while the 225-page bibliography included in the Edinburgh 1910 World Missionary Conference Report (vol. 6) lists some 400 biographies plus numerous works of an autobiographical nature.

Within the continuum encompassing nineteenth-century hagiography (in which missionaries could do no wrong) and late-twentieth-century pathography (in which missionaries could do no right), there has been produced a significant volume of healthily critical yet sensitively nuanced interpretations of missionary lives, as evidenced in the superb "Mission Legacies" series regularly featured in the International Bulletin of Mission Research since 1977, and published in the American Society of Missiology Series as a single volume, Mission Legacies.

ÉLISABETH ELLIOT's Shadow of the Almighty: The Life and Testament of Jim Elliot (1958)—the story of her husband who, along with four other young missionaries, was martyred in attempting to contact the Auca Indians—is arguably the single most significant biography published in the latter half of this century in terms of its impact on Western student mobilization for mission. Her book Who Shall Ascend: The Life of R. Kenneth Strachan of Costa Rica (1968) was likewise ground-breaking, marking the beginning of more realistic portrayals and assessments of missionary subjects.

Missionary biography as a genre will likely continue to undergo substantial change as the record of missionary private thought and life becomes increasingly difficult to track. Whereas Western missionaries of earlier generations routinely produced extensive personal diaries and journals, as well as remarkably complete station records and annual reports, this is no longer the case, and would-be biographers will find it increasingly difficult to do their work. Prayer letters tend to be vetted to the point where they contain little, if anything, of deep insight into the missionary himself or herself, and scarcely anyone today journals or keeps a diary. Furthermore, since information is increasingly stored electronically, and rapidly becomes technologically inaccessible, sources for the writing of biography will become increasingly problematic.

Furthermore, given the fact that a majority of successful missionaries during the second half of the twentieth century are often persons who seem to leave scarcely any paper trail, it is safe to conjecture that the future of conventional missionary biography looks dim, and the appearance of studies on old subjects is much more likely than is the appearance of studies on new subjects. At the very least, research methods of biographers will need to change if the genre is to accurately reflect the key movers in this century's Christian expansion.

Ironically, while the names of many nineteenth-century Western missionaries are household words in Western Christian circles, scarcely anything is known about those persons most responsible for the twentieth-century expansion of Christianity in Africa, Asia, Latin America—"native evangelists"—undeniably the most effective missionaries of this century. Efforts to redress this lack are evident in such emerging endeavors as the University of South Africa's massive Church History Database, and in the proposed nonproprietary, electronic database of African Christian Biography under the direction of Jonathan Bonk.

JONATHAN J. BONK

Bibliography. G. H. Anderson, ed., BDCM; J. D. Douglas, ed., TCDCB; idem, WWCH; R. A. Tucker, FJI; idem, GGC; J. D. Woodbridge, ed., AFC.

Birinus (d. c. 650). Early missionary to England. Birinus, whose origin is apparently lost to history, was commissioned to work in England, having promised Pope Honorius I that he would go where no previous missionary had gone. In 634, he arrived in Wessex. Finding the West Saxon population largely pagan, he did not follow his original intention to go to remote England and settled among them. Within one year he had won the West Saxon king, Cyneigils, to Christ, with many eventually following the king's lead.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Bibliography. J. E. Field, Saint Berin, The Apostle of Wessex; E. John, NCE 2:574–75; S. Neil, HCM; ODCC.
Bishop, Isabella Bird

Isabella Bird (1831–1902). English traveler and missions motivator. Born into a pastor's family, she knew pain as a constant companion after removal of a spinal tumor when she was only eighteen. However, she vividly recounted medical trips to Canada and the United States in a style that established her reputation as a popular writer and speaker.

Married in 1881 and then widowed after only five years, Bishop decided to travel throughout western Asia and India. During her travels she came across a group of Syrian Christians who were faithfully enduring harsh persecution. The leaders pleaded with Bishop to send them teachers from England, and this call changed her attitude toward missions and missionaries. On her return to London, she reentered the speaking circuit with the purpose of challenging her audience to take up the task of mission engagement. Further travels in Asia beginning in 1894 led to more challenges to her audiences. By the time a tumor finally took her life in 1902, her influence was such that she was referred to as the “Mother of Missions.”

PENNY GUSHKEN

Bibliography. F. E. Arnold-Foster, Heralds of the Cross: or The Fulfilling of the Command; E. C. Dawson, Heroines of Missionary Adventure; idem, Missionary Heroines in Many Lands.

Black Muslims. Popular designation used to refer to the Nation of Islam during the years following the 1961 publication of C. Eric Lincoln's The Black Muslims in America. Lincoln's book chronicled the development of the Nation of Islam from its beginnings in Detroit in the early 1930s. The mysterious Farrad Mohammed, also referred to as Mr. W. D. Fard, began teaching a group of black southern immigrants about the “true religion” of the black man of Asia and Africa. Terming Christianity as the religion of the white man, Fard taught his followers that whites had come to power through trickery, evil, and coercion and were to be overcome by the black race. Through their discovery of their true selves in the Nation of Islam, blacks would be prepared to take their rightful place in world history and throw off white domination.

Subsequent to the mysterious disappearance of Fard in 1934, Elijah Muhammad, Fard's chief minister, became the leader of the movement, moving to Chicago in 1936. There he established the Temple of Islam No. 2 as a new headquarters for the Nation of Islam. Muhammad taught the tripartite doctrine that Fard was "Allah himself," that God is a black man, and that he, Muhammad, was his "Messenger." In 1965 he published his Message to the Black Man as a principal document outlining theological and political beliefs for the Nation. He called for a separate nation for blacks, to be rid of the influence of evil whites. Whites were "devils by nature" having been created by a black scientist named Yakub as part of his rebellion against Allah. Consistent with the teaching of Fard, Message looked forward to the day when blacks would triumph over whites and take their rightful place in the theocracy of Allah.

Other central tenets of the nation of Islam included strict dietary laws forbidding the consumption of alcohol, drugs, and pork, and economic self-reliance. Indeed, these two ideas came together in Nation cooperative efforts in farming, the production and sale of fish and bean pies, and owning and operating numerous stores, restaurants, and bakeries in the black community. Men were known as diligent workers, always well dressed in dark suits and ties and often visible on neighborhood thoroughfares selling copies of the movement's Muhammad Speaks newspaper.

The Nation saw a strong period of growth, particularly among inner-city black males during the 1950s and 1960s. Much of this has been attributed to the work of chief Muhammad aide Malcolm X, who began working for the Nation subsequent to his release from prison in 1952. His conversion to the Nation was typical for his time; the Nation was especially adept at working with young men in inner-city neighborhoods and prisons, providing them with a message that spoke to their disillusionment with society and American race relations. As a symbol of the rejection of the legacy of white oppression Malcolm Little, like other converts, dropped his "slavemaster" surname and had it replaced with an "X."

Elijah Muhammad died in 1975 and was succeeded by his son, Wallace Deen Muhammad. Wallace soon changed his name to Warith Deen Muhammad and moved the movement closer to orthodox Islam, dropping the “whites as devils” doctrine and affirming the universal appeal of Islam. Three years later, Louis Farrakhan led a sectarian faction out of the newly named World Community of Islam in the West to retain the separatist views of the Nation of Islam.

The Nation of Islam still has a small, if steady following in prisons and inner cities. Many missionary organizations have followed their lead in concentrating on prisoners in their outreach. Similarly, organizations such as Project Joseph, led by Carl Ellis of Chattanooga, Tennessee, have targeted the Nation of Islam and other more orthodox forms of Islam in their own evangelistic efforts.

HAROLD DEAN TRULEAR

Black Theologies. The black theology movement gained ascendancy in the 1960s as African American theological scholars and church leaders attempted to respond to the growing black consciousness movement in the United States. While African American theologians such as Benjamin Mays, George Kelsey, Howard Thurman, and William Stuart Nelson had written a variety of theological texts that covered a wide range of theological options prior to and during the civil rights movement, the rise of Black Power gave occasion for a new group of theologians and church leaders to interpret the gospel in light of the oppression of black people in the United States.

Early attempts, such as the “Black Power and the Church” statement crafted by the National Council of Negro Churches in 1966, affirmed the congruence between the militant call for Black Power and the power of Jesus Christ to set people free from social oppression. Theologian James Cone produced the first full treatment of this new perspective, with Roberts focusing on the ideal of reconciliation and Jones building on the traditional ideal of hope within downtrodden communities.

The movement did not escape the attention of black evangelicals, as theologians such as William Bentley, Anthony Evans, and Ronald Potter began to wrestle with the issue of contextualization of the gospel. Bentley emphasized the use of black history in black evangelical theology, while Potter pressed the issue of social oppression and black identity. Evans gave primary attention to the need for an orthodox biblical base for theology in the black church.

Such emphases created theological and philosophical space for a renewed interest in the part of black evangelicals in Africa and African missions. Organizations such as the Destiny Movement, founded by Edward Ellis in the late 1980s and the development of the Black Campus Ministries division of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship and Here’s Life Black America in Campus Crusade for Christ gave particular attention to the role of African Americans in missions both in the United States and overseas.

Black theology was also challenged by women who accused black male theologians of replicating patterns of exclusion by whites against blacks by ignoring the oppression of black women in church and society. Borrowing the term “Womanist” from author Alice Walker, theologians such as Jacquelyn Grant, Katie Cannon, and Delores Williams called for a nonexist, egalitarian view of the church in the black community. Church of God theological ethicist Cheryl Sanders has advocated a theology for the black church that also focuses on an egalitarian ethic, but is rooted in historic church orthodoxy and practice, including the central role of women in church planting and development.

Blasphemy

Blasphemy. Sin of reviling, slandering, or mocking the name, character, and majestic glory of God. The concept of blasphemy is found in the Bible and in societies where organized religion exists, particularly in Islamic countries.

In the Old Testament blasphemy was always a direct or indirect insult of God, including cursing the sacred name (YHWH) (Lev. 24:10–16), deliberate disobedience of God’s Law (Num. 15:30), idolatry being the ultimate blasphemy (Neh. 9:18, 26; Ezek. 20:27–29). Instead of fulfilling her mission calling to be a light drawing the nations to worship and honor the name of Yahweh (Isa. 9:6; Pss. 9:11; 96:3), Israel incurred God’s judgment (captivity) and as a result provided cause for the name of Yahweh to be blasphemed by the pagans (Isa. 52:5; cf. Rom. 2:24).

The mission purpose of the church and the call to proclaim the message of Christ in cross-cultural settings (Matt. 28:19–20) demand that the church, and missionaries in particular, live with moral integrity and cultural sensitivity lest a cause for blasphemy of the name of Christ arise for those being reached with the Christian gospel today (1 Cor. 9:19–27).

In the New Testament, blasphemy takes on a larger meaning including slandering a human being (Matt. 15:19; Rom. 3:8; Eph. 4:31; Titus 3:2), celestial beings (2 Peter 2:10–12; Jude 8–10), and the Word of God (Titus 2:5). Jesus taught that the sin of blasphemy is forgivable but identified blasphemy against the Holy Spirit as unforgivable (Matt. 12:30–32; Mark 3:20–30). Much debate surrounds the nature of this sin and its commission outside this context. Of note is the fact that Paul, a self-confessed blasphemer (1 Tim. 1:13) who sought to make Christians blaspheme (Acts 26:11), was forgiven of this sin (Acts 22:14–16).

Paul’s three-year evangelistic and church planting efforts in the religiously hostile environment of Ephesus had such an impact that mob violence resulted and a charge of blasphemy was leveled against him (Acts 19:23–41), a scenario repeated in mission history to the present.

In Pauline teaching, blasphemy was a serious offense involving rejection of the faith and violation of conscience of which two professed converts were guilty, demanding a severe apostolic censure and apostolic assignment of discipline at the hands of Satan (1 Tim. 1:19–20; 2 Tim. 2:17).
Blasphemy

Generally, among all cultures where religion plays a significant role, blasphemy is taboo and Christian mission activity will be affected correspondingly. For example, in countries where Islamic law is influential, blasphemy is a serious problem for Christianity. Generally defined as any insult to God, the prophet Mohammed, or any part of the divine revelation, the trend among Islamic fundamentalist scholars has been to broaden the definition to include any statement contrary to shar’ia law or the Islamic religion itself. In some cases verbal witness is all that is needed for arrest and potential execution, the penalty for blasphemy. Several notorious and internationally publicized cases in the 1990s witness to the peril of this becoming a tool for religious persecution, a grave danger for missionaries and their converts in the Muslim world.

RICHARD D. CALENBERG

Bliss, Daniel (1823–1916). American missionary to Syria. Born in Georgia, Vermont, he was appointed by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions to service in Syria. Bliss is remembered as the founder of the Syrian Protestant College, renowned in later years as the American University of Beirut.

In the early 1860s there was a great demand for elementary education in Syria. Even more pressing was the need for Christian secondary schools, because after completing their elementary education in the mission schools, Protestant children were going on to secular institutions or in some cases to Jesuit schools. This led in 1862 to a decision by the missionaries to seek ABCFM approval to open a “collegiate literary institution” in Beirut and to nominate Daniel Bliss to serve as principal.

During the U.S. Civil War, interest in foreign mission work declined and so did finances. This made it a bad time to ask the Board for funds for a major new endeavor. In 1862, Bliss was sent to America to collect money and make other arrangements for the proposed college. After raising as much he could in America, he turned to England for additional funds. At last, on December 3, 1866, the Syrian Protestant College was opened in Beirut.

Bliss served as active president of the college for thirty-six years, followed by fourteen years as president emeritus.

ROGER S. GREENWAY

Blyden, Edward Wilmot (1832–1912). West Indies born African scholar, diplomat, and educator. Blyden is considered to be one of the most significant African thinkers of the nineteenth century and the “Father of West African Nationalism.” Although he was ordained in the Presbyterian Church in Liberia, he is best known for his work in the African political arena. His views on African unity were revolutionary for the period. He advocated a pan-African nationalism, stressing the withdrawal of all forms of European colonial efforts, the creation of a large West African nation, and the formation of an independent African church. It is with the latter that Blyden had his influence on missions.

He called for the Africanization of churches and indigenous-oriented worship. He was critical of European missionaries, accusing them of destroying African societies and customs through insisting on Western forms and leadership. Although he did not personally leave his Christian religion and convert to Islam, he believed Islam to be a better religion for Africa, at least in the beginning stages of its development. The author of several books and pamphlets, his views are summed up in the book Christianity, Islam, and the Negro Race (1887).

THOMAS L. AUSTIN

Boarding Schools. See Mission Schools.

Bolivia (Est. 2000 pop.: 8,329,000; 1,098,581 sq. km. [424,162 sq. mi.]). Bolivia is a land-locked country nestled in west-central South America. It shares borders with Chile, Peru, Argentina, Paraguay, and Brazil. Cultures with pre-Columbian roots comprise 59.4 percent of the population, with the Andean Quechua (34.3%) and Aymara (23.5%) dominating. It is estimated that as many as 1.35 million of the total population are Protestant evangelicals. From 1976 to 1992 the Bolivian population grew at 2.1 percent per year, while the evangelical churches expanded at a rate of more than 8.5 percent per year.

The expansion of the evangelical Bolivian churches related closely to both ethnic and social class response. The greatest response over one hundred years consistently came from Aymara populations, though Quechua response began to increase in the 1980s. These populations have made up the traditional peasantry. The next greatest response has come from the complex middle classes of cholo and mestizo populations of the cities. By the 1990s there were nearly equal numbers of rural and urban evangelicals.

The First Period: Expatriate Mission. Protestant missionary presence in Bolivia began after the establishment of the Republic in 1825 with British and American Bible Society colportage. The leaders of independence reflected liberal Enlightenment values (including individual rights, separation of church and state, and universal education), limited the role of the Catholic Church in government, and began national participation in the world economy. Together this meant gradually increasing toleration of Protestant missions as perceived carriers of these values.

Expatriate mission which resulted in established congregations began at the turn of the twentieth century with five pioneer organizations: the Methodists, the Brethren Assemblies, the Canadian Baptists, the Andes Evangelical Mission, and the Seventh-Day Adventists. Their entrance to the conservative nation was facilitated by the reascendancy of liberal Bolivian politics at the time the world market for tin began to expand. But it was not until 1906 that the Bolivian Constitution was changed to recognize religious liberty. More mission organizations entered in the periods after World War I, the Chaco War with Paraguay (1932–36), and World War II. By 1960 thirty-seven Protestant church-planting missions registered 24,000 adherents. Along with church planting and leadership training they carried on diverse programs, especially health and education, responding to social need.

The Second Period: The Bolivian Church. The rise of the Bolivian evangelical churches themselves, beginning in the 1960s, characterized the second period. This was evident in the emergence of mature Bolivian leadership and vision in the traditional denominations.

It was also evident in growing interdenominational and interchurch cooperation. Moves toward citywide cooperation began in 1955 with the formation of the United Churches of La Paz. National cooperation began with the Evangelism in Depth campaign of 1965. The year following, the more conservative missions and churches formed the National Association of Bolivian Evangelicals (ANDEB). ANDEB came to relate most closely to the Lausanne Movement in Bolivia; the Evangelization of Bolivia; C. P. Wagner, The Protestant Movement in Bolivia.

Bompas, William Carpenter (1834–1906). British missionary to Canada. Bompas was born in London to Baptist parents and later decided to pursue a career as a lawyer. But in 1958, after suffering a stress-related breakdown, he chose to enter pastoral ministry with the Church of England.

In 1862 Bompas volunteered to work among the indigenous peoples in northwestern Canada under The Church Missionary Society, and he arrived at Fort Simpson on Christmas Day, 1865. Until his death forty-one years later, Bompas started churches and schools, learned Indian languages, and translated Scriptures and portions of the Anglican Book of Common Prayer and other Bonding. In order to minister effectively in another culture, one must learn to communicate well with the people of that culture. But meaningful communication requires more than simply being able to speak the language; it also implies developing meaningful personal relationships within that cultural context, and a willingness to listen and to see life from the other’s point of view.

The term “bonding” was coined by Thomas and Elizabeth Brewster in 1979 to refer to a missionary’s deep sense of belonging in relationships in a second culture and the community’s acceptance of the newcomer as an accepted outsider. The term was developed by analogy to the bonding that takes place between an infant and its parents at the time of birth.

Bonding with a new community can be facilitated by the new missionary’s immersion in the life of the new community and society—spending as much time as possible with the local people upon arrival in the community, preferably living with a local family for the first few weeks or months. In this way, the newcomer begins to enter the community and to enter into the people’s thought patterns, worldview, and values. It also enables the community to begin to know and understand the newcomer.

Bonding is facilitated by entering with a learner attitude. The one who is a learner is willing to be dependent on the people of the community and to be vulnerable with them. The learner role implies the humility to make mistakes in language and culture and to receive correction.

By developing relationships and gaining an empathetic understanding of the people’s feelings, desires, and fears, the new missionary can adopt habits of lifestyle and ministry that can enable him or her to be good news from the people’s perspective in order to draw them into a belonging relationship with God.

Bonding is based on an earlier concept—identification—in which the missionary was encouraged to enter sympathetically into the lives of the people in order to understand their way of thinking, and discover ways in which the gospel could enter in and transform their patterns of life. It is also rooted in a belief that the incarnation of Christ (John 1:14) provides the model for missionary ministry.

Criticism of the bonding concept has centered around three main areas: (1) questioning whether it is necessary or even possible for the newcomer to attempt to bond with the new community; (2) dislike of the use of the term and of the analogy with parent/infant bonding; and (3) disagreement about the relative importance of living with a family in the early days in a new community.

ELIZABETH S. BREWSTER
Booth, Joseph

(1851–1932). English missionary to Malawi. Born in Derby, England, in 1851, Booth was called to be a missionary later in his life. His wife Mary shared the call, but died of pneumonia three weeks before departure.

Booth worked in Malawi only from 1892 to 1903, but strongly influenced its religious and political history. He founded two interdenominational faith missions—Zambezi Industrial Mission (1892) and Nyassa Industrial Mission (1893)—and he started three denominational missions—Churches of Christ (1896), Seventh-Day Baptists (1898), and Seventh-Day Adventists (1902). Through his first convert, John Chilembwe, he was instrumental in founding the Providence Industrial Mission of the [black] American National Baptist Convention, Inc., in 1900.

Booth opposed colonialism on principle, and his conviction of human equality made him support the concept of “Africa for the African.” His anticolonial attitudes made the Nyasaland government declare him a prohibited immigrant in 1907.

A pacifist, Booth rejected the use of force to achieve justice, but without him the only armed uprising against colonialism in Malawi (the Chilembwe Rising in 1915) would not have been possible. Wrongly implicated in the Rising, Booth and his second wife Anny were deported from Basutoland and South Africa in 1915.

His general aim then was to reach the unreached masses of Africa by innovative means, with preference for self-supporting “industrial missions” and churches led by Africans with limited African-American help.

KLAUS FIELDER

Booth, William

Booth, William (1829–1912). English preacher, social reformer, and founder of the Salvation Army. Booth was born into poverty in Nottingham, England. At age fifteen he became a Methodist, and four years later he was ordained a minister. He served a five-hundred-member middle-class church near the slums of London. He converted numerous prostitutes and drunkards. His congregation disapproved and Booth resigned. In 1865 he formed the Christian Mission as an outreach to the downtrodden. He renamed it the Salvation Army in 1878.

According to Booth, people needed deliverance from sin and the material degradation that so often accompanied it. He organized street-corner revival meetings accompanied by a Salvation Army band. The early “campaigns” excited violent opposition. Many were fined and imprisoned. Others, including women, were brutally assaulted. Yet the operations of the Army were extended to the United States in 1880, Australia in 1881, and later to Europe, India, and elsewhere.

In 1890 Booth published In Darkest England, and the Way Out suggesting remedies for vice and poverty. His proposals struck a responsive cord. Money was liberally given and a large number of his ideas saw fruition. Opposition eventually gave way to widespread sympathy. In 1904 Booth had an audience with King Edward VII and opened a U.S. Senate session with prayer. In his waning years he became increasingly blind but continued his religious and social work until a few days before his death.

Edward Matthews

Bibliography. R. Collier, The General Next to God.

Born Again. See CONVERSION.

Bosch, David Jacobus (1929–92). South African mission scholar. Born in South Africa, he was a graduate of the universities of Pretoria and Basel. He was ordained in the Dutch Reformed Church and served as a missionary and seminary teacher in Transkei from 1957 to 1971. In 1972 he became professor of missiology at the University of South Africa (UNISA), Pretoria, where he served until his death in an automobile accident. His congregation disapproved and Bosch resigned. In 1986 he formed the Christian Mission as an outreach to the downtrodden. He renamed it the Salvation Army in 1878.

According to Bosch, people needed deliverance from sin and the material degradation that so often accompanied it. He organized street-corner revival meetings accompanied by a Salvation Army band. The early “campaigns” excited violent opposition. Many were fined and imprisoned. Others, including women, were brutally assaulted. Yet the operations of the Army were extended to the United States in 1880, Australia in 1881, and later to Europe, India, and elsewhere.

In 1890 Booth published In Darkest England, and the Way Out suggesting remedies for vice and poverty. His proposals struck a responsive cord. Money was liberally given and a large number of his ideas saw fruition. Opposition eventually gave way to widespread sympathy. In 1904 Booth had an audience with King Edward VII and opened a U.S. Senate session with prayer. In his waning years he became increasingly blind but continued his religious and social work until a few days before his death.

Edward Matthews

Bibliography. R. Collier, The General Next to God.

Born Again. See CONVERSION.

Bosnia-Hercegovina (Est. 2000 pop.: 4,330,000; 51,129 sq. km. [19,741 sq. mi.]). Bosnia-Hercegovina is a microcosm of the ethnic, religious, and cultural diversity found in the former Yugoslavia. Its name derives from the union of two provinces, Hercegovina representing the smaller region located in the south of the republic. After World War II it was established as one of the six constituent republics of former Yugoslavia and became an internationally recognized independent state in April 1992.

In 1991 Bosnia-Hercegovina’s population was comprised of 43 percent Slavic Muslims, 31 percent Serbs (predominantly Orthodox Christians), and 17 percent Croats (mainly Catholic). These figures were radically altered by the war (1992–95) which caused extensive displacements and casualties.

The Romans occupied the area in the first century B.C. In A.D. 395 it became part of the Western Roman Empire, and since the Great Schism between Western (Roman Catholic) and Eastern (Byzantine or Orthodox) Christianity in A.D. 1054 it has remained under the jurisdiction of the Roman Catholic Church. Yet due to its geographic isolation as a landlocked, mountainous region, the impact of Christianity on Bosnia was minimal until the tenth century. In the twelfth century the Bosnian sovereign “Ban” Kulin laid the foundation for an autonomous (independent of both Rome and Byzantium) Bosnian church whose adherents were known as the “Bogomils.” Bogomils originated in Bulgaria as a medieval dualistic sect, actually a semi-evangelical reaction against the hierarchy and religious formalism of the Byzantine Christianity and ruling classes. They became heavily concentrated and very influential in Bosnia, which was ruled by a series of governors (bans) and kings until the Ottoman arrival in 1463.

In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the religious history of Bosnia-Hercegovina took another turn following its occupation by the Ottoman Turkish Empire. Widespread conversions to Islam followed, largely for economic and political reasons. In the late nineteenth century when the Turks were defeated, tensions arose between the Croats who welcomed the new Austro-Khama refused to take part in traditional initiation ceremonies. Nevertheless, as eldest son he succeeded to the chieftainship in 1872, leading the Bamangwato people until his death in 1923. During his long reign, Khama fought strongly against alcohol, transformed fertility rites into national prayers for rain, substituted prayer for charms to protect his army in battle, and astutely preserved the land for his people despite the pressures of COLONIALISM and expansion from neighboring South Africa.

Botswana is also the land of ROBERT MOFFAT, DAVID LIVINGSTONE, and lesser-known missionary giants of the nineteenth century. The first church was established in 1829 at Kuruman, where Robert and Mary Moffat worked for fifty years, translating the Bible into Sechuana (published in 1857). The people of Botswana were the first in southern Africa to turn to Christ.

Today, Botswana is a land of nominalism with no more than 50 percent of the population professing Christianity. Only half of those are affiliated with any church; less than 5 percent can be considered evangelical.

DONALD K. SMITH

Bibliography. R. Gray, Black Christians and White Missionaries.

Braden, Charles Samuel (1887–1970). American missionary in Bolivia and Chile. Born in Chanute, Kansas, Braden traveled to Bolivia in 1912 after studies at Baker University, Columbia, and Union Theological Seminary. Ordained in the Methodist Church in 1914, he moved to Chile the following year. There he was professor and president of Union Theological Seminary (Santiago) and edited El Heraldo Cristiano. Returning to the United States in 1922, he worked for two years as assistant secretary at the Methodist Board of Foreign Missions in Chicago. After completing his Ph.D. at the University of Chicago in 1926, he took a position in the Religion and Literature of Religions Department at Northwestern University, where he served until 1954. Throughout his teaching career he continued to stimulate interest in the worldwide scope of the church, seen through such activities as founding World Christianity—A Digest in 1937 and writing several books of missiological interest, including Religious Aspects of the Conquest of Mexico (1930), Modern Tendencies in World Religions (1933), These Also Believe: A Study of Modern American Cults & Minority Religious Movements (1949), and War, Communism, and World Religions (1953).
Braden, Charles Samuel

A. Scott Moreau

Brainerd, David (1718–47). American missionary to indigenous Americans. The influence of David Brainerd’s life far exceeded his brief missionary career among indigenous Americans. He was born in 1718 in Haddam, Connecticut, and began his studies at Yale College in 1739. After three years he was expelled for his criticism of a tutor, which seemed to flow from the effects of the Great Awakening on the campus. School authorities did not take kindly to the outbreaks of prayer and Bible study groups. However, at Yale Brainerd heard about missionary work among the Indians and in 1742 he investigated work under The Society in Scotland for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge. He was appointed and served in New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. By 1746 he counted some 150 converts in New Jersey. By that time his health had failed and he died of tuberculosis at age twenty-nine.

Brainerd did not establish any landmarks in his work. In fact, some of his methods were criticized because he appeared to be unwilling to learn from others who had worked with the Indians. However, his lasting influence on world missions came through his deep devotional life, which inspired and motivated succeeding generations of missionaries until the mid-twentieth century. His Life and Diary became a standard devotional classic after it was published by Moody Press in 1949.

Jim Reapsome

Brazil (Est. 2000 pop.: 174,825,000; 8,511,965 sq. km, [3,286,470 sq. mi.]). The fifth largest country of the world in area, Brazil occupies 47.7 percent of the land surface of South America. In its population of aboriginal Indians, Europeans, and Africans, 21 percent are Protestants, 72 percent are Roman Catholics, and the remaining 7 percent are Spiritists and members of other religions. However, more than 60 percent of the Roman Catholics are involved with African and European spiritist practices.

1500–1850. Protestant missions were initially associated with the French and Dutch invasions. French Huguenots made their first effort to bring the Protestant Reformation to Brazil in 1555. On March 10, 1557, the Calvinist admiral Gaspar of Coligny, with the support of John Calvin, organized the first Reformed church in the Guanabara Bay, Rio de Janeiro.

In January 1558 the Roman Catholic French vice admiral Villegaignon, the new ruler of the French colony, began persecuting the Huguenots in Brazil. Villegaignon strangled three of them after forcing them to confess their Protestant faith. Jacques le Balleur escaped and preached among the Tamoios Indians for ten years. Later he was captured by the Portuguese army and condemned to death with the approval of José de Anchieta, a Roman Catholic Jesuit. In 1565 the French were expelled from Brazil.

The second attempt to establish the Protestant Church occurred during the Dutch invasion of northeast Brazil in 1630. The transplanted colonial Reformed Church was composed of employees of the Dutch West India Company, former Dutch soldiers who remained in Brazil, refugees and adventurers who were attracted by adventure and commerce, Brazilian Indians, and the new generation of Flemish Brazilians.

The Dutch Protestants in Brazil worked especially among the Indians of Paraíba and Pernambuco. Between 1630 and 1654 they organized two presbyteries with twelve churches and ten preaching outposts, and established the first synod. More than fifty Dutch predicantes (pastors) and 105 consoladores (assistant pastors) ministered in the northeast, but in 1654 the Dutch invaders were expelled. No record exists of a successful missionary attempt to plant Protestantism in Brazil during the next two hundred years.

1850–1970. From 1850 until 1970 five mainline Protestant denominations were established among the Brazilians: Congregational, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, and Assembly of God.

Congregationalist. The Congregational movement started with Robert Reid Kalley and his wife, Sarah, who traveled from England to Brazil in 1855. Kalley was a medical doctor and an ordained minister of the Free Church of Scotland. He founded the Igreja Evangélica (Evangelical Church) in Brazil, using the Sunday school approach, installing the congregational system of government, and excluding infant baptism.

Presbyterian. In 1859 the American missionary Asahel Green Simonton arrived in the Guanabara Bay, Rio de Janeiro, and organized the first Presbyterian church in 1860. José Manoel de Conceição, a converted Brazilian Roman Catholic priest, brought great incentive to the new church. In 1865 the first presbytery was organized and the first Brazilian Presbyterian minister was ordained; in 1867 the first seminary was established. The first synod, formed in 1888, developed a plan for evangelizing the whole country, including different ethnic groups. In 1911 the Presbyterian Church of Brazil sent its first missionary to Portugal.

Methodist. In 1837 the American missionary Daniel P. Kidder and his wife traveled through São Paulo, Bahia, Pernambuco, and Pará as Bible colporteurs. The Methodist Church, however, was not established until 1876, when J. J. Ranson organized the first Methodist church in Brazil.

Baptist. The Baptist work began with the arrival of the American Baptist missionaries William and Anna Bagby in 1881 and Zachary and Kate Taylor in 1882. With the help of Antônio Teixeira de Albuquerque, a converted Roman Catholic priest, they planted the first Baptist churches and established the Baptist work in Brazil.

Assembly of God. By 1910 the first Assembly of God missionaries had disembarked in Brazil. Gunnar Vingren and Daniel Berg were Swedish, but had immigrated to the United States. They settled in Belém, North Brazil. The Assembly of God Church became the strongest and fastest-growing evangelical denomination in Brazil.

The astonishing growth of the Assembly of God and of the independent and indigenous charismatic churches was the most significant spiritual movement in Brazil between 1900 and 1970. The “accelerated growth” of the Assembly of God was particularly unusual. The charismatic churches comprise almost 90 percent of the total evangelical population of Brazil today.

The denominations involved in the Protestant missionary movement in Brazil between 1850 and 1970 had several elements in common: the expatriate missionaries were theologically conservative; they used colportage, personal and itinerant evangelism, discipleship, and church planting as mission strategies; they established educational schools and theological institutions for training nationals; and the expatriate missionaries and the national Protestant leaders viewed the Roman Catholics as their main mission field.

Between 1900 and 1970 the old-line denominations in Brazil struggled with the tensions between expatriate Protestant missionaries and the national leaders of the churches. A period of schisms and independence began among the Presbyterians in 1903, followed by the Baptists in 1922 and the Methodists in 1930.

From 1970 to Present. A renewal movement during the 1960s blossomed within the old-line denominations and led to the formation of several independent Baptist, Presbyterian, Methodist, Lutheran, and charismatic communities. Their emphasis on prayer, spiritual gifts, evangelism, and church planting led them to pray for the needs of the whole world.

The “Antioch Mission,” founded in 1975 by a Presbyterian minister, established a mission-minded theological institution and began preparing candidates to be sent by the mission itself, by denominations or other missionary agencies. Indigenous charismatic churches, such as “Congregação Cristã do Brasil,” “Brasil para Cristo,” “God is Love,” and “The Kingdom of God Universal Church,” have flourished until this day. Their missionaries are working in Latin America, Africa, Europe, and North America.

The astonishing growth of evangicals and their missionary vision among more than 250 evangelical denominations in Brazil is difficult to explain apart from the work of the Holy Spirit. From less than 100,000 in 1900 to more than 30 million affiliated members in 1995, Brazil has become the third largest evangelical community in the world (after the United States and China). According to the statistics presented at the First Brazilian National Missions Congress in 1993, between 1988 and 1993 more than 5,400 Brazilian missionaries were sent out.

Nevertheless, evangelicals in Brazil face several challenges. First is missionary attrition—“more than three thousand Brazilian missionaries returned home in less than two years,” and 90 percent of them did not return to the field. Second is the need for continued interdependent cooperation between denominational mission boards and independent mission agencies for recruitment, training, deployment, and financial support of the missionaries. The third challenge is the inadequacy of cross-cultural missionary training. Finally, there is an urgent need for evangelical unity to foster fellowship and prayerful cooperation among evangelicals in Brazil.

Five Brazilian associations have been deliberating on these missiological issues in Brazil: the Cross-Cultural Brazilian Missions Association (AMTB), the Association of Professors of Missions in Brazil (APMB), the Association of Church Missionary Committees (ACMI), the Ibero-American Missionary Commission (COMIBAM), and the newly formed Evangelical Association of Brazil (AEYB).

ÉLIA S. MEDEIROS

Brazilian Mission Boards and Societies. Brazilian Protestants, established in the early nineteenth century, were slow to undertake mission work overseas. Brazil, with its vast territory, was seen as a mission field. There are numerous historical reasons for the lack of indigenous missionaries; churches were supported by foreign mission boards; when money was available it was enough only to pay a local pastor; there was no knowledge of mission fields outside Brazil; the missionaries failed to see the Brazilian churches as capable of participating in the missionary enterprise; some denominations were directed by missionaries and they did not see the need for sending missionaries from Brazil since their mission board at home was doing exactly that; and the thought that there were so much to be done in Brazil before venturing overseas was prevalent (and to some extent still is) among Brazilian church leaders.

The rise of indigenous missionary efforts started around 1911, when the Presbyterians sent Mota Sobrinho as their first missionary to Portugal. The first effort was supported by Presbyterians from Brazil, Portugal, and Scotland. The Baptists organized their Missions Board in 1907 and Chile and Portugal were among the first counties to receive their help. The major indigenous boards and agencies among the denominations are the Assemblies of God, the Baptist Convention. They are totally supported by Brazilian funds.

The sending of Brazilians as missionaries into cross-cultural ministry contexts (both inside and outside Brazil) has grown rapidly in recent years. Figures from a 1998 missions census show some 2,200 Brazilians deployed in 84 counties around the world. Most consider the 1987 Ibero-American missions congress held in São Paulo (see COMIBAM) to be the watershed event. From that date the number of Brazilians serving cross-culturally has more than doubled, the number of Brazilian boards and agencies has significantly increased, and the Brazilian evangelical church has seen itself as a potential "mission force" rather than a "missions field."

The Structures. Brazilians are being sent by the following different types of missions structures: denominational boards (34%), interdenominational Brazilian agencies (33%), international agencies with Brazilian leadership (19%), international agencies with non-Brazilian leadership (12%), and local churches (1%). Nearly 90 percent of Brazil's missionaries are serving under Brazilian leadership.

The interdenominational Brazilian agencies have been the fastest growing over recent years. These agencies are most often simple structures; a board and an executive director. Office staffs are typically small and minimally resourced. The agencies see themselves as "servants" to the church and seek to partner with local congregations in training, deploying, and maintaining the missionaries.

Although 80 percent of the Brazilian evangelical church identifies itself as Pentecostal or charismatic, only 7 percent of the sending structures (sending 22% of the missionaries) identify themselves as such. Most Brazilians serve under structures that identify themselves as either "interdenominational" (34%) or "traditional/non-Pentecostal" (40%). Clearly the potential of the Pentecostal wing of the Brazilian church has not yet been realized in missions.

A common "meeting point" for Brazil's structures has been the AMTB (Association of Brazilian Cross-cultural Missions). This association is Brazilian-led and seeks to assist Brazil's missions by promoting consultations, missions publications, and partnerships among its constituency. With some regularity AMTB sponsors a Brazil-wide national missions congress.

Preferred Fields of Service. There are Brazilians developing all kinds of missionary work on six continents, including evangelism, theological and secular education, planting churches, and medical services. As might be expected, Brazil's younger agencies tend to begin by sending their missionaries to fields relatively close to Brazil. The great majority (64%) of Brazil's missionaries are serving in Latin America, Spain, or Portugal. However, what is surprising to note is the significant growth in the number and percentage of Brazilians serving in resistant countries and among peoples of the 10/40 Window. In 1989 only 5 percent of Brazil's missions force served in the 10/40 Window. By 1998 that percentage had grown to 13 percent.

Brazil is expected, with Korea, to be one of the principal countries sending out missionaries over the next decade. Training for the missionary, his or her character, loyalty in sending the promised support, and partnership with receiving churches are areas that need attention in the future if the Brazilian churches want to grow in their ability to participate meaningfully in the missionary task.

Antonio C. Barro and Ted Limpic

See also Latin American Mission Boards and Societies.

Brethren Missions. Arising in Central Germany in 1708, the Brethren movement was powerfully influenced by the religious currents of Anabaptism and Pietism. Anabaptist principles were conveyed to its members by contacts with Swiss and German Mennonites; Pietist principles, by traveling evangelists. Both currents stressed personal commitment through conversion and application of faith convictions in daily life and conduct. This led to a striking level of evangelistic zeal by early Brethren witnessing to their new beliefs, despite oppressive actions by authorities who found their actions to be disruptive of societal peace.

These pressures led to emigration from Europe to North America, in groups (1719, 1729) and as families. By the early 1740s virtually all of the Brethren had transplanted themselves in the New World, principally in Pennsylvania. During the rest of the colonial period, they enlarged their numbers to perhaps five thousand in congregations stretching from New Jersey to Georgia. They were counted among the “Plain People” because of their nonconformist and largely withdrawn lifestyle and the similarity in church practice and belief with Mennonites and Quakers.

After the American Revolution, with its stressful impact on the nonresistant (pacifist) Brethren, members streamed westward in the tide of inland settlement. By 1850 Brethren had relocated as far as the West Coast, in Oregon and California. Planting of new congregations during these decades had primarily occurred by division of growing churches and by colonization.

It was at midcentury that voices were first raised advocating organized mission efforts. This was originally designed to meet the religious needs of members who had moved to the West. Somewhat later, articles appeared in church periodicals that called the Brethren to follow the Great Commission (Matt. 28:19–20) in reaching periodicals that called the Brethren to follow the Great Commission (Matt. 28:19–20) in reaching 1908 as the Church of the Brethren), concerned for church unity and moderation.

Brethren Missions

Both of the latter two bodies enthusiastically adopted home and foreign missions. The German Baptist Brethren, through its General Mission Board, created active mission programs in India (1894), China (1908), and Nigeria (1922), in addition to supporting a district initiative in Denmark and Sweden begun in 1876, later terminated in 1947. The Board also began work in Asia Minor, France, and Switzerland without, however, lasting significance. When the Board began its work in 1884 it had less than $200 in hand; by 1913 its assets totaled more than $1 million. Among the church leaders most responsible for the tremendous growth in support for missions during this period were Daniel L. Miller (1841–1921), Charles D. Bonsack (1870–1953), and Otho Winger (1877–1946). The most zealous proponent of foreign missions at this time was Wilbur B. Stover (1866–1930), who led the first team of missionaries to India in 1894. Through indefatigable speaking and writing he urged missions as the “great first work of the church.” His namesake H. Stover Kulp (1894–1964), together with Albert D. Helser (1897–1969), opened the mission field in Nigeria in 1922 and devoted his life to that cause.

Following World War II, a mission program was also created in Ecuador. The Indian, Chinese, and Ecuador churches all merged into national, ecumenical bodies. The Nigerian church (Ekklesiayar Yan’uwa a Nigeria), which expanded rapidly in numbers after 1950, became autonomous in 1973 and cooperates with other regional church fellowships. It maintains a strong fraternal relationship with the Church of the Brethren, deploying expatriate church workers from the United States in its educational and church life. This reflected a shift in mission philosophy in the Church of the Brethren after 1955 that emphasized indigenization and mutual mission.

The Brethren Church began many home missions projects after the 1883 separation. A Foreign Missionary Society created in 1900 mounted a strong effort in 1909 in Argentina with Charles F. Yoder (1873–1955) as the leading personality, and in 1918 in French Equatorial Africa (later the Central African Republic). In the latter, hundreds of congregations were founded after 1921. Early attempts in Persia and China failed to flourish.

Theological tensions within the Brethren Church led in 1939 to division and the inception of the Fellowship of Grace Brethren Churches. The mission society, the mission in Central Africa, and most of the missionaries and congregations in Argentina aligned themselves with the Grace Brethren, under the aggressive leadership of Louis S. Bauman (1875–1950) of California. Missionaries in Argentina remaining with the Brethren Church under the guidance of C. F. Yoder developed a new program near Buenos Aires. Later Brethren Church mission work was started in India, Colombia, Malaysia, and Mexico. Some of their personnel cooperated with the Church of the Brethren mission in Nigeria. In the meantime, by 1980 Grace Brethren had initiated mission programs in Brazil, Mexico, France, Chad, and Germany. Home and foreign missions have been central to the life of the Fellowship of Grace Brethren Churches.
Brethren Missions

Church of the Brethren missions have always featured wholistic attention to amelioration of substandard material and social conditions as well as evangelism and conversion. They have been noted for creating orphanages, hospitals, schools, and vocational training. A missionary to India, Ira W. Moomaw, became widely known for his work with AGRICULTURAL MISSIONS. Courageous response to famines, pandemics, and armed conflicts in India and China brought numbers of converts. Work with lepers in Nigeria earned international attention, as did the preventive health program there known as Lafiya (wellness).

A characteristic of the programs of all three Brethren bodies active in missions—Church of the Brethren, Brethren Church, Fellowship of Grace Brethren Church—has been the significant role of women. In many cases they found possibilities for leadership and action in church work not readily available in their home congregations. Their achievement was great in education, health care, and work with indigenous women. Among the foremost were Dr. Florence Newberry Gribble (1879–1942) of Oubangui-Chari, Anna Crumpacker (1882–1967) of China, and Ida Shumaker (1873–1946) of India.

Although relatively late in mission involvement for theological and sociological reasons, Brethren of several denominations have been active on several continents since the late nineteenth century. The total membership of Grace Brethren congregations in the Central African Republic far outnumber those in the United States; participants in worship services of the Church of the Brethren in Nigeria already outnumbered by 1995 those of the Church of the Brethren in the United States and, if membership trends continue, will soon outdo the membership of the mother body in North America. This rapid increase has been presented as a case study in the CHURCH GROWTH MOVEMENT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bribery. While there are eighty references to corruption and hundreds to various kinds of oppression and injustice in the Bible, there are few specific references to bribes, though the practice was clearly known throughout the Old Testament period. Samuel could claim “I took no bribes to distort justice” (1 Sam. 12:3) but his sons did not follow his example (1 Sam. 8:3). Some of David’s contemporaries had “their hands full of bribes” (Ps. 26:10), Amos castigated those who “afflict the just, take a bribe and neglect the poor” (5:12), and Isaiah counsels the righteous man to “shake his hands lest they contain a bribe” (33:15).

Bribery is defined as “the bestowing of money or favor upon a person who is in a position of trust in order to pervert his judgement or corrupt his conduct. It intends to make a person act illegally, unjustly or immorally.” It is condemned in the law of Moses. “You shall take no bribes, for a bribe blinds the officials, and subverts the cause of those who are in the right” (Exod. 23:8; Deut. 16:19).

Sometimes, based on local custom where bribes may be tolerated, cross-cultural missionaries are tempted to offer bribes in order to achieve their goals. This practice should be constantly monitored and evaluated.

Gifts of appreciation may be given by those engaged in Christian mission after a service is provided to maintain cordial relationships. Bribes, however, may facilitate Christian service but compromise Christian witness.

ROB BELLINGHAM

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bridges of God. The term is taken from The Bridges of God, written by Donald A. McGavran in 1955, and considered the Magna Carta of the CHURCH GROWTH MOVEMENT. Indeed, the most common date used for the birth of the Church Growth Movement is 1955 because of the publication of The Bridges of God. The principal thesis of this book is that the mission station methodology of drawing converts from among those nationals who were attracted to the headquarters facilities of a foreign mission for any number of reasons was counterproductive. Converts in this approach were too frequently regarded by their peers as “cultural traitors.” McGavran desired to replace it with what he termed “PEOPLE MOVEMENTS,” an indigenous missiological approach in which converts would receive Christ and multiply churches within their cultural context so that conversion would take place without breaking or violating cultural ties in a kind of chain reaction. The book precipitated a vigorous debate among mission leaders of the time, but McGavran’s thesis soon became the prevailing view of missiologists.
The Bridges of God was first published by World Dominion Press in the United Kingdom and distributed in the United States by Friendship Press of New York. A revised and enlarged edition was published in 1981.

C. Peter Wagner

Bridgman, Eliza Jane Gillett (1805–71). American missionary to China. She was one of the few missionary women to begin her career single, prosper in it as a married woman, and bring it to a climactic close as a widow. Each stage of her life reveals a maturing faith and a deepening love for her work in Christ’s name.

Gillett was born in Derby, Connecticut, and attended school in New Haven. She began a teaching career there before moving to New York, where she served for seventeen years as principal of a boarding school. Through the influence of her pastor, she began to sense God’s call to the mission field. When the China Mission of the Episcopal Church was fully organized, Gillett was one of the three single women teachers recruited. In 1845 she became the first American unmarried woman sent to China.

Shortly after she arrived in Hong Kong, she fell in love with Elijah Coleman Bridgman. They married, which brought Eliza into sharp dispute with her mission board. As a result, she switched her relation to the American Board, and opened a girls’ school at Wongka Moda in 1845. In 1850 it became a boarding school and was soon filled to its fifty-pupil capacity. Many girls were brought to Christ through her tireless work.

After her husband’s death in 1861, she went to Peking, learned the Mandarin language, and, despite strong government opposition, opened another girls’ school. To further her work, she spent most of her own income to buy land and erect buildings. In her efforts to reach young girls for Christ, she literally worked herself to death.

Kathy McReynolds

Bright, William (1921– ). American evangelist and founder of Campus Crusade for Christ. Born in Coweta, Oklahoma, he graduated from Northwestern University, Tahlequah, Oklahoma. After going to California in 1944 to pursue a business career, he became a Christian under the influence of Henrietta Mears at First Presbyterian Church, Hollywood.

His vision for obeying the Great Commission began with evangelizing college students. He had begun seminary studies, but quit to launch Campus Crusade for Christ in 1951 at the University of California–Los Angeles, focusing on student leaders. He used a direct, aggressive approach to evangelism. His simple method later became his internationally circulated booklet, Have You Heard of the Four Spiritual Laws?

Brother Andrew

After rapid growth on U.S. campuses, Campus Crusade started overseas work in South Korea in 1958. Bright added specialized evangelistic outreach to athletes, business executives, political leaders, and diplomats. Campus Crusade grew rapidly to become one of the largest interdenominational mission agencies in the world, with some 6,000 fully supported U.S. and national workers in 152 countries.

Bright’s most influential innovation in world mission was his movie about the life of Christ (the Jesus film, 1979). In his The Secret: How to Live with Power and Purpose (1989) he codified his teaching about the Holy Spirit. For his contributions to religion in America, Bright was honored with the prestigious Templeton Award in 1996.

Jim Reapsome

Bibliography. R. Quebedeaux, I Found It! The Story of Bill Bright and Campus Crusade.

British and Foreign Bible Society. See Bible Societies.

British Virgin Islands (United Kingdom Dependent Area) (Est. 2000 pop. 19,000; 153 sq. km. [59 sq. mi.]). A group of some sixty islands, fifteen of which are populated. Local income is provided largely through tourism and offshore company registrations. In 1993 the population was estimated at 95.5 percent Christian (86.5% Protestant, 6.3% Catholic, and 2.7% marginal). Seventeen denominations are present, and the Methodists, who came in the late eighteenth century, have the largest number of members and congregations.

A. Scott Moreau

Brother Andrew (1928– ). Dutch missionary to closed countries and founder of Open Doors. Known only by his pseudonym, Brother Andrew was born into a strong Protestant family in Witte, Holland. German occupation during World War II ended his formal education and initiated his involvement in the Dutch resistance movement. He joined the army as a teen and served as a commander in Indonesia. Wounded and disillusioned, he gave himself to God. Enlivened by a missionary concern for his co-workers in his hometown chocolate factory, he began formal missionary training in 1953 at the Worldwide Evangelization Crusade Missionary Training College in Glasgow, Scotland.

In 1955 he attended a communist youth festival in Warsaw, Poland. It was then that he realized his life work was to be among the suffering church in many such countries. Known behind the Iron Curtain as the “evangelist of Eastern Eu-
Brother Andrew

F. French, Miss Brown’s Hospital.

Brown, Edith (1864–1956). English medical missionary and evangelist to India. After a struggle to qualify as a doctor at a time when English medical colleges were closed to women, she sailed to India on October 17, 1891, under the auspices of the Baptist Zenana Mission. In her first year in Ludhiana, Punjab, she had a vision of a medical college and teaching hospital for women, but it was not until 1893 that she was able to start implementing her plans with support from fourteen missions and encouragement from the surgeon-general of India. She began by persuading local midwives to come for training and to call her to difficult cases. The infant mortality rate plummeted, earning her the trust of the local women.

Brown was not until 1893 that she was able to start implementing her plans with support from fourteen missions and encouragement from the surgeon-general of India. She began by persuading local midwives to come for training and to call her to difficult cases. The infant mortality rate plummeted, earning her the trust of the local women.

In Ludhiana, Punjab, she had a vision of a medical college and teaching hospital for women, but it was not until 1893 that she was able to start implementing her plans with support from fourteen missions and encouragement from the surgeon-general of India. She began by persuading local midwives to come for training and to call her to difficult cases. The infant mortality rate plummeted, earning her the trust of the local women.

In 1943, two years after she reluctantly retired, the hospital nearly closed because of wartime shortages of personnel. In 1947 Brown returned to assist in the aftermath of partition with a high-caste Hindu convert whose life she had saved. The Christian Medical College and Hospital, Ludhiana is now a premier institution in India and a powerful ecumenical witness known throughout the country.

ELEANOR M. JACKSON

Buchman, Frank Nathan Daniel (1878–1961). American faith missionary and founder of Moral Rearmament. Born in Pennsburg, Pennsylvania, he graduated from Muhlenberg College and Mount Airy Lutheran Seminary. After ordination and pastoral work he was converted at Keswick in 1908, then returned to student ministry at Penn State College. In 1921 he began a movement to “change lives and enlist life-changers” that in 1929 developed into the Oxford Group with its four absolutes: purity, honesty, unselfishness, and love. The name of the group changed in 1938 to Moral Rearmament, designed to bring people of all faiths “the next stage nearer God.” Though he was often irascible, close colleagues worked with Buchman for years and for nothing. His crusade was run on Faith-Mission lines. After divine guidance had been given, commitments might be made without resources—and the funds arrived on time. Admirers included Harry Truman and foreign heads of state, Henry Ford, Bernard Shaw, and leading cardinals and archbishops. Detractors criticized this “Salvation Army for snobs,” though Buchman never confined his outreach to the “up-and-outs.” After World War II he was tireless in reconciliation efforts. Germans and Japanese were welcome at his Swiss center, when even some MRA personnel demurred.

The MRA is said to have averted major strikes, thwarted a planned massacre of the British in Nigeria, boosted the morale of dockers in Rio, helped Tunisian and Moroccan leaders avoid the bloodshed that was to overtake Algeria, and mediated between warring Congolese tribes to ease the path to independence. Buchman is still to many an enigma, one who dealt in theological generalities, but there is something disarming about a leader who explained success in terms of having been “wonderfully led to those who were ready.” Buchman’s thinking is reflected in his Remaking the World (1947).

J. D. DOUGLAS
Buddhist, Buddhism. A religion founded by a man from Northeast India, Siddharta Gautama (c. 566–486 B.C.), who, by virtue of his religious insight, came to be known as the Buddha (Enlightened One). The Buddha’s teachings (dharma) were rooted in the Hindu metaphysical systems of his day: a belief in the essential oneness of all being (brahman-atman) and the contingent nature of a phenomenal world driven by the dynamics of rebirth (samsara) (see reincarnation and transmigration) and ethical progression (karma). What came to be called Buddhism, however, distinguished itself by calling into question two key Hindu beliefs/practices: the spiritual value of the caste system and the divine character of the Hindu pantheon.

The Buddha himself was a member of the caste known as ksatriya, the second highest caste (second to the priestly caste, the brahmins) whose members formed what amounted to the aristocracy of fifth-century B.C. India. His father was king of an area called Lumbini on the modern border between India and Nepal. Gautama was given all the privileges of royalty, but came to see the spiritual vacuity of wealth and power. In reaction, he left home and family, and adopted a lifestyle outside of all caste, that of a wandering religious ascetic. Over time, however, diligent practice of asceticism showed him that mortification was equally vacuous. The Buddha’s Enlightenment consisted of recognizing the futility of reining on either self-aggrandizement or self-denial as a path to freedom (nirvana). Instead he began to teach a Middle Way, a path that consisted of moral living (sila) even as one learned, through meditative practice (samadhi), that the highest wisdom (panna) is beyond all cultural and social constructs, including caste.

In order to register this implicit denial of the spiritual necessity of caste, the Buddha chose not a frontal attack, but an emphasis on the temporariness of all life by characterizing all life as suffering (dukkha). In Four Noble Truths he summarized the character, origin, and ubiquity of suffering. In the fourth Noble Truth, the Buddha taught a path made of moral and meditative injunctions designed to position the spiritual seeker in a lifestyle more receptive to the ultimate wisdom of Buddhist teaching. The effect of this was to move the locus of religious practice away from Vedic ritual and temple sacrifice (the traditional loci of classic forms of Hinduism and indigenous Indian religion) to a much more personal centered, interior based set of practices. Thus, in Buddhism caste moved from being the determiner of religious life (as in Hinduism) to being a temporary factor (in India, at least) of conditioned existence. The Buddha encouraged a movement already apparent in Indian religious life in general from a socially constructed religion to a readily adaptable cross-cultural religion focusing on the universal wisdom of his teaching rather than social realities.

Indian culture was apparently ready for this reform. Emphasis on caste had created a top-heavy religion of privilege (Hinduism) that made access to ritual and practice the province of high caste brahmins and ksatriyas. Lower caste Hindus and those outside of caste altogether were attracted to the Buddha’s no-nonsense, meditative-practice teaching. If the Buddha’s sermons (suttas) are any indication, he also attracted his share of high caste Hindus. His movement grew rapidly during the Buddha’s 45-year itinerant ministry.

A result of this emphasis was a sharp lessening in importance of the elaborate Hindu pantheon of gods and goddesses. Although most converts to Buddhism probably did not give up their veneration of local deities altogether, the Buddha made it clear that these were penultimate in importance when compared with the importance of self-reliant spiritual searching. In the long term this change in the function of the gods and goddesses led to the shaping of different schools of Buddhism as it spread throughout Southeast Asia, China, Japan, Korea, and Tibet. In each of these situations, the Buddha’s teachings proved to be adaptable to local cultures without losing their essential features. Southeast Asian Theravada, Chinese Mahayana, Japanese Zen, and Tibetan Vajrayana Buddhism, in all their varieties, are distinctive and distinctively Buddhist.

This cultural adaptability is one of the reasons Buddhism has grown to be the world’s fourth largest religion with an estimated 300 million adherents. Because the Buddha emphasized the heavy and ultimately illusory role history and culture play in the way we view the self and the self’s spiritual search, Buddhism has proven to be effective in advocating itself to non-members. In Christian terms, Buddhism is a missionary religion. The Buddha, near the end of his life, encouraged his followers, especially the members of the order of monks (Sangha), to go and spread his teachings to all sentient beings. This has made Buddhism a major player on the world’s religious stage. It has now begun to spread rapidly in Western countries, with significant Buddhist populations in Western Europe and North America.

This growth has also made Buddhism a major competitor to Christianity both in the West and around the world. The cross-cultural adaptability of Buddhism is rivaled only by the ability of Christianity and Islam to transcend national, ethnic, and economic borders. This makes Buddhism an ideal religion in the increasingly global climate in which modern humanity finds itself. Buddhism has shown itself adept at addressing the traditionally thorny issues that arise around the interfacing of science and religion, for example. In some senses, the advantage here goes to Buddhist, Buddhism

Buddhism (over Christianity and Islam) because of its “semi-theistic” stance toward the gods and the divine in general. Although different branches of Buddhism take different postures toward “divinities,” gods and semidivine beings, in all forms of Buddhism gods of whatever sort are stages on the way, with final Enlightenment the task of the human individual in the end. The effect of this is that religion and science can be seen as fully compatible human endeavors, both extending human growth, both to eventually be transcended, as will all of samsara or the phenomenal world.

This same compatibility, however, creates a dilemma when it comes to ethical considerations. If all of reality is conditioned and impermanent, and the goal is to eventually supersede it with the unconditioned emptiness of Nirvana, then both the motivation and execution of ethical considerations can be problematic in a way that does not pertain for theistic religions with a supernatural mandate. Modern Buddhist scholars and practitioners, aware of the importance of this issue in a world filled with cultural injustices and oppression, are currently hard at work on developing a concept of “engaged Buddhism” that addresses the problems of social injustice without giving up on Buddhism’s metaphysic.

Buddhism is also ideally positioned to address the essentially therapeutic emphases of modern life. Early Buddhist psychological analyses of the human person, especially the mental states, are perhaps the most sophisticated in all of human history. These analyses—found across the Buddhist traditions, all the way from Theravada Abhidhamma analysis to Zen Buddhist suprarationalism—all serve in the Buddhist systems to elaborate on the anatta or no-self teaching of Buddhism. This refers to the essential Buddhist understanding that the individual self is a construct of historical and cultural factors, a construct that must be superseded in order to achieve Enlightenment. This makes the goals of Buddhist psychology and associated spiritual practice very different from comparable Christian and Muslim analyses and practice.

But the analyses themselves are profound across religious traditions, and the resulting practices, particularly the meditative ones, extremely effective in helping achieve self-knowledge. Indeed, most Westerners who become attracted to Buddhism do so because of their interest in the spiritual meditative practices which form such a rich core of the Buddhist religious tradition. Theravada Buddhist vipassana practice (insight meditation) has achieved a wide following in the United States, as has Zen meditation and the Tibetan meditation practice of the numerous dhammadhatu centers throughout the Western world. Westerners searching for the peaceful stress reduction that such practices effectively engender are soon attracted beyond the meditative technique to the metaphysical understandings not far below the surface.

At that metaphysical core, one finds a spiritual conundrum between all forms of Buddhism and all forms of orthodox, theistic Christianity: The question of whether a single, personal, transcendent God exists in relationship with discrete, eternally real human souls. After all the analyses are done, Buddhist religious traditions do not recognize such a God, and Christian traditions cease being Christian if they fail to do so.

TERRY C. MUCK

SEE ALSO Pure Land Buddhism.

Bulgaria (Est. 2000 pop.: 8,576,000; 110,912 sq. km. [42,823 sq. mi.]). Bulgaria, a Balkan country bordered by the Black Sea in southeastern Europe, has a population that has been steadily declining since 1985 due to emigration. It was formerly communist (one of the most consistently pro-Soviet), but is now a constitutional republic with a democratically elected government. Engineering is the principal economic activity supplemented by agricultural products such as wheat, corn, and barley. Bulgaria is the fourth largest exporter of tobacco in the world. About 80 percent of the population is Bulgar and 10 percent Rumelian Turk. The remaining 10 percent is made up of six different Gypsies nationalities and smaller communities of Macedonians, Pomaks, Poles, and Armenians.

With most of the nonreligious and atheists returning to the church since 1989, the vast majority of the Christians (over 80 percent of the population) are Orthodox. However, there are one million Muslims (12% of the country’s population). Evangelicals have tripled since 1970 (40,000 to 125,000) and are mainly represented by the Pentecostal Union, Church of God, Baptists, Christian Brethren, and Seventh-Day Adventists. The most rapid church growth since 1990 has been among Pentecostals. Evangelicals have experienced exceptional success among Turks and Gypsies.

The major evangelical strategies being implemented are church planting, literature distribution, and radio/TV broadcasting. The churches are also investing major resources in discipleship, Bible teaching, and leadership training. Competition between the many new evangelical agencies as well as conflict with marginal Christian groups (Jehovah’s Witnesses, Mormons, etc.) is a looming problem.

Todd M. Johnson

Bulu, Joeli (c. 1810–77), Tongan missionary in Fiji. Born in Vava’u, Tonga, he converted to Christ during the Great Tongan Awakening around 1833. Deeply burdened for Fiji at the same time that a letter came from missionary David Cargill requesting help, Bulu was sent in 1838. He first worked on learning the language, and when the missionaries set up a mission printing press, he was assigned to work there under James Calvert.

Proving to be faithful in the ministry, he began two years of missionary probation work in 1848, and in 1850 was the first South Pacific Islander to be ordained to ministry in the Methodist Church. In all, he toiled among the various islands of Fiji for thirty-nine years, often working in places too dangerous for Western missionaries.

He bridged the work between two major eras: cannibalism and acculturation (Tippett and Kanailagi, p. 114). His responsibilities ranged from assisting missionaries (e.g., Lorimer Fison) to pioneer evangelism and church planting to teaching and training local pastors to serving Fijian royalty. He braved life-threatening attacks from traditional religious politicians, political tensions and hostility, numerous hurricanes, and a measles epidemic that wiped out over forty thousand Fijians (a large proportion of the church—this set the indigenization process back by decades). Throughout, Bulu’s cultural sensitivity and unwavering ability to trust God qualified him as an exemplar in bearing testimony to Christ among the Fijians.

A. Scott Moreau

Burial Rites. See Death Rites.

Burkina Faso (Est. 2000 pop.: 11,708,000; 274,000 sq. km. [105,791 sq. mi.]). Christianity is a new religion in Burkina Faso. Roman Catholic missions began their work in the central part of the country at the end of the nineteenth century, in the wake of the establishment of French colonial rule over the Mossi Kingdom. The first evangelical Protestant missionaries arrived in 1921 with a vision to evangelize the Mossi. They were followed by the Christian and Missionary Alliance (1923), SIM (1930), the Worldwide Evangelization Crusade (1937), and the Evangelical Pentecostal Mission (1945).

The first five evangelical missions settled in specific areas of the country and evangelized the ethnic groups in their regions of ministry. This allowed evangelicals to occupy the land efficiently with the Assemblies of God working in the central region, the SIM in the east, the Christian and Missionary Alliance in the west, the Worldwide Evangelization Crusade and the Evangelical Pentecostal Mission in the south. Such cooperation among the original evangelical missions is a major reason for the growth and vitality of Christian communities throughout Burkina Faso in a relatively short time.

The participation of Burkinafés in the spreading of the gospel is an evidence of Christian vitality in Burkina Faso. Del Tarr recounts how, during his time as an Assemblies of God missionary in Burkina Faso, Jacques Kaboré, a Bible school student, was the human agent behind a three-month on-campus revival that resulted in 3,500 conversions to Christ (Tarr, p. 9). This is not an isolated case. The history of the other evangelical missions provides examples of Burkinafés’ involvement in evangelization even in the early years. They preached the gospel locally but they also carried it beyond the borders of their ethnic groups. They took their evangelistic zeal with them wherever migration led them.

Within Burkina Faso, migration and evangelistic zeal altered the Christian religious landscape in the 1970s. The denominations planted by the five original evangelical mission agencies became less regional as their adherents established their own kinds of churches in areas where they settled. New Protestant missions such as the Southern Baptists and the Mennonites also arrived in Burkina Faso at that time.

Migration to neighboring countries is an important factor in the life of Burkinafés. It was through migration that Burkinafés Christians became participants in cross-cultural missions. In Côte d’Ivoire, for instance, Burkinafés helped establish the Assemblies of God denomination. They were also active in Benin, Niger, Senegal, and Togo. Quite often they started by reaching Burkinafés immigrants in these countries. But they soon embarked on evangelizing other groups.

Titie Tiéno

Bibliography. D. Tart, Signs and Wonders in Ministry Today.

Burma. See Myanmar.

Burnout. The state of emotional, physical, and/or spiritual exhaustion that makes the missionary unable to carry out his or her work. While it is not normally terminal in life-and-death terms, it is often fatal to missionary effectiveness.

Potential causes of burnout are many, but overwork, undersupport, and prolonged exposure to the pressures of living and working cross-culturally are three of the most important. Learning the language and becoming bicultural can be particularly stressful to newcomers; living in the public view, facing unfulfilled expectations, and issues of self-esteem may be more important burnout issues for longer-term veterans.
Burnout

Unfortunately, all these challenges are often compounded by a lack of pastoral care or by mission administrators insensitive to the psychological pressures their missionaries face. Reliable figures are hard to come by, but some estimate that between 20 percent and 50 percent of new missionaries fail to return for a second term. This attrition is seldom the result of theological difficulties or problems in communicating the gospel. It is almost always attributable, at least in part, to an inability to adapt to the kinds of issues that lead to burnout.

Increasingly, mission agencies are seeking ways to address the causes of burnout before they occur. Training seminars, mentoring programs, team-building efforts, pastoral care ministries, and more flexible schedules have all proven helpful. But the rigors of missionary life, particularly among some of the least reached peoples of the world, are still significant. And the limitations of human and material resources available to the worldwide missionary enterprise would seem to suggest that the issue of burnout will not soon pass from the scene.

GARY R. CORWIN

SEE ALSO Attrition.

Burns, William Chalmers (1815–68). Scottish missionary to China born in Dun, Scotland. His father was one of Scotland's most respected ministers and his mother was known for her piety. After a rebellious youth, Burns surprised his parents by preparing for the ministry. While studying theology at Glasgow he decided to become a missionary. He was accepted as a missionary to India by the Church of Scotland.

Burns, William Chalmers (1815–68). Scottish missionary to China born in Dun, Scotland. His father was one of Scotland's most respected ministers and his mother was known for her piety. After a rebellious youth, Burns surprised his parents by preparing for the ministry. While studying theology at Glasgow he decided to become a missionary. He was accepted as a missionary to India by the Church of Scotland.

Before Burns could leave for India he became involved in the Scottish revival that began in 1839. God used him for eight years as a preacher and revivalist in Scotland, England, and Canada. In 1846 Burns renewed his application to go to India, but the Foreign Missions Committee of the Free Church of Scotland was short of funds. At that time the Presbyterian Church of England was looking for someone to pioneer a new mission to China, and Burns applied. On April 22, 1847, Burns was ordained the first missionary to China by the Presbyterian Church of England.

 Burns began his work in Canton; he later moved to Amoy and other places, arriving eventually in Peking. His method was to wear Chinese clothing, itinerate widely, and preach wherever possible. He opposed the opium and coolie trade and sought to raise consciences back home against these evils.

ROGER S. GREENWAY

Bibliography. A. Fulton, Through Earthquake, Wind and Fire: Church and Mission in Manchuria 1867–1950; S. Neill, HCM.

Burundi (Est. 2000 pop.: 7,339,000; 27,834 sq. km. [10,747 sq. mi.]). It is difficult to discuss the central African nation of Burundi independently of its northern neighbor, Rwanda. The two states, precolonial kingdoms with similar ethnic populations, who speak closely related Bantu languages, became after 1885 part of German East Africa. After World War I they were administered by Belgium as a League of Nations mandate, and after World War II as a United Nations Trust Territory, known as Ruanda-Urundi.

Both nations achieved independence in 1962, Burundi as a constitutional monarchy. It was the second most densely populated territory in Africa, and had an extremely low per capita income. Alongside this was a high rate of literacy and probably the highest percent of baptized Christians, both Catholic and Protestant, in Africa.

The people of Burundi—between six and seven million—all speak the same language, Kirundi; all share the same customs and all live side by side. They are divided, however (and this is true also of their northern neighbor, Rwanda), into a cattle-keeping aristocracy, the Tutsi (14%), the Hutu agriculturists (85%), and a tiny minority of indigenous pygmies, the Twa (less than 1%). The Tutsi warriors, who often appear physically different, are descended from an immigrant group coming from the north, probably about four hundred years ago, who subdued the peasant Hutu, making them their clients. The German and then Belgian colonial officials, and in some cases the missionaries also, favored the Tutsi as "natural leaders" and as more intelligent than the "Hutu peasants." In fact, the divisions between Tutsi and Hutu were originally flexible; there was intermarriage, and it was possible for a Hutu who acquired enough cattle to "become Tutsi." But in 1933 the Belgian administration introduced mandatory identity cards, which included the "ethnic identity" of the bearer, Tutsi, Hutu, or Twa. Legally, movement between groups was no longer possible. There was discrimination against the Hutu in education, in recruitment to the civil service, and, in particular, in recruitment to the army which, in Burundi, was almost totally Tutsi.

After independence (1962), the constitutional monarchy did not last long; it was overthrown by an army-led coup in 1965. The country's history since has been one of struggle between Tutsi and Hutu, with the almost exclusively Tutsi army giving that minority group the advantage, and with periods of ethnic genocide leading to the refugee exodus of hundreds and thousands of civilians into its eastern and western neighbors, Tanzania and Zaire. Parallel events in Rwanda have both influenced and been influenced by Burundi. There were military coups in Burundi in 1965, 1976, 1983, and 1993. Particularly low points were the overthrow (and killing) of the royal family in 1965, the assassination of the first popularly elected president (a Hutu) and many of his ministers in October 1993, only four months after his election, and the death of his successor in a plane crash in Rwanda in April 1994. The plane, which also carried the Rwandan president, was shot down by a rocket.

Tragically, Hutu and Tutsi Christians, baptized members of common congregations—for there was never any ethnic segregation—have not been able to separate themselves from the general social breakdown. This is true for Roman Catholic and all Protestant denominations, although of course there have been many individual acts of heroism and Christian compassion. But it is sadly clear that many Christians, including clergy and pastors, have participated in the murder of fellow-believers, even of innocent children. Where did missionaries and the church fail in their teaching? It will take many years for the churches to come to terms with what has happened, and rebuild a new foundation. For the Protestants there is a particular and bitter irony, since Ruanda-Urundi, from about 1930, was the cradle of the East Africa Revival. Members of this movement have testified to the breaking down of racial and ethnic barriers where the Holy Spirit’s healing power was experienced. But even the Re-vival fellowship has not been enough to prevent the killings.

Butler, Fanny Jane

Butler, Fanny Jane (1850–89). English pioneer medical missionary to India. The eighth child of ten born to a museum curator, she grew up surrounded by good books. Intensely musical, she could read when she was three. She gave herself to Christ when she was thirteen. Meeting a CHINA INLAND MISSION couple in Birmingham, she resolved to work in China. But then Dr. Elmslie of Srinagar’s dying appeal for women medical missionaries directed her to the School of Medicine for Women in London, of which she was the first student. When she qualified in Dublin in 1877, she became the first fully qualified English woman medical missionary. After study in Calcutta and language training, in 1883 she moved to Bhagalpur, where in four years she created an effective outpatient system and developed considerable pediatric skills. After a visit to see CMS work in Amritsar in 1886, she was inspired to volunteer to go to Kashmir; whence, after a short furlough, she arrived in December 1888. She organized the start of a much longed for women’s hospital in Srinager but tragically died of complications from dysentery two weeks after the foundation stone was laid. A simple gospel preacher, she is probably most significant for showing what could be achieved through love in the way of preventive medicine. In 1890 a Fanny Butler Scholarship was created to train women medical missionary candidates in London.

Cable, (Alice) Mildred (1877–1952). English missionary to China. Born in Surrey, England, she qualified as a chemist, studied also in the fields of surgery and midwifery, and in 1902 was sent by the China Inland Mission to Shansi Province, where she joined Eva and Francesca French in developing a girls’ school. At heart, however, they were pioneers, and in 1923 the three moved to Suchow, whence they made many hazardous journeys through the Gobi Desert, Inner Mongolia, Sinkiang, and Chinese Turkestan, and occasionally fell into the hands of brigands or communist bands. They studied manners and customs of the people, and evangelized in the oases; Mildred recounted their experiences in such books as Through Jade Gate and Central Asia (with Eva French, 1927), Something Happened (with Francesca French, 1935), and The Gobi Desert (1942). Worsening political conditions compelled them to leave the area in 1936, and Mildred returned to England, where she continued to write while working for the British and Foreign Bible Society. She also produced the life stories of Percy Mather (1935) and George Hunter (1948).

J. D. Douglas

Cabrini, Frances Xavier (1850–1917). Italian-born missionary to the United States. Born Maria Francesca Cabrini in Sant’ Angelo Lodigiano, Lombardy, Italy, she studied to become a teacher. Her attempts to become a religious were initially turned down due to frail health. Working at the House of Providence orphanage in Codogno, she made her vows there in 1877. Three years later, Cabrini founded the Institute of the Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart with seven orphan girls. After the establishment of several houses in northern Italy, the organization received papal approval in 1888. She served as its mother-general until her death.

Abandoning a desire from childhood to go as a missionary to China (anticipation of which led her to adopt the name Frances Xavier), Cabrini obeyed the request of Pope Leo XIII and accepted the invitation of Archbishop Michael Corrigan in 1889 to care for impoverished Italian immigrants in New York City. Her activities eventually expanded as she established more schools, orphanages, and hospitals in the United States, Latin America, and Europe. In 1909 she became a naturalized American citizen. Devoted to Christ and with an indomitable spirit, she triumphed over enormous challenges in her ministry to immigrants and other needy people, winning widespread respect and inspiring other women to join her.

When she died from malaria in 1917, there were an estimated 1,500 daughters in 67 religious houses. Mother Cabrini was canonized a saint by Pope Pius XII on July 7, 1946, for her heroic faith and service to humankind. She was the first American to receive this honor; her feast day is December 22. In 1950, the Catholic Church proclaimed her Patroness of Immigrants.

Gary B. McGee

Call, The. See The Missionary Calling.

Calverley, Edwin Elliott (1882–1971). American renowned Islamics scholar and missionary in the Middle East. Born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, he received his education at The City’s College, Princeton University, Princeton Theological Seminary, and Hartford Seminary Foundation. At the latter, he was mentored by Duncan Black MacDonald and completed a Ph.D. in Arabic and Islammics in 1923. The Philadelphia Presbytery of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) ordained him in 1908. In the same year, he married Eleanor Jane Taylor, M.D., a recent graduate of the Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia.

Joining the Arabian Mission of the Reformed Church in America in 1909, they went as missionaries to the Persian Gulf and served in Bahrain, Iraq, and Kuwait. An illness forced him to return home with his family in 1930. After recovery, Calverley then began a long and distinguished career on the faculty of the Kennedy School of Missions at Hartford Seminary Foundation. His expertise in Arabic and Islamics gained recognition from several professional organizations of which he was a member: American Council of Learned Societies, American Oriental Society, Royal Asiatic Society, and Royal Central Asian Society. In 1939, he was appointed to the Translations Committee of the American Bible Society. Calverley's books include Arabian Primer, I and II (1920), Arabian Reader (1925), Worship in Islam (1925), and Islam, An Introduction (1958). He served as co-editor of The Muslim World with Samuel M. Zwemer (1938–47), editor of The Muslim World (1948–52), and afterward as an associate editor. As a visiting professor, he taught at Columbia University, American University in Cairo, Johns Hopkins University, American University in Washington, D.C., and Boston University School of Theology.

GARY B. MCGEE

Calvinism. A system of doctrine and an historical phenomenon. As a doctrinal system, Calvinism stresses certain truths that have a clear bearing on mission, three of which stand out.

First, Calvinism insists that the glory of God is the primary goal of all thought and action, including mission. "The chief end of man," says the Westminster Shorter Catechism, "is to glorify God and to enjoy him forever." Therefore, Calvinism opposes the common tendency to regard human beings and their happiness as the central concern of mission. While Calvinism clearly regards human well-being as important, and concern for the temporal and eternal welfare of humans motivates many kinds of mission activity, the glory of God remains the primary goal.

Calvinists find ample support for this in Scripture. Jesus summed up his work saying, "I have brought you (Father) glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do" (John 17:4). Since Christ's mission on earth was to glorify the Father and he passed on his mission to his disciples, the primary goal of the church's mission can be none other than to glorify God. "As you (Father) sent me into the world, I have sent them into the world." "As the Father has sent me, I am sending you" (John 17:18; 20:21).

Missionaries who take as their chief goal the glory of God enjoy theological underpinnings that help them persevere when from a human standpoint the mission is impossible. Calvinists cling to the truth that whatever the immediate and visible results of their work may be, God is glorified when his servants carry out their assignments humbly, faithfully, and in accord with his Word.

Second, Calvinism stresses the all-embracing doctrine of the KINGDOM OF GOD, which was the main theme of Jesus' preaching. For Calvinists, Christ's lordship extends to every inch of the globe and to every area of public and private life. This claim is affirmed in the very preface to Christ's commission in Matthew 28:18–19: "All authority in heaven and earth has been given to me. Therefore go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and teaching them to obey everything I have commanded you." Christ's claim to universal authority has powerful implications for mission work and discipleship.

Christ is Lord over all, Calvinists insist, and his Word speaks with authority to rich and poor, politicians and academicians, merchants and military, parents and children. The Word the church proclaims turns the searchlight of divine truth and righteousness upon every area of life and every human relationship. Nothing lies outside the boundaries of Christ's reign.

When Christian mission fails to teach and operate from this perspective, a form of Christianity develops that treats religious faith and morality as individual matters and leaves the public square unaffected. Churches may grow in size and number but if they fail to educate members to apply kingdom values to society at large, they fail in their role as lighthouses of the kingdom and they set the stage for suffering, violence, and revolution. The mission world is currently awakening to its failure to address the broader implications of Christ's kingdom for the plight of the poor, systemic injustices, racial tensions, and misuse of the ENVIRONMENT (see HOLISTIC MISSION).

A third major emphasis of Calvinist theology that has a bearing on mission is the doctrine of the SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD. Calvinism stresses the fact that mission work is first and foremost the Lord's work, not ours. He calls and equips his servants to co-labor with him in gathering his chosen ones from every corner of the earth.

Recognition of the sovereignty of God has the dual effect of keeping missionaries humble when their work goes especially well, and encouraging them when the opposition seems overwhelming. The Bible tells us that when Paul and Barnabas returned to their "sending" church in Antioch, "they gathered the church together and reported all that God had done through them and how he had opened the door of faith to the Gentiles” (Acts 14:27). Their summary of what had taken place is very instructive. They ascribed the glory to God by attributing the success they enjoyed to God’s working through them and opening doors they never could have opened. Paul and Barnabas did not ignore what they as missionaries had done. They had preached, taken risks, faced opposition, gathered converts, and started churches. But the bottom line was that the work was the Lord’s, not theirs. They made this plain when they reported to the church.
Calvinism

Besides humility, the truth of divine sovereignty offers encouragement to missionaries who tremble at the magnitude of the task before them. Calvinism reminds them that even the best preachers cannot reach farther than people’s ear drums and God alone can cause sinners to respond to the gospel’s call. God acts in saving power in accord with his sovereign and eternal will.

Paul the missionary succinctly summarizes God’s sovereign activity in salvation and mission: “Those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified” (Rom. 8:30). Clearly, God uses missionaries as his callers, his co-workers. His eternal purpose and sovereign power make their mission possible and assure them that their work will not be in vain (Isa. 55:10–13). The open acknowledgment of this comforting truth is something Calvinism offers mission.

Historically, Calvinism has played a major role in the Protestant mission enterprise over the past two centuries. A large percentage, in some cases the majority, of missionaries serving in parts of Africa, Asia, and Latin America have been Calvinists. There are critics who argue that Calvinism’s emphasis on the sovereignty of God discourages mission. And even among Calvinists there are a few who excuse their neglect of mission by arguing that divine predestination removes the need for human efforts to win the lost. Calvinism’s defense lies in its submission to the Scriptures which clearly teach both divine sovereignty and Christian duty to co-labor with God in mission.

ROGER S. GREENWAY

Cámara, Helder Pessoa (1909– ). Brazilian priest and theologian; champion of the poor. Born in Fortaleza, the twelfth of thirteen children, he was thoroughly acquainted with the rigors of poverty and its consequences. Ordained to the priesthood at twenty-two, he became active in politics, in public and religious education, as well as concern over the role the church should play to enable it to meet the needs of the people. In 1952, shortly after his consecration as a bishop, he organized the National Conference of the bishops of Brazil and was its secretary for twelve years. This became the leading force for social change in the country. Named auxiliary bishop of Rio de Janeiro (1952), he helped in the formation of the Council of Latin American Bishops (CELAM), serving as its vice president, 1959–65. In 1965 he was named archbishop of Olinda and Recife, where he served until his retirement in 1985. During his tenure his stand for economic development and pacifism was severely opposed by the government and he was eventually banned from speaking in public between 1968 and 1977. He countered with a strong position on nonviolence, which he parlayed in North America and Western Europe, where he received honorary degrees and his writings were in great demand. His simplicity and acclaimed saintliness have won for him a place among the defenders of the poor of the world.

PABLO E. PEREZ

Cambodia (Est. 2000 pop.: 11,637,000; 181,035 sq. km. [69,898 sq. mi.]). Cambodia is bordered by Thailand, Vietnam, and Laos. It is estimated that less than 0.5 percent of its people are Christians and less than 0.1 percent Protestants, though recent growth rates have exceeded 20 percent annually.

The Khmer, the largest people group, developed a sophisticated Hindu culture in the tenth century. By the twelfth century, the kings had created Angkor Wat, a temple-like city that symbolized prosperity and invulnerability. The Angkor Empire collapsed in the fifteenth century, and for the next four hundred years Cambodia was embroiled in numerous wars with her neighbors. It was a protectorate of France from 1863 to 1945. Cambodia became an unwilling participant in the Vietnam War when the king allowed the Viet Minh sanctuary. This resulted in U.S. bombing of Cambodia, which in turn opened the door for the Khmer Rouge, led by Pol Pot, to seize control in April 1975. Pol Pot carried out one of the bloodiest socialist revolutions in history in which one to 3 million lost their lives and hundreds of thousands fled the country.

Mission History. Roman Catholics first entered Cambodia in the sixteenth century with little results. The rulers persecuted and expelled all missionaries. It was only in the second half of the eighteenth century that mission work began to see some success among the Khmer.

During the time of French rule, the Khmer were relatively open to Christianity. Even so, conversions were still few in number. By the
In the 1960s, there were about sixty thousand Catholics, of whom only three thousand were Khmer.

Protestant missionaries arrived in 1923 first under the Oriental Missionary Society (now OMS INTERNATIONAL) and later under the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE (CMA). The CMA missionaries initially made little progress due to the opposition of the French rulers. In 1965, King Sihanouk, believing Christianity to be anti-nationalistic, prohibited foreign missionaries. In 1970, when the king was deposed, foreign missionaries returned and experienced a new openness to Christ among the Khmer. Before 1970, there were roughly six hundred Protestant Christians. When the Khmer Rouge took over the country in 1975, there were over nine thousand. During the Pol Pot regime many of them died or fled the country. Today there is no record of Khmer Christians in Cambodia, although one source reports twelve small congregations of less than one hundred each in Phnom Penh.

From 1979 to 1991, the country was embroiled in civil war. Three separate parties have tried to overthrow the Vietnamese-backed regime led by Heng Samrin. With a semblance of peace due to UN efforts, many mission and social organizations are making inroads into Cambodia.

VIOLET JAMES

Bibliography. D. Chandler, A History of Cambodia; idem, Facing the Cambodian Past; F. Ponchaud, The Cathedral of the Rice Paddy; idem, Cambodia Year Zero.

Cameroon, United Republic of (Est. 2000 pop.: 15,245,000; 475,442 sq. km. [183,568 sq. mi.]). In 1845 Jamaican and British Baptist missionaries introduced Christianity in what is now Cameroon, at Victoria and Douala. In 1850, the Board of Foreign Mission of the Presbyterian Church-USA established a mission on the island of Corisco, forty miles north of the mouth of the Gabon River Estuary and just off the coast of Rio Muni. This served as a point of departure for evangelistic work along the coast, including what is now Cameroon. Catholics began work in 1890, while two years later, Presbyterian missionaries moved into the southern Cameroon interior. The Bulu were among the first to respond. By 1930 the largely Bulu congregation at Elat (Ebolowa) was the largest Presbyterian Church in the world. The overwhelming majority of Christians belong to churches which owe their origins to these three traditions. Smaller numbers belong to Lutheran or various Pentecostal and African Initiated Churches.

While most of the population in southern and western Cameroon, which was turning to Christianity, observed traditional religions, Islam dominated in the north. Evangelistic outreach there began later and proved more difficult. At present, two-thirds of the population of Cameroon professes to be Christian. However, few Christians are in the north. There are over thirty denominations.

In the years leading up to national independence in 1960, the mission agencies handed power to Cameroonian bodies, including oversight of agricultural, broadcasting, educational, medical, translation, and other ministries. With limited resources, contemporary Cameroonian Christians have struggled to maintain these ministries through church planting, evangelism, and social outreach, especially in the areas of rural development and urban poverty. Cameroonian Christians have been among leaders in Africa in formulating a contextual approach to theological education and a holistic approach to mission.

At times, especially during the years immediately before and after Cameroon became independent in 1960 and in the early 1990s, church-state relations have been troubled. Conflict has arisen, in part, when Christian leaders have identified with political parties actively supporting a major political rival of the head of state. For example, in the early 1970s, the Catholic bishop of Nkongsamba, Cameroon's third largest city, was implicated in a plot against former President Ahmadou Ahidjo. More generally, the exercise of the churches' prophetic ministry has engendered tension as the churches have championed democratization, defended human rights, and challenged the government to address problems of the poor and marginalized.

PAUL R. DEKAR

Camping. Temporary community living designed to enrich the Christian life. The customary focus is a camp, conference, retreat, or outdoor center. Although an urban environment is possible, a natural setting connecting campers to the powerful witness of God's creation is the usual site of organized camping. The temporary community enables people to come apart from the social pressures of their permanent communities, pressures that often hinder change, and to gain new perspectives on their lives and God. Camping is highly relational and introduces participants to a compelling community of love, fellowship, and shared experiences where Christian beliefs and values can be seen and tried under supportive leadership. The continuous day-by-day guided process of growth and the expectations of taking risks, trying new activities, and meeting new people open the participants to taking new steps of faith in the development of a Christlike character. While many institutions focus on a certain dimension of the person, camp is designed to minister to the whole person—physically, mentally, socially, and spiritually. Camping aims to provide powerful, memorable experiences that point to specific spiritual and biblical truths. The daily regimen of an isolated camp community offers a rich opportunity for development of Christian leadership for the church and society.
Camping

Although outdoor living goes back to the creation of humankind, and the Bible recounts the nomadic life of the patriarchs of the Jewish nation, the forty-year wandering of the children of Israel, and Christ's use of the out-of-doors for his ministry, historians view organized camping as a North American innovation of the late nineteenth century. They acknowledge, however, that the camp meetings of the Second Great Awakening at the turn of the nineteenth century set the pattern of future camping practices. Outdoor meeting sites drew people away from potentially harmful pursuits in the cities to do business with God as the frontier was being settled. The camp meeting was replaced by the Bible conference toward the end of the nineteenth century as organized camping grew.

Many of the early leaders of the movement were devout Christians whose zeal not only led them to create their own camping ministries, but also helped others to do likewise. Examples of this zeal are Luther Gulick and his wife Charlotte. The children of missionary parents, they started a camp for families at Gales Ferry, Connecticut, in 1887, taught at the School of Christian Workers (which later became the International YMCA College and eventually Springfield College), traveled to Europe on behalf of the international YMCA to spread ideas on camping and creation, and recruited hundreds of men and women to serve abroad as recreational workers and camp leaders. Charlotte is credited with founding the Camp Fire Girls, and Luther along with others founded the Boy Scouts of America.

Christian missionaries and missionary societies along with organizations like the YMCA, the International Sunday School Association, the International Council on Religious Education, Scripture Union, and Inter-Varsity Fellowship have taken the camping movement throughout the world.

The need for mutual encouragement, fellowship, and sharing of ideas and resources drew evangelical camp leaders together simultaneously in California and New England in 1950 and in the Midwest and Canada shortly thereafter. These groups merged in 1961 as the Christian Camp and Conference Association and then became Christian Camping International (CCI) in 1963 as international camps were added to the membership. CCI is an alliance that aims to strengthen international camps worldwide.

Bud Williams

Campus Ministry. See Student Mission Work.

Canada (Est. 2000 pop.: 31,029,000; 9,970,610 sq. km [3,849,653 sq. mi.]). Canada is the world’s second largest country in size, covering five time zones. Yet it has just over 30 million inhabitants, a mosaic of over one hundred nationalities, their religions ranging from Asian shamanism to African animism to European “churchianity” and secular humanism.

However, Christian principles shaped this nation even before the Confederation in 1867. Many of the million British loyalists who headed north after the American War of Independence were devout Anglicans, Baptists, Congregationalists, Methodists, and Presbyterians. On the Prairies the subsequent influx of Anabaptists, reflecting Pietist views, mixed with other immigrants. The Quebec Act of 1774 gave the Roman Catholic Church in that province the right to act as a quasi-state.

Ambivalence and Tolerance. Eighty percent of Canada’s inhabitants live within a hundred miles of the southern border, where the climate is least inhospitable, and the land is most arable. Of the world’s exportable grain, Canada provides 20 percent (80% of its own production). However, the narrow ribbon of population stretches nearly four thousand miles from west to east, mostly along the southern border. There are only three cities of more than one million people: Vancouver (west coast), Toronto (heartland), and Montreal (east). Thus evangelism and missionary outreach tend to be very regional.

Many Canadians are ambivalent about their national identity, as, on the one hand, ethnic minorities celebrate their traditions, and, on the other hand, the culture and commerce of the United States flood across the world’s longest unprotected border: Canada has only one-tenth the population of the United States but is its chief trading partner. The percentage of evangelicals in Canada (officially 7% but actually 14%, according to statistician George Rawlyk) is much lower than in America (over 30%). Separation of church and state has never been the issue it is in the United States, but then Canadians like to appear moderate about most issues.

What has been characteristic of Canadians is a mind-set that is, for the most part, tolerant of plurality in culture, religion, and ideology. After all, Canada became a nation only as a compromise between the English and the French. Because of provincial representation, the benevolent pacifism of Mennonites and other refugees in the three Prairie provinces (Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba) influenced politics and society out of proportion to their numbers, and helped to sensitize the young nation to world need. Per capita charitable giving, including to missions, is among the highest in the world. The ratio of missionary sending to population has vied with New Zealand and Norway for top place.

Revival and Missions. Revival movements, such as “The Great Awakening” of the 1700s, made an impact on local communities and on government (see Great Awakenings). The 1800s were dubbed “The Evangelical Century.” On the official seal of the Dominion of Canada are words chosen from Psalm 72:8: “He shall have dominion from sea to sea.”

Up to the early 1800s, most missionary work was directed from denominational headquarters in Europe. Gradually Canadian churches awakened to their own responsibilities. In the late 1800s, the Student Volunteer Movement motivated many men and women to become missionaries. Canada’s InterVarsity Christian Fellowship, founded in 1929, held its first student missions conference in Toronto in 1946. That conference became the noted student missions recruitment convention now held in Urbana, Illinois. Canadians participate in “Urbana” but also hold their own regional student missions events, which motivate hundreds of young men and women to consider missions (see also Urbana Mission Conferences).

Prairie Bible Institute and Toronto Bible College (now Ontario Bible College and Theological Seminary) were among dozens of Bible schools initially established to prepare men and women for missionary service. Recruits from the vast prairies, accustomed to simple, rugged living and resourcefulness, made successful pioneer missionaries in developing countries. As a result, a century ago some British-oriented missions would accept workers from Canada but hesitated over Americans!

Religious Plurality. The ethnic mosaic has continued to expand, as the United Nations for several years named Canada the most ethnically diverse city in North America. The city hosts the largest Italian and Somali communities outside of their homelands. Vancouver has the second largest community of Sikh expatriates in the world. Nationwide, the influx of Chinese and Korean Christians has spurred evangelical witness, particularly in churches that had lost their missionary vision.

Now far removed from its Christian roots, Canada’s secularized society is scarred by overt immorality and radical humanism. The communications media enjoy casting churches either as irrelevant or bigoted. In a major exhibit in 1990, the Royal Ontario Museum stereotyped pioneer Canadian missionaries to Africa as adventurers, racists, and destroyers of culture, out to extend the British Empire. Yet the very missionaries the Museum cited as examples were just the opposite, as documented by their journals in the Museum archives!

Native Canadians, or First Nations members (terms preferred to “Indians”), continue to present a special need, as the news media have publicized abuses by several church boarding schools earlier in the 1900s. Meanwhile New Age views romanticize “native spirituality”—rejected by evangelical native churches.

Anglo-French tension, perpetuated by a minority of Quebec secessionists, also is part of the Canadian mosaic. Up to the late 1950s, missionaries from English-speaking Canada were pelted with stones and sometimes imprisoned for public witness; the Martin Luther film was banned. Now the power of the Roman Catholic Church is largely disregarded by Quebecois, and French-speaking evangelical churches multiply faster than the availability of trained leaders.

Canada constitutes a fertile mission field in itself, and also has the potential, in personnel and financial support, to provide missionaries within the nation and to other lands.

Canadian Mission Boards and Societies.

Samuel de Champlain, who founded Quebec city (1608), declared, “The salvation of a single soul is worth more than the conquest of an empire.” He was sympathetic to the French Calvinistic Huguenots, several of whom accompanied him and settled in Acadia/Novia Scotia (1605) and Quebec (1608). However, the early influence of these Protestants was snuffed out by the Jesuits, who arrived in 1611, and gained control of “New France” by 1620, blocking further Huguenot immigration.

Jesuit, Franciscan, and other Roman Catholic missionaries suffered much physical hardship and, in some cases, torture and death at the hands of those they sought to win to the Church. Outreach to the far West was carried on chiefly by the Oblates of Mary Immaculate (OMI). An early Protestant pioneer was Johann Christian Erhardt, a Moravian who visited Labrador in 1752 but was killed by the Inuit. Other Moravians arrived in 1764 and established self-supporting Christian settlements (see also Moravian Mission). English medical missionary Wilfred T. Grenfell drew world attention to the plight of the native peoples of Labrador by his work 140 years later.
Canadian Mission Boards and Societies

JOHN ELIOT’S 1661 translation of the New Testament for the Algonquins (who extended into Upper Canada) was the forerunner of Bible translations that spurred Protestant mission in Canada. The first non-English publication of the British and Foreign Bible Society was the Gospel of Mark, translated by a Mohawk chief (published 1804). The Church Mission Society undertook the evangelization of the west and north. A Methodist missionary invented a syllabic script for a Cree translation. Presbyterians and others joined in the outreach. By 1914 those efforts had resulted in an estimated three-quarters of native Canadians becoming Christian. However, since then, native peoples have suffered the impact of social vices and face great spiritual and physical problems. Today native churches and missions continue pastoral and missionary outreach among their own people.

Increasingly, Canadians responded to the call of missions overseas. Among the pioneers were Baptist Samuel Day (India 1835); Presbyterians George L. Mackay (China 1888); Salvationist Rowland V. Bingham (Africa 1893); Baptists Archibald and Jean Reekie (Bolivia 1898). Pentecostal missions began developing early in the 1900s, with four Canadians taking part in a project in Liberia (1908).

Two Canadians who launched global missions were close friends and fellow gospel entrepreneurs. Albert B. Simpson began as a Canadian Presbyterian before moving to pulpits in the United States. Trainer of missionaries, editor, and author, he founded the Christian and Missionary Alliance in 1897. Bingham, Simpson’s friend, pioneered the Sudan Interior Mission (see Society for International Missions) in 1893, opened Canada’s Keswick spiritual life conference as a mission-sending base, and initiated a mission-focused magazine, a publishing house, and a mission to the armed forces.

In 1928, another Presbyterian minister, Oswald J. Smith, started Peoples Church, a non-denominational work that gained international missions fame. Traveling to 80 countries, Smith contributed to missiology through slogans, the “faith pledge,” many of his 1200 hymns, poems, and gospel songs, and his 35 books (six million copies, 128 languages).

World War II exposed Christian members of Canada’s armed forces to the spiritual and physical needs of other lands. Reports influenced groups such as the Mennonites to become active in missions and development projects. By the 1960s, Canadian foreign missionaries numbered over four thousand. The highest proportion of these came from Associated Gospel (AGC), Brethren, and Fellowship of Evangelical Baptists churches, although the majority served outside their own denominational missions—most under missions are linked with the Interdenom-
Candidate Selection

Strong candidacy programs include interaction with the home church of each candidate, reflecting the fact that it really is the church that sends the missionary. Many missions will not even consider a candidate who does not have an enthusiastic endorsement from their sending church base.

GARY R. CORWIN

Candidate Selection. Statisticians estimate that there are over 144,000 missionaries worldwide and that this number of cross-cultural Christian workers will continue to grow. They note that this burgeoning missionary force will come increasingly from non-Western countries.

Principles of candidate selection for ministry can be found in both the Old and New Testaments. Jethro advised Moses to select capable men who met certain qualifications to serve as judges (Exod. 18:21). Those selected to work on the tabernacle had to possess certain skills and abilities (Exod. 35:10, 30–35). The same was true for replacement of an apostle (Acts 1:21–22) or the institution of a new leadership role for deacons (Acts 6:3).

Candidate selection is most healthy when viewed from a systems perspective. Effective selection procedures must work in tandem with the follow-up support scaffolding of continuous training and mentoring, or approved candidates will be shortchanged in their total ministry effectiveness. Selection procedures should be considered one step in a system designed not only to recruit and qualify capable candidates, but also to provide ministry-long maintenance.

Selection benchmarks should be specific to the task anticipated. What qualifies a person for missionary CHURCH PLANTING does not automatically qualify the candidate for BIBLE TRANSLATION, dorm parenting, tentmaking, or camp ministries. To assure sound selection benchmarks are in place, wise selectors will attempt to determine the minimal skills required for effectiveness for a particular position. Additionally, they must ask what commitment, competency, cultural, and character benchmarks will be required to accomplish these tasks effectively. Commitment benchmarks would include a sense of God’s call to ministry and staying power, a firm grasp of Scripture, and appropriate ministry skills. Other minimal qualifications may include flexibility and empathetic contextual skills, servant-leadership and followership, and moral purity.

The use of multiple assessment tools can provide the selectors and the candidate with a comprehensive evaluation. Many agencies use personal interviews, doctrinal statements, letters of reference, and psychological testing. Some require additional participation in simulation exercises or supervised ministry experience. Multiple assessment tools, when tied to specific future ministry tasks, can provide all parties with a comprehensive evaluation.

ATTRITION (premature departures) carries a heavy price tag: lost ministry opportunities, lost finances, family stress, and friction between institutions. While justifiable reasons for attrition exist (such as marriage, failing health, retirement, and care of parents), unjustifiable reasons also exist (such as peer conflict, moral problems, and adjustment and training issues). It therefore becomes incumbent on each agency leader in every country to track and investigate the accuracy of the reasons given for attrition. Such research, when not inhibited by pride on the part of agency leadership or the involved Christian worker, will assist selectors in the necessary adjustments of the selection and follow-up procedures.

Those involved as candidate selectors should represent the institutions who will provide the candidate future support in some manner. These institutions may include the sending churches, agencies, national churches, and training institutions. Institutional partnership in the selection process will ensure ownership and accountability. Such partnership in selection also demonstrates to the candidate the concern and credibility of each part.

TOM A. STEFFAN

Candidate Selection

Candidates for church planting should be selected using Qualified Church Planters; B. Sawatsky, EMQ 27:4 (1991): 342-47.

Canon. See Bible.

Cape Verde (Est. 2000 pop.: 448,000; 4,033 sq. km. [1,557 sq. mi.]). Cape Verde consists of an archipelago of ten islands and five islets in the Atlantic Ocean off the coast of West Africa. It is a former Portuguese colony that gained independence in 1975. Eighty percent of the population is Caboverdian Mestico, of whom 98 percent are Christian, the vast majority being Roman Catholic. Evangelical Protestants represent less than 4 percent of the population. The most successful has been the Church of the Nazarene, with over twenty congregations and nearly ten thousand members.

Todd M. Johnson

Carey, Lott (1780–1828). African American pioneer missionary to Liberia. Lott was a Baptist missionary and a respected leader of the freed African American slaves who colonized Liberia on the west coast of Africa in the early nineteenth century. After buying his freedom, Carey was converted at the racially mixed First Baptist Church of Richmond, Virginia, where he became active in ministry and was licensed to preach. Along with his mentor, William Crane, he helped form the Richmond African Missionary Society, an auxiliary to the General Missionary Convention of the Baptist Denomination in the United States of America for Foreign Missions, known as the Triennial Convention, which was organized in 1814.

Carey's interest in Baptist mission endeavors led to his personal desire to go to Africa as a missionary. In 1821 he and a small group of Baptist freed slaves sailed for Africa. Though they sailed under the auspices of the American Colonization Society, established in 1816 to facilitate the return of freed slaves to Africa, Carey's passion was missions and it was his distinction to be the first U.S. Baptist missionary to Africa.

Once in Liberia, Carey became a leader of the African American colony and actively engaged in a number of significant ministries, including the establishment of the first Baptist church in Monrovia (known as Providence Baptist Church), which he served as pastor. His concern for education led him to help establish schools in and around Monrovia for settlers and for indigent children and to establish a mission school in Grand Cape Mount among the Vai people. This school was an especially satisfying project for Carey who, unlike other settlers, had a great zeal to evangelize the indigents. In an effort to promote mission work among the indigenous tribes, Carey led in the establishment of the Monrovia Baptist Missionary Society and he was chosen its first president.

In spite of Carey's untimely, accidental death, he left a legacy of godly leadership and ministry etched in Baptist missions history in Africa and in the effort to bring both Christianity and Western civilization to Africa by colonization with freed American slaves.

Richard D. Calenberg

Carey, William (1761-1834). English missionary to India. William Carey's nomination as the "Father of Modern Missions" may not be chronologically accurate (Moravian missionaries criss-crossed the globe before he was born), but it is accurate in terms of what his life and ministry spawned in the ensuing years of Protestant missions in England—that is, the so-called great century of missionary outreach. Carey was born into a poor family near Northampton. He became an apprentice shoemaker at age sixteen and was married in 1781. Poverty stalked the family, but Carey studied hard and became a Baptist lay preacher in 1785. He combined his biblical and geographical knowledge and soon preached that the church's primary responsibility was foreign missions. Fighting an uphill battle against the religious establishment, in 1792 he published his landmark study, An Enquiry Into the Obligation of Christians to Use Means for the Conversion of the Heathens. Under his influence, some Baptist ministers organized a new mission board, the Baptist Missionary Society. In 1793 Carey and John Thomas and their families sailed to India.

Despite family and economic hardships, Carey persisted in preaching, doing Bible translation work, and starting schools. However, for the first seven years at Malda there were no Indian converts.

Carey moved his base to Serampore, where he ministered thirty-four years until his death. He completed translations of the Bible into Bengali, Sanskrit, and Marathi. He organized schools and started a print shop. By 1818 there were some six hundred baptized converts. The following year he began Serampore College to train pastors. However, as the mission grew, serious internal problems developed, which eventually caused a split in the mission in 1826.

Carey’s wife Dorothy died in 1807 and he remarried within a year, much to the consternation of his fellow missionaries. His colleagues also felt that Carey’s children suffered because of his heavy workload and the lack of discipline. Another grievous setback was the loss of his manuscripts in a fire in 1812, but he zealously plunged into his work again.

Carey’s fatherhood of modern Protestant missions is seen in the fact that his basic strategies of work have been followed ever since: Bible translation and production, evangelism, church planting, education, and medical and relief work. Although Carey had a high regard for Indian culture, he fought against widow burning and infanticide. He left his mark on India, while in both Europe and North America his zeal for world missions provided the impetus for a remarkable upsurge in missionary vision, the starting of new mission societies, and the sending of thousands of missionaries.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cargill, Margaret (1809–40). English pioneer missionary to Fiji. Born the second daughter of a naval captain, she was educated at home by her widowed mother. She proved to be an energetic, devoted, well-read Sunday school teacher. She and David Cargill were married in 1832 when he was ordained a Wesleyan missionary to Tonga. They sailed to Tonga, where he began his labors to translate the New Testament into Tongan. Later, they were sent to Lakemba, Fijian, where he began his work with Fijian dialects. Cargill herself proved to be an adept linguist, a skilled nurse (nicknamed “the lady with the gentle spirit”), hospitable, and able to adapt to privation and the hostile monsoon climate. In each station she organized educational classes for women and girls, also becoming a class leader in the Rewan school. She organized educational classes for women and girls, also becoming a class leader in the Rewan school. Arising from the myth there are aspirations about the desired effect. The existence of cargoistic ideology alone, however, does not always result in a cult movement. A situation of cultural stress caused by a sense of deprivation, such as may occur in the presence of a “superior” culture, is a common precursor to a movement. Then the availability of a charismatic or prophetic leader often catalyzes cargoistic ideology into a cargo movement.

Cargo Cults. Cargo cults are distinctive manifestations of a cultural phenomenon indigenous to Melanesia. They share much in common with other revitalization movements and New Religious Movements (NERMS). Such movements have often posed a threat to missions and Indigenous Churches.

The term “cargo cult” focuses on the most notable aspect, the expectation of acquiring large quantities of material goods. The Melanesian use of the term kago refers to a restoration of a primeval, idyllic order. The cult anticipates a socioeconomic and spiritual renewal that involves a radical change in the existing socioeconomic order. There is an expectation of peace, health, social justice, and material prosperity that resembles the Jewish Shalom but can also be cosmic in dimension.

Traditional Myth provides the indigenous socioreligious ideology for many of the known movements. The relevant myth frequently expresses how there was an idyllic state in the primeval past that was destroyed or lost due to some failure on the part of the mythical ancestors. Arising from the myth there are aspirations for the primeval idyllic state to be restored in the present. Magical-literary understanding of the process of cause and effect gives the movements their particular expression while the use of rituals of analogy and reenactment is thought to bring about the desired effect. The existence of cargoistic ideology alone, however, does not always result in a cult movement. A situation of cultural stress caused by a sense of deprivation, such as may occur in the presence of a “superior” culture, is a common precursor to a movement. Then the availability of a charismatic or prophetic leader often catalyzes cargoistic ideology into a cargo movement.

The classical cargo movements have not been so common in recent years due to economic progress and acculturation. Nevertheless, the ideology and thinking processes behind them are still evident and are thought to provide the dynamic for secessionist, nationalistic, and political movements as well as community development enterprises. Under Christian influences cargoistic ideology may provide the dynamic for people movements to embrace the gospel. The ideology and thought processes may result in Syncretism, spirit-revival movements within the church, and independent churches.
Cargo Cults

Missions and national churches need to take the spiritual-social aspects expressed in the movements seriously because they reflect the concerns of the practitioners. Missions and national churches should seek to ameliorate cargistic tendencies by preaching a holistic salvation and practicing the presence of the Kingdom of God in power and lifestyle. Church and mission should also enable indigenous peoples to understand economic processes and the concept of linear history as the context of God’s revelation.

ALBERT F. TUCKER

Caribbean. The nations of the Caribbean have a diverse population of 40 million people who occupy twenty-five major islands and hundreds of smaller ones. The region has long been referred to as a “Naboth's vineyard,” an unspoiled natural paradise whose serenity, resources, and vulnerability have led frequently to political intervention, economic exploitation, and cultural intrusion. Three hundred years of competition between the Spanish, French, Dutch, and British empires, a later hegemony by the United States, international commercial and tourist development, and ideological tensions—the most recent of which have been caused by Fidel Castro’s communist Cuba—have given the Caribbean a colorful but often tragic history. The religious picture that follows from these conditions is a blurred mosaic of churches, social movements, and cults that to a large extent recapitulate the region’s turbulent past.

The nature of Christianity in the Caribbean follows from three basic facts of the region’s social history. First, its ethnic composition is the result of the virtual elimination of the indigenous peoples within decades of the discovery of the islands in the late fifteenth century and the introduction of perhaps as many as 5 million African slaves over a period of three centuries to support production of sugar, the region’s main cash crop. Second, the Caribbean has a fragmented religious and cultural character as a result of European imperial rivalry, its proximity to mainland North and South America, and the importation of indentured workers, including East Indian laborers in the nineteenth century. Third, notwithstanding the high mortality rates in the region from endemic disease and unhygienic conditions, the Caribbean in the twentieth century had continuing appeal as a paradise, not only for tourism and commercial exploitation, but for political and social experimentation. Besides Cuban socialism, the region has had a long history of social uprisings, progressive labor unions, and populist parties, the most recent led by Maurice Bishop in Grenada and Michael Manley in Jamaica.

As a consequence, the insular Caribbean, including the Greater Antilles (Cuba, the island of Hispaniola [occupied by the Dominican Republic and Haiti], Jamaica, and Puerto Rico) and the Lesser Antilles, the archipelago that extends from the Bahamas in the north to Trinidad off the Venezuelan coast, offers a complex social profile. While the islands are distinguished by their geographic origins and their location (e.g., the northern Lesser Antilles are known as the Leeward Islands and the southern as the Windwards), more often the islands are grouped according to their former or actual colonial status: the former Spanish possessions of Cuba, the Dominican Republic, and Puerto Rico; the several British islands of Jamaica and the Lesser Antilles, the Bahamanian and Cayman clusters, and Trinidad and Tobago; the French possessions of Haiti, Guadeloupe, Martinique, Saint Martin, and Saint Barthelemy; the Dutch possessions of Aruba, Bonaire, Curacao, Saint Martin, Saba, and Saint Eustatius; and the Virgin Islands, which the United States purchased from Denmark in 1917.

The Caribbean population is ethnically 35 percent Afro-Caribbean, 31 percent Creole-mulatto, 30 percent European, and 4 percent Asian. The few thousand Amerindiens who survive are the remnants of the native Carib and Arawak populations that probably numbered at least 300,000—if not as many as one million—at the time of European intrusion. Linguistically, 60 percent of the population speak Spanish, 20 percent French, 17 percent English, and 3 percent Dutch.

The Religious Profile. The religious preferences of the Caribbean peoples correspond roughly to their ethnic and national origins. Roman Catholics make up 60 percent of the population, Protestants 20 percent, spiritists 9 percent, and members of Eastern religions—Hindus, Buddhists, Sikhs, Muslims, and Baha’is—about 3 percent. An estimated 9 percent of the inhabitants are considered nonreligious. The Jehovah’s Witnesses, with some members in most of the islands, claim 50,000 in the French territories of Haiti, Martinique, and Guadeloupe.

The Roman Catholic traditions of the peoples of Cuba, the Dominican Republic, and Puerto Rico, who together account for more than half of the total Caribbean population, are a product of the early missionaries and a colonial administration that lasted in the case of Cuba and Puerto Rico for four hundred years, from 1492 to the Spanish-American War of 1898. Consequently, the Roman Catholic Church in the region benefits from deep religious loyalties, even in Puerto Rico, where an evangelical minority has assumed an important role, and in Cuba, where Atheism prevails officially.
Caribbean

The picture is quite different in the colonies and former dependencies of the British Empire, including Jamaica, the Bahamas, Bermuda, Barbados, Trinidad, and several of the Lesser Antilles. There Anglicans and Methodists, dating from British colonial days, tend to predominate. On the island of Anguilla, for example, the Protestant population reaches 90 percent, and on several others, Antigua and Barbuda, the British Virgin Islands, the Cayman Islands, Montserrat, Saint Kitts and Nevis, and the Turks and Caicos Islands, the proportion is above 80 percent. Nevertheless, observers sometimes conclude, nominal adherence with little commitment characterizes the faith of many Caribbean Protestants.

In contrast, Roman Catholic influence predominates in the island societies that formed under French cultural influence—even those like Dominica, Grenada, and Saint Lucia, which later came under British jurisdiction—although without the status and public support that the Catholic Church has enjoyed in the former Spanish possessions. Although Haiti’s evangelical population is substantial—as much as a quarter of that country’s 7 million—prolonged and sometimes intensive effort at Protestant evangelization has not altered the essential character of Haitian culture, and the Protestant community in the other French areas is generally much smaller; as low as only 4.1 percent of the inhabitants of Guadeloupe.

Two other patterns are observable in the Caribbean’s religious configuration. In the Dutch islands of Aruba, Bonaire, and Curaçao, nominally Catholic societies, the evangelical population is quite small, as it is also in the Virgin Islands of the United States, the Cayman Islands, and the Bahamas, where also the process of secularization is well advanced. In contrast, in Trinidad, along with the mainland states of Guyana and Surinam, substantial numbers of East Indians form Hindu and Muslim communities that retain distinctive religious practices and compete with the previously established Afro-Caribbean communities for recognition and control.

These descriptive categories, however, indicate little about the human aspirations and the religious dynamics of the area. The religious framework must be understood within the context of an exploitative slave and racial caste system, a stratified white society, large numbers of white indentured (often Irish Catholic) servants, an imposed, accommodating, dominant religion, whether Protestant or Catholic, a tradition of authoritarian government, ongoing struggles for freedom and identity, and in more recent decades considerable overpopulation and consequent emigration and, often, a sense of hopelessness and futility. The religious recourse has often been Afro-Caribbean spiritism. More than merely a personal cult or cultural relic, spiritism at times has given rise to organized political-religious movements of protest and rebellion (see Latin American New Religious Movements). On a smaller but not unimportant scale, indigenous Holiness, Pentecostal, and charismatic movements have emerged in several of the islands; and some mainland missionary ventures, notably those of the Seventh-Day Adventists, have established important religious beachheads.

The relative lack of spiritual inertia of the contemporary Caribbean region stands in contrast to the vitality of evangelical Christians in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. In earlier decades the Caribbean Protestant churches exhibited considerable vision for evangelizing their own peoples and sending missions to West Africa. Nowhere in the Caribbean except in Puerto Rico and Jamaica is there presently an island population whose evangelical (as contrasted with nominal Protestant) Christians demonstrate notable evangelistic fervor. In only five of twenty-six jurisdictions do evangelical Protestants account for more than a quarter of the population. In twelve of these island units the proportion is less than 15 percent. Nevertheless, on some islands the better-established churches and various Baptist, Holiness, and Pentecostal groups appear to be making headway. In several of the islands the largest or second largest Protestant group is the Seventh-Day Adventists.

Pervasive Spiritism. The mainly Afro-Caribbean and Creole-mulatto character of the island population has important religious and cultural overtones. While Europeans of Spanish descent make up substantial proportions in Cuba and Puerto Rico, the other European populations are but a small minority of their respective island societies. From the Afro-Caribbean cultural majority have emerged strong religious influences, such as Afro-Cuban Santería, Jamaican Rastafarianism, and Trinidadian Shango and Obah. Spiritists (Voodoo, Vodun) acquired political importance in Haiti during the years of the dictator François “Papa Doc” Duvalier, and Rastafarianism, which identified in the post–World War II period with Emperor Haile Selassie, has gained support in Jamaica. These, however, are only the more formalized traditions among the many folk practices deeply embedded in the traditional culture. Not atypically, half of the people of the Dominican Republic are believed to engage in occult practices. While spiritist cults may not always be a defiant obstacle to evangelical Christianity in the region, they fortify latent resistance to forms of Christianity that were once the religion of the colonial, slaveholding European minority. Only where evangelical Protestantism has accommodated popular cultural forms has it taken root and grown, such as in the case of the nineteenth-century revivalist movement in Ja-
Caribbean

Modernization. While the movement has heightened urban youth who appear to be the victims of racialism and egalitarianism. But Rastafarianism has also produced a growth in Rastafarianism, notably Pentecostalism, in Jamaica, and in Puerto Rico. Luther P. Gerlach finds many structural similarities between the two. Both religions conceive of a world of powerful supernatural forces and practice spirit possession. Both are characterized by tight-knit local cells linked together in polyccephalous overlapping networks. This design, Gerlach argues, is eminently suited to survival. These groups keep a low profile and are tolerated by political authorities because, on the one hand, they appear to be harmless and, on the other, may be useful as a counterforce among the masses to the more powerful established religions. But despite some similarities, the two consider each other to be implacable enemies. Spiritists attempt to manipulate the spirit world, asserts Gerlach, while evangelical Protestants exorcise evil spirits and submit to the Holy Spirit.

An Assessment. The extremely diverse and often opposing cultural and religious traditions of the Caribbean preclude easy generalization about the spiritual needs. With the exception of several of the larger islands, the evangelical churches have not acquired the strength and autonomy that would permit them to radically influence the lives of their own peoples or send missionaries abroad. In this respect Puerto Rico and Jamaica stand apart, having developed strong evangelical communities, benefiting originally from Holiness and Pentecostal missionary efforts but now entirely independent and contextualized. It is estimated that 30 percent of the total population of Puerto Rico considers itself evangelical, the majority identified with one or another Pentecostal denomination. While 165 foreign Protestant missionaries serve in Puerto Rico, the island churches send 65 missionaries—and a number of effective short-term evangelists—abroad. In contrast, Protestants account for only 5 percent of the Dominican Republic's population of 8 million and 2.5 percent of Cuba's 11 million people.

Protestant evangelicals on Jamaica, on the other hand, make up an estimated 18 percent of the population, the Protestant churches are well established, and forty missionaries have been sent out to other countries. In the wake of Afro-Christian revival cults that emerged among the Jamaican masses from the 1860s to World War II, Pentecostalism has in the period of modernization from a peasant to an urban society, become the most dynamic Protestant movement on the island. William Wedenoja identifies several contrasting features of these groups, despite their many similarities. While for the revivalists God and the angels are key deities, the Pentecostals are christocentric; while the revivalists concentrate on the Old Testament, the Pentecostals focus on the New Testament; while revivalists tend to authoritarian structures, Pentecostals tend to be more congregational. Wedenoja found that the trends were away from large, formal, cold congregations in favor of churches that are fervent, smaller, and more intimate.

In a time of modernization and political independence, as the old values and ways of life are disintegrating, the majority of the Caribbean peoples are caught in a bewildering transition. The labor unions and populist movements that formed after World War I and the political experiments like those of Cuba, Trinidad, Grenada, and Jamaica have sometimes given island inhabitants nominal control, but with little sense of power, given the islands’ spare resources, stagnant economics, and growing populations. Self-governing nations of the size of Antigua (64,000), Grenada (84,000), and Dominica (86,000) are far too small to deal with the burgeoning problems.

With only Trinidad in the Caribbean producing substantial quantities of petroleum, and with their single-export (mainly sugar) economies having collapsed, these countries have turned increasingly to tourism and offshore banking—and the laundering of drug money—to support their peoples. As a result many young people have emigrated to mainland countries or, having resigned themselves to a life with little promise for the future, are living simply for the present. The high numbers of unmarried mothers and alarming increases in crime document as much. For the Caribbean peoples who have embraced it, however, evangelical Protestantism offers the spiritual resources either to ease the transition to modern life or to provide consolation for the sectors that the modern world has simply passed by.

EVERT A. WILSON

Caribbean New Religious Movements. As with the Latin American New Religious Movements, many of the spiritistic groups in the Caribbean can trace their origin to the atrocities of the slave trade and the need for the populations who had been forcibly removed from their homes to maintain some frame of religious identity. Often that identity was underground, and outward conformity to colonial Christian norms served as a cover for inward nonconformity. Movements include Voodoo (Haiti); Convince, Kumina, Myal, and Rastafarianism (Jamaica); Shango and Obah (Trinidad); Abakua and Santéria (Cuba); and Kele (St. Lucia). In this article we will describe some of the more significant groups (for a treatment of the factors involved in their development seen in light of the whole Caribbean historical experience, see CARIBBEAN). It should be noted that the selected groups introduced below can be characterized by the general themes described here, but within each movement there are also multiple folk-level variations maintained at the local level.

Descriptions of Selected Movements. Convince rituals in Jamaica combine Christian and spiritistic elements. The most utilized spirits are those of departed members, but African spirits are the most powerful. Believers, called bongo men, can be controlled by more than one spirit simultaneously. Their rituals (some held annually, others as need arises) include Christian prayers and Bible readings, veneration of the spirits, dancing and possession, and sacrifice.

Various Rastafarian groups emerged from the black population of Jamaica in the 1930s. Rastafarians venerate Haile Selassie I, the former emperor of Ethiopia, envisioning him as a black messiah who will liberate them from white oppression. The earlier emphasis on repatriation to Africa has waned in contemporary times. Rastafarians typically follow vegetarian dietary regulations, smoke marijuana, and wear their hair and beards in dreadlocks. Their most prominent musician, Bob Marley, popularized reggae music as a Rastafarian style.

In Trinidad Shango groups honor various spiritual powers. Shango (the Yoruba god of thunder and lightning) is one of many powers which may possess adherents. These powers include other Yoruba deities as well as Christian figures. Each Shango cult center holds an annual four-day ritual for the particular spirit recognized at that center involving nightly prayer (including Christian prayers), drumming and singing, possession, and culminating with animal sacrifice.

Voodoo (or voudou or vodoun) originated in Haiti in the late 1700s. Separated from their home, the slave populations fused a variety of belief systems and practices and developed a religion strong enough to withstand later French persecution. Usually centered on a temple, the ceremonies are festivals in which spirit possession is prominent. In it the spirits (lwa), who range from African deities to stereotyped Christian saints, are thought to ride the participants like horses. They provide protection for the possessed, so long as the devotees maintain an appropriate schedule of sacrifices and offerings. Popularized through practices such as zombi (in which a living person's mind is altered so that he or she comes under the control of evil practitioners) and voodoo dolls (which are magically linked to an intended victim whose pain parallels damage done to the doll), voodoo is widely known outside of the Caribbean.
Caribbean New Religious Movements

Missionary Implications. The historical connection of the spiritist religions to the trauma of the slave trade, their ability to meet important felt needs in their adherents whose lives are often bound up in oppression and poverty, the emotional ties of the followers to local leaders, the perception that Christianity and spiritistic practices can be readily mixed, and the ingrained ability to present one appearance on the surface and keep deeply held values underneath make genuine conversion to Christianity a complex issue. Missionaries working among these movements will need to consider all of these factors if they are to enable the adherents to respond fruitfully to the claims of Christ as Lord over all of life.

SEE ALSO New Religious Movements.

Carmichael, Amy Wilson (1867–1951). Irish missionary to India. Born in Northern Ireland and converted in her teens, she was briefly a missionary to Japan before going to South India in 1895. She never returned home. Her Dohnavur Fellowship was formed in 1901 to rescue little girls forced into temple prostitution. The task called for unusual and often misunderstood sacrifice. Everything was subordinated to the claims of the children, even evangelistic tours. In 1926 the Dohnavur Fellowship became an independent society of some nine hundred members. In 1929 the three established stations were being run by four women; the work miraculously survived throughout World War II almost unscathed. In 1948 there were eleven missionaries, so Cary conducted the language school and at age seventy-one opened a new station at El Hajeb.

Bibliography. E. Elliot, A Chance to Die: The Life and Legacy of Amy Carmichael; F. Houghton, Amy Carmichael of Dohnavur: The Story of a Lover and Her Beloved; E. Skoglund, Amma: The Story of a Lover and Her Beloved; Gary B. McGee

Carver, William Owen (1868–1954). American early missiologist, theologian, and educator. A native of Tennessee, Carver studied at Richmond College in Virginia and Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in Louisville, Kentucky. He joined the seminary faculty in the year of his graduation (1896) and served there until his retirement in 1943. Although he had received his doctorate in New Testament, he followed in the steps of H. H. Harris in teaching missions and in 1899 became the first professor in the newly created Department of Comparative Religion and Missions. He traveled to Europe in 1900 and 1907–8 to study missions there, and toured Baptist missions in South America and Asia in 1922–23.

Through Carver's teaching, publications, and promotion of missions he profoundly influenced the Southern Baptist Convention. He wrote twenty-one books in addition to many articles in denominational periodicals and journals. Carver contributed to the founding of the Woman's Missionary Union Training School for Christian Workers in Louisville (renamed the Carver School for Christian Work in 1953), the Southern Baptist Historical Society, and the Historical Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention. He was also a member of the American Theological Committee, a regional section of the World Conference on Faith and Order.

Gary B. McGee

Cary, Maud (1878–1967). American pioneer missionary to Morocco. Born on a farm in Kansas, she was converted when a traveling evangelist preached in her deeply religious home. At age eighteen she enrolled at the Gospel Missionary Union Bible Institute in Kansas City, Missouri, and in 1901 sailed for Morocco. She was to labor there for fifty years despite a disastrous initial two years when colleagues accused her of frivolity and a lack of piety. Fortunately, the mission let her stay. Her fiancé fled to the Sudan rather than admit she was not the meek missionary wife he wanted, causing her much anguish. By now fluent in Arabic and Berber, she soldiered on, taking her first furlough in 1924. By 1939 the three established stations were being run by four women; the work miraculously survived throughout World War II almost unscathed. In 1948 there were eleven missionaries, so Cary conducted the language school and at age seventy-one opened a new station at El Hajeb. and a Bible institute. She needed medical treatment (1952–55) but returned as the mission blossomed in 1955 with the ending of French colonial occupation. In her final years she saw the fruit of her patient labors teaching the Bible, but in the year of her death the Moroccan government closed down all foreign missions lest they create political unrest.

ELEANOR M. JACKSON

Bibliography. E. Stenbock, Miss Terri: The Story of Maude Cary, Pioneer CMU Missionary in Morocco; R. A. Tucker, FJIJ.

Casalis, Eugene (1812–91). French pioneer missionary to Lesotho. At age twenty-one he was sent out by the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society. Lesotho was selected due to South Africa’s mix of European settlers, including French Huguenots as French Protestants were not welcome in French colonies. After founding a station at Morija in 1833, he established one in 1835 at Thaba-Boisu, the residence of Moshoeshoe I, the chief of the Lesotho tribe. His accomplishments over the following twenty years included translation of the Gospels, ethnographic studies, and serving as advisor to the chief in an important diplomatic role.

Furloughed over 1849–50, Casalis preached and rekindled a missionary passion across France. His success in motivating others resulted in his appointment six years later to direct the mission. He established a training program and oversaw the successful opening of new fields (Tahiti and Senegal in 1862, after unsuccessful attempts in China and Mauritius in 1860). Casalis retired in 1882 and died in 1891. He was the first Protestant missionary honored by membership in the Legion d’Honneur.

JOHN EASTERLING

Bibliography. E. Casalis, The Basutos, or Twenty-three Years in South Africa.

Caste. A hereditary division of any society into classes on the basis of occupation, color, wealth, or religion. More specifically, in Hinduism, caste (jati) is the permanent social group into which a person is born, with social and religious obligations determined for a lifetime by one’s caste.

The beginnings of the caste system in India are thought to date back to the invasion of Indo-European Aryans (or Vedic peoples) who migrated into the Indus Valley about 1000 B.C. Varna refers to the social divisions believed to have been characteristic of these people. One theory is that the organization of castes was based on varna (color). Aryans were light, while the invaded peoples were dark. Others believe stratification resulted in castes developing from social classes or other types of differences. During this early period, groups and strata of Hindu society began to form. No historical records exist for this period, but from the hymns, legends, and other accounts, it seems that the social system of the newcomers was composed of four major divisions: the brahmana, a sacerdotal or priestly category; the rajanya, a chiefly, noble, or warrior category; the vaisya, who were variously perceived as commoners, farmers, or merchants; and the sudra, a category of servants or commoners of a lower status.

Social anthropologists suggest that the persistent feature of Indian society has been the existence of endogamous descent groups (a system in which people must marry within their own group). Over time such groups were integrated into local hierarchical systems of cooperation and interdependence. The caste system typically includes the following components: (1) the population composed of the series of mutually exclusive castes; (2) segments structured by caste in endogamous descent groups, ideally related unilineally; (3) a dominant caste with political and economic power over the others; (4) an occupational specialty related to each caste; (5) a ritual system of exchange of food, goods, and services concerned with purity and pollution as well as economics; (6) a ranking of each caste according to their respective degrees of pollution.

Various movements to reform the caste system have made some impact on the traditional structure. Buddhism, Islam, and Christianity have all made inroads into caste norms. It is significant, however, that most of the reform movements have resulted in castes of their own, evolving into exclusive, endogamous sects. Mahatma Gandhi’s programs were aimed at the removal of the caste system, but the divisions persist even under modern pressures of Westernization. Since caste in India has always functioned as a powerful religious system of belief, movements to lessen the influence or abolish the caste system have so far failed.

Christian missions have for the most part ignored caste distinctions. Those who join a Christian church are compelled to join a church community outside the caste system, automatically forcing them downward from all their social and family relationships. Indications are that people would become Christians more readily if they were able to remain in their own social grouping. And yet many Christians maintain that the freedom found in new life in Christ (Gal. 3:26–29; Eph. 2) transcends the divisions of caste, and that the gospel challenges injustices associated with caste.

NORMAN E. ALLISON

See also Association and Kinship.

Castro, Emilio

Castro, Emilio (1927–). Uruguayan Methodist pastor, missiologist, and ecumenical leader. He received his theological training at Union Theological Seminary in Buenos Aires, and the University of Basel, under Karl Barth. He has held pastorate in Argentina, Bolivia, and Uruguay and served as president of the Evangelical Methodist Church of Uruguay. At the same time he held key positions as vice president of CPC (Christian Peace Conference), executive secretary of ASIT (South American Association of Theological Schools), and general secretary and coordinator of UNELAM (Commission for Evangelical Unity in Latin America). He was director of the WCC Commission on World Mission and Evangelism and editor of The International Review of Mission, and from 1985 to 1992 served as general secretary of the WCC and editor of Ecumenical Review; residing in Geneva. In 1993 he returned to his native Uruguay to continue ministry as a pastor and evangelist. Many of his articles, reports, and books, in both English and Spanish, have played a key role in the development of a genuine Latin American pastoral theology, as well as made a significant contribution to the meaning of mission from his unique perspective.

Pablo E. Pérez

Cayman Islands (Est. 2000 pop.: 36,000; 259 sq. km. [100 sq. mi.]). Consisting of three sparsely populated islands located just south of Cuba, the Caymans are a British Crown colony. Thirty percent of the population is from Britain, Canada, or the United States. Like the Bahamas and the neighboring Turks and Caicos groups, the thinly populated, low-lying Cayman Islands were inhabited mainly by fishermen until offshore financial companies and tourist hotels began to proliferate. Grand Cayman quickly became second only to the Bahamas as a financial center; registering 500 banks and 18,000 other companies. The tiny islands had one-half million guests annually in the late 1980s. The population is 80 percent Protestant.

Everett A. Wilson

See also Caribbean.

Cell Groups. See Small Groups.

The Celtic Missionary Movement. Ardently missionary, with a strong focus on Scripture and personal piety, the Celtic movement had a major impact on the evangelization of the British Isles, western Europe, and northern Europe in the fifth through tenth centuries. The founder was Patrick, born about 389 in a Christian family in Britain, who was kidnapped as a teenager and taken to Ireland, where he was a slave for six years. After his escape he studied, was ordained a priest, and in 432, in response to a vision, returned to Ireland as a missionary bishop, where he remained until his death (c. 461). His mission led to the conversion of thousands, the ordination of priests, and the establishment of monasteries, which became centers of evangelization, learning, and civilization.

Patrick's theology was evangelical; he quoted the Bible frequently, especially Romans. A man of deep spirituality and prayer, his greatest desire was to spread the gospel. The Irish monasteries became known as seminaries for the study of Scripture and for strict discipline, drawing students from the Continent and England. Streams of dedicated men poured from them to go on pilgrimages for Christ wherever they might feel led. In 563 Columba landed at Iona in Scotland with twelve companions and established monasteries from which missionaries went to barbarian tribes, north into Scotland and south into England. They were more effective in evangelizing England than were the missionaries from Rome, led by Augustine of Canterbury.

Beginning in 590 Columbanus established monasteries that evangelized barbarian tribes in Burgundy while bringing a measure of renewal to the Frankish church. Expelled by the corrupt court, he established other houses in Switzerland and northern Italy.

The Celtic movement differed from the Roman church on several issues: the dating of Easter, the tonsure of the monks, and, most important, submission to the authority of Rome. But at the Synod of Whitby in 664 the movement began to come under the authority of Rome. Two of the greatest Celtic missionaries were consecrated as missionary bishops by Rome. Willibrord (658–739) evangelized the Frisians, and Boniface became the apostle to central Germany. He was martyred in 753.

The Celtic missionaries were characterized by spontaneity, a lack of traditionalism, and rugged individualism. They went where others would not go, without credentials or material support, self-reliant, trusting in God, and accomplished much more than their numbers would warrant. Theirs was a type of monasticism that was ardently missionary; thus the monastery was not a place of retreat from the world but a place of preparation for mission. Women played an important role in the Irish church, and Boniface used communities of women in mission, perhaps for the first time. Many of the Celtic institutions and much of the movement were destroyed by the Viking invasions in the eighth and ninth centuries. Yet the vigor of the tradition continued in England to some degree. Missionaries from England coming from Celtic roots were used to bring the Scandinavians into the Christian faith in the tenth century.

Paul E. Pierson

See also Monastic Movement.

Centenary Conference on the Protestant Missions of the World (London, 1888). Meeting at Exeter Hall June 9–19, 1888, this was the largest, most representative interdenominational, international missions assembly to that date. Meant to celebrate the first 100 years of modern missions advance, the centennial name marked no specific anniversary. Present were 1,579 delegates from 139 denominations and societies representing 10 countries, including a coterie of non-Westerners. Great Britain and her colonies dominated the roster; 219 from 67 societies represented North America and 41 from 18 societies came from continental Europe. Most females attending were wives of male delegates, though a few women gave speeches.

Sixteen public assemblies surveyed the world’s mission fields; more sensitive topics were addressed in twenty-two closed sessions, which discussed women’s work, education, literature, medicine, native churches, polygamy, the opium and liquor trades, inter-mission competition, and other issues. Meeting at the zenith of the European imperialist era, speakers assumed Western colonialism to be advantageous for missions and the gospel as civilizer. Procedural rules prohibited the adoption of formal positions, which aided a spirit of generic evangelical comity. An attempt to launch a permanent international committee to facilitate inter-mission cooperation was unsuccessful. A postconference caucus did vote to petition governments to end the opium, liquor, firearms, and slave trades.

Though some delegates were disappointed at the lack of specific results, outcomes of the London Conference included an overall raised consciousness and support level for foreign missions; America assuming more contribution and leadership for world missions; the establishment of the World’s Missionary Committee of Christian Women and what later became the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, important for the later ecumenical movement. Additionally the precedent was set for the decennial megaconferences in New York (1900) and Edinburgh (1910).

Thomas A. Askew

Ch'eng, Ching-yi

Central African Republic (Est. 2000 pop.: 3,731,000; 662,984 sq. km. [240,534 sq. mi.]). The Central African Republic is a landlocked state and home to over fifty tribal languages. With a broad diversity of religious groups, the Central African Republic enjoys freedom of religion with remarkable success in evangelism.

Muslims, mostly Sunnis of the Malekite rite (3.3%), are strongest among non-Africans, concentrating among nomads in the north along the Sudanese border. Tribal religions (5%) are professed by a minority within each tribe, with the exception of the Bunta Pygmies (99%) and Mbi-nou (60%).

Catholics arrived in 1894, opening the first mission at Bangui. Elevated to a vicariate in 1937, the church now consists of five dioceses under an African archbishop. Christianity grew rapidly after territorial independence in 1959, when professing Christians grew from 42 percent Protestant to 47 percent in 1975. Catholicism saw a 4 percent rise from 28 percent, making this growth the most dramatic in Africa. The Baptist Mid-Missions arrived in 1920, followed a year later by the Church of the Brethren mission which sponsored a hospital, dispensaries, Bible schools, and a school of theology. The Sudan Mission, started by Lutherans in 1923, was later assisted by the American Lutheran Church and the Church of Norway.

The Association of Central African Evangelical Churches was organized in 1974 to facilitate cooperation between Protestant denominations. Two years later, the interdenominational Bangui Evangelical School of Theology opened, offering higher degrees in theology.

Gary Lamb

Bibliography. D. B. Barrett, WCE.

Ch'eng, Ching-yi (1881–1939). Chinese indigenous church leader. Son of a pastor of a church of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, Ch'eng became pastor of the Mi Shih Street Church of Christ in China. He assisted in translating the Union Version of the Chinese Bible while in Britain in 1903, and gave a memorable speech at the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE in Scotland in 1910. He declared that Chinese Christians were not interested in Western denominations. In 1912 and 1913 he was interpreter as John R. Mott visited China on behalf of the WMC’s Continuation Committee. Ch'eng served as the secretary of the China Continuation Committee (1913–22), and was instrumental in organizing the National Christian Conference in Shanghai (1922). He served as the secretary of the National Christian Council (1924–34), and from 1934 as the secretary of the Church of Christ in China, a union denomination made up of Presbyterian, Congregational, and Methodist congregations or-organized in 1927. Thus he embodied the movement of Chinese churches to unite the works of various missions, and to shape their own ministry and theology in the Chinese context. Ch'eng was one of the organizers of the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL (1921), and served as vice president from 1928 to 1938.
Ch'eng, Ching-yi

SAMUEL LING

Chad (Est. 2000 pop.: 7,307,000; 1,284,000 sq. km. [495,752 sq. mi.]). Chad is a land-locked country located in north-central Africa. The population is comprised of some 181 ethnic groups speaking 127 languages. Johnstone reports that it has more unreached people groups than any other African country. Under French rule and protection since 1900, Chad achieved independence in 1960. A variety of wars resulting from political infighting along religious and ethnic lines over the past thirty years and regular periods of severe drought have left the country economically devastated.

The single largest religion is Islam (almost 46%), followed by Christianity (35%) and traditional religions (19%). Islam arrived in the eleventh century, though until recently it has been confined largely to the desert-dominated north and eastern parts of the country. Of the Christians, roughly 20 percent are Catholic and 14 percent Protestant. The first Catholic missionaries arrived in the 1600s, though the first permanent station was not established until 1929 and extensive work did not commence until 1947.

The first Protestant missionaries, Rev. and Mrs. Berge Revnes with the Church of Lutheran Brethren, arrived in Chad in 1920. It took them four years to secure permission from the French to evangelize. Workers from Christian Missions in Many Lands arrived in 1921, Baptist Mid-Missions began their work in 1925, and the Sudan United Mission in 1927. By 1993, 249 Protestant missionaries representing 28 agencies were present in Chad. The vast bulk of missionary work has been confined to the non-Muslim south. Also by 1993 a reported 54 Chad nationals served as missionaries in other countries.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Bibliography. D. W. Barrett, ed., WCE; P. Johnstone, OW.

Chalmers, James (1841–1901). Scottish missionary to the South Pacific. Born into a Scottish stonemason’s home in Ardrishaig, and converted at age fourteen, he worked briefly with the Glasgow City Mission before studying for the Congregational ministry at Cheshunt College, Cambridge. Ordained in 1865, he trained further under the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY; and in 1867 was sent first to Raratonga in the Cook Islands, then in 1877 to New Guinea. It was dangerous work: once Chalmers and his wife were threatened by the stark ultimatum, “Presents—or death.” Slowly, however, they won the trust of the local peoples. As he furthered the work of evangelization and education Chalmers wrote, “It is not the preaching of a sermon so much as living the life that tells on the native heart.” An advocate of INDIGENOUS CHURCHES who sought to preserve what was good in local customs, Chalmers set up a string of mission posts, established a training college, and shared his geographical interests in Pioneer Life and Work in New Guinea (1895). While pressing on into territory unknown to Europeans, Chalmers was killed on Goaribari Island, Papua.

J. D. DOUGLAS

Chamberlain, Jacob (1835–1908). American medical missionary to India. Born in Sharon, Connecticut, he was educated at Western Reserve College, the New Brunswick (N.J) Theological Seminary, and the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York. In 1859 he sailed for India as a medical missionary to the Arcot mission in Madras under the appointment of the Dutch Reformed Board. He initially worked among the Tamils and was involved in teaching and administration at the Theological Seminary. In 1863 he was transferred to a district among people who spoke the Telugu language.

Combining his medical expertise with his evangelistic endeavors, he often took lengthy and arduous missionary journeys to places where the name of Jesus had never been heard. For many years he was the only physician in an area as large as his home state.

His literary labors included involvement in tract societies and overseeing the committee for the translation of the Bible in the Telugu language. He translated the liturgy of the Dutch Reformed Church, and also produced devotional works and a version of a hymnbook into the Telugu language. In 1900 he represented the Reformed Church at the ECUMENICAL MISSIONARY CONFERENCE in New York City. The following year he became the first moderator of the South India United Church Synod.

Chamberlain effectively used his medical and surgical work to open the way for Christian teaching. Considered one of the most enterprising of modern missionaries, he is credited in large measure for the marked success and rapid growth of the Christian church in India. His amazing experiences became the primary material for tracts and books. His works include Religions of the Orient, The Kingdom in India, The Cobra’s Den, and In the Tiger Jungle.

FLORENCE R. SCOTT

Chambers, Oswald (1874–1917). Scottish author, poet, and missionary to troops in Egypt. Born in Aberdeen, the eighth of nine children in a poor family serving the Baptist Church in Scotland, he received Christ as a teen while walking home after hearing Spurgeon preach.

Chambers' talents are seen in his poetic, musical, and artistic abilities. At the conclusion of his studies at the National Art Training School, he declined the offer of a two-year scholarship to study art in Europe, having observed the spiritual decline of others who followed that path. Eighteen months into a two-year art program at Edinburgh, he followed God's call to pursue ministerial training.

Throughout the rest of his life, Chambers preached, taught, and traveled (including a short trip to Japan and regular tours to teach in the United States). His last field of service was in Egypt, where, under the auspices of the YMCA, he and his family served the troops stationed there during World War I. There he died from complications after an emergency appendectomy, leaving behind his wife Gertrude (Biddy) and his daughter Kathleen.

Chambers is not remembered as much for his missionary service as he is for the inspiration he provided to countless missionaries through his book My Utmost for His Highest, a compilation of daily devotionals put together by Biddy after Chambers’ death. Though her name nowhere appears on the book, it is to her that the body of Christ owes a debt of gratitude that can never be repaid.

A. Scott Moreau

Bibliography. D. McCasland, Oswald Chambers: Abandoned to God.

Channel Islands. See United Kingdom Dependent Area (Est. 2000 pop: 152,000; 195 sq. km. [75 sq. mi.]).

Chapman, J. Wilbur (1859–1918). American crusade evangelist. Born in Richmond, Indiana, he studied at Oberlin College, Lake Forest University, and Lane Seminary (in Cincinnati). After his ordination in the Presbyterian Church in 1882, he served for twenty years in the American Midwest, stirring congregations to revival and becoming one of the founders of the Winona Lake Bible Conference in 1885. Appointed a full-time evangelist in 1903, he traveled internationally, conducting successful campaigns in Great Britain (1910 and 1914) and Australia (1909 and 1912). In 1917 he was elected general moderator of the Presbyterian Church U.S.A.

Charismatic Missions

Influenced by D. L. Moody and influencing Billy Sunday, Chapman was among those on the forefront of the efforts at using crusade evangelism to reach American cities for Christ in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. His own mark was the development of the use of simultaneous campaigns in which multiple events using varied means were held at the same time as the central crusade helping to ensure a metropolitan area was blanketed with the gospel. His crusades were characterized by extensive preparation, a method emulated by many crusade evangelists today.

A. Scott Moreau

Charismatic Missionaries. See Independent Charismatic Missionaries.
Charismatic Missions

work, started by Pat Robertson, and the Trinity Broadcasting Network of Paul Crouch to dominate Christian media and claim the allegiance of a large part of Christian America. Renewal movements are evangelistic by nature, and most of these mega-ministries sought international visibility to extend their influence. A conservative estimate of the number of charismatics worldwide is 150 million, including more than 3,000 new denominations.

Charismatics who remained in their denominational churches had the benefit of established mission boards. As the renewal gained strength within a given denomination, the number of charismatic missionaries and mission leaders increased. Independent charismatics, on the other hand, lacked formal links to mission agencies. They sometimes joined nondenominational mission organizations but often met with suspicion due to their charismatic beliefs. There was a trend toward unity and evangelistic urgency in the 1980s and 1990s, with charismatic churches working together and forming associations of churches.

The movement had a prolonged internal focus due to the denominational structures it sought to reform. This carried over into the independent churches. When the leaders considered mission outreach, they looked for new strategies and approaches rather than relying on established agencies which were perceived as rigid and lifeless. They eschewed organizational structure yet lacked the internal structure to support missionaries.

Independent charismatic churches want direct involvement in missions. They become what are known as "sending churches," with as many as 125 missionaries receiving the majority of their support from one congregation. Effective congregations are characterized by having a missions director or pastor; missions-minded senior pastor; missions spending of over 10 percent of the budget, regular exposure of the congregation to missions, relationship to missionary structures, and contact with charismatic churches and ministries on the field.

The Vineyard Christian Fellowship, under the direction of John Wimber, introduced the concept of "power evangelism" in which a believer is instructed by the Holy Spirit to initiate contact with an unbeliever and accompany the encounter (see also POWER ENCOUNTER). The Vineyard is an example of an association of churches that has recently developed missions awareness and international outreach.

A few charismatic mission agencies were formed that have experienced unusual success. Youth With a Mission (YWAM), which gained its popularity as a short-term missionary venture, is the largest sending agency, with 6,000 full-time missionaries. Its founder, Loren Cunningham, began with a vision to send young people from North America around the world but quickly expanded to include young people from every country. Another organization, Christ for the Nations, founded by Gordon Lindsay, claims to have planted over 8,500 congregations around the world.

The Association of International Mission Agencies (AIMS) provides a much-needed structure for charismatic mission outreach. Established in 1985 to link churches, mission agencies, and training institutions, AIMS facilitates cooperation among charismatic agencies. In addition to bridging diversity ranging from church planters to short-term professionals to tentmakers, the Association provides for the ongoing information needs of its constituency. Under the direction of Howard Foltz, the Association has grown to nearly 200 member organizations.

The Pentecostal World Conference, held every four or five years since 1944, attempted to unify Pentecostals/charismatics worldwide. These meetings focused on self-identification. With the rise of the renewal within the Roman Catholic Church, separate charismatic conferences were held to allow for the participation of Roman Catholics in leadership roles. These large gatherings gradually took on the evangelistic priorities of evangelical Christianity but never attained the numerical strength or broad representation of the movement that the leaders had envisioned.

The 1977 Kansas City Charismatic Conference was an ecumenical North American conference with an emphasis on the lordship of Christ. It was at this historic meeting that the three major streams of the North American Pentecostal/charismatic movement—classical Pentecostals, Protestant charismatics, and Roman Catholic charismatics—formed a coalition. Together they began to realize their responsibility to fulfill the GREAT COMMISSION.

The first North American Congress on the Holy Spirit and World Evangelization was held in 1986 in New Orleans. The second and largest of the two was held the next year; also in New Orleans. These conferences are credited with making world evangelization a central focus of the charismatic movement. The participants adopted the Lausanne Covenant and identified with the evangelistic goals of evangelical Christianity.

The 1990 North American Congress on the Holy Spirit and World Evangelization at Indianapolis, the third in the series, was held to prepare North Americans for the international meeting the following year. Enthusiasm was at a high pitch but did not translate into significant participation at Brighton the next year.

Brighton '91 was the International Charismatic Consultation of World Evangelization. With the working title "That the World Might Believe," this consultation was designed to prepare the worldwide charismatic movement for the “decade of evangelism.” Although the geographical representation was uneven, this is thought to have been the first truly global meeting for world evangelization held by the movement. Many prominent American leaders were not in attendance nor did they endorse the gathering. Thus Brighton ’91 symbolizes not only the lack of international unity but also the lack of cohesion among charismatics in North America. Orlando ’95, the fourth North American Congress, was well attended but fell short of expectations.

It is hard to judge the impact of these congresses on the charismatic movement, yet they did serve as a visible demonstration of charismatic interest in missions. They also provided a means to inform large segments of the movement that evangelism is a priority. The movement itself, however, remains fragmented in its approach to world evangelization. By nature, the constituency is pulled in several directions. Ecclesiastical allegiance, participation in larger ecumenical networks, local priorities, special interests, and extensive diversity are just some of the factors which account for the current fragmentation.

The theoretical framework of the charismatic movement includes a working theology or theology of ministry. This in part led to an incomplete theology of mission as it was viewed as a simple extension of the local witness of the church. Prompted by an awareness of what was happening within the rest of Christendom, charismatics wanted to join in Cross-Cultural Evangelism.

Their Pentecostal heritage included an anti-intellectual bias often equating supernatural experience with sufficient preparation to be effective in a Third World setting. Involvement of the laity is paramount as opposed to dependence on a trained clergy. These factors delayed the development of an effective mission strategy and, in the early days of the movement, produced many missionaries who lacked appropriate preparation for Cross-Cultural Ministry. As with the Pentecostal movement, this trend has been corrected, and charismatic missiologists are poised to make a significant contribution to world evangelization in the twenty-first century.

While the actual number of charismatic Christians in the world is a source of constant debate, the fact that together with the Pentecostals they represent the largest segment of Christianity today is well documented. The flexibility of charismatic belief and practice facilitates its Inculturation in Third World countries. The Holy Spirit is expected to directly guide the local leadership as they establish local patterns of practice and Apologetics.

Missionary churches were strongly influenced by the renewal following the assumption of control by natural leaders. Following World War II, the transfer of control to national leadership spread rapidly throughout the countries of the Third World. Western Christian denominations realized the need to do the same within their mission churches. As the transfer of power was in progress, the influence of the charismatic movement was growing internationally. There was a new openness to the priorities of Third World Christians and recognition that the result was rapid church growth.

The renewal introduced the option for rhythmic clapping and dancing and vocal expressions during the worship service. It encouraged the use of local folk or popular music in church services. Charismatics recognized satanic forces at work in the world requiring prayer for God’s supernatural intervention. They also prayed for healing and miracles, expecting God to demonstrate his power. The dramatic international growth of charismatic Christianity made a significant impact on the Western world, as it became a force too large to ignore.

While global unity has yet to be realized, the charismatic renewal has had the effect of a grassroots ecumenism. The common spiritual experience became a catalyst for a broad-based Christian unity. It contained an evangelistic thrust that assumed every Christian was a witness for Christ. Cooperative evangelistic efforts include pentecostal, neo-fundamental, Roman Catholic, and mainline Protestant Christians. Charismatic interest in world evangelization matured in the 1980s although financial support for missions remains below the average for evangelical churches. Charismatic missiologists and agencies are emerging.

Some feel the charismatic movement is God’s plan to energize the church for evangelistic outreach. The belief that the gifts of the Spirit are for evangelistic purposes is especially true for Third World charismatics. Protestant charismatics are active in creating new ministries and promoting evangelistic concern. Roman Catholic charismatics have established programs to further world evangelization including the Catholic Evangelization Training Program at the Franciscan University of Steubenville (Ohio) and Evangelization 2000.

KENNETH D. GILL

SEE ALSO Pentecostal Missions.

Charismatic Movement

Charismatic Movement. See Charismatic Missions and Pentecostal Movement.

Charles, Pierre (1883–1954). Belgian Catholic missiologist. Charles joined the Society of Jesus (the Jesuits) at age sixteen. After studying philosophy in England and Germany, he was ordained in 1910. He became fluent in five languages besides his native French, not counting Latin and Greek. Charles traveled widely during his lifetime, visiting Catholic missions in Africa and India, among other places. From 1914 until his death he was on the faculty of the Jesuit preparatory institute in Louvain, Belgium. There, influenced by the work of Robert Streit, he began in 1923 to develop a scientific theology of missions that emphasized rational preparation, the planting of the Christian church among all peoples, the adaptation of the gospel to individual cultures, and the need for indigenous clergy to take over leadership. He taught that Christians should approach evangelism with an understanding of respect for the value of non-Christian cultures and religions. He helped create the missions program at Gregorian University in Rome in 1932 and taught there, in addition to Louvain, for several years. Charles, through his instruction, students, writings, and conferences (the Semaines de Missiologie was held annually at Louvain except during World War II), had a profound influence on the theology and practice of missions throughout the Catholic Church and other Christian denominations. The documents of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) were heavily influenced by his doctrines.

ROBERT SHUSTER

Chi-Oang (1872–1946). Chinese evangelist in Taiwan. Chi-Oang did not come to Christ until she was fifty-two years old. At that time her reputation was that of one who had successfully reconciled her fiercely independent mountain people, the Sediq, with the Japanese during their occupation of Taiwan. The occupation prevented mission work among any of the mountain tribes on Taiwan. As a result, at the age of fifty-eight, she was encouraged by a Presbyterian missionary couple, James and Lillian Dickson, to enter a two-year Bible training school and to work among her own people. Chi-Oang was uniquely fitted for this, enjoying freedom of movement and respect from both sides because of her previous work.

Finishing Bible school, she became a fearless evangelist and discipler, and the Japanese sought numerous times to stop her. Each time, however, she was spared arrest through God’s providential oversight and the loyal help of her followers. As result of her ministry, at the end of World War II and the Japanese occupation, thousands of the Sediq descended from the mountains to be baptized. She died shortly after the churches gained their freedom, her work complete of building, sustaining, and nurturing them through this time.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Chi-Oang

Child Evangelism. Both biblical and historical records document the priority among global cultures of passing on a spiritual heritage to the next generation. While we may observe concerted efforts throughout church history to baptize, catechize, and evangelize children and youth, until recently there has been a dearth of global strategic planning to address children and youth as a particular focus of worldwide missionary efforts.

The New Testament and records of the Apostolic Fathers are quite clear when they speak of children and faith. The training of a child was a parental responsibility; failure by parents in carrying out this responsibility brought sorrow to child and parent alike. Second- and early-third-century Christians baptized neither infants nor young children, but by A.D. 250 infant baptism was practiced, particularly in North African Christianity. Cyprian of Carthage and Augustine of Hippo argued that original sin was the chief reason for the need to baptize infants and no one, including children, should be refused God’s mercy and grace. While the Reformation produced groups with varying viewpoints on baptism of children, there did emerge a variety of catechetical approaches, which indicates the intentionality of churches born out of the Reformation to instruct and nurture children to full participation in Christian faith.

Although its impact and significance has been disputed, the Sunday school stands as a historical representation of concern for children and Christian faith. Its origins in England in the 1780s stems from efforts by Robert Raikes and others to educate marginalized poor children caught in massive changes brought about by the Industrial Revolution. The American version emerged as a pioneering-missionary vehicle with obvious shades of American revivalism. For example, the American Sunday School Union began in 1824 with the resolve to establish “Sunday schools in every destitute place in the Valley of the Mississippi.”

The last half of the nineteenth century saw the Sunday school movement grow to international prominence as “uniform lessons” became a vehicle of expansion. By 1900 3 million English-speaking students used these lessons in New Zealand, Australia, Japan, Korea, China, Africa, and wherever British or American missionaries served. The uniform lessons were also translated into scores of languages that increased the influence of the Sunday school worldwide.

Evangelistic Sunday schools in the United States have gone through both growth and decline patterns during the twentieth century, but their evangelistic focus on children has remained constant. Research indicates that 85 percent of people make decisions for Jesus Christ before they reach fifteen years of age.

Recent studies support the strategic significance of evangelism to children. One-third of the world’s population is under fifteen years of age, with 85 percent of those under fifteen living in the Third World. The vast group of children existing in non-Western settings are increasingly living in urban slums. Forty thousand children under five die daily and some estimate that 100 million children live or work on city streets worldwide. Exploitation of children as child laborers and sex objects is growing rapidly. Two-thirds of an estimated 130 million children worldwide with no access to basic education are girls.

This tragic present state of the world’s children, particularly in non-Western settings, highlights a number of missiological implications. While children need to hear the gospel of Jesus Christ in contextualized forms that state clearly the forgiveness present in the work of Christ, missions strategists increasingly plan and implement holistic forms of ministry to children. The plight of the urban poor, where growing numbers of children can be found, requires a reevaluation of Christian mission in urban contexts. Crucial to any mission strategy to children is the growing evidence that women are the key to societal change and have the most impact on the lives of children. Mission agencies in the future will no longer be able to avoid developing strategies for ministry to children and may even have to rethink the PEOPLE GROUP concept with its priority on adults.

BYRON D. KLAUS

Chile

Chile (Est. 2000 pop.: 15,311,000; 756,945 sq. km. [292,256 sq. mi.]). Chile is a South American republic located along the western slope of the Andes (2,600 miles long and averaging 110 miles wide), bordered by Peru and Bolivia on the north, Argentina on the east, and the Pacific Ocean on the west. Because of its length, climates vary from the hot, dry northern desert to the glaciers, stormy islands, and chilly Tierra del Fuego in the far south. Most of the population lives in a 600-mile stretch of the central valley, with the capital city, Santiago (over 5 million), as the focal point. Hydroelectric plants along the short but rapidly falling streams generate 75 percent of the nation’s power. Chile’s population is relatively well-educated, with a reported 94 percent literacy level. There are more than 230,000 enrolled in universities. Two of Chile’s authors, Gabriela Mistral and Pablo Neruda, have won Nobel prizes for literature. Chile is a typical Latin American democracy with a successful expanding economy and the burden of a large, although shrinking, number of persons living below the poverty level. With the help of foreign investment, the economy has improved to the point where in 1995 the country became a candidate to join the North American Free Trade Act (NAFTA). The Spanish, who invaded in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, intermarried with the native Araucanians, which accounts for the mixed ancestry of 72 percent of the population. The total native American peoples account for nearly 7 percent of the population. Some 928,000 are Mapuche, descendants of the original Araucanians. Prior to freedom from Spain in 1810, Chile was subservient to the government and economic life of Lima, Peru. This led to a pervasive illegal trade with contraband goods. With intervals of conservative government controlled by the established and wealthy landowners (latifundios) and intermissions of military dictatorship, the country arrived at the middle of the twentieth century with unrealized expectations that the nation’s riches in fertilizers and minerals would be shared by the disenfranchised masses. Increasing dissatisfaction with the deteriorating economic situation and strong leftist-Marxist influence on the university level and in the national congress re-resulted in the 1970 minority election of Salvador Allende to the presidency. Unprepared for victory and not knowing how to apply Marxist principles to an ailing economy, Allende added his own personal confusion, and the national standard of living spiraled downward. Both Roman Catholic and Protestant churches became involved in the politics and added to the confusion. After three years of the Allende government, in a bloody coup, the military installed Augusto Pinochet as president, who eventually became convinced that he was indispensable. Pinochet's success with the economy paralleled a growing unrest over his government's dictatorial ways. Pinochet lost a plebiscite in 1988, which led to the installation of a civilian government at the end of 1989 whose present administration is based on seventeen political parties.
Chile

According to some statistics as few as 60 percent or as many as 75 percent of Chileans claim to be Roman Catholic although attendance at Mass on any given weekend is more likely 15 percent. Liberation theology and the charismatic movement have had significant impact in the life of the Catholic Church. The key to understanding present Protestant churches is the impact of the 1909 Pentecostal revival within the Methodist Church, which presently has a membership estimated at over 500,000. Estimates of Protestant church membership statistics vary widely from 16 percent to 30 percent of the total population. Pentecostal church membership is variously reported to be from 80 percent to 95 percent of Protestants. Having left behind the first generation's religious enthusiasm, now that the churches are populated with second-, third-, and even fourth-generation evangelicals, by 1993 it was estimated that only 44 percent of Protestants regularly attended church. One major concern within evangelicalism is how to reach the middle-class masses in the cities. Several church groups, such as the Christian and Missionary Alliance, Presbyterians, and the Baptist Convention are giving special attention to this need and have met with moderate success. Another concern is the training of workers for the huge indigenous Pentecostal churches. An attempt is being made to solve this problem through the Pentecostal Bible Institute.

An equal challenge for the indigenous Pentecostal and other Protestant churches has to do with ministries outside the church. Social outreach is below what it could be given the size of the Chilean church. The same can be said for the relatively small number of cross-cultural missionaries sent out by Chilean churches.

David Spruance

China (Est. 2000 pop.: 1,284,597,000; 9,560,961 sq. km, 3,691,487 sq. mi.). The Christian faith was first brought to China in A.D. 635 by Nestorian missionaries who followed the silk trade route from their well-established church base in Syria and Persia. Their bishop, Alopen, was welcomed in Changan (now Xian) by the reigning emperor, Tang Tai Zung. The Nestorians translated parts of their Bible and other literature into Chinese, often using Taoist and Buddhist terms to convey their meaning. Although the Nestorian faith spread to several major cities in China and boasted thousands of converts, its greatest growth may have been among the foreign trading community. As a result of a severe persecution under Emperor Wu Zung in A.D. 845, it lost its foothold in China proper, but continued to exert a Christian influence among the Kerait, Ongut, and Uighurs—tribes on the northern frontier of China.

At the end of the thirteenth century, the Khubilai Khan, Mongol ruler of China, invited the pope to send "one hundred teachers of science and religion" to instruct the Chinese. A papal interregnum, difficulty of travel, and uncertainty over the nature of this invitation meant that this request never received a response. However, in 1294 John of Montecorvino, a Franciscan, was sent to China. Within a short time he baptized six thousand Chinese, established churches in several cities, and had the New Testament and Psalms translated into the language of the court (probably a Mongolian dialect). By the time the Yuan (Mongol) dynasty was replaced by the Ming dynasty in 1368, there may have been as many as one hundred thousand Roman Catholic Christians. From this period until the arrival of the Jesuits in China at the end of the sixteenth century, no record exists of Christian churches in China.

The Society of Jesus (Jesuits), with Matteo Ricci as its chief China representative, entered China in 1582 from its base in the Portuguese colony of Macao. First assuming a religious role, much like Buddhist monks, and then becoming more like Confucian scholars, Ricci and his Jesuit colleagues identified with the Chinese elite. They prepared maps, practiced astronomy, constructed and repaired clocks that they gave to the emperor, and wrote treatises on Christianity that related to the Confucian worldview. By the beginning of the eighteenth century the Christian church in China numbered two hundred thousand, including scholars, urban dwellers, and rural peasants.

Unlike the later-arriving Franciscans and Dominicans who disagreed sharply with them, most Jesuits were flexible about the Chinese culture. They viewed ancestral rites as civil deference, not religious worship, described Confucius in semi-sacred terms as holy, and used indigenous terms for God. Their differences with the other orders and the Vatican over these issues resulted in the "rites controversy." This lasted from the early 1600s until 1724, when the Yung Zheng emperor proscribed the Christian faith in China. This violent ecclesiastical dispute contributed to the pope’s disbanding the Jesuit order worldwide in 1773. Missionaries from other orders continued to work secretly in China, and the church went through difficult periods of persecution.

Robert Morrison, an Englishman, came to Macao in 1807 as the first Protestant missionary to China. At that time foreigners were not allowed to live in China, and Morrison and others following him had to engage in trade in Canton or live and witness in other cities where there were Chinese, including Singapore, Penang, Malacca, Bangkok, and Batavia (Jakarta). The attempt of England to import opium into China resulted in the opium war of 1840. China’s defeat led to a series of unequal treaties in 1842–44 and 1858–60 by the Western powers. These opened up China to trade, diplomacy, and missionary presence. Unfortunately, it put the stamp of “foreign” upon the Christian faith and caused some Chinese to protest: “You introduced two things to us by force, neither one of which we desired—opium and Christianity.”

The Protestant mission in China expanded from a trickle of missionaries in 1842 to a high of nearly eight thousand by 1930. Over a period of 150 years, they engaged in all of the traditional types of ministry: production of grammars, dictionaries, Bibles, booklets, and tracts; evangelism and church planting among the Han Chinese and many minority groups; education, both general and theological, at all levels; establishment of hospitals and missions of mercy; opposition to evils such as footbinding, infanticide, and opium. Catholic missions, with their unique perspective, expanded in much the same way.

From 1840 to 1900 many “missionary incidents” occurred between the Chinese government and missionaries. These culminated in the huge antiforeign Boxer Rebellion of 1900, when many foreign missionaries and Chinese converts were killed.

From the fall of the Ch’ing dynasty (1911) until the advent of the People’s Republic of China (1949), the control of churches and Christian activities increasingly was transferred from foreign mission agencies to Chinese church bodies. By 1949 there were about 750,000 Protestant Christians and probably double that number of Catholics—not very many for a country of 400 million people. Furthermore, Protestant churches were denominationally divided, generally small, and struggling to escape the epithet of “foreign.”

During the past fifty years under the People’s Republic of China, foreign religious workers have used nonmissionary roles to continue their Christian witness in China. More important, Protestant Chinese churches, now viewed as truly Chinese, have grown to numbers estimated at 20 to 60 million. These Protestant Christians worship and witness in three different contexts: in churches related to the China Christian Council; in autonomous Christian communities (often called house churches); and in student fellowship groups on school campuses.

Although under greater or lesser pressure from the government, the CCC and autonomous communities conduct normal church life, produce Christian literature, engage in witness, and establish training programs to develop new leaders.

China Inland Mission. See Overseas Missionary Fellowship.

China (Taiwan). An island that was under Japanese rule from 1895 to 1945, Taiwan is one hundred miles east of the China coast. After the fall of mainland China to the Communists in 1949, Taiwan became the refuge of the Nationalist Chinese government. More than 98% of the 21 million population are Han Chinese. Most of the them (Taiwanese 74%, Hakka 11%) immigrated to Taiwan more than two hundred years ago. The others (13%) are Mandarin-speaking refugees who came from mainland China after 1948. Although the majority speak Taiwanese, the official language and the language of education is Mandarin. The Malaya-Polynesian mountain peoples (1.7%) are divided into nine tribes.

The most popular religion in Taiwan is folk religion (70%), a combination of Buddhism and Taoism with an animistic worldview. Less than 4% of the population are Christians (1.4% Roman Catholic and 2.5% Protestant), with the Presbyterian Church of Taiwan the largest Protestant denomination (about 50% of the Protestants).

Between 1627 and 1664 the Dutch Reformed Church sent thirty-seven missionaries to Taiwan to minister to Dutch traders. They also made a major missionary outreach into the aboriginal communities. However, the missionaries were driven out after the Manchu established their control over Taiwan in 1683. In 1859, several Dominican Catholic missionaries arrived. The Protestant missionary efforts, pioneered by the English Presbyterian James Maxwell in the south (1865) and the Canadian Presbyterian George Leslie MacKay in the north (1872), proved difficult and dangerous.

Progress was slow in the early stages. Under the occupation by Japan, the missionaries had considerable freedom until 1940. The church grew dramatically between 1950 and 1960 because of the influx and conversion of refugees from mainland China. Roman Catholics soared from 13,000 in 1945 to 180,000 by 1960; the Protestant community shot up from 51,000 in 1948 to 220,000 by 1960. But stagnation has set in since then despite major evangelical outreaches.
China (Taiwan)

Protestants are unequally distributed among the different linguistic groups. About 23% of the mountain people are nominal Protestant as are 4.6% of the Mandarin, 1% of the Taiwanese, and 0.5% of the Hakka. More than thirty seminaries and Bible schools provide leadership training. The lack of pastors has become a serious problem.

The Year 2000 Gospel Movement set a specific and ambitious goal of 2 million believers, 10,000 churches, and 200 overseas missionaries sent out from Taiwan by the year 2000. Progress has not been very encouraging. In 1996 there were only about 490,000 Protestants and 3,361 churches. The revival of Buddhism and traditional Chinese religions is the greatest challenge to Christianity in Taiwan.

Tsu-Kung Chiang

Chinese House Church Movement. As a form of ministry, the house church movement in China is a contextual response to political pressure. In the 1950s, after the expulsion of missionaries from China, those who refused to join the Three-Self Patriotic Movement (TSPM) were not allowed to worship in their churches; so they started a movement that recaptured the worship of the early Christians at home (Acts 2:46; 5:42; 1 Cor. 16:19). This form was viable because meetings could be moved from one place to another at any time and could not be easily detected by local authorities. During the Cultural Revolution, when all churches were closed down by the government, all Christians could meet only in Christian homes. The movement grew tremendously despite the hostile environment because it provided a true Christian community of commitment and love where many experienced the power of the Holy Spirit in miracles and radical life changes. Today the movement is massive in scope, with estimates ranging from 30 to 80 million participants as compared to a total Christian population of less than 1 million before the communist takeover in 1949.

The term “house church” refers to those who refuse to join the TSPM and to register with the government. The movement is not a denomination or ecclesiastical fellowship like what is found in the West. More accurately, it comprises individual house churches. There is no common statement of faith, no formal fellowship or denominational structures. It is, simply, a model of Christian community for places where structural expression is not possible. The most important feature of the house church movement is not a theological system, but a common stand defined by relationship to the TSPM and the Chinese government. This having been said, there are, however, certain common theological convictions among the house churches. One is obedience to the Word of God even to the point of risking one’s life; another is the belief in the absolute separation of church and state, as the movement’s adherents are convinced in the light of Scripture that government control is not acceptable.

Chem Bin Tan

Bibliography. D. Adeney, China: The Church’s Long March; R. Fung, Households of God on China’s Soil; M. D. Wong, Spiritual Food.

Chinese Mission Boards and Societies. Chinese mission history on a wide scale began with the founding of the Chinese Foreign Missionary Union in 1928 by Leland Wang. It represented an outreach to the scattered Chinese in the South Seas of Asia and to outposts including Borneo, Sarawak, Bali, Sumatra, and the Celebes. Later it expanded to include efforts in New Guinea, Fiji, Tahiti, and New Zealand. It was an indigenous faith effort focusing on church planting and church growth.

In 1947 Evangelize China Fellowship was established by Andrew Gih. A faith mission with indigenous leadership, it labored in Hong Kong, Macao, and Taiwan, and later to the Chinese diaspora in Southeast Asia. Primary schools for girls and orphanages for the homeless demonstrated Gih’s concern for the marginalized. Over fifty churches were planted as the mission reflected social and evangelistic concern.

Chinese mission activity on a broad scale shifted to the United States with the founding of the Chinese Christian Mission in October 1961, in Detroit, Michigan, under Thomas Wang. Soon after, the mission moved to its present site (Petaluma, California) continuing its effort to reach both mainland and Chinese diaspora. Its global dimension includes work in Hong Kong, Taiwan, Singapore, the Philippines, Australia, and Canada, plus new thrusts to Siberia, Latin America, and the Chinese mainland. A staff of thirty full- and part-time workers undergird the work of twenty Chinese missionaries abroad. Its publishing house and San Francisco book room reach out to both believers and nonbelievers, contextualizing the gospel within Chinese traditional culture.

Another U.S. founded mission is Ambassadors for Christ. Established on May 6, 1963, by co-founders Ted Choy and Moses Chow, its focus is on the Chinese students. Its call was “to reach our kinsmen for Christ,” with the hope that these persons might someday return to China and be “a force for the kingdom.” The campus ministry centered around Bible study groups, where overseas Chinese students were won to Christ. Such students were then channeled into local Chinese churches for discipling.

Ambassadors for Christ undergirds its mission with a variety of publications to students, scholars, and believers in the Chinese churches. It provides leadership and resources for the growth of Chinese Christian families and American-born Chinese through seminars and conferences. It sponsors a triennial convention for North America, calling Chinese Christians to engage in world evangelism. The five previous conventions have seen attendees rise from an initial 300 to 1,800 in number, with hundreds having responded to the missionary call. Unlike other Chinese mission efforts which emphasized “going,” Ambassadors for Christ has responded to those who have “come” to America. In this sense it has linked with the Chinese churches as a total mission force.

The Chinese Overseas Christian Mission was established in 1950 by Stephen Y. T. Wang, then a student at Cambridge, England. His concern was directed to the four thousand Chinese in England and Europe, the primary task being evangelism and church planting. With Wang’s death in 1971, Mary Wang and co-workers continued the mission. Today over thirty workers are based in the United Kingdom and Europe in over one hundred cities, ministering to fifty churches and many more fellowships. With the opening of Eastern Europe and Russia, the mission extended its pioneering efforts.

With a population of eight hundred thousand in greater Europe today and only 2.5 percent of them reached for Christ, emphasis is directed to the huge numbers of Chinese restaurant workers. A new thrust now prevails among Chinese scholars from mainland China, Taiwan, and Hong Kong. Correspondence courses, lay seminars, and Theological Education by Extension (TEE) undergird the mission. Literature includes Chinese and English journals along with videos and cassettes.

Chinese mission history, as recounted, was indigenous and intracultural in nature, as first-generation Chinese reached out to their own. With over one thousand Chinese evangelical churches in North America alone, it appears that a steady supply of American-raised and American-born Chinese will bear the brunt of Chinese mission in the twenty-first century.

HOOVER WONG

SEE ALSO Asian Mission Boards and Societies.

Chitambar, Jashwaut Rao (1879–1940). Indian missions advocate. Chitambar was born in Allahabad, United Provinces (now Uttar Pradesh), the son of a Methodist minister father who had been disinherited by his family for converting to Christianity.

His early years of ministry were spent in the academy. Two years after graduating from Methodist Theological Seminary in Bareilly he married Viola Singh. In 1906 Chitambar was named a professor at Lucknow Christian College, where he later was named principal.

About this time Chitambar’s interest in missions became evident. Along with K. T. Paul and Bishop Azariah, Chitambar founded the indigenous National Missionary Society in 1905. The society was one of the primary organizations advocating the contextualization of Christianity in India, using ashrams and brotherhoods along with the more traditional educational institutions and hospitals.

Chitambar put his knowledge to work as editor of the Hindustani Methodist periodical Kaukab-I-Hind, “Star of India,” and as a member of the committee revising The Standard Hindustani Dictionary. A translator of hymns, he also wrote two biographies: John Wesley and Mahatma Gandhi.

In 1931, three-quarters of a century after the advent of the Methodists to India, he was the first Indian to be elected bishop. Before India received international prominence and its independence in 1947, Chitambar was a well known and popular speaker for India in the United States and Europe. He died in Jubbulpore.

STANLEY M. GUTHRIE

Cho, (David) Paul Yonggi (1936– ). Korean pastor-evangelist of world’s largest church. Cho was the oldest son of a farmer in Kyungnam province who had nine children. He graduated from the Full Gospel Theological Seminary and Kungmin University. When he became seriously sick and was on the verge of death in 1956, his future mother-in-law assisted him spiritually to experience divine healing. He also met an Assemblies of God missionary in Pusan who taught him Pentecostal doctrines and whose church he joined.

Cho started his ministry with a handful of people who helped him plant a tent ministry in the center of Seoul in 1961. This eventually resulted in the Yoido Full Gospel Church, with over 700,000 members by 1993, including the members of the ten satellite churches scattered throughout Seoul. The Yoido Central Church sanctuary holds 20,000 people with six services on Sunday. The strength of his church is the well-organized 50,000 cell groups for Bible study and prayer.

Cho was elected to be the moderator of the Korean Assemblies of God in 1966, a position he held for over ten years. In 1993 he was elected to be the president of the International
Cho, (David) Paul Yonggi

Assemblies of God. In 1994 he became the president of the only Christian daily newspaper in Korea. He has written numerous devotional books that have been translated into several vernacular languages. Cho's The Fourth Dimension explains his theology and philosophy of expectant visionary prayer, which he describes as the key to his success in ministry.

Bong Rin Ro

Christ and Culture. The Early Church's Interaction. During its first sixteen centuries, the Western church's perception of cultures was borrowed from the Roman imperial view of the world. Culture was seen as a single, normative universal, a monochromatic ideal to be stamped on the barbarian world outside the empire. With the collapse of Rome and the Western empire in the fifth century, the church became the custodian of that ideal.

In the Byzantine Empire of the East, and still today among the Orthodox family of churches, the pattern was different. The churches assimilated into existing ethnicities and languages: Greek, Coptic, Armenian, or Slavic.

By comparison, the Western church became the architect of a mono-ethnic church and imposed a single language (Latin) to promote it. Christendom's self-understanding as a superior world culture slowly grew to dominate Europe and beyond as the church expanded its reach. The Crusades against Islam, and later the brutal conquests of Latin America and the slave trade of Africa, became partial expressions of this cultural ethnocentrism.

In these earliest encounters with cultures, there were other responses. The abortive mission of the Nestorian Christians to China in the seventh and eighth centuries took a much more conciliatory approach in matters cultural and religious (see Nestorian Missions). Minority voices like those of the Franciscan Raymond Lull (c. 1235–1315) pleaded for compassion and educated understanding in dealing with Islam. From that Muslim world Western Christendom even borrowed ideas in philosophy, science, and mathematics. But these exceptions created no breaches in the prevailing and naive assumption that non-Western culture was largely an inventory of pagan items.

Iberian Expansion and the Counter-Reformation. The colonial advances of Spain and Portugal in the New World (1450–1760) brought Christendom's first large-scale contact with non-Western cultures. Secular power and coercion allied itself with persuasion. The combined motivations of “God, gold, and guns” reinforced earlier Western hostilities to “other cultures” as “HEATHEN,” a term carrying sociocultural and political connotations as weighty as theological ones.

Again, there were notable modifications of such attitudes. Bartolomé de las Casas (1474–1566) spent a lifetime protesting the colonizers’ treatment of the indigenous peoples of Latin America. Others were to press for more than compassion and dignity. In China Matteo Ricci (1552–1610) and his fellow Jesuit missionaries saw the culture not as an obstacle but a door for Christian penetration. His approval of the cult of Confucius and of ancestral rituals represented new ways to accommodate Christianity to the culture. Those accommodations would help stir what came to be called the Rites Controversy in the church (see Roman Catholic Missions).

The founding of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide in 1622 created a centralized organ for Catholic missionary activity that pled for evangelization by peaceful, not violent, means. It tended to encourage respect for the cultural way of life of other peoples and to oppose wholesale cultural domination. The Congregation introduced a rule-of-thumb distinction between the religious and secular aspects of culture. “Secular culture was not to be touched, but whatever did not conform to Catholic faith and morals was to be uprooted” (Shorter, 1992, 144).

The distinction opened the door for those like the Jesuit missionary in south India, Roberto de Nobili (1577–1656). He sought a measure of legitimacy for Hindu institutions and customs, such as caste. Similar to Ricci, de Nobili could argue such customs were those of secular culture. They were therefore as compatible with the Catholic faith as those of ancient Rome.

Ultimately, however, these experiments were seen as dangerous, especially in view of the earlier Counter-Reformation decisions of the Catholic Church's Council of Trent (1545–63). In opposing the growing Protestant threat and its commitments to national and cultural pluralism on a formal church level, the Council hardened its monocultural perspectives, tragically at the very time when new cultures were being "discovered." Sweeping and rigid standardization of liturgy and theology closed the door for some time to future efforts like those of de Nobili and Ricci.

The Reformation Interlude. The beginnings of Protestantism in the sixteenth century did little of a practical sort to shift perceptions of culture as a monolith. It lacked the stimulus of global interaction and colonial power that the Catholic Church enjoyed until the end of the eighteenth century. Protestantism’s attention was fixed on European Christendom as its mission field and its interests in culture were largely formed around institutional issues of church and state.
At the same time, theological paradigms and practices were being formed that would play a part in later modifications. Both Luther and Calvin rejected the Catholic view of accommodation to culture that saw grace building on nature by way of divine modification. They affirmed the radical and extensive impact of sin on human society while defending the exercise of the Christian’s liberty in local political, cultural, or ecclesiastical customs.

They parted company in their perceptions of how the tensions between these two realities of sin and liberty could be resolved. Luther viewed the tension as one of Christ and culture in paradox, enduring one kingdom in the expectation of another more trans-historical kingdom. Calvin saw Christ as the transformer of humanity within culture and society, not apart from it. And, unlike both, the Anabaptist movement saw the community of God’s people as more hostile to culture, to humanity’s autonomous settings of values.

The Protestant insistence on the translation of the Bible would eventually help to break the monolithic paradigm of culture. Though not always clearly recognized, the genie of cultures was to spring out of its vernacular language bottle. Bible translation would divinely validate the cultures of later converts throughout the world. It would help to change “culture” from a singular noun to a plural noun.

Initial Protestant Encounters with Cultures. By the end of the eighteenth century, reversals were taking place in mission history. Catholic mission interest and efforts, after a flourishing century and a half, were in serious decline and Protestant efforts were growing. Protestant England and Holland replaced Catholic Spain and Portugal as colonial powers.

But Europe’s sense of racist superiority continued to promote colonial expansion and its right and duty to rule the “inferior” cultures it dominated. Even the United States, though a latecomer to expansionist policies, was infected by its concept of “Manifest Destiny.”

Protestantism’s newly found vigor did not always free itself from those homeland self-perceptions of cultural superiority. In relative innocence, it had few doubts about either the wholesale depravity of cultural life in non-Western societies or Western culture as the culmination of human development.

Humanitarian motives quickly linked evangelization with “civilizing” (understood as Westernization). And the question, debated through much of the nineteenth century, became, Should one precede the other or were the two processes simultaneous?

Though disagreements were intense, either-or choices were rare in the early years (Hutchison, 1987, 12). In America John Eliot (1604–90) withdrew Native American Christians from their cultural connections into Westernizing “praying towns.” Fellow Puritan Cotton Mather (1663–1728) would add later, “The best thing we can do for our Indians is to Anglicize them” (Bosch, 1991, 260).

With the expansion of Protestant missions, doors opened for a wide variety of social services. The formation of the China Medical Missionary Society in 1838 gave medical missions a wide legitimacy. In India Alexander Duff (1806–78) touted the superiority of Western education as preparation for the gospel. His support for the use of English as the medium of instruction flowed from his hopes for an intellectual Anglicization to promote conversions.

Protestant Shifts in Understanding. Not everyone shared completely the simplistic views of “barbaric” indigenous cultures that demanded Westernizing. German missiologist Gustav Warneck (1834–1910), influenced by a national romanticism that glorified the Volk (the ‘people’), saw cultures as gifts of God to be affirmed and preserved. And missionaries like Bruno Guttman (1876–1966) in Tanzania and Christian Keysser (1877–1961) in Papua New Guinea created strategies to implement these convictions. Guttman resisted Western civilizing as an instrument that would destroy the peoplehood of traditional cultural patterns. Keysser supported “tribal conversions” and the building of the structures and leadership of the emerging church on clan and tribal foundations.

Meanwhile, others were questioning the traditional connections of civilizing and Christianizing as a growing “native church” demanded a shift in leadership from mission to national church. The old policies, built on skeptical disregard for human cultures, stood in the way of that transition.

Mission administrators Henry Venn (1796–1873) of England’s Church Missionary Society and Rufus Anderson (1796–1880) of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions led the way in such a shift. They called for “indigenous churches” of self-support, self-propagation, and self-government. And behind it lay their relative confidence that churches built on “native” culture could thrive with integrity and independence.

To that end Venn supported the training of “native clergy” and opposed Duff’s promotion of education in the English language. And Anderson questioned repeatedly the legitimacy of “civilizing” or social transformation as an aim of missions. That would come, he argued, as a consequence of gospel impact and the “native” church’s leavening of cultures.

Dissenting views also began to appear as a growing theological gulf sharply divided liberal from conservative. The difference widened into the twentieth century, shaping attitudes on evangelization and civilization into an almost either-or choice. The earlier millennial optimism shared by British and American missions had seen the extension of Anglo-Saxon civilization as the extension of the Kingdom of God. Under the impact of liberalism, especially in its social gospel forms, millenialism took a revisionist shape. “Civilizing” and social service took priority over evangelization (see MILLENNIAL THOUGHT).

On the conservative side, the rise of the interdenominational FAITH MISSIONS from the 1860s and the growth of premillenialism shifted the focus to evangelization. Henry Frost of the China Inland Mission wrote, “While it is always true that Christianity civilizes, it is never true that civilization Christianizes.” Medicine and education were seen as “supportive” ministries. Cultural adaptations of a superficial sort were promoted for pragmatic reasons (Taber, 1991, 81). The American appearance of fundamentalism in the early twentieth century sharpened the differences even more.

From Culture to Cultures. Missionary optimism regarding the ultimate triumph of “Western civilization” dimmed severely with the participation of the “Christian” West in World War I and the global aftermath of the Great Depression. The political breakup of the Western colonial empires following World War II reinforced a worldwide awareness that culture was plural, not a singular.

Advancing this weariness with culture as a monolith was the growing discovery of SOCIOLOGY and CULTURAL ANTHROPOLOGY as tools for missions. In earlier decades outstanding ethnographies had been written by missionaries like R. H. CODRINGTON and Henri Junod. The research of Father Wilhelm Schmidt (1868–1954) in the global spread of cultures was an early influence in Catholic circles.

But not until the mid-1930s and the co-creation of Wycliffe Bible Translators, International and the Summer Institute of Linguistics did the full usefulness of these fledgling disciplines begin to impact the church both Protestant and Catholic. Through the early leadership of linguists like Kenneth Pike and Eugene Nida, missions began to see slowly that culture was not an abstract concept.

Under the impact of functionalism, the dominant anthropological school of the day, cultures were seen as discrete, bounded units. In their diverse forms, they became collective shapes of the ideas, values, and meanings of societies and peoples. They provided explanations, stability, and adaptive skills to understand oneself, God, and the world. Missionary anthropology was born.

In the last three decades, these insights have provoked new explorations. Evangelical authors like ALAN TIPPETT, Charles Kraft, and Paul Hiebert and Catholic scholars like LOUIS LUZBE-TAK have wrestled deeply with the implications of anthropological insights for Christian missions. Others like Robert Schreiter and Charles Taber have joined them in the dialogue over the Christian faith, cultures, and the shaping of theology (labeled CONTEXTUALIZATION among Protestants and INCULTURATION among Catholics).

The bulk of scholarship until now has focused on the missionary impact of Christianity on cultures. The impact of cultures on the formation of Christian theology and missions is still in its developmental stages. A Summary Review of Historical Paradigms. Using the typology of H. Richard Niebuhr (1956), five paradigms of the Christian attitude to cultures have appeared in the church's history. On opposite ends of the alternatives are the paradigms of Christ Against Cultures and Christ of Cultures.

The paradigm of Christ-Against-Cultures has appeared when one sees culture only as a monolithic whole, without nuance or particulars. Cultures then become largely hostile threats to the gospel, especially when the culture observed is not one's own. Mission dominated by Western ethnocentrism has often moved in this orbit in the past.

The opposite paradigm of Christ of Cultures asks us not to fight cultures but to join them. Theological liberalism has been comfortable here. The Laymen's Inquiry, released in a one-volume version titled Rethinking Missions (1932), typified this mood. It saw the missionary as an ambassador more than a soldier and called not for evangelization but for social reconstruction.

Within the Roman Catholic Church, the paradigm of Christ Above Cultures remains secure. Modifying the earlier view of grace supplementing nature and the examples of Ricci and de Nobili, it has called for building Christianity on the incompleteness of cultures. Since the Second VATICAN COUNCIL (1962–65), it has been more aware of the deepening levels in human cultures and of cultural pluralism. The traditional model of ACCOMMODATION is now questioned as too superficial and haphazard, too limited to the institutional. Inculturation is heralded as recognizing more culture's integrative level, culture as a dynamic, systemic whole (Luzbetak, 1988, 76–83). But the two-tiered nature/grace paradigm remains in place.

The paradigm of Christ and Cultures in Paradox continues to see a distinction between the two kingdoms of church and cultures, and views culture's many forms and meanings as more neutral items of “adiaphora” than of hostility. This has allowed some like Warneck to commend a long period of toleration before abolishing the Indian caste system and polygamous marriages. For others like Guttmann it has meant seeing Africa's “primordial ties” of clan, neighborhood, and age grouping as ties linked to the creation itself.

Calvin's view of Christ the Transformer of Cultures has undergone modifications. But its basic thrust remains that of penetrating and “taking possession of” culture's sin-infected meanings for Christ’s glory. Missions theorists like J. H. Bavinck (1895–1964) plead for perceiving the vestiges of God's presence in culture's many-layered diversity while avoiding the fabrication of some international super-culture. Culture is religion made visible but not indivisible. Even under divine judgment, its creational structures and values must be renewed in Christ.

Harvie M. Conn

SEE ALSO Gospel and Culture.

Christ. See Jesus; also Christology.

Christian and Missionary Alliance Missions.

The Christian and Missionary Alliance resulted from the merger of the Christian Alliance, founded in 1887 by ALBERT B. SIMPSON as a North American nondenominational fellowship, and the Evangelical Missionary Alliance, founded the same year as the missionary arm of the Christian Alliance. The year 1887 also saw the ordination and sending of William Cassidy, the new agency's first missionary, who tragically died en route to China. Between 1887 and 1890, a total of nineteen missionaries were sent out, beginning a movement that grew rapidly in both size and influence. By 1893, 180 missionaries were at work on forty stations in twelve fields. As the EMA grew to become larger than its parent, the two were combined to form a single organization in April 1897, the same month that the cornerstone was laid for the Missionary Training Institute building in Nyack, New York (now Nyack College). Headquarters for the agency remained in New York City until 1974, at which time they were transferred to suburban Nyack. In 1989, they were moved to Colorado Springs, Colorado.

From the beginning, Alliance missions has emphasized pioneer mission activity. Simpson developed six guiding principles, which more than a century later still form the core of the organization's missionary philosophy. Included among these principles was the ethos of the missionary activity—"evangelistic and aggressive rather than educational and institutional"—as well as the overall goal: "our chosen fields are the [by missionaries] unoccupied portions of the heathen world." Economy and sacrifice were two important themes as well; the expenses of the home administration were kept to "the lowest possible figure" and missionaries were promised allowances to cover their expenses instead of regular salaries.

Throughout the twentieth century the Alliance progressively developed its overseas thrust. Having assumed denominational status in 1974, it finds itself today in the somewhat unique position of having approximately three-quarters of its church membership overseas. As a reflection of this state of affairs, the Alliance World Fellowship was established in May 1975, with seventy-four representatives from thirty-four nations joining to produce an exemplary church-mission agreement emphasizing full partnership between churches in North America and those abroad. The regular meetings of the AWF are only one of many measures implemented to keep the denomination from succumbing to the dangers of an ingrown institutionalism.

Today 1,108 Alliance missionaries are currently active in forty-six different countries, while Alliance churches exist in an additional dozen lands. The CMA is a strong proponent of the Unreached Peoples concept and conceives of itself as an agency whose chief focus is evangelism, discipling, and church planting. While a relief and development arm (CAMA Services) and a tentmaking arm (the International Fellowship of Alliance Professionals) have been added in recent years, the denomination's missionary philosophy shows unwavering commitment to full-time, career-oriented missionary personnel involved in the establishment of God's church among those peoples who have not yet had the opportunity to hear the Good News regarding salvation in Christ.

Larry Poston

Bibliography. R. L. Niklaus, L. J. Sawin and S. J. Stoezsz, *All for Jesus: God at Work in the Christian and Missionary Alliance Over One Hundred Years.

Christian Church (Denominational) Missions.

While claims of interest in world evangelism were present among Christian Churches from about 1800, the initial sending of missionaries did not actually begin until 1849. Significant commitment was not seen until one-quarter of a century later with the formation of the Foreign Missionary Society and the Women's Christian Missionary Society. The mission history of the movement may be divided into two historic streams: agency-based missions and "direct support" missions. The issues dividing these two streams have roots in the writings of Thomas and Alexander Campbell around the question of the application of biblical authority. The Restoration Movement has been significantly divided over these two approaches to mission activity. Commitments to mission and the means of carrying out mission have led to divisions in both the movement and local churches from the earliest days until the present.
Christian Church (Denominational) Missions

In his early writings Alexander Campbell advocated the conversion of the world to Jesus Christ and the use of appropriate means to do that. However, he opposed some of the practices of contemporary agencies and strongly maintained that the local congregation is the only God-given institution for world evangelism. Later, in 1849, apparently changing his attitude, he founded and served as life-long president of the American Christian Missionary Society. This agency provided the first organized approach to world missions of the Christian Churches. The formation of this agency reflected some changes in the broader theological and political climate of the times.

Campbell suggested four primary functions for a mission agency: (1) selecting and appointing evangelists, (2) preaching and making converts, (3) gathering converts into congregations, and (4) organizing these converts under the care and nurture of elders and deacons. Often not aware of the historic roots of mission in the movement, both direct support and agency-supported missionaries have continued to focus on these functions.

The contemporary picture of Christian Church missions includes both direct support missionaries and missionaries who are sent by mission agencies. By 1995 missionaries were listed as serving in more than seventy countries in at least 157 different incorporated Christian Church agencies or under local congregational supervision. The actual number of missionaries sent by the Christian Churches is difficult to ascertain because of differences in defining the term. Questions of geography, nature of the ministry, and time commitment cloud the issue. Illustrating this, different denominational directories list differing numbers of missionaries, though it should be noted that in both directories the listing is voluntary. With only a few exceptions these figures do not include the many people who are serving cross-culturally with interdenominational missions, such as Wycliffe Bible Translators, Campus Crusade, Food for the Hungry, World Vision, and Missionary World. Only a few who have a significant support base in the United States are listed. Some bivocational missionaries are listed, but the majority remain unlisted. These figures do not include short-term missionaries. Many churches recruit, support, and supervise short-term missionaries who may serve from a few weeks to two years. Since no centralized reporting structure exists among Christian Churches, it is impossible to know how many missionaries are actually serving at any given time.

Missions among the independent Christian Churches/Churches of Christ range across what is found in other evangelical missions. When one looks at the principal commitments of various Christian Church missions, the following are commonly found: evangelism and church planting, relief and development, leadership development and theological education, benevolence, Bible translation and literacy, short-term missions, and small-scale publishing.

Some agencies specialize to serve wide sectors of this fellowship of churches. For example, Team Expansion, Amor Ministries, and Christ in Youth serve largely in short-term missions. IDES and FAME serve in relief and development. Pioneer Bible Translators serves in Bible translation. Other missions serve a wider range of ministry concerns such as Christian Missionary Fellowship and African Christian Mission, whose focus is in evangelism and church planting, but who engage in medical work, education, theological education, literacy, and other kinds of ministries.

The majority of missionaries with the Christian Churches, however, serve in small direct support agencies that may include only one or two families. These agencies have been formed in many cases in the context of a local congregation to provide legal status for the mission and supervision by people who are particularly interested in that ministry. In a number of cases these small missions cooperate in field operations, as seen in Indonesia. In most cases they work independently on a given field. The National Missionary Convention meets annually and about every five years meets with the North American Christian Convention as a joint convention. The National Missionary Convention provides an opportunity for churches, mission agency personnel, and individual missionaries to meet and informally address missional issues of the Restoration Movement. Leaders from local congregations, direct support missionaries, mission agencies, and many other parachurch agencies set up booths, conduct workshops, plan corporate worship, and meet informally for about three days. This convention is normally attended by about five thousand to seven thousand depending upon its location. When combined with the North American Christian Convention, the two conventions together normally have registrations exceeding forty thousand. Mission funding and supervision remain thorny issues for Christian Churches. Some churches will only support missionaries affiliated with agencies who have acceptable boards and regular supervision. Other churches prefer to provide financial and ministry supervision from within their congregations or supervised by local congregations. Local funding within congregations reflects the same kind of ambiguity that is common to the broader denomination. Some churches raise funds through
Christian Walk and Work in Mission

Character-Based Missionary Problems and Proposed Solutions. Numerous surveys have shown that "the greatest problem among missionaries is relational breakdowns among themselves" (Elmer, 1993, 33). Two great needs, then, are for missionaries to cultivate love for others and effective interpersonal skills. Without these characteristics missionaries forget the real enemy and turn on each other. Spiritual Warfare is sup- planted by petty infighting. Everyone is affected and the whole work weakened. Jesus linked Christian love and unity with effective evangelism (John 17:20–21). Especially when working in other cultures the spirit of teamwork is essential for missionary work (see Teams in Mission). Missionary agencies and churches would do well to demand that all missionaries study conflict reso- lution before leaving their homelands (see Conflict). Missionaries must also be reminded of the indispensable quality of love for their lives and work. Without love all service and sacrifice are "nothing" (1 Cor. 13:1–3).

Many missionaries’ careers have been ruined by their inability to adapt to other cultures and other people (see Adjustment to the Field). "The two most valuable assets a missionary can possess are versatility and adaptability" (Kane, 1980, 93). These characteristics are developed by the Spirit in the soil of humility and servant-mindedness. Missionaries need to ask God for the grace to "become all things to all people so that by all possible means [they] might save some" (1 Cor. 9:22).

They should also realize that studying cultural ANTHROPOLOGY from a Christian perspective is an effective way to learn of their own subtle ETHNOCENTRISM and better prepare them for the life of constant adaptation that constitutes missionary living. Such study also leads to an understanding of WORLDVIEWS. Too few Christians have a well-developed biblical worldview with the lordship of Christ at its center. Not having thoroughly ana- lyzed their own culture by Scripture, they are poorly equipped to counsel people of other cul- tures to follow Christ within that culture. Devot- ion to Christ as Lord and courage to follow him whatever the cost within their own cultures are important characteristics for missionaries.

Another problem that missionaries face is selfishness. This is especially true of many Western- ers who have not forsaken the idol of materialism as a part of their conversion to Christ. Missionar- ies do not always leave their love of things behind when they go to serve abroad. No one has done a better job analyzing this than missiologist Jon Bonk in his book Missions and Money (see also Missionary Affluence). A propensity for selfishness affects many missionaries’ approach to evangelism and discipleship. These have become things to be done rather than an integral part of their lives. A credibility gap often occurs when missionaries share the gospel but do not share themselves with their hearers. Then the flaw of selfishness appears.

...
Christian Walk and Work in Mission

Many missionaries have hurt their families and testimonies by their lack of parenting skills and their blind devotion to ministry (see Family Life of the Missionary). Strong character is developed through the daily responsibilities and trials of raising a Christian family (see Gross, 1995). A missionary’s credibility in public ministry is often lost by failure in the private ministry of his own family (1 Tim. 3:4–5; Titus 1:6). Much can be learned by reading the heartbreaking lament of a missionary child who was raised at the expense of the family (Van Reken, 1988; see Missionary Children).

The Missionary Research Library in New York has discovered another missionary problem. They report that “ill health is the greatest single cause of missionary dropouts. Physical health problems account for 20.3% and mental health problems for 5.6%, making a total of 24.9%” (Kane, 1980, 105). Missionaries need the determination to cultivate the mind and the body as well as the soul. Maintaining a hobby, reading interesting books and magazines, exercising, eating well, developing recreational interests all help in preserving personal well-being (see Member Care).

As important as these areas are, Paul said, “physical training is of some value, but godliness has value for all things” (1 Tim. 4:8). Godliness is indispensable for the Christian. To be godly is to be like God, to follow God. Missionaries must remember that in making disciples they must not cease being disciplined followers of Christ every day. Praying, Bible reading, praising God, and sharing his Word should be as natural as eating and breathing. And of all the inner character to be developed, two traits should be constantly cultivated: faith that works through love (Gal. 5:6; 1 Thess. 1:2–3).

A personal walk with God determines the effectiveness of work for God. Christlike character is greatly needed. But the character needed comes only by grace. It is the Fruit of the Spirit, not the effect of human determination. It is best sought by humble prayer to a heavenly Father who desires to give the best of his gifts to his children.

Edward N. Gross

Christianization. See Colonialism.

Christlieb, Theodor (1833–89). Early German missiologist and missions apologist. He is remembered as the foremost promoter of the reevangelization of Germany after industrialization. He became the father of the Westgerman Evangelical Alliance in 1880 and the Gnndauer Fellowship Movement in 1888, the latter remaining the largest evangelical lay movement in the German Protestant state churches. Christlieb was one of the few Lutheran professors who favored a pietistic outlook. He was also influenced by British-American revivalism through his personal contacts during his pastoral work in London from 1858 to 1865.

Christlieb’s missiological thinking paralleled that of his associate Gustav Warneck. He was also influenced by Rufus Anderson. He met the latter in 1873 at the International Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in which he was a major speaker. He then introduced Anderson’s thinking to the German-speaking world. In 1874 he and Warneck started and edited the first journal to explore missiology as a science. In 1879 he produced the first survey of Protestant world missions entitled Protestant Foreign Missions: Their Present State: A Universal Survey. This six hundred-page volume went through several editions and was printed in all the major European languages, as were several of his works, including The Indo-British Opium Trade and Its Effect (ET 1879) and Modern Doubt and Christian Belief (ET 1874). Christlieb served from 1869 until his death as an outstanding professor of practical theology at Bonn University. From his first year at the university until his death on August 15, 1889, he incorporated missiology within his work on practical theology, and was thus one of the earliest German professors to continually integrate missiology into his teaching at the highest academic level.

Thomas Schirrmacher

Christmas Island (Australian States and Territories) (Est. 2000 pop.: 1,000; 135 sq km. [52 sq. mi.]). Christmas Island is a territory of Australia in the Indian Ocean south of Java, Indonesia. Hall of the population is Han Chinese and another 35 percent is Malay. The predominant religions are Chinese folk-religion and Islam. Only 13.6 percent are Christians. Most of the Evangelicals are Anglicans, Methodists, and a few other Protestants.

Todd M. Johnson

Christo-Paganism. Christo-paganism is a kind of Syncretism that exists and persists where the process of evangelization has been defective and incomplete, leaving the pre-Christian animistic belief-system and practices virtually intact but fused with some Christian elements.

The Australian anthropologist-missiologist ALAN TIPPETT has vividly described his own careful observation of the phenomenon in parts of Mexico and Guatemala. In these nominally Christian communities Tippett saw stark evidence of the old animistic belief-system and associated practices in the devotion of Catholic Indians of Mayan descent. He watched them on their knees approaching shrines “more Aztec than Christian,” and “others putting paper or cloth under their bloodstained [sic] knees get charged with power for magical or healing purposes,” all being done as Christian ceremony.

Tippett also discovered “Christian strands of thought” in the “dominantly animistic context,” which he found to be typically portrayed in the native Mexican autobiography, Juan the Chamula. Juan, who saw himself as a faithful Catholic, believed, among other things, that the Savior watches over people on the road. He died on a cross to save the wayfarer from the Jews, whom he equates with devils, and who were supposedly cannibalistic.

Originally the sun was cold as the moon, but it grew warmer when the Holy Child was born. He was the son of a virgin among the Jews, who sent her away because they knew the child would bring light. St. Joseph took her to Bethlehem, where the Child was born. The sun grew warmer and the day brighter. The demons ran away and hid in the mountain ravines. (pp. 21–22)

Christo-paganism may manifest a variety of elements: the survival of discrete cultural complexes; the persistence of the old mythical belief-system; the demand for a therapeutic system; and a vivid notion of the living dead. Many cases could be cited from various parts of the world, both Protestant and Catholic. Many Catholics are intensely aware of the problem; not all instances are as extreme as those mentioned above, but resemble more what DWIGHT HESSELMAN calls “multireligion.” For example, some Batak Protestant Christians in Indonesia visit the gravesites of important ancestors at Easter; they make food and other offerings to them and seek their blessing on the temporal affairs of their descendants. Those Bataks from the more profoundly converted regions shun such things. Tippett observed a vivid example of Christo-paganism in Australia: aboriginal dreamtime paintings displayed behind the Communion Table.

Such phenomena are the very antithesis of possessio, which is the investing of an existing practice with specifically and exclusively Christian significance. They represent an ANIMISM merely submerged, not replaced. The indigenous pagan culture has been suppressed by an external cultural power, not converted. The pagan worldview has been neither adequately critiqued nor displaced by a Christian one; the old associated practices have been neither converted to authentically Christian use nor supplanted by appropriate functional substitutes.

JOHN McINTOSH

Christological Controversies. Owing to the central place of Christ in Christian thought (quite different from, say, the place of Buddha in Buddhist thought), there has always been controversy over his person and work. The early centuries witnessed the rise and virtual demise of several Christological heresies which in their day threatened the developing stream of orthodoxy. The Ebionites thought of Jesus Christ as a human, Jewish Messiah, to the neglect of his divinity. The Gnostics argued that the “incarnation” was a temporary donning of human flesh, for appearance’s sake, by some deity less than the high God. The Arians conceived of the Son of God as a lesser deity. Denying the two natures, they argued that the nature of the Son took the place of the human soul in the historical Jesus Christ. By contrast, Apollinarius, while agreeing with the Arians that Christ had but one nature, held that nature to be thoroughly divine, displacing any human soul, such that the “human” properties of Christ were nothing more than the animal elements found in human nature. Monarchianism, in both its forms, preserved the unity of the Godhead by embracing merely functional distinctions between the Father and the Son, effectively denying the Son’s subsistence as God. The Nestorians, eager to preserve Christ’s human experience, effectively divided his humanity and divinity so sharply that it was difficult to see how they avoided embracing two persons.

Some of these heresies have resurfaced in new forms during the last one hundred years or so. Arianism, for instance, lies at the heart of the Christological convictions of the Jehovah’s Witnesses; some forms of New Age thought seem remarkably similar to some features of ancient Gnosticism. The reason for the chasms that divide people with one set of Christological convictions from those with a quite different set is that all sides have insisted that Christology matters. It matters, finally, for how one understands Christianity, and thus salvation itself—and therefore the church’s mission. The same sorts of things could be said about the more radical of the assorted Christologies generated by skeptical application of the historical-critical method during the last two centuries (cf. Henry; Runia).

189
Christological Controversies

But the most recent Christological controversies have been generated not so much by alternative interpretations of the sacred text, as by constructions that simultaneously recognize the validity of many elements of orthodox Christology while setting it in a framework that relativizes it. Thus Panikkar argues that, while Christ is incarnated in Jesus, Christ cannot be identified with Jesus: Christ is always more than Jesus. Christianity may have a monopoly on Jesus, but not on Christ. God has disclosed himself in Christ, or even in some cases who have repudiated Christianity as they have experienced it while accepting the (unrecognized) “Christ” in their own religious heritage.

Something similar is done with some forms of Logos-Christologies. If the “Word” is the light that enlightens every person (John 1:9), then it would be wrong to insist that Christianity has some decisive advantage. In an alternative construction, Hick argues that the only way genuine pluralism can prevail among the religions is to postulate that there is an ultimate Reality (not even “God,” since some religions have more to do with ritual and veneration of ancestors than with any deity) that stands more or less equivalently behind all religions. Thus it is entirely appropriate for Christians to worship within the framework of Christian theology; it is inappropriate for them to tell others that they ought to do so too.

In this way, some positions espoused in the most recent Christological controversies wipe out the sense of mission, classically conceived, in which Christian believers share and proclaim the good news that in Christ God is reconciling to himself a people from every tongue and people and tribe and nation. That is now likely to be dismissed as cultural imposition or, worse, colonial manipulation. The only Christological heresy left is the view that there is such a thing as Christological heresy. You may believe what you will, but you must never say that the eternal salvation of anyone is in any way tied to belief in a particular Jesus Christ.

The issues at stake are extraordinarily complex. Here it is enough to say that the exclusive claims advanced by and in behalf of Christ cannot be so easily dismissed. Despite protests, Christians who ostensibly believe in the Christian Christ while adhering to the views of Panikkar or Hick are not believing the Christian Christ at all. Some of the erroneous views are deeply rooted in demonstrably false exegesis. More importantly, “Christ” is not a cipher or an abstract notion that can be dropped into any religious structure. Jesus Christ belongs to the pattern of redemptive history that is reflected in the Bible’s plot-line. Within the meta-narrative of Scripture the biblical Christ has a coherent place. Remove him from this plot-line, and it is not the same Christ. To put it another way, one cannot properly appreciate the biblical Christ (whether to accept or reject him) apart from a firm grasp of the Bible’s story-line in which he is embedded. In that case the urgency of mission is retained.

One must also say that many Christological controversies around the world at first glance seem less traumatic, since they have to do with the attempt to anchor gospel presentation of Christ in the Scriptures while finding lines of burning relevance to local hearers. If the appeal for relevance is primary, however, the Christ we present may become domesticated to the culture. On the other hand, every generation, every culture, needs to continually ask the foundational questions regarding who Christ is, as the Bible portrays him. It is not surprising that poor believers in forsaken barrios fasten on Jesus’ sensitivity to the poor and his striking calls for justice. It is not surprising that African believers note the emphasis on the corporate nature of the people of God. It is not surprising that zealous believers in the Western tradition are struck by Jesus’ urgent calls to active mission. This may be all to the good. The test in every case is whether some elements of biblical Christology are being blown out of proportion while others are ignored. The final synthesis needs to be recognizably the Christ of the Bible. Alternatively, even if the emphases are different, there must be a humble pursuit of biblical balance in the efforts of every generation and culture of believers to articulate who Jesus Christ is, as he is disclosed in Scripture. Christological controversy that is seeking to recover the holism of biblical Christology in a world that constantly veers toward assorted reductionisms is a healthy thing.

Donald A. Carson

See also Uniqueness of Christ.

Christology. Every facet of biblical Christology could be tied to mission, in that the biblical plotline that sets out God’s mission to redeem from a lost race a vast number from every tongue and tribe and people and nation is focused on Jesus Christ, without whom the missionary plotline would be incoherent.

On the basis of John 20:21, a substantial amount of contemporary mission literature conceives of the task of mission in terms of incarnation (see Incarnational Mission). The Gospel of John is perhaps the clearest in enunciating the doctrine of incarnation, and here too the resurrected Jesus tells his disciples, “As the Father has sent me, I am sending you.”

In general terms (i.e., apart from the meaning of this verse), a link between the incarnation and mission is valuable on two fronts. Christologically, it focuses on the unique humility of the eternal Son in becoming a human being in order to perform his Father’s will, accomplish his mission, and rescue God’s guilty image bearers from sin and death. Metaphorically, it is a suggestive model of our mission: as the eternal Son entered our world to accomplish his mission, so Christ’s disciples in mission must, as it were, “incarnate” themselves into the worlds they are called to serve and evangelize.

On the other hand, it is doubtful that John 20:21 can responsibly be called on to support this emphasis. As Köstenberger has shown in exhaustive exegesis, the analogical argument in that verse draws in a major theme in the Fourth Gospel: the sending of the Son, the sending of the disciples, with entailments in the authority of the “sender” and the obedience of the one sent. John’s Gospel does not set forth our going as an “incarnation.” The observation is more than a narrow point of picky exegesis: under the guise of the “incarnation” model of Christian mission some now so focus on “presence” and identification with those being served that the proclamatory, kerygmatic, “good news” elements are largely suppressed.

More broadly, the biblical Christology that depicts Christ as both divine and human develops an awareness of the wholeness of Christian mission. This mission is God’s initiative; it is undertaken with God’s sovereign authority. Yet this mission signals more than divine presence, more than information graciously provided about this God; it signals the Son’s costly adoption of our nature, living our life and dying our death. In this light, the many chapters of the canonical Gospels that describe Jesus’ ministry during the days of his flesh betray a daunting concern for the whole human being. Addressed are questions of health, justice, integrity, marriage, generosity, family, priorities, humility, truth-telling, death, compassion, and much more. Nor is this the exclusive preserve of the Gospels. Elsewhere, for instance, Jesus’ identity with the human race not only qualifies him to be our priest and our substitute, but ensures that his own strong cries and tears make him uniquely fitted to empathize with ours, and thus also to save to the uttermost all who come to God by him (Hebrews).

Nevertheless, the wide embrace of Jesus’ concerns for broken human beings must never obscure the fact that such concerns are set within a plotline that takes him to the cross. His social and humanitarian passions cannot legitimately be given independent standing. They are tied to the dawning of the kingdom, whose consummation awaits his return, and entry into which is finally secured by the new birth (John 3:3, 5), itself predicated on the cross. The Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life a ransom for many (Mark 10:45). Moreover, substantial elements in the ethics of Jesus turn on the critical importance of living with eternity’s values in view. Thus Christian mission, while properly being wholistic, must focus on the promulgation of the good news that men and women can be accepted by God, both now and forever, because of what God has done in Christ Jesus.

Genuine Christian mission is impossible apart from genuine Christian love, and genuine Christian love is both modeled and impelled by the Father’s sending of the Son out of love for this lost world, and by the Son’s willing sacrifice on our behalf. If we are all by nature children of wrath (Eph. 2:3), God’s love for us is not a function of how lovable we are, but of how loving he is. Insofar as Christians learn to receive that love, and learn to measure their poor love by his great love, so also they begin to learn that the love that impels Christian mission grows from within (cf. 2 Cor. 5:14–15). That is precisely the reason why Paul thought of himself as a debtor to all (Rom. 1:14): always there is the debt of love to be paid, for Christ has paid it for us.

This elementary but fundamental Christology has a direct bearing on Christian mission. This is not sentimentalism, as if the cross of Christ were a symbol of love and nothing more. If Jesus’ sacrifice did not in fact aim to achieve something, then far from being an effective example of self-sacrificial love, it reduces to sheer insanity. But in fact it did achieve something: the reconciliation to God their Maker and Redeemer of a vast number of God’s image bearers, otherwise lost in pathetic and evil rebellion. In that framework,
Christology

Christ's self-sacrifice is the most staggering instance of love conceivable, both the means of our redemption and the model for our living. If that model increasingly constrains Jesus' followers, mission is inevitable.

One of the great Christological themes of the New Testament, especially strong in Hebrews 5:7, pictures Jesus as the high priest par excellence. At one level this theme is associated with the storyline of redemptive history. The Levitical priesthood is displaced by the Melchizedekian, and Jesus' priesthood is of the latter order. But if the Levitical priesthood is rendered obsolete, so also is the law-covenant that bases itself upon this priesthood (Heb. 7:11–12; cf. 8:13). Thus there is a forward movement within the biblical narrative itself.

Nevertheless, the structure of priestly service, complete with tabernacle/temple, articulated in the law-covenant is certainly not obsolete in every respect. It serves as a shadow, a model, a type of the heavenly reality (Heb. 10:1ff.). What is required for a guilty people to be acceptable to and enter the presence of a holy God is depicted in gripping, symbol-laden ritual, which in turn prophetically announces the ultimate fulfillment of the reality to which it points. The priesthood of Jesus is pictured in these transcendent terms. Precisely because it is tied to Melchizedek and not to Levi, however, its relevance is not limited to the people of the Mosaic covenant. It is also in principle open to people from every tribe and tongue.

One of the major strands of New Testament Christology pictures Jesus as the One who emptied himself, humbled himself, served obediently all the way to the ignominy of the cross—and was triumphantly vindicated (e.g. Phil. 2:6–11). The ultimate vindication occurs when Jesus returns at the end of the age. This schema provides a goal, a philosophy of history (with Jesus at the crucial midpoint and returning at the end), a telos to which history rushes. Not only is it appointed to us to die and face judgment, but there is a final and irrevocable judgment at the end of the age (Heb. 9:27–28; Acts 17:31; Rev. 22:10–11). History is not simply spinning in circles, nor are we dipping in and out of it in successive cycles of reincarnated existence.

These realities not only lend a certain urgency to the task of mission, they also provide a model: self-denial and willing self-death now, final vindication later. Effective mission can only be sustained when both of these elements prevail.

One of the core Christological confessions is that Jesus is Lord. Regrettably, this may become the merest cliché, with no discernible content to “Jesus” and nothing more than religious sentimentality connected with “Lord.” But in the New Testament, heart-belief in this truth, coupled with oral confession of it, are tied to salvation (Rom. 10:9). To confess that Jesus is Lord is, implicitly, to deny lordship to all others (cf. 1 Cor. 8:4–6; 12:1–3). In the light of Septuagint usage of “Lord,” it is also to confess the deity of Jesus Christ. One cannot responsibly confess Jesus as Lord and then deny the uniqueness that he claims for himself and that his earliest followers assigned him. Further, it is a public commitment of covenantal allegiance and loyalty to Jesus and to his teaching (for how can one responsibly call him “Lord! Lord!” and fail to do what he says?), and thus not only to enjoy the salvation he alone graciously gives but also to participate joyfully in his final and GREAT COMMISSION.

Donald A. Carson

SEE ALSO Uniqueness of Christ.

Church. One way to define the church has been to do a word study of ekklesia, the word used at least seventy-three times in the New Testament to refer to the church. “The word is derived from ek and kaléo and (speaks of) the assembly of free citizens in the Greek city-states who through a herald were ‘called out’ of their homes to the marketplace. In ordinary usage the word denoted ‘the people as assembled,’ ‘the public meeting’” (Berkhoff, 1986, 343). The term ekklesia indicated the self-consciousness of the early Christians, who saw themselves as the continuation of what God had begun in the wilderness with the nation of Israel, called together by the proclamation of the gospel for the purpose of belonging to God through Christ by the power of the Holy Spirit (see, for example, Acts 19:39). Yet a word study of ekklesia tells us little about the reason for which the group is called, the purposes and goals of the group, or the parameters that determine who is part of the group.

A second way to describe the church is by crafting a propositional definition. How we would love to have the confidence of Martin Luther who said, “Thank God a seven-year-old child knows what the church is, namely holy believers and sheep who hear the voice of their shepherd (John 10:3). So children pray, ‘I believe in one holy Christian Church.’ Its holiness . . . consists of the Word of God and true faith” (Luther’s Works, vol. xi). Hendrik Kraemer came close to Luther’s simple definition: “Where there is a group of baptized Christians, there is the Church” (The Missionary Obligation of the Church, 40). However, a purely propositional definition is not enough to show us the church’s structure, purpose, destiny, or mission. In fact, the New Testament gives us no formal definition of the church.

A third way to define the church was used by Jesus and the New Testament writers: metaphors of the church. Paul Minear demonstrated that there are at least ninety-six different images of the church in the New Testament. We are familiar with many of these, like body, temple, building, household, family, saints, New Israel, new creation, and branches of the vine. These rich images express what the church is and serve also to show what the church should become. They call the members of the church to see themselves in a new light, challenging them to become more like the members of the church to see themselves in a new light, challenging them to become more like the pictures offered.

These images are metaphors of the church in mission. Almost all the images of the church in the New Testament are not still photographs but rather moving pictures, dynamic videos of the church living out its witness in the world. For example, the church is the salt of the earth. It is the light of the world. As the Body of Christ, it is the physical presence of Jesus in the world. As a royal priesthood (1 Peter 2) the church is a priest for the Gentiles, who see the good works of the church and glorify God.

The church soon found that it needed a way to bring all the pictures together in a simple description. Shortly after the apostolic era, the church followed a fourth way to define itself by using three words that appeared in the Apostles' Creed, with a fourth added soon thereafter and institutionalized at Chalcedon. All the subsequent ecumenical creeds adopted these four marks or notes (from the Latin notae) about the church. "I believe . . . the holy catholic church, the communion of saints," is accepted by all major Christian traditions, on all continents, in all the languages of the church.

The four creedal marks of the church have tended to be understood as static adjectives modifying the church. As such, they have fostered institutionalization, maintenance, and decline in the church. Hans Küng and G. C. Berkouwer emphasized that the four marks are not only gifts but also tasks facing the church. Moltmann saw the four as descriptive of the church's solidarity with the poor. C. Van Engen and D. Guder have suggested we think of the four marks as adverbs modifying the missionary action of the church. As such, they call the church to be the unifying, sanctifying, reconciling, and proclaiming presence of Jesus Christ in the world, challenging local congregations to a transformed, purpose-driven life of mission in the world, locally and globally.

A fifth method of defining the church involves affirming a series of seemingly contradictory characteristics. When we try to describe the church we are immediately caught in a tension between the sociological and theological views of the church. The church is both divine and human, created by the Holy Spirit yet brought about by gathering human beings. The tension can be illustrated by mentioning five complementary couplets. The church is not either one or the other of these—it is both, simultaneously.

1. The church is both form and essence. What we believe to be the "essence" of the church is not seen in its forms. We believe the church to be one, yet it is divided; to be holy, yet it is the communion of sinners. We believe the essence of discipleship is love, yet we experience actions in the church that are far from loving.

2. The church is both phenomenon and creed. The church is to be believed. But what is believed is not seen. That which is perceived as a phenomenon of the visible world does not present itself as the object of our faith. The church is too often not believable. We could also use the words "Real-Ideal" or "Relevance-Transcendence" to represent this seeming contradiction. We cannot be members of an "ideal" church apart from the "real" one. The real must always be challenged and called by the ideal; the ideal must be understood and lived out in the real world.

3. The church is both institution and community; organization and organism. During the Middle Ages, the exclusively institutional view of the church took on its most extreme form. In reaction, the sixteenth-century Reformers emphasized the church as fellowship and communion. Many people feel today that we need to seek to keep both elements in equal perspective, especially when it comes to missionary cooperation between churches and mission agencies. The church is both institution and community. The community invariably, and necessarily, takes on institutional form; the institution only exists as the concrete expression of the communion of persons.

4. The church is both visible and invisible. The visible-invisible distinction has been used as a way to get around some of the difficulties involved in the first three paradoxes presented above. The visible-invisible distinction, though not explicitly found in the New Testament, was proposed in the early centuries of the church's life. The visible-invisible distinction is with us because of the reality of the church as a mixture of holiness and sinfulness. (For example, see the parable of the tares in Matt. 13:24-30, 36-43.) The distinction is important, but perhaps it must be remembered that there is one church, not two. "The one church, in its essential nature and in its external forms alike, is always at once visible and invisible" (Berkhof, 1986, 399).

5. The church is both imperfect and perfect. Luther spoke of the church as "simul justus, simul peccator," seeing it as simultaneously just and sinful, holy and unrighteous, universal and particular. But the church is not, therefore, justified to remain sinful, divided, and particular: "Faith in the holiness of the church," Moltmann said, “can no more be a justification of its unholy condition than the justification of sinners means a justification of sin” (Moltmann, 1977, 22–23).
Church

The local congregation derives its essential nature only as it authentically exhibits the nature and characteristics of the universal church. And, the universal church is experienced by women and men, witnesses to the world who give observable shape to the church only as it is manifested in local churches.

Hendrikus Berkhof called for a special visibility to see and recognize the church. The church, he said, has a threefold character, being related (1) to God as the new covenant community of the Holy Spirit, (2) to the believers as the communion of saints, and (3) simultaneously as the apostolic church sent to the world (Berkhof, 1986, 344–45). The missionary movement has been the arena where this threefold character has been given concrete shape as the church has spread over the globe, comprising now around one-third of all humanity.

A sixth way to define the church involves the actual shape which the church has taken throughout its missionary expansion around the world. During the last five hundred years there have been four major paradigms of the church in mission: colonial expansion, three-self churches, indigenous national churches, and partner churches in mission.

1. From the early 1500s to the middle of the 1800s the principal paradigm of the church in mission involved the churches of Western Europe and North America “planting” the church in Africa, Asia, and Latin America. With notable exceptions, this era could be described as a colonial competition in church cloning by Western forms of Christendom. Gisbert Voetius (1589–1676) described this perspective well when he spoke of the goal of mission being (1) the conversion of people, (2) the planting of the church, and (3) the glory of God. But Voetius was a child of his time. That which was planted was mostly carbon copies of the Western forms of ecclesiastical structures, Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and Protestant.

2. A second paradigm emerged around the middle of the 1800s when Henry Venn and Rufus Anderson proposed the Three-Self Formula as a way for the church in Africa, Asia, and Latin America to become autonomous and independent. Dominating mission theory and practice for the next hundred years, the formula stated that churches were maturing when they became self-supporting economically, self-governing structurally, and self-propagating locally. With heavy stress on institution and organization, the formula unfortunately tended to produce self-centered, self-preoccupied national churches that often turned in upon themselves and demonstrated little commitment or vision for world evangelization.

3. This tendency toward introversion of three-self churches fueled the search for what became a third major paradigm of the church’s self-understanding: indigenous national churches in mission. Beginning with Roland Allen’s call for the spontaneous expansion of the church, churches all around the globe began to see themselves as equal partners whose essential purpose was mission. In the 1920s the term “daughter churches” was used to refer to the churches in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. By 1938 at the International Missionary Council (IMC) meeting in Tambaram, Madras, India, the “older” churches and “younger” ones stressed a mission-oriented view of the church. The record of this conference, The World Mission of the Church, shows the delegates wrestling with the intimate relationship of church and mission (see also Tambaram Conference [1938]). That same year Hendrik Kraemer called for churches to move from mission field to independent church. John Nevius, Mel Hodges, Donald McGavran, and others began calling for Indigenous Churches, communions, organizations, and fellowships that would be culturally appropriate to their contexts.

Along with indigeneity, the missionary nature of the church was increasingly being emphasized. Those attending the 1952 IMC meeting in Willingen, Germany, affirmed that “there is no participation in Christ without participation in his mission to the world” (The Missionary Obligation of the Church, 3 [see also Willingen Conference (1952)]). The most complete development of this view was Johannes Blauw’s The Missionary Nature of the Church, published in 1962, one year before the newly formed Commission on World Mission and Evangelism of the World Council of Churches met in Mexico City, emphasizing “mission on six continents” (see also Mexico City Conference [1963]). The 1960s was a time of the birth of nations, particularly in Africa, terminating colonial domination by Europe. These movements began to recognize that the “national churches,” the churches in each nation, had a responsibility to evangelize their own nations. The church was missionary in its nature and local in its outreach.

4. In the subsequent forty years, the world has changed as has the world church. The fourth paradigm reflects the fact that today over two-thirds of all Christians live south of the equator. Christianity can no longer be considered a Western religion. Western Europe and North America are increasingly seen as mission fields. Nominalism and secularization contributed to these formerly mission-sending areas becoming mostly post-Christian. Meanwhile, mission-sending from the south has been increasing to such an extent that today more cross-cultural missionaries are being sent and supported by the churches in Africa, Asia, and Latin America than from Europe and North America. Thus since the 1970s the missionary nature of the church has meant that churches and mission agencies are called to partner together in a reciprocal flow of world evangelization that crisscrosses the globe. Thus the church’s nature and forms of existence have been radically reshaped by mission.

Although we know that the ideas are distinct, it is impossible to understand church without mission. Mission activity is supported by the church, carried out by members of the church, and the fruits of mission are received by the church. On the other hand, the church lives out its calling in the world through mission, finds its essential purpose in its participation in God’s mission, and engages in a multitude of activities whose purpose is mission. “Just as we must insist that a church which has ceased to be a mission has lost the essential character of a church, so we must also say that a mission which is not at the same time truly a church is not a true expression of the divine apostolate. An unchurchly mission is as much a monstrosity as an unmissionary church” (Newbigin, 1954, 169).

CHARLES VAN ENGEN

Church and State. The expression “church and state” refers to the relationship between two sets of authority structures that have shaped human existence. The concern of the state is temporal life whereas the church’s concern is spiritual life. The question as to what is the most desirable relationship between the two has been a persistent theme throughout history. The following discussion will present an overview of these historic tensions and their influence on the expansion of Christianity.

In Matthew 22:21 Jesus taught that the two structures are separate. The statement “render therefore to Caesar the things that are Caesar’s and to God the things that are God’s” distinguishes the responsibilities between church and state, but does not detail the obligations. Paul followed with instructions to Christians to “be subject to the governing authorities” (Rom. 13:1) unless the submission contradicted the Scriptures (Acts 5:29). The Pax Romana of the Roman Empire with its peace and ease of travel together with Alexander’s legacy of the Koine Greek language allowed the gospel to spread quickly over large areas. Formal missionary bands spontaneously spread the faith into Asia Minor, Mesopotamia, India, Armenia, Rome, Gaul, Britain, and North Africa. These advances were met by local and sporadic persecution by Decian (249–251), Valerian (257), and Diocletian (303), who saw the church as politically subversive.

It was not until Christianity became a state religion in the fourth century that scholars began to grapple with a clearer definition of the relationship between church and state. In 313 Christianity became an officially recognized religion and Emperor Constantine became responsible for directing the church. The temptation for the church was to lose evangelistic fervor and conform to culture rather than continuing to penetrate culture. In 330 with the division of the empire into East and West came also two different approaches to church–state relations. In the Byzantine Empire the secular ruler held absolute authority over both the church and the state whereas in the Western Empire the church had more freedom to direct its own affairs. By the fifth century the Roman popes took responsibility for civil justice and military matters.

During the Dark Ages the idea of a society with two realms of responsibility, one over spiritual and the other over temporal matters, became clearer: God ordained the state to strengthen and propagate the faith, and to protect the church against heretics. However, the tension over supremacy was always a struggle. It was during this time that monasticism responded to the increasing institutionalization and nominalism of the church. By secluding themselves for prayer and devotion lay people sought life consistent with the gospel. Committed communities formed and unintentionally produced the majority of missionaries for the next thousand years (see Monastic Movement). Monks like Benedict of Nursia preserved ancient learning and raised the level of civilization and Christian understanding in Western Europe. Beginning as peripheral renewal movements many of these monastic orders eventually became centers of power and lost sight of their original vision. Alongside the Western monastics were the Celtic missionaries. Persons like Patrick, Columba, Columbanus, Willibrord, and Boniface evangelized Ireland, Great Britain, and much of northwestern Europe and established important centers of biblical learning. These two great missionary movements were largely independent of both the institutional church and government.

After the sixth century the popes increased their power in both the spiritual and temporal spheres. Then in 800 Pope Leo III crowned Charlemagne as emperor and the event the centuries-old debate between church and state. Did the emperors receive their crowns from the papacy, or was it the emperors who approved the election of the popes?
Church and State

By the eleventh century the confrontation between the two structures reached a zenith. In 1075 Pope Gregory VII decreed that he had the divine power to depose Emperor Henry, thus declaring that secular authorities had no jurisdiction to appoint ecclesiastical positions. Although a compromise came in 1122, the issue faded only with the gradual dominance of the papacy. By the end of the reign of Pope Innocent III (1198–1216) the issue had arrived at a solution—royal power was under submission to the authority of the church. The thirteenth century saw papal power in supreme control over the state, but this was to change soon as the European monarchs strengthened their national supremacy.

The Reformation brought fresh challenge to the authority of the papacy both spiritually and politically, and further diminished the church’s control. Martin Luther did not consider ecclesiastical administration important, so many of the Lutheran states had rulers that controlled the church. John Calvin clearly differentiated between church and state by declaring that governments were to protect the church and manage society by following biblical principles. On the other hand, the Anabaptists believed that Scripture indicated the need for a complete separation of church and state, and subsequently suffered intense persecution. They believed that secular government had no authority over the religious beliefs of people and therefore the church had no right to claim financial assistance from the state. Their political views influenced other related movements in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, such as the Baptists and Quakers.

During the Enlightenment of the eighteenth century John Locke and others propagated the concept that secular government was a matter for society rather than God. Thus the institutional church gradually became dominated by rising national powers and lost much of its voice in political affairs. In the United States the founding government separated church and state to protect Religious Freedom from state intervention and to protect the state from the dominance of the church. Religion was a private matter between an individual and God, yet religion remained a part of national life. This strict separation of the two institutions was the commonly held view among Western nations of the nineteenth century.

From the beginning of this century Western countries have experienced increased social pressure to exclude anything religious from national life. They have secularized governments that want to severely restrict the influence of religion on political affairs. The influx of diverse ethnic and religious groups together with the erosion of Judeo-Christian values has amplified this call for a secularized society. On the other hand, most of the non-Western nations have not had to struggle with the theory of separation of church and state. For instance, Islam, Hinduism, and other religions dominate many nations which desire to protect their faith from secular contamination.

For modern missions the answer as to what is the most desirable relationship between church and state may be glimpsed in church history. The institutional church has always had struggles between itself and the state. Nonetheless, there is the government of God and then that of the state and the church. How that triad of tension plays out in life is sometimes difficult to determine and will vary depending on the historical and cultural context. However, the growth of the Kingdom of God over the ages has largely been achieved through a remnant of believers on the periphery of power regardless of their political or ecclesiastical status. It is in this position of faithfulness and obedience to the Lord of the church that future missionary endeavors will continue to see the expansion of Christianity.

ROBERT GALLAGHER

SEE ALSO Human Rights and Ideologies.

Church Development. Evangelical missions have always emphasized personal evangelism and starting churches (congregations) as their basic purpose. This dual purpose was formalized, and technically analyzed, in the 1960s by the appearance of what came to be known as the Church Growth Movement, initiated and pioneered by Donald Anderson McGavran. A science of church planting and church development resulted that has complemented the perennial emphasis of missions on personal evangelism. Church growth theory says that personal evangelism is incomplete if it does not gather the converts in congregations which, in turn, know how to multiply themselves. Therefore, the multiplication of churches (local congregations) is the best, and fastest, way to evangelize the world.

“Church Planting” became the technical term used to describe this category of evangelism. Mission societies and boards began to appoint “church planters” and “church developers.” Mission statements incorporated the goal of planting and developing churches in every socioeconomic and ethno-linguistic group in the world. “A church for every people” became the motto. As the missiological science developed, a concomitant emphasis emerged. How do you develop the congregation once it is planted? How do you ensure its continuing growth? How do you prevent a plateau after several years? Research, surveys, and study of these questions became a part of the church growth theory. Planting churches and developing them were seen as interdependent disciplines in the study of missiology.

As the Church Growth Movement developed and tested its theory, the term “church growth” came to mean a process of planting, developing, and multiplying churches. This process has become a unit of study in most missiological curriculums. The Church Growth Movement has had a significant, and somewhat controversial, impact on general missiology, especially in the evangelical wing of the modern missionary movement.

A perusal of the church growth literature on this subject, written by both those who espouse the movement and those who oppose it, reveals five dimensions of genuine, integral church development.

Internal church development means that the organized church has body life. The members will be growing in grace, in knowledge of the faith, in Bible study, and in Christian living. The church will be in a constant state of edification. Love, fellowship, and cooperation will be characteristics common to the church. The church will be a warm center in the community that radiates Christian love, service, and concern. Spiritual gifts will be emphasized, discovered, and used for the collective edification of all. Spiritual growth in discipleship will be evident. Worship and praise will be fleshed out in sacrificial service and stewardship. This internal growth is a sine qua non for the other dimensions of development.

Centripetal church development means the church is reaching out to its community. The members will be trained to witness as individuals, and collectively, to the unchurched of the community. Evangelistic activities will be perennial. People will be added regularly to the membership not only by transfer, or by biological growth, but by conversion. A constant numerical growth will be expected and experienced. In other words, people will be attracted to the church by its reputation of internal growth and by its intentional efforts to reach them with the gospel. The internal growth will not lead to spiritual introversion, but will be a catalyst to numerical growth. Nongrowth will be a curable disease.

Centrifugal church development means that the church will try to reproduce itself, or multiply itself. It will try to become the mother of another church. It will extend itself into other areas of its field, and use its membership to start missions in sectors of its society unreachable by its normal program. It will even be willing to sacrifice some of its own members to form a nucleus for a new congregation. A really growing church will not be content to just grow larger; it will try to give birth to other churches. This multiplication principle will many times prevent the customary “plateau syndrome,” experienced by so many congregations after ten or twelve years of life.

Cross-cultural church development means that the church that tries to multiply itself in a pluralistic world will inevitably confront the cross-cultural challenge. A sector of the field of the church will be the home of a different socioeconomic, or ethno-linguistic people group. The church will want to penetrate that group and try to start a church within it. The pluralistic nature of most communities today guarantees this encounter. The church will seek the means to evangelize within the other culture.

If there is no cross-cultural group in the area, then the church will want to seek ways to create world awareness among its members. Each local congregation should be aware that it is a part of the universal church of Jesus Christ and his world mission. It will initiate activities that will involve it in the world mission of its denomination. It will participate through missionary education, prayer, sacrificial giving to missions causes, and cooperation in world missions projects. In this way the church will avoid ethnocentrism and see itself as a part of the universal community of Christ.

Influential church development means that the church growing in the four dimensions will be able to have a greater impact on the larger society in which it operates. A loving, caring, growing church will demonstrate the characteristics of Christ’s kingdom and will gain the favor of the community. In this way it, and its members, can have a more positive influence on the political, economic, and social aspects of its field of service.

In summary, authentic church development will be integral, involving simultaneous growth in all five dimensions. Any church that continues to grow bigger without at the same time growing better by expanding its base to care for the numerical increase will face serious consequences. Balance is basic for genuine church development.

JUSTICE C. ANDERSON

Bibliography. V. Gerber, God’s Way to Keep a Church Going and Growing; M. Hodges, Growing Young Churches; D. A. McGavran, How Churches Grow; idem, Understanding Church Growth; D. Miles, Church Growth: A Mighty River; E. C. Smith, Balanced Church Growth.

Church Discipline. The practice of church discipline is mandated in the New Testament teaching of Christ and modeled in Acts and the Epistles. Inherent in the implications of the commission to "make disciples of all nations," church discipline is the responsibility and ministry of the local church to its members. Whether the gentle admonition of an erring Christian brother (Gal. 6:1) or the dramatic action of excommunication of a persistently unrepentant member from the fellowship of a local church, the need for the church to monitor and care for its own is clearly taught. While formal disciplinary procedures become the responsibility of the church gathered, church discipline begins with a direct and personal appeal of a Christian brother by another who has been sinned against. Christ's teaching recorded in Matthew 18:15–17 outlines the procedures to be followed in the process of confronting a fellow believer. It should be noted that this passage allows the use of a mediator for the private confrontation in cultures where mediators are a necessity in conflict resolution. If a personal and private appeal goes unheeded, it is to be followed by the direct confrontation by the personal testimony of one or two other witnesses. In the case of continued refusal to acknowledge wrongdoing, a public exposure before the gathered church is to culminate in exclusion from the worship and fellowship of the body.
Church Discipline

Biblical examples of discipline are found in churches planted by Paul and in the exercise of his apostolic authority. The specific offenses mentioned include blatant moral sin (1 Cor. 5:1–13), idleness and disregard of apostolic instruction (2 Thess. 3:6), and doctrinal deviation (1 Tim. 1:19; 2 Tim. 2:17–18). The purpose and goal is always the full restoration of the sinning member and the purity of the church (1 Cor. 5:6–8; 2 Cor. 2:6–8).

Church discipline is a doctrine difficult to teach and practice, especially in cross-cultural or multi-cultural mission contexts. Theological, cultural, and practical issues and problems must be considered when seeking to teach and implement the biblical principles and practice of discipline.

The problems of nominalism, SYNCRETISM, and CHRISTO-PAGANISM which have plagued the Christian church wherever it has been planted, are directly addressed by the practice of church discipline. New converts who have been properly taught and held accountable by other mature and consistent Christians and church leaders are generally more likely to make a break from past non-Christian practices. But the practical matter of who should be considered a "member" of a local flock and thus subject to the privileges and responsibilities of church fellowship, including submission to church discipline, has proven to be problematic in many instances. An observed trend in contexts where different denominational churches have been planted is for converts under discipline in one church to escape to another rival fellowship which may have a very different view of church discipline.

Teaching church discipline in a cultural context in which well defined TABOOS exist can prove to be both a help and a hindrance in teaching biblical church discipline. While the idea of being responsible to the community for one's actions is understood, problems may arise in understanding the biblical concepts of SIN and the related purposes of church discipline.

The punishment and payment demanded for breaking a taboo must be distinguished from the restorative purpose of church discipline based on the biblical doctrines of sin, atonement, justification, and sanctification. Any prevailing notion of payment of a penalty to restore harmony or work of penance for an offense must be countered in teaching the biblical purpose and practice of church discipline.

In cultures where face saving is a high value, confrontation about sin becomes a serious breach of cultural values and is often avoided at all costs, especially in the case of another tribesman or a leader. In such cases cultural values dictate that GUILT before God is not as important as the potential of SHAME before people, even for leaders of the church who may have misused their authority and committed sins demanding the imposition of church discipline. In many of these cultures, a hierarchical leadership style is customary and the leader, including the pastor or church authority is to be highly honored and implicitly obeyed. Cases of the misuse of church discipline for the purpose of manipulation, control, imposing authority, and forcing submission on the flock are not uncommon in such situations. Abuses of ecclesiastical power, especially in the use of church discipline, are not new, as a study of church history reveals. The truth of the corporate nature of official church discipline usually is lost in such cases.

For many churches in Africa, the problems of adultery and polygamy are prevalent and yet are extremely difficult to adjudicate in reference to church discipline. Cultural marriage customs (e.g., levirate marriage, see MARRIAGE; MARRIAGE PRACTICES) may create situations which demand wisdom and skill to determine a resolution which will maintain the integrity and purpose of the practice of church discipline (as do divorce cases in other settings). The practice of some churches is to exclude from the rite of communion disciplined members discovered to have sinned and then restore them after one month of probationary observation and abstinence from the forbidden activity. The propensity of this procedure to lead to legalism has prompted one veteran missionary in Africa to call the practice of church discipline "the first really significant heresy which the African churches are in a position to produce" (Trobisch).
Some of the problems experienced in the implementation of church discipline in mission contexts may be a result of the culturally conditioned practices of sending churches, missionar-ies, and sending agencies. A failure by sending churches to model church discipline at home or with erring missionaries has caused confusion for the younger churches. Reluctance of some early church planting missionaries to entrust the function of church discipline to national leaders of the churches they planted has been misunder-stood and resented. Yet experience in places like New Guinea has shown that biblically trained and spiritually mature leaders of the indigenous church are often more discerning than the expatriate missionaries of the cultural, theological, and practical issues in cases needing discipline and wisdom in the application of the biblical in-junctions. Teaching biblical truths concerning church discipline is the function of the church, not an individual. Understanding that church discipline is a means of preserving and protecting the purity of the body can help ensure appropriate application of this crucial doctrine, in every cultural context in which the Christian church is planted.

RICHARD D. CALENBERG

Church Growth Movement. Church growth is that discipline which investigates the nature, expansion, planting, multiplication, function, and health of Christian churches as they relate to the effective implementation of God’s commission to “make disciples of all peoples” (Matt. 28:19–20).
Students of church growth strive to integrate the eternal theological principles of God’s Word concerning the expansion of the church with the best insights of contemporary social and behavioral sciences, employing as the initial frame of reference the foundational work done by DONALD MC-GAVRAN.

This is the classical definition of church growth, although it has been altered and adapted by several leaders since it was first formulated and incorporated into the by-laws of the AMER-ICAN SOCIETY OF CHURCH GROWTH. It is important to note that the defining focus of the church growth movement is evangelization. The most restrictive clause, which separates the church growth movement from other affinity groups, is the explicit recognition of the founder, Donald A.
McGavran. Not all church growth advocates adhere to the entire corpus of McGavran’s teaching, but all work out of the research paradigm that he established.

Donald McGavran, after spending thirty years as a field missionary to India with the India Mission of the United Christian Missionary Society related to the Disciples of Christ), experienced a growing frustration with the progress of the mis-ionary enterprise as he was able to observe it.
He was appalled, for example, when he reviewed the records for his mission in the early 1950s and found that they had spent $125,000, but they had added only a total of fifty-two members to the churches. He began to think that there must be a better way to do missionary work.

After a vigorous process of research and analysis, McGavran published The Bridges of God in 1955 (see BRIDGES OF GOD), which became the Magna Carta of the church growth movement. Its empirical background had been initiated by Methodist Bishop Wascom Pickett’s research on what were called in those days “Christian mass movements” in India. McGavran was the person who used the label “church growth” to describe the missiological paradigm he was developing.
The accepted date for the beginning of the church growth movement is 1955, the year of the publication of The Bridges of God.

Over the next fifteen years (1955–70), Mc-Gavran took several very important steps to solidify the movement. (1) He entered into voluminous correspondence with the leading missiologists of the day, dialoguing in depth on the cutting edge missiological issues of the day. (2) He continued his research and published the first edition of Understanding Church Growth with Eerdmans in 1970. This remains an irreplaceable textbook for serious study in the field of church growth, and it is already acclaimed as a missions classic. Eerdmans published a revised edition in 1980, and in 1990 the current edition, revised and updated by McGavran’s disciple, C. PETER WAGNER, was published. It has been in print for almost thirty years.
(3) McGavran relocated from India to the United States and engaged in extensive itinerant teaching, communicating the principles of church growth to thousands of leaders. (4) Recognizing that an educational institution would be necessary to solidify the movement, McGavran founded the Institute of Church Growth in 1961 at Northwest Christian College in Eugene, Oregon. By 1965 McGavran and his church growth movement had been so widely recognized as a historic innovation in missiological principles and practice, that he was invited to become the founding dean of the Fuller Theological Seminary School of World Mission and Institute of Church Growth in Pasadena, California. Fuller Seminary, therefore, became the institutional center of the movement, with the missiological base being the School of World Mission and the application to American churches in the church growth major of the Fuller Doctor of Ministry program initiated by Wagner in 1975.
Church Growth Movement

The major contributions of the church growth movement to twentieth-century missiology can be summarized under four sets of principles.

Theological Principles. McGavran’s field experience came at a time when liberal Christianity was in its heyday. Mission was seen as fulfilling the CULTURAL MANDATE, giving a cup of cold water in the name of Jesus, promoting social justice, and helping Muslims and Buddhists to become better citizens. Advocating CONVERSION to Christianity was widely frowned upon as being manipulative PROSELITISM. McGavran countered this by advocating that the central purpose of missions was to be seen as God’s will that lost men and women be found, reconciled to himself, and brought into responsible membership in Christian churches. Evangelism was seen not just as proclaiming the gospel whether or not something happened, but as making disciples for the Master.

Ethical Principles. McGavran’s results-oriented approach provided fodder for debate on a number of ethical issues, some of which continue today. He became alarmed when he saw all too many of God’s resources—personnel and finances—being used without asking whether the KINGDOM OF GOD was being materially advanced by the programs they were supporting. McGavran demanded more accountability in Christian stewardship. He wanted efforts evaluated by their results. His attitude reflects these words of WAS-com Pickett: “It is disturbing to read book after book about modern missions without finding so much as a hint about either what helped or what hindered church growth. In many books the author seems eager to prove that the missionaries have done everything according to God’s leading and that if no church has come into being it means only that God’s time for saving souls has not come.” “The disciples’ duty is to sow the seed and leave it to God to produce.” How different this is from the command of Jesus, “Make disciples of the nations!”

Missiological Principles. McGavran’s major missiological principle is people movement theory (see also Peoples, People Groups and People Movements). Before the days of the conscious application of CULTURAL ANTHROPOLOGY to MISSIOLOGY, McGavran intuitively recognized the fact that DECISION-MAKING processes are frequently quite different from one culture to the next. Whereas most Western missionaries and their converts were preaching an individualistic gospel and expecting unbelievers to come to Christ one by one against the social tide, McGavran concluded that this was not the way that multitudes could or would come to Christ. Important decisions, according to the WORLDVIEW of many non-Westerners, were community decisions. Therefore, the best way to approach many of the world’s people with the gospel had to be through the encouragement of multi-individual, interdependent conversions whereby members of families, extended families, clans, villages, and tribes would often become Christian at the same time. This process was labeled a “people movement” (see Mass Movements). An important corollary of McGavran’s people movement theory is the HOMOGENEOUS UNIT PRINCIPLE.

Procedural Principles. The distinction between what McGavran called “discipling” and “perfecting” is his key procedural principle. He observed that discipling is best seen methodologically as a distinct stage of Christianization as over against perfecting. While the terminology has been updated by some, the principle remains intact. Discipling brings an unbelieving individual or group to initial commitment to Christ and commitment to the body of Christ, which is the church. Perfecting is the lifelong process of spiritual and ethical development in the lives of believers (called “discipleship” by some). McGavran warned that too many mission activities had been diverted to perfecting when the original mission charter demanded discipling. He never tired in pointing out that a full 70 percent of the world’s population had not been discipled, and he constantly urged Christian churches worldwide to get on with sending out more laborers into the harvest fields.

The church growth movement has spread worldwide through McGavran’s disciples and through the graduates of the Fuller Seminary School of World Mission where courses in church growth have been mandatory. Courses in church growth are now taught at major institutions where evangelistically oriented missiology is a major component of the curriculum.

C. Peter Wagner

Church Leadership. See LEADERSHIP.

Church Mission Society (CMS). Major evangelical Anglican missionary society. Founded under the name of “the Society for Missions in Africa and the East,” it officially became the Church Missionary Society in 1812, and took its present name in 1995. Set up by members of the Established Church of England (Anglican), its first field was Sierra Leone and its first missionaries German Lutherans, recruited through the Swiss BASEL MISSION (because no ordained Englishmen offered) and sent there in 1804. In 1809 English laymen sailed to New Zealand. In 1814 German and English workers were sent to South India, and the first ordained British missionary arrived in Malta.

By the 1850s CMS missionaries had gone to some fifteen territories, although in some (such as Canada) this was for limited periods. In many cases British colonies were the chosen fields, and Sierra Leone and Nigeria in West Africa and Uganda and Kenya in East Africa, with India and Ceylon, became and have remained major areas of concentration. China, Japan, and Middle East nations also received CMS missionaries, and in New Zealand it provided most of the ordained clergy for the Anglican Church that developed there. In almost all these areas diocese were set up and episcopal churches established, their first bishops usually former CMS missionaries. The first non-Western bishop in a CMS area was Samuel Ajayi Crowther of Western Equatorial Africa (Nigeria), consecrated in 1864. Unlike a number of missionary societies, CMS had no founding figure among its overseas personnel; its general or clerical secretaries probably exercised the greatest influence, and the names of Reverend Josiah Pratt (1802–24), Reverend Henry Venn (1846–72), and in this century Canon Max Warren (1942–63), and Reverend John V. Taylor (1963–74) are especially remembered.

In 1921 a new venture, which became the CMS Ruanda General and Medical Mission (now Mid-Africa Ministry), emerged as a daughter society, and in 1922 after long discussions and negotiations a more theologically conservative group broke away and founded the Bible Churchmen's Missionary Society (now Crosslinks). CMS, however, began and has continued as a specifically Evangelical Anglican sending society.

In the mid-1900s, as it approached its bicentenary, the British Church Mission Society had more than two hundred men and women serving abroad. There were daughter sending societies in Ireland, Australia, and New Zealand. The greatest areas of concentration have been Nigeria, East Africa, and Pakistan; newer work is in eastern Zaire, Nepal, and Eastern Europe. Mid-Africa Ministry (CMS) has over forty personnel serving in Uganda, Rwanda, Burundi, and Zaire. In recent years much emphasis has been placed on bringing national workers to Britain for further education and training.

As a society CMS sent single women abroad comparatively early; the first long-serving woman went to Calcutta in 1822. By the end of its first century, 1899, 550 women had gone abroad, compared with 1,556 men; this of course does not take wives into account. The present general secretary is a woman.

JoceLYn MurRAY

Church Missions Conferences

Church Missionary Society. See Church Mission Society.

Church Missions Conferences. The widespread sponsorship of mission conferences by local churches reflects the significant role played by the local church in world missions. Although the primary purpose of church mission conferences is educational, they are also used as a catalyst for increasing prayer and financial support for missionaries.

The essential character of church mission conferences has changed little since the nineteenth century. Although there is some variation among denominations, most conferences feature (1) one or more speakers, often furloughed missionaries; (2) meals that include an inspirational or educational program focused on missions; (3) a mission-related children's program; (4) a pledge drive for the church's yearly missions budget; and (5) a motivational call to support missionaries through prayer or to volunteer for missionary service.

In the decades following the Second World War, North American churches such as The People's Church of Toronto and the Park Street Congregational Church of Boston were notable for sponsoring large-scale mission conferences lasting a week or more and involving speakers and exhibits from a wide variety of missionary agencies. These influential conferences provided a prototype for other evangelical churches. Also helpful was the establishment of the Association of Church Missions Committees (ACMC, now Advancing Churches in Mission Commitment) in 1974, which led to the publication of materials that outlined a systematic approach to planning and implementing mission conferences. In recent years, church-sponsored conferences have also been influenced by innovations in electronic media and communications technology. Contemporary mission conferences may include feature-length films, videotapes of missionaries at work, computer-generated presentations, and live telephone or video links with missionaries on the field.

Church mission conferences vary in size and duration, from the annual weekend conference in a single church to larger conferences involving a network of churches in a geographical area. In the round-robin model, a group of churches alternate the leadership of the conference with the site changing from year to year. The Concerts of Prayer movement has stimulated interdenominational collaboration among churches, with emphasis on prayer for missionaries in particular areas of the world. The manner in which financial support is raised for missions also varies. In churches where missions are included in the overall budget (or in a larger denominational budget), the primary goal of the conference is often to educate the congregation about how finances are spent and to stimulate prayer for missionaries. In contrast, the faith-promise model of giving separates the church’s missions budget from the regular budget. Churches following the faith-promise model often use an annual mission conference to challenge embers to give to missions in excess of their regular church pledge. A third approach is the single offering, exemplified by the Southern Baptists’ annual Lottie Moon Offering, which raises support for the denominational mission budget. In some churches, the mission conference may include a single offering for one or more missionaries serving with Faith Missions or for a specific mission-related project.
Church Missions Conferences

As the primary means of contact between missionary candidates or furloughed missionaries and the average church attender, church mission conferences play an understated but critical role in contemporary world evangelization. ALAN A. SEAMAN

Bibliography. M. Collins and C. Blackburn, Missions on the Move in the Local Church; ACMC, Your Church: Planning a Missions Conference.

Church of Jesus Christ Latter Day Saints. See Mormons.

Church Planting. Church planting has become the most frequently used term for starting new churches. By definition church planting can be described as the effort to bring men and women to faith in Christ and incorporate them into growing, reproducing Christian fellowships. Far from denominational aggrandizement, church planting seeks to extend God’s kingdom through fantastically multiplying churches. Church planting has become the most frequently used term for starting new churches. PETER WAGNER calls church planting the world’s single most effective evangelistic method. DONALD A. MCGAVRAN contends that the only way Christian missions can meet the expanding needs of the fantastically mounting populations of the world is by providing fantastically multiplying churches. Church planting’s importance rests on several foundations. It reflects biblical patterns. Luke recorded the amazing expansion of the New Testament churches, moving from recounting the increase in numbers of members to the fact that the number of congregations “multiplied” (Acts 9:31). The Bible, in both direct teaching and overall principles, includes teaching on both the why and the hows of church planting. Church planting also augments evangelism and church growth. Studies show that new congregations evangelize more effectively than older congregations, as new congregations put more energy into growth and less into maintenance.

Additionally, church planting promotes geographical and people group expansion. New churches are demanded to reach both geographical regions and people groups. New housing areas and underchurched regions demand new churches. It becomes increasingly clear that the churches of the fathers do not always reach the sons and daughters. The present diversity of people (and peoples) demands a diversity of churches; this diversity can only be provided by the unlimited multiplication of churches. Church planting also satisfies critical needs. Some declare that we already have enough churches and rather than starting new congregations we should build up the existing groups. The truth is that seldom are there enough churches to meet community needs. Most often, differing groups of people cannot be adequately served by existing churches.

Finally, church planting strengthens Christian witness. Starting new churches not only helps Christianity progress; the ministry contributes to the spiritual progress of existing Christians. Opportunities for spiritual ministry expand with the starting of new congregations.

Obviously, church planting is an imperative action for effective church or denominational growth.

The Methods of Church Planting. Study of church planting demands attention both to why and to how—considering the types of and the direct steps to new churches.

Church planting models can follow either the modality type or the sodality type. Modality models involve a local church giving birth to a new congregation. The church plant might be accomplished by sending out a group of members to become the nucleus of the new group. This model, sometimes called colonization, usually achieves extension growth. Extension growth usually reaches the same type of people served by the parent church.

Sodality models involve church starts by an agency other than a local church. The planting agency might be a parachurch organization, a church-planting team, or an individual church planter. Sodality models may produce a congregation much like the founding entity, but might result in bridging growth, which produces a congregation for a different kind of people, such as a congregation for persons of different ethnic groups or socioeconomic strata.

Church planting generally follows a pattern of persuading, preparing, and producing. The first step of church planting, persuading, consists of convincing churches and persons that planting is called for. Persuading begins with spiritual dynamics of prayer, God’s will and call. Church planting, a spiritual undertaking, requires the power of the Holy Spirit.

A second phase in persuading for church planting relates to creating a climate for church planting. Not every Christian or every church member is convinced of the need for or advisability of new churches. Every church, denomination, or other church-planting entity should have some group that will lead the entity in extension efforts. This group, which may be a missions committee, a church-planting task force, or a planning committee, guides the church-planting entity in committing resources to starting new churches.

The second step of the church planting process, preparing, begins the actual process of starting the church. A first phase of the preparing step relates to establishing goals. Goals relate not just to the determination to start churches, but include plans for specific kinds of churches. Goals also consider the areas for new churches. These plans should be based, when available, on the soundest data from demographic research materials.

The study of the areas for the new church seeks to ascertain the need for and possibilities of a new church. The area must be cultivated, that is, contacts made with the people in the community to ascertain needs and make known the nature of the new congregation. Meeting places should be sought.

The third step in church planting, producing, relates to actually beginning the church. Bible study groups and evangelistic efforts instigate the actual meetings of the church.

The producing step must lead to establishing the church both in the eyes of the members themselves and of the community. Eventually, the church will have to secure facilities. Care must be taken, however, so that provision of facilities does not consume the time and energy of the new congregation that should be expended in continuing growth. The church-planting effort includes care for achieving continuing growth. New churches should continue to grow in number of members, quality of life, and eventual reproduction.

Conclusion. Church planting remains a central interest and activity in missions. Almost every community in the world needs more churches. To remain faithful to the Lord of the Harvest, churches must emphasize vast efforts toward forming new congregations. The GREAT COMMISSION demands the constant provision of churches into which disciples can be incorporated and developed.

SEE ALSO Church Growth Movement; Saturation Church Planting.

Church Polity. Missiologists have noted that in one way or another Christians in every generation have debated the relationship of church government structure and mission. As A. F. Glasser notes, the question at issue is, “What is the relationship between the church’s structured congregations, ruled by its ecclesiastical authorities, and those mission structures within its life directed by others, whether voluntary or authorized, whereby the gospel is shared with non-Christians and new congregations are planted?”

The three basic understandings of church polity are the episcopal, presbyterian, and congregational forms. There are some shared aspects, or factors of overlap, among these three approaches. In addition, it should be realized that there are hybrid understandings employed by some smaller groupings or individual congregations.

From the standpoint of the practical implementation of missions, the key issue is where the authority resides. Is it centralized in a centralized agency, with final funding authority, or is the impetus with a local congregation or congregations, with local authority and financial support? In the episcopal form of church government, the key office is the bishop (the traditional English rendering of the Greek episkopos, though it has been translated “overseer” in several more recent versions). Episcopal polity draws a distinction between the bishop and the New Testament office of elder or presbyter (presbuteros), even though certain passages appear to use the terms interchangeably (Acts 20:17, 28; Titus 1:5, 7). Adherents to the episcopal form of government primarily appeal for support to the tradition of distinguishing the offices of bishop and elder that developed during the earlier centuries of church history. There is also no clear New Testament basis for the position of archbishop (or, in the polity of the Roman Catholic Church, cardinal or pope).

In episcopal polity, all major authority is held by the bishopric. Hence, decisions on missionary personnel and programs are ultimately under the control of the church hierarchy. Financial support is undertaken from a centralized fund. A notable exception has been the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY, which has operated as a semiautonomous mission agency within the purview of the Church of England.

In the presbyterian form of church polity, the focal office is the elder. In many churches with presbyterian polity, there is also the office of deacon (diakonos), with different service functions. The group of elders (1 Tim. 4:14) is sometimes called the presbytery (more commonly, the session). Usually, though, the presbytery speaks of the meeting of a group of pastors and elders from churches within a limited region, a meaning that is plausible in 1 Timothy 4:14.

Presbyterian polity grants the major authority to the church session and presbytery. Thus, even though there is a hierarchical element in making decisions related to mission, the authority resides closer to the local church with presbyterian churches. Support generally goes through a less centralized common funding agency than under the episcopal structure.

In congregational churches, each local congregation is ultimately only responsible for itself. Though congregations often cooperate in many diverse programs, the overall program (or denomination) does not have the final say. The key officials are usually the deacon (Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:8, 12) and the pastor (who is often thought of as a single elder or overseer). Based either on one way of understanding 1 Timothy 3:8 and Romans 16:1 or instances in church history, many churches also have the office of deaconess.

Under congregational polity, each local church appoints missionaries and provides direct (or earmarked) support for the mission candidates. Even though some congregational circles have very large centralized candidating, training, and funding agencies, such as the Southern Baptist Foreign and Home Missions Boards, participation is not mandatory for each local church body.

Perhaps the best way to gain insight regarding the relationship between church polity and mission, however, is to observe the unfolding of these themes side by side in the New Testament. Foundationally, in Matthew 16:18 the Lord Jesus made his epochal promise “I will build my church.” Then, the capstone of Matthew’s Gospel is the Lord’s missionary command to “make disciples of all nations” (28:19).

At first glance, the nature of the relationship between the church and mission is not transparent. However, in the Book of Acts, “church” and “disciples” become basically interchangeable terms. Also, the only New Testament use of “make disciples” (matheteuo) outside Matthew’s Gospel is in Acts 14:21, strongly implying that, for Paul and his missionary colleagues, making disciples (v. 21), then organizing churches (v. 23), were two sides of the same coin.

There is another sense in which this largely overlooked passage is crucial. Elders are the only church officers mentioned in the new churches founded near the end of the first missionary journey (Acts 14:23). This same single-level approach to church government in newer congregations is also in evidence in Titus 1:5—9, in the churches on the island of Crete (v. 5).

On the other hand, older (and presumably larger) churches in the New Testament appear to have a two-level church polity. Both the Philippian church and the church at Ephesus that Timothy ministered to had been in existence for a decade or more and were led by both overseers (elders; Acts 20:17, 28) and deacons (Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:1–13).

Thus, it seems that as the New Testament churches grew from newer and smaller congregations to much larger, more mature ones, there was not one static, monolithic understanding of church government. Rather, there was the flexibility in polity to accommodate such growth, as well as to continue to stimulate further healthy growth.

The dynamic of Evangelism and Church Planting and ensuing growth, which has emerged as a strong missiological emphasis in the past decades, is clearly at the very heart of mission. Therefore, questions related to church polity must never be divorced from carrying out Christ’s Commission (Matt. 16:18; 28:19–20).

A. Boyd Luter

Church/Mission Relations. As old as the Acts of the Apostles, relational issues between the church local and the church itinerant (missions) have been an important focus in Christian history. Acts 13–15 includes seminal passages describing the commissioning and ministry of Paul and Barnabas as missionaries sent out by the church at Antioch. The passage describes the supremely important Council at Jerusalem, which set the pattern for addressing cultural issues in the ever-increasing expansion of the church. The key issues of “Who sends the missionary?” and “What kind of accountability of them is appropriate?” find their answers in these passages.

Paul and Barnabas, the archetypal first missionaries sent out by the postresurrection church, provide a pattern that is most instructive. On the issue of sending, it is clear from Acts that they received both an internal and an external call to itinerant cross-cultural ministry to Gentiles. The elders in Acts 13 conclude “It seemed good both to the Holy Spirit and to us” to commission Paul and Barnabas for this ministry. And so they did. And as Paul and Barnabas went they kept in mind the importance of their sending and prayer base, and the need to be accountable to it. Their return visits and reports (Acts 14 and 18) are clear testimony to this. At the same time, they functioned quite independently under the Holy Spirit’s guidance in determining both the itinerary and methods of their missionary work.

The tensions that have existed in the modern period in church-mission relations have centered primarily on these same ancient issues, “Who sends the missionary?” and “What constitutes an appropriate system of accountability?” For some, the issue is described in strictly theological terms: local churches ought to send missionaries, and the only reason mission agencies even exist is because the churches fell down on the job. For others, the issue is more complex. While agreeing with the principle that the local church is the sender of missionaries, some point out that agencies are the necessary bridge to doing that with accountability and effectiveness. Were there no agencies, they argue, the churches would just have to invent them again. Both logistics and appropriate accountability require it, they say.

Supporters of the agency model point out that Paul and Barnabas were their prototype, sent out by the local church but self-governing under the leadership of the Holy Spirit in both their strategy and methodology. Accountability consisted in reporting back, not in getting prior approval. While faxes and the internet did not yet exist, it seems unlikely that on-the-spot decision making would have been overruled in any case. They seemed to operate on the assumption that the church itinerant is also part of the universal church, even if it is not everything that the church in its local manifestation encompasses. That it is, rather, a transcultural bridge, in symbiotic relationship with the local church of the present, but also with the local church of the future. The fact that they appointed elders as they went certainly seems to indicate as much.

Most notable among those advocating the “two-structure” approach has been missiologist RALPH WINTER, whose 1974 modality/sodality framework is the most extensive treatment of this subject. Bruce Camp, writing in 1995, provides a rare theoretical challenge to this view.

Our own day has seen a number of new entities and models directly relevant to church and mission relations. The ministry of ACMC (Advancing Churches in Mission Commitment, originally the Association of Church Mission Committees) over the last two decades has been a strategic attempt to help local churches take their responsibility in the world mission enterprise more seriously. It has done much to enable them to become more than simply disbursers of money. Other entities, such as the Antioch Network, have endeavored to link churches in mission, particularly the plethora of burgeoning new mega churches. At the same time, progressive agencies are working hard to genuinely serve the churches, recognizing that effective communication has sometimes broken down and an unwholesome dichotomy has developed.

The turn of the twenty-first century will be an interesting time for discerning how church and mission relations in North America ultimately evolve. New models and hybrids of models are almost certain to emerge.

GARY R. CORWIN

Circumcision. See INITIATION RITES.

Clapham Sect. A group of wealthy Anglican evangelicals who lived in a suburb of London in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. Influenced by the evangelical revivals, they worked for the extension of evangelical Christianity throughout the world and labored for social reform in England. John Venn was their rector; their best known lay leader was William Wilberforce. They helped establish the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY in 1799 and the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1804.

The group cooperated with dissenting or non-Anglican evangelicals in establishing chapels in many parts of England and helped fund the training of pastors. Wilberforce led the campaign in Parliament that abolished the slave trade in 1807 and ended slavery in the British Empire in 1833. Their projects for social reform included the regulation of factory conditions, the improvement of treatment of the mentally ill, sailors, chimney sweeps, the unemployed, and individuals who had been imprisoned for small debts. They promoted schools for the poor and provided funds for Sunday schools. They inspired a later generation of nineteenth-century reformers, including Lord Shaftesbury, William Booth, and Florence Nightingale. They integrated their evangelical faith, their commitment to mission, and their concern for social reform.

PAUL E. PIERSON

Clark, Charles Allen (1878–1961). American missionary to Korea. Born in Spring Valley, Minnesota, he was educated at the University of Minnesota, Macalaster College, McCormick Theological Seminary, and the University of Chicago. He was sent to Korea by the Presbyterian Church U.S.A. after his ordination in 1902. With Seoul as the center of his labors until 1922, he studied Korean, worked in a hospital, did bookkeeping, wrote tracts, taught school, managed property, and pastored the Central Church. Following the principles laid out by John Nevius, the church grew rapidly, and he opened several preaching stations. He once had charge of forty-five country churches as well as his city church. In 1908 he also began to teach homiletics and pastoral theology in the new Pyeongyang Seminary. He served as a pastor and continued to itinerate even after moving to Pyeongyang in 1922. He was president of the seminary (1933–39) when it was closed due to a Shinto shrine controversy. He continued to teach and to preach until he returned to the United States in 1941. Back home he revitalized six churches in Oklahoma and became pastor of three of them. He was a prolific writer and translator, producing seven of his own books in English and forty-two in Korean. An extraordinarily effective missionary, he baptized over three thousand persons, planted fifty-three churches, and helped give the Korean church its constitution, conservative theology, and evangelistic zeal.
Clark, Charles Allen

Albert H. Freundt Jr.

Bibliography. A. D. Clark, History of the Korean Church; C. A. Clark, The Korean Church and the Nevius Method, Religions of Old Korea.

Clough, John Everett (1836–1910). American missionary to India. Born near Frewsberg, N.Y., he spent his youth in Illinois and Iowa where he graduated from Burlington Institute and Upper Iowa College. Converted to Christ while in Burlington, he later received ordination as a Baptist minister in 1864. A year later, he arrived in south India as an ABFMS missionary to the Telugu people.

Clough began his ministry at Ongole in present-day Tamil Nadu. During his long tenure, the Baptist mission, previously considered a failure, experienced remarkable growth. The conversion of a low caste leather worker led to over 3,000 converts by 1867, mostly among the outcaste Madigas. A major turning point for the mission came with the famine of 1876–78. Participating in a government relief project for the suffering, Clough gained permission from British authorities to oversee construction of four miles of the Buckingham Canal. Giving hiring preference to Christians, they also helped supervise the more than six thousand workers. During this time, he refused to baptize new believers lest their conversions be for the wrong reasons. He changed this policy in July 1878 and in a single day, 2,222 were baptized and received into church membership. A Mass Movement had begun and within months thousands of converts had been baptized; the total reached 21,000 by 1883. At his final departure from India in 1910, the Baptist mission to the Telugus had 60,000 members.

Gary B. McGee

Cocos Islands. (Australian States and Territories) (Est. 2000 pop.: 1,000; 14 sq. km. [5 sq. mi.]). Cocos (Keeling) Islands is Australian territory comprised of a group of twenty-seven islands in the Indian Ocean. Sixty-five percent of the inhabitants are Malay in origin and another 20 percent are Anglo-Australian. The majority are Muslims and about 24 percent are Christians. Evangelicals are limited to a small number of Anglicans. No other Protestants work on the islands.

Todd M. Johnson

Codrington, Robert Henry (1830–1922). English missionary to Melanesia. Codrington was an outstanding example of the nineteenth-century scholar missionary. Born in Wroughton, Wiltshire, England, Codrington studied at Charterhouse and Wadham College, Oxford, graduating B.A. 1852, M.A. 1857, and Hon. D.D. 1885. He was ordained an Anglican priest in 1857 and worked in the diocese of Nelson, New Zealand (1860–64). Bishop Patteson encouraged him to transfer to the Melanesian mission, and in 1867 he became headmaster of St. Barnabas’s School on Norfolk Island, which served as the central training institution for the mission. After Patte-son’s death in 1871 Codrington declined the invitation to become bishop, serving as acting head of the mission until 1877. Described as genial and erudite, Codrington won the friendship and respect of the Melanesian students and learned a great deal from them about their beliefs and customs. His pioneering linguistic and anthropological writings, The Melanesian Languages (1885) and The Melanesians (1891), reflected his systematic scholarly and his desire to understand Melanesian society from within. He expounded the classical concept of mana. Codrington was influenced by the High Church Anglican tradition and believed that all religions had some truth. While he was critical about aspects of Melanesian customs, he adopted a sympathetic and respectful approach to them. He produced A Dictionary of the Language of Mota (1896), and in 1912 completed the translation of the Bible into Mota, which served as the mission’s lingua franca. In 1887 he retired as a missionary and worked in the diocese of Chichester in England.

Allan K. Davidson

Coillard, Francois (1834–1904). French pioneer missionary to southern Africa. His father died when Coillard was only five, but his resourceful mother became a housekeeper for several years to earn enough and keep the family together. At the age of eight he entered a Protestant school in preparation for ministry. Monsieur Ami Bost, his pastor, kindled Coillard’s two great passions—church music and missions. After seven years of formal education at Strasbourg University, followed by seminary in Paris and eight months of training at La Maison de Missions in Paris, Coillard became burdened to go where no one ever wished to go. Since French Protestants were unwelcome in French colonies, the PARIS EVANGELICAL MISSION SOCIETY had only one field in the yet uncolonized Basutoland, where Coillard would serve for the next two decades (1857–77).

Prior to his departure to Africa, he met a young woman from Scotland, Christina Mackintosh, who was instantly drawn to him and his deep calling to missions. She followed him to South Africa, where they were married on February 26, 1861, in Cape Town.

In 1866 the Boer wars forced the Coillards’ expulsion from Basutoland, but eventually they returned. Inspired by Livingstone, he set out in 1878 to explore and evangelize in the region of the Zambesi River. In 1889 the Coillards and their entourage journeyed to Zambesi and established several missionary stations. They encountered witchcraft, slave traders, and many other hardships. Madame Coillard died on October 28, 1891, after thirty years of marriage. Coillard served in the region of the Upper Zambesi until his death.

Bibliography. C. W. Macintosh, Coillard of the Zambesi.

Coke, Thomas (1747–1814). Welsh pioneer of Methodist missions. Born in Brecon, Wales, into a well-respected family, he received a doctorate in civil law from Oxford. A sincere Anglican churchman, Coke came to realize that religion had to do with the heart as well as the mind. The new fervor that resulted brought about his dismissal, and he joined the Methodists, becoming JOHN WESLEY’s closest associate. Coke assisted Wesley in preaching, visiting Methodist societies in England, Scotland, and Ireland, presiding over conferences, and giving legal assistance to the Methodist movement. As his focus upon the world enlarged, so did his fire for missions. In 1783 he helped draw up the first plan for organizing the growing Methodist Church there. He continued his involvement in mission within the British Isles, oversaw personally the mission work in the West Indies, and carried on administrative and literary work and preaching. His missionary vision stretched beyond western continents to Africa and the Far East, and during the final decade of his life new fields of missionary activity opened up in these areas. In 1814, while leading a missionary band on a voyage to India and Ceylon, he died and was buried at sea.

Coke was not only a preacher of missions, but poured his own financial assets and very life into the endeavor. Long known as the “father of missions” within the Methodist movement, his influence upon American Methodism is second only to that of FRANCIS ASBURY, with whom he co-founded the Methodist Episcopal Church of America. Next to John Wesley, he is considered the most significant and formative figure in Methodism’s first hundred years.

Collectivism. See INDIVIDUALISM and COLLECTIVISM.

Colombia (Est. 2000 pop.: 37,822,000; 1,138,914 sq. km. [439,735 sq. mi.]). Colombia, the fourth largest country in South America, is located in the northwest corner of the continent with coasts on both the Pacific Ocean and the Caribbean Sea. It is bounded by the Andes Mountains in the west; plains and forests in the east. Of its population of 37.8 million, 98.6 percent speak Spanish. The indigenous Amerindians, speaking some 65 languages in 12 language groups, form .78 percent of the general population. Urbanization is over 70 percent.

The Roman Catholic Church. Following the period of the Spanish military conquest (1500–50), a series of papal pronouncements delegated spiritual responsibilities to the Crown. Several Spanish clergy, including St. Luis Beltrán and St. Pedro Claver, attempted to protect both Indians and black slaves from cruel treatment. During the colonial era (1550–1810), the Spanish established parishes, provided education for the upper classes, and founded universities and hospitals. Little attempt was made to translate the Bible into indigenous languages and, until recently, its use among the laity was not encouraged by the clergy. From 1610 the Inquisition effectively prevented the development of non-Catholic religions.

Colombia established its independence from Spain in 1819. Internal political struggles between the anticlerical Liberals (who favored a more open society) and Conservatives (supporters of the Catholic Church) spawned a period of civil wars between 1853 and 1866. They ended with a Conservative victory and the pro-clerical Constitution of 1886. The Church signed a concorded between Colombia and the Vatican and enjoyed great political and spiritual advantage until 1930, when Liberals regained power. The Catholic charismatic movement emerged and peaked in the 1970s, with an emphasis on spiritual renewal and Bible study. The Church today claims 93 percent of the population, though statistics reveal that 70 percent never attend Mass.
Colombia

The Evangelical (Protestant) Churches. After independence (1819), the Inquisition was abolished. Itinerant Bible sellers (colporters; see Colportage) entered, the most notable being James Thomson who founded a chapter of the Bible Society in Bogotá in 1825. Formal Protestant ministry began with the arrival of a North American Presbyterian missionary, Henry B. Pratt, in 1856. Early Protestant efforts faced great resistance from the dominant Catholic milieu. Strategies included wide Bible distribution and the founding of schools.

After the turn of the century, the Presbyterians were joined by new entities such as the Gospel Missionary Union (1908), The Bible Society (1912), the Christian Missionary Alliance (1923), and the Cumberland Presbyterians (1927). In 1930 a Liberal government was elected and a widely read publication described Colombia as the least evangelized South American country. Response to both opportunity and challenge brought 20 groups between 1930 and 1948, including the Assemblies of God (1932), World Evangelization Crusade (1933), Plymouth Brethren (1933), the Assemblies of God (1932), World Evangelization Crusade (1933), Plymouth Brethren (1933), the Latin America Mission (1937), the Southern Baptists (1941), and the Interamerican Mission (OMS; 1943).

Continual Catholic opposition culminated in the terrible years of La Violencia (1948–58), in which the “evangelicals” (as most Protestants are called) were identified with the Liberals and suffered vast destruction of church and school property. Some 120 were killed, and many had to flee for their lives. The evangelical church was purified, strengthened in its resolve to evangelize, grew in numbers, and experienced deep unity. For mutual support and protection, the evangelicals formed the Evangelical Confederation of Colombia (CEDEC—now known as CEDECOL), which at present embraces over fifty denominations.

In 1968, 80 percent of the evangelicals united in a year-long outreach known as Evangelism-in-Depth, which combined evangelistic efforts in the local church plus large united campaigns. Church planting in Colombia has included social, medical, and educational ministries in both rural and urban areas. Evangelicals sustain several printing houses, indigenous publications, radio stations, and more recently, high quality programs on national television.

The Wycliffe Bible translators and New Tribes Mission have pioneered work among the Indian communities, though their efforts are greatly hindered by the ubiquitous presence of guerrillas. During the 1980s and 1990s, several missionaries were killed.

Bible institutes and nonformal training opportunities are multiplying. The Biblical Seminary of Colombia (Medellin) and the Baptist Seminary (Cali) are the best known institutions that provide theological education at the university level. The Pentecostal and charismatic movements have grown notably and count among their numbers the largest denominations and churches. Large independent congregations flourish, some attracting thousands. Increasingly churches are found among the middle and even upper classes. Almost exclusively national figures have replaced missionary leadership.

From 1958 to the late 1990s evangelicals grew eightfold. Approximate calculations indicate an evangelical presence of about 5 percent in Colombia distributed among 150 denominations and over 5,000 congregations. About 1,000 foreign missionaries serve in the country. Some 600 pastors meet in over 50 church associations.

Colombian mission agencies have also merged, including COMIBAM (Latin American Missionary Committee in Colombia). Together, they promote the involvement of nationals in cross-cultural missionary efforts. At present evangelicals support thirty-four missionaries outside of Colombia and eighteen cross-cultural workers within the country.

Colombia, at the turn of the century, finds itself in the grip of violence, with guerrilla, para-military groups, and the army in frequent combat. The drug trade continues. The government is plagued with corruption. New Age ideas attract the middle class; Satanism and witchcraft are rife. While old traditions are fast falling, it is a time of unprecedented openness to the gospel.

Jack Voelkel

Bibliography. P. Johnstone, OW; R. Wheeler and W. Browning, Modern Missions on the Spanish Main.

Colonialism and Missions. Some have accused the missionary movement of simply serving as the religious side of nineteenth-century colonialism, as an attempt to impose “Western religion” on Asia and Africa along with political and economic domination. But the truth is far more complex. At times missionaries arrived before the colonists, at times with them, and at times later. But it is clear that the missionary movement lived in uneasy tension with colonialism, having very different goals. Hence, at times missionaries found themselves in conflict with European settlers or colonial governments; at other times they believed that European control brought the best hope for peace, stability, and protection of the native populations.
The missionary movement had its roots in the eighteenth- and nineteenth-century revivals. Consequently, its primary concern was evangelism, but it also had a powerful humanitarian focus, with especially strong opposition to slavery (see Abolitionist Movement). At the same time the revivals affirmed the values of liberal democracy and Western culture, seeing them as basically Christian, and believing with most Europeans and Americans that the tide of history was taking Western institutions to the rest of the world. Thus most missionaries, even the most vociferous critics of the abuses of colonialism, believed the system to be consistent with the Christian faith. In this they shared the naiveté of their contemporaries.

The complexity of the relationship may be seen in the case of William Carey, Adoniram Judson, and the East India Company. The Company denounced Carey’s venture in the British Parliament and refused him residence in Calcutta, forcing him to live in Serampore, a Danish colony. When Judson was not allowed to remain in Calcutta he went to Burma, where after a few years he was imprisoned during the Anglo-Burmese War as an English spy. Thus the missionary was often caught between two opposite forces, distrusted by both.

Two dominant motifs appear in this complex relationship. First, to the missionaries, evangelism was most important. This concern for the advance of the gospel determined varying political responses by the missionaries in widely different contexts: sometimes they favored colonialism, sometimes they did not, depending on what seemed to be most advantageous for their mission. Second, most missionaries defended the indigenous peoples against the exploitation of European commercial and political forces. This, too, led them to a variety of attitudes in different situations. But it is clear that colonial governments and European settlers were interested in stability and profits, while the missionaries had different goals. To further complicate the picture, at times the European traders and settlers were at odds with their own governments, which in some cases attempted to curb the worst exploitation of indigenous populations. And often different mission groups found themselves on opposing sides of issues. For example, Anglicans, coming from the established church in England, were more apt to favor imperialism than were English non-conformists. American missionaries, espousing the separation of church and state, were often naive in thinking they were nonpolitical. They usually supported American policies, especially in the Philippines after the Spanish American War, despite the brutality against the Filipino independence movement. But they often encouraged the aspirations of nationals for independence in colonial lands. In India the British required American missionaries to sign a pledge promising no involvement in Indian political affairs.

The attitudes of colonial governments varied. The British refused to allow missionaries to work in northern Nigeria, fearing it would antagonize the Muslim rulers. The Dutch encouraged mission work among animists in parts of Indonesia (hoping it would aid in their control) but refused to allow work among Muslims in Java. On the other hand, the British gave grants for education in India and nearly every mission school benefited.

The clash between colonialism and missions can be seen in the case of India. When Carey campaigned against infanticide and suttee, the Hindu practice of burning widows with the bodies of their husbands, the East India Company opposed him, believing that interference with such customs would threaten stability and put profits in peril. Other missionaries criticized the British government for collecting taxes from Hindu pilgrims, which were then used to support Hindu temples. But the ambiguity of the relationship is seen in the fact that Carey eventually accepted an appointment to lecture in Indian languages at the Company’s college, using the income to support Bible translation and distribution. When direct British control was substituted for Company rule the Serampore missionaries and others expressed their belief that it would bring great temporal benefits. The fact that it opened India to evangelization and Western education and ended certain inhumane practices were no doubt factors in this evaluation.

Baptist missionaries to Jamaica were told to have nothing to do with political affairs (i.e., slavery) but their experience with the plantation system led them to call it the “offspring of the devil.” Thus the planters perceived the evangelical missionaries as a threat to the stability and power of their society. Missionary Christianity was a challenge to colonial oppression. Some missionaries urged slaves to be obedient to their masters, believing that the progress of Christianity would lead to the end of slavery. But after a slave revolt, Baptist missionary John Smith was blamed and condemned to death on scanty evidence, dying in prison before a pardon from the king arrived. The situation became worse and in 1832 fourteen Baptist and six Methodist chapels were destroyed by enraged whites over the issue.

The ambiguity may be seen further in Central Africa, where missionaries encouraged British control, believing it was the greatest protection against the slave trade by Arabs, Portuguese, and others. Livingstone’s belief in “commerce and Christianity” represented an antislavery ideology, the hope that commerce would introduce prosperity and thus end the slave trade. In the 1820s LMS missionary John Philip, working in a context of violence between settlers and native peoples, became an advocate of the Xhosas, his influence being decisive in a reform giving them legal status. This incurred the rage of both English and Boer settlers. The Wesleyans had different views at some points but both missionary groups wanted British rule because they believed it would bring security and the benefits of British law to the native peoples. In midcentury another LMS missionary, John Mckenzie, working farther north, advocated British rule because he believed it to be better than either of the possible alternatives in that fluid and chaotic situation: white supremacist Boer rule or the imperialism of Cecil Rhodes.
Colonialism and Missions

At times the missionaries expressed strong opposition to colonial policies. At the turn of the century two American Presbyterians published articles condemning the exploitation of African rubber workers in the Congo, calling it “twentieth century slavery.” The case brought international attention, the missionaries were sued for libel, and the suit was finally dismissed. Some improvement in the treatment of the African resulted, but the case created tension between the Belgian and American governments. After World War I, with nearly all the land in Kenya in the hands of English settlers, Africans were forced to work two months each year on settler lands, leaving their own crops unattended and families unprotected. While some missionaries believed the Africans should be compelled to work as part of the “civilizing” process, others disagreed. Strong protests came from two Anglican bishops and the Church of Scotland mission, reinforced by J. H. Oldham, a leader in the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL, who denounced the practice as immoral. As a result the government order on native labor was withdrawn in 1921. Two years later, Oldham’s influence was decisive in a declaration of the Colonial Office, that the “interests of the African natives must be paramount,” over against settler demands. Yet Oldham and others were not opposed in principle to white rule or settlement, but idealistically if naively believed the empire could be justified on the basis of a harmonious partnership between all groups. In contrast, the Scottish mission in Malawi worked for its independence, and was noted by an African writer as perhaps the only case of pursuit of equity in a colonial cause by a group who were members of the imperial power.

The case of the “Opium Wars” with China also illustrates the ambiguity. The opium trade and the two wars of economic aggression (1839–42 and 1858–60), were strongly criticized by the missionary community as unjust. Yet when China was opened to Europeans, and thus missionary residence, as a result, and Christians were promised protection, nearly all missionaries saw this as a providential act of God, who had used the “wrath of man” for his purpose. They naturally believed that the greatest blessing that could come to China was the gospel and soon sent large numbers of missionaries under the umbrella of the “unequal treaties” which had been imposed on the Chinese.

Thus it is clear that most missionaries supported colonialism even as they fought against its abuses. They recognized its achievements. One wrote, “Gone is the slave trade and intertribal wars. A new era of civilization has dawned for Africa.” But if they often failed to see the negative aspects of colonialism, they contributed to its destruction by refusing to accept the idea that non-Westerners were genetically inferior, believing there was no obstacle to their reaching the standards of any other people if evangelical Christianity was accepted. And the liberal education and new ideas introduced in mission schools were an important factor in generating nationalistic movements in a number of Asian and African countries, leading to their independence and thus, the end of colonialism.

Paul E. Pierson

Colportage. The practice of selling or giving away small portions of Scripture or gospel tracts. The idea (and word) comes from France, where col (neck) and porter (to carry) were combined to refer to peddlers who carried packs of their wares for sale around the countryside. According to the Oxford English Dictionary, the term was used in English by 1796. Providing an alternative to those who had no access to bookstores or other outlets for religious literature, colporteurs were employed by missionary agencies (especially Bible Societies) and traveled mostly rural areas selling or trading for their products.

In the United States, the main promoter of colportage was the American Tract Society, which began colportage work in 1841 with two men in Indiana and Kentucky. Just a decade later, over 500 were employed by the ATS in colportage work, most of it in the American west and south. However, as towns and churches were developed, the need for colportage in the United States diminished, and the work dried up there shortly after the turn of the century.

While the need for colportage was diminishing in the United States, however, it was peaking in many other parts of the world, where access to printed literature was limited. At its height, the British and Foreign Bible Society listed some 55 countries where colportage was used as a means of Scripture distribution. Colportage was used widely in Latin America, China, the Middle East.

Colporteurs, mostly males, were hard-working and firmly committed individuals who were willing to walk seemingly endless miles and face severe persecution in the hope of bringing the Columbanus (c. 543–615). Irish monastic missionary to Europe. Though little is known of his early life, Columbanus was purportedly a strong, good-looking man who may have entered monastic life in part to escape the temptations of the flesh. He actually called himself Columba, but historians often refer to him by the Latin spelling to avoid confusing him with the earlier Irish missionary by the same name. He was one of the most important missionaries in the Celtic Missionary Movement. His efforts, coming after Ireland and Scotland had been reached and the Anglo-Saxon work was well established, focused on the areas that were to become France, Switzerland, and Italy. They had been reached for Christ once before, but had reverted to paganism. Though foundations of Christian influence still survived, those foundations were in desperate need of shoring up.

Columbanus is perhaps best remembered for founding influential monasteries and developing a strict set of monastic rules that affected monasteries throughout France for centuries. The first monastery he founded was in Luxeuil in the northeast part of the country. He lived there from the time of its founding (c. 590) until 610, when he was expelled by political leaders whose goal was to deport Columbanus and his twelve Irish companions back to Ireland. The boat that was to take them to Ireland, however, ran aground before they were picked up. Departing from Luxeuil, the company traveled through northern France, then along the Rhine River, down through western Switzerland (where Gall parted from the company because of illness and later founded his own significant monastery), and finally into northern Italy, where Columbanus established another monastery at Bobbio that in the Middle Ages became a center of scholarship.

Bibliography. W. H. Marnell, Light from the West: The Irish Mission and the Emergence of Modern Europe.

COMIBAM. This is the acronym for Cooperación Misionera Iberoamericana (Ibero-American Missionary Cooperation), a cooperative network among the various national missionary movements that exist in Latin America. Most of these are integrated by Christians committed to the evangelization of unreached peoples. The objective of COMIBAM is "to glorify God in awakening and developing the missionary vision and action to all the nations in the local churches of Ibero-America [Latin America and Spain], and to serve as a link of cooperation between the different missionary efforts."

A significant element in COMIBAM is the goal of having in each Spanish- or Portuguese-speaking country a contextualized missionary movement with its own specific characteristics. The 印刷的圣经到人们，否则他们永远都无法阅读。更进一步，技术的进步使得圣经的分布更加广泛。例如，在一个未知的日期，一个走运的巡游者，基督教的使命仍然欠他一笔债务，因为这些人对那些他们所信仰的神圣教义的智慧是无价的。实际上，Columba被称作摩西，因为他拒绝接受他家乡的国王的王冠，而选择了号召。Columba在伊奥纳岛建立了一个修道院，据说他有十二个爱尔兰僧侣定居在那里，开始了他的传教工作。在他离开这个世界的时候，他在伊奥纳岛的修道院里度过了他的晚年。他被驱逐的目的是将Columbanus和他的十二个爱尔兰僧侣遣返回爱尔兰。这条船在他们被捡起之前已经搁浅了。虽然离开Luxeuil的船没有被救起，但Columbanus和他十二个爱尔兰僧侣在离开爱尔兰的途中，仍然沿着莱茵河，通过西部瑞士（Gall在那里），最后到达北部意大利，哥伦班斯在那里建立了另一个修道院，班比奥。”

Columba of Iona (521–597). Irish missionary to Scotland. Columba was born in Ireland of royal lineage through both parents. In accordance with his royal status, he benefited from the care of a priest and was brought up in the Christian faith. As a young man, he entered a monastery; he was ordained a deacon and later a priest. Between 545 and 562 Columba founded numerous churches and monastic societies, the chief centers of education. Legends and traditions surrounding much of Columba’s life, including his departure from his homeland at the age of forty-two. Whatever the actual precipitating circumstances, he, with twelve Irish monks, settled on the small island of Iona, where he established his headquarters for the missionary work to which he devoted his remaining years. There he founded a monastic community, an Order not for solitaries but one that provided training for evangelists sent to preach the gospel, build churches, and establish other monasteries. Securing good relations with King Brude enabled the Ionia community to work among pagans in the western highlands of Scotland.

Of equal concern to the Ionia Christians was the copying of Scripture. Columba himself is said to have written out over three hundred copies of the Vulgate and the Psalter. Only a few hours before his death, at the age of seventy-six, he was engaged in copying the Psalter.

The influence of the founding abbot of Iona and his community spread beyond Scotland to many parts of the British Isles, Europe, and Iceland. Columba, known as “the Apostle of the Western Isles,” has also been called “the Moses of Iona” because, like Moses, he refused to take his place among royalty and chose rather the call of service to a higher King. One biographer claims that one cannot truly understand the history of the Scots without knowing something of the man Columba. Life of Columba, written by Adamnan, his eighth successor in the abbacy of Iona, is considered more of a hagiography than a biography.

COMIBAM

organization was the result of the First Ibero-American Missionary Congress, held in São Paulo (Brazil), in November 1987. In the 1980s a growing number of evangelical churches began to be more aware of and active in intercultural and transnational missions. The idea, however, was not to develop a mere extension of the work that established denominations were already doing around the world, but to promote the Christian testimony to unreached countries and peoples.

As an expression of this movement and as a way to promote its growth, a group of leaders met in Mexico City, summoned by CONELA (Latin American Evangelical Confraternity), with the purpose of organizing the first Ibero-American Missionary Congress. From its beginning, COMIBAM was more than an event. It was a movement that fostered vision and challenge for the involvement of Ibero-Americans in world missions. About 3,300 persons registered in this Congress, coming from twenty-five Ibero-American countries and thirty-five other countries in the world. The emphasis of COMIBAM is not so much on evangelization inside one’s own culture, as on intercultural evangelization. COMIBAM has already produced an important amount of literature on intercultural missions and has organized several missionary congresses and conferences at national, regional, and continental levels, particularly in Latin America.

Pablo Deiros

See also Latin American Mission Boards and Societies.

Comity. A concept derived from the general principle that mission groups ought not to compete with one another. The method used to promote this concept was to make one agency responsible for evangelism in a particular territory or among a particular people. Double occupancy of a region, with the exception of big cities, was to be avoided.

Historically the term owes its origin to the late-nineteenth-century missionary conferences (for and by missionaries, with some nationals participating as guests) that took place first in Asia, and then in a less extensive fashion in parts of Africa and Latin America. The first such conference, the “General Conference of Bengal Protestant Missionaries,” took place in Calcutta in 1855, and was followed by numerous regional and national conferences over the next half century, leading up to the great World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh (1910). The establishment of the principle of comity in missions was one of the most outstanding results of these early conferences.

The need for comity arose because missions entered many territories in a rather haphazard fashion, with frequent chaos and overlap. The resulting waste of limited resources was widely abhorred, as was the confusion caused to those newly receiving the gospel. Because the good stewardship of personnel and money was a universal ideal among the various societies, the principle of comity quickly gained broad acceptance. Verbal and personal agreements among missionaries became the order of the day, with missions agreeing not to open up work in areas where another mission was already established.

While this approach led ultimately to what mission historian R. Pierce Beaver called “de-nominationalism by geography,” there was a general expectation that many emerging churches would likely join together after the missionaries moved on to other regions. This has, in fact, often happened. At the same time, the levels of cooperation comity required often spilled over into other mission spheres as well.

On the whole, the system worked well as long as people stayed where they were. However, as greater mobility for purposes of work and education became the norm, the system increasingly showed its limitations. Its chief legacy in evangelical missions circles is in the courtesy and cooperation shown among agencies in discussing future plans and in not duplicating existing efforts.

Gary R. Corwin

Commission on World Mission and Evangelism. At its Accra 1958 meeting the International Missionary Council voted for integration with the WCC. The hope was that this action would put mission at the center of the WCC agenda. A primary motivation for merger was that many member organizations of the IMC, though founded as missions, were now free-standing church bodies in their own right that wished to relate to other churches as churches and not through mission agencies. Moreover, insofar as the original vision for unity was driven by a missionary imperative, it was logical that concerns for mission and unity be combined within one body. The union of the two bodies took place at the New Delhi Assembly of the WCC in 1961.

To further the work of mission, the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism (CWME) was established. Its mandate was “to further the proclamation to the whole world of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, to the end that all men may believe in Him and be saved.” There was particular emphasis on the need for outreach evangelism by the local church. The commission was to assist churches throughout the world to “bring the Gospel to bear upon situations where there is no effective witness to Christ,” and to secure coop-
Commitment

Mission and evangelism, as envisioned by the WCC, must be both holistic and relevant to the local situation. This means that evangelism can never be divorced from issues of social responsibility, and that the way in which the gospel message is both presented and lived out must always be related to the struggles of the poor, the oppressed, and all who are in any way hurting.

Attempts are also being made to distinguish between true evangelism and proselytism, which is regarded as unethical. The complaint here is against those groups that show little respect for the existing Christian witness in an area. Proclaiming and living out the gospel is of course beyond reproach. What is objected to is the deliberate attempt to unsettle the faithful of historic churches who are diligent in their Christian life. When they are induced to change religious affiliation by offers of material betterment, including technology, scholarships, and the like, the practice is even more objectionable. By contrast, there has recently been increasing response to the demand for true evangelism, which is preceded by serious study and evaluation of both culture and context. A prime example is the message of the Salvador Conference (1996) “that the gospel, to be most fruitful, needs to be both true to itself and incarnated or rooted in the culture of a people.”

JOHN H. Y. BRIGGS

Commitment. Commitment, when used in the context of missions, evokes a picture of the last session of a missions conference in which someone responds to the call for missionary volunteers. But biblical commitment is much broader and deeper than that. It is the mark of every true disciple: unconditional commitment to the lordship of Jesus Christ. That means all of life—vocation, possessions, relationships, talk, play—is fully at God’s disposal. And since God loves the world, the true disciple will too. So every member of the body is supposed to be a world Christian. If not, someone is in rebellion or ignorant. But biblical commitment is not just passive—it is proactive, an eager listening for God’s call, a searching for God’s will, an involvement in God’s cause of world evangelism whatever the location or vocation.

The response at the end of the missions conference, though, is also commitment. It is a choice to obey God’s call to a very special vocation that is at the cutting edge of God's purposes for world redemption. For some this call is an extraordinary revelation of God's will like Paul on the road to Damascus. For others it is the culmination of following God's ordinary leading in life, one step at a time, like Barnabas. For both, however, there comes a time when a verdict must be rendered: Do I obey God's call to missionary vocation? To say "yes" at that point is commitment. And such commitment is essential when the missionary hits the tough times, for only the one who is confident of God's call will stick it out.
Commitment

Because we live in an era when commitment to anything or anyone is not considered worthy of an independent person in control of his or her own destiny, bent on finding personal fulfillment, the ancient call to commitment may be more difficult to accept than in earlier days. Perhaps that is why the volunteers are so few and the dropouts so many. But God still expects commitment, unconditional and irrevocable, both for the one whom he would call to special missionary service and for every true disciple.

ROBERTSON MCQUILKIN

The Commonwealth of Independent States. The Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) is a loose, fragile federation linking twelve of the now-independent republics of the former Soviet Union—all but the three Baltic republics. Member states include Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Ukraine, and Uzbekistan. Although people of Slavic stock make up over 70 percent of the combined population—concentrated especially in Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus—all together the CIS is home to nearly 600 distinct people groups, approximately half of which have been only minimally reached with the gospel. While over half the CIS population is nominally Christian—mostly Russian Orthodox—active believers are few, and, although estimates vary widely, evangelicals probably make up only between 1 and 2 percent of the population, half of them being in Ukraine alone. Most are either Baptist or Pentecostal. Approximately 20 percent of the people in the CIS are nominally Muslim, the majority following a highly animistic variety of folk Islam. And, of course, after more than 70 years of communist suppression of religion, millions are atheists or agnostics.

It was in A.D. 988 that Eastern Orthodoxy was first introduced into what eventually became the Russian Empire, and it was long taken for granted that to be Russian or Ukrainian was, by definition, to be Orthodox. Protestantism had little impact until the latter half of the nineteenth century, when increasing numbers of Slavs began coming to Christ through the influence of German Mennonites and Baptists and, especially in St. Petersburg, of the Plymouth Brethren. Two main denominations emerged, the Baptists and the Evangelical Christians; but under the czars Protestants were allowed little freedom. They actually experienced greater freedom during the first twelve years of communist rule, between 1917 and 1929, when their number swelled to 500,000, including a growing number of Pentecostals. But then, under Stalin, repression became intense, driving the church largely underground. In 1944, after being forced to form a single church union, Protestants were again given very limited permission to function. They experienced no real freedom, however, until the late 1980s, when communism began to crumble.

After the Soviet Union finally collapsed in 1991, changes of monumental proportions emerged on the religious scene. At least on paper, for the first time ever, most people in the CIS were granted religious liberty. National believers organized hundreds of indigenous mission societies. Although most are quite small and limited in their geographical focus, a few, such as the Rovno, Ukraine-based Light of the Gospel Association, regularly send evangelists and church planters thousands of miles to initiate Christian witness in some of the least evangelized areas of the former Soviet Union. A wide variety of other indigenous parachurch organizations has also emerged, focusing on such areas as publishing, prison ministry, children's work, and humanitarian assistance.

Local evangelical congregations began to multiply, increasing in number from about 3,000 in 1990 to as many as 10,000 by the late 1990s. During the communist era, Moscow had only one legally functioning evangelical congregation; by the late 1990s there were more than 300. Evangelicals from other parts of the world launched an unprecedented evangelistic blitz. Several hundred mission agencies and countless local churches sent workers by the thousands to take advantage of the new freedoms and of people's apparent spiritual hunger. By the late 1990s it was estimated that nearly 6,000 foreign missionaries were serving in the various republics of the CIS—the majority on short-term assignments, but nearly 2,000 serving longer term. And, significantly, several hundred of these missionaries were non-Westerners—from South Korea.

After decades with no evangelical institutions of higher learning, new schools proliferated, numbering more than 100 by the late 1990s. While many of these Christian colleges and Bible institutes are quite small and are struggling to maintain academic standards, several are having a significant impact on the entire CIS. Leading institutions include Donetsk Christian University (specializing in the training of indigenous missionaries) and Odessa Theological Seminary in Ukraine and, in Russia, St. Petersburg Christian University and the Russian-American Christian University in Moscow (focusing on the preparation of Christians for involvement in secular society).

The Fragmentation of the Church. Until the 1990s, divisions among evangelicals were relatively few. Under communist oppression, they tended to preserve unity as much as possible. Now, however, older denominations have begun to experience a measure of fragmentation, while both nationals and foreign missionaries have established scores of new church bodies. There has been considerable debate between those Westerners who advocate coming alongside the existing churches and those who argue that because the traditional churches are sometimes legalistic and out of step with contemporary culture, new wine should be poured into new wineskins.

Relations with Russian Orthodoxy. Western evangelicals working in the CIS are sharply divided as to the appropriate stance to be taken toward Russian Orthodoxy. The majority eschew any cooperation with the Orthodox Church, arguing, among other things, that Russian Orthodoxy seems to teach salvation by works and that it is dominated by ritualism and even superstition. However, a sizable minority of evangelicals working in the CIS argue that a renewed Orthodoxy is, in fact, the best hope for evangelizing that vast region. The Orthodox Church itself is ambivalent about any sort of cooperation with evangelicals. Most Orthodox reject Protestant Christianity out of hand as being heretical and incompatible with Slavic culture, but some Orthodox leaders have been more open to evangelical offers of cooperation and assistance.

Cooperation with Westerners. National believers tend to be quite ambivalent in their attitude toward Western missionaries serving in the CIS. While appreciating some of the resources and new ideas Westerners bring, nationals understandably resent the tendency of Westerners to stay for too short a time, to be woefully ignorant of the local language and culture, to fail to contextualize their message, and to pay insufficient attention to existing national church structures and leaders.

Threats to Religious Liberty. Although the Russian Constitution guarantees religious liberty, Orthodox leaders have repeatedly called for severe restrictions on the activities of both foreign and indigenous Protestant organizations, and in several regions of the Russian Federation local governments have unilaterally begun to suppress evangelical activities. Religious liberty has been more consistent in Ukraine but is limited or nonexistent in most of the other CIS republics.

Communication

Communication. Communication is the missionary problem par excellence. The word comes from the Latin word communis (common). In order to fulfill the Great Commission a "commonality" must be established with the various peoples of the world—a commonality that makes it possible for them to understand and embrace the gospel of Christ. Accordingly, when Hendrick Kraemer sought to place questions having to do with the missionary task in a "wider and deeper setting" than that afforded by alternative words, he chose the word "communication."

From very early days the progress of the gospel has been aided by the communication skills of its proponents. One thinks immediately of John the Baptist's preaching in Judea, Peter's sermon on Pentecost, and Paul's ministry to the Gentiles. Jesus was a master communicator. However, a tension is introduced at this point because the New Testament makes it clear that human wisdom and communication skills are not sufficient to draw people to Christ and advance his kingdom (cf. 2 Cor. 2:1–6). Though the Lord Jesus commissioned the apostles to discipulate the nations by preaching and teaching, he commanded them to stay in Jerusalem until empowered by the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:8). Elenetics, the "science of the conviction of sin" (Herman Bavinck), deals with this tension between human and divine components in Christian communication and is a pivotal, though often neglected, concern in missiology.

Augustine was perhaps the first to introduce secular communication theory to the church in a systematic way. Called as a young man to be the rhetor (legal orator) of Milan, Italy, he was profoundly impressed by the eloquence of the renowned preacher of Milan, Ambrose. Converted and baptized in 387, he returned to Hippo in North Africa where he became bishop in 396. Augustine questioned the Christian use of the rhetorical knowledge and skills he and various other church leaders of the time had mastered at the university. Taking his cue from the experience of the Israelites who were commanded to take clothing, vases, and ornaments of silver and gold with them upon their exodus from Egypt, he concluded that "gold from Egypt is still gold." Profane knowledge and communication skills can be used in kingdom service. Augustine then pro-
Richardson’s account of how the gospel was communicated. At a popular level, Don comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcialist, James F. Engel has contributed a comprehensive text highlighting audience analysis andcia
Marx understood history to be the product of an ongoing dialectic of opposing material forces shaping the economic conditions of human social existence. Ideas then are simply the manifestations of the material conditions at work in the societies in which the ideas emerge. Marx is especially remembered for his critique of capitalism and his view that future societies would see the eventual abolition of classes and of private ownership of the means of production, and the development of a communist society in which all of the systemic causes of social alienation and exploitation of humankind are eliminated. Marxism has tended to emphasize both the inevitability of social evolution toward a classless society and the necessity of violent revolution and class conflict in the transition from one stage to another. Marx was an atheist and held that humankind tries to realize through the illusions of religion what is denied them in reality. Rather than positively working to change contemporary problems, religion is a deluded attempt to escape the misery of the present world. Thus it is the “opium of the people” and must be opposed.

Although Marx’s thought has undergone significant revisions by later thinkers, his views exerted enormous influence upon twentieth-century societies worldwide. Such diverse revolutionaries as V. Lenin and J. Stalin in the Soviet Union, Mao Zedong in China, Fidel Castro in Cuba, Ho Chi Minh in Vietnam, and Pol Pot in Cambodia, as well as a host of lesser figures, have claimed the authority of Marx for their repressive social and political agendas. Marxism, with its trenchant critique of Western capitalism, was especially attractive to many in the non-Western world during the 1960s and 1970s. Marxist themes, combined with the emerging nationalistic fervor of the postcolonial era and a reaction against Western economic exploitation of non-Western nations, produced powerful revolutionary movements in Latin America, Africa, and Asia. Marxist themes have also been prominent in some of the leading Roman Catholic and Protestant liberation theologians in Latin America, although most were careful to distance themselves from the atheistic and determinist assumption of Marxism (see Liberation Theology/Missiology).

The Christian church has generally been tightly controlled and persecuted in Marxist societies. Contrary to Marx’s predictions, however, religion has not withered away; indeed the Christian church remained strong in the former Soviet Union and actually grew dramatically in communist China. With the dismantling of the Berlin Wall in 1989 and the collapse of the former Soviet Union, the most visible attempts to implement the agenda of Marxism have been exposed as dismal failures. Marxism has consequently lost much of its appeal throughout the world, although it still retains considerable influence in some sectors.

Harold A. Netland

See also Ideologies.

Comoros (Est. 2000 pop.: 778,000; 1,862 sq. km. [719 sq. mi.]). The Comoros are a group of three volcanic islands in the northern entrance of the Mozambique Channel about halfway between Madagascar and the African mainland. The nearby island of Mayotte is geographically part of the group but administratively under France. Over 90 percent of the population are ethnic Comorians who speak three distinct Swahili languages. Most are Muslims and the Christian presence is very small, representing just over one percent of the population. Most of these are Roman Catholics. Evangelicals are represented by the African Inland Mission, whose churches are growing at over 5 percent per year, and a few other Protestants.

Todd M. Johnson

Comparative Religion. The comprehensive study of religions as phenomena using both historical and systematic methodologies, as far as possible without dogmatic presuppositions, comparing and contrasting both universal and particular features of these religions.

The study of religion as a Western academic subject is a relatively new discipline. Prior to the mid-nineteenth century, when one studied “religion,” the subject matter was one’s own religion with occasional thoughts on how other religions compared with one’s. The study of religion, in other words, was synonymous with theology. In the mid-nineteenth century, several trends gave these occasional and dogmatic thoughts about other religions a new, distinctive character. One trend, ironically, was the Christian missions movement, which was reaching the peak of several centuries of development and was supplying Western scholars with a wealth of material on non-Christian religions. Second, at this same time anthropologists and archaeologists were studying non-Western cultures and sending back an avalanche of data on cultural and religious practices from Asia, Africa, and Micronesia. Third was the full flowering of a way of looking at such data in a way that emphasized human rationality, as opposed to divine agency. This Enlightenment viewpoint was tailor-made for attempts to make some sense of this body of religious information.
Comparative Religion

This early science of religion produced scholarly works of two types. One is typified by the work of a man often called the father of religious studies, Max Müller (1832–1930). Müller, using data obtained through his linguistic studies, traced the history of religious systems and then wrote comparative studies that made “religion” the underlying category of study rather than a specific religion. The second is typified by the work of James George Frazer (1854–1941), who took the catalog approach to making sense of this deluge of religious information. His twelve-volume Golden Bough is organized according to cross-religious categories, such as Magic, Taboo, and Totemism, with religious data from different religious traditions filed under the appropriate heading.

One can see in this early work the influence of a positivist approach to data—in short, the scientific model. The task of the scientist of religion was to gather as much data as possible, and then do theory construction that attempted to explain the data in wider and wider circles of inclusivity, with the goal not of discovering metaphysical truth but of describing accurately and meaningfully the religious phenomena of the world in which we live. Given this reliance on the scientific model (in an attempt to distinguish this study from theology), it is not surprising to find that when the prevailing scientific theory of the nineteenth century changed, the study of comparative religion began to change.

In some ways, Charles Darwin’s theory of evolution was a godsend for comparative religionists. One effect of Darwin’s explanatory thesis was to remove the need for periodic or constant divine intervention in human affairs in order to explain why things happen as they do. Divine intervention, of course, was a staple of premodern explanatory theses. By making it scientifically respectable to offer secular explanations for human phenomena, evolutionism opened up a whole new arena of activity for the fledgling science of religion. Sociologists, psychologists, and philosophers quickly filled this new arena with huge explanatory theses that attempted globally to describe the origins and development of all religion in comprehensive schemata.

This was the age of the great sociologists of religion, Emile Durkheim (1858–1917) and Max Weber (1864–1920). A uniquely American contribution to the discipline was offered by the psychologists of religion, typified by William James (1842–1910) and his Varieties of Religious Experience. Perhaps more than any other, the philosophers of religion began to produce systematic philosophies of the development of religious consciousness, such as that produced by Teilhard de Chardin (1881–1955).

This ferment of scholarly activity in kindred disciplines encouraged the carving out of methodologies designed specifically for the study of religion. Objective histories of specific religious traditions began to appear from the studies of scholars like Nathan Soderblom (1886–1931) and William Brede Kristensen (1867–1953). Other scholars, in the cataloging tradition of Frazier, adapted a methodology loosely related to Edmund Husserl’s philosophical phenomenology and began to develop cross-religious categories in order to better compare and contrast religious traditions. Gerardus van der Leeuw (1890–1950) and Rudolf Otto (1869–1937) published works in the Phenomenology of Religion tradition, which relied on a method that advocated a temporary suspension of one’s own beliefs (epoche), in order to clearly identify the unique character of religious phenomena (sui generis), with the goal of understanding only (verstehen). These two approaches to the data of religious studies, the longitudinal, historical study and the cross-sectional phenomenological study, have been dominant methodologies in comparative religion.

In other ways, Darwin’s theory of evolution sent the discipline of religious studies down a dead-end road. The search for a common origin and developmental pattern to all religion proved to be a remarkably contentious and ultimately frustrating enterprise. The data of religions from around the world proved to be elastic in the extreme when it came to theory shaping. Some of the developmental schemes posited all religions coming from animistic roots where all being is invested with spiritual power (see Animism), moving toward a more well-defined Polytheism and finally the great monotheistic religious traditions (see Monothelism). Others of the developmental schemes took roughly the same material and posited theories that taught exactly the opposite: that the original conceptions of God were of high gods, monotheisms that over time devolved into polytheistic and then spiritist religions, with more and more layers of gods between humans and the high gods. And as more and more of the world’s religious systems were studied, they proved as a group to be less and less amenable to step-by-step developmental patterns.

In most academic circles, the recognition that these essentially Western-based universal categories and developmental patterns do not necessarily fit other cultures led to a move toward cultural Relativism, which argued that no generalizations are possible from culture to culture (see also Pluralism). Each must be studied totally on its own terms. This move matched some of the insights of phenomenologists regarding the subjectivity of the religious scholar himself or herself, but went beyond those insights by suggesting that suspension of one’s own point of view might be a chimera, that relativity extended not only to cultures but also to cultural observers. Many scholars began to see in cultural relativism a dead end as pronounced as the one faced by evolutionists—in this case, a dead end leading to an inability to have any kind of cross-cultural (and cross-religious) communication at all. This gave rise to two middle roads between universalism and particularism. The first came to be called functionalism, a view that did not find the core of religion in truth-claims of the gods or the gods’ representatives, nor in the unconnected, conditioned realities of discrete cultures, but in the function religion performed in addressing personal and societal needs. The needs that functionalists identified as “religious” varied. But for all functionalists, “religion is as religion does.” Functionalist theories of religion are among the most widely used in religious studies today, and in one sense may be seen as extensions of Emile Durkheim’s pioneering work. It is particularly useful to sociologists of religion such as Wach (1898–1955) and Robert Bellah (b. 1927), and anthropologists Mary Douglas (b. 1921) and Clifford Geertz (b. 1926).

A second middle road between universalism and particularism is structuralism. With roots in the work of linguist Ferdinand de Saussure (1857–1913), and given methodological form by social anthropologist Claude Levi-Strauss (b. 1908), structuralists see the use of language and language systems as the mediator between universals and particulars. Religions and cultures came to be viewed as analogous to languages. Each language (or religion), is different with its own vocabulary and grammatical rules. Each language (or religion), however, also has structural features in common that seem to run across all languages or religions. Structuralists say these features allow people of one religious tradition to recognize themselves in another person’s religious tradition, but to preserve the otherness of that tradition because those features’ full meaning resides more in the holistic pattern of that religious tradition than in the content of a particular belief. The recognition of these common structural features allows empathy that may lead to understanding, but not to understanding itself. Structuralism is on the cutting edge of approaches to religion being explored by scholars today. History of religions and phenomenological methodologies still provide much of the on-the-ground content and data of religious studies, but those data are increasingly filtered through the lens of structuralist forms.

Evangelical Christians can make good use of these different approaches to the study of religion so long as they are seen as useful tools in gathering and handling data of a very specific nature and not as normative methodologies over against theological and revelatory ones. They become problematic for evangelicals when these theories begin to claim for themselves absolute status, replacing propositional and ethical absolutes with methodological ones.

TERRY C. MUCK

CONFESION

SEE ALSO Religion; World Religions.

COMPUTERS. SEE TECHNOLOGY.

CONFESION. In biblical usage, confession in both Hebrew (yādā) and Greek (hōmologeo) has the general sense of acknowledgment. While it is not necessarily oral, it usually involves verbalization. Two complimentary orientations of confession are found: acknowledging our faith in God and acknowledging our sin.

CONFESSION. In the Old Testament, Israel’s confession of faith is intimately tied to the praise of God and acknowledgment of his greatness. Solomon mentions the need of God’s people to confess his name and turn from their sins in his prayer of dedication of the Temple (1 Kings 8:33, 35; 2 Chron. 6:24, 26), linking confessing God and confession of sin together. Nehemiah also shows the connection in leading the people in admission of sin followed by confession and worship of God (Neh. 9:2, 3).

In the New Testament the confession of faith in God is more prominent. John the Baptist admitted that he was not the Christ (John 1:20) and the Pharisees were afraid to confess their faith publicly (John 12:42). Positively, it is verbal confession of Christ which identifies a Christian (Rom. 10:9–10; 2 Tim. 2:19; Heb. 3:1). This confession, however, must be matched by a lifestyle which honors the one confessed (2 Cor. 9:13; 1 Tim. 6:12). Though not all will become Christians, Paul tells the Philippians that every tongue will eventually confess that Jesus is Lord (Phil. 2:11).

In the historical development of the term two important nuances were added after the New Testament: confession as the testimony to Christ given by a martyr at the time of his or her death (see also Martyrdom and Witness), and a confession as a summary statement of belief to which a body of Christians subscribes. Such statements have been seen throughout the history of the church from the Apostles’ Creed to the Lausanne Covenant. Traditionally, however, the term “confession of faith” refers to the types of statements of doctrinal beliefs and distinctions which were developed during and since the time of the Reformation.

These statements are typically attempts to clarify the Christian faith in light of cultural, social, or religious circumstances. While there are universals inherent in confessing Christ (e.g., his Deity), there are also particulars of faith which may be confessed in one context without being addressed in another context. They thus have an occasional orientation and are seen as human formulations of belief in contrast to the eternal truths conveyed in the Scriptures. Some, such as the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, are almost universally acknowledged in the church. “Creed” is usually used to refer to the statements of the early centuries of the church now seen by the universal church to be essential for all Christians. Other confessions either were developed or have been used to give a sense of denominational identity (The Augsburg Confession for Lutherans and The Westminster Confession for Presbyterians), to declare the church’s stance in difficult social or religious circumstances (The Barmen Declaration in Nazi Germany) or to define particular biblical and theological orientations (The Lausanne Covenant for evangelicals). The Lausanne Covenant has been given a particularly important place in contemporary evangelical missions, having been translated into more than twenty languages and having many evangelical mission organizations and fellowships using it as their statement of common faith (see also LAUSANNE MOVEMENT).
Confession

Missiological Implications of Confessing Faith. The content of a personal confession of faith is not limited to Western culture or to Christianity. Cultures and religions around the world recognize the need to find absolution for wrongs committed, and have appropriate rituals which enable the confession of transgressions. Confession of sin is not limited to Western culture or to Christianity. Cultures and religions around the world recognize the need to find absolution for wrongs committed, and have appropriate rituals which enable the confession of transgressions. Confession in other cultures and religions may come as part of rituals of transition in which ritual purity is a necessary precondition for successful transition from one phase of life to another (from singleness to marriage, from child to adult, from neophyte to religious leader). They may also come in times of crisis, whether already present (e.g., drought) or anticipated (e.g., preparing to go to war or impending death). They typically involve admission of wrongs done and may be accompanied by appropriate acknowledgment symbols. For example, the Huichol of Mexico tie a knot in a piece of string for each sin committed. Symbols of receiving absolution of forgiveness may also accompany the confession, such as the Huichol practice of burning the knotted string to demonstrate that the transgressions have been forgiven.
Missiological Implications of Confessing Sin.

While certainly every confession of sin must ultimately be before God, no universally normative commands or restrictions are given in Scripture as to the public extent of the confession or what rituals may be involved with it. Protestants in individualistic cultures tend to emphasize private confession before God rather than before a priest. One of the hallmarks of the East African Revival, however, was the public confession of sins among believers.

Study and understanding of rituals of confession which already exist in cultures will provide missionaries with tools which may help them develop appropriate Christian rituals. However, care must be taken not to simply import traditional rituals wholesale into the church lest Syncretism become a problem.

A recent development in mission circles is that of identification repentance (see Powers, The) in which individuals or small groups of Christians confess on behalf of larger groups of people (organizations, ethnic groups, nations). Justification for this practice is found in the example of Nehemiah (1:6).

Confession of sins is a mark of a Christian, but the method used may legitimately borrow from cultural values and symbols so that they remain relevant in their context.

A. Scott Moreau

Confucianism. A system of social, political, ethical, and religious thought based upon the teachings of Confucius (c. 552–479 B.C.) and his disciples. For over the past two thousand years Confucianism in its various forms has been influential in shaping the cultures of China, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Singapore, Korea, Vietnam, and Japan.

Confucius (from K’ung Fu-Tzu, “Master K’ung”) was born into a family of lower nobility. According to tradition, after serving in various minor posts in the state of Lu, at the age of fifty Confucius attained a relatively high rank but became disillusioned with the lack of interest in his social ideas. Retiring from public service, Confucius spent some thirteen years traveling from state to state in an effort to inspire social and political reforms. He then returned to the state of Lu to concentrate upon teaching his disciples and, according to tradition, to edit the Confucian classics.

Confucianism looks to the Five Classics—the Book of Poetry (Shih Ching), the Book of Rites (Li Ching), the Book of History (Shu Ching), the Spring and Autumn Annals (Ch’un Ch’in), and the Book of Changes (I Ching)—as authoritative. Following his death, the teachings of Confucius were collected in the Analects (Lun Yu), probably compiled in the third century B.C. In addition to the Five Classics are the Four Books—which include the Analects, the Great Learning (Ta Hsueh), the Doctrine of the Mean (Chung Yung), and the book of Mencius—which form a smaller corpus of authoritative texts.

Traditionally the family has been the center of Chinese social life. This is reflected in the classical Confucian emphasis upon the Five Relationships, namely, the relationships between father and son, elder brother and younger brother, husband and wife, elders and juniors, and rulers and subjects. Hierarchical relationships, with carefully defined reciprocal obligations for all parties, provided for order and stability, not only in the family but in society at large. Confucius emphasized the virtue of filial piety (hsiao), or respect and honor for one’s parents. The duty of the son is to obey his father in all things while he lives and to honor and continue to obey him after he is dead. Filial piety thus came to be closely identified with the ancient cult of ancestral veneration, through which the continuity of familial ties were reinforced (see Ancestral Practices). In turn, the father has a great responsibility for the well being of the family.

Another central virtue for Confucius was jen, often translated as “benevolence” or “humaneness.” Jen might be regarded as the ideal embodiment of moral virtue, combining both righteousness (li) and propriety (li). Confucius developed the notion of li (often translated “ritual,” “propriety,” “principle,” or “order”) into a moral and religious concept. Li contains both an external and internal sense. Externally li refers to proper patterns of behavior which, when performed correctly, express and reinforce harmony among the various hierarchically ordered elements of the family, society, and cosmos. Li also includes the idea of right moral attitude and motivation in actions.

Mencius (c. 371–289 B.C.) and Hsün Tzu (c. 298–238 B.C.), two of the most influential teachers after Confucius, offered strikingly different analyses of human nature. Mencius held that human nature is essentially good and that humanity’s task is to uncover and cultivate this inherent goodness, thereby realizing the congruence of human nature with the way of Heaven (Tien). Hsün Tzu, by contrast, while acknowledging the perfectability of humanity, stressed the evil aspect in human nature. Strict controls in the form of laws and education are necessary for an ordered and harmonious society.

During the Han dynasty (206 B.C.–A.D. 220), Confucianism became recognized officially as state orthodoxy, the Confucian canon was formalized, and the beginnings of a religious cult of Confucius emerged. Although attempts to deify Confucius were initially rejected, sacrifices to Confucius were practiced by the literati and...
Confucianism

eventually such sacrifices were included among the state sacrifices performed by the emperor. In A.D. 630 an imperial decree called for establishment of a state temple to Confucius in every prefecture, in which sacrifices to the sage could be regularly offered. In later centuries there were attempts to purify the increasingly elaborate cult of Confucius by restoring his image as “The Perfectly Holy Teacher of Antiquity” as well as countermovements to recognize sacrifices to Confucius as equal in standing to those offered to Heaven and Earth. However, with the revolution of 1911 the cult of Confucius languished in China, although it has continued to flourish among the Chinese diaspora in Hong Kong, Taiwan, and Singapore.

Is Confucianism primarily a social ethic or a religion? Scholars are divided on the question of Confucius’s own views on religion. Some see him as essentially agnostic, a social and ethical humanist who was primarily concerned with “this worldly” relationships. When asked about death Confucius replied that he knew nothing of life; how could he know about death (Analects, XI.11)? When asked about the spirits he said one should respect them but keep them at a distance (VI.20). On the other hand, Confucius placed great value on proper performance on the ancestral rites (III.12), an activity with clear religious overtones. He claimed the authority of Heaven (Tien) for his views: “Heaven is the author of the virtue that is in me” (VII.23).

Christianity has had an ambivalent relationship with Confucianism. Some Christians, as for example Matteo Ricci in the sixteenth century, saw in classical Confucianism much which could be adopted and utilized in establishing Christianity in the Chinese context. Ricci saw commonality between Christianity and Confucianism particularly in ethical teachings and what Ricci saw as a primitive monotheism in early Confucianism. Others regard this as a misinterpretation of Confucianism and stress the discontinuities between the systems. Given the enduring influence of Confucianism in many Asian societies, the church in Asia must continue to engage in a serious manner the themes and values of Confucianism. Fundamental questions for Christian contextualization concern the Confucian understandings of the religious ultimate (Heaven, Lord on High) and the spirits of the deceased, assumptions about the inherent goodness of human nature, and the relation between Confucianism and ancestral veneration rites.

Harold A. Netland

Congo (Est. 2000 pop.: 2,970,000; 342,000 sq. km. [132,046 sq. mi.]). Located on the west coast of Central Africa and sharing borders with Zaire, Central African Republic, Cameroon, and Gabon, the Republic of Congo’s population is comprised of some 75 ethnic groups. An estimated 85 percent are Christians (50 percent are Catholic, 22 percent are Protestant, and 14 percent are indigenous independent groups). Independence from France was achieved in 1960, with a Marxist-style government ruling from 1968 to 1991. Disillusionment with a failing economy resulted in constitutional reform and the adoption of democracy, with elections being held in 1992 and 1993.

Congo was initially exposed to the gospel through Portuguese missionaries who arrived in 1491, nine years after Portuguese explorers reached the coast. The king, Nzinga Nkuvu, and his son Alfonso were baptized on May 3, 1491. Alfonso ascended to the throne in 1506 and moved to establish a Christian presence in every locality in the kingdom. His son, Henrique, became the first contemporary African-born Catholic bishop. The Capuchins, an Italian order, sent some 440 missionaries between 1645 and 1835, but eventually the church deteriorated through a combination of withdrawal of missionaries by Portugal, syncretic religiosity; and the ravages of the slave trade. Catholic work was renewed in 1883 when the Holy Ghost priests arrived, and continues strong today.

Protestant missionary work began in 1909 when the Swedish Evangelical Mission expanded their work from Zaire. Since its inception, Protestant work has been strongly affected by several indigenous movements, most notably Kimbanguism, from Zaire. The Evangelical Church, the largest Protestant denomination, achieved independent status in 1961. The Salvation Army also has a strong presence.

During the 23 years of Marxist rule missionary activity was suppressed. After the constitutional reform and elections, however, the doors opened to missionary work. In 1993 it was estimated that there were almost 120 missionaries serving in Congo representing some 15 agencies, with Scandinavians and Americans the bulk of the workers.

A. Scott Moreau

Congress on the Church’s Worldwide Mission (Wheaton Congress, 1966). With the merger of the International Missionary Council into the World Council of Churches in 1961, conservative American mission executives, missionaries, and missiologists perceived a need for a distinctly evangelical congress to address ongoing issues of Conscience

Theological and practical concern. Jointly sponsored by the EFMA and IFMA, the congress was held in Wheaton, Illinois, in April of 1966. The seven-day congress comprised five missions-oriented biblical expositions, ten major study papers (on topics like Syncretism, Universalism, evangelical unity, Proselytism, changes in the Catholic Church), and area reports. The 938 registered delegates represented some 258 mission boards and agencies, interest groups, and educational institutions from 71 countries in every part of the world.

The conference was framed to respond to the challenges of the conciliar movement by reaffirming fundamental convictions in an atmosphere of evangelical ecumenicity. The pre-congress statement noted that there was greater missionary strength in the IFMA-EFMA affiliation than in the WCC. Thus it was felt that the time had come for this segment of the total mission force to clearly state its own convictions.

Among the papers that emerged from the congress was the Wheaton Declaration. Initially drafted by Arthur Glasser, it was revised in several committees and finally adopted by the delegates. The declaration begins by affirming the need for certainty, commitment, discernment, hope, and confidence in the midst of the hardening social, religious, and political climates of the times. It confesses the failures of evangelical missions in the light of scriptural standards, and presents an evangelical consensus on the authority of the Bible and the central concern of evangelism in mission. Finally, it addresses selected crucial issues of the day (the issues studied in the major papers).

The Wheaton Congress garnered enough attention to merit the publication of the declaration in IRM, though there was relatively little impact in ecumenical circles. Even so, the Wheaton Congress stands as an important evangelical milestone in that it was one of the definitive steps that eventually resulted in the Lausanne Movement.

A. Scott Moreau

Conscience. A term traditionally understood to refer to the part of a person which distinguishes right and wrong. Paul wrote about the reality of all humans having a conscience “now accusing, now even defending them” (Rom. 2:15). The Old Testament has no specific references to conscience. However, the foundation of the concept lies in God's knowing judgment of our actions and the consequent responsibility of the follower of God to be able to evaluate his or her actions and attitudes (e.g., 1 Sam. 24:5; 2 Sam. 24:10; Job 27:6; Jer. 17:9–10). While in the Old Testament conscience is seen more in the collective context of a covenant community, a more individualized and autonomous perspective appears in the New Testament, where conscience is considered a foundational part of every human being. Paul sought to keep his conscience clear (Act 24:16; 2 Cor. 1:12) and commended this as an example to others (1 Tim. 1:5; 3:9) even though ultimately it is God who is Paul's judge and not only Paul's conscience (1 Cor. 4:4). Some people have weak consciences and this must be recognized (1 Cor. 8 and 10:23–11:1). Others, however, have seared (1 Tim. 4:2) or corrupted (Titus 1:15) their consciences through willful participation in sin (see also Eph. 4:19).

The well known idea that Gentiles have the law of God written on their hearts (Rom. 2:14–15) does not refer as much to content as to function. Paul argues that the Gentiles’ pagan laws functioned better (by both accusing and excusing them) than God’s own law did in the hearts of the Jews (who only used it to excuse themselves). Here we see that conscience is not focused on content (what the rules are) as much as it is application of value judgments on actions and attitudes (how the rules are applied). Conscience “merely monitors the worldview that exists in our internal conversation” (Meadors, 114). Conscience, in this sense, acts as a moral restraint among all peoples, hindering a movement toward pure lawlessness, preventing cultures, peopled by sinful and selfish humans, from self-destructing. While the form and means of functioning of conscience will vary with the worldview of the people, the fact of the presence of a conscience is a universal human quality.

What is the source of conscience in humanity? Sharing the image of God, we are all born with the need and capacity to develop a sense of right and wrong. All humans, through the process of Enculturation, are given the rules their consciences require to distinguish right and wrong, albeit within the framework of their own cultural constructs. Conscience is thus a natural gift from God in all people and does not require a special work of the Spirit to be operative. Being part of the human makeup, it can be studied in its personal, familial, and cultural contexts.

The conscience has the function of producing Guilt or Shame when we have violated cultural norms. Though an oversimplification, it is not inappropriate to say that in an individualistic setting, guilt tends to be more operative—the conscience is internal, and produces guilt when one violates a norm whether or not others know what has been done. In a collective setting, shame is more operative—one shames the group and self through transgressions of group norms.

While no culture corresponds uniformly to God’s kingdom values, every culture has vestiges of those values embedded within the rules, mores, and laws it maintains (see also Ethics). Human beings are not born with the values of God already in their hearts; they are born with a need for such values and the capacity to grow in appreciating them. As they grow, they are taught elements of God’s values, together with cultural rules and regulations (see also Moral Development). These become the values which are applied by our consciences in evaluating our actions.

223
Conscience

The concept of conscience appears in many of the major religions of the world, but conscience as an internal, universal human component appears to be unique to Christianity (Despland, 50). During the early stages of the modern missionary period, Christians observing other peoples and religions sometime disparaged them because of the perceived lack of conformity to the Western concept of an internal, individual conscience. This was built on the assumption that the development of such a conscience conformed to the biblical picture and was the hallmark of civilization. Western missionaries tended to assume that their consciences were advanced beyond that of local peoples, who they felt had little if any sense of right and wrong. They took on themselves the task of teaching moral scruples, all too often imposing new cultural (rather than biblical) values and belittling or trampling on local values in the process.

To understand the cultural forms of conscience is of critical importance in missionary work. It carries implications for Elenetics (the conviction of sin) as well as cross-cultural ethics. When we feel that another does not have a proper conscience, we are tempted to develop one that matches ours. When we develop ethical systems, they tend to blend our cultural values together with biblical values, and may not make sense to our target population. In fact, in promulgating our ethical and moral systems rather than enabling the development of contextualized ones based on the local culture’s reading of the Word of God, we develop a dependence mentality and inhibit spiritual growth, as Robert Priest aptly points out.

An approach to conscience which is biblical and culturally sensitive recognizes that (1) conscience is universal, (2) the indigenous conscience operates well, (3) it functions in its own context and in light of indigenous values, and (4) part of the missionary task is not to attack local value systems but to introduce people to the Word of God in such a way that they can see for themselves God’s view of their culture through the eyes of Scripture. It is built on trust that God is at work in any people who call on his name; and that when they enter into a covenant relationship with him he is committed to enabling their growth as a body of believers into the likeness of Jesus (Eph. 4:7–16).

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Constantine. See Cyril (826–869).

Consultation on the Church in Response to Human Need. See Wheaton ’83.

Consultation on the Relationship Between Evangelism and Social Responsibility (CRESR ’82). CRESR ’82 was a gathering of fifty evangelists, mission leaders, theologians, and missiologists at Reformed Bible College in Grand Rapids, Michigan, June 19–26, 1982. It continued the debate within evangelical circles over the broadening of the traditional understanding of mission as evangelism to include social responsibilities. There were five major sections in the discussion: (1) Church history and modern theology of salvation; (2) How broad is salvation in Scripture? (3) The kingdom in relation to the church and the world; (4) History and eschatology; and (5) Conclusions.

Prompted by a shift in John Stott’s thinking to include social responsibilities as an integral component of mission between the Berlin Congress (1966) and the Lausanne Consultation (1974) and Arthur Johnston’s response to that shift in The Battle for World Evangelism, the participants at CRESR ’82 also wrestled with the spectrum of social responsibilities in which we might be involved (from relief work to structural change). The resulting consultation statement, Evangelism and Social Responsibility: An Evangelical Commitment, has been well received over the years as an evangelical approach to the questions raised during the Consultation. While all agreed that our Christian responsibilities include engagement in meeting social responsibilities, the question as to whether this is integral to mission was not resolved to everyone’s satisfaction.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Consumerism. Consumerism is frequently associated with the movement sparked by Ralph Nader aimed to inform and protect consumers. The term is also used as a rough synonym for American-style capitalism and materialism. Modern marketing, with its focus on consumers’ needs and the development of sophisticated advertising techniques, has had a powerful impact on people’s purchasing patterns. The segmentation of markets into smaller units has enabled companies to achieve greater distribution of their products. Consumerism is also an American export to many other parts of the world, where marketing fosters the transition to capitalist, consumption-oriented economies. This phenomenon frequently submerges local traditional beliefs and customs in favor of American popular culture.

Both marketing and consumerism are elements of a capitalist, materialistic system that is largely humanistic and devoid of ethical or spiritual values. American popular culture, including television, clothing fashions, movies, fast food, sports, and music, is thoroughly materialistic and consumption-oriented. The spirit of consumerism leads people to tie their identity and status to their spending. Moreover, the American economy is consumption-driven to the extent that any significant decreases in spending would result in an immediate recession. In contrast to this materialistic mind-set, Jesus taught that one's life does not consist of the multitude of one's possessions, cautioning people against greed that causes them to accumulate material possessions they cannot take with them when they die (Luke 12:15–21). Their treasure should be where their heart is (Matt. 6:21 par: Luke 12:34). Jesus expected his followers to be prepared to renounce all their possessions, to give generously to others (Matt. 19:21; Luke 14:33; 19:8), and to consider their belongings as resources entrusted to them by God to further his kingdom (Matt. 24:45–51; 25:14–30; Luke 12:41–48; 16:1–13, 19–25). Paul, likewise, preached modesty and contentment (Phil. 4:10–13; 1 Tim. 6:7–8).

Generally, consumerism has led to greater personal debt (see DEBT) and thus decreased missionary giving and deployment in recent years. As people are enculturated from childhood to expect a high level of physical comfort, they are more likely to give priority to meeting their own lifestyle needs than to sacrificing a substantial portion of their income for the cause of world evangelization. In response to changing patterns of giving, some groups have begun to accentuate single-project over long-term giving. The high cost of Western-style missions also raises the issue of efficiency in the way modern mission is conducted. In order to stem the pervasive influence of materialistic values in contemporary Western culture, it seems imperative to return to a rhythm of life that seeks to balance work with worship, prayer, rest, and time for relationships and to emulate the attitudes toward material possessions urged by Paul and Jesus.

ANDREAS J. KOSTENBERGER

SEE ALSO Economics.

Contextualization. The term "contextualization" first appeared in 1972 in a publication of the Theological Education Fund entitled Ministry in Context. This document laid out the principles which would govern the distribution of funds for the Third Mandate of the TEF. The scholarships were awarded for the graduate education of scholars in the international church. Contextualization was described as "the capacity to respond meaningfully to the gospel within the framework of one's own situation." A precedent for the new term, "contextual theology," resulted from a consultation held in Bossey, Switzerland, in August 1971. The Ecumenical Institute of the World Council of Churches had sponsored that earlier discussion under the theme "Dogmatic or Contextual Theology."

The lament behind the Third Mandate of the TEF was that "both the approach and content of theological reflection tend to move within the framework of Western questions and cultural presuppositions, failing to vigorously address the gospel of Jesus Christ to the particular situation." Further, it was declared that "Contextualization is not simply a fad or catch-word but a theological necessity demanded by the incarnational nature of the Word."

While the document had a limited purpose, the implications coming from it resulted in a movement which has had an impact on the theory and practice of mission. The contextualization concept was a timely innovation. New nations were struggling for their own life. The mission enterprise needed new symbols to mark a needed separation from the colonialistic, Western-dominated past (see COLONIALISM).

There is no single or broadly accepted definition of contextualization. The goal of contextualization perhaps best defines what it is. That goal is to enable, insofar as it is humanly possible, an understanding of what it means that Jesus Christ, the Word, is authentically experienced in each and every human situation. Contextualization means that the Word must dwell among all families of humankind today as truly as Jesus lived among his own kin. The gospel is Good News when it provides answers for a particular people living in a particular place at a particular time. This means the WORLDVIEW of that people provides a framework for communication, the questions and needs of that people are a guide to the emphasis of the message, and the cultural gifts of that people become the medium of expression.

Contextualization in mission is the effort made by a particular church to experience the gospel for its own life in light of the Word of God. In the process of contextualization the church, through the Holy Spirit, continually challenges, incorporates, and transforms elements of the culture in order to bring them under the lordship of Christ. As believers in a particular place reflect upon the Contextualization

Word through their own thoughts, employing their own cultural gifts, they are better able to understand the gospel as incarnation.

The term “contextualization” is most commonly associated with theology, yet given the above definition, it is proper to speak of contextualization in a variety of ways encompassing all the dimensions of religious life. For example, church architecture, worship, preaching, systems of church governance, symbols, and rituals are all areas where the contextualization principle applies. Context, on which the term is based, is not narrowly understood as the artifacts and customs of culture only, but embraces the differences of human realities and experience. These differences are related to cultural histories, societal situations, economics, politics, and ideologies. In this sense contextualization applies as much to the church “at home,” with all its variations, as it does to the church “overseas.”

In mission practice the more visible aspects of contextualization were closely related to older terms such as Accommodation, Adaptation, Inculuration, and Indigenization. Issues such as forms of communication, language, music, styles of dress, and so on had long been associated with the so-called three-self missionary philosophy which was built around the principle of indigenization. Indigeneity often was understood as “nativization,” in that the visible cultural forms of a given people would be used in expressing Christianity. In going beyond these more superficial expressions, the new term “contextualization” tended to raise the fear of Syncretism. This would mean the “old religion” would become mixed in with the new biblical faith and that culture would have more authority than revelation. Some felt, therefore, that the older concept of indigenization should not be changed but, rather, broadened to cover more adequately the field of theology.

In addition to giving greater attention to the deeper levels of culture, the new term “contextualization” became distinguished from indigenization in other ways. Indigenization always implied a comparison with the West, whereas contextualization focuses on the resources available from within the context itself. Indigenization was static while contextualization is dynamic, as a still photograph might be compared to a motion picture. The older indigenization was more isolated while contextualization, though locally constructed, interacts with global realities.

The fact that the early documents about contextualization were formulated in offices related to the World Council of Churches also made the concept difficult to accept in the nonconciliar circles. The heavy emphasis on justice and social development left little, it seemed, for evangelism and conversion. Scholars in Latin America were among the earliest to write about what they saw as an appropriate theology for their context. The direction this new theology took alarmed many evangelicals.

Liberal Theology became almost as a household word in the 1970s and 1980s. Evangelicals felt it demonstrated an inadequate use of the Bible and relied too heavily on a Marxist orientation. This was difficult for North American conservatives to accept. Even before his book, Ministry in Context, Gustavo Gutiérrez had already written his Theology of Liberation (1971). Soon afterward J. Míguez Bonino followed with Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation (1978). These major innovations opened up further thinking on contextualization. They followed closely the volatile 1960s in the United States. Ideas about contextualization in the United States first became associated with the controversial issues raised by the Vietnam War and American racism. “Black Power,” as advocated by James Cone (1969), had become a popular application of what contextualization is.

Because of this ferment Hermeneutics quickly became the central point of contention among evangelicals. The question was asked whether truth is derived primarily from human experience or from Revelation. At first there was little consensus among evangelicals about the role of culture and social issues, especially in theology. The contextualization debate made serious new thinking possible, especially with regard to culture and the way in which it connects to the biblical record.

Throughout the 1970s the writing and discussion on contextualization began to clarify directions that evangelicals should take. A Lausanne-sponsored gathering at Willowbank (Bermuda) in 1978 adopted the theme “Gospel and Culture.” The conference took seriously the role of the cultural context of the believer as well as the biblical text in defining evangelization and church development. The late 1970s also saw the rise (and demise) of the quarterly, The Gospel in Context. The journal’s brief life demonstrated how creative and stimulating worldwide contextualization could be.

The decade of the 1970s also brought remarkable progress in finding ways to carry out contextualization. Each of the ways, or “models,” as they are called, carries certain epistemological assumptions, as well as philosophical ideas about truth. While the models each have their differences, they also have several features that they share in common. Some are more centered on human experience while others show a greater dependence on widely accepted teachings of the church and the Bible. Thus, the assumptions undergirding some of these models make them less acceptable to evangelicals. Variations exist within a given model and certain features of more than one model may be combined. A brief review of the models will show how diverse the approaches to contextualization are.

Adaptation model: One of the earliest approaches was to make historical-theological concepts fit into each cultural situation. Traditional Western ideas are the norm. These are brought to the local culture. What is irrelevant may be set aside and what must be modified can be changed. The faulty assumption here is that there is one philosophical framework within which all cultures can communicate, assuming that other forms of knowledge are not legitimate.

Anthropological model: The beginning point is to study the people concerned. The key to communication and pathways to the human heart and spirit lies in the culture. The assumption is that people know best their own culture; world-view themes, symbols, myths are repositories of truth for all people. While this is true, unless discernment about a culture is brought to the Word for affirmation or judgment the contextualization exercise can become distorted and misleading.

Critical model: The critical aspect of this approach centers on how features of traditional culture—rituals, songs, stories, customs, music—are brought under the scrutiny of biblical teaching. Here the culture and the Scriptures are evaluated concurrently in the search for new ways to express belief and practice. One must ask who will carry out the process, and how accurate are the meanings derived from both customs and the Scripture.

Semiotic model: Semiotics is the science of “reading a culture” through “signs” (see SYMBOL, SYMBOLISM). This comprehensive view of culture interprets symbols, myths, and the like that reveal the past as well as studying “signs” that indicate how the culture is changing. These realities are compared with church tradition in a process of “opening up” both the local culture and Christian practice. To master the complicated method would tend to separate an indigenous researcher from the people and the context.

Synthetic model: Synthesis involves bringing together four components: the gospel, Christian tradition, culture, and social change. These elements are discussed together using insights offered by the local people. Also there must be a recognition of sharing insights with “outsiders.” Each contributes to the other, while each maintains its own distinctives. The openness and legitimacy given to all views would tend toward ambiguity and a kind of universalism.

Transcendental model: This model does not concentrate on the impersonal aspect of theology, that is, to prove something “out there,” but is primarily concerned with what any truth means to the subject and to members of the subject’s community. Likewise revelation is understood as the active perception or encounter with God’s truth. Much criticism can be raised. How can one be an authentic believer without objective context and why is such Western sophistication necessary?

Translation model: Based on translation science, the nearest possible meanings of the original text are sought out in the receiving culture. Exact forms may not be possible, but expressions and forms that are equivalent are introduced. Attempts were made to identify the “kernel” or core of the gospel which then would apply to all cultures. The problem of subjectivity in selecting forms is a risk, as is separating the Word from what is culturally negotiable.

In contextualization, evangelicals have a valuable tool with which to work out the meanings of Scripture in the varieties of mission contexts and in conversations with the churches of the Two-Thirds World. A built-in risk of contextualization is that the human situation and the culture of peoples so dominate the inquiry that God’s revelation through the Bible will be diminished. To be aware of this danger is a necessary step in avoiding it. Contextualization cannot take place unless Scripture is read and obeyed by believers. This means that believers will study the Scriptures carefully and respond to their cultural concerns in light of what is in the biblical text. Culture is subject to the God of culture. Culture is important to God and for all its good and bad factors, culture is the framework within which God works out God’s purposes. Some indications of the gospel’s presence in the soil may be evident, but Scripture is something that is outside and must be brought into the cultural setting to more fully understand what God is doing in culture, and to find parallels between the culture and the Bible.

The strength of contextualization is that if properly carried out, it brings ordinary Christian believers into what is often called the theological process. Contextualization is not primarily the work of professionals, though they are needed. It is making the gospel real to the untrained lay person and the rank-and-file believer. They are the people who know what biblical faith must do if it is to meet everyday problems. The term “incarnational theology” is another way of speaking about contextualization (see INCARNATIONAL MISSION). This means that Christian truth is to be understood by Christians in the pews and on the streets. The objective of contextualization is to bring data from the whole of life to real people and to search the Scriptures for a meaningful application of the Word which “dwelt among us” (John 1:14). The missiological significance for contextualization is that all nations must understand the Word as clearly and as accurately as did Jesus’ own people in his day.

DEAN GILLILAND

SEE ALSO Gospel and Culture.
Contingency Plans. As commercial and governmental communities protect themselves against terrorism, the evangelical mission community has become a preferred target for terrorist threats, kidnapping, and extortion demands. Contingency planning is a process by which these potential risks are identified and prioritized as to possibility and consequence. It is a technical term asking the question, “What if?” and then answering it.

The objectives of a good contingency plan include identifying mitigation steps, incorporating applicable policy guidelines, exploring alternatives, and evaluating consequences and risks. The process begins with a risk assessment and then identification of any actions that can be taken before the crisis occurs to reduce its probability or the consequences. While God is sovereign, there is a human responsibility for practices that contribute to safety.

The purpose of an effective contingency plan is to provide “step-by-step” guidelines for managing a crisis. The plan should always be based on the worst-case scenario and be as thorough as circumstances allow. The wording and organization of the plan should be user-friendly. It should include the information that needs to be obtained, notifications that need to be made, and actions that need to be taken.

In the mission community contingency planning falls into two broad categories. The first is planning for individuals and families, which should include action plans specific to the local situation. These are normally developed in the field. The second is organizational planning that is done in conjunction with the development of corporate-wide policies. Policies are not contingency plans but broad guidelines that define the organization’s specific direction and apply to all members of the organization.

Good contingency planning allows for time to assimilate information from a variety of sources; to evaluate, in a controlled environment, the benefits and risks of various response plans; and to provide a foundation and structure for crisis response.

Robert J. Horan

doom” (Crockett, 1992, 44). Those who hold to the metaphorical view believe in a real hell that is a place of judgment, but that we do not know precisely what that punishment will be like (Crockett, 1992, 49).

The third view of hell in opposition to the literal position is the conditional immortality, or annihilationism (see Annihilation). Again this is not a denial of the reality of hell or suffering in it. Clark H. Pinnock states that “it is more scriptural, theologically coherent, and practical to interpret the nature of hell as the destruction rather than the endless torture of the wicked.” He holds that the “ultimate result of rejecting God is self-destruction, closure with God, and absolute death in body, soul, and spirit” (Pinnock, 137).

Spiritual Warfare. Spiritual Warfare is a biblical concept derived from the fall of humankind. The battle was intensified by Christ's first coming that brought into focus the reality of demonization and demon-deliverance. Today there are two major views of spiritual warfare (see also Power Encounter and Territorial Spirits).

The Classic View. Those who take this position rely on the teachings of the Word of God (Eph. 6:10–20), the power of God, and believing prayer. No biblical evidence can be found that believers can be “demonized” or “have a demon,” terms reserved in Scripture for the unregenerate. Victory in spiritual warfare for the believer centers on claiming Christ's past victory on the cross over Satan and demons (Col. 2:15; Heb. 2:14; 1 John 3:8; Rev. 12:11), claiming the believer's union with Christ (Rom. 6:1–4; Gal. 2:20), claiming the believers' position as believer priests (1 Peter 2:9), claiming the present work of the Holy Spirit (John 16:13; Eph. 5:18), winning back influence from Satan (Eph. 4:27), putting on the whole armor of God (Eph. 6:13–17), praying when we are under pressure (Phil. 4:6–7), presenting our whole being to God (Rom. 6:11–13), and resisting the devil for daily victory (James 4:7; 1 Peter 5:8–9).

The Demon-Deliverance View. This approach to spiritual warfare features actively and directly casting out demons by Christians who have the appropriate gifts for this ministry. It has been described as the ekballistic mode of ministry or EMM (ekballō, meaning to cast out; Powlison, 1995, 28). Those who hold to EMM say that “Christians and non-Christians often require an 'ekballistic encounter' to cast out inhabiting demons that enslave us in sexual lust, anger, low self-esteem, fascination with the occult, unbelief, and other ungodly patterns” (ibid., 29). Adherents of demon-deliverance ministry hold that non-Christians and Christians alike can be demonized and require the ministry of exorcism. Powlison states, "In sum, ekballistic spiritual warfare envisions the warfare of Christians as a battle against invading demons, either to repel them at the gates or eject them after they have taken up residence” (ibid.). A counseling process is then put in place to encounter and cast out the demon(s).

Third Wave Theology. Since the mid-1970s the present-day controversy is heightened with the advent of what some have called the Third Wave of the Holy Spirit, a term used to refer to the rise of non-Pentecostal evangelicals who feel that the whole range of spiritual gifts is still available in the church. This is commonly associated with the Signs and Wonders movement, though the latter also includes Pentecostals and charismatics. Adherents hold the view that our work in ministry is a type of power encounter between Christ's and Satan's kingdoms, which centers in healings and exorcisms of demons.

The Church Growth Movement. Church growth concepts find their origin in the New Testament. The last four decades have seen an explosion of interest in church growth thinking initiated by the work and writings of Donald McGavran in the 1950s.

Definition of Church Growth. Church growth is "that discipline which seeks to understand, through biblical, sociological, historical, and behavioral study, why churches grow or decline. True church growth takes place when ‘Great Commission’ disciples are added and are evidenced by responsible church membership” (Rainer, 1993, 21; see also Church Growth Movement). This perspective on church growth theory was developed by McGavran in his writings, principally in his best-known work, Understanding Church Growth.

Advocates of Church Growth Theory. Supporters of church growth theory hold the following tenets: (1) that numerical church growth is crucial, (2) that the church should concentrate on responsive peoples groups, (3) that people movement conversions should be encouraged, and (4) that anthropological factors should be recognized in determining a people's responsiveness (McQuilkin, 1974, 19–66).

Advocates point out three sources of church growth, namely, biological growth (children born to church members), transfer growth (people moving from one church to another), and conversion growth (when a person commits to Christ as Savior and Lord).

Opposition to Church Growth Theory. While expressing appreciation for the contributions of church growth thinking, some opponents warn of its shortcomings. Opponents of church growth object to the priority assigned by church growth to numerical growth, resulting in weak support of other goals in mission. Opponents also point to the alleged ecclesio-centrism of church growth, its results-orientation, and its over-emphasis on prioritizing so-called responsive groups.

Again, since church growth theory emphasizes a church-centered theology, some have expressed that the centrality of Christ is eclipsed. Christ-centered theology is foundational to the church’s mission.

The flash point of opposition, however, centers on the Homogeneous Unit Principle advocated by many church growth theorists. McGavran first made the observation that “people like to become Christians without crossing racial, linguistic, or class barriers and that social dislocation should be held to a minimum” (McGavran, 1990, 163). In application, some call for the development of ethnic churches so as to minimize the amount of social dislocation experienced by people coming to Christ. Wagner states that “this principle has become the most controversial of all church growth principles because critics have interpreted it as classist or racist” (ibid., x). Wagner explains, however, that “the homogenous unit principle is an attempt to respect the dignity of individuals and allow their decisions for Christ to be religious rather than social decisions (ibid.).

Western Support of Third World Missions. Should sending money replace sending missionaries from the West? Will sending money rather than missionaries strengthen indigenous churches? Does the spread of the gospel depend on money? Will Western support enhance the missionary spirit of national churches? What is the testimony of history to outside support of national churches? Did Paul take financial support to the churches he planted? Discussion flows pro and con along both sides of these questions (see also Foreign Financing of Indigenous Workers).

Proponents of Traditional Missionary Presence. Those who defend the cross-cultural sending of Western missionaries rather than money hold the following positions: (1) that it is a fallacy to assume that the spread of the gospel can be accomplished only with money, that is, the Great Commission should not be held captive to fund raising; (2) that outside funds can create dependency in national churches; (3) that a mercenary spirit among national leaders can be created by too strong an influx of Western funds; (4) that employing national workers will not necessarily lead to more effective ministry; (5) that sending money instead of missionaries compromises the Great Commission.

Proponents of Western Monetary Support. Those in favor of Western financial support of Third World missions, rather than sending missionaries, advance their reasoning with the following propositions: (1) Western missionaries are too expensive; (2) Western believers should multiply the effectiveness of their earnings at home by supporting national missionaries in their own countries; (3) Western missionaries spend too much time and money on social ministries; (4) the presence of Western missionaries has a negative effect in poverty-stricken areas; (5) educational preparation for Western missionaries is too time consuming and cost prohibitive.

Holistic Mission. “Holism” as it relates to Christian mission means that the church’s mission in the world includes not only gospel proclamation but also sociopolitical, economic, and health dimensions. Those who hold this position believe that mending social ills and alleviating political injustices are integral to Christian mission (see Holistic Mission).

In addition to this position on the Great Commission, Stott also champions the Great Commandment, namely, Christ’s instruction to “love your neighbor as yourself.” According to this view, these two commands constitute the Christian mission in the world. Stott explains that “if we love our neighbor as God made him, we must inevitably be concerned for his total welfare, the good of his soul, his body, and his community” (Stott, 1975, 30). Also according to this view, the Christian mission should include a political dimension in an effort to bring about structural social change.

This concept of mission “describes … everything the church is sent into the world to do. Mission embraces the church’s double vocation of service to be ‘the salt of the earth’ and ‘the light of the world.’ For Christ sends his people into the earth to be its salt, and sends his people into the world to be its light (Matt. 5:13–16)” (ibid., 30–31, emphasis his). In Stott’s expression of this view, evangelism and social action are considered equal partners in mission and mutually integral to each other (see also Evangelism and Social Responsibility).

The Traditional View of Mission. Those who oppose the concepts of holistic mission distinguish between the Cultural Mandate and the redemptive or evangelistic mandate in Scripture. The traditional view holds that the cultural mandate is addressed to people as persons (Gen. 1:28; 2:15; 9:1, 7), while the redemptive mandate is addressed to those who become members of the people of God. The cultural mandate is fulfilled by qualitative and quantitative improvement in culture; it is preservative in a fallen world; and it is nonredemptive. The redemptive mandate is fulfilled by obedience in proclaiming the gospel to a lost world; it offers hope to a fallen race; and it is redemptive and transformational.

Some question the use of John 20:21 as the basic statement of the Great Commission. They contend that this violates the hermeneutical principle of using the more complete and less ob-
Conversion

The relationship between conversion and mission is foundational to missiology, because the conversion of sinners is central to the fulfillment of the Great Commission. In one sense, the goal of the mission—conversion—is simple. But understanding the process of conversion is a complex missiological subject. We must analyze the concept of conversion from three perspectives: the biblical, the psychological, and the sociological.

The Biblical Dimension of Conversion. Biblically, the term “conversion” centers around a number of words. Epistrephó (turn) and metanoia (repentance) are two of the most frequently used terms to describe conversion. The Bible speaks about conversion as turning away from wickedness (2 Tim. 2:19) turning to God from idols (1 Thess. 1:9), or turning from darkness to light and from the dominion of Satan to God (Acts 26:18).

This call to conversion is an important part of gospel proclamation. We not only preach the Good News of Christ’s death and resurrection, but we must also persuade persons to repent and believe in the gospel. Evangelicals have rightfully stressed the importance of faith as a key component of conversion but have generally minimized the importance of repentance.

The call to repentance, however, echoes throughout the New Testament. John the Baptist, Jesus, Peter, and Paul all include repentance in their preaching (Mark 1:4, 15; Acts 2:38; 3:19; 20:21; 26:20). Moreover, the church is commissioned to preach “repentance for forgiveness of sins . . . to all nations” (Luke 24:47; cf. Acts 17:30). Consequently, repentance is a crucial dimension of good missions practice. Perhaps one reason many ministries struggle with ongoing sin in the church is because repentance is not an important element in the original proclamation of the gospel. An initial, watered-down presentation of the Good News will ultimately lead to bad news—unhealthy churches and unholy people.

Therefore, we must call sinners to repentance. Conversion is thus both the duty of the evangelist and the demand of the sinner. This is the humanward aspect of conversion.

But there is also a deeper, more fundamental aspect of conversion. While we call men and women to repentance, only God can bring about conversion. We preach the gospel to people who are dead in their sins (Eph. 2:1–3). Because of this, God’s Spirit must bring people to life. This is the Godward dimension of conversion, known as “regeneration” (Titus 3:5) or more popularly known as being “born again” (John 3:1–8). Hence, conversion is not just a duty or a demand. It is a gift—a supernatural and instantaneous work of God.

The Godward and humanward dimensions of conversion are both taught in the New Testament. But the Godward work of God’s grace in the human heart through the Holy Spirit is primary. As Peter says in his report to the church in Jerusalem, “God has granted even the Gentiles repentance unto life” (Acts 11:18). Luke’s description of Lydia’s conversion also underscores the priority of God’s gracious initiative in conversion: “The Lord opened her heart to respond to Paul’s message” (Acts 16:14).

The Psychological Dimension of Conversion. The psychological dimensions of conversion must be understood if we are to communicate Christ effectively. The ENGEL SCALE describes a step-by-step process whereby a person who knows nothing about God is led to a true knowledge of God. Engel highlights the fact that conversion is a process, not simply a crisis. While it leads to an event, a climactic turning to Christ, it also usually involves a gradual change in the thinking of the person being converted.

While not a major theme, the psychological dimension of conversion is nevertheless implicit in the Gospels. The conversion of the apostles takes...
Conversion

place gradually as they live and interact with Jesus. First they understand him as an authoritative teacher, one who casts out demons with a mere command (Mark 1:27). Next, they see him as a healer, as one who has authority over sickness (Mark 2:1–12). Then, they wrestle with the fact that he has authority over creation. “Who is this? Even the wind and the waves obey him!” (Mark 4:41). Finally, after considerable time, Peter makes his famous confession: “You are the Christ” (Mark 8:29).

People repent and believe in the gospel after hearing and understanding crucial truths about God, sin, and salvation. While the essence of the gospel is unchanging, we proclaim Christ in radically different contexts (see CONTEXTUALIZATION). Because of this, certain dimensions of the gospel are more relevant in particular contexts and the process of conversion varies with the people being converted. Muslims must know different things about God than Hindus. A secular American needs to understand different aspects of truth than an African animist. Because of this, we must study the people we are called to reach, so that we can speak to their unique needs and address their particular problems.

The Sociological Dimension of Conversion.
The sociological (or cultural) components of conversion must be addressed. Western culture and evangelicals in general have viewed conversion in individual terms. But the Bible describes both individual and group conversions. The baptisms of extended households in the New Testament highlight the more community-oriented nature of Greco-Roman culture (Acts 10:44–48; 16:15, 34; 18:8). Similar to Greco-Roman culture, people in many cultures today do not make decisions as individuals; they make decisions as groups.

Therefore, as Harvie Conn wisely concludes, we “must continue to stress the necessity for a personal relationship to Christ as an essential part of conversion. But it must also be recognized that in the world’s cultures such personal relationships are entered into not always by isolated ‘individual’ decisions in abstraction from the group but more frequently, in multi-personal, infra-group judgments. ‘Personal’ cannot be equated with ‘individual’” (Conn, 1979, 103–4).

Missiologically this means that it is often wise to evangelize people in groups, in their natural social networks rather than as individuals. We should target families and friends in our evangelism. Whenever possible, our goal should be on reaching groups, that will lead ultimately to the establishment of new churches.

This is especially important among unreached peoples where the conversion of an isolated individual can lead to severe social ostracizing or even death in some cases. Understanding this sociological (or cultural) dimension of conversion will make us more sensitive to culture and more fruitful in ministry.

Richard D. Love

See also Sociological Barriers.

Conviction of Sin. See ELENC TICS.

Cook Islands (Est. 2000 pop.: 20,000; 236 sq. km. [91 sq. mi.]). The Cook Islands consist of fifteen Pacific islands located between Samoa in the west and French Polynesia in the east. They are divided into the northern atolls and the southern group. A self-governing state since 1965, its population hold citizenship rights in New Zealand nearly 1,900 miles to the southwest. Some 70 percent belong to the Cook Island Christian Church (formerly the LMS), and 15 percent are Roman Catholics.

Allan K. Davidson

See also Polynesia.

Coppin, Fanny Jackson (1837–1913). American educator, missionary leader, and missionary in Africa. Born a slave in Washington, D.C., and purchased by an aunt who freed her, Coppin was sent to New Bedford, Massachusetts. At the age of fourteen, she found employment as a domestic worker in Newport, Rhode Island. In 1865 she graduated from Oberlin College, at that time the only college to accept African American women. From 1865 until 1902 she worked at the Institute for Colored Youth in Philadelphia, initially as a teacher and later as principal. During this time she developed a reputation as a respected teacher and lecturer.

Coppin was also active in missionary promotion. As president of the Women’s Home and Foreign Missionary Society of the AME Church (1883–92), she traveled to England to represent the society and address the assembly at the CENTENARY CONFERENCE ON THE PROTESTANT MISSIONS OF THE WORLD (LONDON MISSIONARY CONFERENCE, 1888).

It was not until 1902, after thirty-seven years in education, that Coppin received her opportunity for overseas missionary service when her husband, Levi J. Coppin, was assigned to South Africa as a bishop of the AME Church. Together he and Fanny served the region of southern Africa until 1904, traveling as far as Bulawayo in... their responsibilities. Throughout their stay, Fannie promoted the education and development of women in Africa as she had done in the United States.

After their return to Philadelphia in 1904, she devoted her remaining years to writing and promoting missionary work by African Americans in Africa.

A. Scott Moreau

Coppock, Grace Lydia (1882–1921). American YWCA missionary in China. From the small farming community of Superior, Nebraska, Coppock felt called by God to foreign missions during her last year at University of Nebraska. In October of 1906 she sailed for Shanghai to work with the YWCA. From the very beginning, Coppock sought to train nationals to lead the YWCA; she refused to begin work until a Chinese associate was found for her. Coppock was appointed General Secretary in 1913. By 1914, the Chinese YWCA Board of Directors consisted entirely of Chinese women who accepted full responsibility for the organization, including finances. This was a time of political turmoil in China with famines and a revolution that ended Imperial rule in China. Along with political revolution came social revolution, particularly for women. National Association women were already speaking out against the practices of footbinding and the use of opium; Coppock also opposed these practices. Coppock was committed to a social gospel; just prior to her death in October of 1921, she deviated from usual YWCA work with university students to institute industrial programs in response to the emerging needs of women in industry. Two years after Coppock’s death, the first Chinese General Secretary of YWCA was appointed to replace her.

Grace L. Klein

Corruption. In 1996 a new ranking of all the countries of the world was produced by the United Nations Organization based on how corrupt their economies were. New Zealand achieved the honor of being the most transparent economy in the world. In most countries corruption was considered to be a major problem, hindering economic progress and slowing the move toward the globalization of trade. Most mission activity takes place in the context of corrupt economic and political systems, which poses an ethical challenge to the presentation of the gospel and the expression of kingdom lifestyles.

There are three key reasons why corruption must be challenged and reduced. First, corruption serves the interests of the rich and powerful and disadvantages the poor for whom the Bible declares God has a special concern. Second, it breeds inefficiency. Where services are only rendered after the payment of bribes or business can only be transacted with “under the table” payments, time is wasted, bureaucracies proliferate, and costs escalate. Third, money gained by corrupt means is not taxed, is often spent on ostentatious luxury items, may finance criminal activities, or may be diverted into foreign bank accounts. The proceeds of corruption seldom serve national interests or the social good and often work directly against them.

The Bible contains ten Hebrew words and nine Greek words and their derivatives in eighty references to describe corruption. Some refer specifically to decay of the body, usually after death, others to breaking God’s Law (Neh. 1:7) and lack of social morality. In Genesis 6:11, 12, God sends the flood because, from his viewpoint, all were corrupt or corrupted. In the Sermon on the Mount Jesus asserts that on earth “a corrupt tree (person) cannot produce good fruit” and “moth and rust corrupt earthly treasures” (Matt. 6:19, 43). God looks for an uncorrupted heart (1 Peter 3:4) and promises a time and kingdom, inaugurated by the resurrection, when there will be no more corruption of any kind (Matt. 6:20; 1 Cor. 15:53, 54).

Democracies are based on the utilitarian principle of “the greatest good for the greatest number.” Corruption and bribery, motivated by greed and self-interest, are a clear violation of this principle. The dilemma faced in many underdeveloped countries is that official wages are low, so government and private employees seek to supplement their incomes. Honest means, even if difficult, do exist, however, and corruption is not the only option. The compelling issue is that the individual has little power to change systemic corruption.

Missions face corruption in several ways. Some take an absolute stand and refuse to pay bribes of any kind. The cost can be long delays and extra expense waiting for services. Others engage local agents to handle business where bribes are demanded and serve to pay the often unitemized or vaguely worded bill. In some cases mission personnel may accept or benefit from corruption.

The case for an absolutist stance is based on the need for the means of mission to be consistent with the ends of mission. Maintenance of personal integrity and avoidance of compromise create opportunities for the God of justice to show his grace and power.

Roh Bellingham

See also Ethics.

Cosmology

Cosmology. A term reserved primarily for the scientific study of the universe considered as a whole. Metaphysics is concerned with studies into the basic kinds of things and properties that make up the entire cosmos. Traditionally, metaphysics is subdivided into two branches: ontology and cosmology. Ontology deals with questions about the ultimate nature of things: whether a thing is one or many, or of what kind. Cosmology considers how the world is organized, and is also related to the specific view of images concerning the universe held in a religion or cultural tradition. It is in this latter usage that cosmology is related to religious belief systems. Christian anthropologists are concerned with cosmological issues both in the area of worldview and religious belief systems. From this perspective worldview is understood as the term for a more general, less precisely delineated, set of ideas concerning life and the world. Cosmology refers to more conscious images, doctrines, and views concerning the universe. In religious belief systems, the most common source of cosmology is in the myths of creation and the origin of the universe. Symbolism and myths depict cosmology in the world of people, and nearly always imply an ethical concern. The behavior required of people in religious cosmologies is often described or implied in the account of the world’s structure. An understanding of the cosmology implicit in a particular worldview can be of great benefit to the missionary attempting to communicate the gospel to those within that worldview.

See also Religious Ultimacy.

Bibliography. M. Eliade, Myth and Reality.

Costa Rica (Est. 2000 pop.: 3,798,000; 51,100 sq. km. [19,730 sq. mi.]). A Central American republic, Costa Rica, which is Iberian in heritage, has enjoyed a long history of democratic government. Evangelicalism began slowly in this traditionally Catholic nation, but in recent years has flourished at an astonishing rate.

Protestant groups established themselves in Costa Rica first by migration in the nineteenth century and only later by denominational and faith missions. Many of the first groups had little interest in proselytism, focusing instead on the maintenance of their own religious communities. Protestant missionaries intent on evangelism did not arrive in Costa Rica until 1891. In 1894 a Baptist church was established in Puerto Limón, and Methodists and Anglicans had organized churches in Costa Rica by 1894 and 1896 respectively. The early Protestant missionaries in Costa Rica, as in most of Latin America, basically targeted the lower middle class in urban settings.

Many of the churches established by evangelicals were of an independent and foreign nature. Fired with a desire to evangelize, missionaries involved with these endeavors invested heavily in support of pastors and auxiliary programs, but few traces of their efforts remain. Though fifty mission boards established some sense of presence in Costa Rica, by 1960, the number of communicant members numbered only a few thousand.

As in many other Latin American countries, the emergence of Pentecostalism dramatically changed the religious landscape. From extremely humble beginnings prior to World War II, its rapid growth—exceeding any correlation to the resources of the sending agencies—clearly indicated that the new groups were essentially of a grassroots nature. Pentecostalism is characterized not only by specific beliefs and practices (glossolalia and faith healing), but by essentially popular, self-sustaining churches. These churches have nationally directed administrative systems with legal constitutions, elected executive officers, and salaried members who oversee the operation and expansion of specialized educational and mission programs for women, youth, and children. These national organizations are supporting a myriad of personnel in a variety of missionary projects both within and beyond Latin America. Further, these groups, in large measure having emerged from the marginalized sectors of society (though recently they have encompassed all economic segments of the country), have from the beginning implemented an impressive social policy. With their emphasis on freedom of expression in worship and affirmation of the individual’s worth within the community, Pentecostals have easily adapted to Costa Rica’s variety of cultures and social classes.

La Federación Alianza Evangélica (the Evangelical Fellowship of Churches) lists 100 different organized church bodies among its membership. Research estimates 2,640 evangelical congregations, a community of 396,000 people constituting 12 percent of the population. If the evangelical presence in Costa Rica is in some sense assured, it is also precarious. Unable to gather a large following several decades ago, evangelicals must now demonstrate continuing leadership in resolving severe human problems. Only appropriate and effective application of their energies and resources can sustain the dynamic structure forged when they moved into the leadership vacuum.

Bibliography. P. Johnstone, OW; D. Petersen, Not by Might Nor by Fire: A Pentecostal Theology of Social Concern.

Costas, Orlando E. (1942–87). Puerto Rican churchman, missiologist, and missionary to Côte d'Ivoire (Ivory Coast) (Est. 2000 pop.: 16,761,000; 322,463 sq. km. [124,503 sq. mi.]).

Situated on the southern shore of the great African bulge, the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, West Africa (popularly known as Ivory Coast in the United States) boasts a population of more than 16 million inhabitants.

The rain forests that once blanketed the country exist today only in the southern third of the republic. Much of the country, particularly in the north, is made up of savanna grasslands. More than sixty ethnic groups populate Côte d'Ivoire, with the Baoulé tribe being the largest people group and Dioula the most widely spoken language. French is the official language.

Followers of indigenous religions make up 25 percent of the population. Those calling themselves Christian now number more than 12 percent, while the Muslim population is now placed at approximately 60 percent of the country's inhabitants.

The country's president maintains an open philosophy in regard to religion. Freedom of choice in terms of religious preference is guaranteed by the Constitution. The first missionary visits were made by French Catholics in 1637, though they did not stay very long due to difficult circumstances. It was not until 1843 that missionaries returned to Côte d'Ivoire. Not until the turn of the twentieth century was the gospel proclaimed there with any consistency.

William Harris of Liberia, known as the "black prophet," felt called of God to preach along the west coast of Africa, moving from the Gold Coast (presently Ghana) to Côte d'Ivoire in the early twentieth century. People burned their fetishes and were baptized in the name of the Trinity as Prophet Harris, as he was known, exhorted his followers to believe the message of those who would be coming with "the black Book." The Harris (or Harrist) Church Movement resulted from his ministry and many of his followers were found worshiping in Methodist churches on the coast and later in Christian and Missionary Alliance churches in the interior (Baoûké).

Many evangelical groups that entered the country in the 1920s and 1930s profited from the preaching of Prophet Harris. The Assemblies of God, Mission Biblique, and World Evangelism Crusade entered the country during these decades followed by a host of other missions, many of them after 1960.

Most evangelical agencies have witnessed a positive response to the gospel though much of this response was found among animistic and non-Muslim peoples. Two major trends have dominated the past decade: the evangelization of the major cities of Abidjan, Yamoussoukro, and Bouaké, where churches and mission agencies are seeking converts among Muslims using medical, educational, traditional, and nontraditional ministries; and efforts to reach Unreached Peoples in Côte d'Ivoire and beyond. The use of friendship evangelism, videotapes, drama, bookstores/literature, cell groups, Theological Education by Extension, Mass Evangelism, broadcast media, signs and wonders, and the Jesus Film are some of the means and methods being used to proclaim Christ.

David P. Harvey

The modern missionary movement in Britain had its foundations in "the evangelical revival" of the late eighteenth century. A group of Christians met in Baker's Coffee House in central London, and with prayer and planning decided to form a missionary society to "spread the knowledge of Christ among heathen and other unenlightened nations." Thus, in 1795 one of the pioneering societies, the Missionary Society was born. In 1818 it was renamed London Missionary Society (LMS) as numerous missionary societies had come into existence. While the BMS (1792) and many other societies were formed strictly on a denominational basis, the LMS was founded on a nondenominational principle. It was created, led, and supported by the Episcopalians, Methodists, Presbyterians, and Independents (Congregationalists).

Ken Mulholland

Bibliography. O. E. Costas, The Church and Its Mission: A Shattering Critique from the Third World; idem, The Integrity of Mission; idem, Christ Outside the Gate: Mission beyond Christendom; idem, Liberating News: A Theology of Contextual Evangelization.

Mission Expansion. The LMS expanded its mission in the South Pacific, southern Africa, Asia, and the Caribbean. The mission attempts of the first twenty-five years include many places such as France, the United States, Canada, Russia, Malta and Greek Islands, Mongolia, China, North and South India, Ceylon, Jamaica, Guyana, Tobago, Trinidad, Java, Ambaya, Malacca, Singapore, Madagascar, Malawi, Zimbabwe, Zambia, Cook and Gilbert Islands. The first batch of thirty missionaries was sent to Tahiti in 1796. The first missionaries to India arrived in Tranquabar soon after the new Charter of 1813 permitted missionaries to enter the British territories. William Morris was the founding missionary of the LMS mission in China. The well-known church historian K. S. Latourette also worked for LMS in China. Famous names like David Livingstone and Robert Moffatt are linked with the LMS mission in southern Africa. The LMS enjoyed a high profile in Britain and overseas for a long time. However, after a hundred years of activity, the work slowed down and decreased due to many factors such as lack of personnel, lack of funds, and the changing political context in the world.

Principles and Characteristics. The LMS, from its origin, had two principles at heart, the Nondenominational and the Fundamental Principles. Over the years various denominations created their own missionary societies and the LMS was left to be supported by the Independent (Congregational) churches. However, the LMS constitutionally remained a nondenominational society. The "fundamental principle" stated that "its [LMS] design is not to send Presbyterians, Independency, Episcopacy, or any form of Church Order and Government . . . but the glorious Gospel of the blessed God, to the Heathen; and that it shall be left . . . to the minds of the persons whom God may call . . . to assume for themselves such form of Church Government as to them shall appear most agreeable to the Word of God." The LMS had recognized the importance of ecumenism and CONTEXTUALIZATION from its early days.

Other characteristics of the society were that it tended to pioneer the mission work in new territories. It developed indigenous leadership to be sent as missionary preachers and teachers to new territories within the same continent. For example, Tahitians and Samoans were used to spread the gospel in Tuvalu, Papua New Guinea, and other islands. It adopted at an early stage the principle of the THREE-Self FORMULA: self-supporting, self-governing, and self-extending (self-propagating). As early as 1915, local churches in Samoa were paying the salary of all white missionaries working in Samoa as well as contributing to the central funds of the LMS. The LMS encouraged women and lay persons to be missionaries. The LMS reviewed its mission at five-year intervals, which later helped it to adapt to new changes. Christian missions generally worked closely with colonial, imperial, and commercial authorities. However, there is some evidence to show that the LMS missionaries in many cases stood against them.

Mission in Partnership. Under the influence of the E CUMENICAL MOVEMENT in the twentieth century, the LMS went through major changes in 1966 and again in 1977. The society became a council of churches that were engaged in mission as mission was perceived to be the responsibility of the whole church and not of mission enthusiasts alone. In 1966, it merged with the Common Wealth Missionary Society, and became the Congregational Council for the World Mission (CCWM). The formation of the United Reform Church in the United Kingdom (1972) brought the overseas work of the Presbyterians into the fold of the LMS/CCWM. The radical shift came in 1977, when the old LMS/CCWM was transformed and the new 'Council for World Mission' (CWM) was inaugurated. The old divisions of younger and older, donor and recipient, North and South, constituent and partner churches disappeared. The CWM consists of thirty-two churches across Asia, southern Africa, the Caribbean, Europe, and the Pacific. All member churches are represented on the Council as equal partners and participate in decision making at all levels. All assets of the CWM are owned by all. All partners together share responsibilities of the mission work of the Council. The CWM believes in mutual sharing, support, and challenge to enable all to participate in God's mission.

Andrew Prasad

Counseling, Cross-Cultural. See CROSS-CULTURAL COUNSELING.

Counseling of Missionaries. Deliberate and intentional investment of resources by mission agencies, churches, and other mission organizations for the nurture and development of missionary personnel comprises the essence of the facet of missions known as MEMBER CARE. One vital aspect of member care is counseling of missionaries and their families during the prefield, on-field, and postfield stages of missionary life. Counseling may provide the missionary an avenue of growth in areas important for effective CROSS-CULTURAL MINISTRY: working well with others; giving and receiving forgiveness; trusting God in the face of disappointment and the ongoing presence of human pain; seeking accountability and personal growth; and availing oneself of supportive resources as needed. These crucial areas of competence are developed and played out within the entire family unit. Awareness of how one family member affects all other family members is critical in understanding and helping any family; however, it may be more so in the missionary family. Unlike many types of life-work, missions inevitably involve all of the family, even if just one or both of the parents are the identified missionaries (see also FAMILY LIFE OF THE MISSIONARY).

Most counseling with missionaries and their families is apt to be primarily short-term, and focused on prevention or resolution of problems. As such, counseling within missions takes on many forms, including semiary and retreat speakers, itinerant mission pastors and counselors, crisis teams, counselors-in-residence at MK schools, and help offered at on-field counseling centers.

Many of the challenges and struggles throughout the life stages of missionaries and their families are not unique. However, there are aspects of counseling that are unique to missionaries during the prefield, on-field, and postfield stages of their lives.

Prefield. Mission boards’ common use of counselors and psychological assessment tools to provide feedback regarding a candidate’s strengths and potential problem areas (see CANDIDATE SELECTION) can determine the prognosis for success in a cross-cultural situation and provide a basis for matching personnel to field placements and job assignments. Placing individuals in an environment in which they are apt to function well, or avoiding placement in situations that are likely to induce overwhelming distress both within the missionary and between the missionary and others is good stewardship.

A good rule-of-thumb to follow in deciding missionary placement is “the best predictor of future behavior is past behavior.” Issues that are troubling for missionaries in their home culture will not only continue to be troubling in their new culture, but are likely to be exacerbated due to the added stresses of transition and cross-cultural living. The more the struggles can be resolved before going to the field, the less the potential harm to the missionaries and families themselves, their mission board, their supporters and home church, and their co-workers—both expatriates and nationals.

On-Field. Generally, counseling on the mission field will look much like counseling anywhere, especially in terms of the kinds of struggles that people have. In particular, missionaries are not immune to guilt, depression, grief, anger, moral failure, and crises. Two special challenges on the field are separation and trauma.

The pain, grief, and anxiety that accompany separation from important people, places, and things are not uncommon to human experience. Understandably, missionaries and their children are particularly vulnerable to separation and its accompanying anxiety and fear. Although all the incidences of mobility and transition of missionary life (home assignments, new assignments, etc.) involve separation, one of the most significant experiences occurs when the children of missionaries go to boarding schools. The manner in which separation is handled by families, boarding school personnel, and mission administrators will make a pivotal impact on the child and the family’s ability to minister effectively. Counselors at MK schools can be of invaluable assistance to families who are negotiating significant transitions several times a year as children leave home and return to school (see also MISSION SCHOOLS).

Pain, grief, and anxiety also accompany trauma, which is almost a given for missionary life. The impact of trauma can go very deep, be very far-reaching, and last for a long time. When this impact is misunderstood and mismanaged, the person may be further harmed by ignoring the significance of the trauma or by attempting to deal with the pain and sadness in a destructive manner. Increasingly mission boards are establishing, enabling, and training crisis teams that can reach the victims within the crucial twenty-four to seventy-two-hour window after the traumatic event. Effective debriefing involves discussions of the traumatic events covering the facts of the crisis, the thoughts and emotional reactions to it, and the symptoms experienced during and after the event.

Postfield. Two interrelated aspects of postfield life that are likely to be difficult for missionaries and their families are reacculturation and retirement. When missionaries return to their sending countries, they are likely to grieve over the loss of the meaningfulness they had experienced in their work as missionaries and to experience stress as they adjust to a culture that was anticipated to be familiar. Often missionary families experience a decline in family cohesiveness and greater emotional dependence of the husband on the wife. Tension is apt to be present between children and parents due to adjustments to new roles and expectations. A growing number of missionary retreat centers are offering counseling, often in an educational format, for those going through this transition (see also Reverse Culture Shock).

Counseling of Missionaries
Counseling of Missionaries

Sometimes counseling may be required as a condition for a missionary’s return to the field, or may aid the missionary in moving on to meaningful work and ministry in the sending country. Counselors affiliated with the mission may provide better help to the troubled member; however, in the case where the difficulty arose between the member and the mission, a non-mission-affiliated counselor is apt to be preferred by the missionary.

Counseling, as a pillar of member care, has become an increasingly important aspect of obeying Christ’s command to tell the nations the news of the kingdom. As an important resource for the lives of missionaries and their families, counseling will hopefully become more accessible to those serving in remote and hostile areas.

Nancy A. Crawford

See also Psychology.

The Counter-Reformation. More than an anti-Protestant movement, the Counter-Reformation was a readjustment by the Catholic Church to meet the changing conditions of the early modern period, partially in reaction against the Protestant Reformation. It also reflected a cry for change, which began a century and a half earlier. The primary vehicles were the Council of Trent, which ran sporadically from 1545 to 1563, and the monastic orders led by the Jesuits. Trent cut off all possibility of reconciliation with Protestants, stating Catholic dogma in a manner that defined Protestant doctrines as heretical. Authority in the Church was defined as tradition plus the Scriptures (including the Apocrypha), but it was clear that no one could interpret the Bible contrary to the Church.

Justification by faith alone was rejected, and the Priesthood of the Believer was denied. The seven medieval sacraments were asserted to be necessary for salvation, and through them grace was conferred by the act performed (ex opere operato). There was a degree of moral and administrative reform, the authority of the pope was strengthened, corruption decreased greatly, and better training of the clergy and more preaching were required. The Inquisition was strengthened, especially in Spain, and was used against anyone suspected of having Protestant ideas as well as against Jews.

The Jesuit order led by Ignatius Loyola became the primary vehicle of mission, along with Franciscans and Dominicans. After a period of intense spiritual conflict, Loyola formed the nucleus of the Society of Jesus at the University of Paris in 1534, and the order was officially recognized by Rome in 1540. They took vows to obey the pope “for the good of souls and the propagation of the faith in whatever countries he might send them.” By 1556 they had one thousand members.

The greatest of their early missionaries, Francis Xavier, planted the Catholic Church in India, the East Indies, and Japan, and died seeking entrance to China. Catholic missionaries accompanied the explorers to Latin America, where the indigenous peoples were baptized en masse, often thousands in one day, even as they were terribly exploited and cruelly treated. By 1559 nine million had been baptized in Mexico alone. Some of the missionaries raised strong protest against such treatment. Among them were Antonio Montesinos and Bartholomew de Las Casas, who argued that Indians should have the same rights as any other Spanish citizens.

Robert de Nobili went to India in 1605, mastered Sanskrit, adopted Indian dress and customs, and won a number of Brahmans; and Matteo Ricci went to Peking in 1600, adopted Chinese customs, and won a number of converts in the court and beyond.

While some priests and friars, especially in Latin America, were unworthy, others showed great dedication and courage, a number suffering martyrdom. The major defects of early Roman Catholic missions lay in the long delay before ordaining indigenous priests and the high degree of Syncretism with pagan customs. Such syncretism and the shortage of priests still plague the church in Latin America.

Paul E. Pierson

See also Roman Catholic Missions.

Cragg, Albert Kenneth (1913– ). English pastor, bishop, and scholar of the Middle East and Islam. Ordained to the Church of England priesthood in 1936, Kenneth Cragg served as Canon of St. George’s Cathedral, Jerusalem; Honorary Canon of Canterbury Cathedral; and assistant bishop of the Anglican see of Jerusalem, residing in Cairo. When Egypt gained diocesan status in the Anglican communion, he relinquished this position in favor of an Egyptian bishop and returned to Yorkshire, where he ministered to immigrant Muslims. He taught at the American University of Beirut in Lebanon during World War II; Hartford Seminary Foundation in Hartford, Connecticut; as faculty and subsequently Warden of St. Augustine’s College, Canterbury, where he developed two major missionary study programs; Ibadan University, Nigeria; Sussex University; and Oxford University. Since his retirement in 1981, he has lived in Oxfordshire, where he lectures and writes. Author of more than thirty books and many articles, Cragg was editor of Muslim World. Cragg has sought to interpret Islam through insiders’ eyes, to bridge the gap in understanding between Muslims and Christians, and to discern positive significance in Islam for Christian purposes.

Paul R. Dekar

Crawford, Daniel (1870–1926). Scottish missionary to Zaire and Zambia. Born in Gourock, Renfrewshire, he was converted at seventeen in a Plymouth Brethren assembly. Though his early education had been restricted he was selected for the party that accompanied fellow countryman F. S. Arnot to Central Africa in 1889. Serving originally in Katanga (modern Zaire), he traveled extensively. He settled in 1895 at Luanza (now in Zambia), and this was to be his base for the rest of his life. His only furlough (1911–15) included visits to North America and Australia. Like his mentor Arnot and his other exemplar David Livingstone, Crawford was both pioneer and strong individualist, but he never lost sight of missionary priorities: setting up a string of churches, preaching the need for conversion, and teaching and translating the Bible. The New Testament in Luba was published in 1904; the Old, in 1926.

In a book that came to be recognized as a Christian classic, Thinking Black (1913), Crawford showed a remarkable understanding of the mind and culture of Africans. They came to regard him with deep affection, and he encouraged many of them as co-workers in ministry. Crawford’s published work included Back to the Long Grass (1923).

J. D. Douglas

Crawford, Isabel Alice Hartley (1865–1961). Canadian-born missionary to indigenous Americans. Born in Cheltenham (near Toronto) to the family of a Baptist minister and teacher, Crawford graduated from the Baptist Missionary training school in Chicago in 1893, having served as a missionary in the slum districts of Chicago as a student. Though she was interested in overseas work, Crawford was sent in 1883 as part of a team by the Woman’s American Baptist Home Mission Society (WABHMS) to Elk Creek, Oklahoma, to serve the Kiowas. Transferred to Saddle Mountain after two years in Elk Creek, she caused a stir by assisting an unordained interpreter in serving communion. The controversy resulted in her resignation from Saddle Mountain in 1906. She began to lecture and teach, promoting Indian rights and Baptist missions as a WABHMS representative until 1918, when she moved to the Allegheny Indian Reservation in New York State. Again she was involved in a dispute, this time championing the Indian desire to stop the transfer of Red House Church from the Baptists to the Presbyterians.

She returned to the lecture circuit until her retirement in 1930. Even in retirement she remained active, still speaking and advocating. After her death at the age of ninety-six, she was buried in the Saddle Mountain reservation, the epitaph on her tombstone reading, “I dwell among mine own people.”

A. Scott Moreau

Creation. The fact that biblical revelation begins with the creation account demonstrates the foundational importance of the creation doctrine to all other biblical doctrines, including redemption. The divine design and majestic glory of the created order witness to the character, sovereignty, and lordship of the Creator (Ps. 19:1–6), which are critical issues in the outworking and understanding of his mission purpose (Missio Dei). Humankind, as male and female, uniquely created in the image of the Creator, is seen to be the apex of creation and focus of this purpose. To humankind is given the right to rule over and subdue the earth and its creatures and to tend and take care of their natural environment, responsibilities for which they are still accountable (Gen. 1:26–30; 2:15; Ps. 8:3–8).

The Fall of Humankind through the temptation of another created being (Satan) radically impacted all of creation and defined the mission of God for human history. Redemption of elect humanity and the restoration of the Creator’s glory in them constitute the ultimate divine purposes, as decreed before the creation itself (Eph. 1:4–14; Rev. 13:8). An age-long conflict with Satan, the rebellious archenemy of his sovereign Creator, is the context for missio Dei. In his passionate efforts to steal glory from the Creator, including God’s exclusive right to be worshiped, and to usurp God’s place of authority over the created order, the enemy seeks to seduce humankind to worship other beings and objects in the created...
Creation

order. Such idolatry and the moral and spiritual perversions which accompany it, are the ultimate manifestation of humanity's depravity and need for the redemption and regeneration offered in the gospel (Rom. 1:18–32; 3:9–31).

The redemptive purposes of God include not only humankind but also the created order. Cursed as a result of the fall (Gen. 3:17–18), yet still an object of his care and concern (Jon. 4:11), creation is described as groaning and eagerly expecting the final redemption of humankind. The curse will be removed "at the renewal of all things" and creation itself will fulfill its divine purpose (Rom. 8:18–25; Matt. 19:28). Ultimately, the present created order will be cleansed, providing the perfect eternal abode for the redeemed to live in the presence of their Creator and redeemer forever (Isa. 65:17; 66:22; 2 Peter 3:10–13; Rev. 21:1).

An understanding of the biblical doctrines of creation, man and woman, and missio Dei is essential to the communication and reception of the gospel of redemption. However, the historical development of distinctive human cultures and worldviews has demonstrated the rejection of revealed truth about God, including the revelation in creation itself (Rom. 1:18–25). The result is evident in a plethora of grossly inaccurate cosmogonies, from fanciful myths about capricious deities to atheistic dialectical materialism.

In some cultural contexts, a good starting point of contact for the gospel is the doctrine of creation. Paul's address to the pagan philosophers in Athens (Acts 17:24–31) is a classic biblical case. Contemporary missionaries working among animistic tribal groups have demonstrated the effectiveness of starting with the creation account in building a foundation for the gospel. The monistic pantheism of the Hindu-Buddhist worldview and the pantheistic naturalism and world consciousness of the Chinese worldview, especially Taoism, demand a careful explanation and understanding of the nature and purpose of creation and humanity's role and relationship to it and to a personal Creator and Redeemer.

In the latter half of the twentieth century certain exponents of liberation theology sought to integrate creation and mission around an ecological and political agenda leading to a radical redefinition of the church's mission. Rooted in the premise that creation presupposes salvation, the church's task is to seek the liberation of the earth from the oppressive policies of Western industrialization and the liberation of the poor from political oppression and economic deprivation. Creation and salvation have been merged into a struggle for political justice, economic equality, and ecological responsibility.

A comprehensive, biblically informed mission theology will include a clearly defined doctrine of creation, including a doctrine of stewardship of the earth and its resources. But mission is not ultimately informed by or subservient to the creation doctrine. Mission flows from a biblical understanding of the Creator's purposes for his creation and proclaims his sovereign lordship over his creation. The biblical mandate is to preach the good news to all creation (Mark 16:15), resulting in a body of regenerated human beings who are newborn creations in Jesus Christ (Heb. 12:23; 2 Cor. 5:17) and who live in the expectation of a new creation to the glory of the Creator (Rev. 21:1–4).

RICHARD D. CALENBERG

Creative Access Countries. Sovereign governments, regimes, or territories that deny, or severely limit, long-term presence for foreigners engaging in Christian missionary or evangelistic activities. Such countries have one or more large population segments that are historically resistant to Christianity. Laws restraining Christian activities reflect the controlling influence of religious-social groups antagonistic to Christianity. Especially suspect are Christian endeavors done with or by foreign mission agencies. The sociological causes for such restrictive measures are numerous. Yet perceived threats to historic religious practices, distinct ethnic identities, or nationalistic reactions to Western colonial encroachments help explain some of the prohibitions.

At the dawn of the modern missions era, there were few restrictions on missionary activities. Those that existed were usually because of European rivalries rather than indigenous religious conflicts. Missionaries were often the first Westerners in what are now Third World countries or they entered later under the auspices of colonial governments. Since the end of World War II, Western colonial rule has given way to rising nationalistic movements.

At the end of the colonial era, the Western missionary's role grew dubious in the minds of many national leaders. Where a sizable or influential Christian presence had developed, there usually were provisions made by the emerging regimes for continuation of Western missionary presence. Where a weak Christian church existed, leaders of dominant religious groups influenced the fledgling regimes to restrict Christianity's growth and development, particularly by diminishing its foreign sustenance. A simple way to enact such restrictions was to deny visas and residence permits to those foreigners known to work with Christian elements in the country. Creative strate-migic initiatives, like the Nonresidential Missionary model, now enable Christian missions and missionaries to penetrate existing barriers in the traditional homelands of antagonistic blocs of Hindu, Buddhist, Islamic, tribal, and more re-tently communist people groups located within the political boundaries of countries resistant to Christian influence.

KEITH E. EITEL

Bibliography. D. B. Barrett and T. M. Johnston. Our Globe and How to Reach It: Seeing the World Evangelized by a.d. 2000 and Beyond; V. D. Garrison, The Non-residential Missionary: A New Strategy and the People It

Creed. See Confession.

CRESR '82. See Consultation on the Relationship between Evangelism and Social Responsibility.

Croatia
(Ent. 2000 pop.: 4,433,00; 56,538 sq. km.
[21,829 sq. mi.]). Croatia (with provinces of Croatia proper, Dalmatia, Istria, and Slavonia) is a crescent-shaped country bounded by Slovenia, Hungary, Yugoslavia, and the Adriatic Sea. It declared its independence from Yugoslavia in 1991, which resulted in intense warfare between the two countries, creating a major humanitarian crisis and Serbian control of one-third of Croatian lands. The country was internationally recognized in 1992 and regained full control over all its territories by 1998. The ethnic composition of the country before the war in 1991 was 77.9 percent Croats, 12.2 percent Serbs, and 9.9 percent others. This has been seriously disrupted by the expulsion of more than one hundred thousand Serbs in 1995 and due to the large influx of Bosnian refugees, both Muslim and Croat.

The region was part of the Western Roman Empire’s province of Illyricum. Christianity was introduced to this area as early as the first century through the missionary travels of the apostle Paul and his co-workers (Illyricum is mentioned in Rom. 15:19, and Dalmatia in 2 Tim.
4:10). Croats who are of South Slavic origin settled in the areas of present-day Croatia and Bosnia in the seventh century a.d. Their arrival was followed by conversion from the old Slavic nature-god religions to Roman Catholicism.
Since that time and following the schism in 1054 between Eastern and Western Christianity, Croatia has remained almost exclusively Roman Catholic. The peculiarity of Croatian Catholicism through the centuries has, however, been the rare permission to celebrate liturgy in its own ancient language with the use of Glagolitic script.

Croatia’s statehood goes back to the year 925, when under King Tomislav and with the blessing of the pope it became an independent kingdom.
In the twelfth century the Croats united in one state with the Hungarians, another Catholic nation. Over the following centuries Croatia was rulled by Venetians, the Ottoman Empire, and the Habsburgs. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the Austrians created a military frontier against the Turks in southeast Croatia settled mostly by Orthodox Serbs who were fleeing the Ottoman territories. Since that time Catholic
Croatia has had a large Orthodox minority.

Protestant efforts to extend influence in Croatia in the sixteenth century were initially very successful although soon brutally eradicated through the Counter-Reformation. The most prominent Croat Protestant theologian was Matthias Flacius Illyricus (1520–75), a student of Luther, prolific writer, and polemicist, considered by many to be the father of modern biblical Hermeneutics. Protestants Jurij Dalmatin and Konzul Istranin worked on the first Croatian translation of the Bible. With the forceful resurgegence of Roman Catholicism, Protestantism was in subsequent centuries confined to minorities of Hungarians, Slovaks, and Germans.

Croatia became part of Yugoslavia in 1918, first named the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. During World War II the so-called Independent State of Croatia, which also included Bosnia, operated as a Nazi puppet state. After the war, under the rule of Tito, Croatia became one of the six republics of communist Yugoslavia.
Croatian struggles against foreign domination through the centuries forced about 25 percent of the population to leave for other countries. This emigration was caused by a combination of economic and political circumstances, including periods of Turkish rule, Hungarization attempts, oppression by the Habsburgs, Serbian dictatorship through the Kingdom of Yugoslavia, and the communist totalitarianism. Many of the more recent immigrants returned following the creation of an independent Republic of Croatia in 1991.

The religious situation in today’s Croatia is characterized by a revival of traditional Roman Catholicism, the influx of large numbers of Bosnian Muslim refugees, and a sudden decrease of Serbian Orthodox Christians. All Protestants together constitute only 0.6 percent of the population, and evangelicals only 0.2 percent. After years of stagnation Lutheran, Baptist, and Pentecostal churches in particular have begun to experience growth. Despite their small numbers, evangelicals have during the recent wars in Croatia and neighboring Bosnia made a significant effort to assist refugees and displaced people, to maintain church unity across ethnic divides, and to participate in the peacemaking efforts within the country. The Evangelical Theological Seminary (ETS) in Osijek (founded 1972) has trained most of the younger Christian leaders of various denominations and its graduates have pioneered in areas of university ministries, Christian publishing, broadcasting, prison ministries, and cross-cultural evangelism. Dozens of young Croats and other graduates of ETS have been sent as church-planting missionaries to Bosnia and to other post-communist nations.
Croatia

Peter Kuzmic

Cross. See Atonement.

Cross-Cultural Communication. See Intercultural Communication.

Cross-Cultural Competency. See Intercultural Competency.

Cross-Cultural Counseling. Cross-cultural counseling, often referred to as multicultural, intercultural, transcultural, or ethnic counseling, occurs when the counselor's basic background differs from that of the counselee's. Prior to the 1970s most counselor training programs, primarily Western value-laden, paid little attention to cultural awareness, thereby increasing the risk of culturally inappropriate interventions in the few cases where such counseling took place.

Interest in cross-cultural counseling in America received its impetus from the vast demographic shifts brought about by the rising prominence of ethnic groups, to a lesser extent by the increasing number of university-level international students, and the growing number of international government, UN, and business projects. Missionaries further realized the need for cross-cultural counseling skills because of the growing refugee population, the fairly recent multicultural composition of missionary personnel, and the struggles of citizens of changing demographic groups to maintain their own identity while interpreting behavior and planning interventions in terms of the other culture.

Cross-cultural counselors can offer the most extensive help by training members of a particular culture to be counselors to their own people. Introducing basic pastoral counseling courses in seminaries and Bible schools, holding on-going seminars for church leaders, and selecting a discerning national to work by their side to interpret cultural issues could greatly reduce the chance of missionaries making ethnocentric misjudgments. For example, the family therapy concept of individuation and enmeshment differs from culture to culture, requiring a discerning national's input on what constitutes dysfunction. Meeting regularly with national counselors for mutual help whereby the counselor guides the trainee to employ appropriate interventions and the national-counselor gives feedback on how a concept or technique manifests itself in that milieu could alleviate the missionary-counselor's workload. At the same time, the counselor has the opportunity to reproduce skills in others.

Missionary-counselors must listen and listen again and again. They must hear the nationals' stories and experience them both cognitively and affectively from their framework without the interference of their own cultural assumptions. To assume correctly that they are understanding from the other culture's perspective, the helper constantly needs to clarify meanings in ways that are acceptable for that culture (repetition, reflection, questions, etc.).

The effective missionary-counselor gradually learns to discriminate between normal situational responses in a given culture and responses that are pathological. For example, in cultures where persecution or discrimination has existed an individual's comments may seem somewhat paranoid. This could well be a learned response to actual negative experiences. Rather than assume a deeper problem the counselor might aim to enable the person to relinquish the hurt, humiliation, anger, or fear that the situation has produced.

Goals, strategies, and techniques need to be congruent with the cultural norms, even if they are not part of the traditional repertoire of the discipline. For example, members of most cultures are sociocentric rather than egocentric (see Individualism and Collectivism). They therefore often respond better when extended families or church leaders or even clan members are included as part of problem resolution. Also, a fixed place in the missionary’s office rather than the village or church may seem artificial to them. Or, counseling that too directly plunges the counselee into personal issues may increase resistance. A “tea time” of small talk frees certain cultural groups to relax and talk more freely.

Each culture has its own idiosyncratic approaches and effective methods that maintain the delicate balance between manipulative informality and effective professionalism that has to be reframed for each situation.

Although counseling may enable a national to take a more active role in facilitating changes in his or her milieu, the socioeconomic-political situations are not the foreigner’s domain per se. One of the goals of missionary-counselors is to let the Lord work through them to empower the counselee to function as healthily and comfortably as possible regardless of the environmental circumstances. The missionary is in a unique position to present the transcendent peace and hope of a sovereign God. Guiding what may well be victimized people to appropriate the immanent grace of the Lord, including the power to forgive, can superhumanly free them from the inner chains of hurt, despair, and anxiety that hinders healthy functioning.

Since the concept of the supernatural is prominent in many cultures, incorporating spiritual issues into the counseling process would offer a more holistic and contextual approach. To do this sensitively, wisely, and biblically, counselors must, first, clarify their own beliefs in this area. Second, they must make every effort to understand the way the worldview of the culture in which they work perceives the supernatural. Third, they need to grasp how it plays itself out in the daily affairs of the people. Fourth, counselors must carefully observe how the culture’s views contribute positively or negatively to the health of the people. Nor can the role of the demonic, so real to many cultures, be ignored (see also Possession Phenomena). In approaching the more mystical aspects of a culture, diagnostic skill that distinguishes among psychological, social, and spiritual events is essential. The counselor must be prepared to use God’s Word with integrity, conviction, and trust in its power.

Most authors on cross-cultural counseling stress the importance of maintaining a balanced emphasis between human universals and cultural uniqueness. An appreciation for the commonalities stemming from the human race’s God-relatedness can be a link to any culture. However, overemphasis on similarities could reduce cultural sensitivity and detract from efforts to differentiate that which is different as a result of their frame of reference and what is maladaptive in that particular culture. On the other hand, too much emphasis on the uniqueness of a culture can lead to stereotypes and blind counselors to the individual differences. Cultural factors do not provide all the answers to dilemmas that a person faces. Foremost the uniqueness of the individual must be considered.

Conclusion. Counseling is a relatively new phenomenon in many countries. Yet throughout the world there is a global cry for help to deal with the emotionally painful effects of the undue stresses produced by the immeasurable, often unprecedented, and many times unpredictable changes taking place. Christians tend to seek support from their church leaders, more often than not, the pastors. Pastors are often in a quandary to know how to deal with the issues.

The need to develop counseling training programs to impart the necessary skills to church leaders has become an imperative. An increasing number of seminaries and Bible schools are offering at least basic counseling skills to pastors. However, the initial training must be done by those who come from countries, generally the Western ones, where they have been able to avail themselves of more In-depth training in counseling. Often they are missionaries who face the formidable challenge of acquiring cultural awareness profound enough to be able to develop strategies and techniques congruent with the given culture’s way of functioning. The above guidelines give a glimpse of the complexity of the task.

Missionaries trained in counseling generally have some cross-cultural training and a degree of experience in another culture. They already have a sense of call to deal in an in-depth fashion with people in order to guide them to better glorify the Lord. It seems fitting that they fill the need to acquire the necessary skills to train nationals to counsel their own people.

FRANCES J. WHITE

Cross-Cultural Counseling

Counseling and Psychotherapy; D. W. Sue, Counseling the Culturally Different.

Cross-Cultural Evangelism. In one sense any Evangelism involves crossing a cultural divide, since the evangelist must communicate spiritual truth to spiritually dead people who in their natural state are unable to comprehend it. Cross-cultural evangelism, however, has the added challenge of communication between people of different worldviews and belief systems. As such, it is more often considered true missionary witness (whether geographical distance is involved or not) than is evangelism between members of the same culture.

CULTURE, of course, is generally seen as a society’s folkways, mores, language, art and architecture, and political and economic structures; it is the expression of the society’s worldview. Worldview has been described as the way a people looks outwardly upon itself and the universe, or the way it sees itself in relationship to all else.

For the cross-cultural evangelist, witness involves a thorough understanding of one’s own culture, the biblical context in which God’s Word was given, and the culture of those among whom evangelism is being done. The message must be tailored or contextualized in such a way as to remain faithful to the biblical text while understandable and relevant to the receptor’s context.

The late twentieth century has seen, along with widespread acceptance of anthropological insights, a flowering of respect for culture in missions and evangelism. James Engel devised a scale to measure people’s understanding of the gospel and their movement toward Christ. It can be used to gauge the spiritual knowledge and involvement of both individuals and groups. At one end of the Engel Scale are those with no awareness of Christianity (-7), followed by those aware of the existence of Christianity (-6), followed by those with some knowledge of the gospel (-5). Conversion is numerically neutral on the Engel Scale. At its far end are incorporation of the believer into a Christian fellowship (+3) and active gospel propagation by the believer (+2) and active witness (+1). Bridge the knowledge gap often, but not always, involves cross-cultural evangelism.

At the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelism (1974), Ralph Winter argued that 2.7 billion people cannot be won to Christ by “near-neighbor evangelism” since they have no Christian neighbors. Winter said evangelists must cross cultural, language, and geographical barriers, learn the languages and cultures of these unreached peoples, present the gospel to them, and plant culturally relevant churches among them. Winter delineated three kinds of evangelism: same culture (E-1), culture closely related to one’s own (E-2), and culture different from one’s own (E-3). Winter’s emphasis on crossing cultural boundaries to reach other cultural groups laid the foundation for the unreached peoples movement and the AD 2000 and Beyond Movement. Winter clearly distinguishes between evangelism (presenting the gospel to one’s own people) and missions (crossing cultural boundaries).

At the 1978 Lausanne Committee consultation on “Gospel and Culture,” thirty-three missions leaders and theologians drafted The Willowbank Report, which set down a detailed acknowledgment of the critical role of culture in missionary communication. Included in the document were evangelical understandings of culture, Scripture, the content and communication of the gospel, witness among Muslims, a call for humility, and a look at conversion and culture. The authors asserted that conversion should not “de-culturize” a convert (see also Cultural Conversion). They also acknowledged the validity of group, as well as individual, conversions (see also People Movements). Participants noted the difference between regeneration and conversion, the dangers of syncretism, and the church’s influence on culture (see also Gospel and Culture).

As evangelical understanding of culture has progressed, a number of innovative evangelism methods have been advanced. Noting that the theology of the Bible is often encased in stories, Tom Steffen of Biola University and others argue that storytelling can be more effective in oral cultures than the Western-style cognitive teaching approach. Baptists working among the Muslim Kotokoli people of Togo have found that storytelling can lower cultural barriers to the gospel.

Use of Western forms of communication may stigmatize the gospel as alien in some cultures. A cross-cultural approach advocated for SHAME cultures—some Islamic societies, for example—is to emphasize the gospel as the answer for defilement and uncleanness rather than sin and guilt. J. Nathan Corbitt distinguishes between hard media (media more concrete in format and presentation, such as books and films) and soft media (media allowing flexibility during its creation and use, such as storytelling, drama, music, and conversation). Corbitt says that to communicate across cultures, evangelists must “soften” their media—using local people and focusing on the process of Christianity rather than its specific products—to spark the greatest amount of understanding and communication within a community.

Some critics have questioned the effectiveness of popular evangelism tools such as the Jesus Film and Evangelism Explosion when used apart from an adequate understanding of the culture. Steffen argues that before the Jesus film is shown, the audience’s worldview must be known, the presenters must earn the right to be heard, the film must be seen first by the community’s information gatekeepers, the presenters must grasp how the community makes decisions and must know how to incorporate converts into healthy churches, and the audience must have a significant foundation for the gospel. Not to have these cultural prerequisites in place, he and others argue, is to invite nominalism or syncretism with our evangelism.

STANLEY M. GUTHRIE

Cross-Cultural Ministry. The theological basis for cross-cultural ministry lies in its examples within both Old and New Testaments, coupled with the universal nature of the Christian faith and the Lord’s Commission to “disciple the nations.” It may be further argued that the incarnation of Christ demands that we take culture seriously in ministry, because it is in the realities of the cultural context that the gospel is manifested (see Incarnational Mission). Thus Gitari has written, “Jesus did not become a Jew as a convenient illustration of general truths. He came into real problems, debates, issues struggles and conflicts which concerned the Jewish people.” The gospel requires specific cultural contexts in which to be manifested.

The missionary expansion of the church from its earliest days is evidence of the seriousness with which Christians have grasped and implemented cross-cultural ministry. In recent times the social sciences have contributed to the conscious acknowledgment of the importance of culture in relation to this missionary endeavor. Eugene A. Nida’s Customs and Cultures stated that “Good missionaries have always been good ‘anthropologists’ . . . on the other hand, some missionaries have been only ‘children of their generation’ and have carried to the field a distorted view of race and progress, culture and civilization, Christian and non-Christian ways of life.”

The context for much nineteenth-century Protestant missions was that of European colonial expansion and this resulted in examples of the export of European culture and expressions of Christianity alongside the gospel (see Colonialism). The twentieth century witnessed first the increasing American missionary endeavor and the rise of Two-Thirds World missions (see Non-Western Mission Boards and Societies). As a result of the internationalizing of missions and the globalization of communications (with its own consequences in terms of cultural change), the issues of culture and mission are today even more complex. Complementing the recognition of the importance of culture in missionary communication has been an examination of culture itself from a Christian and biblical perspective. In the New Testament we find that Paul’s willingness to lay aside personal freedoms and status for the sake of the gospel (1 Cor. 8:9–13; 9:22; Phil. 3:8) illustrate the primacy of the gospel over the messenger’s attitudes and behavior.

Bishop Stephen Neill has asserted that there are some customs which the gospel cannot tolerate, there are some customs which can be tolerated for the time being, and there are customs which are fully acceptable to the gospel. The Lausanne Covenant affirmed that “Culture must always be tested and judged by Scripture. Because man is God’s creature, some of his culture is rich in beauty and goodness. Because he is fallen, all of it is tainted with sin and some of it is demonic.” Bishop David Gitari has welcomed this emphasis that “all cultures must always be tested by the scriptures.”

The relativization of the cultural expressions of the Christian faith has resulted in the popular acceptance within missions of the concept of contextualization, which aims to be faithful to Scripture and relevant to culture. Such an approach intends to apply the absolutes to which Scripture refers within a plurality of culturally appropriate forms. However, disquiet at the prominence currently given to contextualization in missiology was expressed by Christians with a Reformed perspective at a Caucus on Mission to Muslims held at Four Brooks Conference Centre in 1985.

The practical expression of the Christian faith in a culture is a pioneer venture which is liable to the criticism that the true nature of the gospel may become distorted by syncretism or compromise. In the West there has been a debate between evangelicals and liberal Christians over how best to represent Christianity within a modern scientific culture. In the Muslim world, Phil Parshall’s New Paths in Muslim Evangelism laid out the contextualization of Christian mission among Muslims (see Muslim Mission Work). This not only covered issues of communication, “theological bridges to salvation,” but also the forms and practices of a culturally relevant “Muslim-convert church.” Others have argued that the creation of separate convert churches and the Christianization of Muslim devotional means in “Jesus Mosques” (such as the position of prayer or putting the Bible on a special stand) fall short of the requirements for Christian unity in Muslim lands where historic Christian communities exist. This debate is a reminder that Christian mission needs to be sensitive to a broader range of issues than the culture of the unevangelized.

PATRICK SOOKHdeo

Cross-Cultural Ministry

Cross-Cultural Research. Cross-cultural research forms an essential base in missiological research. Whether one is researching a church context or a non-Christian context across cultural boundaries, several concerns apply: an appropriate research design, valid and reliable methods of data collection and analysis, and appropriate application.

The research design may depend on a single disciplinary perspective such as anthropology or cross-cultural communication. More often it will depend on the integration of several different disciplines, such as theology, ANTHROPOLOGY, COMMUNICATION, SOCIOLOGY, political science, and LEADERSHIP THEORY. For the design to provide trustworthy results the cultural perspectives of both the researchers and the community being studied must be brought in focus. Furthermore, one should review the WORLDVIEW assumptions of the theory being used to structure the design because every theory and its development come out of a cultural context. No theory is "culture-free." The theory undergirding the design must allow the explanations of the data to address categories of thinking in the situation being studied. For example, if one's research assumptions preclude the possibility of the miraculous, a study of the religious experience of new churches in Argentina would not produce trustworthy results from the perspective of Argentine Christians.

Data collection and analysis methods often require multiple perspectives to see clearly across cultural boundaries. Like looking into a house, it is helpful to look through several windows in order to gain an understanding of what is inside. The view from a single window may help with one room, but will not provide access to other parts of a house. Similarly, when seeking to do cross-cultural research, the use of more than one perspective may not just be helpful; it may be essential. Even when researchers have used multiple perspectives, their own cultural biases will tend to condition the processes of data collection, analysis, and application.

When crossing cultural boundaries the definition of what is regarded as true and ethical may differ. In more oral-based traditions or strongly patriarchal settings what the older and respected "authorities" have said will take on a larger significance. Whereas in one culture, what is in print may be seen as "public domain," in another culture use of the same data may lead to charges of plagiarism. What is accepted as a method of data collection in one setting may either be unknown or mistrusted in another. Trustworthy methods often require a pilot test to identify what will produce valid and reliable results. The outsider will look from a different perspective (etic) from the insider (emic) to both describe and explain what is observed in terms of either experience or documents. An outsider may observe phenomena that appear to be significant, but are not significant to the insider. For example, while using phonetics one may distinguish different sounds in the ways that different people say the same words. The sounds may be consistently different, but insignificant and meaningless to the insider. Or, the outsider may simply miss what is considered significant by the insider. For example, in doing research into public health matters in northwest Kenya, a Western researcher may simply miss the issues of cursing. What the people believe and practice about cursing deeply influences public health from the perspective of the Turkana. The Western researcher, even if informed of its local significance, may dismiss the issue as irrelevant superstition and fail to address issues considered to be very significant among the Turkana. Traditional Turkana people often ask "who" caused an illness rather than "what" caused it.

To apply research findings collected across cultural boundaries requires great care. Worldview differences expressed in values, categories, perceptual styles, assumptions, and local expressions in both action and language all present serious stumbling blocks to the normal constraints of generalizability. Any well-designed research project will have a defined scope and further constraints imposed by the parameters of the specific methods of data collection and analysis. However, to apply the research across cultural barriers presents another set of applicational constraints. One cannot assume that what is perceived as true or believable in one culture, will necessarily be perceived that way in another culture. Nor can one assume that what would be an appropriate application in one setting will necessarily be appropriate in another.

Cross-cultural research, then, should always take into account the cultures of the researcher, the research subjects, and the theory that may be used in the research design.

EDGAR J. ELLISTON

SEE ALSO Ethnographic Research; Research.

Crowther, Samuel Adjai (c. 1808–91). Nigerian explorer and missionary statesman. The son of a royal Yoruba family in what is now Nigeria, Crowther was taken as a slave when a youth. Freed by the British, he was settled in Sierra Leone and learned Christianity from the missionaries there.

After studies in England, Crowther was among the first to enroll at and graduate from Fourah Bay College in Freetown. He was ordained in the Anglican Church in 1843.

Crowther's name is intimately associated with the Niger River, first as an explorer and then as leader of the mission efforts of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS). He represented the CMS on three expeditions up the Niger sponsored by the British.

It soon became clear that the Niger River was deadly for Europeans, who were not resistant to tropical diseases. Thus, HENRY VENN sponsored the idea of an all-African team of missionaries to work in the Niger River area.

Crowther was installed as bishop of the Niger territories and sent on his way together with assistants from Sierra Leone. The initial work was slow and difficult because of poor communication, pagan persecution, incompetent assistants, and the criticisms of ethnocentric missionaries from England. But Crowther was a man of sterling character who continued the work until he died in his early eighties. His career is a lasting reminder of what Africans accomplished for God during the nineteenth century.

TIMOTHY MONSMA

Crusade Evangelism. Modern crusade evangelism began in the eighteenth century when a mighty movement of God was birthed in North America and Europe. This movement in America, known as the GREAT AWAKENING, was the catalyst for thousands coming to a saving faith in Jesus Christ. The major personalities of this time were GEORGE WHITEFIELD in North America and JOHN WESLEY in England. Their dynamic preaching attracted some of the largest crowds ever to hear the gospel.

Whitefield developed the practice of preaching in the open fields in England when he was not allowed to preach in many of the English pulpits. From this practice an evangelistic ministry surfaced that took Whitefield across the face of England and up the Atlantic Coast in America. A process was begun in which masses of people would gather to hear the Bible preached and seek spiritual renewal. This planned process of revivalism became a major evangelistic tool for reaching the lost.

Wesley soon joined Whitefield in his practice of open-air preaching. Crowds of over thirty thousand flocked to hear Wesley preach. Receiving great opposition from the clergy, he declared that the world was his parish. As the demand for preaching grew, Wesley began to appoint laity to preach. He soon developed routes for his circuit preaching evangelists to travel. Wesley spent the rest of his life organizing the converts into Methodist societies.

The First Great Awakening set the stage for the planned revivalism of the nineteenth century. During the Second Great Awakening, frontier camp meetings were held in which thousands of people, of many different denominations, would come to hear gospel preaching. The camp meetings came to be held annually and took the form of protracted meetings. A starting date was planned but no conclusion.

Many notable evangelists arose during the nineteenth century. The first evangelist of great significance was CHARLES FINNEY (1792–1875). Finney instituted innovative methods called New Measures, which encouraged persons under conviction to come forward and seek salvation. Finney's New Measures included anxious meetings in which the anxious could come to a reserved section and be led immediately to Christ. Finney is remembered as the "Father of Modern Evangelism."

The year 1875 marked the last year of Finney's ministry and the first major American evangelistic campaign of D. L. MOODY (1835–99). Moody and his musician, Ira Sankey, led major crusades in England and America. Moody concentrated his efforts in the cities, believing that if he could reach the cities, he could better impact the country. He repeatedly filled the auditoriums of America's largest cities, regularly preaching to crowds up to 15,000. Moody traveled over one million miles and spoke to over one hundred million people.

A contemporary of Moody was Sam Jones (1847–1906). Whereas Moody focused on regeneration, Jones focused on reformation. He maintained a close connection between conversion and moral issues. He averaged nearly two thousand conversions per crusade, recorded over five hundred thousand professions of faith, and spoke to well over twenty-five million people.

R. A. TORREY (1856–1928) was one of the great early evangelists of the twentieth century. Torrey and his music assistant Charles Alexander were welcomed as Moody and Sankey's successors. Torrey believed that he was the divinely appointed successor to Moody and prayed that the Lord would send him around the world with the message of salvation. He held crusades across the world with notable crusades in Australia, India, and a four-year campaign in Britain, which claimed over one hundred thousand converts. His American crusades were highly successful as he gained notoriety for challenging atheists and was successful in refuting prominent Universalists and Unitarians.

D. L. Moody referred to J. WILBUR CHAPMAN (1859–1918) as the greatest evangelist in the country, Chapman became widely known for his use of the simultaneous crusade. He would divide cities into districts; evangelists would hold meetings that preceded the main crusade. He also utilized various specialists whom he believed would appeal to specific groups. His specialists included social activists, athletes, representatives of the various denominations, children’s specialists, and reformed alcoholics and gamblers.
Crusade Evangelism

Wilbur Chapman left evangelism in 1895 for the pastorate and was succeeded by his crusade director Billy Sunday (1862–1935). Sunday was a former professional baseball player for the Chicago White Stockings. His preaching style was dramatic and included acrobatics and theatrics. Sunday erected giant wooden tabernacles, some holding up to twenty-five thousand, to accommodate the crowds. Those who responded to Sunday’s invitation were called “trail hitters,” reflecting Sunday’s key phrase in the invitation to “hit the sawdust trail.” In all, Sunday preached to over one hundred million people and led over a million persons to faith in Christ.

During the twentieth century many notable crusade evangelists engaged successfully in crusade evangelistic efforts around the world. Prominent Africa-American crusade evangelists include Howard Jones and Ralph Bell. American Pentecostals who conducted massive healing crusades include Oral Roberts, Kathryn Kuhlman, and Benny Hinn. In Latin American contexts crusade evangelists include Indians Abdiyah Akbar Abdul-Haq, Robert Cunville, and Ravi Zacharias as well as African Benson Idahosa, Ugandan FESTO KIVENGERE, and Zambian Nevers Mumba are well known. Additionally, Pentecostals such as American T. L. Osborne and German Reinhard Bonnke have conducted large-scale crusades across the continent. Prominent Asian crusade evangelists include Indians Abdiyah Akbar Abdul-Haq, Robert Cunville, and Ravi Zacharias as well as Sri Lankan Ajith Fernando. In the South Pacific, Australian Bill Newman is well known.

Perhaps no evangelist of any century, however, has had the impact of Billy Graham. Born in 1918, Graham was converted under the preaching of Evangelist Mordecai Ham. As a young minister, Graham received much notoriety as the key speaker for Youth for Christ in rallies across the country. However, it was his 1949 crusade in Los Angeles that launched his ministry into the greatest crusade ministry in revival history. Like many great evangelists before him, Graham preached numerous crusades overseas, including major efforts in Australia, England, China, Eastern Europe, and the former Soviet Union.

Over the years crusade evangelistic efforts have had their share of detractors. Controversies over excessive lifestyles and integrity issues have exposed those who have engaged in crusade ministry for personal gain. They have also resulted in better accountability structures among those who might be tempted to move in such a direction. In any event, however, there is no doubt that the varied forms of crusade evangelism have played, and will continue to play, a vital role in mission and world evangelization.

Frank Harber

Bibliography. E. E. Cairns, An Endless Line of Splendor: Revivals and Their Leaders from the Great Awakening to the Present; S. Huston, Crusade Evangelism and the Local Church; B. R. Lacy, Jr., Revivals in the Midst of the Years; W. L. Muncy, Jr., History of Evangelism in the United States; P. Scharff, History of Evangelism: Three Hundred Years of Evangelism in Germany, Great Britain, and the United States of America; M. Taylor, Exploring Evangelism: History, Methods, Theology.

Crusades, The. Military expeditions against various enemies of the medieval church, especially the campaigns that tried to free the Holy Land from the Muslims. Christians had gone on pilgrimages to the Holy Land during much of the medieval period, but with the arrival of the Seljuk Turks their travels were hampered. These invaders also pressured the Eastern Empire to such an extent that the emperor contacted the pope and other leaders of Western Europe to send mercenaries to help defend the Byzantine Empire. Pope Urban II responded to this appeal by proclaiming the First Crusade in a sermon at Clermont (1095). The primary reason for the Crusades was religious, for they constituted a holy war, and following Urban’s appeal there was an outpouring of religious enthusiasm. In addition, the pope saw in the Crusades an outlet for the energies of the warring nobles of Europe. The First Crusade, consisting of about five thousand fighting men, moved overland to Constantinople and proceeded to conquer territory in Asia Minor and the Levant. The conquest of Jerusalem was accompanied by a frightful slaughter of the inhabitants. The Crusaders did not drive the Turks from the Middle East, but they established several states that resulted in a balance of power among them, the Byzantines, and the Muslims. When the Crusader states were endangered, Bernard of Clairvaux organized the Second Crusade (1147), which was defeated. A Third Crusade (1189–92) resulted in a three-year truce and the granting of free access to Jerusalem for Christian pilgrims. This arrangement collapsed and further Crusades were necessary. The few knights who answered Innocent III’s call to the Fourth Crusade (1202–4) were unable to pay the passage charges demanded by the Venetians. This led the two groups to strike a bargain and agree to attack Constantinople. After conquering and sacking the city, the Crusaders set up the Latin Empire of Constantinople and forgot about recovering the Holy Land. During the thirteenth century there were more Crusades such as the Children’s Crusade, the Sixth Crusade led by the excommuni-Cuba (Est. 2000 pop.: 11,385,000; 110,861 sq. km. [42,803 sq. mi.]). Cuba's religious disposition has been strongly conditioned by its close ties with Spain. With a large European population and its status as a Spanish dependency until 1898, the island had a well-entrenched Roman Catholic establishment existing side by side with a well-developed tradition of SECULARISM. Neither of these ideological orientations filtered down to the level of the typical rural Cuban, whose devotion to the church was limited and whose personal beliefs were likely to be those of Afro-Caribbean folk culture. Students of Cuban development recognize that institutional religion itself was weak. Protestant churches were largely urban in an agricultural society, and both the Protestant and Catholic churches were perceived as being foreign-based institutions. The Protestant presence was the result of the religious pluralism and anticlericalism that were part of the struggle for Cuban independence prior to 1898, as well as the increased mainland influence from expatriate Cubans and Protestant missionaries.

Despite the current absence of a foreign missionary force, reports of religious revival in Cuba indicate that evangelical Christianity remains hardy. Presently there are a reported 150,000 active evangelicals in Cuba, representing dozens of denominations, among them various Baptist and Pentecostal bodies.

SEE ALSO Caribbean.

---

Cults, Cultism. Cults and new religious movements tend to emerge during times of social change and cultural upheaval. Whether the locale is North America or in a developing nation, cults are most successful when people experience alienation, rootlessness, and uncertainty as a result of rapid social change. When people experience a dislocation from previously stable social structures, they often question the efficacy and relevance of traditional social institutions like the family, government, and conventional religion. From the perspective of biblical Christianity, the new cultic movements are viewed as spiritual counterfeits and their leaders as false prophets.

It is imperative that Christians involved in missions be aware of the intrusion of these groups into mission fields around the globe. Cult missionaries can be found in virtually every country where evangelicals are ministering. In those countries where Christianity is not the dominant religion, indigenous populations are often unable to distinguish between legitimate Christian witness and the outreach of cultists because the latter often claim to be Christian and invoke the Bible as a source of their authority. It is essential, therefore, that Christian missionaries work to develop discernment skills among the people they are attempting to disciple.

The need to "guard the gospel" is illustrated by an event experienced a few years ago by a young couple involved in missionary service in Martinique, a French island in the West Indies. There they led a church-planting ministry that required heavy investment in personal evangelism and community outreach. From their labors there emerged a tiny church that gradually grew to the point of self-sufficiency. But while the missionaries were away on a leave of absence, the infant church was invaded by JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. When they returned, they discovered that many of the members, including some of the leaders, had been influenced by the teachings of that cult and had joined with them.

This scenario is repeated over and over worldwide. New Christians, lacking a solid foundation in the faith and knowing little about the strategies and hallmarks of cults and aberrational Christian groups, are caught in a snare of deception and false teaching. It has been said that because of the enormous recent increase of cultic missionary activity overseas, missionaries today are often as likely to confront someone from an American-based cult as they are someone from another world religion. The missionary zeal of the cults in many instances surpasses that of Christian denominations.
Cults, Cultism

There are several ways to define cultism and to understand how cults work. It is possible to analyze cults from sociological, psychological, and theological perspectives. For the Christian, it is important to consider the truth-claims of any religious group. God’s objective truth, as revealed in Scripture, is the standard for evaluating all belief and practice. Therefore, any group, movement, or teaching may be considered cultic to the degree that it deviates from the Holy Scriptures as interpreted by orthodox, biblical Christianity and as expressed in such statements as the Apostles’ Creed.

The majority of people who join cults are consciously or unconsciously embarked on a spiritual search. Some converts to new religious movements are vulnerable because they have no formal religious affiliation whatsoever and therefore lack the necessary discernment skills to evaluate the many religious groups that beckon. Someone has said that “nature abhors a vacuum.” It is especially during times of cultural up-heaval that people, uprooted from traditional ways of thinking, are susceptible to the influx of new ideas. G. K. Chesterton once remarked that when people cease to believe in God, they do not believe in nothing. They believe in anything.

What is an appropriate response for the Christian missionary to the cultists who are engaged in real spiritual competition for the souls of searching individuals? First, we must recognize that to reject the cultic alternatives to Christianity is not to suggest that there is no truth in them. Error is always built on a foundation of half-truths. Spiritual counterfeits often contain an element of the real thing. Until we identify the web of error that characterizes all groups which depart from the baseline of truth found in the Bible, we have only partially understood the dynamics of the cults and new religions. When missionaries encounter members of cults and new religious movements, they can affirm the cultists’ spiritual search while at the same time refuse to accept the presuppositions they may hold. We should seek to establish a common ground rather than attempt to win an argument. Many cultists, for example, share the Christian’s concern for the environment, world peace, and alleviating hunger. Seeking common ground with the cultist will provide an opportunity to introduce the claims of Jesus Christ.

It goes without saying that missionaries (or any serious Christian) attempting to reach cultists for Christ must be sure of their own faith and be able to give a reason for the hope that is in us. In the final analysis, the clash between Christianity and the cultic ways of understanding reality results from differences in worldviews. The Christian missionary must be prepared to present an alternative model of spirituality, an alternative worldview that is centered on biblical faith and the person of Jesus Christ. All believers are necessarily engaged in the task of apologetics, or defending the Christian faith.

Cultic movements gain most of their converts not from other world religions but from the ranks of Christians who are lacking a solid biblical foundation for their faith and who are naive regarding the recruitment tactics of cults. Therefore, it is imperative that mission agencies and non-Western church leaders give priority to the task of educating new Christians about the dangers of false teaching and demonstrating how to effectively respond to the cultic challenge. In short, while evangelizing cults and new religions may be part of the missionary’s opportunity to share the gospel of Christ, more attention should be given to the task of equipping local believers to become grounded in the faith so that they can discern truth from error and therefore avoid cultic entrapment.

Just as missionaries must be familiar with the culture and religion of the people they want to reach, they must also attempt to learn as much as possible about the cult or new religious movement that is often seeking to proselytize nonbelievers and immature Christians. It is also important to identify the reasons why people are attracted to cults. It is easy to overlook the fact that theological and doctrinal attractions are often secondary to personal and social reasons. People find cults appealing because the groups meet basic human needs: the need to be affirmed, the need for community and family, the need for purpose and commitment, and the need for spiritual fulfillment.

The tragedy is that cults often exploit the significant human and spiritual needs that are going unmet in today’s world. As missionaries approach the task of equipping local Christians, they must first examine their own commitment to the truth of the gospel and to the authority of God’s Word. Once we understand that the gospel is really true and stands up to the most difficult scrutiny, our own faith is enlarged and we become more eager to encourage the faith of others. We all need to develop a firm framework of discernment from which we can operate. From that framework, the missionary can help young Christians to understand two core characteristics of all cultic teachings: (1) A false or inadequate basis of salvation. The apostle Paul made a distinction that is basic to our understanding of truth when he wrote, “For it is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast” (Eph. 2:8–9). All cultic deviations tend to downplay or distort the finished work of Christ on the cross and emphasize the role of earning moral acceptance before God through our own righteous works as a basis of salvation. (2) A false basis of authority. Biblical Christianity by definition takes the Bible as its yardstick for determining truth, whether in matters of faith or in practice. Cults, on the other hand, commonly resort to extra-biblical revelation as the substantial basis of their theology (e.g., Unificationists rely on the Divine Principle of Rev. Moon, the Mormons cite The Book of Mormon).

Just as Christian believers in the West have historically been involved in and supportive of overseas or “foreign” missions, we must also be sensitive to the fact that cults are expanding their influence worldwide. The cults are coming, but equally important is the reality that the cults are going. Are we prepared for the inevitable spiritual and human casualties that such movements leave in their wake?

RONALD ENROTH

Cultural Anthropology. See ANTHROPOLOGY.

Cultural Conversion. Conversion of a people from one culture to another. It is contrasted by Charles Kraft with “Christian conversion,” defined as the biblically advocated yet culturally appropriate conversion of persons from their old allegiance to an allegiance to Christ.

Most of the early advocates of Christianity understandably felt that true Christianity could only be properly expressed in the cultural forms in which they had received it. They, therefore, sought to convert Gentiles both to Christ and to Jewish culture. But God insisted on granting the Holy Spirit even to Gentiles on the basis of faith alone without the necessity of converting to Jewish culture. In agreeing with God’s approach, the early church strongly asserted in Acts 15 that Christian witnesses were not to require Gentiles to convert to Jewish culture in order to be acceptable to God. They thus established the principle of faith-only in place of the faith-plus-culture requirement for conversion.

The church has, however, gone back on that agreement constantly throughout history when taking the gospel to other societies. Both Roman Catholics and Protestants have been guilty of requiring conversion to the specific cultural forms of their home denomination in order to be truly Christian. Sometimes missionaries have even resorted to providing food, money, or political favors to win converts to their way of doing things. Such tactics led to the label “rice Christians” for those who converted merely for what they could gain culturally.

The missionary cry of the late nineteenth century, “civilize in order to evangelize,” was one of the more blatant calls to cultural conversion, making as it did at least a partial conversion to Western culture a requirement for entrance into Christianity. The assumption that people had to become Westerners culturally in order to be truly Christian provided the motivation for approaches to mission in non-Western societies that emphasized the setting up of Western-style schools, churches, and other institutions.

The contextualization movement, as advocated by evangelicals (in contrast to a liberal approach), is an attempt to rectify this cultural and theological fallacy. Its aim is to enable the people of each society to experience a genuine and growing relationship with Jesus Christ in a biblically sound yet culturally understandable and appropriate manner.

CHARLES H. KRAFT

The Cultural Mandate. The expression “cultural mandate” refers to God’s command to Adam and Eve to “rule over” creation (Gen. 1:28), meaning to share with God in the management of all that he had made. This mandate was issued before the Fall occurred (Gen. 3), and obviously it precedes the missionary mandate (the GREAT COMMISSION; Matt. 28:18–20). The cultural mandate remains in force and its implications for Christian mission are important.

The cultural mandate has several parts. The first is the command to “be fruitful, increase in number, and fill the earth” (Gen. 1:28). This is the basic command to build community with the building blocks of marriage and family (Gen. 2:24). Here lies the foundation of human society.

The second part has to do with the naming of the animals (Gen. 2:19–20), where Adam’s mental and aesthetic gifts along with his decision-making capacity were called into action. Implied in the command to name the animals is humankind’s responsibility to study the universe, unlock its secrets, use judiciously its potential, and glorify God for the beauty and variety of creation.

The third part of the cultural mandate appears in Genesis 2:15, where Adam and Eve are placed in a bountiful garden and told to “work it and take care of it.” Properly tended, the garden would provide amply for their physical needs and those of their descendants. Implied in this command is our responsibility for the natural environment, the air, soil, water, plants, and minerals, which must be diligently cared for and never exploited or misused.
The Cultural Mandate

Fourth, the cultural mandate includes the elements of reflection and celebration. This is implied by the fact that when he had finished creating, God evaluated what he had made, declared it to be “good” (Gen. 1:31), and set aside a day to celebrate and enjoy the fruit of his work (Gen. 2:1). So important to God was this element of rest, reflection, and celebration that he explicitly set aside one day in seven in the Ten Commandments given to Israel (Exod. 20:8).

The Fall of Humankind occurred (Gen. 3), and since that time members of the human race individually and collectively have transgressed the cultural mandate in every imaginable way. Yet its basic precepts remain intact, and the consequences of disregarding them are visible everywhere. To a bewildered and suffering world Christian mission points back to Genesis, to our first parents’ rebellion and to the transgression of God’s original mandate, to explain the source of the evils that now plague humanity.

There is still more to the cultural mandate so far as mission is concerned. Serious reflection on the cultural mandate enlarges the Christian message so that it addresses everything that God made, sin corrupted, and Christ makes new. It propels Christian activity into every area of human life and every corner of the world to combat evil and falsehood and promote mercy, righteousness, and truth.

The cultural mandate calls for an approach to education that begins with the presupposition that the world belongs to God and he has mandated how humans should relate to one another and treat his whole creation. Reflection on the cultural mandate leads Christians to see that their responsibilities before God are not limited to activities in the institutional church, nor to personal and private spirituality. They include all the arenas of life, the social, economic, political and scientific. In each of these arenas they honor God as they promote truth and mercy and apply scriptural principles to the affairs of life.

Tension has sometimes developed between those who stress the cultural mandate with its broad implications for Christian involvement and those who stress the missionary mandate (Matt. 28:18–20) that emphasizes preaching, making disciples, and establishing churches. The following clarifications and distinctions need to be made.

First, in a fallen world, people need to hear the gospel of Jesus Christ more than they need anything else. Therefore the missionary mandate takes precedence over the cultural mandate. But this does not mean that the missionary mandate replaces or swallows up the cultural mandate. Christians are obliged to obey both mandates, though in the order of missionary activity the proclamation of the gospel to the unsaved is primary.

Second, the witness of Christian lives in which Christ is honored as Lord over all affairs is highly important for the advance of the gospel. Likewise, deeds of mercy to the suffering and needy bear eloquent testimony to God’s mercy in Christ. But our best works are flawed by imperfections and can never substitute for the word-proclamation of the gospel of God’s grace in Christ. The Christian life may give “flesh” to the word, but the Word is always necessary because it points beyond human imperfections to the perfect Savior Jesus Christ.

Third, churches as institutions ought to focus on the task of proclaiming the gospel and discipling believers. Church members, acting in conjunction with the broader Christian community, should be taught and encouraged to apply the teachings of the gospel to social, cultural, and political issues. Even when the Christian community as a whole is derelict in its cultural obligations, it is unwise and inappropriate for organized churches to plunge into matters that are not their primary responsibility, because the specific task of churches is defined by the missionary mandate rather than the cultural mandate.

Christian day schools and colleges play a vital role in educating succeeding generations of children and youth to enter life with a conscious recognition of their calling to be salt and light in all spheres of life (Matt. 5:12–16). Christian education’s primary responsibility lies in the area of the cultural mandate. Nevertheless, Christian education takes place in the New Testament age which is dominated by the missionary mandate. For that reason, Christian teachers should impress upon students the missionary claims of the gospel and the urgency of world evangelization.

RoGer S. Greenway

See Also Evangelism and Social Responsibility.

Culture. The word “culture” may point to many things—the habits of the social elite; disciplined tastes expressed in the arts, literature, and entertainment; particular stages of historical and human development. We use the term “culture” to refer to the common ideas, feelings, and values that guide community and personal behavior, that organize and regulate what the group thinks, feels, and does about God, the world, and humanity. It explains why the Sawi people of Irian Jaya regard betrayal as a virtue, while the American sees it as a vice. It undergirds the Korean horror at the idea of Westerners’ placing their elderly parents in retirement homes, and Western horror at the idea of the Korean veneration of their ancestors. It is the climate of opinion that encourages an Eskimo to share his wife with a guest and hides the wife of an Iranian fundamentalist Muslim in a body-length veil. The closest New Testament approximation for culture is kosmos (world), but only when it refers to language-bound, organized human life (1 Cor. 14:10) or the sin-contaminated system of values, traditions, and social structures of which we are a part (John 17:11).

Cultures are patterns shared by, and acquired in, a social group. Large enough to contain subcultures within itself, a culture is shared by the society, the particular aggregate of persons who participate in it. In that social group we learn and live out our values.

The social and kinship connections that shape a group of people vary from culture to culture. Americans in general promote strong individualism and nuclear families, usually limited tightly to grandparents, parents, and children. Individual initiative and decision making are encouraged by the belief in individual progress. By comparison, Asians and Africans as a rule define personal identity in terms of the family, clan, or kinship group. Families are extended units with wide connections. And decision making is a social, multipersonal choice reflecting those connections: “We think, therefore I am.”

Cultures are not haphazard collections of isolated themes. They are integrated, holistic patterns structured around the meeting of basic human needs. Their all-embracing nature, in fact, is the assumption behind the divine calling to humankind to image God’s creative work by taking up our own creative cultural work in the world (Gen. 1:28–30; see CULTURAL MANDATE). Eating and drinking and whatever cultural activities we engage in (1 Cor. 10:31)—all show the mark of interrelationship as God’s property and ours (1 Cor. 3:16–23). Thus the Dogon people of central Mali build their homes, cultivate their land, and plan their villages in the shape of an oval egg. This represents their creation myth of the great placenta from which emerged all space, all living beings, and everything in the world.

Among the ancient Chinese the cosmic pattern of balance and harmony, the yin and the yang, was to be re-created again and again in daily decisions. The yin was negative, passive, weak, and destructive. The yang was positive, active, strong, and constructive. Individuality came from these opposites. The yin was female, mother, soft, dark; the yang was male, father, hard, bright. The decisions where to live and where to be buried were made by choosing a site in harmony with these opposites.

The anthropological theory of functionalism underlined this holism; subsequent studies, however, have introduced modifications. Functionalism tended to assume that cultures were fully integrated and coherent bounded sets. Later scholarship, wary of the static coloring, admits that this is only more or less so. Cultures are neither aggregates of accumulated traits nor seamless garments. There is a dynamic to human cultures that makes full integration incomplete; gaps and inconsistencies provide opportunities for change and modification, some rapid and some slow.

The Dimensions of Culture. All cultures shape their models of reality around three dimensions: the cognitive (What do we know?); the affective (What do we feel?); the evaluative (Where are our values and allegiances?). The cognitive dimension varies from culture to culture. Take, for example, the view of time. In the West time is a linear unity of past, present, and infinite future; in Africa time is basically a two-dimensional phenomenon, with a long past, a present, and an immediate future. Similarly, cultures differ in their conceptions of space, that is what they consider to be public, social, personal, and intimate zones. For an American, the personal zone extends from one foot to three feet away, the intimate zone from physical contact to a foot away. For Latin Americans the zones are smaller. Thus when an Anglo engages a Latino in casual conversation, the Latino perceives the Anglo as distant and cold. Why? What for the Anglo is the social zone is for the Latino the public zone.

Affective and evaluative dimensions also differ from culture to culture. Beauty in the eye of a Japanese beholder is a garden of flowers and empty space carefully planned and arranged to heighten the deliberative experience. To the Westerner a garden’s beauty is found in floral profusion and variety.

Whom can we marry? In the West that is an individual decision; in clan-oriented societies the kinship group or the family decides. Among the Dogon a man’s wife should be chosen from among the daughters of a maternal uncle; the girl becomes a symbolic substitute for her husband’s mother; a reenactment of mythical incest found among the daughters of a maternal uncle; the girl becomes a symbolic substitute for her husband’s mother; a reenactment of mythical incest found in the Dogon account of the creation of the universe. Among the kings of Hawaii and the pharaohs of Egypt, brother-sister marriage was practiced to preserve lineal purity and family inheritance.

The Levels of Cultures. Cultures are also multilayered models of reality. Like a spiral, they move from the surface level of what we call customs through the cognitive, affective, and evaluative dimensions to the deep level of WORLDVIEW. To illustrate, the Confucian ethic of moral etiquette consists largely in making sure that relationships properly reflect the hierarchical scale. In China and Korea, where cultural backgrounds are shaped deeply by the Confucian ethic, the idea of Li (righteousness) makes specific demands at different cultural levels: different forms of speech in addressing people on different levels of the social scale; ritual practices; rules of propriety; observance of sharply defined understandings of the relationships of king to subject, older brother to younger brother, husband to wife, father to son. And linking all these together is the religious perception of their specific places, in the Tao (the Way, the rule of heaven).
Culture

In this process, cultural forms (e.g., language, gestures, relationships, money, clothing) are invested with symbolic meanings conventionally accepted by the community. They interpret the forms and stamp them with meaning and value (see Symbol, Symbolism). Each cultural form, ambivalent by itself, thus becomes a hermeneutical carrier of values, attitudes, and connotations. Clothing can indicate social status, occupation, level of education, ritual participation. Foot washing in ancient Hebrew culture became an expression of hospitality (Luke 7:44). In Christian ritual it became a symbol of humble service (John 13:4–5).

This symbolic arbitrariness can either help or hinder communication between persons and groups. Jesus’ reproof of hypocrites as a generation of vipers (Luke 3:7) would be a great compliment to the Balinese, who regard the viper as a sacred animal of paradise. On the other hand, his rebuke of the cunning Herod as that fox (Luke 13:32) would make good sense to the same Balinese, in whose fables the jackal plays a treacherous part. The Korean concept of Li (righteousness) can be a point of contact with the Bible, but also a point of confusion, as the Confucian focus on works confronts the Pauline focus on grace.

At the core of all cultures is the deep level where worldviews, the prescientific factories and bank vaults of presuppositions, are generated and stored. Here the human heart (Prov. 4:23; Jer. 29:13; Matt. 12:34), the place where our most basic commitments exist, responds to those divine constants or universals that are reshaped by every culture (Rom. 2:14–15). Twisted by the impact of sin and shaped by time and history, those internalizations produce cultures that both obey and pervert God’s demands (Rom. 1:18–27). In some cultures, for example, murder is condemned, but becomes an act of bravery when the person killed belongs to a different social group. Other peoples view theft as wrong, but only when it involves the stealing of public property. Thus Native Americans, who see the land as a common possession of all, as the mother of all life, view the white intruders with their assumption of private ownership as thieves. When the Masai of Africa steal cattle, they do not regard the act as theft, for they see all cattle as their natural possession by way of gift from God.

Besides reflecting and reshaping God’s demands, cultures are also the means of God’s common grace. Through his providential control God uses the shaping of human cultures to check the rampant violence of evil and preserve human continuity. They provide guidelines to restrain our worst impulses, sanctions of shame or guilt to keep us in line. Cultures and worldviews, then, are not simply neutral road maps. Created by those who bear the image of God (Gen. 1:27–28), they display, to greater or lesser degree, both the wisdom of God and the flaws of sin.

Religion, given this understanding, cannot be, as functionalism argues, simply one of many human needs demanding satisfaction. As the human response to the revelation of God, it permeates the whole of life. It is the core in the structuring of culture, the integrating and radical response of humanity to the revelation of God. Life is religion.

In the building of culture, worldview or religion is the central controlling factor: (1) it explains how and why things came to be as they are, and how and why they continue or change; (2) it validates the basic institutions, values, and goals of a society; (3) it provides psychological reinforcement for the group; (4) it integrates the society, systematizing and ordering the culture’s perceptions of reality into an overall design; (5) it provides, within its conservativism, opportunities for perceptual shifts and alterations in conceptual structuring. This fifth characteristic of worldview, that is, susceptibility to change, opens the door for the transforming leaven of the gospel. The coming of Christ as both Savior and judge takes every thought captive (2 Cor. 10:5). When that divine work is initiated, people, under the impulse of the Spirit, begin to change their worldview and, as a result, their culture.

In the language of cultural anthropology, the change wrought by the gospel is a threefold process: reevaluation (a change of allegiance), reinterpretation (a change of evaluative principles), and rehabilitation (a series of changes in behavior). With regard to the change in the individual, the Bible speaks of repentance (Luke 5:32) and conversion (Acts 26:20). With regard to the wider social world, it speaks of the new creation (2 Cor. 5:17); the age to come, which has already begun in this present age (Eph. 1:21); and the eschatological renewal of all things (Matt. 19:28), the beginnings of which we taste now in changed behavior (Titus 3:5).

Peripheral changes run the risk of encouraging cultural conversion rather than conversion to Christ. The goal of missions must be larger, to bring our cultures into conformity to the kingdom of God and its fullness. The whole of cultural life ought to be subjected to the royal authority of him who has redeemed us by his blood (Matt. 28:18–20).

HARVIE M. CONN

SEE ALSO Gospel and Culture.
Cultural Learning. The intercultural worker who desires to become competent in the culture of ministry must commit to intentional activities and to a lifestyle that results in cultural learning (see also INTERCULTURAL COMPETENCY). The best time to engage in intentional cultural learning is during the first two years of ministry (see Bonding). If the intercultural worker establishes good habits of intentional learning, those habits will carry on throughout the life of one’s ministry and make a person much more effective. This brief essay highlights seven significant steps in the cultural learning process. Each can be accomplished within the first two years of living and working interculturally.

Language Learning. (See SECOND LANGUAGE ACQUISITION.) Language learning is essential to the whole cultural learning process. Individuals who choose to minister interculturally and do not learn language will always be excluded from a deep understanding of the local culture. While some cultural practices can be picked up through observation of behaviors, the meaning of those practices can only be understood through the language of the local people. In many social settings in the world people speak more than one language. Intercultural workers may be tempted to learn a national language and then presume that this is enough to work among a local people. While the national language is important, the deeper understanding of a local culture requires learning the local language as well. The best way to learn a local language is to employ a local language speaker who has some training in teaching that language and who is willing to teach on an intensive daily basis for a period of at least six months. If such a person is not available, then Brewster and Brewster (1976) have provided a handbook of activities that the learner can use to pick up the local language. While some people find this method very helpful and easy to use, others find it quite difficult. Whatever method you choose, learning the local language is central to deeper cultural understanding.

Economic Relations. Since all intercultural ministry involves working with people, understanding the organization of labor, cultural conceptions of property, and social expectations for payment, borrowing, and exchange is essential to effective ministry activities. These activities are best learned by participant observation in the daily economic activities of people, and by interviewing the people, seeking their explanation of how and why they do what they do. Participant observation can be done while learning language. Inquiry into economic activities, which are daily and ordinary, provides opportunity for developing one’s vocabulary and deepening one’s understanding of the daily life of people. Lingenfelter (1996, 43–96) provides a series of research questions that are useful in the collection of data on property, labor, and exchange, and in the analysis and comparison of those data with one’s home culture.

Social Relations. Every community structures its social relations in accord with principles of kinship, marriage, interest, and other kinds of associations (see ASSOCIATION, SOCIOANTHROPOLOGY OF). Understanding the nature of authority in family and community is crucial to framing ministry activities and working in effective relationships with leaders in the community. Several anthropological tools are very helpful in understanding the structure of social relations. Making maps and doing a census of a particular section of the community will help one learn who is who in a community and how they are connected (or not) to one another. Doing genealogies of selected members in the community provides a conceptual map of how people think about their relationships with reference to kinship ties. The map and the census become extremely useful to intercultural workers because it provides for them names and locations of people with whom they are certain to interact during the ministry. Lingenfelter (1996, 97–143) provides questions on family and community authority that help the researcher understand the structure of authority relationships and compare them with one’s home culture and commitments.

Childrearing. At first glance intercultural workers might wonder if observing childrearing practices has any relationship to intercultural ministry. What they fail to realize is that the children are the most precious resource in any community, and that the parents of children invest much time and effort in transmitting their cultural values and coaching the next generation to become mature and effective adults in the community. Childrearing practices provide direct insight into the deeper values and commitments that are crucial for acceptance and effectiveness in the wider society. It is helpful for the intercultural worker to have intimate relationships with two or three families with children in which they may observe and with whom they may dialogue about the process of raising children. Because children have unique and distinctive personalities, the childrearing process also helps the intercultural worker learn how people in the culture deal with distinctive personalities. This can be most useful when one engages these distinctive Interpersonal Relationships. Every community structures its social relations in accord with principles of kinship, marriage, interest, and other kinds of associations (see ASSOCIATION, SOCIOANTHROPOLOGY OF). Understanding the nature of authority in family and community is crucial to framing ministry activities and working in effective relationships with leaders in the community. Several anthropological tools are very helpful in understanding the structure of social relations. Making maps and doing a census of a particular section of the community will help one learn who is who in a community and how they are connected (or not) to one another. Doing genealogies of selected members in the community provides a conceptual map of how people think about their relationships with reference to kinship ties. The map and the census become extremely useful to intercultural workers because it provides for them names and locations of people with whom they are certain to interact during the ministry. Lingenfelter (1996, 97–143) provides questions on family and community authority that help the researcher understand the structure of authority relationships and compare them with one’s home culture and commitments.

Cultural Learning

personalities as adults. Recording case studies of how parents deal with a particular child over a period of time can be a very useful form of observation and learning. Interviewing the parents about their intentions in the process can illuminate further cultural values and understanding. Spradley (1979) provides very helpful insights on structuring interviews, and collecting and analyzing interview data.

Conflicts and Conflict Resolution. The careful study of conflict is one of the most fruitful areas for research on a culture. In situations of conflict people engage in heated exchanges that focus around issues that are of extreme importance to them. An effective cultural learning program includes the careful recording of case studies of conflict, and the interviewing of participants in the conflict to understand what people are feeling, what they value, why they are contesting with each other, and what their hopes are with regard to resolution. In addition, careful analysis of the social processes that people employ for the resolving of conflict is very important. Inevitably each intercultural worker will experience interpersonal conflict with national co-workers. Understanding local processes for conflict resolution will enable that person to proceed with wisdom and support in the local cultural setting (see Lingenfelter, 1996, 144–68, and Elmer).

Ideas and Worldview. Because Christian intercultural workers are interested in sharing the gospel with other peoples, they must seek to understand the ideas and Worldview of the people with whom they work. These ideas are best understood by careful research in the language, by recording and studying the stories, and by observing and understanding the significant life cycle rituals of the local community. Research on funerals is probably one of the most profitable activities that the intercultural worker can do for an understanding of the ideas and deeper values of the local culture (see also Death Rites). Funerals engage the widest circle of family and friends of any particular individual. At these events people discuss issues of life and death, and act together on the beliefs that they hold with regard to the causes of death and the transition from life to after life. Other life cycle activities such as marriage, naming, and birth of children provide similar fruitful insights into the belief system of a culture (see Lingenfelter, 1996, 165–205, and Elmer 1993).

Application for Ministry. Cultural learning for its own sake is interesting and helpful, but for the intercultural worker it is important to practice the discipline of application. Each of the areas outlined above provides very useful information that the intercultural worker may apply to build more effective ministries. However, application must be learned and practiced. The application of cultural learning to ministry typically works through analogy. One finds a particular structure of authority and organization in a community, and thinks about the analogy of that structure to a growing body of believers. One observes patterns of learning among children and draws analogies to learning among adults who are involved in community development or other ministry programs. Learning to think analogically about cultural learning and ministry is crucial for ministry effectiveness. Paul Hiebert and Eloise Meneses (1995) provide very helpful guidelines for application in the ministries of church planting. Marvin Mayers (1987) provides valuable insight into the application of cultural learning for interpersonal relationships and other kinds of intercultural relationships.

SHERWOOD LINGENFELTER

SEE ALSO Extent of Missionary Adjustment.

Culture Shock. The concept of culture shock was brought into prominence in missionary circles by the reprinting in the journal Practical Anthropology of Kalervo Oberg’s pioneering articles entitled, “Cultural Shock: Adjustment to New Cultural Environments.” In this article the condition is described as the result of “losing all our familiar signs and symbols of social intercourse” as we interact in a foreign cultural environment. Culture shock is the condition, experienced by nearly everyone at the start of life in a different culture, in which one feels off balance, unable to predict what people’s reactions will be when one does or says something. It is a real psychological response to very real perceptions and must be taken seriously.

Though the condition can be serious to the extent of debilitation, it is an overstatement to label it “shock” (in the medical sense), as if every case were crippling. Many prefer the term “culture stress” with the recognition that serious cases can approach a condition similar to that labeled shock by the medical profession. The good news is that most people can survive long enough in another society to overcome at least the worst features of culture stress if they are determined enough and work hard at adapting to the new cultural world they have entered.

Four major stages have been identified as reactions to culture stress in the adjustment process. The first of these may be labeled the honeymoon or “I love everything about these people” stage. This period may last from a few weeks to several months if the person stays in the foreign environment. This is a good time to commit oneself to a rigorous program of language and culture learning, before the realities of the new situation thrust one into the next stage. Unfortunately, many return home before this period is over and write and speak very positively about an experience that was quite superficial.

If they stay, they are likely to enter the second stage which can last from months to years. This is the period in which the differences and the insecurities of living in an unpredictable environment get on their nerves, sometimes in a big way. For some this is an “I hate everything” stage. People in this second stage of culture stress are often overly concerned about cleanliness, food, and contact with those around them. They often have feelings of helplessness and loss of control, may become absent-minded, and frequently develop fears of being cheated, robbed, or injured. Not infrequently physical and spiritual problems can accompany these psychological difficulties and the cross-cultural worker’s life becomes very difficult.

As Oberg points out, “this second stage of culture shock is in a sense a crisis in the disease. If you overcome it, you stay; if not, you leave before you reach the stage of a nervous breakdown.” Or, as many have done, you stay but spend all your time with your kind of people, effectively insulating yourself against the people that surround you and their culture. Unfortunately, many mission compounds and institutions have provided just such a refuge for missionaries who never got beyond this stage of culture stress. To survive this stage you need to feed your determination, force yourself to be outgoing, in spite of many embarrassing situations, and plug away at your language and culture learning even though nothing seems to be coming together.

Those who survive the second stage begin to “level off,” accepting that things are going to be different and difficult to predict while they are beginning to be able to function in the language and culture. They develop an ability to laugh at themselves and to endure the frequent embarrassing situations in which they don’t understand what is going on. They begin to recognize that the people they are living among and their way of life are neither totally good nor totally bad but, like their own people and their way of life, some of each. By this time a person has attained a language and culture learning even though nothing seems to be coming together.

Those who survive the second stage begin to “level off,” accepting that things are going to be different and difficult to predict while they are beginning to be able to function in the language and culture. They develop an ability to laugh at themselves and to endure the frequent embarrassing situations in which they don’t understand what is going on. They begin to recognize that the people they are living among and their way of life are neither totally good nor totally bad but, like their own people and their way of life, some of each. By this time a person has attained a language and culture learning even though nothing seems to be coming together.

Even with this improvement in attitude, however, discouragement may take over and lead to a kind of truce with the cross-cultural situation that issues in a “plateauing” or holding pattern rather than continuing growth and adaptation. Many stop at this point, having learned to function reasonably in most social situations, especially those they can control, and having learned to assert and maintain control regularly.

With developing facility in the language and culture, however, and an increasing sense of belonging, one may move to the fourth or “adjusted” stage. Though many of the problems of the third stage may remain, the determination to succeed and to master the language and culture coupled with encouraging success enable one to keep growing without giving in to discouragement. The key is to continue learning and growing, accepting the fact that you are attempting to learn in a few years a whole way of life that has taken the insiders many years to learn. Curiosity, a learning attitude, enjoyment of the process, and just plain determination are your best allies as you give yourself to the task.

Some (e.g., Dodd, 1995, 213–16) have seen the whole spread of reactions observed among humans under stress in the way different people go about the process of adapting to a new culture. Especially in stage two, they note that some dissolve in fright and never get over it. Others react by flight and return home. Still others develop one or another filter approach by moving into the escapism posture in which they resort to unhealthy attitudes such as denying differences, living in exaggerated memories of their home culture or going native. Others are determined to fight and may do this constructively, conquering the obstacles, or destructively by developing a negative, belligerent attitude toward the new culture. Those with constructive, fighting determination, however, learn to flex by accepting, learning and growing into effective functionaries in the new cultural world. These are the ones who succeed.

CHARLES H. KRAFT

SEE ALSO Adjustment to the Field.

Curse, Curses. A curse is an utterance in which a person calls on supernatural power to bring harm to the one cursed. Curses are the opposite of blessings, usually making use of satanic power rather than, as with blessings, employing the power of God. Though words are usually used, the power is not in the words but flows from the supernatural being who empowers them.

The Bible takes curses and cursing seriously, assuming that people have the authority to invoke supernatural power in this way. The words are used about 200 times in the Scriptures. The term anathema (1 Cor. 16:22), often seen as a powerful curse in Scripture, is instead a formula of excommunication with which a person is turned over to God for punishment.
Curse, Curses

The authority Christians have to curse is neither to be taken lightly (James 3:8–10) nor to be abused. Indeed, both Jesus (Luke 6:28) and Paul (Rom. 12:14) admonish us to bless rather than to curse those who hurt us. The Jews who participated in the crucifixion called down on themselves a very powerful curse when they said, “Let the punishment for His death fall on us and our children!” (Matt. 27:25 GNB).

Cursing seems to be very much alive today. Missionaries from various parts of the world report situations in which parcels of land, buildings, artifacts, and missionaries themselves and/or their family members have had negative words directed at them that were followed by strange occurrences. Several instances have been reported of illness or other misfortune affecting everyone who lived in mission homes built on land the people consider cursed. In many cases, the situation has been alleviated through claiming the authority of Christ to break the apparent curses. In addition, those involved in praying for inner healing report great change when certain negative emotional and spiritual symptoms are dealt with by claiming the authority of Christ to break curses.

Charles H. Kraft

See Also Spiritual Warfare.

Customs. See Culture.

Cyprus (Est. 2000 pop.: 777,000; 9,251 sq. km. [3,572 sq. mi.]). No modern nation outside Israel holds a more ancient claim to the presence of its sons and daughters among the early Christians than does the little island of Cyprus in the northeastern Mediterranean. It was a Levite from Cyprus named Joseph, but better known as Barnabas, who distinguished himself in the earliest Christian community by selling a field and placing the proceeds at the feet of the apostles (Acts 4:36).

It was this same Barnabas who was sent by the Jerusalem apostles to nurture the new Gentile outreach at Antioch (Acts 11:22) and who promptly brought Saul from Tarsus to help him. It was no accident that later when Barnabas, Saul, and John Mark set off on their first apostolic mission from Antioch, they went first to Salamis in Cyprus (Acts 13:5), probably Barnabas’s home community. It is recorded that they traveled “through the whole island” (Acts 13:6), no doubt preaching everywhere they went.

Later, Barnabas took John Mark on a second journey back to Cyprus (Acts 15:39). Though no additional information is given, it seems logical to assume that on this occasion Barnabas and John Mark simply continued the work begun during the first visit of Barnabas and Paul to Cyprus. It is possible that Barnabas spent the rest of his life there. The traditional site of his tomb is still marked by a small Greek Orthodox church near the ruins of Salamis in the vicinity of Famagusta, a small Turkish town in eastern Cyprus. The modern Christian community of Cyprus quite naturally still looks back to Barnabas and Saul as its founders.

The culture of modern Cyprus was shaped by its Byzantine Christianity, conspicuously represented by the churches and monasteries dotting its picturesque mountains and plains. Though Cyprus was incorporated into the Muslim Ottoman Empire, its strong Christian community continued to dominate the local life of the island, and its British colonization in the dying years of the Ottoman Empire assured that it was not merged into the new Turkish nation-state after World War I.

As a result of its Ottoman period, however, there remained a conglomerate of majority Greek and minority Turkish villages scattered across the island landscape during the British colonial period, extending up until the early 1960s. Then as the British gave Cyprus its sovereignty as a tiny nation-state, they attempted to create a Constitution that would honor the citizenship of both Greeks and Turks with their vastly different cultures and histories, one Byzantine Christian and the other Muslim.

This attempted political solution lasted for only a decade. In 1974, amid increasing tensions between Greek and Turkish villages, the Turkish army invaded Cyprus and stimulated a population exchange that placed the vast majority of the Cypriot Turkish population in the northern third of the island while the Cypriot Greek population was now placed in the southern two-thirds. In the years following, a United Nations peace-keeping force patrolled the “green line” between the Turkish north and the Greek south, with no commerce or communication between the two. This military “solution” was undertaken against strong protests by the international community, but the Turkish army has made, and kept, its point.

In the tiny northern state called the Turkish Republic of northern Cyprus, Cypriot Turks maintain a universal, though largely secular, Islamic culture. More recent immigrants from Turkey, bolstered by Arab Muslim oil wealth, are helping reintroduce a more orthodox strain of Islam. Stimulated by evangelical Christian tentmakers, a small group or two of Cypriot Turkish believers struggle to take hold, and British remnants of their colonial period still meet to worship as Anglicans in the coastal town of Kyrenia.

In the Greek south, where the northern Turkish nation-state is not recognized, the nation of Cyprus continues its uneasy existence. Dozens of Czech Republic

Cyril (826 or 827–869). Greek missionary to the Slavic people. Christened Constantine, he was born in Thessalonica (Saloniki), the youngest child of a Byzantine official. When he was fourteen Constantine went to Constantinople to study. He excelled and soon was teaching philosophy at the university. After 855, he retired to live and study at the Mount Olympus monastery (where his brother Methodius was a monk). Because of his fame as a teacher, he and his brother were made part of delegation sent in 860 to present Christianity to the Khazar people. They met with little lasting success. The Slavic ruler, Rastislav, asked the patriarch of Constantinople for Greek priests in 862. Constantine and Methodius were selected. In preparation, the brothers translated the Gospels and prepared a liturgy. In 863 they traveled to Rastislav’s court and began preaching and started a seminary for Slavic priests. Opposition developed from the Frankish missionaries, and in 868, they went to Rome to defend their work. Pope Hadrian II approved their liturgy and had Methodius and three of the Slavic priests ordained. The pope also intended to consecrate Constantine as archbishop of Moravia. However, Constantine died in Rome on February 14, 869, after becoming a monk and taking the name of Cyril. The ministry of Cyril and Methodius is traditionally regarded as the major means by which the gospel was brought to the Slavic people.

Robert Shuster

Bibliography. F. Dvornik, Byzantine Missions Among the Slavs: SS. Constantine-Cyril and Methodius.

The Czech Republic and Slovakia (Combined est. 2000 pop.: 15,814,000; 127,899 sq. km. [49,382 sq. mi.]). The modern state of Czechoslovakia was created in 1918 out of the dismembered and defeated Austro-Hungarian Empire. Protestant churches, and the pre-Reformation Hussite movement with its development in the Unitas Fratrum, were always under pressure or at times outright persecution at the hands of the favored Roman Catholic Church. The Unitas Fratrum had both an ecumenical as well as a missionary vision, especially with leaders such as Jan Amos Comenius (1592–1620), although external circumstances never made practical implementation of the vision possible. The Renewed Moravian Church, comprising refugees from Moravia who were given sanctuary in Herrnhut by the German nobleman Nicholas von Zinzendorf, were the trailblazers of the modern Protestant missionary movement (see also Moravian Missions). They sent out hundreds of missionaries all over the world, beginning in 1732. The Protestants who remained in the Habsburg domains concentrated on survival rather than foreign mission. In 1918 the Czech and Slovak peoples achieved their independence, which sadly lasted for only twenty years. Even after the Second World War, they soon became part of the Soviet bloc and only achieved true national independence in 1989 with the "Velvet Revolution." Some missionary interest and awareness were sustained over the years of foreign domination (a number of courageous Czech pastors smuggled Bibles and Christian literature into the Soviet Union even in the dark days of communist domination), but it is only in the past ten years that there has been any real possibility of Czech and Slovak Christians being involved in cross-cultural missionary activity. This is now taking place as individuals are feeling the call of God. A few students from the Evangelical Seminary in Prague are already serving in Asia. With encouragement, the trickle could develop into a flood.

Ronald Davies
Danish Mission Boards and Societies. In 1706 the first missionaries from a Lutheran land arrived in the Tranquebar region of southeast India, sent out by what became known as the Danish-Halle Mission. The Danish king, Frederick IV, had been especially eager to spread the faith by sponsoring this initiative. But in fact the first missionaries were Germans, as were most of the several dozen sent to India throughout the rest of the century. (However, the number of Danes, six or so, who went probably was the right proportion compared to the far more numerous German population.) A missionary college was founded in Denmark in 1714 to further this and other ventures. By the beginning of the nineteenth century, this early Danish-Halle thrust had been overwhelmed by a rationalistic spirit.

A new beginning occurred in 1821 with the founding of the Danish Missionary Society. It has always functioned as a voluntary society within the framework of the national Lutheran Church, to which almost all Danes nominally belong. Financial support is provided by contributions rather than through the taxes that have provided for buildings and clergy salaries. This society, like many of the other early ones around Europe, initially sent workers through the auspices of older ones, such as the Basel Mission, before sending missionaries on its own. Eventually the Danish society had up to seventy missionaries at a time in China. But by the 1960s there were only about eighty-five missionaries total, two-fifths each in Africa and India, the rest in Taiwan and Japan.

Meanwhile, many other societies emerged within the national Lutheran Church, eventually numbering sixteen or seventeen, mostly small and focusing on one or two fields. The only other one with more than a score of workers is a “Sudan” Mission, begun in 1911 for work in what is now Nigeria, and which reported sixty-six missionaries by 1970. Among the smaller Lutheran ones are the Santal dating from 1867 for work in India and a Lutheran Missionary Association begun in 1868 with work in Tanzania and Surinam.

In 1912 a national missionary council was formed, as in so many other countries in the wake of the 1910 Edinburgh World Missionary Conference. Initially it had twelve member societies, all Lutheran. Fifty years later the number of agencies had doubled and included four non-Lutheran ones.

As in the rest of Scandinavia, the Danish “free churches” are very small. The membership total for all of the congregations in each denomination is still only a few thousand. This has nevertheless not kept them from concern for foreign missions, and proportionately they send out far more than the societies within the national church. Their small size means that this yields only one or two dozen missionaries from each denomination. They differ from the main body also in that the denomination as a whole generally takes responsibility for the missions work. The Danish free church missions have mostly worked in Africa. One example are the Baptists who, beginning in 1928, served in the Central African countries of Rwanda and Burundi.

In the early 1970s there were about 330 Danish Protestants serving abroad with twenty-eight boards and societies in thirty countries, as well as a dozen or so Roman Catholic and Jehovah’s Witness missionaries. Twenty years later the number of Protestant missionaries had risen to about 350, but mergers had reduced the agencies to eighteen.

Donald Tinder

Danish-Halle Mission. King Frederick IV of Denmark, unsuccessful in finding Danish missionaries to work at the outpost at Tranquebar on the south coast of India, turned to the German Pietists at Halle under August H. Francke. In response, Francke sent Bartholomaeus Ziegenbalg and Henry Plütschau as the first missionaries to Tranquebar. They arrived as the first Protestant missionaries in India on July 9, 1706. Five principles characterized their work: (1) education and Christianity go together, as Christians must be able to read God's Word; (2) the Word must be available in the local language (Tamil) as quickly as possible; (3) preaching and teaching must be based on accurate insight into the worldview of the local population; (4) the goal of the missionary work is personal conversion; and (5) an indigenous church must be started as quickly as possible.

The work at Tranquebar was a pioneer model of cooperation on an international and interconfessional scale in the missionary venture. The early missionaries came predominately from Germany, but also from Denmark and Sweden, with money and a printing press coming from England. The use of the printing press in missionary work was pioneered by Ziegenbalg at Tranquebar. After the first generation, the most famous of the Tranquebar missionaries was Christian F. Schwartz. Even though the work had all but collapsed by the turn of the nineteenth century, the mission methodology at Tranquebar set the stage for much of the missionary work in India and still remains a model of solid philosophy undergirding quality practice and cooperation.

A. Scott Moreau

Das, Rajendra Chandra (1887–1976). Indian evangelist and indigenizer. Rajendra Chandra Das was born in East Bengal (now Bangladesh) in 1887. After nearly embracing the Brahmo Samaj he was baptized in Dacca in 1908. After higher education in Calcutta, he taught in Christian colleges for some years before becoming a full-time evangelist.

Das was a critic of Western methods of ministry among Hindus. From the time of his conversion he experimented with indigenous methods of worship and service. In 1930 he left Bengal to join the newly born Benares United City Mission (1929–46) in holy Benares (Varanasi) on the Ganges. This effort of seven Protestant mission societies remains the only concerted mission focus on orthodox Hindus in the history of Protestant missions. The mission never amounted to much more than Das himself. The Christian Society for the Study of Hinduism (1940–57) extended the mission's influence across India.

Changing attitudes toward the fundamental meaning of mission and evangelism, along with conservative reactions to Das's criticisms of traditional church and mission structures and programs undermined his influence and led to the closure of the mission and society.

H. L. Richard

Bibliography. R. C. Das, How to Present Christ to a Hindu; idem, Convictions of an Indian Disciple; H. L. Richard, ed., R. C. Das: Evangelical Prophet for Contextual Christianity.

Death

Richard, ed., R. C. Das: Evangelical Prophet for Contextual Christianity.

DAWN. See DISCIPLING A WHOLE NATION.

de Nobili, Robert. See NOBILI, ROBERT DE.

Death. Humans, like animals, die. Unlike animals, humans know they will die. They confront ahead of time the disturbing fact of mortality. They may do this through actually witnessing the death of others, or simply through hearing stories of such. People anticipate their own death in imagination when they experience presages of death in illness, suffering, bodily aging and decay, or in the malevolent sentiments or explicit threats leveled against them by others.

People respond in diverse ways to consciousness of their mortality. Some embrace hedonism. “The most obvious way of reconciling oneself to death is to make sure of enjoying life before death snatches it from us” (Toynbee, 69). Paul acknowledges the logic of this response: “If death ends all, let us eat, drink, and be merry for tomorrow we die” (1 Cor. 15:32). Nonetheless the purposeless pursuit of pleasure is essentially escapist—repressing awareness of a problem that will not go away.

Others embrace pessimism and stress that life is so bad that death can be welcomed as a lesser evil. The Buddha, for example, stressed that “life and suffering were synonymous. Not death, but rebirth, is the arch-ordeal for a human being” (Toynbee, 71). The goal is to extinguish desire and thus extinguish the self in nirvana.

Others seek immortality by winning fame—by attempting to ensure that at least their memory will live on. Some pour themselves into their offspring, attempting somehow to live on in and through them. And of course many hold out some kind of hope in a future joyous afterlife. But ideas on this matter differ markedly and, from the human standpoint, epistemological obstacles to mapping such an afterlife seem insurmountable. While everyone crosses the river of death, the traffic is one-way.

Death presents a fundamental problem for humans—one might even say the fundamental problem. When Christian missionaries preach the gospel, it is a message of “good news” about that fundamental problem. This message is not the result of human speculations, or of humans reaching out with their might to penetrate the impenetrable. Rather God took the initiative in breaking into space-time history in the person of his Son, providing answers that we could not provide for ourselves. Because Jesus Christ crossed the river of death and returned to tell about it, we have a glorious gospel. We now know what caused death, wherein lies life, and what comes after death. Missionaries must never forget that their message, above all, is a message of resurrection life.
Death

But missionaries must not only attend to their message. They must attend to the psychological, cultural, and religious responses to the awareness of death of the people to whom they minister. And this must inform the way in which they proclaim the gospel of resurrection life. The follower of the Buddha will take little comfort in a message which stresses eternal life as life which goes on and on and on. The hedonist and the pessimist cannot be approached in the same fashion.

Finally, since funerals (see Death Rites) invariably require rituals which affirm truths about life and death, missionaries must give attention to helping fledgling churches develop meaningful and appropriate Christian funeral liturgies. In conclusion, it should be stressed that there has been remarkably little missiological writing and reflection on death, either in relation to communication of the gospel message or in relation to developing culturally and biblically appropriate Christian funerals. More is needed.

ROBERT J. PRIEST

Bibliography. A. Toynbee, Man’s Concern with Death.

Death Rites. Death is not only a biological event that requires the disposal of a corpse, but also an occasion for questions about the meaning of life, social organization, and inheritance. All societies commemorate the event with ritual forms called Rites of Passage, symbolic acts that provide a bridge for the social transition from one status to another. Death rites provide not only the means of disposing of the corpse, but also channels for grief; they deal with questions about death and often with the social dislocation that has resulted.

Many traditional societies distinguish between a good death and a bad death. Dying at an old age with many children and grandchildren around is a good death. In contrast, dying violently, away from home, or unexpectedly as in childbirth is bad. A bad death raises questions of its cause and in some traditional societies requires interrogation of the deceased. Among the Diola of Senegal, for example, the corpse is tied to a bier supported by four men. People take turns asking the body questions; a movement of forward or backward indicates an affirmative or negative response. This custom provides an opportunity for confession, and sometimes punishment, which allows the deceased to depart.

Death rites must deal in an appropriate manner with biological decay. Burial in a wooden coffin is common to the north European people, while Muslims use a cotton shroud to wrap the body. Within Islam, proper disposal of the body is a matter of divine obligation, so many mosques are equipped with facilities to wash and prepare the body for burial. Decay may be retarded as by the mummification practiced by the ancient Egyptians. In marked contrast, decay may be accelerated as in the Indian tradition where the corpse is cremated and the skull broken to release the soul (Atman) to be reborn. In the Zoroastrian tradition the corpse was considered utterly impure and could not be allowed to pollute the earth, water, or fire. Placed in a special enclosure called a tower of silence, the corpse was thus exposed to birds of prey.

In many societies the corpse is openly displayed, and people are expected to demonstrate their grief. Where wakes are the norm, the extended family and friends may stay with the relatives of the deceased for several nights. This contrasts with the practice of north Europe, where the body is quickly removed from sight and members of the family show only restrained emotions. Mourning is expressed in various ways, depending upon one’s closeness to the deceased. Traditional Chinese culture has a complex system of mourning involving the extended family. In the West, public mourning has almost fallen into disuse except for the wearing of black at the ceremony.

Feasting is a common element based on the practical necessity that those who have come on a long journey to honor the dead need to be fed. The feast may be of such social importance that it is deferred for days or weeks after the actual disposal of the corpse. The elaborateness of the ritual often depends upon social status. The ceremony for a newborn baby may be slight, or there may be none at all, while for a respected leader there will be great ceremony. Sometimes food and artifacts are placed with the corpse for the journey to the next life. Among the Asante, slaves were executed so that the king would not lack for servants in the afterlife. Sometimes additional rituals are performed long after the death. This is notable in parts of Asia where ancestor veneration is an important element in daily life.

DAVID BURNETT

SEE ALSO Ancestral Practices.

Debt. Personal debt, incurred through the rising cost of education, consumer spending, or other means (see Consumerism), has become a serious obstacle to missionary recruitment and deployment in North America in recent years. While Scripture, contrary to the claims of some, does not forbid entering into debt altogether, it does warn against the bondage that may result from debt (Prov. 22:7). Indeed, excessive debt presents a major barrier, impeding people’s ability to serve God and to do his work, including mission.

Christians have already been forgiven the ultimate debt they owe—sin against God (cf. esp. Matt. 6:12 par. Luke 11:4; also Luke 7:41–43; 16:1–13). Believers are called to wise stewardship of their financial and other resources. Their faithfulness or negligence will result in heavenly reward or loss (Matt. 16:27; Eph. 6:8). Moreover, Christians’ “debts” include obligations in marriage (1 Cor. 7:3; Eph. 5:28), as citizens (Rom. 13:7), in the preaching of the gospel (Rom. 1:14), and in love and service of other believers (John 13:14; Rom. 13:8; 1 John 3:16; 4:11).

The rising level of monetary debt on the part of missionary candidates mirrors a general trend in the U.S. economy, which is characterized by escalating federal budget deficits, record credit card debts, and consumer spending increases without corresponding raises in salaries. Some mission agencies currently allow a portion of missionaries’ support to be devoted to the remission of debt. Other groups permit their staff to remain on support while upgrading their education. Generally, the church should act redemptively where significant debt has been incurred and preemptively wherever possible to prevent prospective Christian workers from entering into excessive financial debt.

ANDREAS J. KOSTENBERGER

Decision-Making. A decision begins with an unmet need, followed by the (1) awareness that there is an alternative to the situation, an (2) interest in the alternative, and (3) consideration of the alternative. This consideration reviews both utilitarian and nonutilitarian issues involved. A (4) choice is made, and (5) action must follow to implement the decision. Action will require (6) readjustment. That, in turn, may create the awareness of further necessary changes, and the decision cycle is repeated.

Decision-making in practice, however, seldom happens in a simple, circular fashion. There are pauses and rapid skips forward and backward. There is no clear beginning or end in the decision process. Each of the identified stages must be expanded to gain a clear picture of the complexity of decision-making.

Improving Quality of Decisions. A Decisional Balance Sheet lists all known alternatives with the anticipated positive and negative consequences of each. The Decisional Balance Sheet will lead to improved decisions when seven criteria for information processing are met:

1. Consider a wide range of alternatives.
2. Examine all objectives to be fulfilled by the decision.
3. Carefully weigh the negative and positive consequences of each alternative.
4. Search thoroughly for new information relevant to each alternative.
5. Assimilate and use new information or expert judgment.
6. Reexamine all known alternatives before making a final decision.
7. Make careful provision for implementing the chosen decision.

Personality and Decisions. Individuals have been categorized as sensors or intuitors in their decision-making approaches. Sensors analyze isolated, concrete details while intuitors consider overall relationships. Intuitors have been found to have better predictive accuracy in decisions.

Other studies have suggested four personality styles in decision-making:

Decisive, using minimal information to reach a firm opinion. Speed, efficiency, and consistency are the concern. Flexible, using minimal information that is seen as having different meanings at different times. Speed, adaptability, and intuition are emphasized. Hierarchic, using masses of carefully analyzed data to reach one conclusion. Association with great thoroughness, precision, and perfectionism. Integrative, using large amounts of data to generate many possible solutions. Decisions are highly experimental and often creative.

It cannot be assumed, however, that individual decisions are the fundamental level of decision-making. In most societies of Central and South America, Africa, and Asia, no significant decision (individual or group) is reached apart from a group process to achieve consensus. In the more individualistic orientation of North American and European societies, group decision is often achieved through a process of argumentation and verbosity, with the sum of individual decisions expressed in a vote.

Group Decisions. A group decision is reached by accumulating emotional and factual information in a cyclical fashion. Beginning with a position accepted by consensus, new possibilities are tested. If accepted, those ideas become the new “anchored” (consensus) position; if rejected, the group returns to the original position, reaching out again as new possibilities emerge. The final stage of group decision is the members’ public commitment to that decision—the essence of consensus.

Group judgment is not better than individual judgment, unless the individuals are experts in the area under consideration. Ignorance cannot be averaged out, only made more consistent. A lack of disagreement in group discussion increases the possibility of “groupthink” (an unchallenged acceptance of a position). A lack of disagreement may be construed as harmony, but contribute to poorer-quality decisions.

Higher-quality decisions are made in groups where (1) disagreement is central to decision-making, (2) leaders are highly communicative, and (3) group members are active participants.
Decision-Making

Clearly, achieving social interdependence in the group is prerequisite to quality decisions. However, mere quantity of communication is not sufficient; the content of intragroup communication affects the quality of decision. The more time spent on establishing operating procedures, the lower the probability that a quality decision will result. Gaining agreement on the criteria for the final decision and then systematically considering all feasible solutions increases the probability of a good decision.

Consensus decision-making groups show more agreement, more objectivity, and fewer random or redundant statements than nonconsensus-seeking groups. Achievement of consensus is helped by using facts, clarifying issues, resolving conflict, lessening tension, and making helpful suggestions.

Cultural Effects on Decision-Making. A group must have decision rules, explicitly stated or implicitly understood, to function. These rules vary with culture; thus a decision model effective in societies of an American or European tradition will probably not function well in Asian or African groups. For example, probability is not normally seen as related to uncertainty in some cultures. For these cultures, probabilistic decision analysis is not the best way of aiding decision-making.

Perception of the decision required by the decision-maker must be considered. What is perceived depends on cultural assumptions and patterns, previous experience and the context. The problem as presented is seldom, if ever, the same as the perception of the problem. The greater the differences in culture, the greater the differences in perception.

DONALD E. SMITH

Degrees in Mission and Missiology. Many missionaries never undertook formal studies in mission or missiology and yet were effective. Many, however, also proved ineffective and even destructive to the life of the church. While formal preparation for cross-cultural ministry does not guarantee future effectiveness, it does provide an opportunity for growth in knowledge and experience, hopefully to avoid the mistakes of the past and to prepare for the ever-changing future. The sending church wants well-qualified and effective representatives. The receiving church expects expatriates to contribute positively to its life. Frontier missionary activity demands the highest of qualifications. The Christian who wants to invest his or her life in world evangelism should seek adequate preparation, in many cases formal studies in an undergraduate or graduate program in mission(s)/missiology.

Theological Frameworks within which Modern Missiological Training Takes Place. Missiologists bring their own particular understandings of mission and missiology to the purpose and content of their programs. Programs in “mission(s)” or “missiology” reflect the theological commitments of those that teach and of their institutions, their understanding of the very nature of mission, and geographical and cultural approaches to education in general, and theological education in particular.

Broadly speaking, missiological training takes place within the frameworks of Roman Catholic, Conciliar Protestant, Non-Conciliar Evangelical, Orthodox, or Third World theologies. James Scherer suggests,

It seems clear that conciliar missiologists tend to place the emphasis in mission teaching at the seminary level mainly on Missio Dei [the mission of God, God’s abiding outreach to all] concerns and tasks of the ecumenical Christian community. Preparation for specific cross-cultural ministries, by contrast, seems to remain the preferred option among evangelical missiologists. Roman Catholic missiologists, based on ecclesiastical positions taken at Vatican II, appear to lean toward the ecumenical position while still making room for cross-cultural preparation (1985, 451–52).

Among the Orthodox, salvation is a communal process of being in a right relationship with God, neighbor, and the created order. Missionary preparation includes study of the Scriptures, church history, patristics, and the language and culture of target groups, with the goal that the gospel be incarnated in each locality. Some Third World programs for missionary preparation put considerable emphasis on contextualization of the Christian message in light of non-Christian religious thinking, as well as on liberation.

Geographical Dispersion of Missiological Training and Levels of Degrees Available. Missiological training takes place around the world and across the educational spectrum, from non-formal missionary training centers offering certificates to universities and seminaries offering doctoral programs in mission(s)/missiology.

In the United States and Canada, in addition to nondegree training programs, Bible colleges, Christian liberal arts colleges, and denominational or nondenominational universities offer undergraduate majors related to missions, under various designations. Some of the bachelor’s degree programs are entitled “Missions,” “World Mission(s),” “Evangelism and Mission(s),” “Religion, Culture and Mis-
Degrees in Mission and Missiology

Areas to Look for in Programs. All programs are not created equal, either theologically or in the depth and breadth of the preparation they provide. The learning environment is a "hidden curriculum" that can prepare the missionary for effective ministry. Courses should be part of a well-integrated curriculum. Practical ministry is essential. The wise student will look for as many of the following features as possible in the program of choice.

The Learning Environment. The global church is valued and modeled through learning with and from those of other cultures. In addition, the training center or school demonstrates partnership with the church within and outside of the United States, to provide educational opportunities that minimize taking people out of their countries and fields of service. The leadership, teachers, and staff model a passion for God and for the lost. The teachers demonstrate a desire to learn from their colleagues and from the students. The teachers attempt to integrate the study of theology, missions, and the social sciences. Leadership development and spiritual formation are integrated within the community life, classroom, and field experiences. The community models and fosters positive approaches to conflict resolution. The learner learns how to be a self-directed learner and how to learn in collaboration with others. A counterculture response to the prevailing society is present, to challenge the learner to live the simple lifestyle, for the sake of social action and world evangelism.

Areas of Study. Adequate biblical and theological foundations are critical. A survey of missions would include a broad and accurate awareness of the present state of the church's ministry around the world. Theology and history of missions seek to understand the present situation in light of biblical norms and past history. Cross-cultural studies will include cultural anthropology and cross-cultural communication. Comparative religion/folk religion/non-Christian religions will be studied to enable the missionary to understand the worldview of the people with whom the gospel is shared. Missions strategies would include conceptual and practical learning of evangelism, church planting, urban ministry, and church growth principles. Missions leadership would enable knowing how to transmit the Christian faith to another generation through discipleship and leadership development of others.

Ministry Experience. The student must demonstrate minimal ministry experience prior to acceptance. Field-based experience as a "learner" in another's culture is required, to permit practice and reflection, under the guidance of more experienced leaders. The local church is involved in the process of preparing the future missionary, in partnership with the training center or school.

W. KENNETH PHILLIPS
Degrees in Mission and Missiology

SEE ALSO Bachelor’s Degrees in Mission; Master’s Degrees in Mission; Doctoral Degrees in Mission.

Deism. The word deism is derived from deus, the Latin word for god, and thus was originally equivalent to theism. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, however, the term was identified with a kind of theism based upon reason and natural religion and which rejected divine special revelation. Deists held that the universe was created by God but that it operated according to immutable natural laws with no significant divine intervention.

Deism flourished in England during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, with leading representatives including Lord Herbert of Cherbury, John Toland, and Matthew Tindal, who wrote what became known as the “deist’s bible,” Christianity as Old as the Creation. Continental thinkers who were also deists included Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Voltaire, and Immanuel Kant (who rejected the label). Some founding fathers of the United States, such as Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Paine, and Thomas Jefferson, were also deists.

Although there was some diversity among deists, many accepted belief in a supreme being; the obligation to worship this being; the obligation of ethical conduct; belief in divine rewards and punishments, in this life and beyond; a rational approach to religion that denied miracles and traditional Christian beliefs such as the Trinity, the incarnation, and the atonement.

Although the term itself has fallen into disuse, the fundamental worldview of deism is still very much alive, especially within the more liberal segment of Christianity, which has little place for special revelation and the miraculous and which regards Christianity largely in ethical categories.

WILLIAM H. BAKER

Democratic Republic of Congo (D.R.C.; formerly Zaire) (Est. 2000 pop.: 51,136,000; 2,344,858 sq. km. [905,350 sq. mi.]). A decade before Columbus discovered the New World, Portuguese explorer Diego Cao located the mouth of the Congo River in 1482, and established the first tenuous European contact with that part of the African continent. Prior to this, the area was known as D.R.C. had its own history of political organization in powerful kingdoms (e.g., Luba, Yaka, and Kongo) and innumerable small ethnic groupings. Within ten years of Diego Cao’s expedition, Catholic missionaries arrived and before long the king of the influential Kongo tribe had been baptized along with many of his subjects. The initially successful Catholic movement declined through compromise with the flourishing Portuguese slave trade. It was only in the seventeenth century that there was a resurgence of Catholic missionary activity in the Kongo region. Although this contact was to have a profound impact (Gray, 1990) it, in turn, was to pass, and by the early nineteenth century little trace of living Christianity was to be found in the region.

Modern Missionary Period. By the time the Congo Free State had been created and granted personally to King Leopold II of Belgium by the European powers at the Berlin Conference (1884–85), Holy Ghost priests were once again established in the Boma area of the Lower River. The earliest Protestant mission agencies to work in the Congo included the Livingstone Inland Mission (1878), the Baptist Missionary Society (1878), and the Garanganze Evangelical Mission (1886). In the northeast the Africa Inland Mission (1912) was one of the pioneer Protestant agencies. From the beginning of the colonial period (official control began in 1908) the Catholic Church enjoyed special powers and privileges in the Congo. This began to lessen, at least officially, with the extension of school subsidies to Protestant schools (1946) and the opening of state schools (1954). Although the mutual mistrust between Catholics and Protestants has abated, there is still relatively little cooperation between them.

As early as the 1902 General Conference of Missions in Leopoldville (Kinshasa), the need for cooperation was seen within the Protestant missionary movement. The Congo Protestant Council (CPC) was created in 1928, not only to facilitate comity between missions but also to have a single voice before the colonial government. During this period, the leadership of the church in D.R.C. was largely still an expatriate missionary affair, but in 1960 the CPC voted to transfer its administrative responsibility into national hands and for missionaries to assume the role of advisors and technicians.

Shortly after, the church in D.R.C. experienced traumatic years of independence (granted June 30, 1960) and “the Rebellion” (1963–65). In both, the church was targeted by antigovernment forces as well as opportunist gangs. Many hundreds of national believers were put to death, and dozens of missionary personnel were brutally killed. Those dark years resulted in a deepening spiritual life and maturity of the national leaders who learned how to stand without missionary assistance.

Increasingly as the 1960s drew toward a close, missions in D.R.C. recognized the maturity and responsibility of the national church. This was accelerated by the government’s refusal to recognize a church body unless its founding mission had ceded to it autonomous legal standing. In 1970, the CPC (until then a group of separate churches) became the national Protestant Church of Zaire (ECZ), with each former church body a member Communauté of the whole. The government recognizes only four Christian groups: the ECZ, the Catholic Church, the Greek Orthodox Church, and the Kimbanguist Church (an independent African church, revering the founder Simon Kimbangu). Relations between the national government led (since 1965) by President Mobutu Sese Seko and the church (especially Roman Catholic) have often been strained, not least during the period of rigorous reaffirmation of traditional African cultural and religious values in the 1970s.

Challenges Facing the Church. D.R.C. is one of the world’s poorest nations. While famine does not threaten as in some areas, the struggle for survival affects the vast majority. The downward economic spiral in this potentially wealthy country affects almost every part of the infrastructure. The church has sought to do what it can, often with little or no help from the government. The deteriorating economic situation sparked rioting in the early 1990s, which in turn led to a withdrawal of expatriate mission personnel from some parts of the country. In the east, some of the largest refugee camps result from the ethnic strife in Rwanda. Mobutu’s government was overthrown by Laurent Kabila’s troops in 1997 and the country’s name was changed from Zaire to the current Democratic Republic of Congo.

Despite these problems, the vitality of the church sets it within the top ten non-Western nations sending out their own missionaries (Pate, 1989) for cross-cultural ministry both within and beyond their borders. While the response to the Christian message continues to be high, the greatest need is for training of national Christians in order to deepen the knowledge and spiritual life of the numerically large church which has sometimes been criticized for not influencing as it should such endemic evils as corruption.

Time and again during its turbulent history in D.R.C., the church has ridden the storm. As the church enters its second century, nominalism and formalism within the church and materialism, secularism, and proliferation of sects outside the church, will challenge again the vision and vitality of the people of Christ in D.R.C.

GORDON R. MOLYNEUX

---

Demon, Demonization

Demon, Demonization. While Scripture does not present a clear picture of their origin, demons are generally recognized by Christians as angels who fell with Satan and are now agents seeking to work on his behalf on earth. In the Old Testament, demons (or evil spirits) do not receive a great deal of attention. Generally, they are portrayed as malicious spirit beings who are used to bring God’s judgment (e.g., 1 Sam. 16:14; Judg. 9:22–24) and are connected with idols and idolatry (Deut. 32:17; Ps. 106:37, 38). While we get one glimpse of some hierarchy of demonic powers (Dan. 10:13, 20), that glimpse is left undeveloped (see _Territorial Spirits_).

The New Testament picture is clearer. At least five types of demonic activity can be seen. Under Satan’s control, they unsuccessfully resist Jesus and try to expose his identity during his ministry (Mark 1:23–27), blind unbelievers (2 Cor. 4:3–4), engage believers in warfare (Eph. 6:10–18), wreak great destruction on earth as part of the end times (Rev. 9), and entice governments and nations to rebel against God (Rev. 16:12–16).

The Gospels present seven encounters of Jesus with demons during his three years of public ministry: the Gerasene demoniac (Mark 5:1–20 and parallels); the boy with seizures (Matt. 17:14–20 and parallels); three instances of people being healed from specific demonic-caused diseases (Matt. 9:32–33; Matt. 12:22–23 and parallel; Luke 13:10–17), and two cases where Jesus silences the spirits (Mark 1:23–27 and parallel; Matt. 8:16 and parallels). In every example we see Jesus’ direct engagement of demons to set people free. Their freedom came through the exercise of his authority (Mark 1:27–28), in contrast to the rituals of the exorcists of his day.

In the thirty plus years covered in Acts, only five statements of distinct demonic encounters are found (Acts 5:15–16; 8:6–7; 16:16–18; 19:11–12; 19:13–17). As with Jesus, the apostles exercise authority over demons to set people free. The relative lack of examples from Acts appears to underscore that demons are to be confronted but are not to be given preeminent attention.

In the epistles we find important teachings on demons and their work. They are the powers behind idols (1 Cor. 10:19–21); we engage them in war (Eph. 6:10–18), humbly submitting to God and resisting Satan (James 4:7; 1 Peter 5:8–9; see also _Spiritual Warfare_); they subvert people through false doctrines (1 Tim. 4:1–4); and we are to test the spirits (1 John 4:1–4). Concerning their character and tactics, they know the truth and shudder (James 2:19), and, following Satan, they masquerade as angels of light (2 Cor. 11:12–15).
Demon, Demonization

In Revelation we see demons characterized as Satan’s host encamped against God. They lead the nations astray (Rev. 16:12–16) and bring destruction on earth (Rev. 9). Though the final picture is not one of battle but slaughter (Rev. 19:19–20), their power on earth over unbelievers, under God’s sovereignty, is mentioned throughout Revelation.

Demonic Attack. With more than thirty terms used (many of them in the Gospels), the range of vocabulary of demonic attack against people is rich. However, it all points in one direction: demons desire to destroy the host by deception and distortion of our very humanity (seen clearly in the Gerasene demoniac; Mark 5:1–20). In terms of control, demons indwell people (Matt. 12:43–45); people may have spirits in them (Mark 1:23); be with a spirit (Mark 5:2); or have spirits (Matt. 11:18). The strongest term of demonic control is daimonizomai, often translated “demon-possessed.” The English connotations of “possession,” however, cloud the meaning. Christians cannot be “possessed” in the sense of ownership, since they belong to Christ. The NRSV frequently uses “demonic” and the Amplified renders it “under the power of demons,” both of which better express the idea of control than ownership. Though the term is not used after the Gospels, if this type of control over Christians were not possible, the continual warnings against demonic infiltration in the epistles would serve no purpose. Just as we can be “controlled” by false teachers, cult leaders, and so on, we can be “controlled” by demons, a fact that has long been acknowledged both by those who minister to the demonized and in non-Western contexts.

Missiological Issues. It is important for the missionary to understand the biblical teaching on demons as well as be effectively trained in dealing with demons as they manifest themselves. As is seen in Acts, however, our focus on the demonic should be selective. Paving too much attention to demonic activity can be just as bad as ignoring it. Missionaries may face either of two extremes: Secularism which denies demons and Anism which sees demons as the source of every problem. In many Western urban settings influenced with New Age thinking the two opposites can be curiously intertwined in a form of spiritistic Syncretism. Many worldviews acknowledge the spirit realm and contain a variety of beliefs and rituals for handling spirits and their activities (see Exorcism). The missionaries must come to grips not only with their own viewpoint, but also that of the Bible and the host culture.

On a practical level, what can the missionary expect? In the New Testament, a demon drove a fortune teller to harass Paul and his missionary band so much that he had to deal with it (Acts 16:15–18). Satan repeatedly thwarted Paul’s missionary plans (1 Thess. 2:17–18), and he persevered in his missionary labors despite a Satanic-given thorn in the flesh (literally “angel of Satan”) by focusing on God’s power and grace (2 Cor. 12:1–9). The young churches Paul planted were in danger of falling prey to Satanic deception (e.g., 2 Cor. 11:2–15) and had to put on spiritual armor (Eph. 6:10–18). Contemporary missionaries must be prepared to face all of these situations. We should also note that Satan is not limited to the particular tactics employed in the Bible. Just as human society grows and changes, so may demonic attacks (see possession phenomenon). However, the central core strategies of deception, blinding, and movement toward destruction are constant themes whatever the culture. In light of this, a crucial missionary task involves working with the local community to develop a clear biblical perspective on the demonic and to couple this with contextualized ministry methodologies which maintain biblical fidelity and, as far as possible, cultural sensitivity.

A. Scott Moreau

Bibliography. C. Arnold, Three Crucial Questions about Spiritual Warfare; M. Kraft, Understanding Spiritual Power; A. S. Moreau, The World of the Spirits; S. Page, Powers of Evil; D. Powilson, Power Encounters; G. Van Rheenen, Communicating Christ in Animistic Contexts.

Denmark (Est. 2000 pop.: 5,207,000; 43,077 sq. km. [16,632 sq. mi.]). Denmark is the smallest of the Scandinavian nations other than Iceland. It lies between the North Sea on the west and the Baltic Sea on the southeast. The Jutland, which is the long peninsula, comprises 70 percent of Denmark’s land area. The rest consists of over five hundred nearby islands, only one hundred of them inhabited. The Faeroe Islands and Greenland are self-governing units within the nation of Denmark. Denmark shares a border with Germany, thus being influenced in part by the Germans. The population is made up of primarily Nordic Scandinavians with a minority of Germans in the south. Approximately 97 percent are Danish and 3 percent foreigners. The literacy rate is almost 100 percent due to a compulsory education system in place since 1814.

The economy of Denmark is largely driven by agricultural and industrial exportation, giving the country one of the highest standards of living in the world. Its government is considered to provide the world’s most advanced welfare and social service system. However, in the 1980s, concern about the costs making up 30 percent of the national budget forced the government to put restrictions on the social benefits for individuals. Currently, Denmark is a constitutional monarchy headed by Margaret I, queen since 1972. There are four principal political parties.

The religion of the people is evangelical Lutheran. Christianity was first introduced in 826 and became widespread during Canute’s reign in the eleventh century. During the reign of Christian III (1534–59), the Reformation brought the establishment of a national Lutheran Church. The state supports the church, which was established in 1536, and 95 percent of the population today are members. However, it has been estimated that only about 3 percent of those members attend church services. This signifies that religion is more a part of the culture and heritage than a personal faith.

Many people are turning to the Eastern religious movement and Christian sects to find spiritual answers, thus implying further that the state church is not meeting the spiritual needs of the Danes. The biggest problem is that the evangelical witness within and outside of the state church is very weak. A major reason for the external problem is the difficulties foreign missionaries face in obtaining visas. There was a decline in missionaries since 1970 and today officially there are only 31 present (the ratio of missionaries to Danes is only 1:165,000). As long as there are visa restrictions in Denmark, evangelism will have to come primarily from the native Christians. Foreign missionaries just do not have access to the people of Denmark as their own Christian organizations and churches do. Regarding the state churches, liberal theology has infiltrated many of them. However, there are two conservative Lutheran free theological facilities in the country. These facilities are expanding and enrolling more students. This, of course, is a positive development for the future of Christianity in Denmark, but unfortunately not enough to reach the majority of Danes. Revival in the Lutheran churches or within other native Christian groups is desperately needed.

William L. Wagner

Dependence. Dependence is a necessary part of life, an inborn tendency which cultural, social, and psychological conditions shape. The real problem of dependence is not its existence or nonexistence, but the manner of being dependent.

Overdependency of any kind (financial, physical, emotional, or intellectual) may result in erosion of self-respect, inhibiting initiative in using existing resources and leading to imitative behavior that destroys cultural integrity. But dependency also may build relationships and knit a society together, strengthening individual and group security and sense of identity.

One-way dependency is negative, ultimately destroying healthy relationships. The person or society depended upon feels exploited, and the dependent individual or group grows to resent the other.

Such dependency reduces self-respect because of an apparent inability to do anything other than receive. Lacking self-respect, the receiver may reject familiar cultural patterns and imitate the person or group that is the source of help. The consequent change is often not appropriate, creating a need for more help. A downward spiral results that leads to psychological or social dysfunction. The group helped is crippled in their ability to care for their own affairs.

One-way dependency is an addictive process in which participants become co-dependents who are unable or unwilling to see people and things realistically. The addictive process takes control of participants, pushing participants to think and do things inconsistent with their values, including deceptive behavior, in the attempt to justify dependency and yet maintain the illusion of independence.

As with any addiction, everything comes to center around satisfying a craving. More and more is needed to create the desired effect, and no amount is ever enough. Perception of information is distorted and relationships become subservient to the addiction. There is an awareness that something is wrong, but addictive thinking says that it is somebody else’s fault. No responsibility is accepted. Addicts tend to be dependent and to feel increasingly powerless. The idea that they can take responsibility for their lives is inconceivable to them.

This pattern of thinking is equally applicable to individuals and groups. Either can be addicted to dependency systems (economic, structural, and psychological) as strongly as to drugs.

Economic dependency has been shown to inhibit national development, yet economic dependency has been repeated in church-mission relationships. Both national and church dependency are characterized by a very few sources investing/giving heavily through an indigenous controlling elite. Fundamental decision-making is implicitly the prerogative of the donor not the recipient. Foreign assistance is large relative to the receiving economy. A large proportion of its university students and leadership are trained in a few foreign sites, and a considerable portion of the aid is spent on purchases from abroad. The economic top 20 percent receive most of the funds, which reinforces their position, and the bottom 40 percent almost none.
Dependency

Christian ministries unwittingly perpetuate economic dependency when they plead “just send money,” separating funds from fellowship contrary to the example and teaching of 2 Corinthians 8 and 9. “It continues to make the national church dependent. . . . It often robs the national church of its natural potential. When easy money is available, very few want to explore indigenous ways of fund raising.”

Dependency is also created by imported structures, methodologies, and institutions that are suitable for churches of one culture but not for another. By placing inappropriate and even impossible demands on the churches, those churches become dependent on the guidance of outsiders who understand the imported system. A form of Christianity is created that cannot be reproduced. Paternalism and its mate, dependency, thus may grow from the very structures of mission and church, not from some weakness in either the new believers or the missionaries.

In cultures of North America and Europe independence is considered an absolute good. A central therapeutic assumption in Euro-American psychology is that healthy behavior is self-reliant, self-sufficient, and independent. The in-born tendency to dependency, either individually or in the social structure, is to be removed as quickly as possible.

Very different assumptions are present in many cultures of Asia, Africa, and South America concerning dependency. It is two-way, part of mutual support, obligation, and reciprocity that binds the society by building relationships of interdependency. Life requires cooperation at every point. Dependency is not weakness but a part of the natural order where help always moves in circles, not in a straight line. What is given will return.

In a basic way, most of the world’s people are dependent. Peoples as widespread as the Japanese, American Indians, Matabele (Zimbabwe), and the Malagasy (Madagascar) all accept dependency as necessary and positive. A reward is expected for relying on another, because you have given by receiving. Amae is a fundamental concept in Japanese social psychology, an automatic good expressed supremely in the role of the emperor who depends on others to rule and carry out every task yet is honored as the ultimate expression of the nation. Dependency is pivotal in the worldview that underlies Malagasy society, and the dependency systems of India affect nearly every transaction.

Missions function within these two opposing concepts of dependency. Euro-American missionaries tend to regard all dependency as bad, and Asian-African-South Americans regard it as necessary and good. Failure to recognize these fundamental differences in attitudes to dependency leads to misunderstanding and alienation.

Gurian and Gurian provide a model that describes destructive extremes and the desirable balance. They note that a one-way dependency may result in entrapment, enslavement, helplessness, suppression, surrender, submission, and submergence. Total independence, on the other hand, can result in abandonment, estrangement, selfishness, narcissism, withdrawal, alienation, and isolation. True interdependency, a position in tension between the two poles of dependency and independence, can lead to continuity, bonding, reciprocity, mutual and healthy obligation, trust, commitment, and involvement.

Scriptures teach the interdependence of believers within the Body of Christ, not crippling dependency nor extreme individualism. Christian workers from every cultural heritage are obligated to build that interdependence within the international church, avoiding patterns that lead to either extreme.

DONALD F. SMITH

SEE ALSO Foreign Financing of Indigenous Missions; Partnerships; Paternalism.

Depravity of Humankind. Depravity refers to the extensiveness, or “depth dimension,” of sin. To the question, How far does the corrupting influence of sin extend to a person’s being? the doctrine of total depravity responds that such corruption is all-pervasive, affecting every part of a person’s nature, including the body, mind/intellect/reason, emotions, will, motivations, and so on. Thus, there is no spiritual good in people at all that could merit God’s grace nor any human inclination to make a move toward God for salvation. Contrast this with other views (e.g., semi-Pelagianism) which deny that sin’s depravity is total and maintain that some aspect of a person’s being (e.g., the will or reason), while weakened by the corrupting influence of sin, retains sufficient ability to set in motion the pursuit after salvation through cooperation with divine grace.

While depravity is pervasive, the Image of God in humanity has not been completely effaced. Conscience or an innate awareness of good and evil remains, and corrupted people may still demonstrate a sensitivity for right and wrong. Will, the power to choose, continues, and sinful people may still engage in natural, civil, and even externally religious good. Thus, depraved people are not as evil as they possibly could be, constantly indulging in every kind of sin. They possess both depravity and dignity.

Scriptural support for depravity includes both general statements about the all-pervasive corrupting influence of sin on humanity (Gen. 6:5; Rom. 3:9–18; 7:18; Eph. 2:1–3) as well as specific statements of sin’s depraving impact on the various aspects of human nature such as the mind (Eph. 4:17–18; Rom. 8:6–7), the heart (Jer. 17:9), the conscience (Titus 1:15), the “inner being” (Mark 7:20–23), and the body (Rom. 6:12–13; 8:10). The biblical evidence points not only to deprivation (the absence of good) but to depravation (total corruption resulting in evil) as the thoroughgoing problem of humankind.

The implications of depravity for missions are several: (1) Personal awareness of our own human perversity propels us to seek out the divine solution in Jesus Christ. (2) “The deeper the sense of sin, the more thorough is the moral recovery and the intenser the spiritual life” (Miley). (3) As those rescued from miserable ruin, we express our thankfulness by no longer living for ourselves, but for him who saved us. This entails commitment to the ministry of reconciliation as ambassadors for Christ (2 Cor. 5:14–21). (4) Because of the universal all-pervasiveness of sin, God justly condemns the entire world to eternal punishment (see also Hell). This desperate plight of our fellow human beings challenges us to embark on the missionary enterprise. The message of salvation which we carry worldwide is the profound answer corresponding to the depth dimension of human sin. It renews the mind (Rom. 12:1–2), changes the heart (Ezek. 36:26), cleanses the conscience (Heb. 9:14), transforms the “inner being” (Eph. 3:16; Col. 3:10), and redeems the body (Rom. 8:13; 1 Cor. 6:12–20). The fullness of deliverance from our depravity awaits the return of Jesus Christ.

Devandan, Paul David

Deputation. In the deputation process initial missionary appointees visit churches and other gatherings of Christians to present their ministry for the purpose of developing prayer and financial support to underwrite missionary endeavors. This procedure is found in independent missions and many evangelical denominations in contrast to denomination mission boards that are usually funded through a unified budget not requiring missionaries to raise their own support. There are certain variations. The Christian and Missionary Alliance requires missionaries to minister in churches and district conferences to help raise funds for the mission, but not for personal support. Overseas Missionary Fellowship asks appointees to seek out prayer support but not to ask for funds. The origin of this term is related to the appointment of deputies (assistants) to stand in with the sheriff and his posse to accomplish a task, just as the supporters choose to stand in prayer and financial commitment to assist in the missionary’s ministry.

The process of deputation has several drawbacks: different personalities can work for or against the candidate; one’s personal network can be well developed or very limited; the costs of missionary support have risen with inflation (often equivalent to public school teacher’s salaries), and the time factor has steadily increased from one to two years with certain high cost-of-living countries taking even three years of this procedure; the constant displacement of a missionary’s family can create hardship; and there are often significantly different levels of personalized help in fundraising. The often overlooked aspect of deputation is the opportunity to share the appointee’s passion and testimony with other potential missionaries. Historically deputation developed in the nineteenth century with the birth of interdenominational mission societies, but today the majority of North American Protestant missionaries are supported through this system.

John Easterling

See also Fund Raising; Furlough.

Deutsche Gesellschaft für Missionwisenschaft. See German Society for the Study of Missions.

Devandan, Paul David (1901–62). Indian theologian, educator, and churchman. Born in Madras, India, the son of devoted Christians, he was greatly influenced by his mother, who studied the Bible in the Tamil, Telugu, and Urdu languages. After earning degrees from universities in India and the United States (Nizam College, Madras University, Pacific School of Religion, and Yale Divinity School), he taught religion at the Union Seminary of Bangalore for seventeen years and served as director of the Christian Institute for the Study of Religion and Society from 1956 until his death. He had a great impact in India through the books and articles he wrote and edited and as a teacher and a man. He combined a personal faith in Christ as his Savior and conservative theological beliefs with an ability to encourage dialogue between people of different faiths. In his native India, overwhelmingly Hindu, this was a major step in equipping his students to minister outside the rather clannish Christian community. One of his best-remembered addresses was on the Christian mission in the world, entitled “Called to Witness,” which he gave to the 1961 Assembly of the World Council of Churches in New Delhi. Russell Chandran, principal of the United Theological College, said of Devanandan, “No one in the Indian church has had so many friends among non-Christian scholars and thinkers and few Indian Christians have been held in so high a regard by non-Christians.”
Devanandan, Paul David

ROBERT SCHUSTER

Development. In terms of missionary activity and mission strategy, development usually denotes an inclusive process in which the physical and social needs of persons and groups are given attention alongside their spiritual needs.

Development is a general word, commonly used with reference to such diverse matters as fundraising, improvement of property or resources, increased effectiveness and profitability of a business or social enterprise, expansion and fulfillment of complex mental capacities, physical maturation—especially of children, and spiritual deepening across a lifetime.

Developmentalism, a closely related term in the field of psychology and social psychology, emphasizes the built-in characteristics of the organism, the person, or the social enterprise. A developmental viewpoint assumes that changes in the maturing human being or in a developing society represent an emergence of the patterns and characteristics that are psychogenetically predisposed and patterned—built into the organism or system. The writings of Piaget and Kohlberg, for example, assume that development is not something that the parent or teacher causes but rather participates in. Developmentalism does not deny the influences of environment, but it avoids assuming that the environment or any outside agents are the singular explanation for all outcomes in the development of a person or of a society. From a developmental perspective, development is defined in terms of the processes through which maturing persons or emergent societies lose the limitations that have characterized their previous condition.

The major obstacles to social development include (1) defeatism, in which people see no possibilities beyond the conditions and restrictiveness with which they are currently most familiar, (2) dependency, an actual condition or a mental state in which people assume that they are not adequate apart from significant help and resources from the outside, and (3) pride, through which people become self-sufficient and resistant to encouragements and assistance from outsiders.

The role of the outsider, whether teacher, parent, missionary, agriculturalist, or health worker, is a matter of assisting, stimulating, encouraging, and providing access to the resources essential to development. Thus, such outsiders could be better described as development technicians. The activity in which outsiders provide valuable services within contemporary church ministries and evangelism in many places is development assistance.

Development assistance has become an increasing emphasis within missions in recent years. Although the concern for the well-being of human beings has been a facet of deliberate Christian missions all through the modern missionary era, conservative and narrow views of missions took a toll during the middle of the twentieth century. Defining missions as verbal proclamation of the gospel makes people more enthusiastic about building schools than about building hospitals. Since development assistance is usually a slow and rather costly investment in people, the threat to other missionary activity has created a substantial schism. For evangelicals and conservatives, especially for fundamentalists, meeting spiritual needs is arguably more important than attending to physical or socio-political matters.

In missiological debates development assistance often is seen as competing for resources that would otherwise be invested in spiritual matters, especially verbal evangelization. The argument usually springs from the fear that if resources are committed to the purposes of social development the emphasis on verbal proclamation of the gospel will suffer. Some have argued that this position is based on the curious assumption that God's capacities and resources are limited.

Another argument against expending Christian resources for physical, social, and economic development is based upon the view that the primary task of God's people is to act upon Christ's primary motive: “to seek and to save . . . the lost.” This position arises from the view that God is honored as his people use resources wisely and in a manner disciplined to the priorities of the Kingdom of God. The conclusion one reaches will depend on how these priorities are understood (see also Missionary Task).

Whatever the argument against the church's participation in development assistance, the example provided by Jesus Christ's engagement in whole-person ministry stands clearly as the most valid precedent. Strategically, as well, current evidence in the field strongly suggests that large-scale evangelization of communities and large extended families often follows closely the offering of development assistance provided in the name of Jesus Christ. This recognition has led to yet another view: legitimization of development assistance because of its pragmatic value as a tool of evangelization.

Although parachurch organizations such as Food for the Hungry and World Vision have emerged largely to balance the church's mid-century denial of the importance of the physical and social needs of people, especially the poor in underdeveloped regions, there is still no consen-
The local church, as a community of faith, is an especially appropriate context for community development. In regions where the church is well-planted, participation of Christians in the social welfare of their communities often provides the incentive and motivational core for substantial development process. Thus the churches of the world are increasingly providing the leadership and community resource-centers for social change.

Relief activities are substantially different from development assistance (see also Relief Work). Although relief is a more common response to human need and is widely supported by Christians as a reflection of Jesus’ teaching about the contrast between sheep and goats in Matthew 25 and his teaching about responsibilities to one’s neighbor in the “good Samaritan” story, relief tends toward counter-developmental interventions and outcomes. Necessary as it is to save lives and to reduce suffering, delivering food and medical supplies can soon lead to a dependent condition, especially if delivered overmuch or overlong. The tendency to think of development as a sort of companion of relief often leads to confusion. Indeed, it is easier to solicit funds and elicit sympathy for relief needs, but relief rarely leads to making the necessary changes in socio-political structure, productivity, lifestyle, and culture. A Chinese proverb is used to sum up this problem: Give a man a fish and he eats today; teach a man to fish and he eats for a lifetime.

Development assistance requires the participation of those being assisted. The one who assists must first listen and learn, resisting the temptation to exert undue influence through one’s expertise and outside leverage. Development assistance requires great patience and appropriate creativity. The primary goal is to encourage people to accept the possibility of bettering their conditions through self-help.

The major obstacle to effective development assistance is the difficulty of bringing into harmony the motives of insiders and outsiders. Views of the appropriate conditions of life, degrees of willingness to accept change, personal and community dignity and pride all must be considered. Who decides what goals are worthy? Who decides how hard and how fast to work? Who decides the best use of resources? Ordinarily, the perverted golden rule prevails: Those who hold the gold make the rules. The influence of well-intentioned outsiders, while important in the short-run, commonly becomes the undermining destructive force in many development projects.

Another common obstacle is disagreement on the scope of the problem being addressed by the development effort. Even MOTHER TERESA of Calcutta was persistently criticized for not addressing the underlying socio-political problems that produce India’s poverty. Instead, she defined her mission in terms of treating symptoms, not causes. Arguments about how large to draw the target can cause development activities to bypass the most basic of human needs: the need to be directly involved in the quest for change.

In recent years the emphasis on development has waned, among missionary efforts and in regard to international assistance in general. The results of development activity have been uneven and often disappointing. Particularly among those who describe themselves as “doing development” and, worse yet, “delivering development,” effectiveness typically has been minimal. Human groups simply cannot be pushed into development by outside efforts. Broad-scale community participation and altruistic local initiatives are essential, and they must arise out of what PAULO FREIRE called conscientization, more thoughtful awareness of the conditions in which people find themselves, coupled with a heightened sense of moral responsibility and initiative.

TED WARD

SEE ALSO Evangelism and Social Responsibility, Holistic Mission, and Transformational Development.

Biblology. E. J. Elliston, ed., Christian Relief and Development; D. C. Korten, Getting to the 21st Century—Voluntary Action and the Global Agenda; J. M. Perkins, Beyond Charity: The Call to Christian Community Development; T. Yamamori, B. Myers, et al., Serving with the Poor in Asia; idem, Serving with the Poor in Africa; idem, Serving with the Poor in Latin America.

Devil. See SATAN.

Deyneka, Peter, Sr. (1897–1987). Russian-American missionary evangelist and founder of the Slavic Gospel Association. Born in the Russian province of Grodno, he immigrated to the United States at the age of sixteen to lift his family out of debt. While working in Chicago, he drifted from his Russian Orthodox moorings and became an activist and atheist. He came to Christ through contact with Moody Memorial Church and numerous Christian individuals. After attending classes at Moody Bible Institute, he continued his education at St. Paul Bible School (Minnesota) and developed his gift for evangelism among Russian immigrants in the region.

In 1925 Peter made his first of several trips back to Russia and became the first person ever to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ in his home village. Significant also was his marriage to Vera, a young Russian Christian woman. During the following decade Deyneka was associated with the All-Russian Evangelical Christian Union and Worldwide Christian Couriers respectively. Ex-

Deyneka, Peter, Sr.
Deyneka, Peter, Sr.

Extensive evangelistic preaching tours in the Soviet Union and around the world convinced him of the need to organize missionary outreach among Slavic people. In 1934 "The Russian Gospel Association," later expanded to "The Slavic Gospel Association" (SGA), was founded. Radio programming (see Radio Mission Work) became one of SGA's largest and most effective mediums of evangelism and theological education. Other major thrusts include distribution of Bibles and Christian literature and relief work among Slavic refugees. Deyneka's booklet "Much Prayer—Much Power" illustrates his conviction that prayer is the modus operandi of missionary outreach. Deyneka remained SGA's general director until his retirement in 1975.

Florence R. Scott

Bibliography. N. B. Rohrer and P. Deyneka, Jr., Peter Dynamite; P. Deyneka, When a Russian Found Christ.

Dialogue. The subject of vigorous discussion, dialogue seems to defy definition. Most agree, however, that dialogue includes face-to-face conversations involving persons who have fundamentally different religious convictions for the purpose of understanding and growth. In the debate on religious pluralism and dialogue, convictions on its nature and use appear to settle into three positions. The position held by pluralists rejects traditional views on biblical revelation, proclaiming interreligious dialogue as a new epistemology; extreme conservatism calls for the rejection of dialogue in favor of proclamation; a more centrist view affirms dialogue as a means of understanding and communication without rejecting biblical revelation.

Ontological and epistemological relativism form the basis for pluralist dialogue. Within this framework, dialogue is seen as a primary avenue toward universal religious truth. Through interfaith discussion under an attitude of equal respect for person and faith, dialogue may reveal supreme truth that transcends various religious traditions: the ultimate truth behind all cultural expressions of religious experience, whether that experience finds expression through Hinduism, Islam, Buddhism, or Christianity. Important aspects include entering dialogue with little or no predetermined expectations, complete honesty, openness, and willingness to change, even concerning important theological issues. Thus, through interfaith dialogue, the Christian may convert from Christianity, the non-Christian may convert to Christianity, or both may become agnostic. Adherents to this position include John Hick, Paul F. Knitter, John R. Cobb, Raimundo Panikkar, and Leonard Swidler.

This position, however, views relativism as a universally accepted paradigm, possibly creating a naiveté concerning the willingness of other parties to agree to the relativistic preconditions and the possibility that such dialogues become limited to other pluralists from various faiths. This position also evidences a lack of attention to smaller religious movements in the pluralist literature. Little space is given to dialogue between Christians (even liberal) and Satanists, to give an extreme example.

The opposite view may be called the antidialogue position; it is held by D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones, among others. Drawing presuppositions from conservative Christian tradition and nineteenth-century positivism, this position assumes an absolute, complete, and accurate comprehension of biblical truth as expressed in evangelical orthodoxy, forming "an exact correspondence between theology and Scripture" (Hiebert, 1985, 7). Any dialogue that contains the possibility for theological change is often perceived as a threat. Accordingly, as John Stott points out, proclamation commands the central element of this position. Careful attention is given to the presentation of the message in monologue form with less attention to surrounding beliefs or circumstances. Dialogue with non-Christians is often considered to involve compromise with anti-Christian forces, violating 2 John 7–11. Preaching in monologue style seeks to accurately communicate propositional truth, thus safeguarding the purity and integrity of the biblical message.

Weaknesses include substantial evidence of cultural and subjective bias in biblical interpretation, undermining the presupposition of exact correspondence. Accordingly, adherents may experience difficulty discerning and respecting differences in conservative biblical interpretation that stem from divergent worldviews. In addition, greater possibilities exist for insensitive presentations that can hinder comprehension of central biblical issues. For example, cultures that value relationships and conversation more than preaching may find difficulty in responding to the message.

The third position seeks to affirm both the understanding and communication aspects of dialogue without surrendering biblical absolutes, the latter being a crucial distinction from the pluralist definition of dialogue. This position, combining critical realism with theological conservatism, is held by (among others) Stott, E. Stanley Jones, Kenneth Cragg, Carl F. H. Henry, and Bishop Stephen Neill. Through interpersonal dialogue, one listens and learns as well as shares scriptural truth. Biblical evidence for this position includes examples from the ministry of Christ (John 3–4; Luke 18:18–29), the ministry of Peter (Acts 10:27–48), Paul (Acts 13:8–18; 17:16–34; 19:8:10; 20:6–7), and the common sense of Proverbs 18:13. Stott summarizes his argument by stating that true biblical dialogue reflects authenticity, humility, integrity, and sensitivity—all without relinquishing essential biblical mandates for salvation. The position calls for careful discernment between people who are valued by Christ and religious systems that oppose him, and it is the position generally practiced by evangelical missionaries.

The weaknesses of this position include possible difficulties in maintaining a balance among interpersonal relationships, biblical truth, and resulting psychological equilibrium. Additionally, losing biblical perspective may also lead toward SYNCRETISM. However, the strengths of this approach far outweigh the weaknesses.

STEVEN J. PIERSON

Diaspora(s). The role of the Jewish diaspora is seen clearly in the Acts of the Apostles. Stephen, Philip, Barnabas, and Paul were all Jews of the diaspora who were at home in both Jewish and Greek culture. And it is clear that the first to preach the gospel to Gentiles were such bicultural Jewish followers of Christ. The first specific mission to the Gentiles was called out from the Antioch church which included both Gentile and diaspora Jewish believers. Acts tells us that the nucleus of the churches planted in the Roman Empire came from diaspora Jews and “God fearers.” The Syriac-speaking church in the East which took the gospel to India and, through the Nestorians, to China probably had its beginning in synagogues of the diaspora in Mesopotamia.

Throughout the centuries Christians have been scattered in other diasporas because of religious or political persecution or to seek economic opportunities and political freedom. The Waldensian movement arose in Lyon, France, in the twelfth century and spread across southern and central Europe, only to suffer PERSECUTION and MARTYRDOM. Some Waldensians joined remnants of the Hussite movement which arose in Bohemia and Moravia in the fifteenth century to form the Unitas Fratrum. It was a few members of that group who became the nucleus of the Moravian movement which became a major catalyst of the modern Protestant missionary movement (see MORAVIAN MISSIONS).

The Mennonites are the primary heirs of the sixteenth-century Anabaptist movement. They have been scattered through a number of Eurolimited to mission(s) and then give examples of broader dictionaries which include mission(s) discussion. Within the categories each work is listed by first edition date.
Dictionaries of Mission(s)

In addition to the recent Directories of Missions, The Encyclopedia of Modern Christian Missions: The Agencies (B. L. Goddard, 1967) provides articles covering the history and development of 1,400 Protestant mission organizations. The nineteenth-century forerunner of today’s geographically-based dictionaries was The Missionary Gazetteer (C. Williams, 1832).

Directories of Mission

The Encyclopedia of Modern Christian Missions: The Agencies (1967), with Burton Goddard as editor. It includes historical, descriptive, and statistical (including financial when available) data for more than 1,400 Protestant foreign missionary and related agencies.

A more comprehensive directory is the type that includes all the mission boards and agencies based in a country. Besides the basic directory information, it may include expanded statistical information about the individual organizations, various overall summary totals, indexes, and other information. For the United States and Canada the most comprehensive directory is the Mission Handbook: U.S. and Canadian Ministries Overseas, initiated in 1953 as an ongoing series by the Missionary Research Library and published since 1968 by the MARC Division of World Vision International.

In the United Kingdom the UK Christian Handbook, edited by Peter Brierley, has an overseas missions section along with sections on other organizations and services. Non-Western countries such as Brazil, Korea, India, and Singapore have produced mission or broader Christian directories, with some available in multiple languages. Directory sections of non-Western cross-cultural sending missions have been included in some publications. From Every People: A Handbook of Two-Thirds World Missions with Directory/Histories/Analysis (1989) by Larry Pate followed earlier publications of the same nature by Marlin Nelson and Lawrence Keyes.

From time to time helpful specialized mission directories have appeared. In conjunction with the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization (1974), Edward Dayton led a team that produced the Unreached Peoples Directory, which in turn stimulated further research and other publications regarding unreached people groups. The Missions Commission of the World Evangelical Fellowship sponsored the World Directory of Missions Research and Information Centers (1989) and the World Directory of Missionary Training Programs (1995).

Comprehensive world surveys initiated by the International Missionary Council in 1925 and 1936 provided directory information that appeared in related publications. In the following decades, the World Christian Handbook (1949, 1952, 1962, 1968), edited by Kenneth Grubb and others, included directory and statistical sections for national churches and mission societies. The most comprehensive world mission directory published to date is The Encyclopedia of Modern Christian Missions: The Agencies (1967), with Burton Goddard as editor. It includes historical, descriptive, and statistical (including financial when available) data for more than 1,400 Protestant foreign missionary and related agencies.
Directories of Mission

A limited amount of mission directory materials have been placed on the World Wide Web. This will most likely increase as the Web continues to develop as a publishing medium.

JOHN A. SIEWERT

Disaster Response. Disaster may be defined as a sudden turn of events (from natural or human causes) which brings about or threatens injury or death to a great number of people, disrupting normal life and requiring immediate action. Disaster Response.

Disaster may be defined as a sudden turn of events (from natural or human causes) which brings about or threatens injury or death to a great number of people, disrupting normal life and requiring immediate action.

Luke 21:9–11 (LB) predicts natural disasters such as earthquakes, famines, epidemics, and “terrifying things happening in the heavens,” perhaps like cyclones and hurricanes. It also warns of human-made disasters such as revolutions and wars “for nation shall rise against nation and kingdom against kingdom.” Millions of people are affected annually by natural disasters. People, caught in war or civil strife, seek asylum as refugees, and their number is on the rise. Studies describe the world of tomorrow to be more susceptible to all kinds of disturbances than the world of today. Both biblical prophecy and the empirical data affirm the need to anticipate coming disasters.

Responding to disaster is not the responsibility of Christians only. It is the responsibility of every compassionate person. Yet, Christians have a good reason to be involved in disaster response. The Great Commandment (Matt. 22:37–39) dictates that the people of God love him and their neighbors as themselves. All humans are created in the image of God and, therefore, each life is precious—each person one for whom Christ died. All the victims of disaster, natural or human-made, should be treated with dignity and respect.

The Book of Acts gives an example of how Christians should act in response to a disaster. One of the prophets named Agabus predicted a great famine coming upon the land of Israel (which later came to pass during the reign of Claudius). “So the believers [in Antioch] decided to send relief to the Christians in Judea, each giving as much as he could.” Their gifts were consigned to Barnabas and Paul, and they were delivered to the elders of the church in Jerusalem (Acts 11:27–30).

In Capernaum Jesus, turning to his enemies, asked, “Is it all right to do kind deeds on Sabbath days? . . . Is it a day to save lives or to destroy them?” No response! Jesus “was deeply disturbed by their indifference to human need” (Mark 3:1–5 LB). Elsewhere we are admonished to “stop just saying we love people,” but to “really love them, and show it by our actions” (1 John 3:17–18). In implementing disaster relief, we must work closely, whenever and wherever possible, with existing churches and missions in order that we might help enhance their ministry.
Discipleship (Luke 24:47; Matt. 28:19–20). In the Gospels, the disciples are with Jesus, the religious leaders are those who are against Jesus, and the crowds or multitudes are those who are curious, but have not yet made a commitment to Jesus. The word “disciple” when referring to Jesus’ followers is equivalent to “believer” (cf. Acts 4:32; 6:2) and “Christian” (Acts 11:26).

We should distinguish between the disciples in a narrow and broad sense. In the narrow sense, we recognize especially those twelve who literally followed Jesus around and later became the apostles. We also recognize a broader group of Jesus’ disciples which was composed, among others, of the large group of people who had become Jesus’ followers (Luke 6:13), a variety of individual men and women (Luke 8:2–3; 23:49, 55; 24:13, 18, 33), tax-collectors (Luke 19:1–10), scribes (Matt. 8:18–21), and religious leaders (John 19:38–42; Matt. 27:57). The term “disciple” designates one as a believer in Jesus; all true believers are disciples (cf. Acts 4:32 with 6:2). The Twelve were distinguished from the larger group by a calling to become “apostles” (Luke 6:13). The Twelve were both disciples (i.e., believers) and apostles (i.e., commissioned leaders) (Matt. 10:1–2).

Discipleship. The initiative of discipleship with Jesus lies with his call (Mark 1:17; 2:14; Matt. 4:19; 9:9; cf. Luke 5:10–11, 27–28) and his choice (John 15:16) of those who would be his disciples. The response to the call involves recognition and belief in Jesus’ identity (John 2:11; 6:68–69), obedience to his summons (Mark 1:18, 20), counting the cost of full allegiance to him (Luke 14:25–28; Matt. 19:23–30), and participating in his mission of being a “light to the Gentiles” (Acts 13). His call is the beginning of something new; it means leaving behind one’s old life (Matt. 8:34–37; Luke 9:23–25), finding new life in the family of God through obeying the will of the Father (Matt. 12:46–50), and being sent by him to the world as the Father had sent Jesus (John 20:21).

When Jesus called men and women to follow him, he offered a personal relationship with himself, not simply an alternative lifestyle or different religious practices or a new social organization. While some of the sectarians within Judaism created separations between the “righteous” and the “unrighteous” by their regulations and traditions, Jesus broke through those barriers by calling to himself those who, in the eyes of sectarians, did not seem to enjoy the necessary qualifications for fellowship with him (Matt. 9:9–13; Mark 2:13–17). Discipleship means the beginning of a new life in intimate fellowship with a living Master and Savior. Thus discipleship also involves a commitment to call others to such a relationship with Jesus Christ.

Jesus’ gracious call to discipleship was accompanied by an intense demand to count the cost of discipleship (cf. Luke 9:57–62; 14:25–33). The demand to count the cost of discipleship meant exchanging the securities of this world for salvation and security in him. For some this meant sacrificing riches (Matt. 19:16–26), for others it meant sacrificing attachment to family (Matt. 8:18–22; Luke 14:25–27), for still others it meant abandoning nationalistic feelings of superiority (Luke 10:25–37). For all disciples it means giving of one’s life for gospel proclamation in the world.

Jesus declared that to be a disciple is to become like the master (Matt. 10:24–25; Luke 6:40). Becoming like Jesus includes going out with the same message, ministry, and compassion (Matt. 10:5f.), practicing the same religious and social traditions (Mark 2:18–22; Matt. 12:1–8), belonging to the same family of obedience (Matt. 12:46–49), exercising the same servanthood (Mark 10:42–45; Matt. 20:26–28; John 13:12–17), experiencing the same suffering (Matt. 10:16–25; Mark 10:38–39), and being sent in the same way to the same world (John 20:21). The true disciple was to know Jesus so well, to have followed him so closely, that he or she would become like him. The ultimate goal was to be conformed to Jesus’ image (cf. Luke 6:40; Rom. 8:28–29; 2 Cor. 3:18; Gal. 4:19) and then live out a life of witness in word and deed to the world that Jesus is Lord.

John’s Gospel carries three challenges of Jesus to his disciples. These challenges offer the means by which a disciple grows in discipleship to become like Jesus. First, true discipleship means abiding in Jesus’ words as the truth for every area of life (cf. John 8:31–32). Abiding in Jesus’ words means to know and to live in what Jesus says about life. Instead of listening to the world’s values, disciples must listen to what Jesus says. This begins with salvation (cf. Peter’s example in John 6:66–69), but involves every other area of life as well (Matt. 28:19–20). Second, true discipleship also means loving one another as Jesus loved his disciples (John 13:34–35). Love is a distinguishing mark of all disciples of Jesus, made possible because of regeneration—where a change has been made in the heart of the believer by God’s love—and because of an endless supply of love from God, who is love (cf. 1 John 4:12–21). Third, Jesus also said that the true disciple will bear fruit: the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22–26), new converts (John 4:3–38; 15:16), righteousness and good works (Phil. 1:11; Col. 1:10), and proclamation witness to the world (John 20:21).

No matter how advanced Jesus’ disciples would become, they would always be disciples of Jesus. In other master-disciple relationships in Judaism, the goal of discipleship was one day to become the master. But disciples of Jesus are not simply involved in an education or vocational form of discipleship. Disciples of Jesus have entered into a relationship with the Son of God, which means that Jesus is always Master and Lord (Matt. 23:8–12). Therefore, this relationship...
Disciple, Discipleship

with Jesus is a wholistic process—involving every area of life as the disciple grows to become like Jesus—and it lasts throughout the disciple’s life.

The church therefore is a community of disciples, the family of God (cf. Matt. 12:46–50), composed of all those who have believed on Jesus for salvation. In our day we have lost that perspective. Often people of the church feel as though discipleship is optional, that perhaps it is only for those who are extremely committed, or else it is for those who have been called to leadership or ministry. We must regain the biblical perspective: to believe on Jesus draws a person into community, a community which defines its expectations, responsibilities, and privileges in terms of discipleship. Mission and Discipleship. We have seen above that a primary goal of discipleship is becoming like Jesus (Luke 6:40). This is also understood by Paul to be the final goal of eternal election (Rom. 8:29). The process of becoming like Jesus brings the disciple into intimate relationship with the Lord Jesus Christ, and, as such, is the goal of individual discipleship. But discipleship is not simply self-centered. In a classic interaction with two of his disciples who were seeking positions of prominence, Jesus declares that servanthood is to be the goal of disciples in relationship to one another (Mark 10:35–45). The reason that this kind of servanthood is possible is because of Jesus’ work of servanthood in ransomng disciples. He paid the price of release from the penalty for sin (cf. Rom. 6:23), and from the power of sin over pride and self-centered motivation. The motivation of self-serving greatness is broken through redemption, and disciples are thus enabled to focus upon others in servanthood both in the church and, with other Christians, servanthood in the world. This is very similar to Paul’s emphasis when he points to Jesus’ emptying himself to become a servant: Jesus provides the example of the way the Philippian believers are to act toward one another (Phil. 2:1–8).

Through his final GREAT COMMISSION Jesus focuses his followers on the ongoing importance of discipleship through the ages, and declares the responsibility of disciples toward the world: they are to make disciples of all peoples (Matt. 28:16–20). To “make disciples” is to proclaim the gospel message among those who have not yet heard the gospel of forgiveness of sins (cf. Luke 24:46–47; John 20:21). The command finds verbal fulfillment in the activities of the early church (e.g. Acts 14:21), where they went from Jerusalem to Judea, to Samaria, to the ends of the earth proclaiming the gospel of the kingdom and calling the peoples of the world to become disciples of Jesus Christ. In the early church, to believe in the gospel message was to become a disciple (cf. Acts 4:32 with 6:2). To “make disciples of all the nations” is to make more of what Jesus made of them.

A person becomes a disciple of Jesus when he or she confesses Jesus as Savior and God and is regenerated by the Holy Spirit (cf. John 3:3–8; Titus 3:5). The participle “baptizing” and “teaching” in Matthew 28:18 describe activities through which the new disciple grows in discipleship. Growth includes both identification with Jesus’ death and resurrection (baptism) and obedience to all that Jesus had commanded the disciples in his earthly ministry (teaching). Baptism immerses and surrounds the new believers with the reality and presence of the Triune God as they dwell within the church. Obedience to Jesus’ teaching brings about full Christian formation for disciples.

Jesus concludes the Commission with the crucial element of discipleship: the presence of the Master—“I am with you always, to the very end of the age” (Matt. 28:20). Both those obeying the command and those responding are comforted by the awareness that the risen Jesus will continue to form all his disciples. The Master is always present for his disciples to follow in their mission to the world throughout the ages.

MICHAEL J. WILKINS

Discipling a Whole Nation (DAWN). Discussed as an effective evangelistic method since the mid-1960s, the first major attempt to systematisically implement this strategy on a nationwide level occurred in the Philippines in the early 1970s. Jim Montgomery, one of the early proponents, founded Dawn Ministries to sharpen and to communicate the DAWN vision for reaching the world.

DAWN seeks to mobilize the whole body of Christ (local churches, denominations, parachurch organizations) in a nation in a determined effort to complete the Great Commission in that country. The goal is to provide an evangelical congregation for every rural village and urban neighborhood in the country. This approach is based on the conviction that the GREAT COMMISSION is not merely about people coming to faith in Christ. Rather, it is about the establishing of local congregations where evangelism and responsible discipleship can occur.
Dispensationalism. An approach to Holy Scripture which sees God's revelation unfolding through various stages. Throughout Scripture, God reveals his missionary purpose. George Peters showed that this purpose was generally "centripetal" in the Old Testament, that is, nations learned of God by coming to Israel. In the New Testament, mission is predominantly "centrifugal," that is, the church moves out to all nations with the gospel (1972, 21).

The modern missionary movement parallels the emergence of dispensationalism. William Carey, who went to India in 1793, is often mentioned as the father of modern evangelical missions, although there were earlier groups, such as the Moravians (see Moravian Missions).

Around the same time, John Nelson Darby (1800–1882) founded both the Plymouth Brethren and dispensationalism. It is clear from the beginning that personal piety, church purity, and missions, together with a dispensational orientation, were the ongoing marks of the Brethren movement. Darby, Groves, Mueller, and a host of others testify to this union of biblical method and missions (Coad, 1968, 16, 28, 37).

Nondispensational pietists, Reformed, Arminians, postmillennialists, and amillennialists have all had an honored part in the expansion of the gospel during the modern missions era. Yet George Ladd, himself not a dispensationalist, affirmed the following about dispensational leaders:

It is doubtful if there has been any other circle of men who have done more by their influence in preaching, teaching, and writing to promote a love for Bible study, a hunger for the deeper Christian life, a passion for evangelism, and zeal for missions in the history of American Christianity (1952, 49).

Dispensationalists, especially in North America, have had a great impact on missions through the Bible College movement. Graduate schools of theology like Dallas Theological Seminary have also played a key role in the development and teaching of dispensationalism. Nondispensational Bible colleges have also sent many graduates into missions. But the missionary impact of dispensational Bible colleges can be seen in the fact that Moody Bible Institute, founded in 1886, alone, has sent out over 6,600 missionaries, of whom almost 3,500 are serving cross-culturally today.

A number of dispensational missiologists have contributed to missions thinking. Among them are George W. Peters, J. Herbert Kane, David Hess, and Edward Pentecost. What are the distinctives of a dispensational approach to missions?

The Urgency of Missions. George Peters emphasized that missions is a response to an emergency (1972, 15). The crisis is the sinfulness of humanity, which, apart from an intervention of God, will be visited with judgment. God provided Jesus Christ who offered himself on the cross for the sin of the world (John 3:16–17; 2 Cor. 5:19; 1 John 2:2). In Christ, God was offering Israel their Messiah and the beginning of the millennial kingdom. But in their rejection and crucifixion of Christ, God provided for the salvation of the world (John 1:12; 3:16). This should not have been surprising; Jesus said that his Father had always been concerned for the Gentiles (Luke 4:24–27). But there was a new dimension to this era. The saved of all nations would be united in one body, the church. Paul called it a mystery not previously revealed as it was through his ministry (Eph. 3:1–13). This Good News directed to all the world is critically urgent to share.

Missions also derives urgency from the fact that Christ is the unique solution to humanity's dilemma (Acts 4:12). Dispensationalists are Christocentric with an evangelistic priority. People who die without conscious faith in Christ have no hope of salvation (Heb. 9:27). Christ may return at any moment (Matt. 25:36–44). Believers stand instructed by Scripture (2 Peter 3:8–15) to pay attention to personal holiness, understanding that time goes on because of God's concern for the lost. Time, then, is missionary in purpose.

This sense of urgency coupled with the belief in a future "postponed" millennial reign of Christ on earth could diminish a dispensationalist's interest in working toward present social improvement (see also Millennial Thought and Mission). But this is denied by more progressive dispensationalists (Blaising and Bock, 1992, 14), as well as by many who are more traditional. Hundreds of hospitals, community development projects, and literacy endeavors conducted by both dispensational and nondispensational missionaries testify to an equal interest in Holistic Mission.

Closure Strategy. Linked to the matter of urgency is that of actually finishing the task of world evangelism. Late-twentieth-century mission leaders emphasized finishing world evangelism by the year 2000. This is similar to what occurred at the close of the last century in the Student Volunteer Movement.
Dispensationalism

Focus on closure has had a tremendous effect on mission. The great evangelical advances in Latin America, Korea, and the Philippines occurred almost entirely in this century. Many cite Matthew 24:14 as the basis for their concern to finish the work of missions: “This gospel of the kingdom will be preached in all the world as a testimony to all nations, and then the end will come.” Perhaps believers today can facilitate the return of Christ.

Dispensationalists agree that all peoples will, in fact, be evangelized (though not all saved) before the end of time, but they consider the “end” as the end of the great tribulation period referred to in both Daniel 9:25–27 and Revelation 7:9–17. Most dispensationalists believe that Christ will come for his saints prior to “The Great Tribulation” and they do not believe they will be involved in the final consummation of the missionary task. A final and comprehensive job of world evangelization will be done during the tribulation, possibly by witnesses who are Jewish people converted during those days (Rev. 7:4–8).

Dispensationalism and missions have had a long and rich connection. As a movement committed to the Word of God, the presence and power of Christ and his Spirit, and preaching the riches of God’s incomparable grace, dispensationalists are motivated to engage in the work of missions until he comes!

MICHAEL POCOCK

Divination, Diviner. Divination is the practice of seeking secret knowledge, usually of the future, by occult means. A wide variety of techniques are used, with the expectation that insight will be provided by supernatural beings or power. Divination is and has always been a widespread practice among non-Christian peoples and, unfortunately, among many who call themselves Christians.

Diviners are specialists in using the techniques of divination to discover the information sought by their clients. The power to gain such information is assumed to be obtained by either directly petitioning a spirit or magically through the correct performance of given rituals. Most of those who specialize in working with satanic power combine divination with their other activities. SHAMANS, spirit mediums, priests of various cults, witches, sorcerers, witch doctors, and the like usually practice divination in addition to whatever else they do.

Among the techniques used are dreams, horoscopes, and astrological tables, water witching, examination of entrails or tea leaves, observing the activities of birds or other animals, the positions of coals or stones, cards, dice, crystals, and palmistry. In Scripture we find reference to divination through examining a dead animal’s liver (Ezek. 21:21), throwing down arrows (Ezek. 21:21), using a cup (Gen. 44:5), casting lots (Jonah 1:7), astrology (Isa. 47:13), and consulting the dead (Lev. 19:31; Isa. 8:19). God’s disapproval of the use of such techniques to gain information regarding the guilt or innocence of a person accused of a crime. Ordeals may involve such things as forcing accused persons to dip their hands in hot oil, swallow poison, have a hot knife pressed against their bodies, or some other act with the understanding that if they are harmed they are guilty. In Numbers 5:11–31, Moses is commanded to instruct the Israelites to use an ordeal involving an oath and the drinking of “bitter water” to discern the guilt or innocence of a wife suspected of adultery.

Divination remains common today. The techniques used are empowered by demons with very real results. Diviners are able to use Satan’s communication system to find things that have been lost, make predictions concerning the future that, if believed, bear startling fruit, and to thoroughly impress those who know no greater power. Those who would present Christianity in a way that is attractive to the majority of the peoples of the world need to take such manifestations of satanic power seriously. Jesus came into a power-oriented world (like ours) and showed us how to use God’s power and passed on his authority and power to us (Luke 9:1; John 14:12) to enable us to confront and defeat the enemy in contexts where he is influencing people through divination.

CHARLES H. KRAFT

See also Shamans, Shamanism.

Divine Attributes of God. Throughout the centuries the Christian world mission has been seen as an enterprise arising from the nature of God himself. On the basis of what evidence is this claim made? Which aspects of divinity are seen in the biblical plan for missions? In his Systematic Theology, Louis Berkhof divides the attributes of God into the incommunicable aspects of his nature, which emphasize the absolute Being of God, and the communicable attributes, which stress the fact that he enters into relationships with his creatures. While at first glance the latter category would appear to be more essential to the missionary program, it is the incommunicable attributes that form a foundation on which the communicable aspects rest. Therefore we begin with God’s incommunicable qualities.
Divine Attributes of God

First, God is self-existent. He does not need human companionship, and rather than being obligated to his creation in any way, he would actually be justified in extinguishing the human race for its collective rejection of him. The plan of redemption, then, arises out of a free choice by God to dispense his grace to individuals (John 1:13; Rom. 9:16–22), and, in imitation of his example, the biblical motivation for missions is just such a free choice on the part of missionary agents (1 Cor. 9:19–23).

God is also immutable—he cannot change (see IMMUTABILITY OF GOD). This means that his choice to dispense grace to humankind cannot be reversed, since this choice is rooted in his unchanging nature. His acceptance of Christ’s atonement for sin, his election and calling, his provision of regeneration for those who respond to the gospel, his work of sanctification, and his provision of an eternal home for the redeemed are all assured (Eph. 1:3–14). The missionary offers to unbelievers a plan for salvation that is guaranteed by an unchanging God, and those who have been regenerated can rely on God’s power to preserve them throughout their mortal lives (Phil. 1:6).

The fact that God is infinite, or omnipresent, gives assurance that since he inhabits all times and places simultaneously, he is able to carry out effectively all of the operations connected with salvation, and is able to do so for all persons with whom he chooses to deal (Eph. 3:11) (see OMNIPRESENCE OF GOD). Thus the gospel may be preached in full confidence that God will be present to hear any sinner’s prayer of repentance.

The fact of God’s unity implies that there is no sundering of purpose within the Godhead. There are no conflicting desires with regard to God’s intent to offer salvation to humans. Each of the members of the Trinity is involved in the missionary enterprise: the Father has chosen individuals for salvation and provides for their regeneration by a free act of his grace (Eph. 2:8–9; 2 Thess. 2:13); the Son has provided the substitutionary atonement for sin and has delegated to his church the task of missions (Matt. 28:18–20; Heb. 10:10); and the Holy Spirit convicts the world of sin and accomplishes the work of regeneration (John 3:3–8; 16:7–11).

Secondly, with regard to God’s communicable attributes, the first is spirituality, meaning that he is immaterial. He is not limited by flesh and blood, and consequently is above the foibles of humanity (John 4:23–24). Missionary agents can be assured that they are participants in a program whose Designer is not subject to human frailty. He makes no mistakes due to physical exhaustion or emotional imbalance, and he is completely capable of carrying out all his intentions, even when his co-laborers succumb to human weaknesses (2 Cor. 12:10).

His intellectual qualities are three: knowledge, wisdom, and veracity. His knowledge, or omniscience, indicates that he knows all things both actual and possible (see OMNISCIENCE OF GOD). Thus his strategies and methodologies for mission are efficacious and his timing without flaw. While missionary theologians have always had to wrestle with difficult issues such as the fate of those who have never heard the gospel, we can be assured that God is cognizant of these issues and deals with them in accordance with his perfect knowledge (Rom. 8:29–30; 1 Peter 1:1–2). Since God also possesses wisdom, he does not simply know about things in a theoretical sense. He acts on his knowledge, and his actions produce the gracious ends he intends (Eph. 1:7–8). Therefore missionaries go forth in full confidence that their participation in the GREAT COMMISSION is not in vain but is a wise pursuit (Prov. 11:30).

God is also characterized by veracity; he has spoken the truth concerning all that he has chosen to reveal to humankind. The Good News is reliable: Christ’s death has been accepted as a substitutionary atonement for sin and humans may attain justification through submission to Jesus as Lord of their lives and belief in his resurrection (Rom. 10:9–10). Thus the missionary can proclaim the gospel boldly, assured that it accurately reflects the way things really are (1 John 5:20).

The moral attributes of God are also three. First, there is God’s goodness, which includes his love, grace, mercy, and longsufferingness. The LOVE OF GOD empowers missionary agents to overcome their innate selfishness and reach out to others across cultural barriers (John 3:16; Rom. 5:8). The GRACE OF GOD—he “unmerited favor”—extends salvation to those whom he chooses (Eph. 2:8–9), and the MERCY OF GOD permits him to accept Christ’s substitutionary atonement for the sins of humankind (Titus 3:4–5). His longsufferingness allows him to tolerate even for a short period of time the sins of humankind, and this enables the missionary enterprise to go forward, for otherwise his wrath would blot out all sin by erasing humankind from the earth (2 Peter 3:9).

The HOLINESS of God—his separateness from sin—makes the Christian world mission necessary, for his holiness stands as an impenetrable barrier to a relationship of either temporal or eternal duration with sinful creatures (Heb.
Divine Attributes of God

12:14). Only through submission to the gospel message can salvation from sin be attained and the way opened to enter into fellowship with God (1 John 1:5–9).

God's righteousness—his absolute justice—also makes mission necessary (see Justice of God). Unless one can fully satisfy the absolute legal standards and expectations imposed by the justice of God on his creatures, he remains unapproachable. But missionary agents proclaim the Good News that these legal requirements have been met through Christ's sinless life and sacrificial death and that one may appropriate a new legal standing in order to enter into the presence of God (Rom. 8:1–4).

Finally, God's sovereignty, or omnipotence, implies that he has both the authority and the power to do what he has said he will do (see Sovereignty of God). He authorized Christ's atoning death, accepted its substitutionary efficacy, will apply its effects to those whom he chooses, will regenerate them, will sustain them throughout their mortal lives, and will establish them in an eternal residence with him. God's sovereignty assures that the activity of the missionary will succeed in the measure that he allows (Gal. 6:7–8). His authority has been delegated to Christ, who in turn delegates it to his disciples, empowering them for the work of the Great Commission (Matt. 28:19–20). Thus we conclude that there is no aspect of God that is not in some way involved in the outworking of the Christian world mission, and it is our privilege to participate as co-laborers with him (1 Cor. 3:9).

LARRY POSTON

SEE ALSO Immanence of God; Providence of God; Transcendence of God; Wrath of God.

Divine Deliverance. Christ sets captives free. Missions is proclaiming Christ—who liberates from darkness and ignorance, from oppression and injustice, from sin and its vicious hold on every aspect of human life, and from death.

The deliverance motif runs throughout the whole story of God's redemptive work. The exodus is the defining event of the Old Testament. The people of Israel were a people set free through the merciful intervention of God; this is a recurring theme in the Psalms.

We also see deliverance in the ministry of Jesus. He announced a kingdom and viewed his mission as one of liberation, through word and deed, from the forces, spiritual and otherwise, that oppressed his hearers. And he called his followers to participate, in word and deed, in this cosmic agenda.

In the writings of Paul, we see that it is centrally through the cross that Christ brings deliverance. The cross was propitiation—a sacrificial guilt-offering. In the cross was manifested the reconciling love of God. But the cross was also the triumph through which Christ brought deliverance. Christians think of the resurrection as a great victory, and it was. But Scripture portrays the cross as the actual point of encounter between Christ and evil, when the powers of darkness were defeated and humanity, indeed the whole cosmos, was delivered from sin, the law, and death (see Atonement).

Christ demonstrated God's justice, giving himself as a ransom—not to Satan, but to the Father. Thereby, Christ triumphed over the powers of darkness (Col. 2:13–15; Heb. 2:14–15). It was not an encounter of power with power so much as it was a freedom to let sin meet judgment. Christ triumphed by submitting to death. He defeated death by his own death.

The missionary task announces and participates in the triumph of God and divine deliverance. The announcement points to the triumph of Christ on the cross; the participation comes not by the triumph of Christians or the church, but by suffering (as identification with the cross).

For some, the primary manifestation of God's deliverance is freedom from oppressive social and economic systems. Liberation Theology contends that God brings deliverance through sociopolitical upheaval that leads to justice. Missions is participation in this process. But while all Christians are called to be catalysts of justice, a true social transformation will only come when the human heart is liberated from sin. The fundamental human problem is bondage, yes, but it is a bondage to sin of which the social and economic inequity in human systems is but a symptom.

For others, divine deliverance speaks of Spiritual Warfare, God's power confronting invisible forces of evil and darkness, an encounter fueled by focused intercessory prayer. Behind this lies the recognition that spiritual forces are at work in every aspect of human life and society and that divine deliverance will only come when these spiritual forces are defeated.

But a cautionary note must be raised. It is possible to overspiritualize the forms of bondage or to overstate the extent to which Satan is himself actively involved in holding people and human systems in bondage. Often the work Christians are called to do includes both prayer and acts of kindness, mercy, and justice—to do what is right in the midst of wrong. If we overspiritualize the bondage, it is easy to assume that if there is sufficient prayer or faith the bondage will be eliminated. In fact, however sincere our faith and well-intentioned our prayers, the full and final deliverance of God will not come until the consummation of Christ's kingdom.
And then also, for others, the divine deliverance is fundamentally for emotional and physical wellness. Sin has left a profound mark of dislocation and inner pain on individuals who have experienced the horrifying effects of wrongdoing. Perhaps they are the children of alcoholic parents; perhaps they experienced physical and emotional abuse. Freedom for them is deliverance that includes physical and emotional healing.

From every angle, we must remember that ultimately the whole creation is in bondage (Rom. 8:19–20) and looks forward to the day of its redemption. This reminds us that bondage is cosmic, not merely individual, and further that ultimate deliverance awaits Christ's return.

Consequently, we maintain a biblical perspective on divine deliverance when we affirm (1) that it is both individual and cosmic; (2) that it has present manifestations, but will only be complete at the return of Christ; (3) that it is fundamentally a spiritual matter, but one that has visible manifestations in every aspect of human life and society; and (4) that deliverance comes not so much through a show of force but by suffering in Jesus' name.

GORDON T. SMITH

SEE ALSO Miracles in Mission.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Divine Election. Divine election is part of God's work of predestination, his decree regarding the eternal destiny of human beings. The issue of election is: Does God choose certain individuals out of the entirety of humanity to be recipients of his gift of salvation in Jesus Christ, thereby assuring that they will enjoy eternal life? If so, by what manner? A corollary issue, called reprobation, is this: Does God also pass over certain individuals, in sorrow leaving them in their sins and to their eternal condemnation? If so, by what manner?

Various responses to these questions have been offered and are summarized here in six general categories.

Calvinism affirms divine election and specifies that God's choice of some for eternal life is unconditional, not based on any human merit or a positive response of faith to the gospel as foreseen by God. Rather, election was God's sovereign will and good pleasure purposed before the creation of the world (Eph. 1:3–14; Rom. 9:14–18) and is immutable, necessary (given the utter sinfulness of people), and efficacious. The elect will certainly embrace the salvation offered them in Jesus Christ and continue in that faith until the end (Acts 13:48; Rom. 8:28–30).

Some Calvinists, in addition to embracing election, also affirm divine reprobation. This view, called double predestination, holds that God not only chooses some for eternal salvation, but also passes over others, in sorrow deciding not to save them but to allow the sentence of eternal death to fall upon them. These people are "vessels of wrath made for destruction" (Rom. 9:14–23); the stumbling of the disobedient is the tragic end to which they were appointed (1 Peter 2:6–10; Jude 4).

A compatibilist approach underscores the causal differences between election and reprobation. In the former case, God causes the salvation of the elect, mercifully giving to them what they do not deserve: grace leading to salvation. This is not without genuine human response, however: divine election is ordained by God and comes about through the willing appropriation of the gospel by faith (2 Thess. 2:13–14). In the latter case, God does not cause the damnation of the reprobate, but justly gives to them what they deserve: condemnation due to sin and willful disobedience to the gospel (2 Thess. 1:6–10).

Pelagianism denies both election and reprobation. Divinely gifted with freedom of choice and the ability to respond to God without a work of grace upon their souls, people do not have a penchant for sin. Thus, there is no need to be predestined in any way, but people are capable of fulfilling God's purposes and are held fully responsible to do so.

Arminianism/Wesleyanism affirms divine election and specifies that such election is conditional. Since God does "not wish for any to perish but for all to come to repentance" (2 Peter 3:9; 1 Tim. 2:3–4) and makes universal appeals for all to embrace his offer of salvation (Matt. 11:28; Isa. 55:1), then all people must be able to meet the terms of salvation. This is made possible by prevenient grace, a divine work in all people everywhere which overcomes the corruption due to sin and which restores the ability to respond positively to the gospel. Election is based on God's foreknowledge of this positive response (Rom. 8:28–30; 1 Peter 1:1–2); thus, it is conditioned upon foreseen faith in Jesus Christ. Double predestination is denied.

Karl Barth's doctrine of election focuses attention on Jesus Christ, who is both the elected man and the electing God (this, for Barth, is double predestination). As the elected man, Jesus is central to the work of salvation and demonstrates that God is for humankind in election and not against humankind in reprobation. God's will from all eternity is the election of Jesus Christ. As the electing God, Jesus willingly elected to become man and to undergo reprobation for himself so that the entire world would be elect in him. The elect community—the church—preaches to the world, proclaiming to all this universal election by God in Jesus Christ.

A Calvinistic perspective is often seen as a deterrent to missions, for the following reasons. If Divine Election

God has already elected certain individuals to salvation, then why engage in missionary work—praying, going, giving, and preaching the gospel—since those individuals will be saved anyway? This objection overlooks the fact that God not only ordains the salvation of the elect, but also ordains that their salvation will come only through hearing the gospel and appropriating this provision of forgiveness by faith and repentance (2 Thess. 2:13–14). Thus, a human response to the Good News is essential and the missionary task is imperative, being the divinely commanded means of linking the elect with the gospel (Rom. 10:5–15). Another key to consider is the fact that divine election is a secret decree and thus not revealed to us; thus, we must engage in missions without the knowledge of whether the individuals to whom we minister are elect or not. Finally, since God’s election is efficacious, missionaries may be encouraged that their labors in preaching and teaching Christ will be fruitful (Acts 18:9–10).

From an Arminian/Wesleyan perspective, if election is conditioned upon the response of individuals to the gospel, then it is imperative to engage in the missionary enterprise. Again, God alone foreknows who will respond positively to the Good News, so the gospel must be indiscriminately preached to all who will listen.

Karl Barth does not distinguish between the elect and the reprobate, since all people have been elected. However, not all people live as elect; rather, many live as reprobate. The Christian mission, therefore, consists of proclaiming to all people that they are elected by God in Jesus Christ, enabling those who do not realize this fact to be aware of their election so as to live in the light of this magnificent work.

Whether we are elected unconditionally (Calvinism), conditionally (Arminianism), or universally (Barth), all who are the elect of God have the responsibility of praying, going, giving and proclaiming Jesus Christ as part of the missionary enterprise.

GREGG R. ALLISON

Divine Initiative. The Scriptures present God as the one ultimate and Supreme Being in the universe. Before anything else existed, God eternally “was.” It was within the depths of his Being that the idea of what would exist arose and when it pleased him those ideas took concrete external shape at the word of his command. God created the supernatural world and the physical world in which the human race would be placed. This is the import of Genesis 1:1, which says, “In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth” and all of this speaks to the question of God’s initiative. If God had not taken the initiative there would have been no reality external to himself. He conceived, developed, and executed the plan that gave reality to what we now experience as our universe and our place in it.

The initiative of God did not end when he had accomplished the initial creation of all things. By a continuous act of his power God sustains everything in existence. Created, contingent being has no power to keep itself in existence; were it not for the sustaining word and will of God, all that is would lapse back into its primal nonexistence and be no more. In addition to this God has retained his right to intervene creatively in his universe for the governance and good of his creation. He does this by sometimes working through the orderly structures he has established and sometimes by contravening them for a higher good (see miracles). After all, the orderly structures (the so-called natural laws) are all part of a larger moral order and subserve those higher purposes. So God’s intervention in his own universe is not a violation of independently functioning laws but rather a rearranging of those orderly structures to serve a higher end. The Deists of the eighteenth century down to and including the liberal theologians of our own day deny that God (if there is a personal God) would do this sort of thing. They assert that after the world was established, God left it to work out its own purposes, especially the purposes of human beings, who now have the ultimate initiative. Scripture does not teach this. It allows that human beings do exercise initiative and may genuinely act as responsible beings, but it is all within the matrix of God’s overall sustenance and management (providence). We may exercise initiative, but not ultimately.

Scripture is replete with examples of God’s taking the initiative. God made the world; God said “Let the land produce vegetation” (Gen. 1:11) and it obeyed him. God created the human pair and established his relationship with them, setting limits upon them. God judged them when they failed. The overwhelming number of times God’s initiative is spoken of in Scripture has caused some modern theologians actually to define God as a “God who acts” (as opposed to the pagan gods who could do nothing) and the Bible as the “Book of the Acts of God” (G. Ernest Wright; R. H. Fuller).

From a missiological point of view, the concept of the divine initiative most directly relates to God’s self-disclosure with a view to bringing fallen humans into a redemptive relation with himself. God has called his people to share this good news of redemption with every living soul.
God took the initiative in seeking out the lost progenitors of our race and all of their descendants. He established a plan of salvation that we may enter into, he commissions people to proclaim this message, he works on the hearts of the unredeemed to awaken a sense of need, and he regenerates those who believe. The apostle Paul worked out an entire philosophy of history based on this conception of God, as he explained to the Athenian philosophers in Acts 17. God made the world and everything in it (17:24); he needs nothing, “because he himself gives all men life and breath and everything else” (17:25); he made all nations from one person “and determined the times set for them and the exact places where they should live” (17:26); and he “did this so that men would seek him and perhaps reach out for him and find him, though he is not far from each one of us” (17:27). Paul sees the redemptive purposes of God at work everywhere and himself as an Ambassador of God calling everyone, everywhere to repentance and conscious faith in Jesus Christ. He also sees it as the task of the church to share in this ministry and proclaim the saving message of the gospel to those who are lost (see Missionary Task).

Those who proclaim the gospel may be sure that God has gone before them. He who made and sustains this universe and who initiated the plan of salvation for lost humanity did not suddenly stop working and leave it all up to human efforts. He certainly includes those efforts, but, thankfully, they are within the context of his own creative involvement and activity. In the end, it is not “he who plants nor he who waters [who] is anything, but only God who made it grow” (1 Cor. 3:7). We are fellow-workers with God (1 Cor. 3:9).

God has gone before us in at least four ways and those who go out to labor in God’s field may be certain that God has been there first—and is still there at work (1 Cor. 3:9; Matt. 9:38). First, God has preceded us by making a knowledge of himself available to everyone (Pss. 19:1-4; 22:27, 28; 48:10; John 1:1-5, 9; Rom. 1:18, 19, 28). Second, God has revealed significant aspects of his nature through General Revelation, such as his righteousness (Rom. 1:32), his kindness (Matt. 5:45; Acts 14:17), his power (Ps. 29:3-10; Rom. 1:20), his majesty and glory (Ps. 8:1-4; 19:1), and his truth (Rom. 1:21, 25). Third, God has written his moral requirements into the human heart and no matter how badly they may be distorted by sin, they are still there and may be appealed to. C. S. Lewis called these “the Tao” in The Abolition of Man and finds the basis for all natural forms of religion in them. These moral requirements include the need to worship (Acts 17:22, 23), the need to seek God (Acts 17:27), fundamental moral principles (Matt. 5:47; Rom. 2:13-16), and a sense of impending judgment upon wrongdoing (Rom. 1:21-25, 32). Finally, God’s will to save is also made known, although, rather obviously, the facts of salvation are not. They may only be known through special revelation (Acts 17:27; Rom. 2:5-11; Titus 2:11; 2 Peter 3:3; 5:4, 8, 9).

The command to proclaim the gospel is a universal one (Matt. 28:19, 20; Acts 1:8) and we may confidently build upon what we know God has been doing before our arrival. Sometimes it is just a general work that God has been doing and we must labor hard in the face of ridicule and rejection, as Paul did in Athens (Acts 17:32, 33). Sometimes God has been preparing the ground very specifically and our call may be to a specific area (Macedonia, Acts 16:10) or a specific individual (Cornelius, Acts 19:19-22). Either way the divine initiative precedes ours and assures us that our labors will not be in vain.

WALTER A. ELWELL

Divorce. God’s ideal for marriage remains one man and one woman for life in a one-flesh relationship. Divorce, for whatever reason, violates this intended union both for marriage in general and for each affected marriage in particular (Gen. 2:18-24; Mark 10:2-12). Though a violation of God’s will and therefore sinful, divorce, like other sins, can be forgiven and persons involved cleansed “from all unrighteousness” (1 John 1:9).

Divorce impacts missions in at least three ways. Cross-cultural ministry must address the place in the churches of persons divorced either before or after conversion. Are divorced persons to be admitted fully into church membership? Each church group will of necessity decide and, as they must, make clear its convictions. In no way should divorced persons be made to feel that they are second-class members in the church. Remembering that divorce can be forgiven and repentant sinners cleansed, perhaps missionaries should consider that those whom God has brought into the kingdom should likewise be admitted to the churches.

A second impact of divorce on missions relates to the place of divorced persons (national and missionary) in church leadership. Many missionary agencies do not appoint divorced persons as missionaries and some churches do not allow divorced persons to serve in church leadership. This conviction is often based on 1 Timothy 3:2 and 12. A grammatical parallel is found in 1 Timothy 5:9, where a widow can be “put on the list” or cared for only if she is sixty years of age and...
Divorce

the “wife of one husband.” It is possible that the phrase “husband of one wife” and “wife of one husband” focus on marital fidelity rather than continuing status. If so, these verses, of themselves, do not prohibit divorced persons from church leadership.

A third impact of divorce on mission relates to the need for strengthening marriages—both missionary and national. Marriage counseling to prevent divorce often comes too late. Churches must extend every effort to help couples reach toward God’s ideal for marriage and maintain God-intended relationships.

Divorce wrecks God’s intent for marriage and affects God’s work in every country. Missionary and church leadership must address and seek to correct the problems associated with divorce.

EBBIE C. SMITH

Djibouti (Est. 2000 pop.: 645,000; 23,200 sq. km. [8,958 sq. mi.]). Djibouti is a small nation on the Red Sea coast of the Horn of Africa. Nearly half of the people are Somalis with an additional 35 percent of Afar background. Ninety-three percent of the country’s population are Muslim, with a small Christian population of about 5.6 percent. The vast majority of the Christian community are French-speaking Roman Catholics and Orthodox from Greece and Ethiopia. Evangelical Protestants are found among Ethiopian Protestants and the Red Sea Mission Team.

TODD M. JOHNSON

Dober, (Johann) Leonhard (1706–66). First Moravian missionary and mission promoter. Born in Münchroth, Wüttemberg, Germany, and a potter by trade, he arrived at Herrnhut in the late 1720s and rapidly became a leading figure in the newly reconstituted “Unity of the Brethren” or Moravian church. When in 1731 Count ZINZENDORF returned to Herrnhut from Copenhagen with the vision of a mission to the Danish West Indies, Dober volunteered to go. He left on August 21, 1732, with the carpenter David NITSCHMANN to travel to St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, to evangelize African slaves. This marked the beginning of the famous Moravian foreign mission enterprise. He worked alone as a lay preacher, as Nitschmann returned home after five months to take up another assignment. After a year and a half of labor Dober had made only one convert, an orphan boy named Carmel Oly, whom he took to Herrnhut in 1734 when eighteen new missionaries arrived and he was recalled to become chief elder of the community. In Europe he performed administrative functions and engaged in evangelistic activities, including work among the Jews of Amsterdam. He gave up the chief elder position in 1741 but was ordained bishop in 1747. The most distinguished of Zinzendorf’s co-workers, Dober traveled incessantly around Europe to maintain contacts among the scattered Moravian churches. He died in Herrnhut.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

Doctoral Degrees in Missiology. Seminaries and universities are granting a wide range of doctoral degrees related to missiology. Such areas as the history of mission, contextualization, theology of mission, mission strategies, Bible translation, Christian leadership development for mission, ethnographic studies that serve as bases for missiological strategy planning, and studies of Christian relief and development illustrate the breadth of the range of missiological studies. The lines that delimit missiological studies from church history, ethics, theology, evangelism and other topics of the theological curriculum focus on the issue of crossing boundaries. However, they remain fuzzy.

Missiological studies are being conducted at doctoral levels from a variety of academic disciplinary perspectives, including missiology, theology, ethics, church history, anthropology, sociology, leadership, political science, economics, education, communications, community development, comparative religion, linguistics, and music. Very often missiological studies are multidisciplinary, drawing on two or more academic disciplines. Multidisciplinary approaches in missiology allow researchers to gain multiple perspectives on complex issues.

The range of doctoral degrees in missiology is also wide and complex. In a search of titles and abstracts listed with University Microfilms, Inc. from 1988 to 1996, sixteen doctoral degree names can be found. The most common related to missiology include the Ph.D., D.Min., D.Miss., Th.D., and Ed.D. Each of these degrees has a related set of names depending on the degree-granting university or seminary. All four types of degrees are commonly granted by seminaries and university divinity schools. However, the Ph.D. and Ed.D. are the most common.

Doctoral degrees related to missiology differ in purpose and content. The Doctor of Ministry degree assumes a prerequisite M.Div. plus three years of post-M.Div. ministry experience. The degree is a ministry-focused degree with the person studying while in service. The 1996 Association of Theological Schools in the USA (ATS) standards describes the purpose of the D.Min. as “to enhance the practice of ministry for persons who hold the M.Div. degree and have engaged in ministerial leadership.” The D.Min. degree requires one year of academic work beyond the M.Div. including significant peer learning, integrative and interdisciplinary activities, personal and spiritual growth, and a doctoral level project or dissertatitation. It is designed to take between three and six years to complete.

The 1996 ATS Bulletin of Procedures, Standards, and Criteria for Membership states that the Doctor of Missiology is “a professional degree which is designed to prepare persons for denominational/interdenominational leadership roles in specialized cross-cultural ministries both in North America and around the world, as well as for teaching. While the primary thrust of the program is professional, it should include theological and theoretical foundations as well as training in research skills.” The D.Miss. has an M.Div. as a prerequisite and two years of ministry experience. Language requirements normally include a field language other than English and such other languages as would be needed to complete the research. The requirements of the degree normally include at least two years of full-time study in missiology beyond the M.Div. plus a dissertation. The D.Miss. is normally an interdisciplinary degree with significant studies in the social sciences to supplement the theological component.

Neither a Ph.D. nor Ed.D requires a prerequisite theology degree and so both are granted not only by seminaries, but universities as well. The requirements for a Ph.D. or Ed.D. with a focus in a missiological topic vary widely. Normally, one would expect at least three years of post-bachelor’s study plus a research-based dissertation. However, in some seminaries, the Ph.D. follows an M.Div. equivalence with three years of study and research. A Ph.D. is seen as a degree based on research and aimed at equipping a person for teaching in a specialized area. An Ed.D. will normally require a significant focus in education.

The difference between the D.Miss. and the Ph.D. may be seen by an analogy from medicine. The D.Miss. is to missiology what the M.D. is to medicine or an Ed.D. is to education. It is designed for the professional practitioner who can apply the theory to a concrete situation. Similarly, the Ph.D. is to missiology what the Ph.D. is to medicine. Both are related to theory development and application. A person with a Ph.D. in biochemistry will instruct the person seeking the M.D. A person with a Ph.D. related to missiology may be a practitioner, but will be expected to develop the theory for the person with the D.Miss. to use in field practice.

Other related doctoral degrees such as the Th.D. focus on their primary theological purpose while incorporating missiological studies. The Ph.D. in missiology, for example, requires an M.Div. plus at least one additional year of theological study as part of the doctoral program. The D.Min. may relate to missiology, but has no specific accreditation related requirements in missiology.

Universities granting missiologically related degrees include private Christian universities, state universities, private “secular” universities, and royal chartered universities. The faculties within these universities who grant missiologically related degrees range across a broad spectrum of disciplines as mentioned above. The search of UMI documentation identified 130 institutions which have granted more than 550 doctoral degrees related to mission over the past six years. Ten institutions accounted for approximately two-thirds of the doctoral degrees.

Edgar J. Elliston

See also Degrees in Mission and Missiology.

Doing Theology. See Theological Method.

Doke, Clement Martyn (1893–1980). South African educator, scholar, and missionary. He came from a distinguished missionary lineage. William Carey was an ancestor through his mother Agnes. His father, Joseph J. Doke, had been a Baptist pastor, missionary, social activist, and church leader in many countries, including South Africa, where he had been a friend of M. K. Gandhi. In 1913 Clement accompanied his father on a mission to the Lamba people at Kafulalufuta, in what is now Zambia. J. J. Doke died before the end of the year, but the work he started was continued by the South African Baptist missionary society, including his daughter Olive, Clement, and Clement’s wife Hilda. They went on preaching treks throughout the area and helped lay the foundations of a church. In 1919 malaria brought the treks of Doke and his wife to a close. He completed degrees in languages at universities in the Transvaal and England and began lecturing on Bantu studies at the University of Witwatersrand in 1932. Soon he was acknowledged as an authority on Bantu and other southern African languages. Perhaps his crowning scholarly achievement was the preparation, with assistance from other scholars, of Zulu and Lamba dictionaries and grammars. But much of his effort went into a translation of the Bible in Lamba, which he completed, with his sister’s help, in 1959. He was also a leader in the Baptist church. Posts he held included editor of South African Baptist from 1923 to 1932, president from 1949 to 1950 of the Baptist Union of South Africa (as his father had been), and the first principal of the Baptist Theological College in Johannesburg in 1951.

Robert Shuster

Dominica (Est. 2000 pop. 71,000; 751 sq. km. [290 sq. mi.]). A former French colony, Dominica was acquired by Britain in 1759 and gained its independence in 1978. The rugged, mountainous island is set between the French islands of Guadeloupe and Martinique. The population is almost entirely Afro-Caribbean, with a tiny minority of Caribs, a remnant of the indigenous peoples. Although English is the official language, the island's cultural heritage is reflected in the French Creole commonly spoken by most citizens and their adherence to Roman Catholicism (75 percent of the population). Evangelical Protestants make up fewer than 10 percent of the residents.
Dominica

See also Caribbean.

Dominican Republic (Est. 2000 pop.: 8,495,000; 48,734 sq. km. [18,816 sq. mi.]). Occupying the eastern two-thirds of the island of Hispaniola, the Dominican Republic is more than 90 percent Roman Catholic. Less than 5 percent of the people are evangelical. The mainline denominations have had less success here than in several other Caribbean societies, with Seventh-Day Adventists constituting the largest non-Catholic church. Dominican Pentecostals are also a significant minority. Other Protestant bodies with some representation are the Church of the Nazarene and the Free Methodists.

See also Caribbean.

Doremus, Sarah (1802–77). American urban missionary and mission activist. Born into a wealthy New York City family, she spent the majority of her life building on the benevolent Christian foundation she had been given. In 1828, seven years after marrying a man of substantial wealth, Thomas Doremus, and becoming the mother of nine children, she began her first organized benevolent work among Greek women. In the early 1830s, she instigated church services in the New York City prison and later formed the Women's Prison Association for discharged prisoners. Her other efforts include manager of the New York City and Tract Mission; manager of the City Bible Society; founder of the House and School of Industry, the Nursery and Child's Hospital, and the Women's Hospital; and organizer of the Presbyterian Home for Aged Women. Although she was an active member of the South Reformed Church, this denominational affiliation was no barrier to her breadth of service nor did it prevent her from launching the effort for which she is most remembered, the Women's Union Missionary Society of America, in February 1861. Having long supported foreign missions, it was no surprise that she was called on to organize an interdenominational society geared specifically for sending single women missionaries. Although subjugated at the hands of strong male opposition in the 1830s, when it was first suggested, it took off under Sarah's leadership thirty years later when the opposition had decreased. The organization thrived under her presidency and continued on as an inspiration to other denominational women's organizations long after her death. Her entire consecration to the Lord's service truly makes her one of the most significant women of nineteenth-century American Protestantism and a true pioneer of urban mission efforts to help women, children, and the poor.

Doubt. The mission Christ has given to his church is to disciple the nations (Matt. 28:18–20). This commissioning involves evangelizing the world (Luke 24:47), equipping the saints (Eph. 4:12–16), and training qualified leaders (2 Tim. 2:21). It is to be done in loving obedience to Christ and in faith.

Doubt may be defined as a state of uncertainty regarding God, his Word, and his works. The mission of the church demands faith in God's ability to guide, provide, and protect. It demands faith in his Word that is displayed by obedience to his commissioning command. It also demands faith in his accomplished work of salvation and his continual works of convicting, regenerating, and empowering. There is clearly a distinction between permanent unbelief as illustrated by Judas and doubts that find resolution in lives such as Job, John the Baptist, Peter, and Thomas. However, since faith involves one's mind, emotions, and will, one may intellectually believe and still be characterized by unbelief (James 2:19).

The lexical basis for the scriptural understanding of doubt revolves around the various negations of ’aman and batah in the Old Testament and pisteuo in the New Testament. Apistos refers to the faithless and unbelieving. Apisteo has the nuance of “to be unfaithful” and “to refuse to believe.” Apista means “unfaithfulness” and is closely related to disobedience. Oligopistos refers to the lack of faith and occurs exclusively in the Gospels.

Throughout Scripture Satan’s warfare tactics are waged against faith (see Spiritual Warfare). In the temptation of Eve, the serpent raises doubt in God’s character and his Word (Gen. 3:1–5). In Jesus’ interpretation of the parable of the sower, he stated that the devil seeks to hinder belief in God’s Word (Luke 8:12). He also told the Pharisees that their unbelief in his Word demonstrated that the devil was their spiritual father (John 8:44–47). The Apostle Paul related Satan’s temptation as being aimed at his converts’ faith (1 Thess. 3:5). For example, pride is the root cause of sin and was the sin of the devil (1 Tim. 3:6) and Jesus clearly taught that pride hinders faith (John 5:44; 12:42–43). Likewise, Jesus called the devil the father of lies (John 8:44), and it is the acceptance of wrong doctrine that upsets faith (2 Tim. 2:18).

Faith is the means by which one becomes God’s child, whereas permanent unbelief results in God’s condemnation (John 3:18; 8:24). The unbelieving find their place in the lake of fire (Rev. 21:8), but the one who has placed his faith in Christ has been delivered from this consequence. However, Scripture is clear on the effects of unbelief even in the life of a Christian. Since a lack of trust is seen as the root of sin and rebellion (Deut. 9:23; 2 Kings 17:14), an unbelieving heart is also called a sinful or evil heart (Heb. 3:12).

Unbelief is evidenced in God’s people as a hesitancy to act in obedience to God and a lack of conviction (Deut. 1:26–33). Unbelief does not please God (Heb. 11:6); it is sin (Rom. 14:23). It hinders the prayer life of God’s people (James 1:6–8; cf. Matt. 21:21; Mark 11:23–24). Whereas faith leads to worship (John 9:38), doubt hinders worship (Matt. 28:17).

The character of unbelief is to turn away from God (Heb. 3:12) and look to something else. To refuse to trust the true God is to commit spiritual adultery (Jer. 3:6; 8) and opens one up to falsehood and deception (2 Thess. 2:11–12). No other object of faith puts one on stable ground whether it be possessions (Prov. 11:28), another person (Jer. 17:5), or oneself (Prov. 28:26). A refusal to believe God dishonors his trustworthy name (1 John 5:10). Unbelief grieves the heart of Christ (Matt. 17:17), who longs to satisfy the thirsts of all who continually look to him (John 6:35; 7:37–39).

God graciously works in response to faith in his truth (Gal. 3:5). While faith opens the door to the release of God’s power (Matt. 17:20; Mark 9:23; John 14:12), unbelief hinders the working of God (Matt. 13:58) and quenches God’s Spirit. The individual Christian and the life of the church are greatly affected by the sin of unbelief. It opens the door to anxiety (John 14:1; Matt. 6:30) and fear (Matt. 8:26; 14:30–31). It makes one unstable (James 1:6–8) and fails to deliver one from dismay (Isa. 28:16), disappointment (Rom. 9:33), and corruption (Titus 1:15).

Since it is faith in God’s revelation that opens the door to true understanding (Heb. 11:3), a lack of faith hinders spiritual discernment (Matt. 16:8). The naive or simple lack discretion in knowing what to believe and are contrasted with the prudent (Prov. 14:15). Since the shield of faith is an important protective piece of the Christian’s armor, unbelief makes one vulnerable in spiritual battles (Eph. 6:16).

Unbelief never catches God by surprise (John 6:64); and it cannot and does not alter or change his perfect faithfulness (Rom. 3:3; 2 Tim. 2:13). It is the Holy Spirit’s role to convict the world of sin, but the unbelief of the church grieves or quenches this convicting work and invites the Lord’s loving discipline (John 16:9). The Scriptures are full of examples of objects of God’s discipline such as the nation of Israel (Num. 14:11–23; Ps. 106:24–27; Jude 5), Moses (Num. 20:12), and Zechariah (Lk 1:20).

God desires merciful support to be shown to the doubting (Jude 22). He also desires that his people encourage each other’s faith (Rom. 1:12). He uses his servants and trials to strengthen our faith (Acts 16:5; Jon. 11:15). He does not belittle cries for help in our unbelief (Mark 9:24) and gives enabling grace to believe (Acts 18:27; Phil. 1:29). Thomas (John 20:27) and Abraham (Rom. 4:20) are examples of those who received God’s aid to believe. As Jesus prayed that Peter’s faith would not fail (Luke 22:32), he lives today to intercede for the faith of his church (Heb. 7:25).

While God rebukes unbelief (Mark 16:14), he invites the repentant to return to him (Jer. 3:12) and let him heal their unfaithfulness. In light of the church’s large measure of unresponsiveness to its mission this provision needs to be taken seriously.

WILLIAM D. THRASHER

SEE ALSO Assurance of Salvation.

Dreams and Visions. Dreams and visions are common universal phenomena, neither restricted to particular peoples nor historical eras. Technically, dreams are related to the state of sleep, while visions occur in trance-like states when people are awake. However, because of their often ecstatic nature and revelatory character, dreams and visions function in much the same manner. They are both important mediums of divine revelation in Scripture. In fact, they are explicitly mentioned or alluded to almost two hundred times in the Bible. Thus, dreams and visions play an important role in the drama of redemption.

Dreams and visions were prevalent throughout antiquity. For example, the royal courts of both Mesopotamia and Egypt had wise men who were professional interpreters of dreams. In the Greek world, sophisticated systems of interpretation were developed as well. Overall, there was an excessive preoccupation with dreams and visions in the Ancient Near East and the Greco-Roman world.
Dreams and Visions

This is not the case in Scripture, however. The elements that dominated the dream world of antiquity—the riotous superstition, perversion, curiosity, and obsession with one’s fate—are lacking in the Bible. When viewed in this light, the biblical description of dreams and visions, while pervasive, is restrained and sober.

The Bible emphasizes that dreams and visions are typical mediums of divine revelation: “When a prophet of the Lord is among you, I reveal my—are reporting the use of dreams and visions in the western evangelical experience, dreams and visions? While not a normal part of missionaries are always needed.

This emphasis on dreams and visions is outlined in Acts. Luke gives numerous illustrations of dreams in the early church. Ananias receives a vision regarding Paul (9:10). Paul is converted through a vision (26:19). Through visions, God prepares the Gentile Cornelius to receive the gospel and prepares the Jew, Peter, to preach the gospel (chaps. 10–11). The famous Macedonian call comes through a vision (16:9). And at Corinth, Paul is encouraged by God to keep preaching the gospel through a vision (18:9–10).

What do these data suggest? What are the mis-

What do these data suggest? What are the misisagogical implications of the Bible’s teaching on missionary form of revelation, whereas dreams and visions are at best only supplementary and secondary.

Moreover, dreams or visions are not always divinely inspired. They can also be psychologically or satanically inspired. Because of this, new converts must be taught discernment. They must learn to examine their dreams and visions in light of Scripture. They also need to submit their dreams and visions to the leaders of their churches who will help them determine if God is speaking.

The Bible is God’s full and final revelation in written form, our highest objective authority. We must examine all things by the Word of God. Moreover, Jesus primarily speaks to us through the Bible. However, he is not bound to the Bible alone. He also speaks to and guides his church through dreams and visions. To deny this supplementary and secondary form of revelation (dreams and visions), is to deny teaching of our primary medium of revelation, the Bible!

RICHARD D. LOVE

Dropout. Typically used of an unnecessary premature departure from a missionary assignment. The term’s roots can be found in an earlier time and mind-set, a time in which ministry “calling” had a profound and almost eternal ring to it. Originally, the concept of “calling” was an important Reformation insight that affirmed the worth of all ethical vocations as reflections of God’s Dualism. Dualism can be understood in at least two distinct senses: (1) views that see the cosmos as a battleground between opposing (and more or less equal) forces of good and evil; and (2) views that see a sharp division of human nature into spirit and matter. There are, of course, many varieties within each category. An example of an influential dualistic perspective from the second category would be R. Descartes’ dichotomy between the mind and the body.

Dualism of the first category can be divided into radical and moderate dualisms. Radical dualism postulates two original coequal and coeternal principles, while moderate dualism holds to only one original principle with a second that derives from the first. Zoroastrianism from the Middle Ages is an example of the radical form, and some forms of ancient gnosticism, with their supreme God and the created devil who in turn creates the material world, are examples of moderate dualism.

Among living religions, Zoroastrianism is dualistic with its good god, Ahura Mazda, who is opposed by the evil god, Angra Mainyu. Ahura Mazda is said to have created the world as a battleground in which to overcome Angra Mainyu and eventually to destroy all evil. From a very different tradition, the notion of Yin and Yang in Chinese thought, with the idea of opposing forces producing harmony when in proper balance and evil when not in proper alignment, is another form of cosmic dualism. Among Animists, the Pueblo Indians of the southwestern United States define the cosmos as a dualistic sacred world, with the more profane world being the one into which people have emerged. Also, the Navajos hold that the totality of phenomena fall into two parts—the good and bad, positive and negative, male and female—all of which complement each other in a fashion not unlike the Yin and Yang in Chinese thought.

From a Christian perspective, while there are certainly aspects of dualistic thought that can be embraced, Christians must challenge any form of cosmic dualism that compromises the biblical understanding of God as the supreme power and authority over all that exists or which limits God’s control over the forces of evil.

William H. Baker

Duff, Alexander

SEE ALSO Adjustment to the Field; Attrition.

Duff, Alexander (1806–78). Scottish missionary to India. Born in Scotland’s Perthshire Highlands, he studied at St. Andrews under Thomas Chalmers, whose strong educational policies he espoused. Ordained in 1829, Duff sailed for Calcutta (surviving two shipwrecks), and opened a school where the higher classes studied the Bible and all true knowledge. A general government decree ordained that higher education teaching should be in English and should promote European literature and science. Soon Duff’s College (as it came to be known) was the largest mission school in India, causing anxiety among Hindu leaders. Poor health forced Duff to temporarily return home (1835–39); then, in 1843, Chalmers led evangelicals in forming the Free Church, and Duff (who approved) had to vacate the Church of Scotland’s Indian property and seek new accommodations.

Duff co-founded and edited (1845–49) the Calcutta Review before returning to Scotland, where he was his church’s moderator in 1851. A missions-promotion tour of North America followed in 1845. In a gripping address to the British Evangelical Alliance in 1855 Duff condemned worldliness in the churches and called on Christendom “to remember the perishing nations.” SYNCRETISM to Duff was anathema; HINDUISM was a “stupendous system of error.” His college's enrollment rose to over 1,700. Duff had provided the role model that led to the establishment of other colleges for the training of Indian evangelists, and was a prime mover in founding the University of Calcutta. When ill health finally compelled him to leave India in 1867, he became professor of theology at New College, Edinburgh, but remained a tireless promoter of missions. Among his numerous works was Missions the Chief End of the Christian Church (1839).

J. D. DOUGLAS

Duff, Alexander

Dutch Mission Boards and Societies. Though Dutch Protestants initially took the lead in missions work, by the twentieth century the contribution had become overwhelmingly from the Catholic portion of the population despite the large Protestant presence at home and in commerce. The Catholic population has remained comparatively large and stable, being almost 40 percent in 1830 and the same 40 percent in 1970. By the 1990s, Catholics had dropped to about a third of the population, and the proportion of those who attended Mass regularly had plummeted. But in the early 1970s, even though the number had started declining, it is noteworthy that of some 12,300 Dutch priests, fully 30 percent of them were still serving as missionaries overseas. They were joined by many more brothers, sisters, and lay workers, so that in total there were over 7,600 missionaries. At the same time there were only some 350 Dutch Protestant missionaries, less than 5 percent as many missionaries as the Catholics were sending.

In the 1970s, this declining but still formidable Catholic missionary force of 7,600 was widely dispersed. There were no significant indigenous Dutch sending agencies, so instead some three dozen international agencies or orders were used, the largest number being with the Mill Hill Fathers, the White Fathers, the Spiritans, and the Franciscans. However, those four still comprised less than one-fifth of the total force. As to area of service, roughly one-third were in Africa. They were scattered, with Congo’s 450 being the largest contingent. Another third were in Asia, of whom four-fifths were quite understandably in Indonesia, the former Dutch East Indies. The final third served in the Americas, the Pacific Islands, and even some in Europe, chiefly Scandinavia. Brazil, the largest Catholic country, received more than one thousand Dutch missionaries. But about 630 were serving in the small Netherlands Antilles or in the sparsely populated South American Dutch possession which did not gain independence as Suriname until 1975. However, by the early 1990s, the number of Catholic missionaries had continued to fall to less than five thousand.

The trend for Protestantism is quite different. Their percentage of the population in the homeland has dropped sharply, so that by 1970 slightly fewer Dutch people identified themselves as Protestants than as Catholics, and by the 1990s they comprise even nominally only about one-fourth of this Protestant-founded nation. That makes the recent significant increase in Protestant missionaries even more interesting, showing that there is no simple correlation between overall church attendance and missionary effort.

Dutch ministers had been working abroad since the early 1600s, when the small Dutch nation started becoming a major global trading and colonizing power. Though they lost what became New York in 1664, various waves of Dutch immigration to North America before and since, and the corresponding effort to minister to the immigrants and their descendants, have probably diverted overseas efforts that might otherwise have gone to non-Christian areas. On the other hand, as the Dutch integrated into North America society, they became major participants, not just in ethnic churches, but in church life generally, including the missionary effort from North America. The colonial Great Awakening began among the Dutch before leaping to English-speaking settlers. In the twentieth century, Dutch entrepreneurs led the evangelical book publishing industry.

The first major Dutch Protestant mission society was founded in 1797, alongside of, but not controlled by or limited to, the Reformed Church. It understandably concentrated its efforts in Indonesia, where the Netherlands had already replaced Portugal as the leading commercial power and gradually extended its political control outward from Java. Theological controversies in the homeland were also reflected in new mission societies (within the main church) and new denominations (generally with their small mission efforts being part of their official church structure) being formed throughout the nineteenth century. These new agencies generally occupied different areas of the vast East Indies. In the twentieth century most began cooperating more closely, and the societies (except one) of the main church finally in 1951 united as an official arm of it. Most of the older mission efforts, including those of the older (and very small) non-Reformed churches, are represented in a Missions Council, are more theologically diverse, and their missionaries are decreasing and have disbursed from their original concentration in Indonesia. From about 350 in the early 1960s, their numbers had decreased more than 60 percent to under 140 by the early 1980s.

By contrast, the newer non-Reformed churches, though still relatively small at home, and joined by some of the Reformed, are sending forth an increasing number of missionaries, often through small Dutch branches of the denominational and interdenominational societies that have become such a key part of the evangelical movement in the twentieth century. The Evangelical Missionary Alliance included forty such agencies with almost 180 missionaries in the early 1980s, but by the mid-1990s there were about eighty agencies in the Alliance (none very large) and they comprise the great majority of the approximately 1,200 Dutch Protestant missionaries.

DONALD TINDER

Dynamic Equivalence. Label for meaning-based or thought-based (as opposed to word-based) Bible translations. Though this kind of translation was first done (and theorized) in English by J. B. Phillips (1958), the label “dynamic equivalence” was coined by Eugene A. Nida to contrast with the term “formal correspondence,” Nida’s term for literal translations. A literal translation attempts to move from the word forms and grammatical structures of the original language as directly as possible into the corresponding words and structures of the receiving language, often without adequate concern for the impact such awkwardness of language will have on the receptors as they strive to determine the meaning. English examples of formal correspondence translations are KJV, ASV, RSV, and NIV.

A dynamic equivalence translation, however, seeks to live up to Phillips’ ideal that a translation should not sound like a translation but an original work in the language. The translator(s) thus seek to recreate in the receptor language “the closest natural equivalent” to the source-language message with a view toward stimulating receptors to understand the original meanings and to respond to those meanings as the original hearers would have (Nida and Taber 1969). This approach takes seriously, in a way impossible for literal translations, the large differences between the conceptual worlds languages represent and the structures by which they represent them. The translator employing this approach, then, will choose words and structures in the receiving language that may differ markedly from the corresponding forms in the source language in order to get across to receptors in a different conceptual and linguistic world the meanings intended by the original authors. English translations produced according to this approach are JBP, GNB, CEV, and NLT.

This concept of translation has created a revolution in the way Bible translation is carried out (see Translation Theory). Translation organizations such as The United (including American) Bible Societies and Wycliffe Bible Translators have long since converted to this approach. Though biblical scholars often hold out for more literal renderings, those with actual expertise in translating virtually all subscribe to a dynamic equivalence approach, though they sometimes use other names for it (e.g., thought for thought, meaning based).

Charles Kraft, in Christianity in Culture (1979), broadened the application of dynamic equivalence to apply to a series of missiological topics in addition to translation. He advocates “dynamic equivalence churches” as the contextualization model we should strive for. An appropriate church, he suggests, should express itself, including its theology, preaching and approach to conversion in ways that look just as much a part of their culture as a dynamic equivalence Bible translation looks and sounds in its language. Whenever a church (or a theology or a Bible translation) looks like literal Bible translations, they are not true to the aims of the God who seeks to be known by every people in terms they can understand. In order to be properly biblical, Kraft contends, churches need to be both appropriate in cultural form and equivalent to apostolic ideals in function and dynamic within their own culture. Just as the early church decided in Acts 15 to refrain from imposing Jewish cultural forms on Gentiles, encouraging them to develop their own cultural expressions of Christianity, so we should aim at churches that grow from biblical seed in ways appropriate to their culture.

CHARLES H. KRAFT

SEE ALSO Bible Translation.

Ecology, Ecological Movement. Clearly a crisis of degradation is enveloping God’s earth. Environmental destruction includes the transformation of forest and field into concrete and pavement, the extinction of entire species, the alteration of earth’s energy exchange systems, and the toxification of the atmosphere, land, and water systems of the world. Industrial development and consumerism exploit whole cultures. Advanced nations work violence against nature and all its forms of life for economic profit, worshiping the god Mammon rather than the God who created all things.

That Christianity is the main source of environmental ruin seems axiomatic to many environmentalists, who feel that the command to subdue and have dominion over the earth (Gen. 1:28; Ps. 8:5–6) gave Christians a theological sanction for destroying both earth and environment. Indeed, evangelicals appear guilty as charged when they describe creation as “the late, great planet earth” that God will destroy with fire and dismiss attempts to redeem it as futile efforts to do God’s work by human means. We unwittingly appear to believe the chief value of the earth is to fuel human industry.

The Biblical-Theological Foundation. The reasons for environmental involvement are strong. “We who bring the good news of God’s love for the cosmos (John 3:16) and of Jesus Christ’s work as Creator, Sustainer and Reconciler (John 1; Col. 1; Heb. 1) cannot be complicit bystanders or participants in the degradation and defilement of the world God loves, sustains and reconciles” (DeWitt and Prance, 1992, viii). Meeting human needs without caring for the earth is not only impossible, but unbiblical. But the focus cannot be “nature” or “resources” or “the environment,” but God’s creation. Earth-keeping must be a worshipful activity, an act of praise to the Creator. Reverence for God must include appreciation of all his creation.

Both humans and the earth are part of God’s creation. They are deeply interlinked realities. God placed humans in the garden and told them to till and care for it (Gen. 2:15; see also Cultural Mandate). Stewardship of God’s creation is implicit in the Image of God and explicit in this commandment. We bless and keep God’s creation as he blesses and keeps us. The capability and responsibility to affect, modify, and control many aspects of the ecosphere is called Stewardship.

If we are responsible caretakers of God’s creation, then we must use the earth, the atmosphere, the land, the water so as to maintain their purity and to conserve and renew their systems as intended by God. The earth is not a commodity to be bought and sold to fulfill sinful greed and exploitation.

There is much commonality between humans and other living beings. God filled the seas and the land with living souls, the common designation for both the living beings of the seas (Gen. 1:20) and the land (1:24) as well as humans (Gen. 2:7). The commonality as creatures has been obscured in most English versions because these terms are translated with different words (e.g., living creature vs. living beings, NIV). God formed Adam’s body out of the dust (Gen. 2:7) in a way similar to how he formed animals out of the earth (1:24). Creation was subjected to frustration and decay, and groans as a result of human sin (Gen. 3:17–19; Rom. 8:20). Human sin continues to impact the land (Num. 26:19–22; Lev. 18:28; Deut. 11:17; 28:1–68). We share a common, interlinked creatureliness.

But humans are also different from the other animals and the rest of creation, being created in God’s image and given dominion over the rest of creation (Gen. 1:28; Ps. 8:5–6) and the command to till and care for the garden (2:15). Only humans dwell in communion with God and live responsibly under his command. Only we can sin in the proper sense of the term. This Sin impacted all of creation; stewardship continues, but it will be accomplished only with toil and struggle.

It is important to notice that the mandate for earth-keeping stems from Creation, not from Atonement. Jesus did not die for the earth. But it will be liberated from that bondage and share the glorious redemption of humanity (Rom. 8:19–23) when Christ, the Lord of all creation, restores the whole cosmos. Ultimately, salvation is cosmological in scope, leading to fellowship with God, community with other humans, and unity with all of creation (Eph. 1:22; Col. 1:18–20).

Currently we experience only the firstfruits of this salvation, an inheritance that extends to Christ's lordship over all creation (Eph. 1:22; Col. 1:18–20). The people of God, as a part of their obedience to the Lord of the earth, must restore earthkeeping as a part of the stewardship of his creation. The church should be the salt of the earth, calling all humans to righteousness, including faith in Jesus Christ, justice in a deteriorating society, and caretaking of an ailing environment.

Dangers to Be Avoided. We must be aware of potential dangers involved in environmental involvement. Missions could fall prey to a compromise of priority. Evangelism and Church Planting are the substance of the Great Commission. Environmental and social concerns are always secondary to the priority of bringing people into relationship with God (see also Evangelism and Social Responsibility). To reverse these would be to deny the heart of the gospel, which is reconciliation with God, justification by grace alone through faith alone. But to refuse to speak to environmental issues flowing out of obedience to our Creator and Redeemer out of fear of compromise is a grave danger as well.

One can be drawn into the kind of Pantheism found in New Age religions or idolatry such as Israel wrestled with in the ancient pagan religions. New Age philosophies err by locating the fundamental problems of humanity in ignorance or the dichotomy between material and spiritual rather than in sin that separates us from God, other humans, as well as creation (see also New Age Movement). Our beliefs, ceremonies, and practices must honor God (YHWH) rather than a god who is the living force behind the universe. This earth is not God's body in which he is incarnate, but God's creation in which he manifests himself. Neither is it a divine being nor identified directly with God's power. The living trine personal God is distinct and transcendent as well as involved by choice in his creation.

We affirm that the earth is the Lord's, not that the earth is the Lord. We must never reduce the distinction between God and humans. Christians cannot be involved with those who believe created humans can create a utopian world through our own power. While the church is the primary means through with God works his redemption today, salvation is God's work.

We must proclaim Jesus Christ and never move toward a Christ who is little more than the principle of interconnectedness within all of nature. He alone is the way to salvation. The real human predicament is solved by the Cross, not by biology or environmental engineering.

Economicals must reject the claim that any attempt to deem humans more valuable than any other animal or plant is a form of bigotry. We must maintain a unique role for human beings as made in God's image and the focus of creation, sin, and redemption. Humans have a unique spiritual nature, a personal relatedness and responsibility to God that is found nowhere else in creation. Of course this does not mean affirming sinful human nature with its greed and selfishness and insensitivity, but the human as responsible steward as image and likeness of the living God.

Conclusion. If we really believe the environment we inhabit is the handiwork of God and that we have been given responsible stewardship for it, then we will be zealous to protect and preserve what the Creator has put in our trust. We will see ourselves as God's stewards rather than owners. We will proclaim a theology that includes personal justification by grace alone through faith alone, but also includes a corporate life of promoting obedient living in every part of our life.

Because we believe both justification and sanctification, we will proclaim a gospel of personal salvation leading to a God-honoring life that includes environmental righteousness. We will forsake selfishness in favor of the benefit of fellow humans and the environment because we care for the creation out of our love for the Creator.

Mission that includes care for creation is not a new emphasis. William Carey was not only the father of modern missions, but also founded the agricultural and horticultural society of India and was a conservationist, calling for forest conservation in 1811. Many missionaries have followed his example; may we also follow him in recognizing our God-given responsibilities as stewards of his creation.

Economics. Economics deals with the allocation of limited resources. Mission, in a Christian context, entails the church's modeling and propagation of the gospel message. Economics and mission intersect at many crucial junctures. We first look at mission-economic highlights in biblical history before discussing the contemporary economic implications for mission.

Scriptural Foundation. From the earliest days of God's dealings with his people, it is clear that God's call ought to take priority over an individual's loyalties. Abraham, the father of believers, was called to leave his home, even to sacrifice his son; the other patriarchs, likewise, were enjoined to live by faith (Heb. 11:8–22). Moses, too, chose to renounce his earthly possessions (Heb. 11:24–28), and the abandonment of self-pursuits was required of the Old Testament prophets. The same principle is reflected in the New Testament in Christ’s own self-emptying (Phil. 2:7), his selfless service (Mark 10:45; John 13:1–15), and his becoming poor to make believers rich (2 Cor. 8:9). Such sacrifice also became the requirement for discipleship (Luke 9:57–62; Jesus’ stewardship parables).
Economics

Of the four Evangelists, it is Luke who shows the greatest interest in economic issues. Luke’s account of the life of the early church in Acts provides an eschatological foretaste of kingdom living (Acts 2:44–45; 4:32–37). Paul, likewise, emulated self-sacrifice in his own life and ministry, calling believers to the sharing of resources with those in need (e.g., the collection for the Jerusalem church: Rom. 15:25–27; 1 Cor. 16:1–4; 2 Cor. 8–9), contentment with life’s necessities (Phil. 4:11–12; 1 Tim. 6:6–8), a disinterested attitude toward worldly possessions (1 Cor. 7:30–31), and hospitality (Rom. 12:13).

Believers were to extend hospitality to missionaries and itinerant preachers of the gospel (Matt. 10:10–15; Heb. 13:2; 2 John 10–11; 3 John 5–8). Fundamental to missions is the acknowledgment that Christians are merely resident aliens and that this world is not their permanent abode (Phil. 3:20; 1 Peter 1:1, 17; 2:11). The love of money is the root of all kinds of evil (1 Tim. 6:10; cf. Mark 4:18–19; 1 Tim. 3:3; 2 Tim. 3:2), no one can serve two masters, God and Money (Matt. 6:24), and rich persons will enter the kingdom only with great difficulty (Mark 10:23–31; Luke 12:16–21; 16:19–31; 19:1–10; 1 Tim. 6:17–19; James 5:1–6). In the seer’s apocalyptic vision, Babylon the Great, with its excessive reliance on her own wealth, has fallen (Rev. 17–18).

Contemporary Relevance. Economics and mission interface at several crucial junctions. Relevant issues include: (1) the general economic environment for mission (Bonk) and the question of which economic system is most compatible with biblical principles (Chewning, Smith); (2) the economic situation of missionaries, including the raising of funds, “tentmaking,” the problem of fluctuating currency exchange rates, the problem of financial indebtedness of missionary candidates (see DEBT), and the issue of greater cost efficiency of national missionaries (Yohannan); (3) the economic circumstances of the target cultures of mission, raising issues such as the need for community DEVELOPMENT AND RELIEF WORK, sociological barriers between the missionary and nationals, the need for economic support of new converts ostracized from their socioeconomic community, and the problem of INDIGENOUS CHURCHES’ dependence on foreign funds.

Of contemporary movements, it is particularly LIBERATION THEOLOGY that focuses on economic issues, usually in terms of Marxist economic analysis. The following factors, however, appear to contradict this approach (France): first, Jesus conceived of his own role not in terms of political or national liberation but of the restoration of an individual’s personal relationship with God; he explicitly rejected a political role, stressing rather love and forgiveness even of one’s enemies, an element frequently missing in radical movements; second, liberation in the New Testament almost always pertains to liberation from sin; third, Jesus does not present a program for achieving the redistribution of wealth or other socioeconomic reforms; liberation theology concentrates on the symptom of socioeconomic injustice while neglecting to deal with the root cause, the fallenness of human nature, which produces the twisted values of selfish materialism.

A sensitivity to economic issues is vital for the church’s effective ministry. The world’s rapid URBANIZATION, the evolution of modern technologies creating a new information elite, the increasing gap between rich and poor countries, and many other factors affect the church’s ministry at home and abroad in many ways. Evangelical spokesmen such as R. Sider and T. Campolo have called for a more simple, radical life-style on the part of Christians for the sake of missions. It has been the subject of considerable debate in evangelical circles over the past decades to what extent social and economic concerns are to be part of the missionary enterprise (see GREAT COMMANDMENT). Some advocate the priority of evangelism and church planting, while others favor a holistic approach that also incorporates social and economic issues. Many favor an approach that is patterned after the model of Christ’s incarnation and service.

The following implications for modern missions emerge from these considerations: (1) biblical discipleship, the prerequisite for missions, entails a disinterested attitude toward worldly possessions; (2) material resources are to be used for the spreading of God’s kingdom (Jesus’ kingdom and stewardship parables); (3) solidarity is called for between believers of different means in local churches and across cultures, leading to a sharing of resources; (4) the ultimate issues in missions are spiritual, but economic and social factors may provide barriers to effective evangelization (Bonk); (5) all missions work takes place in a political, economic, and social environment, and these factors influence the accomplishment of the missionary task (Clouse).

ANDREAS KOSTENBERGER

Bibliography. J. J. Bonk, Missions and Money: Affluence as a Western Missionary Problem; R. C. Chewning, trance of Protestant missions.

Established freedom of worship, which enabled the establishment of the Catholic religion as the only one of the state, the prohibition of other faiths, and required the state to pay for the propagation of the Catholic faith. After gaining independence from Spain in 1822, the Conservatives signed a Concordat with the Vatican (1863). Its provision included the establishment of the Catholic religion as the only one of the state, the prohibition of other faiths, placed the church as responsible to supervise public education, and required the state to pay for the propagation of the Catholic faith.

Today Roman Catholics represent 93.3 percent of the population. In recent years a small charismatic movement has offered opportunities for more personal spiritual experience and Bible study.

The Evangelical (Protestant) Churches. The first evangelical (Protestant) efforts in Ecuador were pioneered by agents of the Bible Society, James Thomson (1824) and Francisco Penzotti, whose religious activities were limited to the sale of the Scriptures.

In 1895, the liberal general, Eloy Alfaro, led a political insurrection. In 1896, three young Americans of the Gospel Missionary Union, George Fisher, J. A. Strain, and F. W. Farnol, arrived in Ecuador, had an audience with General Alfaro, and received his support. In the same year, the Christian and Missionary Alliance sent Charles Chapman and Charles Polk (from the United States) and Zebulun Yates (from Jamaica). In 1897 Alfaro revoked the Concordat and established freedom of worship, which enabled the entrance of Protestant missions.

In 1902, Julia Anderson Woodward (GMU) initiated work with the Quichuas in Caliata, Chimborazo. The Adventists entered in 1904 to develop their ministry of evangelism and to establish schools and clinics.

In 1931 Clarence Jones and Reuben Larson of World Missionary Fellowship founded HCJB, “The Voice of the Andes,” in Quito. HCJB’s programming now includes educational and non-polemical religious broadcasting 900 hours weekly in 17 languages and 23 Quichua dialects internationally, as well as extensive national transmission including a color television station.

The Lutherans entered Ecuador in 1942, followed by the Andean Indians Mission (1945), the Plymouth Brethren (1946), and the Covenant Church (1947). In 1956, five missionaries were martyred while attempting to reach the Auca (Waroani) Indians on the Curaray River. Their deaths challenged many young people, especially in the United States, to foreign missionary service.

By 1993 over 83 agencies fielding more than 1,000 missionaries were in Ecuador. Unity among evangelicals has been promoted by the Ecuadorian Evangelical Fellowship (1964), the Union of Evangelical Ecuadorian Women (1968), and the Ecuadorian Evangelical Missionary Association (1968). In 1969 the program of Evangelism-in-Depth united almost all the evangelicals in a year-long evangelistic effort.

In 1960, the percentage of evangelicals in Ecuador was Latin America’s smallest; during the last 30 years there has been a twentyfold increase. The reasons are varied, including physical disasters and the breakdown of the old feudal structures, both of which have made the Ecuadorians more receptive. In the 1960s, Pentecostal groups entered the country. Following widely publicized miraculous healings in a Foursquare Gospel church in 1964, 2,300 converts were reported and 15 new churches opened. As in all of Latin America, the Pentecostal phenomenon has positively influenced the numerical growth of the evangelical churches. At the present time evangelicals and Pentecostals represent about 8 percent of the population.

Indian work progressed very slowly at first but by 1993, 10 percent of the 3 million native peoples in Chimborazo Province had become evangelicals. The publication of a Quichua New Testament (1954), increasing participation of lay leaders, and the establishment of two Quichua language radio stations influenced this growth. Another factor was land reform which during this period gave Indians new experience in the freedom of personal choice. In spite of intense anti-missionary propaganda from some anthropologists, traders, and agitators, the Wycliffe Bible Translators have nearly reached their goal of making the New Testament available in all the Indian languages of Ecuador.

Ecuador
Ecuador

Four agencies have recently sent out from Ecuador three foreign workers; three cross-cultural missionaries serve within the country. Goals for national evangelism are being projected. In 1996, the Ecuadorian Evangelical Confraternity, which brings together the majority of Ecuador’s Protestant churches, launched an outreach called “100 towns, 100 churches.” Their goal: to take the gospel to previously untouched cities and communities by the year 2000.

Jack Voelkel

Ecumenical Missionary Conference (New York, 1900). Though not widely known, the Ecumenical Missionary Conference held in New York City, April 21–May 1, 1900, may be the largest 10-day event in American religious history; 170,000 to 200,000 persons gathered at its numerous sessions in various churches. Headquarters and principal speeches were located at the 4,000-seat Carnegie Hall. The word “ecumenical” in its title indicated global coverage rather than representation from all Christian traditions. Accorded extensive press coverage, the conference featured former President Benjamin Harrison as honorary chair and addresses by President William McKinley and governor of New York, Theodore Roosevelt.

The New York conference demonstrates the impact the foreign missions movement had on the popular imagination. Invitations were sent to all known missionaries, but only 2,500 served as official “members,” with delegations from 162 mission boards apportioned by the size of their budgets. Like the CENTENARY CONFERENCE ON THE PROTESTANT MISSIONS OF THE WORLD (London, 1888), New York 1900 was inspirational and informative rather than a working conference to legislate policy priorities. A vast agenda was covered, including medicine, evangelism, education, native churches, non-Christian religions, and a country-by-country survey. Women in missions were highlighted, and a scattering of non-Westerners addressed sessions.

Prominent participants included J. HUDDLESTON TAYLOR, bishop James M. THOBURN, John G. PATON, John R. MOFFITT, A. T. PIERS, and ROBERT E. SPEER.

A postconference caucus called for the formation of a permanent international missions coordinating committee, but the project never materialized. The Ecumenical Missionary Conference did, however, pave the way for the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE (Edinburgh, 1910) with its more significant outcomes.

Thomas A. Askew

Ecumenical Movement. The word “ecumenical” comes from the New Testament word οἰκουμενή, which meant either the whole world or the Roman Empire. In the fourth century the term was used to describe the whole church, and referred to those church councils recognized as authoritative by the undivided church. Thus the first seven councils, called to resolve doctrinal issues mainly concerning Christology (see also CHISTOLOGICAL CONTROVERSIES), are called the ecumenical councils. They took place before the division of the Eastern and Western churches and so included all Christians. The final division of the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches in 1054 created the ecumenical problem for all churches, which, up to that point, had understood the church as one.

The Protestant Reformation exacerbated the problem. Even though Luther wished only to reform the Western church with no thought of establishing a different church, the sixteenth century saw massive fragmentation of the Body of Christ in the West, leaving groups ranging from Roman Catholic to Anglican, Lutheran, Reformed, and various Anabaptist communities. Despite the ecumenism of Calvin, Bucer, and others, who longed for the unity of Protestants, most were denouncing each other as apostates by the seventeenth century.

While it is clear in the New Testament that there is only one church and that the unity of all believers is an objective fact based on the work of Christ, the modern ecumenical movement finds its major biblical basis in John 17, where Jesus prayed that all who believed in him would be one so that the world might believe. Thus unity would be linked to mission. And in fact the historical roots of ecumenism are found in movements of renewal and mission beginning with PIETISM and Moravianism in the eighteenth century (see Moravian Missions). An example was the correspondence among Francke, the Lutheran Pietist in Germany; Mather, the Congregationalist in New England; Chamberlyne and Newman, the secretaries of the Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge; Boehm, the court chaplain at St. James Chapel; and ZIEGENBALG, the Lutheran missionary in India in which they sought greater unity in order to carry out the missionary task. Later, Anglicans cooperated with Lutherans in the mission in India. And because of his desire to work for renewal, unity, and mission together, ZINDZENDORF would be called an “ecumenical pioneer.”

The revivals on both sides of the Atlantic brought other manifestations of ecumenism. In North America, GEORGE WHITEFIELD, an Anglican; JONATHAN EDWARDS, a Congregationalist; and Gilbert Tennent, a Presbyterian, cooperated in the first Great Awakening. And in England the revival saw cooperation among Anglicans and dissenters. Members of different denominations corresponded, encouraged each other, and read each other’s works. Carey would be partly motivated in his missionary vocation through reading David Brainerd and the Moravians. The modern Protestant missionary movement, which stemmed from the revivals, saw further steps in cooperation. Most of the early missionaries of the Anglican Church Missionary Society were German Lutherans, influenced by Pietism. The London Missionary Society included Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and Anglicans, while the British and Foreign Bible Society and the Religious Tract Society found support among all evangelical groups. In an early and visionary attempt at greater unity, Carey proposed “a general association of all denominations of Christians, from the four quarters of the world,” to be held in Capetown in 1810 or 1812, “to enter into one another’s views.”

While Carey’s dream would not become a reality until a century later, missionaries of various denominations began to meet in 1825 in Bombay to promote Christian fellowship and exchange ideas. At a similar meeting in 1858 an Anglican stated that while denominational controversies may elicit truth in the West, elsewhere they produce nothing but evil, adding his hope that God would produce a church in India different in many aspects from those in Europe or America. Western denominational divisions seemed to make no sense in Asia or Africa and were often a scandal. They seemed to deny a basic aspect of the faith. In December 1862, another conference prefaced its report with the prayer, “that they all may be one,” and discerned a pattern of “the united action of Christian men who pray, confer, and work together, in order to advance the interests of their Master’s kingdom.” In the same meeting, Anglicans, Presbyterians, Methodists, and Baptists took Communion together. Similar conferences took place in Japan, China, Africa, Latin America, and the Muslim world.

The most prominent focus in these conferences was Unity, which was a result of both the common commitment to mission and the experience of working and praying together. Many recognized that their unity was much deeper than differences in Church Polity or style of worship, and was based on a common devotion to Christ and his mission. But not all took part. The High Church Anglicans at one extreme, and some Faith Missions on the other, stayed away. But at this point there was still a broad consensus among the great majority about the nature and purpose of mission.

An additional and related factor was the Evangelical Alliance, formed in 1846. It sought to unite in fellowship all who believed in the full authority of the Bible, the incarnation, atonement, salvation by faith, and the work of the Holy Spirit. Its monthly journal, Evangelical Christian, brought news of missionary work all over the world, and was avidly read by missionaries as well as those at home. This strengthened the vision of missionary cooperation.

Missionary conferences overseas had their counterparts in Europe and North America. In 1854 Alexander Duff spoke in New York at a meeting open to friends of mission from “all evangelical denominations,” to consider eight key questions about world evangelization. Many similar meetings were held during the last half of the century in various parts of Europe as well as the United States. A new and important step was Ecumenical Missionary Conference held in New York in 1900. Nearly two hundred thousand people attended its various sessions, and it was opened with an address by President William McKinley. The word “ecumenical” was used in its title “because the plan of campaign which it proposes covers the whole area of the inhabited globe.” Thus the original dimension was brought again to the meaning of the term. Now it referred, not only to the whole church and thus to unity and cooperation, but to the worldwide scope of the missionary task.

Along with the revivals and the missionary movement the nineteenth-century student movements formed a third stream contributing to the ecumenical movement. The Intercollegiate YMCA existed on 181 campuses by 1884, emphasizing Bible study, worship, and personal evangelism. In 1880 the Interseminary Missionary Alliance was formed by students from thirty-two seminaries to encourage focus on the missionary task. Through these two organizations mission became the primary feature of the student movement. The Student Volunteer Movement, formed in 1886, carried the emphasis further. Student Christian movements were organized in a number of countries, and these were brought together in the World Student Christian Federation in 1895 under the leadership of John R. Mott. Its founders saw the need for greater unity at home if their goal of world evangelization was to be realized. In England, for example, it brought together Free Church, Evangelical, and Anglo Catholic students to promote missionary zeal. The Federation sought to promote the spirit of unity for which the Lord longed, and to emphasize the efficacy of prayer; the saving work of Christ, and the “energizing power of the Spirit and the Word of God.”

These powerful streams came together in the Edinburgh Missionary Conference in 1910. Many of those who planned it came from the Student Christian movement. A number of them would become leaders in the formation of the World Council of Churches in midcentury. John R. Mott, the chairman, was the most visible leader of the SVM and probably the most important symbol of the growing ecumenical movement. Three topics of the conference were “Carrying the Gospel to all the World,” “The Church on the Mission Field,” and “Cooperation and the Promotion of Unity.” However, in order to ensure the participation of the High Church Anglicans and continental Lutherans, the conference limited participants to those involved in mission to “non-Christians.” Consequently those involved in mission to traditionally Roman Catholic Latin America were excluded. This would create barriers between Latin American evangelicals and the conciliar ecumenical movement later on. On the other hand, neither Roman Catholics nor Orthodox were invited.

Edinburgh’s most important achievement was the formation, in 1921, of the International Missionary Council (IMC) which promoted international missionary cooperation. However, it was also uniquely responsible for the formation of the World Council of Churches. It did so by bringing the younger churches into the thinking of the older churches, helping to recognize them as an essential part of the world Christian community. Even though the organizers had agreed not to discuss matters of theology and polity, some in attendance saw the need to do so and, as a result, the Faith and Order Movement was initiated in 1927. The influence of the Student Movement and Edinburgh was also important in the formation of the Universal Christian Council for Life and Work, established in 1925. Bishop Soderblom of Sweden who had been influenced by D. L. Moody and Mott, established the council to seek cooperative action on common problems. Faith and Order and Life and Work would become the parent movements of the World Council of Churches (WCC), organized in 1948 (see Amsterdam Assembly). For the older denominations it has been the primary institutional expression of the ecumenical movement.

When the IMC became a part of the WCC in 1961 some hoped it would place mission at the heart of the Council. Others feared the move would result in a decline in mission. The latter proved to be right as a combination of theological liberalism, which seemed to doubt the importance of evangelism and maintained a primary focus on social issues, led to a great decrease in missionary activity by most conciliar churches in Europe and North America. Thus the WCC has not succeeded in fulfilling the goal of its early proponents, unity so that the world might believe. Its member churches seem to be playing an ever decreasing role in world evangelism. This can be seen in statistics from the United States. In 1918, 82% of the missionary force came from the “mainline” churches, most likely to be members of the WCC today. In 1966, only 6% of American missionaries served under those boards.

Other manifestations of ecumenism are councils of churches in many countries and mergers of various denominational traditions in some nations. The United Church of Canada was formed in 1925 by Methodists, Congregationalists, and some Presbyterians with the hope of more effective outreach in the West. However, the result has been disappointing and decline rather than growth has been the result. The Church of Christ in China was formed in 1927 by Presbyterians, United Brethren, the United Church of Canada, and some Baptists and Congregationalists. Under the communist regime it became the parent body of the current “Three-Self Church,” sanctioned by the government. The Church of South India was formed in 1947 and included Anglicans, the first time they had been drawn into communion with Presbyterians, Methodists, and others. In 1941 most Protestants in Japan, under government pressure, formed the Church of Christ in Japan, but Anglicans, Lutherans, and some other withdrew from it after the war. In 1948 the United Church of Christ in the Philippines was established. It appears that most of these united churches, with the exception of the Church in China, are not growing as rapidly as many of the newer groups.

The early ecumenical movement was based on a theological consensus which was solidly evangelical and breathed missionary passion. To the extent that agencies lost either or both of these, they declined. But after midcentury a new evangelical ecumenism arose. This is probably the most important manifestation of the ecumenical movement today. In the first half of this century fundamentalists and evangelicals tended to focus more on the issues which separated them from each other than on their common faith and task. But in 1966 the Congress on the Church’s Worldwide Mission at Wheaton and the World Congress on Evangelism in Berlin began to overcome the separatism. Those meetings were succeeded by the International Congress on World Evangelism, held at Lausanne in 1974. The stature of Billy Graham helped greatly in bringing together men and women from diverse traditions and many nations, while the theological insights of John Stott contributed to the formulation of a statement of faith that laid the foundation for a more adequate understanding of mission. The formation of the Lausanne Committee on World Evangelization (LCWE) worked to bring about greater cooperation in the evangelistic task in a number of areas. Those involved included a wider spectrum than ever before, ranging from Anglicans to Pentecostals. At the same time the insights and concerns of Christians from Asia, Africa, and Latin America contributed to deeper understanding of the Gospel and the missionary task by those in the West (see Evangelical Movement).

The second congress of the LCWE, held in Manila in 1989, was probably the most inclusive Christian gathering in history up to that time (see Lausanne Congress II). Four thousand evangelical Christians from 150 countries gathered for a week. They included over sixty from the former Soviet Union, while others came from obscure countries like Chad in Central Africa. The goal was that half the delegates come from Asia, Africa, and Latin America. Pentecostals were included among the speakers. So were women. Thus the whole church was represented to an extent not previously seen. The focus captured the ecumenical ideal: the whole church, taking the whole gospel, to the whole world. And while Manila did not contribute the kind of significant theological reformulation done at Lausanne, it seemed to provide additional impetus to the goals of cooperation in mission.

While the LCWE has been the most visible symbol of the new evangelical ecumenism, there are many others. The AD 2000 Movement, led, not by a European or North American, but by an Argentine, the Global Consultation on World Evangelization held in Korea ('95) and South Africa ('97), the Latin American mission conferences (see COMIBAM) held in 1987 and 1997, and the internationalization of the missionary movement, are all aspects of ecumenism. While there is still much to be done, the evangelical movement is now more genuinely ecumenical than ever before, as men and women from many races, languages, cultures, and nations seek to discover how they can demonstrate our unity in Christ so that the world might believe.

Paul E. Pierson

Educational Mission Work

Mission work is inherently educational. The Great Commission, the mandate and charter of Christian missions, is a command to “make disciples” and to “teach”—both explicitly educational activities. Despite the misguided efforts of some in church history, Christian Ethics (and the biblical view of persons that underlies it) preclude any attempt to make converts by force or deception. Informing others of gospel truth, clarifying their understanding of the truth and its implications, and calling for decision is the task of missions (see Missionary Task).

Modern missionaries pursue that task through a wide variety of educational means. Preaching may have a persuasive intent, but its method is educational. Home Bible studies and “one-on-one” encounters are the stock in trade of missionary evangelists and church planters the world over; in each case the method is to witness to and nurture understanding of biblical truth. Bible correspondence courses (see Bible Education by Extension), explicitly educational in their design, have been effectively used as evangelistic tools in many cultures, especially in Muslim lands

Among resistant people groups and in Creative-Access Countries, educational services can afford an entree that does not otherwise exist. The twentieth-century emergence of English as the language of international commerce has created an enormous demand for teachers of English as a second language, many of whom are Christians who serve with explicitly missionary intent (see Teaching English to Speakers of Other Languages). Development workers and Agricultural Missions also offer educational services as a means of incenting Christian compassion and winning a hearing for the gospel. Radio, television, and literature ministries are likewise intentionally educational (see Mass Media). It is Communication of (i.e., instruction) Christian truth that renders any ministry “missionary.”

Educational ministries are also prevalent in the church. Discipleship programs are designed to cultivate Christian understanding and habits among the recently converted, and catechism or baptismal classes are common in most traditions. In addition to teaching that occurs in regular preaching services, church education programs, such as Sunday school and neighborhood or Small Group Bible studies provide important stimulus for growth in grace. Nonformal evening, weekend, or seasonal training programs provide additional instruction for believers, including formal and informal church leaders.

Theological education entails training for Christian ministry. Bible schools, seminaries, and Theological Education by Extension (TEE) receive high priority in the work of missions. In several regions of the world, “pastors’ conferences” offer a unique opportunity for both trained and untrained church leaders to receive stimulus and instruction aimed at developing their ministries.

Educational mission work also includes training missionaries and their children. Schools for Missionary Children exist in every region of the world, enabling parents to provide quality education for their families in proximity to their area of service. Although missionary training schools in the West may not be considered part of the global missionary endeavor, training missionaries called and sent from churches in the non-Western world is an urgent and strategic aspect of educational mission work. Likewise, on-field professional development of the missionary force is a responsi-ability of mission leadership critical to each missionary’s continuing vitality and effectiveness.
Educational Mission Work

Schools have held a central role in the modern Protestant missionary enterprise from its very inception. The case of missions in India is instructive. After arriving in India in 1793, William Carey set immediately to learning and to translating the Bible into several Indian languages, but he also established schools for instruction in these languages. In 1819, Carey founded Serampore College. Just eleven years later, in 1830, Alexander Duff arrived in Calcutta with a vision of reaching India’s upper castes through European secondary schools and universities using the English language. Briefly, the debate between “vernacularists” and “Anglicists” raged, but Duff’s vision won the day and mission-founded English-language schools spread across the subcontinent. In 1859, when the English colonial government addressed the education of its Indian subjects, the decision was taken to provide grants-in-aid to agencies operating schools and colleges that would agree to adhere to government standards, to include specified courses in their curriculum, and to submit to government inspection. This came as an enormous boon to the founding missions. With the increasing influx of missionary personnel, the government’s policy led to a rapid multiplication of mission schools, which remained strong until a national education program was established following independence in 1947.

Mission schools were similarly significant in China during the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. In Japan, education was the only type of mission work permitted prior to 1873. In the Middle East, mission-founded universities won high regard. In sub-Sahara Africa, “bush schools” (led by indigenous pastors or catechists) and mission schools (nearly all at the primary level) were the principal sources of education well into the 1960s.

Three factors account for the commitment of mission personnel and financial resources to schooling. As a religion of the Book, LITERACY is vitally important to the Christian mission. A somewhat fuller understanding of Christian truth, furthermore, is important to the development and exercise of LEADERSHIP within the Christian community. Finally, at least since Alexander Duff, Christian missionaries have sought through schooling to engender a social transformation which, even among non-Christians, is congenial to Christianity and its values. Constitutional government, legal assurance of egalitarian human rights, capitalistic economies, and modern technologies were viewed as fruits of Christianity in the West, which were to be shared through mission schools.

In light of the immense investment of mission resources in schooling—perhaps more than any other kind of mission work—it is appropriate to review the benefits realized. Most observers acknowledge that the evangelistic effect of mission schools is minimal. Sometimes (as in Japan and the Middle East) educational work has provided access to populations otherwise inaccessible, but the close linkage between mission schools and colonial powers also proved problematic as nationalism grew in Africa and Asia (see NATION, NATION-BUILDING, NATIONALISM, and COLONIALISM). Nationalism of mission schools has greatly diminished their missionary role and significance today. With respect to social transformation, few (if any) societies are congenial to the church or to Christian values. Nevertheless, it can be argued that mission schools and colleges have helped shape the world on which the twenty-first century dawns. How the benefits of mission schooling square with the task and goal of Christian missions is an issue on which all Christians should prayerfully reflect.

Robert W. Ferris

Edwards, Jonathan (1703–58). Prominent American philosopher-theologian and missionary to indigenous Americans. Gifted with one of the best theological minds in America (graduating from Yale at the age of seventeen), his reflections on the nature of genuine religion and advocacy for experiential Calvinism influenced generations of Christians. An intellectually vigorous preacher who aroused deep emotional response in his audience, his sermons were pivotal in the outbreak of the first GREAT AWAKENING beginning in 1739. In 1741 he preached “Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God,” perhaps the best known sermon in American history.

Accepting a position in 1727 at the First Congregational Church in Northampton, Massachusetts, under his grandfather Solomon Stoddard, Edwards took over the pastorate after Stoddard’s death in 1729. Ousted from the church in 1750 after controversy over his strict Communion standards, he accepted an invitation to work with the Mohawk and Housatonic Indians in Stockbridge, Massachusetts, a mission he had helped to found in 1734. He served there from 1751 until 1758, during which time he produced his most mature reflections (for example, Freedom of the Will, 1754; The Great Christian Doctrine of Original Sin, 1758). In 1758, he reluctantly accepted a call to the presidency of the College of New Jersey (now Princeton), dying several weeks later from the effects of a smallpox inoculation.

His legacy of advocacy in missionary efforts, including leadership in the Great Awakening, the work of putting into publishable form the diary of David Brainerd, and his influential arguments that the Great Commission was still relevant (in contrast to the Reformed theology of the time) as well as efforts in preaching the gospel across cultural barriers make him one of the most significant forerunners of the modern missionary movement. A. Scott Moreau EFMA. See Evangelical Fellowship of Mission Agencies.

Egede, Hans Povelsön (1686–1758). Norwegian missionary to Greenland. Egede was born in northeastern Norway. After graduating from the University of Copenhagen in 1705, he was ordained a Lutheran minister and became a pastor. Egede learned about the old Norse Christian settlements in Greenland that had been out of contact with Europe since 1410. He tried to interest bishops and the Danish king in a mission to Greenland, but received only lukewarm support. Eventually he helped found a company to start trading posts on Greenland and support missionary endeavors. He sailed for Greenland in 1722, with his family and a small group to start a Danish colony.

Egede found no Norse communities but rather the Eskimo people, who were the sole inhabitants. He attempted to learn their language and present the gospel to the people, but had limited success. He became a great believer in training indigenous preachers. In 1733 a smallpox epidemic killed thousands. Egede’s care of the sick won him great respect among the Greenlanders. His son Paul, who had grown up among the Eskimos and spoke their language, began preaching and won many to Christ. Moravian missionaries arrived in 1733 and also experienced great success, although they were in frequent conflict with Egede. In 1736 he left, returned to Denmark, where he became superintendent of a missionary school for Greenland and wrote books on the island’s history, folklore, geography, and language. He and Paul translated the New Testament and other works into the Eskimo language. Thanks largely to his efforts and those of the Moravians, all the inhabitants of Greenland became members of Christian churches.

Robert Shuster

Egypt (Est. 2000 pop.: 69,146,000; 1,001,449 sq. km. [386,660 sq. mi.]). Egypt holds a prominent place in both secular and biblical history, presenting the longest-lasting civilization and one of Christianity’s most enduring churches. Recorded history dates back to the twenty-third century B.C. and leaves an impressive record of both divine and human activity. In the fourth century B.C. Alexander the Great captured the Nile Valley and established the city of Alexandria, which continues today as the second largest city in Egypt. Macedonian Ptolemy rule maintained control from 306 B.C. to 30 B.C., when Augustus Caesar made Egypt a province, which lasted until A.D. 395. At that time the Byzantines took control.

By A.D. 639 the Arab Muslim invasions led to the decline and entrenchment of the Coptic Orthodox Church. The establishment of a series of Arab dynasties then followed until Egypt became part of the Ottoman Empire in A.D. 1517. The eventual decline of the Ottoman Empire led to the establishment of British control in A.D. 1801 and then to a protectorate status in A.D. 1914. Eight years later independence was declared and a constitutional monarchy established. By 1953 Egypt became a republic and continues as such.

The history of Christianity in Egypt is equally impressive, tracing its roots to the preaching of Mark in A.D. 50, as recorded by Eusebius. The Coptic Church is one of the autocephalous (self-governing) Oriental Orthodox Churches (non-Chalcedonian) and represents the largest single Christian population in the Middle East. Though strongly affected today by emigration trends, reflecting Middle Eastern political instability, Egyptian Copts still represent 11 percent to 15 percent of the population. Desert monasticism, following the rules of St. Anthony and St. Pachomeus, established Coptic Christian predominance in Egypt and enhanced African missionary successes in Nubia, Sudan, and Ethiopia. Pope Shenouda III, current patriarch of the Copts, has led the church in significant social programs and spiritual renewal in recent years.

The Coptic Church has persevered through the centuries in spite of its minority environment, demonstrating Christian stability in a predominantly Muslim society. The church is marked by the competing values of “a remnant of the faithful” mind-set, ecumenical objectives for removing schism within the worldwide Christian church, and a commitment to spiritual renewal.

Though smaller in numbers, the evangelical churches and the Roman Catholic Church are also present in Egypt. Among the 46 denominations present in Egypt, the Presbyterians and Anglicans are the largest. Christian witness is most commonly provided through Bible and Christian literature distribution and more recently through Christian broadcasts on satellite television. Christian outreach to Muslims is severely restricted. The distribution of ethno-linguistic groups in Egypt is represented by Egyptians (86.4%), Arabs...
Egypt

(6%), Nubians (3%), Gypsies (2%), and Berbers (2%). The predominant religions represented are Islam (85.4%) and Christianity (14.2% with Coptic Orthodox representing 13%). The literacy rate is 49%. Two world-class cities, Cairo (14,000,000) and Alexandria (4,034,000), are notable centers of Egyptian life and influence.

The situation for Christian mission is seriously affected by two issues. First is the issue of religious tolerance. Jewish tolerance has been moderate, with Egypt being the first Arab state to give official recognition to Israel. This occurred in 1979 by the courageous act of Egypt's president Anwar Sadat, who signed a peace treaty with Israel. This alienated the majority of Arab countries who had less tolerance for a Jewish state and eventually led to the expulsion of Egypt from the League of Arab States and Sadat's assassination in 1981 by extremists. This also provided impetus to developing Islamic fundamentalism accompanied by cries of Jihad.

Tolerance for the Christian minority in Egypt and freedom for Christian expression has also been severely limited. Accounts of numerous human rights abuses continue to be recorded in Egypt. The second and related issue is the rise of Islamic fundamentalism, which originates from Egypt in association with the rise of Muslim Brotherhoods.

Egypt is considered the intellectual center of Islam with its history rooted in the ancient and still influential Al Azhar University. This prominent center has spawned many religious and political parties, among which are several of fundamentalist orientation. Though Qur'anic law (Shariah) is not the political framework of the Republic, there is considerable pressure to make it so. Both of these issues make the climate for Christian witness by nationals and expatriates a difficult endeavor.

Nevertheless, some of the most significant growth of the church in the Middle East is found in Egypt and it is recognized that Egypt is strategically important to the mission of the church. The future of Christian witness, though sensitive, is of high priority. The biblical promise of “blessing to all nations” through the seed of Abraham must eventually return to the household of Hagar, the Egyptian slave, and her descendants. Egypt retains an important place in biblical history and prophecy, intricately situated in relation to the Great Commission.

J. Ray Tallman

El Salvador (Est. 2000 pop.: 6,425,000; 21,041 sq. km. [8,124 sq. mi.]). Bordering Guatemala and Honduras and facing the Pacific Ocean, El Salvador is the smallest of the five Central American republics. The language is Spanish, with only 5 percent of the people of Indian descent. The capital city is San Salvador (metropolitan area of 1.5 million). Both nation and capital are globally unique for they are named after Christ the Savior.

El Salvador elects a head of state for a five-year term. The economy is focused on agricultural exports (coffee, cotton, sugar—utilizing 40% of the labor force) and other industries (textiles for export and chemicals).

It gained its independence from Spain in 1821, and in 1839 it withdrew from the Central American Federation. Historically, the absence of a democratic social foundation generated a series of strong political/military leaders, and a number of internal revolutions and regional struggles. Its power structure has been dominated by a small land-owning oligarchy. Inevitable social inequities in this century have led to clashes and violent military encounters, including the 1934–35 massacre by the military of some 30,000 peasants accused of communism. The 1969 battle with Honduras over the presence of some 300,000 Salvadoran workers in Honduras left some 2,000 dead.

Latin American Marxist guerrilla movements, supported by Russia and Cuba, during the 1960s and 1970s encouraged a full-scale insurrection which fractured the nation. The United States countered with countless millions of dollars in military and economic assistance. During the conflict at least 75,000 people lost their lives—with violence by both extreme right and left. Catholic priests and nuns, as well as some evangelical leaders were martyréd. The twelve-year civil war ended with the UN-brokered January 1992 formal peace treaty. The expected “peace dividend” has not yet generated economic prosperity due to the political and financial cost of reforms and national infrastructure, the problem of retraining thousands of demobilized soldiers and guerrillas, the challenge of an 80 percent poor population.

Historically and culturally, El Salvador is a Roman Catholic nation, and hence 97.5 percent call themselves Christian: Catholic 75 percent, growing at an annual rate of 0.8 percent; Protestant/Evangelicals (with some 64 denominations), 20.6 percent. (2.3% in 1960) of which 80 percent are Pentecostal/charismatic, growing at an annual rate of 5.9 percent; the remaining 4.4 percent covers other religious groups and the non-religious.

Protestantism arrived in El Salvador in 1896 through Samuel A. Purdie (Central American Mission) and his family, influenced by the great colporteur, Francisco Penzotti. In 1996 the Centennial of the Gospel was celebrated through the Efforts of an interdenominational evangelical coalition, involving Pentecostal and non-Pentecostal leadership as well as national mission agencies and parachurch organizations.

Evangelical spiritual harvest has impacted all strata of society, in spite of violence, poverty, and structural injustice. Church leaders now face the challenge of a fluid postmodern world as they disciple young believers, and create new church and leadership training models. Significantly, Salvadoran evangelicals are committed to their own global missionary responsibility and have sent out scores of missionaries through their own agencies.

WILLIAM DAVID TAYLOR

Election, Divine. See Divine Election.

Elections. See Political Elections.

Elenetics. J. H. Bavinck refers to elenetics as a missionary science which asks the question, “What have you done with God?” The term comes from the Greek word elencho, which means to reprove, to rebuke, to convince, to convict. Most specifically, it refers to the work of the Holy Spirit in convicting people of sin as seen in John 16:8. Thus the Holy Spirit is the agent of elenetics in that he is the one who convicts of sin. According to Bavinck, elenetics is “the science which is concerned with the conviction of sin. It is the science which unmasks to heathendom all false religions as sin against God, and it calls heathendom to acknowledge the only true God.” Thus it presumes the falsehood of all other religions against the truth of Christianity. It does not compare religions or enter into “dialogue” as if all religions including Christianity were neutral and contained necessary religious truths to be discovered and believed. Rather, it is apologetic in nature in that it defends the Christian faith as the only true faith and accuses all other religions as rebellion against God (see Apologetics).

Elenetics takes humankind back to the Fall of Genesis 3, to our original sin, and calls us to repentance, to turn away from our sin to faith in Christ and to serve the only true God. Therefore, elenetics takes sin very seriously, as well as the need for repentance. Thus it is of necessity evangelistic, confrontational, and directive. It evangelizes by proclaiming the whole counsel of God, the gospel, as it is presented in Scripture, God’s revelation to us. It confronts the non-Christian with his or her sin and the resulting separation from God and warns of the wrath to come. And it directs the listener to repent and to believe Christ as the only hope for salvation and eternal life with God.

Bavinck explains that the basis of elenetics is God’s revelation in Jesus Christ and a strong trust in the work of the Holy Spirit, who alone convicts of sin and brings to faith in Christ. He gives several considerations to support this. God manifests himself through his General Revelation in culture and in individuals even before the missionary makes any contact. He also points out that there may appear to be similarities between Christianity and other religions but that these perceptions fail to plumb the depths of either religion and may lead one to make serious errors in faith. Again, the Holy Spirit is the only agent of elenetics, and he alone convicts of sin and calls to repentance. The missionary is only the means by which the Spirit works. Finally, our philosophical reasoning and argument may cause an adherent to renounce his or her non-Christian faith, but that is useless unless the person puts his or her faith in Jesus Christ as Lord and God.

Therefore elenetics is seen as an approach theory in missions. It refuses to accept that there is God’s special revelatory truth in non-Christian religions and, in appropriate ways, confronts these religions in order to call their adherents to repentance. Thus it is important that missionaries have knowledge of religions, but even more important that they have a deep knowledge of the Word of God and a strong faith in Jesus Christ. For it is only through God’s truth that error can be discerned and true faith built.

Harvie Conn provides five characteristics of elenetics: (1) It is personal in that it approaches individuals in relationship. (2) It is holistic in that it approaches in deeds as well as words. This means that the missionary becomes a part of the community and deals with people in community. (3) It is contextual in that it approaches people where they are in their culture, in their belief system. This means that the missionary must be knowledgeable about the culture and sensitive to the needs of people within that culture and belief system. (4) It is verdict-oriented in that its goal is to bring a person to a personal relationship with Jesus Christ as Lord and God. This of course requires that a person be confronted with the claims and demands of Jesus Christ and be called to repentance. Finally, (5), it is God-centered in that it seeks primarily to convince people to be reconciled to God. It does not seek to improve systems or lifestyles but to fill the earth with worshipers for God.

It is crucial for missionaries involved in elenetics to be correctly informed of the context of their ministry—the culture in which they seek to do elenetics, that is, the receptor culture. They not only must understand and believe their own faith, but also understand the beliefs and faith of...
Elenetics

the receptor culture so as to facilitate true communication of the meaning of the gospel using the proper cultural language, forms, values, and symbols. Without this there will be misunderstanding and syncretism among those hearing the message.

Because elenetics seeks primarily to convict of sin (i.e., to awaken and charge the conscience with the seriousness and guilt of sin), it is most important that missionaries understand what sin is in their own culture, in the biblical culture, and in the receptor culture. With this understanding missionaries are enabled to engage as God’s instruments in the conviction of sin and the call to repentance for offenses which are considered sin in the receptor culture and which are truly sin, because they are declared sin in Scripture. Robert Priest explains that unless people are convinced of their sin from their own cultural understanding and definitions, there will be no conviction or repentance of sin. Therefore, as he explains, in the initial stages of evangelism, missionaries should concentrate the proclamation of sinfulness, guilt, and repentance on the common agreement of these between the receptor culture and the biblical definitions. As missionaries preach sin in the forms and behaviors of the culture, which are also in agreement with the biblical view of sin, the Holy Spirit will convict of sin, and the people will hear and understand the call to repentance.

As the Holy Spirit begins to work on persons in the elenetic process, the missionary will need to know how sensitively and correctly to proclaim the gospel and to counsel the persons in terms of guilt, in terms of fear as they are confronted with a just God who judges sin, and in terms of shame as they are confronted with a holy God whom they have greatly offended. Then as the Holy Spirit completes his saving work through convicting of sin, repentance, and effectual call, missionaries must be able to counsel the person regarding God’s forgiveness and eternal love.

Elenetics as practical theology and as an approach to missions in recent years due to the problems of syncretism in missions and to issues related to the contextualization of theology. The church is growing rapidly in many parts of the world, but in some cases the fruits of repentance and holiness of life are not evident. Elenetics refuses to allow syncretism and its related errors and demands repentance of sin as explained in Scripture and turning to Christ as Lord and God.

Bibliography.

---

Eliot, John (1604–90). English missionary to Indigenous Americans. Eliot was born in 1604 in Widford, England. After receiving an A.B. from Jesus College at Cambridge in 1622, he worked at a school headed by Thomas Hooker, who influenced him to adopt Puritan beliefs. Because of the anti-Puritan policies of the Church of England, Eliot emigrated to Massachusetts Bay in 1631. The Puritans had done little to evangelize the Indigenous Americans and there was little support for such work. But Eliot felt a call to reach these neighbors with the gospel. He learned some Algonquin from a neighbor’s servant and, in 1646, began preaching in Algonquin in tribal villages. Slowly he made converts. Opposition came not only from tribal sachems, but also from colonists. But Eliot persisted and his reports led in 1649 to the founding in England of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in New England. Eliot believed converts should be separated from the associations of tribal life, so he organized the settlement of towns, where the “Praying Indians” could live close to English communities and adopt the English lifestyle. The first of fourteen such settlements was in 1651 at Natick. Eliot prepared a catechism in 1653 as part of his continuing effort to train indigenous American lay leaders and ministers. He published in 1663 his translation of the entire Bible in Algonquin, one of the first achievements of American scholarship. In 1671 he distributed dialogues in English that provided vivid pictures of the means he and his Indian associates used to communicate the gospel in meaningful terms. By 1674 there were almost 4,000 Praying Indians, led by twenty-four indigenous ministers, about 1,100 in Eliot’s settlements. Disaster came in 1675. As a result of the so-called King Philip’s War in 1675, the Praying Indians were rounded up and eventually sent to a small island, where harsh conditions and the shock of betrayal killed some and broke the spirit of more. Eliot tried to protect them, but was largely ineffective. After the war ended in 1676, the remaining Praying Indians could return home, but only enough for four small settlements came back. Eliot continued to labor among them, but few other English or Algonquin-speaking people took up his work. He died on May 21, 1690, but his example was a strong influence on future American missionary efforts.

ROBERT SHUSTER

Eliot, Elisabeth Howard (1926– ). American lecturer, author, and missionary to Ecuador. Eliot was born of missionary parents in Brussels, Belgium. Her father, Philip E. Howard Jr., later became the editor of the Sunday School Times.
She and her five siblings, all of whom entered Christian ministry, were exposed regularly to missionary guests in their home. After graduating from Wheaton College in 1948, Elliot went to Ecuador in 1952, working initially among the Colorado Indians. In 1953 she married Jim Elliot and joined him among the Quichua Indians. In 1956 Jim and four companions were speared to death in an attempt to reach Auca Indians.

In 1958 Elisabeth and her three-year-old daughter, Valerie, with Rachael Saint, went by invitation to live among the Aucas, where she learned the language and began translation work. In 1963 she returned to the United States. She was married in 1969 to Addison Leitch, who died of cancer in 1973. She married again in 1977 to Lars Gren. A popular speaker to students, women, and others, she produces a daily radio broadcast, Gateway to Joy, heard nationwide and a bimonthly newsletter. She has written more than two dozen books, many of which have been best-sellers and have stimulated great interest in missions.

David M. Howard

Elliot, Philip James (1927–56). American missionary martyr in Ecuador. Elliot was born to godly parents in Portland, Oregon. He graduated from Wheaton College in 1949, having been a champion wrestler and campus leader as president of the Student Foreign Missions Fellowship. He began keeping a personal journal in 1948, parts of which have been widely quoted because of his keen spiritual insights.

Elliot went to Ecuador in 1952 to work among the Quichua Indians. In 1953 he married Elisabeth Howard in Quito. Burdened for unreached tribes, he and companions Nate Saint and Ed McCully searched for the Aucas, which they discovered in September 1955. For three months they dropped gifts weekly from the air to the Aucas. In January 1956, with two more companions, Roger Youderian and Peter Fleming, the five established a beachhead on the Curaray River near the Auca territory. One friendly contact with three Aucas took place at their river encampment. Then on January 8, 1956, they were attacked and speared to death by the Aucas. The story of Jim Elliot and his companions has continued to motivate Christians all over the world for commitment to missionary service.

David M. Howard

Enculturation values are embedded in them, and they are tempted to criticize inappropriately the process of enculturation as they observe it in a new culture, often because what they see does not “feel” right to them. Understanding the enculturation process is important for successful contextualization, for it provides crucial insights needed for success in the process of helping people of a new culture understand the message of the gospel.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

End Times. A primary scriptural impetus for the global missionary enterprise is the Great Commission statement crowning the First Gospel: “go and make disciples of all nations. . . . I am with you to the very end of the age” (Matt. 28:19–20). Jesus makes it clear that the urgent emphasis of the final mission must not be simply to “disciple” the world, but to continue to do so until the culmination of the end times events.

Relatedly, the Savior had already spoken to the heart of the issue in the Olivet Discourse, Jesus’ sermon on the end of the age. Assurance that the global evangelistic task will be completed can be drawn from Matthew 24:14: “And this gospel of the kingdom will be preached in the whole world as a testimony to all nations, and then the end will come.” Unfortunately, this passage does not elaborate on how this climactic proclamation will come about or who will accomplish it, nor does it address other questions that divide evangelical Bible scholars and missiologists.

Neither are these the only key passages that relate mission to the end times. For example, in Acts 2:17 the apostle Peter relates the phenomena going on around him on the Day of Pentecost to the “last days,” citing Joel 2:28–32, which is there linked to the “day of the Lord” (Acts 2:20), a great theme of Old Testament eschatology. These references added urgency to Peter’s appeal to his hearers: Call on the name of the Lord and be saved (v. 21) before it is too late for you to do so (v. 20)!

This passage also reveals the balancing perspective that “the last days” actually began in earnest with the inbreaking of the new age of the Spirit at Pentecost. This understanding is shared by the description of Christ being revealed in “these last days” in Hebrews 1:2. Relatedly, Paul speaks of ungodly behavior characterizing “later times,” which seems to include his own day (1 Tim. 4:1).

On the other hand, Paul also looks ahead to absolutely “terrible times in the last days” (2 Tim. 3:1), though still times in which the God-breathed Scriptures will bring hearers to salvation (3:15–4:5). Of that latter-day period, Peter reminds his readers that the Lord wants “everyone to come to repentance” (2 Peter 3:9), urging a blameless lifestyle that will be a crucial aspect of attracting unbelievers to salvation (vv. 14–15).

Unfortunately, to this point, evangelicals have not sufficiently probed the Book of Revelation for specifics with regard to the completion of the Great Commission. Recently, however, R. Bauckham’s programmatic discussion of the “conversion of the nations” in regard to the Apocalypse has served to stimulate fresh discussion in this area.

For example, it is quite likely that “a great multitude that no one could count, from every nation, tribe, people and language” (Rev. 7:9) standing before the heavenly throne is to be linked to the Matthean Commission. This vast throng from “all the nations” (Matt. 28:19), whether martyrs or not, are the end times fruit of the Great Commission.

Also, the references to “the eternal gospel to proclaim to those who live on the earth, to every nation, tribe, language and people” (Rev. 14:6–7) and the group of martyrs standing on the glassy sea (15:2) apparently are the fulfillment of the promise of the age-concluding preaching of the gospel described in Matthew 24:14. That understanding becomes even more likely when one sees that this use of “gospel” in 14:6 is its lone inclusion in the Book of Revelation.

Further, the two-sided harvest of Revelation 14:14–19 reflects strikingly similar imagery and terminology to Christ’s parable of the wheat and the weeds (Matt. 13:24–30, 36–43). Since it speaks of the judgment at the “end of the age” (vv. 39–40), in which the children of the kingdom and the children of the evil one are separated to their ultimate destinies, there are important missiological implications.

So, if nothing else, recent study of the Book of Revelation has located several passages that seem to detail the completion of the Great Commission in the end times. It remains for further exegetical and theological study to clarify important details that will inform the theory and practice of the evangelical missionary enterprise in the crucial time ahead.

With the new millennium, there is great curiosity about the possible arrival of the “end times.” From the standpoint of mission, there has been much creative strategizing and sending, including hundreds of strategies aimed toward the goal of completing the global imperative by the turn of the century.

Since there is still much uncertainty attached to the specific impact of these efforts with respect to God’s plan and timing, encouragement should be drawn from joyfully remembering the promise of the risen Lord, in the context of the carrying out of the Great Commission: “I am with you always, to the very end of the age” (Matt. 28:20).

On the other hand, God’s sovereignty must never be an excuse for irresponsibility or complacency. Employing imagery with overtones of the end times, the apostle Paul laid out the practical urgency of “understanding the present time. The hour has come for you to wake up from your slumber, because our salvation is nearer now than when we first believed. The night is nearly over; the day is almost here” (Rom. 13:11–12).

A. BOYD LUTER

SEE ALSO Millennial Thought and Mission.

Engel Scale. A model that illustrates the spiritual decision process has become known as the Engel Scale. The idea behind the model or scale is to indicate that a decision for Christ is not just one event, but a journey or series of events that will lead toward spiritual maturity.

The scale was developed through cooperation between James F. Engel and Viggo Søgaard. A rudimentary model was first published by Viggo Søgaard (Everything You Need to Know for a Cassette Ministry). The model was titled Total Program Principles, indicating the total program needed to carry out the GREAT COMMISSION. It was designed for strategic application and to assist in comparative media decisions. Biblical background was seen from the parable of the sower, and from Paul’s illustration of one who planted and another who watered (1 Cor. 3:6).

Engel refined the model, adding significant thinking from secular behavioral science. To a large extent, Engel follows the paradigm of a linear approach to DECISION MAKING as seen in a consumer behavior model: knowledge-belief-intention-behavior. On such a model, both cognitive and affective dimensions are united on one linear dimension. A similar approach has been followed by Rogers in Diffusion of Innovations.

In Contemporary Christian Communication, Engel gives a full description of the scale and its implications for the church and its mission. The scale shows the various stages in the decision-making process, starting from initial exposure for those who have no awareness of the Christian faith, through conversion, and a lifelong pattern of growth and maturity. Everyone is somewhere on this scale.

The model was quickly adopted by teachers and became a primary model for many organizations, with significant adaptations.

One drawback of the scale is the fixed linear approach. The sequence of elements needs to be flexible, allowing for different ordering of the events. For some the spiritual journey begins with information and knowledge, but for others it may start through a power encounter which has caused attitude change. For most people there will be concurrent processes of cognitive and affective changes toward spiritual maturity.

A revised version, utilizing a two-dimensional model, separating cognitive and affective processes, was published by Viggo Søgaard in 1986 (Applying Christian Communication). Based on the conviction that conversion is not an entirely cognitive process, the affective dimension has been added. The affective dimension will primarily be a person’s feelings toward the gospel, the church, and Christ.

Cognitive changes are illustrated as an upward move, while affective responses can fluctuate between positive and negative attitudes. The model (or scale) provides a grid for illustrating and evaluating strategies, and as such provides a way to analyze evangelistic and nurture ministries in the light of a decision-making process. Questions needing research include: Are we aiming where the audience is? Do the translated materials really fit? How does this ministry relate to that which was done before? How does it relate to that which follows?

VIGGO B. SØGAARD

England. See UNITED KINGDOM.

English Mission Boards and Societies. The two oldest English mission agencies predate the Evangelical Revival. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge was established in 1698 to provide schooling and Christian literature in both Britain and North America. Connections with German Pietists also led the Society in 1710 to adopt the Danish Lutheran mission at Tranquebar, the first Protestant missionary venture in India. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts was founded in 1701 to adopt the Danish Lutheran mission at Tranquebar, the first Protestant missionary venture in India. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts was founded in 1701 primarily to provide Anglican pastoral ministry to settlers in the British North American colonies. Although the Society’s royal charter made implicit reference to the needs of the indigenous American peoples, the SPG remained almost entirely a colonial church society until the 1830s.

These two religious societies were not dedicated exclusively to overseas mission. The first English society founded specifically for this purpose was the Particular Baptist Society for Propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, founded in 1792 by the Particular (Calvinistic) Baptists. The Baptist Missionary Society (BMS), as the English Mission Boards and Societies

Society became known, sent William Carey to Bengal in 1793. Other denominations similarly touched by the Evangelical Revival soon followed suit. In 1795 evangelicals from various churches formed “The Missionary Society” in an united endeavor to send the gospel to the “heathen,” leaving the converts to decide their own form of church government. This dream of evangelical ecumenism proved hard to sustain once different denominations had their own missionary bodies. The name was changed to the London Missionary Society in 1818. The LMS became chiefly identified with the Congregational denomination. Among its missionaries were Robert Morrison, Robert Moffat, and David Livingstone. Evangelicals in the established Church of England formed their own missionary society in 1799: the “Society for Missions to Africa and the East” or “Church Missionary Society.” The CMS grew over the course of the nineteenth century into the largest of the English societies. From the ranks of its secretaries came two of the most influential missionary thinkers in recent Christian history: Henry Venn and Max Warren. John Wesley’s new “Methodist” movement within the Church of England was also actively involved in foreign mission from 1786, when the first Methodist missionary arrived in the West Indies. However, the formal organization of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society took place only after 1813, when different Methodist districts established their own missionary societies, which came together in one national body in 1818. Unlike the BMS, LMS, or CMS, the WMMS was not a voluntary society separate from denominational structures, but an integral part of the Methodist connectional machinery.

Nevertheless, the English mission agencies in the nineteenth century shared an essentially common evangelical theology and similar approaches to fundraising at home and policy on the field. As the century proceeded, three developments occurred that diversified this picture. First, the revival of High Churchmanship within the Anglican Church expressed in the Oxford Movement first transformed the SPG into an effective missionary agency, and then, in 1857, led to the formation of a new mission, the Universities’ Mission to Central Africa. Although owing much to the ideas of Livingstone, the new mission also embodied the distinctively Anglo-Catholic principle that missionary ventures should be pioneered by “missionary bishops.” The focus was shifting from voluntary society to church. Second, James Hudson Taylor’s formation of the China Inland Mission in 1865 marked an alternative and distinctively evangelical departure from the voluntary society ideal. The CIM repudiated the idea of a society run by an elected committee and responsible to its subscribers, and introduced instead the model of nondenominational “faith mission,” directed on the field by a spiritually gifted leader, with the domestic emphasis falling less on fundraising than on prayer. This ideal became international in scope during the 1880s and 1890s, but also spawned other faith missions in England such as the Regions Beyond Missionary Union (whose origins go back to 1878) or the Sudan United Mission (1904). Third, in the final years of the century strains began to appear within English missions over theological issues, particularly in relation to biblical criticism and attitudes to Indian religions. By the early 1920s these strains had become acute, issuing, for example, in the secession of some conservatives from the CMS in 1922 to form the Bible Churchmen’s Missionary Society (now known as Crosslinks).

In terms of size of missionary force and levels of popular support the older denominational societies reached their peak between the World Wars. After 1945 these societies, under the leadership of mission statesmen such as Max Warren, began to revise their policies in response to the growth of nationalism in the non-Western world and the beginnings of decolonization. Their approaches were also affected in varying measure by the increasing theological doubts about the appropriateness of seeking to convert people of other faiths to Christianity. Some of the older societies changed their names or even dissolved themselves in favor of new bodies that expressed ideals of global Christian partnership rather than mission in the traditional sense of a one-way flow of personnel and funds from the West. Between 1966 and 1977 the LMS was transformed into a global partnership body, the Council for World Mission. Less radically, the CMS in 1995 changed its name to the Church Mission Society, reflecting an understanding that mission is a broader process than the sending of missionaries. In 1965 the SPG and the UMCA had merged to form the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (USPG).

In England, as elsewhere, the newer faith missions have continued to stress the priority of initiating evangelistic expansion to unreached populations. However, by the 1990s they too were struggling to maintain their levels of support, as the younger generation of English evangelicals appeared less acutely concerned than their forebears about the spiritual condition of non-Western peoples. To some extent evangelicals in England have followed the more liberal sections of the English churches in focusing their overseas concerns on Christian relief agencies such as TEAR Fund, set up by the Evangelical Alliance in 1968. Young people in England have nonetheless been attracted to a third generation of mission agencies, such as Operation Mobilisation (1957) or Youth With a Mission (1960), which have en-
Enlightenment. Surely one of church history’s more intriguing ironies is the fact that the modern Protestant missionary movement, which began in the late eighteenth century, came out of an environment that was strongly influenced by the philosophy of the Enlightenment.

Often explicitly anti-Christian in outlook, Enlightenment philosophers not only attacked traditional Christian beliefs but propounded ideas that called into question the need for evangelism and missions. In its own way, however, the Enlightenment both prepared the way for the new missionary initiatives and influenced their direction.

Building on the humanistic foundations of the Renaissance and seventeenth-century rationalism, eighteenth-century Enlightenment philosophers as diverse as Rousseau, Voltaire, Lessing, Kant, Paine, and Hume asserted the autonomy of the individual and the ability of unaided human reason to discover truth. They therefore rejected reliance on any external source of truth in philosophy and religion, including divine revelation and the authority of religious institutions. The attitude of many Enlightenment philosophers toward religion is well summarized in the title of Immanuel Kant’s 1793 essay Religion Within the Bounds of Reason Alone.

Most Enlightenment philosophers did not deny God’s existence, but were Deists who believed that God was distant and uninvolved in human affairs, and had left it to human reason to discover the path to happiness, morality, and truth. Their focus, therefore, was on nature and on human experience, and by exalting human reason as the arbiter of what was ethical or true they affirmed the innate goodness and potential of the individual. They therefore rejected the Christian belief in the DEPRAVITY OF HUMANKIND or the need for spiritual conversion—and thus evangelical missionary activity.

Christians who retained their orthodox convictions reacted sharply against Deism and other aspects of Enlightenment philosophy. On a theological level, Bishop Joseph Butler’s The Analogy of Religion (1736) was apparently intended as a point-by-point refutation of the writings of the noted Deist Matthew Tindal; it became the most widely used theological work of the eighteenth century. Although Butler is usually remembered as a philosophical theologian, one of his printed sermons supported the cause of foreign missions.

On a practical level, evangelists such as JOHN WESLEY and GEORGE WHITEFIELD crisscrossed the British Isles (and in Whitefield’s case the American colonies) proclaiming the Bible’s message to large crowds. Most of their hearers were ordinary people, but Whitefield’s Journals are sprinkled with accounts of encounters with Deist intellectuals. “I fear Deism has spread much in these parts,” he wrote during a 1739 trip through Maryland.

When WILLIAM CAREY, the father of modern foreign missions, catalogued the religious state of the nations of the world in his influential tract An Enquiry into the Obligation of Christians to use Means for the Conversion of the Heathen (1792), he noted that France consisted of “Catholics, Deists, and Protestants” and added that “Various baneful, and pernicious errors appear to gain ground, in almost every part of Christendom; the truths of the gospel, and even the gospel itself, are attacked.” Although urging the cause of foreign missions, Carey realized that so-called Christian countries could not be excluded from missionary activity.

Nevertheless the Enlightenment significantly influenced the spirit of eighteenth-century society, and as such had an indirect but definite impact on the beginnings of modern Protestant foreign missions, particularly in England.

Enlightenment thinkers unintentionally encouraged foreign missions, for example, through their attempt to find a common natural religion throughout the world. The age of exploration had opened up new vistas for studying diverse human societies, and as they looked beyond superficial cultural differences Enlightenment scholars concluded that human nature was basically the same everywhere. As David Hume declared in 1748, “It is universally acknowledged, that there is a great uniformity among the acts of men, in all nations and ages, and that human nature remains still the same.” In Christian eyes this reinforced the conviction that the gospel was equally valid for all humanity, and that no culture should be excluded from its message.

The scientific and experimental methodology of the Enlightenment also influenced the growth of missions. As eighteenth-century evangelicals moved away from Puritanism, with its preoccupation with inward-looking piety as the test of conversion, they embraced immediate religious experience as the basis of their assurance of salvation. In so doing they were mirroring the Enlightenment’s method of seeking truth through immediate experience. This in turn encouraged a new activism in evangelism and missions, since conversion could be immediately experienced.

In other ways the Enlightenment spurred the growth of an activist spirit in Western society as a whole, which in turn influenced evangelical Christianity. Enlightenment ideas gave impetus to a new spirit of optimism and progress in society, for example, and a determination not to be bound by the past. While at times this could take radical directions (as indeed happened in the French Revolution), in a more general way this progressive attitude encouraged the development of new approaches to old problems and new ways of looking at the world. This in turn made Christians more open to new directions in their work—including foreign missions.

In a similar way the Enlightenment opened the door to a new wave of pragmatism and a willingness to experiment with new methodologies. Evangelicals embraced this attitude with enthusiasm. The field preaching of Wesley and Whitefield is one example of this; another is the growth in lay witness and work. The explosion in evangelical foreign mission societies (as well as voluntary societies devoted to a host of other religious and social causes) in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries owed far more to lay activists than to ordained clergy.

The Enlightenment unquestionably laid the foundations for much modern secular thinking, and as such continues to challenge contemporary Christians. Even in modern missions its continuing influence can be detected among those who deny the need for overt evangelism and reduce missions solely to humanitarianism. Nevertheless, without the Enlightenment the emergence of the modern missionary impulse would have been seriously hampered.

JOHN N. AKERS

Environment. While various social structures, including business and government, are increasingly concerned about environmental problems—pollution, exploding population, famine, vanishing resources—evangelical missions often reflect the general evangelical trend to leave such concerns to secular groups. This attitude comes from a hierarchical, Platonic view of life, which makes caring for the physical world less urgent than the salvation of souls. The fear that faith in God might be taken over by the concern for nature is ever present. As a consequence, lamented Francis Schaeffer, an evangelistic opportunity is being lost; for while modern young people have a real sensitivity to nature, most Christians do not care about the beauty of nature or nature as such. Another consequence of the evangelical perspective and activities on the mission field is that they often pave the way for self-interested enterprise, ignorance, and greed, which lead to environmental degradation.

Christians can no longer avoid seeing that the environmental damage brought by war, multinational companies, and modern technology conflicts with human survival needs and the long-term intentions of a compassionate God who created a world in which every part waits for its redemption (Rom. 8:21). An organic or holistic view of life will bring many insights to challenge Christians (see also holism, biblical); for example, the links between population growth, environmental destruction, and social conflict; the irresponsibility of powerful groups’ accumulating wealth through mining and industry without taking thought for the associated environmental damage or the suffering of disadvantaged people (the loss of land in order to build factories, the industrial pollution of rivers); the rise of Gaia-consciousness in the New Age movement.

Such challenges, when contrasted with kingdom insights about the rule of God over all creation (Isa. 11:9; 65:25), have led some missions to think about environmental issues. For God’s mission in redemption cannot be separated from his mission in creation. While limits of time, energy, skill, and finance must confine the scope of missionary concern about nature, environmental degradation so affects people that caring for their spiritual welfare cannot be separated from caring for creation. This in effect reinterprets the biblical concept of stewardship—not dominion and control, but responsibility and accountability to the Lord of creation.

The Christian ethic is the world’s only hope of averting environmental disaster. This requires a transformation of attitudes, which is most effectively achieved by the regeneration of human hearts. Evangelism is, then, an essential part of ecology, a fact that few missions have realized. Balance will be recovered only as we study and adopt the integrated view of life reflected in Hebrew thought, the theology of Francis of Assisi, and Eastern Orthodoxy rather than the Western individualism that has held sway since the Reformation.

When we seek the kingdom of God, environmental issues will assume their full significance as part of a larger structure of rightness and integrity. We will take note that most of the growth in world population is concentrated in the poorest and most environmentally degraded countries, and that there is a global increase in environmental refugees who are being displaced because of drought, soil erosion, and flooding. The perspective of many of these people is such that organic and ecological models and metaphors can be used to explore with them the deep issues of life.

Environmental issues suggest various ways in which mission in the twenty-first century can be made more effective. We should study biblical holism and the role of stewardship in God’s plan for both urban and rural situations. Courses in the THEOLOGY OF MISSION should incorporate environmental concerns. We can analyze case studies of how mission grows out of the work of Christians with a holistic worldview (e.g., Peter Harris in Portugal). We can make the good news real for powerless people by challenging evil structures and working to reverse the pollution of their air, water, and soil. Organic metaphors and models of appropriate lifestyles can be used to communicate the gospel. Missions can involve themselves in environmental issues that relate to human survival—population, land ownership and use, relationships between the powerful and the marginalized. Mission work must take these issues seriously as part of the challenge of the whole gospel for the whole world.

Bibliography. W. D. Roberts, Patching God’s Garment; C. DeWitt, The Environment and the Christian; P. Harris, Under the Bright Wings; H. Snyder, Earthcurrents; L. Wilkinson, Earthkeeping in the Nineties; F. Schaeffer, Pollution and the Death of Man.

Episcopal Mission. See ANGLICAN MISSION.

Equatorial Guinea (Est. 2000 pop.: 452,000; 28,071 sq. km. [10,838 sq. mi.]). The people of Republic of Equatorial Guinea speak seventeen languages. Tribal religionists account for less than 5 percent of the population, in large part due to the country’s long-standing association with Catholicism. Catholicism arrived in the fifteenth century and existed under European colonial administration prior to independence in 1968.

Baptist missionaries first arrived from the West Indies in 1841 but were expelled by the Spanish administration in 1858. In 1870 the English Methodist Church sent missionaries in response to an appeal from the Fernando Poo Protestant community. The Methodists were allowed to remain in 1870 only through the British consul’s intervention. Methodism remains the largest Protestant body on the island.

The principal evangelical body on the mainland of Rio Muni is the Evangelical Church, which receives support from the United Presbyterian Church and since 1970, the Worldwide Evangelization Crusade of UK. The Presbyterian Church began on the island of Corisco in 1850, reaching the mainland in 1865. Five years later the first African pastor was ordained and within ten years an African missionary had been sent to Cameroon. WEC INTERNATIONAL entered Rio Muni in 1933, merging its work with that of the Presbyterians to form the Evangelical church in 1970.

President Macias Nguema came to power at independence in 1968 and subjected the country to a reign of terror until he was overthrown and executed in 1979. Protestant buildings were confiscated, foreign missionaries expelled, and local clergy suffered imprisonment and torture. During his despotism reign tens of thousands of Guineans were victims of political assassinations.

Eschatology

Eritrea (Est. 2000 pop.: 4,025,000; 124,000 sq. km. [47,876 sq. mi.]). Eritrea, until 1993 a northern province of Ethiopia, is an independent state on the Red Sea. Seventy-five percent of the population are Tigrai and Tigre. Eritrea is 41 percent Christian and the Orthodox represent 75 percent of the total number of Christians. Lutheran Evangelicals number more than 20,000 and are active in evangelization.

Eschatology. One of the striking characteristics of the evangelical missionary enterprise is the optimism with which it is being pursued. There appears to be little, if anything, that can shake its advocates’ belief that the GREAT COMMISSION can and soon will be fulfilled. It has been suggested that the worldwide church is on the threshold of unprecedented growth. It is said that this will involve a near universal hearing of the gospel accompanied by successful CHURCH PLANTING among every ethnic group. This success will signal the final epoch of missions and inaugurate the end of this age.

This confident outlook is based on an eschatological orientation, in which the inexorable implementation of God’s salvific plan is followed from his promise to Abraham (Gen. 12:1–3), through the sending of the Son (Gal. 4:4), and on to the yet outstanding parade of the nations to Zion (Zech. 8:20–22). This air of anticipation is not generated by the calamitous state of the world, but by the present state of missionary advance. Jesus said (Matt. 24:14) that before he would return the gospel would have to be preached to the whole world, to every nation, tribe, and language. For the first time in history this appears to be a real possibility. In light of the progress that has been made and technological advances at our disposal, it is reasonable to believe that every people can hear the gospel and have the church planted in it. We just might be able to complete the task within this generation.
Eschatology

Of course, few dare to suggest particular dates. Neither is there agreement on the details of the eschatological timetable. But that our Lord will return, of that there is little evangelical doubt. This, more than anything, has contributed to an atmosphere of heightened eschatological anticipation. There seems to be a general consensus that we are not only in or near the final stage of history, but that we are also close to reaching the ultimate goal of salvation history, the full reinstatement of the Kingdom of God.

The key biblical text in this regard is Matthew 24:14. To the degree that this text is accepted as a promise of Christ’s return, it yields several consequences of decisive import for the missionary enterprise.

First, it states the content of the missionary message in terms of the gospel of the kingdom of God. The purpose of Jesus’ ministry is to announce and offer God’s salvation to all of humanity. He does not speak of vengeance, but rather salvation, especially for sinners. It is a message of salvation, peace, and hope, which is offered even to publicans and prostitutes (Mark 2:15f.). Of course, the availability of salvation both now and in the future depends on an individual’s present attitudes (Luke 19:42). Since he offers immediate forgiveness of sin (Mark 21:1–12) it is an announcement of salvation as something already present and operative. However, the reign of which Christ speaks, although inaugurated in the present, will not be completed until the parousia. It will not be fully and perfectly realized until Christ returns. Yet, it does provide the missionary with a message of present significance. We really do have something of immediate benefit to proclaim.

Second, this passage is an eschatologically irrevocable announcement of divine intent. Jesus does make reference to human responsibility. We are to pray for it (Matt. 6:10), implore God for it (Luke 18:7), strive to get in (Luke 12:31), hold ourselves ready for it (Matt. 25:44). But human agency cannot bring it into existence. No more than it can hasten, delay, or hinder it. God alone gives it (Luke 12:32) and disposes it (Luke 22:29). Jesus promises it (Matt. 5:3) and grants or denies admittance (Matt. 8:11). What the kingdom is, is necessarily linked to the person of Christ, who determines its contents in terms of his own sending. He is Savior and Victor. He will bring ultimate victory of truth over all contradicting human ideologies, of justice in the struggle between right and wrong, of healing of all wounds, and love and reconciliation over all revengeful justice. These images portray a kingdom which God alone can and will institute. From this it becomes clear that history is indeed moving toward its God-appointed end. Christ will be victorious over death, sin, and Satan. Knowing that gives the missionary movement the confidence needed for bold and aggressive world evangelization.

Third, the text speaks of a specific commission or task, that is, proclaiming this message to all peoples. Since this is given in the context of the eventual completion of salvation history, this part of it also takes on eschatological significance. The messengers, those converted, and the concrete structures that result, the ever expanding people of God, are a sure sign of the coming kingdom.

Fourth, this text provides a powerful motivation for missions. God has commissioned his people with the implementation of the decisive and final stage of salvation history. Although this does not necessarily mean that the missionary work will hasten the return of Christ, some evangelicals do believe that the timing of Christ’s return depends on the pace of our work; the sooner we complete our commission, the sooner he can return.

The most important thing in this text is not the controverted specifics of chronological sequence but rather the motivational value of the delay in Christ’s return. How close are we to completing our missionary task? When will Christ return? God alone knows (Acts 1:7). But we do know that he has not yet returned and until he does, our work is not finished. This should cause us to view missionary work with sobriety, realism, and confidence. We will not be spared opposition and disappointment. The last days will be characterized by heightened activity on the part of the forces of darkness. But the end will come. The missionary task will be completed and therein lies the actual motivation, our confidence. The hope of Jesus’ return is an essential element in an evangelical theology of mission.

Edward Rommen

See also Millennial Thought and Mission.

Estonia (Est. 2000 pop.: 1,495,000; 45,100 sq. km [17,413 sq. mi.]). Pagan Finno-Ugric peoples from Western Asia arrived on the Baltic in the third millennium B.C. Christian forces conquered the region in the early 1200s, beginning a seven hundred-year period of foreign occupation. German nobility ruled until the early 1500s. Reformation Swedish control brought educational and social improvements. Russian domination (1721–1920) reversed many reforms but saw significant revival among the commoners. After 50 years of Soviet repression (1940–91), new reli-
Eternal Life

The Apostles' Creed closes with the words "I believe . . . in the resurrection of the body and the life everlasting." Although anticipated in the Old Testament (Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2), the concept of "eternal" or "everlasting" (kJV) life is more fully developed in the New Testament, particularly in the Johannine literature.

Eternal life is more than mere continuing existence. It is qualitative in nature as well as unending in duration (John 10:10). It is the divine life which is present in God and Christ and bestowed as a gift upon the believer through the Holy Spirit (John 1:4; 1 John 1:1–2; 5:11). The life of the Christian is not his or her own life; it is the life of Christ who lives in his followers (Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:21).

Although unending existence is encompassed within the concept, eternal life is essentially relational. In his high priestly prayer, Jesus describes it as knowing God and having fellowship with him through his Son, Jesus Christ (John 17:3). Christianity is unique among the world's religions in the nature of the claims it makes about the self, claims derived from the words and actions of Jesus himself (John 11:25; 14:6; see also UNIQUENESS OF CHRIST).

Because it is imparted at the moment of regeneration, eternal life begins in the present life and is not affected by physical death. Those possessing eternal life are declared to be saved and are promised that they shall never perish (John 3:15–16, 18, 36; 5:24; 10:9). To be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord (2 Cor. 5:8). The gift of eternal life is received by faith so that those who believe have already passed from death to life (John 5:24; 1 John 3:14) and have the life which is in the Son (1 John 5:12), a life which expresses itself in victory (1 John 3:8–9), love (John 15:9–17), and joy (John 16:20–24).

The New Testament uses the figures of new birth and spiritual resurrection to describe eternal life. First, the new birth (John 1:12, 13; 3:3) relates the believer to the family of God. Second, the reception of eternal life is described as spiritual resurrection. Having been "raised together with Christ" (Col. 3:1), the believer now enjoys being "alive from the dead" (Rom. 6:13). The concept of spiritual resurrection, however, does not negate the New Testament teaching regarding physical resurrection, developed most fully in 1 Corinthians 15.

Because the biblical teaching regarding eternal life stands in stark contrast with the teaching of other major world religions regarding life after death, it has received great emphasis in missionary proclamation, particularly among Muslims, Hindus, and Buddhists.

Like the Bible, Islam teaches eternal personal existence (Sura 3:103; 9:21; 15:48; 18:2; 56:31, 32) in heaven (Sura 55:26–27) or hell (Sura 37:22–23; 55:44; 67:7–10). Hell is the abode of the wicked (Sura 70:15). Allah will fill Gehenna with men and "jinn" (Sura 11:120).

Islam views death not as a punishment for sin, but the natural termination of life. It is to be followed on the Day of Resurrection by judgment resulting in admission to Paradise or assignment to hell based upon the works done in this life (Sura 3:185). However, ultimately, it is Allah's will which determines one's eternal destiny. Muslims have no assurance of ultimate salvation (see also SOTERIOLOGY IN NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIONS).

Although the primary purpose of life is to walk in God's path, abide by his laws, and secure his pleasure, Islam is devoid of the concept of eternal life as a present reality during this life. Rather the Qur'an contrasts sharply this life with the life to come (Sura 4:77).

In its description of heaven, the Qur'an says little about the worship of God or relationship with him. Rather, heaven is depicted as physical and sensual, as a beautiful garden filled with tasty fruits (Sura 55:48–60). Men are promised unending opportunity to consort with multiple beautiful, wide-eyed maidens. Little is said about the women apart from those who serve in the role of physical partners for men. This stands in sharp contradiction to Jesus' teaching that men and women will neither marry nor be given in marriage in the hereafter (Matt. 22:30).

Christian proclamation to Muslims with regard to eternal life, while affirming the continuity of personality beyond the grave and the reality of heaven and hell, stresses the present reality of eternal life, the assurance of salvation, the relational and spiritual character of heaven, and the equal status of men and women before God.

Since Hinduism does not distinguish between the Creator and the creation, the concept of absorption into the Divine implies the ultimate loss of personal identity. The self is viewed as uncreated and distinct from the physical body. Salvation, likened to a drop of water merging into the sea, comes at the conclusion of a long series of reincarnations, sometimes referred to as "the wheel of existence" (see also REINCARNATION AND TRANSMIGRATION). This cycle of multiple births and deaths continues until a true understanding of the self brings it to an end. Inherently connected to the belief in reincarnation is the doctrine of karma, the accumulation of merit and demerit, whereby each person experiences the consequences of his or her past and present lives.

With reference to eternal life, Christian proclamation in Hindu contexts has emphasized the continuing personal identity of the believer in relationship with a truly compassionate personal God, the assured hope of salvation, the reality of a qualitatively superior life in the present, and the experience of forgiveness that brings freedom from bad karma and escape from the wheel of existence. Christians, referring to Hebrews 9:27, testify with assurance that this is their first and last earthly lifetime!

The Buddhist understanding of eternal life is conditioned by the experience of Buddha Gautama, who set out on a spiritual journey for the purpose of overcoming and transcending the old age and sickness that lead to the agony of dying. Although Buddhism adopted many of the Hindu views regarding karma and reincarnation, it developed many of its own unique concepts as found in the four noble truths, the eightfold path, and the twelve steps of interdependency. Since suffering is caused by desire, freedom from desire leads to Nirvana, a state which is in essence nonbeing. Buddhists do not hold to the permanence of the self.

The concept of karma leads to the desire to acquire merit in order to improve one's position in future lives. The fatalism implicit in the Buddhist concept of karma leaves no room for the possibility of divine forgiveness.

Christian proclamation in Buddhist contexts emphasizes continuing personal identity that transcends death, the legitimate desire for and reality of eternal fellowship with a personal God, eternal life as a gift from a loving and gracious Heavenly Father to be received by faith, and a lifestyle of love as a response to God's forgiveness and his gift of the Holy Spirit through Jesus Christ.

KENNETH B. MULHOLLAND

Eternal Security. Eternal security, also known as the perseverance of the saints, refers to the continuation of the work of God in the life of a true believer. To the question “Will the operation of divine grace begun in a true believer’s life certainly continue and be brought to completion such that a genuine Christian can never completely fall away from Christ and fail to obtain eternal salvation?”, two different answers—one positive, one negative—have historically been offered, by Calvinism and Arminianism respectively.

The Calvinist doctrine of perseverance is expressed by the Westminster Confession of Faith (17.1): “They, whom God has accepted in his Beloved, effectually called, and sanctified by his Spirit, can neither totally nor finally fall away from the state of grace, but shall certainly persevere therein to the end, and be eternally saved.” Key points include: (1) This does not apply to everyone who professes faith, but only to those whom God has elected and saved. (2) These true believers, though they may fall into sin temporarily, will certainly persist in exercising faith and engaging in good works in the midst of temptations and attacks. This refutes “a common caricature of this doctrine which describes it as teaching that believers are certain to be saved no matter how they live” (Hoekema). (3) Perseverance is a continuing work of God and hence the security of these true believers does not ultimately rest on their ability to withstand assaults and maintain themselves in Christ. But this persevering power does not operate apart from the believers’ faith which is the means by which God preserves them. (4) This faith includes perseverance as a constitutive element: “genuine faith, by definition, perseveres; where there is no perseverance, by definition the faith cannot be genuine” (Carson).

Scriptural support for the Calvinist position includes promises stressing divine power and faithfulness to protect believers (1 Peter 1:3–9; Phil. 1:6; Rom. 8:31–39; 1 Cor. 1:8–9; 1 Thess. 5:23–24), passages presenting God’s purposes for believers as being all of a piece (Rom. 8:28–30), Christ’s own pledges to guard believers (John 6:37–40; 10:27–30), and assurances of eternal life (John 3:36; 5:24; 1 John 5:13). The Spirit’s ministry of regenerating and sealing people (John 3:3–8; Eph. 1:13–14; 4:30) is the guarantee of their ultimate salvation. The intercessory work of Christ ensures complete salvation (Heb. 7:23–25; John 17:24). The reality of being part of the New Covenant—providing believers with a new heart (Ezek. 36:25–27), transforming power (2 Cor. 3), and union with Christ (1 Cor. 1:30; Eph. 1:1–12)—enables them to persevere in faith and holiness. Perseverance is also linked with divine election and irresistible grace. This theological outlook has meant that Calvinist missions have tended to emphasize personal conversion, the organization and structure/development of the church, and the transformation of society, especially through education, health, and agriculture. Once people come to faith, since their salvation is secure, they are to live in ways that contribute positively to changing their context.

Contrast this with Arminian theology. While stressing that provision of persevering grace has been made for the church, it considers this grace to be conditional with respect to each individual Christian. The believer is protected by God’s power, but this grace can be resisted. Ultimate salvation is thus contingent on the believer persevering in the faith. Thus, “there is no way of telling whether a given person in the Church will persevere to the end; the fact of his perseverance at any given moment is shown in the fact that he is persevering” (Marshall). Although some Arminians consider apostasy by true believers only a possibility, others affirm that falling away does occur.

Scriptural support for the conditionality of individual salvation includes warnings against apostasy (Heb. 2: 1–3; 3:12; 10:26–31; 2 Peter 3:17) and exhortations to remain firm in the faith until the end (Col. 1:21–23; Heb. 3:14–15; John 15:1–7; Matt. 10:22) Such instructions would appear superfluous if true believers could not fall away but are guaranteed eternal salvation. Also, cases of actual apostasy are presented as evidence that falling away does indeed occur (Heb. 6:4–6; 1 John 2:18–19; 2 Peter 2:1–2; Judas; Acts 5:1–11; 1 Tim. 1:19–20; 2 Tim. 2:16–18; 4:10). Objecting to the Calvinist viewpoint, Arminianism finds eternal security to be inconsistent with human free will and claims that it leads to complacency and moral laxity.

This outlook has generally worked itself out in Arminian missions through an emphasis on personal conversion followed by Christian discipleship, growth in spiritual maturity, and continual need for revival and increased holiness of the converts. Education, health, agriculture, and other social emphases have tended to be downplayed, compared with the importance of growth in the personal and corporate holiness, worship, spirituality, and devotion of the churches and their leaders.

A compatibilist approach to this doctrine encourages responsible integration of the passages stressing God’s continuing work of preservation with those emphasizing the believer’s responsibility to persevere in the faith. Acknowledging the difficulty of knowing if some people are genuine believers, it admits that some non-believers give startling evidence of conversion (Heb. 6:4–6; Mark 4:1–20; 1 John 2:18–19; Matt. 7:21–23) yet turn away, not from saving faith, but from the religious position they once held. True believers, however, always continue in grace until ultimate salvation, and the ground of this perseverance is God’s sustaining power which works through their persistent faith. One means of encouraging such abiding faith is the above-mentioned scriptural warnings and exhortations.

Assurance of Salvation is the legitimate and comforting result of this doctrine. This subjective confidence paves the way for believers to face difficulties, persecutions, and even threats of death without fear of being separated from God. This engenders boldness and dedication to the cause of Christ worldwide.

GREGG R. ALLISON

Ethics. Christians can all agree, at least in a general sense, to the notion that ethics are in some way important for theological reflection and mission. Confusion can arise, however, as to what some key fundamental terms mean and to how discussions on ethics should be articulated. A brief introduction to the nature of ethical discourse, therefore, can provide a framework for a more informed exploration into the relationship of ethics to both Christian mission in general and cross-cultural missionaries in particular.

Basic Definitions and General Orientation.

In popular parlance, often no distinction is drawn between morality and ethics. Within the academic discipline of ethics, however, these two terms are not synonymous, although they are related. The first concerns the concrete manner in which people act and order their lives; the second, on the other hand, refers to articulating the explanations and justifications of why and how people do what they do. To speak of “ethics in mission” is to deal with both of these aspects—that is, with the mundane realities of human existence and the theoretical foundations of behavior and values. This opening part of the discussion will focus on the insights that philosophical and theological ethics can offer into the nature of ethical reasoning. These might serve missiological reflection and missionaries facing complex ethical quandaries by helping to specify the nature of the issues at stake and by identifying at what point dialogue (or disagreement) and resolution (or confrontation) can be expected. They can also aid ethical discussions through fostering more careful analysis of different points of view and solutions.

To begin with, ethicists differentiate among the various levels of ethical discourse. These range from the spontaneous human responses to given situations (level one) to accepted cultural mores and unquestioned socialized patterns (level two), and on to more reflective debate on ethical principles (level three). Lastly, there is the meta-ethical level, which posits an answer to the ultimate question “Why be ethical?” Christians, for instance, in certain situations might react in similar patterns to others within their context (levels one and two). They may or may not hold to broadly held views of justice or compassion and make common cause on individual issues (e.g., abortion, poverty), even though the principles underlying their opinions and actions would be grounded in their faith (level three). Christians will necessarily part with others over the most fundamental grounding of ethical behavior (level four). For them, the person of God and the demands of the gospel provide unique motivations for individual and corporate life. Ethical interaction with those of different commitments becomes increasingly difficult as one moves up these four levels.
Ethics

Philosophical ethics traditionally has categorized ethical reasoning according to a few classical approaches (Fairweather and McDonald). Deontology (from the Greek dei, “it is necessary”) focuses on duty and making correct decisions in accordance with transcendent principles. Teleological (from the Greek telos, “the end”) ethics focuses on consequences and desires to seek the greatest good. In contrast, virtue ethics centers not so much on the decision-making process, but on the character of the person or community; it highlights the nurture and formation of moral people. Each of these ways of formulating ethics finds echoes in the Bible and defenders among Christian ethicists. A comprehensive ethic would need to incorporate the contributions of each emphasis.

What is more, all ethical persuasions utilize a variety of sources (Verhey, 1984, 159–97; Wright, 1995, 11–178). All usually appeal in some fashion to human reason, conscience, and experience. Christian ethics do also, although the understanding and evaluation of these potential sources for ethics is influenced by belief in the Creation, the Fall of Humankind, and Redemption. Ethical stances can be linked as well to traditions of particular communities, which attempt to train their members to conform to certain values and lifestyle models. The church, of course, would be the locus for a specific set of traditions and provide the communities for the Christian. The conviction that God has revealed himself in word and deed argues for two other sources for ethical direction: the Bible and the Holy Spirit of God. These general affirmations, however, in no way should minimize the fact that Christians differ over the viability and use of these multiple sources. For example, disagreements surface over the ability of the Conscience to discern right from wrong, the nature of biblical authority, the relationship between the two Testaments, and the means by which the Spirit guides believers. A Christian ethic must be conscious of the breadth of theological formulations that would comprise a coherent and comprehensive ethical stance.

This list of theological issues, and the options taken on each one, are inseparable from a final factor to take into account: the impact of theological frameworks on ethical discussion. The three major theological streams that flow out from the Reformation—Lutheranism, Calvinism, Anabaptism—have developed different ethical visions. Over the centuries and around the world each has generated different kinds of societies and Christian communities. Each as well has proposed views which have determined how Christians have perceived their identity and their mission in the world. The positions developed vis-à-vis, for instance, the responsibility of the Christian and the church to the state, the essence of Christ’s work on the cross, the relevance of the theme of the Kingdom of God today, and the use of violence, all inevitably help shape how missionaries and individual missionaries comprehend ethical problems, conceive of what sources to appeal to in their ethical thinking, and decide among possible courses of action (see also Christ and Culture). More recently, Liberation Theology has proffered a new paradigm of reflection and Praxis: the partial realization of the kingdom in the achievement of justice in oppressive situations. This theological construct, that begins from the perspective of the preferential Option for the Poor, is now suggesting different slants to those crucial theological issues that must occupy any serious ethical reflection (Schubeck).

Missionary Cross-Cultural Ethics. In addition to the aforementioned philosophical and theological topics that demand thoughtful consideration, missionaries working in a cross-cultural setting can face the additional obstacles of having to deal not only with ethical issues alien to their own experience, but also with a context that might define and solve problems from another vantage point. A sort of “cultural-ethical” shock can result. Hence, the need for greater missionary self-awareness of cultural makeup and differences.

Missionaries should be cognizant of how their background and the host culture in which they labor compare concerning items such as the significance of time, the importance of social Status and Role, Gender Role differences, the role of Guilt and Shame, and the meaning of success. Each culture has its own orientation to life and structures the many institutions of its society accordingly. Missionaries can reject, substitute for their own, add to or synthesize with their own, the new ethical values and positions they encounter. The descriptive task of properly understanding this different ethical world, when joined with the virtue of humility, is the solid first step before any missionary attempt at prescriptive words or actions. The subsequent challenges are multiple. Legal implications for those missionaries who are foreigners are unavoidable, and wrestling with the possibilities and the right to act within the limits set for those from outside can be a source of tension. Missionaries must strive to be true to their faith and the biblical witness; they must be willing to listen and learn, to admit to inappropriate behavior and change biblical interpretations if warranted, and to have the courage and wisdom sometimes to take uncomfortable ethical stands. In sum, missionaries are called to cultural sensitivity and realism and Christian integrity, even as they try to avoid slip-
Ethics

Another understanding of "social ethics" would relate the phrase to issues of social structures and processes. The focus is now on more global items, like how societies are put together and function economically and socially (see Economics). Interest is no longer limited to individuals—how they should respond to different social pressures or certain demands. Rather, concern is directed especially at identifying, analyzing, and evaluating the policies and practices of institutions, then proposing alternative schemes that might better conform to certain ethical standards. Topics include justice, equity, and Human Rights. Each touches the gamut of human communities, from the family to governments bound together by treaties in the international arena.

Regarding justice, debates revolve around whether it should be distributive (so that all get an equal share—an ideal of socialism) or productive (all have equal opportunity—an ideal of capitalism); whether the achievement of justice (however defined) for the whole can legitimate the possible deprivation of justice of particular individuals or groups; and whether and to what degree the state can intervene in the life of citizens to attain greater justice for everyone or for particular groups. Equity raises questions, at one level, of how the government carries out its duties and apportions benefits; it also concerns the call to the individual not to take unfair advantage of others whose conscience does not respond in the same way to similar situations. Once more, the necessity of self-awareness and the priority of the descriptive task over the prescriptive are apparent. The New Testament teaches that God appeals to the conscience to convict humans of their sin; after salvation, the Scriptures and the Spirit of God work together to correct and renew the conscience of all who believe. Missionaries, then, should partner with God in touching the conscience of those who need to respond to the gospel message and endeavor to help believers to mature in their faith so that they might live with a sanctified conscience.

Social Ethics in Context. The distinction between individual ethics and social ethics for missiology and missionaries can frequently be a false one, even though the differentiation might prove to be theoretically helpful. Personal experience can bring one in touch with dangers of wider import. Good examples are the problems of bribery, the experiences of women, and peace. Attempts to seek resolution and redress can lead into the labyrinth of government corruption, the ugliness of some manifestations of gender inequality, and the abuse of political power. All of these items demand not only theological clarity, but also wisdom and valor in the meeting of the pragmatic challenges that they force on those desiring to obey the will of God (Adeney, 1995, 142–62, 192–250).

The phrase "social ethics" many times is associated with certain kinds of issues that impact the broader body politic. If the phrase, though, is defined simply as the shared moral values and behavior of a specific context, then it ties back into the earlier part of the discussion. For believers, identity and duty are linked with Christian faith, tradition, and community, even as they are inseparable from the life of other human beings around them. The continual struggle for Christians and the church is to balance being faithful to their particularity and sensitive to the realities of their cultural setting and environment (Carroll R., 1994).
Ethics

...ing. However one might appraise liberation theologies, that theological current has seriously dealt with these problems at a communal, national, and international level and places the theme of justice as the foundational criterion for all ethical reflection and Praxis.

Any evangelical missiological entrance into these sometimes explosive issues will require a mature evaluation and acceptance of pertinent elements of the Reformation heritage, as well as interaction with the insights from philosophical ethics. Contextual awareness and sensitivity must also not be forgotten, as missiologists and missionaries attempt to grapple with specific problems in the warp and woof of daily life in other socio-cultural settings.

M. DANIEL CARROLL R.

Ethiopia (Est. 2000 pop.: 63,785,000; 1,221,900 sq. km. [471,776 sq. mi.]). Christianity in Ethiopia began in the fourth century with the coming of two Syrian Christians, FRUMENTIUS and ADESIUS, to the ancient capital of Ethiopia at Aksum. Frumentius was responsible for the conversion of the future emperor Ezana in 328, thus marking the beginning of Ethiopian Christianity. Frumentius, though granted his freedom, returned to Ethiopia in A.D. 340 newly consecrated by Athanasius of Alexandria as the first bishop of Ethiopia. The coming of the “nine saints,” monks from Syria, in the fifth century transformed Christianity from a court religion to a grassroots faith.

The rise of Islam in the seventh century was the beginning of over a millennium of isolation for Ethiopia. A strong nationalistic Christianity emerged during these centuries that enabled the kingdom to survive a long series of challenges from within and from without. At the heart of this nationalism was the legend of Solomon and Sheba. As recorded in the thirteenth-century Kebra-Negast (Book of Kings), the Solomonic dynasty begins with Menelik I, son of Solomon and Sheba, who returned to Ethiopia with the ark of the covenant and turned Ethiopia into a new Israel. With the acceptance of Christ as Lord in the fourth century, Ethiopia became even more the true Israel and its capital the new Jerusalem. The fifteenth century emperor Zara-Yaqob used this civil religion to lead the nation to new heights.

This nationalistic mythology served Ethiopia well during its brief conquest by Muslim forces in the sixteenth century. With the help of the Portuguese, the Solomonic leadership was restored.

Ethiopia in the nineteenth century reached a low point under Tewodros II, whose rash imprisonment of English missionaries led to a British invasion and a humiliating defeat in 1868 at Maqalda. In a sharp reversal of fortune the next emperor, Menelik II, renewed Ethiopian self-confidence and won the admiration of the world for his victory over Italian invaders at Adowa in 1896. In an Africa cruelly partitioned by European rivals, the picture of an independent Christian kingdom conquering a colonial power was not forgotten by African leaders. The concept of “Ethiopianism” helped transform missionary Christianity into something more connected with the African past.

Ethiopia lumbered into the twentieth century as a largely feudal kingdom ill-equipped to face the modern world. In 1930 Haile Selassie ascended to the throne and slowly moved his nation forward. His successful defense of Ethiopia during its war with Italy (1935–41) furthered his program of reform. His impact on the church was profound, leading ultimately to the independence of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church from the Coptic Church of Egypt in 1959, ending a dependency that began in 340.

In 1974 Haile Selassie was overthrown by a military coup. In 1984 Colonel Haile Mengistu Miriam seized power from the ruling military council. His ideological Marxism meant the seizure of church property and the imprisonment of many church leaders. In 1991, Mengistu was overthrown and religious freedom restored under Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. On April 27, 1993, Eritrea declared independence after a referendum was passed by a landslide vote, ending years of bitter conflict with Ethiopia.

The decade of the 1990s saw Christianity in all its wide variety expand in Ethiopia. Though Muslims composed 35 percent of Ethiopia’s 56 million citizens, Christianity remained the dominant faith. The Ethiopian Orthodox Church (Tewahido) had upwards of 25 million members. Roman Catholicism (both Latin and Alezandrian rites) remained under one million. Protestant groups composed 14 percent of the population. Fastest growing were the evangelical churches, with the Kale Heywet Church (SIM related) numbering approximately two million members and the Mekane Yesu Church (Evangelical Lutheran) estimated at 400,000.

MARK R. SHAW

Bibliography. J. Bonk, An Annotated and Classified Bibliography of English Literature Pertaining to the Ethiopian Orthodox Church; D. Crumney, Priests and Politicians: Protestant and Catholic Missions in Ortho-
Ethnicity. Classification of a person or persons into a particular group based on factors such as physical characteristics (e.g., skin color, facial characteristics, body shape); cultural identity (e.g., language or dialect, religion), or geographic origin. Since the founding of the church, ethnicity has been a fundamental reality of missions.

For example, wherever intercultural evangelists have gone they sought to translate the gospel into the local language. They knew that the gospel had to be understood in local terms, they also knew that the gospel had to be lived in the local milieu. Jesus was the model. Even though he was God, he took upon himself a human body and was shaped in a particular cultural context—he was a Galilean Jew. That is the way God enters cultures and saves people. God takes Culture very seriously. So should intercultural evangelists. The gospel affirms culture in general terms. As the gospel enters culture as salt and light it actually enhances culture.

Needed: A Theology of Ethnicity. Missiologists have developed theologies of “ethnic evangelism,” but few missiologists are developing a theology of “ethnicity” itself. This task is becoming increasingly urgent because the demands of ethnicity will probably dominate the world’s agenda at least in the opening decades of the new millennium.

Lessons might be learned from the history of northern Europe, which was torn apart by ethnic struggles for centuries. In the process of time the problem was sorted out to some degree by simply drawing national boundaries around ethnic realities—Germany for the Germans, Holland for the Dutch, France for the French, Italy for the Italians, and so forth. This did not solve all the problems as recent events in the Balkans have shown. But it did have a salutary effect of stressing nation over tribe (ethnic entity). It seemed a bit more civil to be a nationalist than a “tribalist.” But history has shown that the two are essentially the same.

Ethnicity and the State Today. Several factors have served to mitigate the impact of ethnicity on world history in recent years. First is the phenomenon of Colonialism. By exerting powerful influence the colonial powers sought to suppress ethnic feelings so that the rule of colonial law could be upheld. Second, strong nations have emerged where the aboriginal population was either displaced or suppressed by immigrant peoples from a variety of cultures. This was the case in much of South, Central, and North America along with Australia and New Zealand. Third, ideological hegemony was exercised by some states such as totalitarian socialism or communism. In these systems there was simply no opportunity for authentic ethnic expression. Ethnicity was treated as a thing of the past or as an ornament which could be worn on occasion if it did not interfere with the march of the totalitarian state.

Two of those factors are almost gone—structural colonialism is no more and ideological totalitarianism is in shreds. Under the facades of these two systems ethnicity not only survived but flourished, awaiting the moment when once again ethnicity could be claimed, admired, and expressed. That is the case today. Where these two systems reigned, now ethnicity has emerged as a major factor. As the breakup of the former Yugoslavia shows, however, this is not always a positive thing.

The Role of Ethnicity in Society. Ethnicity has a positive and a negative side. Through genetics we inherit many things, but we do not inherit culture; that we learn. Our cultures give us specific ways of viewing the world, as well as how to interact with other persons, how to survive and prosper. Cultures provide identity and a place to belong. The process of Enculturation which begins at birth provides the individual with a way to be human. Alone, newly born human beings have no hope of survival. Culture shapes the person. The formative role of culture or ethnicity is profound and pervasive. This is the positive side. The harmful effects of ethnicity appear when ethnocentrism takes the upper hand in cases where one group imposes its will on another or when a group fears this will happen.

So much interethnic hostility exists in the world today that the word itself has begun to take on a negative meaning. This bodes ill for the opening decades of the twenty-first century because ethnicity is on the rise.

The Gospel and Ethnicity. The gospel is very clear with regard to ethnicity. The Kingdom of God is not a new “generic” culture, but a family which includes people from a great variety of cultures. The unity of the Christian church has nothing to do with culture, yet it affirms all cultures. Believers are “one” because they love the same Lord and are redeemed by the one Lamb of God. Their unity is the result of the love which they receive as a fruit of the Holy Spirit. In the Body no one culture dominates nor dictates to another. Everyone stands humbly before God, in their culture but not of that culture. The culmination of world history will be when the followers of Christ will join the multiethnic choir—out of every tribe and nation and tongue, praising God forever and ever (Rev. 7).

DONALD R. JACOBS

See also Minority, Minority Populations.

Ethnocentrism. The term “ethnocentrism” may simply be defined as the belief that one’s own people group or cultural ways are superior to others. An ethnocentric person generally has an attitude/opinion of prejudice (prejudging others as inferior). This internal orientation may be manifested in individual action or institutionalized policy toward others as in the case of anti-Semitism, apartheid, bigotry, fascism, and racism.

Prejudice or discrimination in a scientific sense can be both positive and negative. However, in the social sciences, including missiology, the terms are generally used with a negative connotation. It is necessary to distinguish between the two: prejudice is an attitude; discrimination is action or social interaction unfavorable to others on the basis of their religious, ethnic, or racial membership.

Prejudice is the subjective prejudgment of others to be inferior, whereas ethnocentrism is the subjective presumption that one’s own people group or cultural ways are superior. Bigotry (i.e., narrow-mindedness or intolerance due to differences between self and others) and racism (i.e., the presumed cultural superiority or inferiority as caused by genetically inherited physical characteristics such as facial feature, skin color, etc.) are two general forms of prejudice.

Institutionalized manifestation of ethnocentrism and prejudice can be found in specific cases historically. Fascism (i.e., authoritarian nationalism) of Benito Mussolini, which emerged in the 1920s in Italy, and Adolf Hitler’s control of Germany in the 1930s are cases in point. Hitler’s belief in the superiority and purity of his own kind gave impetus to anti-Semitic measures that led to the holocaust of the Jews. The black and white racial conflicts in the United States and South Africa are examples of institutionalized manifestation of ethnocentrism and prejudice.

Ethnocentrism is Contrabiblical to Mission. Mission is the divine design of bringing spiritual blessings to all nations, reflected in God’s covenant with Abraham (Gen. 12) and Christ’s GREAT COMMISSION to bring the gospel to all nations. God’s desire is that none perish but all should come to repentance (2 Peter 3:9).

Ethnocentric pride of many Jews prevented them from performing their duties as God’s choice instruments of grace to the nations (Rom. 7–9). The apostles had difficulty in following the resurrected Christ’s command to bear witness to the nations (Acts 1:9) Even during persecution they persisted in evangelizing only their own kind (Acts 11:19).

The detailed description of the Holy Spirit’s directing Peter toward the Roman official Cornelius in Acts 10 is very telling regarding ethnocentrism and mission. The Holy Spirit prepared Peter personally by leading him to lodge at Simon’s house (cf. the Jewish ceremonial law of Lev. 11) prior to giving visions and directions to both Peter and Cornelius. Later Peter came to a new understanding: “I now realize how true it is that God does not show favoritism and accepts men from every nation” (Acts 19:34–35). When witnessing the “Gentile pentecost,” the Jewish Christians “were astonished that the gift of the Holy Spirit had been poured out even on the Gentiles” (10:44–45).

Ethnocentrism is Counterproductive in Missions. “Missions” are the ways and means whereby the Christian church fulfills its mission of world evangelization. INTERCULTURAL COMMUNICATION, CROSS-CULTURAL MINISTRY, and CHURCH PLANTING are parts of the process of world evangelization. At any of these points ethnocentrism can curtail or cripple efforts in missions.

Persons with an ethnocentric orientation have difficulty developing a genuine social relationship with members outside their group. While we must recognize that no one is entirely without prejudice or ethnocentrism of some kind, ethnocentrism in the Christian inhibits obedience to the GREAT COMMANDMENT (“love your neighbor as yourself”) and the Great Commission. Ethnocentrism is a significant obstacle to missionaries serving as messengers of the “gospel of reconciliation” (2 Cor. 5).

The ethnocentric Western Christian has the tendency to presuppose a “guilt feeling” in the audience in talking about justification, atonement, and so on. People from a shame culture (see SHAME; avoid embarrassment and “losing face” at all cost and acquire honor and “save face” by all means) may be more ready to appreciate and accept Christ as the “Mediator, Shame-bearer, Reconcilor” (Rom. 5; 2 Cor. 5; Eph. 2; Heb. 9; etc.)

Some Western Christians are predisposed to the use of informational/impersonal evangelistic means of the technological society as compared to oral and mostly relational cultures of the target group. The understanding of “limited cultural relativism” (viewing cultural ways as relative, an antidote to “ethnocentrism”) will enable Christians to adapt to new cultural contexts with the relevant gospel message and flexible evangelistic methods.

Ethnocentrism Still Inhibits Missions. Martin Luther despised the Book of James as “the straw epistle” and preferred Romans and Galatians. This is a historical example showing the power of prejudice. His pattern of preferential treatment of different books of the Bible can still be found in modern missions in prioritizing Bible books for translation. In a similar manner, cross-cultural church planters may disregard the cultural context of the target ethnic groups and persist in imposing their own Christian tradition on new converts in terms of worship and preaching style, discipleship programs, and church policy.

At a personal level, missionaries may not be completely free from ethnocentrism in their attitude, etiquette, and action. All missionaries must be willing to ask themselves on a regular basis if they are displaying ethnocentric attitudes in what they communicate by the very way they live.

ENOC WAN

Ethnographic Research. Ethnography is the task of describing a culture from the perspective of the people for whom it is a way of life. The ethnographer learns from people by participating in their lives and observing their world while carefully recording his or her observations. Ethnographic research is the systematic study of culture using the methodology of ethnography.

The Ethnographic Method. The ethnographic method begins with an ethnographer choosing a cultural context in which to study. In selecting a context, careful consideration should be given to the accessibility of the activities and people who form the basis of the study. The ethnographer must balance the issues of personal interest with the needs of others who are working in the area. The overall concern is protecting the integrity of the work while avoiding spoiling the field. Methodological concerns will inevitably guide the selection process.

Another aspect of the selection criteria is the central focus or research problem that determines the direction of the study. The research problem may be chosen prior to entering the context through a survey of the literature or in dialogue with others who have similar research interests. The research problem may also arise out of the preliminary work done in the context of the study. In either case, the research problem articulates the focus of the study as a manageable unit and provides the basis for the critical questions that the ethnographer seeks to answer. Ethnographic research is most useful when the ethnographer has a good working knowledge of the local language.

After selecting the context, the ethnographer begins the process of participant observation. Participant observation, a cognate term for ethnography, is the process of identifying with the people through participation in their activities, events, and conversations while observing the interactions. The degree of participant observation may range from a person who is completely involved in the process to a person who is primarily an observer. The initial work of the ethnographer is to make observations of the place, activities, and actors in a given social situation in an effort to describe the setting. Early observations should include a record of (1) the use of space and time, (2) artifacts that are present in the social situations, (3) descriptions of the people including their physical characteristics and the language(s) used, and (4) structural observations of both the material objects and the social relationships.

As the participant observation process continues, the ethnographer moves beyond initial observations to more focused observations and specific observing and informal conversations of interviews, the most productive ethnographic technique. Interviews may be structured (such as questionnaires or surveys), informal (which appear to be natural conversations), or retrospective (which asks an informant to reconstruct the past by recalling information about a person or event). Interview quality is dependent on the preparation and mental alertness of the interviewer and the willingness and ability of the informant. The ethnographer must develop the skill of interviewing both to ensure a culturally acceptable form and to exercise a degree of control over the direction of the interview. In the case of ethnographers who are learning the language, interviews provide useful exercises for both data collection and language practice, but are hard to direct. At the heart of the interview is respect for the person(s) being interviewed and a willingness on the part of the ethnographer to explore the world through the eyes of the informant. Central to the entire observational process is the written record.

Observational data are recorded in a written account known as fieldnotes. Types of fieldnotes include the condensed account, the expanded account, and the fieldwork journal. The purpose of the condensed account is to record exact statements, words, and observations as they are heard to ensure accuracy and exactness. The expanded account is the record that is kept in its complete form, including the transcription and expansion of the notes from the condensed account. The third form is the journal, in which the ethnographer keeps a record of feelings, personal observations, and activities that help provide insight into the process and account for the attitudes of the individual.

The usefulness of fieldnotes depends on the objectivity of the record. Although there is debate over the issue of objectivity, there are a number of methodological conventions that reduce observer bias. The first area deals with three principles for language recording. The language identification principle requires the ethnographer to clearly identify the language for each fieldnote entry. The verbatim principle addresses the need to make an accurate verbatim record of the content of interaction and conversations. The last principle is that of using concrete language to ensure that as much detail as possible is recorded without the inevitable condensing and summarization that characterize the majority of formal note taking.
Ethnographic Research

Another area of concern for objectivity involves the issues of reliability and validity of the measurement. The ethnographer must develop a procedure for data collection that employs different techniques. Reliability is the extent to which these techniques or the measurement procedures provide the same answer every time it is used. If a measure is reliable, another person may use the method and come up with comparable results. The second issue is that of validity, which determines the extent to which the procedure gives the correct answer. Validity may be approached in two ways: respondent validation and triangulation. Respondent validation seeks to check the accuracy of the accounts of the attitudes and beliefs with the key respondents from whom the account was taken. Triangulation is the process of checking all sources of data with a minimum of two other sources to ensure that it is not idiosyncratic in nature. The ethnographer triangulates all of the significant input to ensure that inaccuracies, either through misunderstandings or intentional misleading, are removed from the record.

Analyzing the data is an ongoing element of the research from preentry through each phase of the observational process. The ethnographer begins to explore hunches and assumptions in the early phase moving on to a more formal level of analysis as the data are recorded in the field notes. In addition to the components of objectivity, the ethnographer analyzes phenomena observed in the research and recorded in the fieldnotes to discover key terms and concepts that provide insights into the cultural context. The ethnographer must be thoroughly familiar with the data in order to compare the terms and concepts in a move toward categories of meaning that can be further triangulated to ensure validity. This process requires both analysis and further observations at an increasing level of specificity. Due to the cyclical nature of the analysis and observational process, the ethnographer is directed by the questions emerging from the analysis. It is essential that the ethnographer maintain a constant interaction among observation, recording, and analysis in order to ensure that the research remains focused. As the research nears completion, the analysis will produce a number of cultural categories that are further compared, leading eventually to the discovery of typologies, models, themes, or theories that are grounded in the data.

The final phase of the ethnographic research process is the writing of the description as a document known as an ethnography. While it appears tedious, the formal writing provides an irreplaceable opportunity to synthesize the data into a systematic description that becomes a useful document to the community at large.

Missiological Implications. The potential contribution of ethnographic research to our understanding raises the following issues: (1) an increasing number of missionaries must be competent in ethnographic research methodology; (2) ethnographies should be included in the preparation of missionary candidates; (3) ethnographic research is crucial to the ongoing process of contextualization, especially with the problem of nominalism; (4) ethnographic research should be encouraged to provide comparative data for the development of strategies employed by missions; and (5) mission leaders should incorporate ethnographic research as a useful method of gaining understanding as the internationalization of missions continues both at the level of field ministries and in developing multicultural leadership.

C. Douglas McConnell

See also Qualitative Research.

Ethnography. A methodology that looks for significant patterns of behavior in social contexts and seeks to interpret them according to the insider’s perspective. This type of qualitative research, involving “participant observation,” was brought to popular consciousness by Margaret Mead (1928) and Oscar Lewis (1963). The researchers immerse themselves in a given social context as participants, making detailed observations that they convert to written data for analysis. Some researchers attempt to become one with the social group and make their observations from the inside (the emic perspective); others join the social group as outsiders (the etic perspective) and seek to confirm their findings through open-ended interviews with its members.

Ethnography is particularly useful for missionaries because it provides them with the tools they...
Ethnomusicology

Ethnomusicology is an academic discipline emerging in the twentieth century. It grew out of the tension posed by the adage, “Music is a universal language,” and the discovery of great varieties of music never previously observed as a result of nineteenth-century explorations into various parts of the world. With its roots dating back to the 1880s in the field of comparative musicology, the term “ethnomusicology” was first coined in 1958 by Jaap Kunst. As a discipline, ethnomusicology has grown from initial “arm-chair” observations of music collected by explorers to active analysis, documentation, and participant-observation research of the ever-burgeoning musics of the world’s cultures. Ethnomusicology is interdisciplinary, drawing from Anthropology, Linguistics, and musicology. A major goal of ethnomusicologists today is to understand the music of the world’s peoples.

Traditionally, ethnomusicology includes the study of folk and traditional music, contemporary music in oral tradition, and Eastern art music. It involves the study of conceptual issues such as the origin of music, musical change, composition and improvisation, music as symbol, universals in music, the roles and functions of music in society, the comparison of musical systems, and the interrelationships of music in multimedia events with drama and dance. Although research methodologies can apply to any musical culture, ethnomusicologists most often study cultures other than their own.

Historically, ethnomusicologists have debated the philosophical and methodological foundations of the discipline. The great divide falls between anthropological and musicological approaches to music. Alan Merriam’s thinking evolved from seeing ethnomusicology as “the study of music in culture” (1960), to “the study of music as culture” (1973), to the assertion that “music is culture and what musicians do is society” (1975). Musicological approaches, on the other hand, kept their focus on the transcription and analysis of the world’s musics.

Despite this conflict in approaches, ethnomusicologists today generally agree on five main characteristics of the field. First, they recognize similarities and universals in music and musical behavior over against an appreciation for the plethora of musical styles worldwide. Second, they agree that personal research must be carried out in the field. Drawing from anthropological methodologies, field research includes the gathering of data about music, the collecting of music, participant-observation techniques, the audio-videorecording of music events, the collection of song texts and musical instruments, the investigation of concepts about musical sound and musical behavior, and learning to perform the music under investigation. Third, ethnomusicologists generally agree that music can be written down and analyzed from a visible format. They seek solutions that go beyond the adaptation of Western musical notation. Fourth, ethno-

Bibliography. O. Lewis, The Children of Sanchez; Autobiography of a Mexican Family; M. Mead, Coming of Age in Samoa; J. P. Spradley, Participant Observation; A. L. Strauss, Qualitative Analysis for Social Scientists.

Charles A. Davis
Ethnomusicology

Ethnomusicologists investigate music as a phenomenon of culture. They insist that music has roles and functions within the wider cultural organization of societies, and that the study of music within its cultural context produces a true, genuine understanding of that music. Finally, ethnomusicologists extend their interests to the processes of musical change, the ways in which music remains stable, grows, and disappears. They interest themselves in the music of a culture as a whole, in the individual song or piece, and in the life of an individual or group.

Ethnomusicology and Mission. Historically, music and ethnomusicology played only a minor role when it came to doing the task of mission. Parallel to academia, most missionaries viewed music as “a universal language” that required the translation of Western hymns into local dialects for new converts. However, current research shows that the discipline of ethnomusicology can greatly impact the task of missions. Two major approaches help accomplish this. First, ethnomusicology, through the study of a culture’s music and song texts, can bring a deeper dimension in cultural understandings of the people with whom a cross-cultural worker is ministering. Second, it can help make the gospel more relevant by working within the indigenous communication systems inherent within a culture. The development of culturally appropriate songs and music for evangelism, discipleship, and worship makes a major contribution to creative contextualization of the gospel.

Within contemporary missions, ethnomusicology is receiving a more recognized role for making Christ known among the nations. Vida Chenowith, a pioneer in ethnomusicology for mission as a professional musician and Bible translator, has combined linguistic methodologies, ethnomusicological concerns, and her desire to provide indigenous songs for worship. Roberta King, who focuses on music as communication, seeks to encourage the development of culturally relevant and meaningful songs for communicating the gospel that are readily acceptable to and understood by the receiving culture. The process includes working with indigenous Christian musicians in setting Scripture to song; the approach leads to creative contextualization of the gospel. James Krabill has studied the growth and theological development of an indigenous church, the Harrists of Côte d’Ivoire, through the study of their song texts. The Southern Baptists and Christian Missionary Alliance also pursue various approaches to incorporating ethnomusicology in mission. Newer missions, such as Frontiers, are sending teams to areas of the world where music and dance are major channels of communication and encouraging them to develop evangelistic methods based on the “arts.”

Ethnomusicology can and should be integrated into every level of the missionary task. The missionary-ethnomusicologist’s major work is to develop mission approaches and methods that are meaningful and helpful to the church, that are readily understood by missionaries as being highly effective, that are in agreement with national church leaders’ goals and concerns for the church, and that are readily accessible to Christian workers. Ethnomusicology for missions is more than the mere development and collection of indigenous hymns, although this is important in itself. Rather, in addition, it seeks to contribute to the overall increased effectiveness of making Christ known through the study of a culture’s musical genres, the learning of a people’s worldview through the study of song texts, the identification of the role and function of music for developing methods in the use of music for evangelism, music for making disciples, and music for training leaders. Finally, the development of meaningful songs for worship that lead people to an encounter with God is an ultimate goal.

Ethnopsychology. See Cross-Cultural Counseling.

Ethnotheologies. Ethnotheology is a recent word in mission vocabulary. Achieving prominence in the 1970s, it has grown out of a new reality—the cross-cultural diffusion of the gospel into every corner of the world. The Christian faith has been rooted in Africa, Oceania, and various parts of Asia. Latin America is reformulating its centuries-old dialogue with the faith into something that is more than “borrowed” from Iberian or Anglo-Saxon churches. Voices in the United States—African-American, Asian, and Hispanic, for example—silenced by their minority status, are speaking loudly. A new day for missions has dawned—a demographic shift in the ecclesiastical center of gravity from north to south, from west to east, from majority to minority.

With that shift comes a new opportunity for theological cross-fertilization beyond those traditional geographical, social, and ethnic barriers, and new reflections on the meaning of Christianity in new contexts. The reading list of the world church has expanded past the names of Calvin and Wesley, Hodge and Packer. To it has been added names of Elizoneleo and Kim, Mbiti and Cone.

Terminology. No single term has yet emerged to describe this new situation. “Indigenous theology” was an early term that is still in use in some places. But its colonialist ring and its attachment to missionary sources sound too much like an “outsider’s” imposition. “Contextual theology” draws attention to role of context and setting in doing theology. But some evangelicals, for that very reason, are hesitant to give it full support; they fear an overemphasis on context and an underemphasis on biblical text. “Local theology” is popular among some Roman Catholic missiologists (Schreiter, 1985, 6).

“Ethnotheology” has found wide, but not widespread, acceptance in evangelical Protestant circles. Its strengths lie in its focus on the specificity of theology for a given socio-cultural area and its support from linguistics and cultural anthropology (Kraft, 1979).

One common danger may be lying behind all these terms. It is the hidden, parochial assumption that real theology, theology without an adjective, is what has been done in the Anglo-Saxon world. And that those developing theologies variously called indigenous, local, contextual, or ethnic are mere addenda to this generic universal. A true terminological breakthrough will not come until we can speak easily of all particular theologies as ultimately contributions, northern and southern, to mutual enrichment and self-criticism.

The Contributions of Ethnotheologies. In this new global mission setting ethnotheologies are prodding theological reflection in directions new and old. They are underlining again the missiological dimension of all theology past and present. Paul’s theology was that—a task theology whose map found its orientation point in missions. And the early church that followed him did not lose that dimension (Conn, 1990, 51–63).

Through the years, however, the missiological dimension has moved to the periphery. Philosophy has made itself comfortable in the Western world of Christendom, the corpus Christianum. It “occupies itself with the missionary enterprise as and when it seems to it appropriate to do so” (Bosch, 1991, 494).

Ethnotheologies, however, do not flow out of a world where the church is in a majority. They must define the faith in a non-Christian world where theirs is a minority voice. In this setting, whether post- or pre-Christian, ethnotheologies are recovering the missionary obligation of all theology. The gospel’s connection to the world demands the service of more than simply theologians; evangelicals are calling for mission theologians (Branson and Padilla, 1986, 311–23).

Ethnotheologies are expanding the global interests of theology. Anglo-Saxon theology, for example, has explored Christology in terms of the traditional titles of Jesus as the Lord, Son of God, Son of Man, Jesus as prophet, priest, and king. African theologians are turning to their own cultural designations. Can we speak of Jesus as the master of initiation, as chief, as ancestor and elder brother, and as healer (Schreiter, 1991)?

In an Asian context where the world’s major religions predominate, how do we confess Christ in an Islamic setting? Who is Jesus for Asian women? In a Korean context of suffering and repressed anger, how does Jesus speak for the people (the minjung)? In a Hindu setting, is he Avatar or more (Sugirtharajah, 1993)?

Ethnotheologies are widening theology’s context in a more holistic direction. For a millennium and a half, Western European theology increasingly found its dominant dialogue partner in philosophy. Its concerns turned to more abstract issues of ontology and epistemology. The secularist worldview of the Enlightenment turned theology to issues of faith and reason. And the rise of the university gave both skepticism and religious studies a home, further compartmentalizing life into separate categories of the public and the private, theology and ethics, knowledge and virtue. In a world now seen as governed by human reason and natural law, Western European theology found itself asking, “Where is the God of truth in a world of science?”

The ethnotheologies of a new day are driven by other contextual interests. In a political world of power versus powerlessness, they cross the boundary between theology and ethics. Black Theologies in the United States and South Africa and Liberation Theologies in Latin America ask, “Where is the God of righteousness and justice in a world of injustice?” Often the theological formulations are Theodicy questions. Western European theologies ask, “Does God exist?” Black theology and Feminist Theologies ask, “Does God care?”

Issues of traditional culture dominate the black African theological agenda: What should our attitude be to African Traditional Religions? What is our relation as African Christians to Africa’s past (see AFRICAN THEOLOGIES)? And in Asia ethnotheologies are formed particularly in dialogue with the world’s major religions. Theology there resembles religious apologetics (see ASIAN THEOLOGIES).

Emerging Concerns. In this explosion of creative theologizing, evangelicals remain concerned about the balance between text and context. “Theology must undoubtedly always be relevant and contextual, but this may never be pursued at the expense of God’s revelation” (Bosch, 1991, 187). In the hermeneutical process of theology Christians must take seriously the normative priority of their classical text, the Scriptures. But, with a general weakness of biblical exposition in many ethnotheologies (Dyrness, 1990, 195), at least two particulars threaten this balance.

Ethnotheologies

First, when does sensitivity to context become syncretism (Conn, 1984, 176–205)? The 1982 gathering of Third World evangelical theologians reflected this concern. “Ethnotheologies are often politically motivated and do little or no justice to the Scriptures. Syncretistic theologies often accommodate biblical truth to cultural variables. Several liberation theologies have raised vital questions which we cannot ignore. But we reject their tendency to give primacy to a praxis which is not biblically informed in the doing of theology. Likewise we object to their use of a socio-economic analysis as the hermeneutical key to the Scriptures” (Ro and Eshenaur, 1984, 23–24).

Second, can the particularism of ethnotheology lose its connection to the universal gospel? Where is the continuity between the theological formulations of the past and the emerging ethnotheologies of the present? How do we relate new understandings to the church’s theological heritage of the past?

And how do we do it without assuming that there is some grand cookie-cutter pattern—a kind of universal theology that will apply in every context without nuance? How do we deal with discontinuities between Western European and other theologies? Where is the line between semper reformanda and semper imitanda? These are the contemporary questions that surround ethnotheology and its ongoing development.

Harry M. Conn

Europe. Mission in Europe, as also in Africa and Asia, must start with the biblical record: thus the importance for Europeans of the Syrophoenician woman in Mark’s Gospel who used Jesus’ sense of humor to secure the healing of her daughter; and the Greeks in John’s Gospel “who would see Jesus.” Building on this the record indicates European participation in the Pentecostal experience: Peter’s direction by vision to accept Cornelius as a fellow follower of the Way, and the Macedonian appeal to Paul to render help to the youthful churches of Europe. Thus bound up with the early history of Europe is the growth of the early Christian community, the story of how it came to define its core beliefs in relation to incipient heresy, and how from being a persecuted sect it became the state religion of the Roman Empire. This process was not all gain, for with it, as Eusebius (c. 260–340), the church’s first historian, observed, there came social advantage in adopting the Christian faith, whose adherents came to represent a range of motivations from continued faithfulness to more pragmatic reasons (“the hypocrisy of people who crept into church” with an eye upon securing imperial favor).

With the Christianization of the Roman world, the expansion of the empire itself came to have mission implications. Some have suggested that the expansion of Christianity among the Teutonic peoples pressing on the borders of the empire was in the first place a product of Christians who had been taken prisoner by, for example, the marauding Goths. Franks and Celts were to follow in accepting the Christian faith and among them some remarkable early missionaries responded to the missionary call to evangelize the continent: receiving cultures soon became also sending cultures, seen, for example, in the lives of Columbanus (c. 543–615) and Boniface (680–764) (see also Celtic Missions). Later the missionary endeavors in the East of two Greek brothers, Cyril (826–869) and Methodius (c. 815–885), saw the gospel taken in 862 to Moravia, where Cyril’s educational activities led to the invention of the Cyrillic alphabet, which it is claimed became the foundation of all Slavonic languages. The Eastern Church’s use of the vernacular in early missionary activities was in marked distinction to the Western Church’s concentration on Latin. In the fifteenth century the missionary endeavors of a reinvigorated Catholic Church were more obvious than the outreach of Protestantism, which remained confined to Europe. In the West the sending of priests alongside the conquistadores to colonize the new world that Columbus had “discovered” was seen as simply a continuation of the Christianization of the Iberian peninsula, or Reconquista, the driving of the Moors out of Spain. Columbus’s famous journey and the fall of Granada both occurred in 1492. At the same time militant Islam, in the form of the Ottoman Turks, was pressing the Christian East with great ferocity until 1683, when Vienna in the center of Christian Europe came under siege by these alien forces. The most remarkable missionary story of the sixteenth century was that of the Jesuit, Francis Xavier (1506–52), who in the last decade of his life undertook a formidable program of evangelization starting in Goa. From there he traveled to Sri Lanka and the islands of Indonesia, going as far east as Japan and founding a church there before continuing his mission work in China. In the process he was surprised to find a Christian presence already in India in the form of the Malabar Christians whom he thought most dreadfully ignorant. Matteo Ricci (1552–1610), born in the year of Xavier’s death and also a Jesuit, won the trust of the Chinese court through his demonstrated mastery of science and technology and exploited this for missionary purposes.

In the Protestant world it was not until the era of Pietism had succeeded that of the Reformation that the churches began to look to wider missionary horizons. In England the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts was founded in 1701. Although much of its work was among European ex-patriots it did provide a mechanism to evangelize non-Christian populations, a theme that in continental Europe came to be championed by Count von Zinzendorf (1700–1760) and the Moravians. By the end of the eighteenth century, Protestants, under the influence of Calvinism modified by the experience of the Evangelical Revival inaugurated what Latourette has called ‘The Great Century’ of missionary endeavor. The Baptist Missionary Society was formed in 1792, with the London Missionary Society following in 1795 and the Church Missionary Society in 1799. In Europe, where Bremen led the way with the founding of a new missionary society in 1819, Hamburg followed in 1822; the Basel Mission was established in 1815, the Rhineland Society in 1828, and the Berlin Society in 1824, two years after French Protestants had formed the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society.

Missiology in such a context was born out of shared experiences and soon implanted within the university curriculum with the establishment of the Halle chair of mission studies in 1896. Missiological scholars networked with one another and with practitioners through the activities of the International Missionary Council, itself a child of the historic World Missionary Conference meeting in Edinburgh in 1910, which played such a crucial part in bringing the Ecumenical Movement to maturity. Consent between Christians on the style and content of Christian mission was not easily obtained and was not resolved by the integration of the IMC into the work of the World Council of Churches in 1961.

Already, by the second half of the nineteenth century, denominational endeavors were supplemented by interdenominational initiatives in which a new kind of missionary society was born, of which Hudson Taylor’s China Inland Mission of 1865 was archetypal. The new Faith Missions did not overtly solicit funds from supporters, who no longer controlled policy, for decision making was now invested in the hands of missionaries to identify with those to whom they ministered in dress and culture.

The century which followed that of Europe’s unstinted investment of human resources and finances in both home and foreign missions, has been a century of Secularization. Fundamentally, it was the fruits of Enlightenment thinking as well as scientific advances which, for many of Europe’s citizens, in a century of troubled political and economic development, pushed matters of faith to the margins of life and concern. In the East the legacy of the years of Marxist constraint and persecution is still painfully present. Regrettably the relationships between evangelical minorities and state orthodoxy have all too often deteriorated since the end of the Cold War, while in the former Yugoslavia, as in the island of Cyprus, ethnic tensions and conflict have all too often set Christians against their Islamic neighbors.

In the West, folk or national churches still claim large baptismal memberships and maintain an excellent range of worship buildings and ancillary facilities, even though regular worshipers form only a small percentage of secular Europe’s population. Europe hardly needed the reminder of the Mexico City Conference on World Mission in 1963 that witness was to take place in all six continents. Those who had been sending nations now desperately needed to receive something of the buoyancy and hope of the churches of the south. Many North American missionary societies increasingly saw Europe as a mission field needing urgent attention.

In its turn this has led to a new relationship between mission agencies and the churches which had been born out of the labors of their missionaries. First, within the Ecumenical Movement younger mission-founded churches sought recognition as churches in their own right, not to be represented by proxy through mission boards. Second, questions were raised about missionary structures and some of the old societies chose to reconstruct themselves more into mission partnership organizations. Perhaps the classic transformation was the way in which the London Missionary Society became first the Congregational Council for World Mission in 1966. This body was in turn fully internationalized as the Council for World Mission in 1977. The new council, it was hoped, recognizing a diversity of leadership through equality of presence around a single partnership table, would combine a commitment to unity with a commitment to mission. In Europe, the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society went through a similar change in 1971 when it became the Communaute Evangelique d’Action Apostolique (CEVAA). Other societies were reluctant both to unite home and foreign mission and to replace the societal model by one of world Partnership.

Europe has seen the uniting of some churches, especially within the Methodist and Reformed traditions, the continuation of large national churches though with serious loss of membership, and the revival of orthodoxy in the context of political freedom but economic constraint. The Roman Catholic Church at the end of the century recognizes other Christians in a way that would have seemed impossible at its beginning. In some countries it has joined national ecumemical traditions. There are good relationships between the Conference of European Churches and the Conference of European Bishops, so they are able to have joint continent-wide celebrations. Moreover, the influence of the Charismatic Movement among Roman Catholic laity and clergy has opened up new and fruitful lines of communication, but a reluctance to go further still emanates from the Vatican on such issues as the recognition of non-Roman orders and the possibilities of shared communion. Undoubtedly, a major aspect of the century has been both the growth of Pentecostalism alongside historic Protestantism and the wide impact of the Charismatic movement both within the mainstream churches and the new house and community churches. Together, these have contributed to growth in Christian witness in Europe.
Europe

JOHN H. Y. BRIGGS

Evangelical Fellowship of Mission Agencies.
The Evangelical Fellowship of Mission Agencies (EFMA) is a voluntary association of more than one hundred missionary agencies. It is composed of both denominational and nondenominational missions from a wide variety of evangelical traditions.

History of the EFMA. The EFMA was formed in the 1940s as part of a larger evangelical resurgence in the United States. The advance of theological liberalism as represented in the old Federated Council of Churches (predecessor of the National Council of Churches) and its missions arm, the Division of Foreign Missions (predecessor of the Division of Overseas Ministries), had given rise to concerns for developing evangelical missions.

Efforts to present an evangelical voice were hampered by continued divisions in outlook and strategy. The moderate voice that developed was called the National Association of Evangelicals (1943), rallying around leaders such as Harold Ockenga and Clyde Taylor.

In 1945 Taylor issued a call for evangelical missions, both denominational and nondenominational, to come together under the aegis of the NAE to deal with missions-related problems. Fourteen of the missions agencies that gathered for this purpose became charter members and launched the EFMA. Taylor served as executive director of the EFMA until 1975. The organization was led by Wade Coggins from 1975 to 1990, and by Paul E. McKaughan from 1990. The EFMA broke new ground by pulling together evangelicals from various traditions, ranging from Baptist to Reformed, Mennonite, Holiness, and Pentecostal. As a variety of evangelical denominations, missions and service agencies, and student ministries joined the association, the EFMA experienced rapid growth.

One of the first moves by the EFMA was to establish a presence in Washington, D.C., so as to represent the concerns connected with the surge in evangelical missionary activity following World War II. For example, the EFMA has intervened to enable evangelical missionaries to obtain passports more easily, and has worked with the U.S. Department of State and with foreign embassies in Washington to provide, where necessary, certification of the reliability of member missions agencies and churches. This has eased the process of obtaining visas for missionaries serving under organizations affiliated with the EFMA.

Already on the scene since 1917 was the Inter-Denominational Foreign Mission Association (IFMA), which served non-Pentecostal missions groups including the historical “Faith Missions.” In the early days of the EFMA, relations between the EFMA and the IFMA were tense, but by the 1960s an era of cooperation began. The two associations formed a joint Latin America Committee that continued until the 1990s. In 1964 they formed the Evangelical Missions Information Service (EMIS) and began publishing the Evangelical Missions Quarterly (EMQ). In the late 1950s Wade Coggins joined Clyde Taylor in the work of EFMA, and in the 1960s E. L. Frizen Jr. became the director of the IFMA. Coggins, Taylor, and Frizen were the architects of many cooperative efforts between the IFMA and the EFMA.

At various times, as needed, there have been joint committees related to Africa, Latin America, Asia, Personnel, Publication, Church Growth, and Theological Education by Extension (TEE).

Through the 1950s the number of missionaries being sent out by the EFMA and the IFMA agencies increased while those related to the National Council of Churches of Christ (NCCC) declined. By 1960 it was noted by missiologists that the combined number of missionaries of EFMA and IFMA agencies was greater than those of the NCC-related groups.

One significant example of EFMA–IFMA cooperation was joint sponsorship in 1966 of the Congress on the Church’s Worldwide Mission, which came to be known as “Wheaton ’66.” Meeting on the campus of Wheaton College, it gathered together hundreds of missions leaders to hear the challenge of reaching the world with the gospel of Jesus Christ. The Congress issued a statement called the Wheaton Declaration, which stated the continuing call to the church to acknowledge the lostness of humanity and the need to take the gospel to all the earth.

EFMA has been a major proponent and supporter of the World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF), an association of more than 120 national organizations of evangelicals worldwide. These national units—variously known as evangelical fellowships, associations, federations, alliances, or councils—frequently have within their membership the churches that have grown out of the work of EFMA and IFMA missions.

EFMA Distinctives. The EFMA is a nonprofit membership organization that provides many services to its members and to the larger evangelical community. In many ways it parallels a trade or professional association. The EFMA concentrates on the needs of its members, seeking to enhance their work and to make the leadership of member organizations more effective in their respective tasks.

While retaining solid commitment on the evangelical theological essentials, member agencies represent a wide range of doctrinal distinctions within the broader evangelical family. Membership is divided almost evenly between denominational and nondenominational groups. They come from traditions including Wesleyan, Reformed, Pentecostal/Charismatic, Baptist, Presbyterian, Lutheran, Mennonite, and Brethren. While denominational groups provided important momentum for the EFMA, independent missions have also been a significant part of the association from the beginning. Missions with specialized ministries and service organizations are also an integral part of the EFMA.

The EFMA has maintained a fundamental commitment to cooperation, a stance that has characterized its philosophy and activity. It has sometimes found itself caught between the broader ecumenical movement and the more separatist evangelicals and fundamentalists. During the years of its ascendancy, the separatist American Council of Churches made vicious attacks on the NAE and EFMA because of their more moderate stance. In time, the EFMA became the largest association of missionary agencies.

Identification and authentication are very important components of EFMA’s ministry. Through its membership standards it provides individuals and churches with a way to recognize missions agencies that conform to specific doctrinal and financial standards.

Strategic planning is another significant role, with the EFMA often serving as a kind of “think tank,” providing opportunities for missions leaders to wrestle with ideas and strategies. Through such forums various missions strategists have launched major new missions concepts and initiatives.

An important channel of catalytic ministry was the formation and development, with the IFMA, of the EMIS. Under the leadership of James Reapsome, EMQ and World Pulse contribute significantly to the distribution of news and ideas about missions. The EMIS has also sponsored significant strategy conferences and seminars.

As a cooperative effort with the IFMA, the annual Personnel Workshop has stimulated significant advances in how missions deal with personnel concerns. Subjects addressed by the workshop include recruitment of missionaries, orientation, training, evaluation, compensation, retirement, pensions, children’s education, and pastoral and psychological care.

The Church Growth Movement was given prominence as an academic discipline and missions strategy through EFMA-sponsored workshops by Donald McGavran during the 1960s. Through the ministry of the EMIS, Church Growth seminars were conducted by international teams (often including McGavran) and local leaders worldwide. Having served as a catalyst in this area, the EFMA left the development of programs and training to others. The Disciple a Whole Nation (DAWN) strategy, for example, has its roots in the Church Growth seminars held in the Philippines.

The EFMA also had a significant role in the development and dissemination of Theological Education by Extension (TEE). Through its joint (with IFMA) subsidiary Committee to Assist Ministry Education Overseas (CAMEO), EFMA supported seminars for missionaries in the preparation of TEE materials. In turn, TEE programs around the world have impacted thousands of lives and provided theological training for church leaders. CAMEO, led by Raymond Bucker and later Lois McKinney, also gave important leadership in developing improved curricula for all levels of leadership training worldwide.

Focus/listening groups constitute another method of strategic planning. EFMA convenes such groups at various locations across the United States, bringing together people from the missions community such as missions executives, pastors, academic leaders, and specialized ministry representatives. Such gatherings provide opportunities for creative thinking and planning as issues and opportunities confronting missions in the coming decades are considered.

Although not without its problems, the EFMA has served a vital role in the task of world evangelization during the past half century. As the church moves into the twenty-first century it will confront an increasingly complex world with a fresh set of opportunities and challenges, and the EFMA can be expected to continue to provide leadership to member groups as they work together to make disciples of Jesus Christ among all nations.

Wade T. Coggins

Evangelical Missiological Society (EMS). A North American organization that brings together professors of missiology and related disciplines, missionaries/missiologists, and missions administrators for the purpose of encouraging fellowship and professional stimulation in the common commitment to carrying out the GREAT COMMISION. Regional and annual meetings provide forums for discussion of missiological issues facing evangelicals in their missions endeavors. Members share a common evangelical theological framework as expressed in the doctrinal statements of the INTERDENOMINATIONAL FOREIGN MISSION ASSOCIATION (IFMA), the EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP OF MISSION AGENCIES (EFMA), and the Fellowship of Frontier Missions.

333
Evangelical Missiological Society (EMS)

Due in large measure to the vigorous leadership of DONALD MCGAVRAN and DAVID J. HESSELGRAVE, the EMS was officially established in November 1990 through a reorganization of the already existing Association of Evangelical Professors of Mission (AEPM). Several factors led to the formation of EMS. First, there was a perceived need for a missiological society composed solely of evangelicals who were committed both to the full authority of Scripture and to the priority of EVANGELISM and CHURCH PLANTING in mission. The already existing AMERICAN SOCIETY OF MISSIOLOGY, with its broader membership base (which includes Roman Catholics and conciliar Protestants) and interests, did not fit this expectation. Second, since membership in the AEPM was restricted to professors of mission, it was felt that a new society was needed that included not only classroom professors but also field practitioners and missions administrators with missiological interests. Third, there was a perceived need for closer ties between the evangelical missions community and the broader evangelical theological world. Through regular joint meetings with the Evangelical Theological Society (ETS), the IFMA, and the EFMA, the EMS was expected to represent evangelical missions interests within the broader evangelical community. Annual meetings of the EMS are held in conjunction with the ETS and, every third year, the IFMA and EFMA.

In addition to its national and regional meetings, the EMS has also sponsored numerous monographs and publications addressing critical missiological issues from an evangelical perspective. The first executive director of the EMS was David Hesselgrave, under whose leadership society membership increased dramatically.

HAROLD A. NETLAND

SEE ALSO Academic Associations of Mission.

Evangelical Missionary Alliance (EMA). The EMA, an evangelical missions association in the United Kingdom, aims to resource, equip, represent, and network its members to promote the cause of global mission. The roots of the EMA can be traced to 1941, when the Fellowship of Interdenominational Missionary Societies (FIMS) was founded. EMS was a prayer fellowship that disbanded in 1957 prior to the 1958 formation of EMA.

The EMA incorporated into its membership both interdenominational and denominational organizations. Its first secretary was Gilbert Kirby, who was then also the secretary of the Evangelical Alliance UK. In 1966, Ernest Oliver was appointed secretary and carried this responsibility in a part-time capacity in addition to being first secretary of Regions Beyond Missionary Union and later a director of Tear Fund. His distinguished work at EMA in 1966–82 provided the foundation for further development in recent years. In 1983 Stanley Davies, the current general secretary, was appointed.

There are four members of staff, including the general secretary. Additionally, a council of twenty-six elected persons is responsible for establishing policy, approving budgets, and appointing senior staff. It is also a forum for debating current missiological issues in the United Kingdom. An appointed executive committee of nine provides guidance for senior staff regarding EMA work.

The EMA has acted as an information service on all aspects of world mission, monitoring world developments, brokering relationships, and advising members on a wide range of issues (financial, legal, technical, training, and missiological). It convenes various continental and functional working groups (e.g., Africa, radio, short-term mission) and consultations of specific regions and issues; it holds specialist seminars and courses (e.g., for missionaries on home assignment, promotion, and publicity for mission). It also convenes an annual conference that addresses key missiological issues. It helps in developing and facilitating youth involvement in mission, and initiates new ventures that raise the profile of world mission in the United Kingdom by encouraging and fostering partnership in all aspects of Christian mission. From time to time, it also provides representation to government and media publishing material.

EMA Cooperation. While the EMA is a separate organization with its own constitution and council, it has a partnership relationship with the Evangelical Alliance UK. The two organizations are committed to working together in mobilizing churches for mission involvement through their joint World Mission Project. Another joint project is the Commission on Unreached Peoples, which aims to foster pan-evangelical reflection and action, evaluate strategic initiatives, and comment on trends and issues requiring action (see also PEOPLES, PEOPLE GROUPS).

The EMA also works with other bodies. It cooperates with Churches Commission on Mission (CCOM), the ecumenical mission network in the United Kingdom, on a number of joint initiatives. such as the Personnel Officers Group and The Mission Finance Officers Group. It also has worked with CCOM health-related issues such as AIDS consultations.

The EMA also cooperates with the European Evangelical Missionary Alliance (EEMA), a network of national missionary associations across Europe. The EEMA holds an annual meeting that is hosted by one of its national member associations. It occasionally calls a Europe-wide consultation on a particular topic, such as EUROCOMET '92, a consultation on the care and education of Missionary Children. Currently the EMA UK office services the EEMA network.

Finally, the EMA is represented on the World Evangelical Fellowship Missions Commission by its general secretary, who is a member of the executive committee. The EMA is committed to the goals of the commission, and participates in its programs.

Membership. There are three categories of EMA membership. First, corporate membership is for organizations that send missionaries into cross-cultural work, agencies that support the cause of world mission in different ways, and organizations that train people for cross-cultural missions. Corporate membership requires members to meet and maintain certain standards with regard to publicity, finance, and relationships. In 1996, there were over 140 corporate members, representing nearly six thousand serving missionaries and staff. This represents over 60 percent of all Christian missionaries, of all denominations, sent from the United Kingdom. Second, affiliate membership is open to non-U.K. originated agencies that work cross-culturally in the United Kingdom. Third, personal membership is available for individuals committed to global mission.

Vision. The EMA vision for the decade from 1995 to 2005 is that it will be a dynamic catalyst, impacting local, national, and global Christian organizations in the education and implementation of world mission. It will be recognized as the key network of successful cooperation for world mission, enabling all U.K. evangelicals to contribute to the goal of a church for every people and promoting missiological reflection and application among colleges, agencies, and churches. It will serve as the primary U.K. voice of evangelical missions in representing, encouraging, educating, and enabling them in effective world mission, and in working with the EMA so that world mission will be high on the agenda of local churches.

Evangelical Missions Conferences. Represented by a broad spectrum of types, evangelical missions conferences have typically shared the common purpose of furthering the worldwide Christian movement. While they have taken a variety of forms, most have tended to fall within one of two main categories. They generally exist either as “think-tanks” for discussing missions strategies, programs, and policies, or as inspirational meetings to rally the Christian public. The latter seek to inform and inspire people in the pews to contribute their prayer and financial support, as well as to send forth their sons and daughters (and increasingly themselves, as short-term and second-career missionaries) to engage directly in the great missionary task.

The most common variety of the inspirational type conferences have been those held annually in local churches (see Church Missions Conferences). These have followed a wide variety of schedules and patterns during their lengthy history, but the long-popular pattern of week-long conferences with nightly meetings has largely given way in our overly programmed and frenetic age to weekend conferences or month-long mission emphases with special events and speakers taking center stage over several weeks of regular meeting times. The common features generally include displays and reports from furloughing missionaries and mission agencies that the church supports as well as messages from one or more gifted speakers.

A related but largely fading tradition among fundamentalist and evangelical Christians is the Bible and missions conference centers, which combine rustic vacation and recreational opportunities with Bible teaching and missionary reports and challenges. While these were very popular during the late nineteenth century and much of the twentieth, they have not fared as well in recent decades with an increasingly affluent and harried American evangelical population. Even where these centers have continued with relative success, the missions emphasis has become much less pronounced.

In terms of perennial conferences, there can be little doubt that the triennial Urbana Mission Conferences are among the most famous and long-lasting. This massively attended event (close to 20,000 in 1996) has been held over the Christmas break since 1948 at the University of Illinois at Urbana, but its roots go all the way back to the quadrennial student conventions begun by the Student Volunteer Movement in 1891. Those gatherings continued until 1936, but ended as the clouds of war gathered. The model was again picked up in 1946 in Toronto by the Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship, which had recently merged with the Student Foreign Missions Fellowship. The gatherings today at Urbana, which combine large doses of both inspiration and information, attract hundreds of mission agencies and thousands of students, missionaries, and others.

Conferences devoted to discussing strategic missions policies, programs, and plans have played an influential role in shaping the North American evangelical missionary movement through the years. Over the last three decades or so, they have been doing the same internationally as well. On the domestic North American scene, a long-standing and influential place has been held by the annual conferences sponsored by the INTERDENOMINATIONAL FOREIGN MISSIONS ASSOCIATION (since 1917), and the EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP OF MISSION AGENCIES, the missionary wing of the National Association of Evangelicals, formerly known as the Evangelical Foreign Missions Association (since 1945). Supplementing their annual meetings, these two associations have also met jointly on a triennial basis since 1963, when their momentous first meeting together gave birth to the Evangelical Missions Information Service. Others among their meetings have also been of weighty importance. Their meeting together at Green Lake, Wisconsin, in 1971, for example, was a pivotal event in the history of evangelical mission and church relationships, providing as it did a strategic examination of both overseas and domestic issues.

Other important issues-oriented missions conferences that take place annually or periodically in North America would include the meetings of groups like the AMERICAN SOCIETY OF MISSIOLOGY, the EVANGELICAL MISSIOLOGICAL SOCIETY, the International Society for Frontier Missions, AIMS (Association of International Mission Services), and ACMC (Advancing Churches in Missions Commitment). There are in addition periodic scholarly conferences devoted to missions topics, generally sponsored by evangelical seminaries and graduate studies programs. An important example would be the June 1986 conference held at Wheaton College, “A Century of World Evangelization: North American Evangelical Missions, 1886–1986.” More regular but smaller study conferences are also sponsored by the Overseas Ministries Study Center, a center for missions scholarship which publishes the International Bulletin of Missionary Research.

On a wider and usually international front, there is a long tradition of the great conferences, some of which would be claimed by both evangelical Christians and others, and some of which would be far less international than others. The earliest of these would include gatherings such as the UNION MISSIONARY CONVENTION (NEW YORK MISSIONARY CONFERENCE, 1854), the CENTENARY CONFERENCE ON THE PROTESTANT MISSIONS OF THE WORLD (LONDON MISSIONARY CONFERENCE, 1888), the ECUMENICAL MISSIONARY CONFERENCE (New York, 1900), the PANAMA CONGRESS (1916), and most notable of all, the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE (EDINBURGH, 1910).

In recent decades a new wave of self-consciously evangelical international conferences have taken place. Beginning in 1966, with the twin events of the CONGRESS ON THE CHURCH’S WORLDWIDE MISSION (Wheaton, 1966) and the WORLD CONGRESS ON EVANGELISM (BERLIN CONGRESS 1966), evangelicals of many stripes, and from around the world, have gathered together in events like these to declare their commitment to global mission in the face of theological, cultural, and pluralistic challenges to its legitimacy. Subsequent global conferences over the period have maintained this emphasis while building on it in various ways.

The most significant of these more recent conferences was the first LAUSANNE CONGRESS ON WORLD EVANGELIZATION (1974). Besides being the most representative global conference up to that time, it was pivotal in at least two ways: First, it refocused in a very important way the attention of the evangelical missions community on the most neglected segment of the world’s population, unreached peoples. Second, through the instrumentation of the Lausanne Covenant, it enhanced the status of social concern ministry as an integral part of gospel witness. Other conferences that followed built on these foundations.

These included the LAUSANNE CONGRESS II ON WORLD EVANGELISM held Manila in 1989, a fact indicating perhaps better than anything else the enduring legacy of Lausanne I. It clearly was a watershed event, having produced in its wake a movement with the same name.

The other really significant series of global conferences that followed in the train of Lausanne I, albeit with a less churchly and more specifically missions-oriented clientele, were the Global Consultations on World Evangelization held in Singapore in 1989, in Seoul in 1995 (see GLOBAL CONSULTATION OF WORLD EVANGELIZATION [GCOWE 95]), and in Pretoria in 1997 (see GLOBAL CONSULTATION OF WORLD EVANGELIZATION ’97 [GCOWE II]). This series of conferences has been particularly significant in mobilizing national evangelical leadership in various countries to the task of reaching the unevangelized peoples and corners of their own land with the gospel, as well as in stirring up a passion for engaging in mission beyond their own borders.

Finally, mention should be made of the WORLD EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP and its network of associations and commissions that sponsor global, regional, and national conferences that serve over 100 million evangelicals globally every year. A significant portion of these have a profound missions impact.

GARY R. CORWIN

Bibliography. J. D. Allan, The Evangelicals: An Illustrated History; J. D. Douglas, ed., Let the Earth Hear His Voice: International Congress on World Evangelization, Lausanne, Switzerland; idem, Proclaim Christ Until He Comes: Lausanne II in Manila; D. M. Howard, Student Power in World Evangelization; H. Lindsell, ed., The Church’s Worldwide Mission; D. McGavran, ed., The Evangelical Movement. In the broadest sense, an “evangelical” movement comprises persons who believe in salvation by faith in Jesus Christ and present the gospel to others. In the context of North America, the term denotes a twentieth-century movement committed to the historic doctrines of the Christian faith, the supreme authority of Scripture in faith and practice, the need for personal conversion, and the imperative of world evangelization. In global Christianity, “evangelicalism” encompasses a broad scope of Christians, movements, and organizations which transcend confessional and ecclesiastical lines.

In the sixteenth century, an early evangelical movement appeared among Roman Catholics in Spain and Italy (e.g., Juan de Valdes) who wished to bring about reform in the institutional church through a more biblically based faith than that of the late medieval church. Much more prominently, however, “evangelical” described the faith of Martin Luther and his followers who initiated the Protestant Reformation. Along with justification by faith, he taught the priesthood of all believers, thereby replacing a sacred hierarchy with a community of faith in which all believers serve as priests before God. Gradually, the term embraced the “Reformed” churches originating with Reformation and Puritanism, already a force for Reformed theology in the Church of England, sought to bring about the restoration of New Testament Christianity and a Christian society. Its influence extended to the Pietist movement in Germany and the later evangelical revival in England. Celebrated Puritan leaders included Richard Baxter and John Owen; in America, Puritanism reached its peak in the spiritual and theological writings of Jonathan Edwards.

In continental Europe, Pietism emerged in the Lutheran and Reformed churches. Though faithful to Luther’s teaching on justification, it focused on the believer’s need of regeneration. Lutheran Pietists Philipp Jakob Spener and August Hermann Francke emphasized a “heartfelt” conversion, individual and family prayers, devotional study of the Bible with applications for the Christian life, hope for the world as expressed in Christian social action, and foreign missions. The movement soon spilled over into Mennonite, Brethren, and Quaker churches. Jansenism and quietism in the Roman Catholic Church were part of the larger spiritual awakening at the time associated with Pietism.

The mass evangelism of Charles and John Wesley and George Whitfield advanced the evangelical revival in eighteenth-century England. In 1738, at a Moravian meeting on Aldersgate Street in London, John Wesley found new meaning in the doctrine of justification by faith when he received personal assurance of his own salvation. While the “Methodists,” as their converts were called, eventually left the Church of England, Anglican evangelicalism continued, led in part by Charles Simeon and William Wilberforce. Across the Atlantic, stirred by revivalists like Jonathan Edwards and George Whitfield, the Great Awakening secured for evangelicals an important role in the development of the United States. In nineteenth-century America, evangelical Christianity reigned as the dominant faith and forged the nation’s values and religious consciousness. Revivalism, promoted by evangelists such as Charles G. Finney, offered hope for a spiritual awakening that would eliminate social evils and bring about the establishment of a Christian republic. African-American churches guided by leaders Richard Allen (African Methodist Episcopal Church), Thomas Paul (Baptist), and others, also taught evangelical doctrine. Social activists, represented by the later Ida B. Wells-Barnett (Methodist), found strength for their struggles for racial equality in a deep evangelical faith.

The Wesleyan holiness movement, fired by the teachings of John Fletcher, Phoebe Palmer, and William Arthur, highlighted the postconversion experience of “entire sanctification” for the perfection of the believer and purification of society. Reformed revivalists Dwight L. Moody, Hannah Whitall Smith, and speakers at the annual Keswick Conventions in England viewed this second experience of grace as the beginning of the “Higher Life,” a fully consecrated life empowered for Christian service. Both holiness camps referred to this as baptism in the Holy Spirit.

From the holiness taproot grew the Pentecostal Movement shortly after the turn of the twentieth century. It originated with a revival at Charles F. Parham’s Bethel Bible School in Topeka, Kansas, in 1901. The movement became worldwide several years later as a result of the interracial Azusa Street revival (1906–9) in Los Angeles, California, led by the African-American William J. Seymour. With scores of succeeding revivals in North America and Europe, a new diaspora of missionaries left for the mission lands. Concurrent with the Azusa Street revival, a Pentecostal revival commenced in India in 1906.

Between the Civil War and World War I, the hegemony of evangelical Christianity declined...
Evangelical Movement

due to rapid changes in the culture. Waves of immigration brought large numbers of Roman Catholics, Eastern Orthodox Christians, and Jews to the American shores that threatened evangelical dominance. Prompted by the religious skepticism of the Enlightenment, Darwinian evolution, and the radical higher criticism of the Bible coming from German and English academic circles, questions arose about the ultimate claims of the Christian faith. These challenges appeared to undermine the historical integrity of Scripture, creationism, miracles, and the divinity and resurrection of Christ. Furthermore, the growing appeal of the social gospel convinced numerous evangelicals that social action was now replacing the priority of personal conversion in some church bodies. Many were influenced by dispensational premillennialism with its negative assessment of human progress and warning of the imminent return of Jesus Christ and impending judgment on the wicked. In response to these assaults on traditional Christian beliefs, conservatives in mainline churches sought to preserve theological orthodoxy by controlling denominational structures and seminaries. This agenda consequently led to the fundamentalist-modernist controversy that peaked in the 1920s. Modernists endeavored to reconcile Christian beliefs with scientific discoveries and higher criticism, and concentrated their energies on the social applications of the gospel. Some endorsed forms of religious pluralism. Fundamentalists, as the conservatives were called, coming largely from the Reformed sector of evangelicalism, denied the Enlightenment notion of the innate goodness of humankind and fought modernist tenets. Losing the battle in their denominations, fundamentalists like the New Testament scholar J. Gresham Machen, Carl T. McIntire, founder of the American Council of Christian Churches, and the Canadian Baptist T. T. Shields, encouraged conservatives to separate from them.

Fundamentalists resisted changes that imperiled their vision of a Christian society, the truth claims of non-Christian religions, scientific arguments against biblical teachings on the origins of life, as well as the ecumenical movement and the Pentecostal movement. After the famous “Monkey Trial” in 1925 at Dayton, Tennessee, in which John T. Scopes was convicted of illegally teaching evolutionary theory in a public school, the public viewed fundamentalism as antiscientific and obscurantist.

By the 1940s, conservatives J. Elwin Wright, Harold J. Ockenga, Carl F. H. Henry, Billy Graham, and others rejected the denominational separatism and intellectual and cultural isolationism of fundamentalism and became the spokesmen for the “New Evangelicals.” The evangelistic crusades of Billy Graham, which first gained national attention in 1948, played a crucial part in the shaping of “neo-evangelicalism.” Key institutions also served the new movement: among them, the National Association of Evangelicals (NAE [1943]), Wheaton College (1869), Fuller Theological Seminary (1947), and Christianity Today magazine (1956). These and similar institutions fostered a “renaissance” of evangelical biblical and theological scholarship beginning in the 1950s. The elections of evangelicals as presidents of the United States in recent decades has not only marked the resurgence of evangelicalism, but signaled widely different political orientations within.

The organization of the National Black Evangelical Association (1963), and to the north, the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada (1964), represented other notable milestones. While the NAE preempted the term “evangelical,” many evangelicals remained within their denominations, most of which were constituent members of the National Council of Churches (NCC) and the World Council of Churches (WCC). Three large evangelical denominations—the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod, Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod, and the Southern Baptist Convention—have chosen to remain outside conciliar bodies.

Modern evangelicalism now encompasses an almost unbridgeable diversity of Christians, all loyal to the gospel message, but with varying theological and spiritual orientations. Major groupings consist of Lutherans, Presbyterians, Anglicans, Pentecostals, Baptists, Wesleyans, Mennonites, Brethren, Churches of Christ, and others in the Restoration Movement. To these can be added Messianic Jews, nondenominational Christians, and constituents of parachurch agencies (e.g., Campus Crusade for Christ). Although controversial, some observers have listed Seventh-Day Adventists; and “Jesus Name” or Oneness Pentecostals belong.

The Charismatic Movement has magnified evangelical witness in the mainline denominations, highlighted the ministry of the Holy Spirit in the life of the believer, and notably influenced contemporary Christian music and worship styles across a wide range of churches. Noted leaders included Dennis Bennett (Episcopal Church), Larry Christenson (Evangelical Lutheran Church in America), Demos Shakarian (Full Gospel Business Men’s Fellowship International), and David J. du Plessis (Assemblies of God). In a significant development, some charismatics in the Roman Catholic Church have identified themselves as “evangelical Catholics.”

In England, the perceived new threat of Roman Catholicism and the decline of evangelical doctrine led to the founding of the Evangelical Alliance in 1846 to sponsor conferences and promote biblical Christianity, an international week of prayer, aid to Protestant minorities, and the evangelization of the world. A century later, it became a founding member of the World Evangelical Fellowship (1951). Anglican Evangelicalism advanced under the tutelage of John R. W. Stott, James I. Packer, and Anglicans in other countries such as FESTO KIVENGERE in Uganda and Leon Morris in Australia.

Protestant missions began as a result of renewal movements subsequent to the Reformation. While the Reformers exhibited little interest in evangelizing non-Christians (see Reformation and Mission), the rediscovering of the gospel and the value placed on the translation of the Scriptures into the vernacular languages made a profound impact on the course of the missions movement. Indicative of the complex origins of Protestant missions, early efforts varied from chaplains working for the Dutch East India Company, to Puritan missions to Native Americans in New England, and in England the founding of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (1698–99) and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG) (1701).

From Germany came the Danish-Halle Mission (1705) and Moravian Missions (1732), the latter under the leadership of the Pietist Nikolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf.

Missions gained more ground with the publication of William Carey’s Enquiry into the Obligations of Christians to Use Means for the Conversion of the Heathen and the organization of the Baptist Missionary Society, both in 1792. Many more societies emerged, including the London Missionary Society (1795), the Church Missionary Society (1799), the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (1810), the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society (1813), African Baptist Missionary Society (1815), Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions (1831), Woman’s Union Missionary Society (1861), and the Woman’s Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church (1869). The evangelical unity of these agencies and the several hundred mission societies that followed laid the theological basis for Comity agreements in the nineteenth century and the international missionary conferences (e.g., Centenary Conference on the Protestant Missions of the World [London Missionary Conference, 1888]).

University and college students were inspired to dedicate their lives to foreign missions at Dwight L. Moody’s Northfield Conference in Massachusetts in 1886. At the gathering, Arthur T. Pierson, an ardent evangelical and later editor of the Missionary Review of the World, challenged the students with the watchword, “The evangelization of the world in this generation.” From this event arose the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions (SVM) and leaders such as John R. Mott (World Student Christian Federation) and Robert P. Wilder (SVM traveling secretary).

As the missions movement progressed, practices that centered on establishing schools and charitable institutions came under fire from critics who favored apostolic methods (e.g., Matt. 10:7–10). Usually impelled by premillennial eschatology and dissatisfied with the slow rate of conversions, independent Faith Missions (e.g., China Inland Mission founded by J. Hudson Taylor in 1865) aimed their attention primarily at direct evangelism. Radical evangelicals like A. B. Simpson, founder of the Christian and Missionary Alliance (1881), anticipated that in the end-times the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Joel 2:28–29) would bring miraculous Signs and Wonders (Acts 5:12) that would once more accompany gospel proclamation. A novel approach to training unfolded with “Bible institutes,” which prepared ministers and missionaries for the Faith Missions. Early schools included the Missionary Training Institute (Nyack College) founded by Simpson in 1882; Chicago Evangelization Society (Moody Bible Institute) by Dwight L. Moody in 1889; Boston Missionary Training Institute (Gordon College and Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary) by A. J. Gordon in 1889; and Toronto Bible Training School (Tychon College and Seminary) by Elmore Harris in 1894.

In the twentieth century, doubts about the need for sending missionaries took a heavy toll on Protestant missions and after midcentury, the number of missionaries in most of the older denominations declined. In contrast, the missions that remained conservative in theology grew. Networking among them resulted in the formation of the Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association (1971) and the Evangelical Fellowship of Mission Agencies (1945), an NAE affiliate. Subsequent efforts at cooperation have included the Congress on the Church’s Worldwide Mission (Wheaton Congress, 1966), World Congress on Evangelism (Berlin Congress, 1966), Lausanne Congress on World Evangelism (1974), and International Conference for Itinerant Evangelists (1983). Regional networks have been formed to further evangelism and achieve other objectives (e.g., theological education, social action, relief work).

In addition to nondenominational faith missions, a variety of parachurch organizations have extended vital services. Along with the contributions of the United Bible Societies (1946), Wycliffe Bible Translators (1934) has trained workers to reduce languages to writing, produce grammars, and translate the Scriptures. Continuing the tradition of the SVM, Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship (1936) and its triennial Urban Mission Conferences in the United States have inspired thousands of students to become missionaries. Youth With a Mission (YWAM [1960]) has created opportunities for youth to evangelize overseas. Mission Aviation Fellowship (1944) has provided air transport and communications assistance for missionaries. World Vision (1950) has focused on relief and development activities. Others have engaged in publishing ventures, and radio and television evangelism. The International Council for Evangelical Theological Education (ICETE) (1980) has encouraged the upgrading of standards in Bible colleges and seminaries and promoted regional accrediting associations.
Evangelical Movement

Pentecostalism ushered in a new pattern in missions, based on the radical expectancy of miracles in ministry (e.g., physical healings, deliverance from chemical addictions), glossolalia and the gifts of the Holy Spirit for spiritual empowerment, and the encouragement of Indigenous Churches. Embracing many of the same beliefs, the charismatic movement influenced missions in church bodies connected to NCC and WCC. Independent charismatics have found assistance for their missions in the Association of International Mission Services (1985). Believing that supernatural interventions and “power encounters” will help bring closure to the Great Commission before the imminent return of Christ, “Third Wave” and “New Apostolic Reformation” mission endeavors have grown under the tutelage of John Wimber, Charles H. Kraft, and C. Peter Wagner (see also New Apostolic Reformation Missions).

Evangelical Christianity has grown significantly outside of North America and Europe in the last half-century. Major advances have taken place in Latin America, sub-Saharan Africa, Asia, and Oceania. Christians in these areas, the majority of whom now exhibit features of Pentecostal/charismatic spirituality and are vibrantly concerned for world evangelization. They have begun sending out their own missionaries in one of the momentous developments in modern Christianity (see also Non-Western Mission Boards and Societies).

GARY B. MCGEE

Evangelical Theology. The basic relationship between missions and evangelical theology can be defined in terms of two doctrines: bibliology and soteriology.

Evangelicals’ view of Scripture is characterized by a strong commitment to divine inspiration, inerrancy, and the grammatical-historical method of exegesis. But more than any other factor, it has been the evangelicals’ unyielding adherence to the unconditional authority of Scripture that has shaped their approach to mission. Evangelicals view the Bible as a reservoir of divinely revealed truth, its authority being traced back to the absolute authority of God himself. That being the case, all prescriptive statements of Scripture must be followed to the letter.

This conviction naturally leads to an emphasis on obedience as a motivation for service. Compliance with God’s own commission to make disciples of all nations (Matt. 28:19) is a theme that has echoed down through every epoch of the modern missionary movement and has repeatedly loosed new waves of activity. The Student Volunteer Movement is a good example of this. Between 1890 and 1920 the movement was able to motivate upwards of 1,800 volunteers by appealing to the Christian’s responsibility to go. Typical of this are the words of one of the movement’s leaders. According to ROBERT E. SPEER, “everyone of us rests under a sort of obligation to give life and time and possessions to the evangelization of the souls everywhere that have never heard of Jesus Christ, and we are bound to go, unless we can offer some sure ground of exemption” (Wallstrom, 16). He firmly believed that the only thing that could prevent successful evangelization of the world was the Christian’s disobedience.

The same motive, obedience, still characterizes much of evangelicalism’s recruitment of new missionaries. And the case is almost exclusively based on Christ’s authoritative command as recorded in Matthew 28:19–20.

Soteriology is the other doctrine that has shaped the evangelical approach to mission. According to evangelical understanding of salvation, the necessity of mission arises, on the one hand, out of the spiritual need of humanity, and on the other hand, out of the redemptive work of Christ. As a result of the fall into sin human beings are alienated from God, live under his anger, and will suffer eternal damnation. However, Jesus’ vicarious death and resurrection achieved a basis for justification. This basic soteriological orientation has been applied to the missionary task in two ways.

First, every individual who has not accepted the message of God’s grace by faith is lost. There are no exceptions, since Scripture clearly expresses the fact that all have sinned (Rom. 3:23), that all sinners are subject to God’s wrath (Eph. 2:3). Of course, it has become especially difficult for moderns to accept the idea that people who through no fault of their own have not heard will be damned. Recently there have been several attempts to reevaluate or soften the impact of these verses. Nevertheless, the lostness of the un-evangelized has been and remains the position of most evangelicals (see also ANNIHILATION and UNIVERSALISM).

Second, the offer of salvation is addressed to all of humanity. Perhaps it is because of the uncomfortable consequences of the previous thesis that some seek a way out by interpreting passages like 2 Corinthians 5:18 in a universalistic way. But, whatever discomfort or reservations they might have, most evangelicals strictly reject all forms of universalism, since the salvation which has been made available to all can only be appropriated by means of an individual act of faith. As a result, evangelical missionary efforts have been consistently driven by a desire to reach everyone with the gospel message. This has been done under the banner of slogans such as “evangelize the world in this generation.” And a great deal has been made of statistics that show the disproportionate relationship between the Christian missionary force and that part of the world’s population that remains UNEVANGELIZED.

Combined with the emphasis on the necessity of individual faith, this global outreach places the personal act of the will at center stage. All other responses (e.g., good works or general religiosity) are rejected as false or misleading and are in all likelihood some form of SYNCRETISM, in which case, the essential element of the gospel, the necessity of CONVERSION, is lost. There is no way around personal faith in Christ and this message of salvation must be offered to all.

All of this has had a pronounced and sometimes stifling effect on the level of theological activity among evangelicals engaged in mission. The basic theological framework described above is so widely accepted that one may indeed speak of a consensus. This is borne out by the documents produced by various conferences convened by evangelicals, which reflect a high degree of theological commonality. But one of the unintended results is that many within the evangelical missiological community have assumed that because there is general agreement on basic theological issues we should focus our resources exclusively on the practical contingencies of completing that task. Driven by a desire for achievement, they have abandoned theological reflection and have turned to the secular marketplace in search of methodological guarantors of success. Encouraged by the prospect of new levels of productivity, they uncritically apply social scientific or managerial techniques to essentially theological issues (see also SOCIAL SCIENCES).

Unfortunately, this tends to obviate the advantages of consensus, by allowing activism to blind us to the theologically fluid nature of missionary encounter. For example, the ongoing encounter with non-Christian religions generates a steady stream of theological questions. Theological consensus does not obviate the need for what might be called dynamic field theologizing, since problems of a primarily theological nature do not yield to nontheological (social scientific) solutions.

This form of theological atrophication would not be so difficult to overcome if it had not been replaced by other, nontheological paradigms. Perhaps it is the elevation of pragmatism to the status of a missiological norm that has led to an uncritical acceptance of applied social science. This trend has continued unabated during the last few years. There can be little doubt that the insights and techniques of social science are useful. Nevertheless as Os Guinness observes, “it is distressing to witness the lemming-like rush of church leaders who forget theology in the charge after the latest insights of sociology—regardless of where the ideas come from or where they lead” (Guinness, 157).

Just where have these ideas led? To a missionary enterprise in which there is little place for God and his enabling Spirit. The often stunning effectiveness of these methodologies has deceived some into thinking that (or acting as though) ministry can be managed quite nicely without God. If human agency is viewed as the primary engine of missions, it should come as no surprise that theology has been neglected. But if the majority of missiological problems are actually theological in nature, theological skills will have to be recultivated and reasserted in every area of mission.

EDWARD ROMMEN

Evangelism. Evangelism announces that salvation has come. The verb “evangelize” literally means to bear good news. In the noun form, it translates “gospel” or “evangel.” The angels’ proclamation of Christ’s birth is typical of the more than 130 times the term in its various forms occurs in the New Testament: “Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For there is born to you this day in the city of David a Savior, who is Christ the Lord” (Luke 2:10–11).
Evangelism

The Hebrew term translated in the Septuagint by the same word appears in the writings of Isaiah: “How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that brings good news . . .” (Isa. 52:7). Again, speaking of the ministry of the coming Messiah, the prophet writes, “The Spirit of the Lord God is upon Me; because the Lord has anointed Me to preach good tidings . . .” (Isa. 61:1, 2).

Jesus interpreted his mission as fulfillment of this promise (Luke 4:18, 19). He saw himself as an evangelist, announcing the coming of the Kingdom of God. This message was to be proclaimed in the context of demonstrated compassion for the bruised and forgotten people of the world.

At this point, there is often confusion among Christians today. Some contend that evangelism involves only the gospel declaration, while others identify it essentially with establishing a caring presence in society or seeking to rectify injustice.

It should be clear that both are necessary. One without the other leaves a distorted impression of the good news. If Jesus had not borne the sorrows of people and performed deeds of mercy among them, we might question his concern. On the other hand, if he had not articulated the gospel, we would not have known why he came, nor how we could be saved. To bind up the wounds of the dying, while withholding the message that could bring deliverance to their souls, would leave them still in bondage. Mere social concern does not address the ultimate need of a lost world (see also Evangelism and Social Responsibility).

A Revelation of God. What makes the announcement so compelling is its divine source. Contrary to the opinion of popular humanism, evangelism does not originate in the valiant groping of persons seeking a higher life. Rather, it comes as a revelation of God who is ever seeking to make a people to display his glory.

The deposit of this divine quest is the canon of inspired Scripture. As the Word of God, “without error in all that it affirms” (The Lausanne Covenant, Section 2) the Bible is the objective authority for the gospel. To be sure, it does not pretend to answer every curious question of humankind, but what is written does show God’s way of salvation to an honest heart. Not surprisingly, then, theological systems that compromise Scriptural verities do not produce evangelism.

The revelation makes us see how we have all turned to our own way. Such arrogance cannot be ignored by a just God, since it is an affront to his holiness. Inevitably, then, the sinner must be separated from God. Furthermore, his wrath upon iniquity cannot be annulled as long as the cause of evil remains. Since life is unending, all the spiritual consequences of sin continue on forever in Hell.

Knowing, therefore, what is at stake, evangelism strikes at the heart of Sin. Though the disclosure of human rebellion and its result may be bad news, still the gospel shines through it all, for God judges so that he might save.

Incarnate in Christ. The redeeming work of the Trinity focuses in the person of the Son. In Jesus Christ evangelism becomes incarnate. Jesus is not God apart from the human, nor the human apart from God; he is God and mankind united in one Personality. In this perfect union of eternal consciousness, Christ becomes the reconciling center of the gospel. All that took place in salvation before his coming was in anticipation of him. All that has taken place since his coming is accomplished in his Name—the only “Name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved” (Acts 4:12).

The apostolic gospel does not minimize the exclusive claims of Christ. He alone is Lord, and with “all authority” (Matt. 28:18), he stands among us, and says, “I am the way, the truth, and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me” (John 14:6).

His mission reaches its climax on the hill of Calvary. There in the fullness of time Jesus bore our sins in his own body on the cross, suffering in our stead, “the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God” (1 Peter 3:18).

Christ’s bodily resurrection and subsequent ascension into heaven bring the cross forcibly to our attention. For when one dies who has the power to rise from the grave, in all honesty we must ask why he died in the first place. To this penetrating question the gospel unequivocally answers, “Jesus . . . was delivered for our offenses, and was raised again for our purification” (Rom. 4:24, 25).

Experiencing Grace. In confronting the reality of the cross, we are made supremely aware of God’s love. It is “not that we loved God, but that he loved us,” and “gave himself” for us (1 John 4:10; Gal. 2:20). Perhaps we could understand one giving his life for a righteous person, or for a friend, but “God demonstrates his own love toward us, in that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us” (Rom. 5:8).

Heaven is the wonder of the gospel. Nothing deserved! Nothing earned! In our complete helplessness, bankrupt of all natural goodness, God moved in and did for us what we could not do for ourselves. It is all of grace—unmerited love. From beginning to end, salvation is the “gift of God” (Eph. 2:8).

The invitation is to all. “Whosoever will may come” (Rev. 22:17). Though the enabling power to believe is entirely of grace, the responsibility to respond to God’s word rests upon the sinner. We must receive the gift in true repentance and faith.
It means that we choose to turn from the pretense of self-righteousness, and with a broken and contrite spirit, trust ourselves unto the loving arms of Jesus. Until there is such a Conversion, no one can enter the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 18:3).

Through this commitment, the believer is introduced to a life of forgiveness, love and true freedom. “Old things have passed away; behold, all things have become new” (2 Cor. 5:17). There is an actual partaking of the divine nature, so that a regenerated person begins to live in the Savior. It is this inward dynamic of sanctification that makes Christianity a saving force for holiness in the world. Out of it flows compassionate deeds of mercy and bold evangelistic outreach.

A Ministering Church. Faithful witness of the gospel calls forth the church. All who heed the call and live by faith in the Son of God—past, present, and future—become part of this commission of the saints.

As the church is created by evangelism, so it becomes the agent of God in dispensing the gospel to others. Unfortunately, our mission to the whole world may be forgotten, and we accept the same delusion as did the self-serving religious community of Jesus’ day. Their attitude was seen in bold relief at the cross when they said in derision, “He saved others; himself he cannot save” (Mark 15:31). What they failed to realize was that Jesus had not come to save himself; he came to save us; “The Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many” (Mark 10:4); he came “to seek and to save that which was lost” (Luke 19:10).

Those who take up his cross, as we are bidden, enter into this mission. In this service, whatever our gifts, every person in the church is “sent” from God, even as we are called into Christ’s ministry (John 17:18; 20:21).

Underscoring this mission, before returning to the Father in heaven, Jesus commanded his church to “go and make disciples of all nations” (Matt. 28:18). The Great Commission is not some special assignment for a few clerical workers; it is a way of life; it is the way Jesus directed his life with a few disciples while he was among us, and now the way he expects his church to follow.

Wrapped up in this lifestyle is his plan to evangelize the world. For disciples—learners of Christ—will follow him, and as they learn more of him, they will grow in his likeness, while also becoming involved in his ministry. So they, too, will begin to make disciples, teaching them in turn to do the same, until, through the process of multiplication, the whole world will hear the gospel.

Bringing people to Christ is not the only expression of the church’s ministry, of course. But it is the most crucial, for it makes possible every other church activity. Without evangelism the church would soon become extinct.

Evangelism

The Way of the Spirit. Let it be understood, however, that this work is not contrived by human ingenuity. God the Holy Spirit is the enabler. What God administers as the Father and reveals as the Son, he accomplishes as the Third Member of the Trinity. So the mission of Christ through the church becomes the acts of the Spirit. He lifts up the Word, and as Jesus is glorified, convicted men and women cry out to be saved. Evangelism is finally God’s work, not ours.

We are merely the channel through which the Spirit of Christ makes disciples.

That is why even to begin the Christian life one must be “born again” (John 3:3). “It is the Spirit who gives life; the flesh profits nothing” (John 6:63). Likewise, it is the Spirit who sustains and nourishes the developing relationship. He calls the church to ministry. He leads us in prayer. He dispenses gifts for service. Through the Spirit’s strength, faith comes alive in obedience and by his impartation of grace, we are being conformed to the image of our Lord.

Everything, then, depends upon the Spirit’s possession of the sent ones, the church. Just as those first disciples were told to tarry until they received the promised power, so must we (Luke 24:49; Acts 2:4). The spiritual inducement at Pentecost, by whatever name is called, must be a reality in our lives, not as a distant memory, but as a present experience of the reigning Christ. Hindrances that obstruct his dominion must be confessed, and our hearts cleansed so that the Spirit of holiness can fill us with the love of God. Though we can never contain all of him, he wants all of us—to love and adore him with all that we are and all that we hope to be. Any evangelistic effort that circumvents this provision will be as lifeless as it is barren. The secret of New Testament evangelism is to let the Holy Spirit have his way in our lives.

The Glorious Consummation. Whatever may be our method of presenting the gospel, and wherever God may place us in his service, we labor in the confidence that his world mission will be finished. Evangelism, as the heartbeat of Christian ministry, simply directs our energy to that goal toward which history is moving, when the completed church will be presented “faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy” (Jude 24).

Indeed, in Christ the Kingdom of God is already present in the hearts of those that worship him, and the day is hastening when his kingdom will come to fruition in the new Jerusalem. The church militant, like an ever-advancing army, will at last shatter the principalities of Satan and storm the gates of hell. In the councils of eternity the celebration has already begun (Rev. 7:9, 10:11:15). Anything we do which does not contribute to that destiny is an exercise in futility.
Evangelism

Our work now on earth may seem slow, and sometimes discouraging, but we may be sure that God’s program will not suffer defeat. Someday the trumpet will sound, and the Son of Man, with his legions, shall descend from heaven in trailing clouds of glory, and he will reign over his people gathered from every tongue, every tribe, every nation. This is the reality which always rings through evangelism.

The King is coming! While it does not yet appear what we shall be, “we know that, when he is revealed, we shall be like him” (1 John 3:2). And before him every knee shall bow and “every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father” (Phil. 2:11).

ROBERT E. COLEMAN

SEE ALSO Cross-Cultural Evangelism; Cross-Cultural Ministry; Crusade Evangelism; Lifestyle Evangelism; Presence Evangelism; AND Proclamation Evangelism.

Evangelism and Social Responsibility. Over the past two centuries the modern Protestant movement has planted vibrant churches around the world. Today, the center of Christianity is moving to these younger churches. But this growth is not without its problems. One area of deep concern in many evangelical circles is the division between evangelism and social concerns. Despite many efforts to present a whole gospel, the effects of this dualism in missions and churches are still apparent.

The roots of this division go back to medieval Europe, where churches and monasteries were centers of worship, evangelism, literacy, relief, medicine, and agriculture. The WORLDVIEW of the Middle Ages, rooted in biblical thought, divided reality between the Creator and the creation. In this view God was intimately involved in all of his creation, and all creation, including both heavenly and earthly concerns, was one. That same unity is evident in the ministry of Jesus, which reflects a wholism that does not seem natural today.

By the eighteenth century, the church felt called to worship and to mission, but education, medicine, and agriculture became the domains of science and the modern nation-state. The shift was due mainly to the rediscovery of Greek thought, especially Greek dualism, which separated spirit and matter, supernatural and natural, and heavenly and earthly affairs. The absorption of dualism theologica was formalized by Thomas Aquinas. The result was the increasingly sharp distinction between religion and science, or between eternal and earthly needs.

On the surface, the modern mission movement began in the nineteenth century with a whole gospel. Missionaries planted churches, and established schools, hospitals, handicraft projects, and agricultural centers. They cared for the starving during times of famine, and called for social justice. Underneath these activities, however, the dualistic perspective persisted. It did not help that missionaries often cooperated with the colonial agenda, the goal of which was “civilizing” their new territories. Evangelism and church planting were seen as the marks of Christianity. Education, medicine, and agriculture were signs of civilization. In many cases, however, people accepted science, technology, and other manifestations of modern rational thought introduced by the missionaries, but rejected the gospel they proclaimed. That is why some observers conclude that Christian missionaries have unwittingly been a force for SECULARIZATION worldwide.

A second consequence of this dualism was that missions organized schools, hospitals, and agricultural projects based on Western models that did not fit local contexts. The operation of these institutions reflected the division between evangelism and social concern. Specialists provided services in a compartmentalized way that communicated something less than an integrated gospel. Furthermore, these institutions required large amounts of money and Western-style organizational skill, most of which had to be imported from outside. Later, when missions began handing over the administration of the institutions to local churches, local leaders often saw them as heavy burdens which their churches could not easily sustain.

The division between evangelism and social concern reached its peak in the early twentieth century in the battles between liberals and fundamentalists over the emerging Social Gospel movement. Liberal churches virtually abandoned aggressive evangelism in favor of relief and development ministries of all kinds. Conservative churches increasingly focused their attention on evangelism and church planting, and left relief and development tasks to parachurch agencies. That emphasis has created the impression in many parts of the world that the church deals with ultimate concerns, but has little to contribute to the urgent needs of the contemporary world.

In recent years there have been efforts in evangelical circles to restore a holistic understanding of the gospel. In 1966 the CONGRESS ON THE CHURCH’S WORLDWIDE MISSION was held at Wheaton, Illinois, sponsored by the Evangelical Foreign Mission Association (now the EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP OF MISSION AGENCIES) and the INTERDENOMINATIONAL FOREIGN MISSION ASSOCIATION, agencies that represented at that time 102 mission boards and 30,000 missionaries. The conggress, which was comprised of nearly 1,000 delegates from 71 countries, wrote The Wheaton Declaration, in which they called on the church to address contemporary issues such as racism, war, the population explosion, poverty, and the disintegration of the family. This growing concern for a Christian response to social problems was due, in part, to the influence of the large number of participants from outside the United States whose churches could not ignore the social evils around them. Also in 1966, the World Congress on Evangelism gathered in Berlin, sponsored by Christianity Today. That congress reaffirmed the importance of proclaiming the gospel, but in the closing statement condemned racism and called for repentance and unity among Christians in addressing the world's desperate needs. In the regional congresses that followed (Singapore, Minneapolis, Bogota), the involvement of the church in social issues was a recurring theme. In 1973, the Workshop on Evangelicals and Social Concern drafted the Chicago Declaration of Evangelical Social Concern which represented another attempt to transcend the traditional dichotomy between evangelism and social responsibility.

The Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization (1974) took a major step toward resolving the tension between these two concerns by affirming that both evangelism and social responsibility are essential to the mission of the church. The Lausanne Covenant stated that “The message of salvation also implies a message of judgment upon every form of alienation, oppression, and discrimination, and we should not be afraid to denounce evil and injustice wherever they exist” (section 5). The plea to keep evangelism and social concerns together was strengthened by a statement of support that was signed by some five hundred Lausanne participants. This effort to bring evangelism and social responsibility together generated sharp criticisms on the part of some mission leaders in North America. But, particularly for those in the Two-Thirds World, it was an invitation to proclaim a gospel (see also Holism, Biblical).

The Lausanne Statement on the Church in Response to Human Need (Wheaton, 1983) sponsored by the World Evangelical Fellowship. Both affirmed that evangelism cannot be divorced from meaningful involvement with people in all their needs. In recent years, Christian agencies such as World Vision International, Food for the Hungry, the Mennonite Central Committee, and the Adventist Development and Relief Agency have initiated theological and administrative reflections on how to implement the proclamation of the whole gospel (see also Holism, Biblical).

It is clear that as long as evangelism and social concern are seen as two separate entities that need to be integrated, the dualism that has weakened missions will remain. Some will reduce one to the other: conservatives will see social ministries as means to evangelistic ends and liberals will see social ministries as ends in themselves. Others will try to balance the two by claiming that one is more important than the other, with many conservatives arguing that evangelism is the top priority while liberals counter that the church must concentrate on other, more pressing needs. Both approaches fail to integrate the different strands of the gospel into a single whole.

We will proclaim a whole gospel only when we reject the dualism between supernatural and natural realities, religion and science, and evangelism and social concerns. Many young churches in other cultures have taken a step in this direction by making no distinction between the spiritual and the material, or between supernatural and natural realms. Many of them model integrated ministries to whole persons and societies. Evangelical mission agencies and churches are catching on as well. In partnership with younger churches, they are beginning to focus on people more than tasks, on holistic development more than relief, on transformation more than the simple delivery of services (see also Transformational Development), and on the formation of living communities of faith rather than bureaucratic institutions. Some agencies are backing away from the overspecialization that characterizes Western approaches to life and are offering a more generalized sort of training with holistic ministry in mind (see also Holistic Mission).

The push for holism draws strength from the rediscovery of the church as a healing community where Christians gather to Worship, to bear Witness to the world, and to minister healing, in the fullest sense of the term, to people. It is also fueled by a renewed emphasis on a theology of the kingdom of God, within which evangelism, church, ministry, and prophetic witness are parts of the whole. This kingdom, however, cannot be defined by theories of modern utopias, as in Marxism and capitalism. It is defined by Christ, its King. He and his incarnation as a human...
Evangelism and Social Responsibility unite God's concerns for all creation, now and for eternity. His salvation includes not only eternal life in the presence of God, but also a new earth characterized by righteousness, peace, justice, and fullness of life. In a word, Shalom is the ideal to which individual Christians as well as the corporate church aspires. As Dan Fountain points out, "God's plan for the world is this: that all persons everywhere, in every nation, know God's saving health and be delivered from disobedience, disruption, despair, disease and all that would destroy our wholeness."

Paul G. Hiebert and Monte B. Cox

Evangelist. The term “evangelist” is used three times in the New Testament: Acts 21:8 refers to Philip as the evangelist; Ephesians 4:11 refers to the evangelist as a gift or office of the church; and in 2 Timothy 4:5 Timothy is exhorted to do the work of an evangelist. These references indicate that the evangelist is a divinely gifted specialist in the work of the church.

During the second century, evidence indicates that there were great numbers of Christians who became full-time wandering evangelists. As missionaries they set out on long journeys endeavoring to preach the gospel to those who had never heard.

The evangelist in many ways parallels the apostle. The apostle is described in the Didache as a wandering missionary. Such a close association has led scholars, such as Adolf Harnack, to conclude that there was little distinction between apostles and evangelists. Because the apostles were known as those who preach the gospel (Gal. 1:8; outside of the New Testament, see 1 Clem. 42.1; Polycarp, Ep. 6:3; and Barn. 8.3), the evangelists were closely linked with them. A frequently quoted dictum was, “Every apostle is an evangelist but not every evangelist is an apostle.”

The evangelist continued the work of the apostles long after the technical sense of an apostle as one who was an eyewitness of Jesus' earthly ministry (Acts 1:21–22) ceased.

Evangelists also served as apologists, giving able defenses of the faith to the secular world. Quadratus has been thought by many to be the earliest Christian apologist. The historian Eusebius refers to him as an evangelist who wrote a defense against the false charges of the heathen in order to defend his fellow Christians. He addressed his defense of Christianity to the Emperor Hadrian.

Other early evangelists served in the missionary capacity such as Pantaenus, who took the gospel as far as India. Pantaenus was the founder and first teacher of the theological school in Alexandria around A.D. 180. He was primarily a missionary theologian. When he arrived in India, he discovered that many people had a copy of the Gospel of Matthew. Eusebius notes that these copies had been left by the apostle Bartholomew during a preaching tour through India.

From the beginning of Christianity, the evangelist has played an important role in reaching the non-Christian population. As missionaries, apologists, and theological educators, evangelists have played vital roles in the growth of the church.

In contemporary times, evangelists have been particularly effective through the medium of mass evangelism (see also Mass Communication). Evangelists such as Bill Bright, Billy Graham, Luis Palau, and Ravi Zacharias have seen great impact in reaching people through specialized tools (e.g., tracts), mass media (radio, television, the Jesus Film), crusades (see Crusade Evangelism), and other significant evangelistic methods.

Frank Harber

Evangelistic Mandate. See Great Commission.

Evangelization, Measurement of. A major biblical concept standing for human response and responsibility with regard to the implementation of God's mission to the world. The term can be defined as the whole process of spreading the Good News of the Kingdom of God, the extent to which the Good News has been spread, the extent of awareness of Christianity, Christ, and the gospel.

It is based on the central biblical verb evangelizō, which with its immediate cognates occurs 25 times in the Greek Old Testament (Septuagint) and 132 times in the New Testament, with its meaning similar to the English transliteration evangelize. The Greek verb means to spread the good news of the gospel, with signs following, in both supernatural power and compassionate deed; to preach, to persuade, to call to faith in Christ. The Greek verb has 42 synonyms in biblical Greek, and the English verb has 700 synonyms in current English, which can be reduced to 400 distinct and different dimensions of evangelization.

Evangelization can be seen as obedience to the seven mandates of Christ’s Great Commission: Receive (the Spirit)! Go! Witness! Proclaim! Disciple! Baptize! Train! The church’s endeavors to obey this Commission have resulted in some 45 major types or varieties of Christian ministry and outreach. Down through the centuries, the church’s concern with evangelization has resulted in over 1,400 distinct global plans to evangelize the world, some 300 of which are still being energetically implemented today.

In order to keep track of the status of evangelization and progress with its implementation, the world’s churches and missions spend about U.S. $750 billion each year on their annual censuses. This status is measured and enumerated for individuals, for peoples, for language speakers, for cities, for countries, for continents, or for the entire world. It enables the computation, for any specific population, of the number of evangelistic opportunities people receive, per year per capita. It also enables the trichotomy to be formed whereby the world and its populations can be categorized as either World A (the unevangelized, being populations with individuals numbering less than 50% evangelized, but with church members less than 60%), and World C (the Christian world, with church members numbering more than 60%). This enables mission planners to see clearly the distinction between, on the one hand, the world’s 4 billion non-Christians, as priority target for the sharing of all the benefits of Christ and his kingdom, and on the other hand, the world’s already heavily Christianized populations with strong enough home ministries to not require foreign missionary resources.

Evangelization is widely recognized as dangerous business. Throughout 20 centuries and 70 generations of Christian mission, 60 million Christians have become martyrs for Christ—believers who have lost their lives, prematurely, in situations of witness, as a result of human hostility. Every day around 500 Christians scattered across 100 countries are murdered because of their faith. Inevitably, persons at highest risk are those implementing evangelization—bishops, evangelists, colporteurs, and foreign missionaries. MARTYRDOM has thus become, empirically, the major single factor involved in world evangelization.

DAVID B. BARRETT

SEE ALSO Quantitative Research.

After learning the language of the Koho, a mountain dwelling people in the Central Highlands near Dalat, Vietnam, she served there twenty-three years as a teacher, translator, and youth worker. She was a regular faculty member at the Koho Bible Institute, which was established in the 1930s by Herbert Jackson, Helen’s uncle. She was a primary contributing translator for the Koho New Testament (published 1967) and translated hymns and choruses for the Koho church hymnal. Alongside her academic and translation work her weekends were devoted to taking Koho youth in her Land Rover into the surrounding mountain villages for services in Christian villages and for witness to non-Christians. Due to the Vietnamese communist revolution of 1975 she relocated to Indonesia, where from 1977 to 1986 she learned the Indonesian language and taught theology at the CMA Bible School in Makale, South Sulawesi, Indonesia. In 1986 her mission reassigned her to assist immigrant tribal refugees from Vietnam’s Central Highlands resettle in Charlotte, North Carolina, where she resides.

JAMES F. LEWIS

Evans, James (1801–46). English missionary to Canada and linguist. Born in England, Evans traveled to Canada in 1823 and taught at the Rice Lake Indian Mission School. He was ordained a Methodist minister in 1833 and went to work among the Ojibwa people. Evans was appointed general superintendent of Northwest Indian Missions in 1840, based in northern Manitoba. He had already prepared a grammar for the Ojibwa language and now started work on a written language for the Cree Indians. He invented a syllabic alphabet of simplicity and eloquence that was adopted by the Crees and is still in use today among many of the Indian people of northwest Canada. In 1841, using ingenuity and the materials at hand, he printed a hymnal in Cree, possibly the first book printed in the Canadian northwest. By this time he had made enemies in Hudson Bay Company, which was the political power in the area. Evans taught his converts to rest on Sunday and this slowed down fur trade. Company officials accused him of immorality and murder. Although cleared of all charges, the struggle broke his health and heart and he returned to England to die in 1846. But he trained a group of translators to succeed him and in 1861 they published the entire Bible in the Cree language, using his alphabet.

ROBERT SHUSTER

Evanson Assembly (1954). See WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES ASSEMBLIES.

Evil Spirit. See DEMON, DEMONIZATION; also POSSESSION PHENOMENA.
Exegesis

Exegesis. Exegesis, from the Greek word exēgēsia meaning "to lead out" or "explain," "interpret," or "describe," has come to refer to the act and process of determining the meaning of a text, particularly a biblical text. In the broader field, Hermeneutics (the principles and theory of the art and science of interpretation), modern students may include such goals as discovering the author's experience and person at the moment of writing or the reader's authentic selfhood. Traditional exegesis seeks to discover as precisely as possible the meaning and intent of the original author. Hence, it is assumed that, with the possible exception of predictive prophecy, the correct interpretation of a passage must be something the author could have intended and the first hearer/readers understood.

The careful exegete will employ a number of steps included in what is often called "the grammatical-historical method." These include: (1) What did the writer write? Answering this question includes consideration of textual criticism, seeking that which is most likely what the writer wrote when there are differences in the wording among ancient manuscripts linguistic study of the words and grammatical structure of the original language if possible; and the nature and wording of translations (literary, dynamic equivalent, paraphrase). (2) What was the literary setting? Here one seeks to identify the genre or literary form (narrative, poetry, history, prophecy, wisdom, apocalyptic, gospel, epistle, etc.) in order to employ the methods appropriate for understanding it. Consideration of the literary context enables the student to see the implications for interpretation of what comes just before and after the passage under consideration as well as its relation to the book as a whole, all books by the same author, its position within the Testament, Old or New, within which it appears, and in the Bible as a whole. (3) What were the "introductory" matters of the identity of the writer and recipients, their situation, when and where the document was written, the purpose, and the writer's sources of information? (4) What were the elements of the historical situation, including the influences of geography, politics, philosophy, the social, religious, and cultural context of the day, as well as the intellectual and current events of the writer's time? It is important to note that different parts of the Bible often have their distinct historical-cultural settings within which each must be considered.

The exegete may also find help in seeing how others have dealt with the passage. An examination of the history of its interpretation will provide both positive and negative examples. Consulting commentaries may furnish information and insights one might otherwise miss. However, neither of these should substitute for the interpreter's personal struggling with the passage.

These steps provide the raw data, the original meaning of the passage. Theological exegesis seeks to understand what it teaches about God, God's view of human persons, God's expectations from those who confront his revelation, and examples of God's dealing with people. The careful exegete is aware of basic spiritual and moral principles, rooted in the nature of God, which are revealed in the Bible. Occasionally these are stated plainly, more often they are revealed through the situations related in the Bible. These principles should be identified in individual passages and in Scripture as a whole. These revealed principles comprise the teachings, the doctrines, of Scripture which were applied in the ancient world and now must be implemented in very different situations of the modern world.

Exegesis is important for missions at a number of points. It is the biblical message that the missionary proclaims; exegesis is essential to ensure it is indeed that message which is declared. Exegesis is imperative to understand properly the nature and parameters of the missionary commission lest we undertake a human rather than the divine agenda.

Careful exegesis must distinguish between the basic principles of Scripture and the adaptation and application of them in specific cultural settings. Contemplation of the essential truths of the faith and their cultural adaptations in Scripture must be the basis for legitimate CONTEXTUALIZATION. This helps guard against letting the modern culture pour its message into the Bible rather than making the divine revelation understandable and adaptable to the modern world. This is essential in conveying the gospel and its implications in the culture and setting of people groups addressed by missions, avoiding unnecessarily transporting forms, emphases, traditions, and values from the missionaries' own culture. The cultural awareness which is a part of the missionary-interpretor's responsibilities is also essential to avoid literalistic or legalistic interpretations and applications which miss the author's (divine and human) intent.

All biblical translation should be based upon solid exegesis. As important as it is to put as quickly as possible the Scriptures in the language of groups among which missions work, the translator must, by careful exegesis, be sure that the translation conveys the same message to the mind of the modern recipient as it did to the original recipients. Exegesis must assure that the translator has done this as closely as possible before work is begun on transferring the message into the new setting (see also BIBLE TRANSLATION).

J. JULIUS SCOTT, JR.

Bibliography. G. Bray, Biblical Interpretation Past and Present; G. D. Fee and D. Stuart, How to Read the Bible For All Its Worth; G. D. Fee, New Testament Exege-
The term “exorcism” is not used in the New Testament. In the KJV, the word “exorcize” (Mark 1:24, 31; Acts 19:13) is translated “charge under oath.” To exorcize is to charge under oath (e.g., in Matt. 26:63 Jesus is “adjured” to tell the truth about his messianic status). The term also refers to the expelling of a spirit or spirits by means of ritual(s). Such rituals involve oaths; they may also include the use of magical formulas and secret incantations. Though widely used today of Christian work in expelling demons, the term “exorcism” is not used in the New Testament to describe Jesus’ or his disciples’ ministry. Rather than relying on ritual, they cast out demons by verbally exercising God’s authority (see Demon, Demonization). The noun occurs only in Acts 19:13 of Jewish exorcists who used the name of Jesus in a botched exorcism.

Rituals of exorcism are found in every world religion and especially in Folk Religions. Four components are almost universally involved: the exorcist, the victim, the community, and the ritual. The exorcist is seen as a person with special powers. The victim may be troubled because of spiritual power. This may be accomplished by torture to make the victim an uninhabitable host for spirits; the application of specially prepared herbs; the use of magical formulas, chants, and incantations; an offering; or some type of animal sacrifice. The help or advice of friendly spirits may be enlisted through mediumistic channeling to deal with the spirit tormenting the victim. Understanding the functions of such rituals and the way they act as a social glue in the community is important for the missionary. If they are discarded by the missionary and the social functions that they serve remain unmet, the practices may simply go underground.

A variety of formalized exorcism ceremonies have existed inside the church from early on. In the second and third centuries, rituals of exorcism were a common part of the baptismal process. The Catholic Church has a well-established ritual. Lutherans and Anglicans once had exorcism rituals, but abandoned or issued strict controls over them by the 1600s to prevent abuses. Among some contemporary Christian groups the form of demonic confrontation, the use of religious paraphernalia (water, oil, crucifixes), prayer and fasting, and repetitive reading of key Bible passages all with the extensive use of formulaic language point to a ritual orientation even though no formalized procedure is being followed.

It is important for the missionary to understand the function of exorcism in the local community. The fact that we are privileged to call on Christ’s authority in dealing with spirits in a Power Encounter is often recognized by the local community as God’s work among them, and thus provides an evangelistic breakthrough. A danger to be noted is that if missionaries present a ritual-dependent Christian authority over the demonic, they may be opening the door to the rise of Syncretism in the form of Christian magical thinking.

See also Demons, Demonism and Possession Phenomena.
Extent of Missionary Identification

Contemporary missiology presents missionary identification based on an incarnational model for ministry (see INCARNATIONAL MISSION). The model functions within three main arenas: the life of the missionary, the message itself, and the medium or forms that convey the message.

The first arena, the missionary’s lifestyle, fosters the most powerful means of identification. The missionary seeks to become a full participant in the host society. Recognizing the reality of misunderstanding, the missionary enters the new culture as a learner rather than teacher. He or she is open to genuinely sharing his or her own cultural background. Thus, the missionary becomes a type of culture-broker living between two worlds, transmitting information from one to the other, bringing the gospel from without and giving from one cultural context to contemporary yet culturally different recipients. The goal of identification is to achieve a cross-cultural understanding in order to effectively communicate the message of Christ. The result of participating deeply in another culture forces one to think in new ways and recognize differing views of reality. In doing so, the missionary becomes a “bicultural” person with a broader vision that enables the ability to pull away from the home culture and work meaningfully in the new one (see BICULTURALISM). Incarnational missionaries thus develop a new cultural framework based on the two cultures known to them, allowing more effective ministry in the host culture. Additionally, they often find new perceptions about their home culture.

Inherent to the goal of living in two worlds as a bicultural person is the danger of rejection of one of our two worlds. We may either reject the culture in which we are ministering or reject our own culture by “going native.” Neither of these options is helpful to the missionary personally or professionally. The first option denies the validity of the people with whom we are ministering. The second option denies the fact that we will always be seen as outsiders. Our goal is to learn to accept what is true and good in all cultures and to critique what is false and evil in each of them based on deeply rooted biblical truth.

The practice of incarnational missionary identification functions on three levels: (1) lifestyle—external identification in terms of language, dress, food, patterns of courtesy, use of local transportation, and housing; (2) willingness to serve alongside and eventually under a local leader; (3) inner identification, the deepest of all levels. Attitudes of dignity, respect, and trust speak of our genuine love for the people with whom we minister. Genuinely deep love forms both the foundation and capstone for all levels of identification.

The second arena for missionary identification deals with the content and presentation of the message. Drawing from COMMUNICATION theory, the missionary is encouraged to adopt the receptor’s frame of reference where one becomes familiar with the conceptual framework of the receptor and attempts to fit communication of the message within the categories and felt needs of the receptor’s WORLDVIEW. Thus, the message is presented in a way that “scratches where the hearer itches.” Jesus demonstrated this when he spoke to the woman at the well about living water and her background. He also dealt with Nicodemus on his own Pharasaic terms. He interacted differently with Zacchaeus (Luke 19:1–10), the rich young ruler (Mark 10:21), and the demoniac (Luke 8:38–39). Furthermore, the apostle Paul followed Jesus’ example when he determined to be Jewish or Greek depending on his audience (1 Cor. 9:19–22), clearly seen in his address to the Athenians (Acts 17:22–31).

The third arena for missionary identification lies in the development of the forms and media for conveying the gospel message. The missionary who has not learned the beliefs, feelings, and values of a culture will often fail to recognize the most appropriate methods for communicating Christ. There is the continued danger of simple translation of Western books, songs, drama, and films. As Tippett suggested, “the first step in identification is to accept as many indigenous forms and procedures as can legitimately be retained as Christian.” Although the cost in time and effort to pursue such CONTEXTUALIZATION of the gospel is great, it does not match the cost and threat of miscommunicating the gospel. A syncretistic acceptance of the gospel and stilted or stunted churches easily result from lack of identification on this level.

Missionary identification today is not an option: it is an imperative. Historically, one of the results of poor missionary identification has been the national outcry of “Missionary go home!” We must learn from our mistakes and move ahead with greater determination, especially in light of modernity’s more complex degree of multicultur- alism. In spite of our tendency to work at external identification, people still need to experience love on deeper levels. Missionaries must incarnate themselves by recognizing and working within the individual needs and social contexts of peoples.

ROBERTA R. KING

SEE ALSO Bonding; Culture Learning; Culture Shock.

When an innovation begins to take hold, we would like to know if it is going to endure. One way is to ask how biblical the innovation is: Does it aim at reinforcing some biblical mandate or principle, or recovering one that has been neglected?

For example, when Ralph Winter rocked the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization in 1974 with his vision of “hidden people,” it was not a fad. Recognizing Christ’s mandate to reach every nation, the unreached of the world became the focal point of evangelical missions. Thus, toward the end of the twentieth century a plethora of innovations aimed in the same direction: the 10/40 Window concept, the AD 2000 Movement, identifying the “gateway” cities or peoples, for example, all target the least reached. Are they fads? Time will tell.

Another innovation which has endured is the “indigenous” methodology developed in the nineteenth century by John Nevis— that the goal of missions is to establish self-governing, self-supporting, self-propagating churches (see Indigenous Churches). The Third-World missions movement has grown from the “self-propagating” or Great Commission mandate, an enduring “new” development. But fads often seem to accompany biblical innovation. For example, the self-support principle became, “let the nationals do it,” and let the West pay for it (see Foreign Financing of Indigenous Workers). These are fads that will pass because they violate basic biblical principles. We can never buy our way out of personal responsibility, nor assign world evangelism to others so long as half the world has no Christian “nationals,” because peoples live out of reach of present gospel witness.

Donald McGavran’s themes of concentrating on responsive peoples and targeting homogenous units for evangelism are certainly far less popular than they once were. This should come as no surprise regarding the Homogeneous Unit Principle, since it is extra-biblical (though not demonstrably anti-biblical, at least in the way McGavran advocated it). But concentration on responsive people is clearly biblical, the way God himself operates. Nevertheless, this concept does not have the strength the innovation once knew, so may prove to be a fad.

Two of the strongest emphases in the last quarter of the twentieth century were Short-Term Mission and Tent-Making Missions. These cannot be considered fads since they have always been with us, but unrealistic expectations for these approaches may pass since they lack biblical mandate or principle.

Holy Spirit power is essential for missionary success, but the innovations accompanying the Power Encounter movement at the end of the twentieth century—prayer walks, spiritual mapping, confronting an identifiable demonic prince that reigns over a city or region (see Territorial Spirits), and many others—may prove to be fads because the biblical foundation is at least problematic.

Innovation is essential for the cause of missions and this will bring genuine biblical advance, but inevitably it will bring passing fads as well. The way of confidence is to evaluate each new idea at the bar of Scripture.

Robertson McQuilkin

See also Controversies in Contemporary Evangelical Missions.

Faeroe Islands (Denmark Autonomous Area) (Est. 2000 pop. 47,000; 1,399 sq. km. [540 sq. mi.]). A small group of eighteen islands off the coast of northern Europe between Iceland and Scotland populated primarily by Faeroese (of Scandinavian descent) who are largely dependent on fishing for their livelihood. In 1993 the population was estimated at 93.4 percent Christian (93% Protestant, 0.1% Catholic, 0.3% marginal), though they are generally nominal. The Evangelical Lutheran Church, thought to be present since the mid-eighteenth century, is the largest denomination, followed by the Christian Brethren.

A. Scott Moreau
Faith

Faith. Faith is both proposition and practice, creed and conduct, belief and behavior. Hebrews 11 describes what faith is and what faith does. James warns that faith that does not work is no faith at all. Throughout Scripture, faith is not only revealed in terms of what to believe, the object of faith, God himself, but it is also that which works in the human mind, heart, and will to bring people to saving trust in the living God.

Although the word “faith” does not stand out boldly in the Old Testament, the stories of God’s people are replete with belief, trust, and hope. For example, the deeply introspective psalms reveal how intense personal faith is. To these writers, faith stands out like a life preserver: Trust in God, rather than self, is proposed as the only way to salvation and wholeness, whether the enemies be internal or external. Old Testament persons did not have the advantage of hearing Jesus or reading Paul, but they clearly understood what God required of them in terms of obedient faith, trust, and hope.

Faith blossoms like a spring rose in the New Testament. Taken together, in its verb, noun, and adjectival forms, the basic Greek word πίστις occurs more than three hundred times. The object of such faith is God’s saving work in his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ. Faith is a personal relationship. People of faith relinquish their own efforts to be good enough to please God. Instead, they trust completely in Christ and in him alone for salvation, forgiveness, righteousness, and wholeness (see also Shalom).

Although intimately relational, New Testament faith is rooted in certain historical facts. People who come to faith believe the testimony, or the record, about Christ’s life, death, resurrection, and ascension. The only valid repository of faith is the Lord Jesus Christ himself, not a set of facts about him, not the Bible, not the church, but a living person. Saving faith does not require a complete understanding of biblical theology, but it does require knowing why Jesus came to earth, died, and rose again.

Subjective faith begins with a conviction of the mind based on adequate evidence. It grows in the confidence of the heart, or emotions, based on the conviction of the mind. Faith is crowned in the consent of the will, by means of which conviction and confidence are expressed in conduct. The will acts in response to what God has done in Christ. The will says “Yes” to Jesus Christ. This combination of the elements in human personality involves a moral decision, according to Paul (1 Thess. 1:9) and Peter (1 Peter 2:25). Jesus described that “Yes” in many different ways, as receiving him, trusting him, believing in him, welcoming him, drinking of him, eating of him, loving him, and obeying him (see also Conversion).

New Testament stories and dogma emphasize that the Son of Man who came to redeem people from sin also came to live in them, to direct and control their lives, to be the object of their worship, love, obedience, and service. Therefore, people of faith confess Christ as Savior and Lord. They commit themselves without reservation to do his good and perfect will.

From this obedient faith springs the New Testament pattern for mission. Faith is not a passing phase; it is a continuing walk of obedience to the Lord’s commands, including his Great Commission.

Church history reveals remarkable exploits of what we call “faith” to evangelize the unbelieving world. Unfortunately, too often these heroines and heroes of faith were loners, isolated from the larger institutional churches because they dared to go against the grain. While church hierarchies and public opinion argued otherwise, these missionary pioneers abandoned their comfort zones to enter uncharted waters, where the name of Jesus was not known or confessed. These people believed God not for salvation alone but also for overcoming horrendous obstacles. In that sense, they discovered a realm of faith often described by Jesus. For example, he said, “Everything is possible for him who believes” (Mark 9:23). He promised great results from faith that was as small as a grain of mustard seed (Matt. 17:20; Luke 17:6).

The story of the expansion of Christianity is filled with exploits that would qualify for inclusion in Hebrews 11. At the same time, not all of those people were delivered from great tribulation, neither were many missionary pioneers who laid the foundation for the worldwide church today. In fact, missionary martyrs are many, and it is important to recognize not only the obedience of their faith, but also the costliness of it. Having confessed Christ, they put their lives on the line for him (see Martyrdom).

Mission board archives are crammed with stories showing that for many missionaries faith was defined as obedience, courage, trust, hope, and a willingness to die for the sake of planting the church. Perhaps this quote from LOTTIE MOON, a nineteenth-century missionary to China, says it best: “If I had a thousand lives, I would give them all for the women of China.”

To look at mission from the other side, it is safe to say that apart from this kind of faith, the church would never have advanced anywhere. But somehow the mission of the church exploded because a minority of Christians took their cue from the faith they saw exercised by the early believers in the Book of Acts. Those Christians not only confessed personal faith in Christ, but they either went themselves or sent others to declare Christ’s lordship throughout the Roman Empire and into Africa and Asia. Their successors took Christ’s name throughout Eastern and Western Europe.
Faith is the key to personal salvation and to missionary obedience. Faith links people to God through Jesus Christ; faith engages them wholeheartedly in God's worldwide mission. Faith has been God's instrument for building his universal church.

Since Missionary Obedience

Faith Mission Societies. With the beginning of the modern missionary movement in the last years of the eighteenth century, several types of mission agencies emerged. The earliest agencies, such as the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions and the London Missionary Society were interdenominational. In the early years of the nineteenth century denominations organized their own boards of missions; and even as late as 1925, 75 percent of American missionaries were affiliated with denominational boards.

Faith mission societies, often also referred to as independent, interdenominational, or nondenominational, developed in the latter half of the nineteenth century. At the present time they have many more missionaries under appointment than do the denominational agencies. These types of mission agencies appeared first in Great Britain, the best known being the China Inland Mission in 1865. Some of the early faith missions in the United States were the Christian and Missionary Alliance (1887), the Evangelical Alliance Mission (1890), the Sudan Interior Mission (1893), and the Africa Inland Mission (1895).

Several interrelated factors led to the development of faith mission societies. First was the conviction that the denominational agencies were not reaching the unevangelized areas of the world—they were not penetrating the interiors or frontiers of many countries. The terms “interior” and “inland” in the names of these new agencies testified to this fact. Among the unreached in many countries were women. This led to the first American faith mission, the Woman's Union Missionary Society (1860).

A second major issue was theological. Christian leaders were alarmed at the growth of what they perceived to be liberalism in many denominations and wished to found agencies that were fully committed to the authority of Scripture and had an evangelistic fervor to reach the lost. These new agencies were connected with the fundamentalist movement, were theologically conservative, and usually separated themselves from the mainline denominations. They tended to be opposed to the conciliar Ecumenical Movement, believing that many of its leaders were liberal and that it was more committed to social issues than to evangelism.

A third factor for the establishing of the independent mission agencies was financial. Denominational agencies often had insufficient funds to send out missionaries. The new boards, operating on the faith principle, believed that God would provide even when it appeared that no money was available. This made it possible for them to continue to send out new missionaries. At the beginning, societies like the China Inland Mission instructed their missionaries not to ask for money nor to tell anyone but God about their specific financial need. At present, most of the faith agencies ask for money or in some way make their financial needs known.

As concerned Christian leaders assessed the spiritual needs of the world, they formed a number of specialized mission agencies that can also be considered faith or independent societies. Among these were Mission Aviation Fellowship, Far Eastern Broadcasting Company, Gospel Recordings, and Wycliffe Bible Translators.

The formation of these new agencies came in a period at the end of the nineteenth century when mission interest was stirred to new heights by many mission conferences both in England and in America. Among these were international conventions held in Cleveland, Detroit (1894), and Liverpool (1896) by the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions. Another series of important annual conferences was promoted, beginning in 1893, by the Interdenominational Conference of Foreign Missionary Boards and Societies in the United States and Canada. The most international and interdenominational of all these conferences was the Ecumenical Missionary Conference held in New York in 1900.

From the beginning, the faith mission societies derived their finances and personnel from independent Bible and community churches. Most of their missionaries were trained in Bible schools founded in the last two decades of the nineteenth century, such as Nyack (1882), Moody (1886), Ontario (1894), and Barrington (1900). Gradually, many of these schools added liberal arts courses to their curriculum and became Bible colleges granting the B.A. degree. Most candidates for faith missions continue to come from these schools.

Many faith mission agencies that were based originally only in the United States or England have now established centers in other countries, even in Asia, Latin America, and Africa. Thus they have become international societies, sending missionaries from six continents to six continents.

The theologically more inclusive nature of the World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh in 1910, the growth of liberalism in mainline denominations, and the antipathy of denominational boards to the faith mission agencies contributed to the founding in 1917 of the Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association of North America. Boards formerly a part of the Foreign Mission Conference of North America, such as the Africa Inland Mission, Central American Mission, China
Faith Missions

Inland Mission, Sudan Interior Mission, South Africa General Mission, Inland South America Missionary Union, and the Woman's Union Missionary Society joined forces to form this new association of interdenominational or faith missions societies. Today a total of seventy-two agencies belong to the IFMA. The IFMA does not include denominational, Pentecostal, or holiness groups, even though it is willing to work with them in cooperative endeavors. So in 1945 a group of mission executives related to the National Association of Evangelicals formed the Evangelical Foreign Missions Association (EFMA), now renamed Evangelical Fellowship of Mission Agencies. It includes many agencies that are not members of the IFMA.

Ralph R. Covell

See also Independent Non-Denominational Mission Agencies.

Falkland Islands [Islas Malvinas] (United Kingdom Dependent Area) (Est. 2000 pop.: 2,000; 16,300 sq. km. [6,293 sq. mi.]). The Falkland Islands consist of two main islands and over 100 smaller ones in the South Atlantic Ocean off the coast of Argentina. It is a colony of the United Kingdom and its residents enjoy all civil and political rights. Nearly all residents are British in background. Most of these are Christians but there is a growing movement among the nonreligious. Evangelicals are found among the Angличans and the Free Church.

Todd M. Johnson

Fall of Humankind, The. The biblical teaching concerning the fall of humankind is found in Genesis 3; Romans 5:12–19; 1 Corinthians 15:21–22; and 1 Timothy 2:12–13. Genesis 1 and 2 record the conditions of the “golden age” when humans, created in the image of God with mandates for dominion over and stewardship of creation (Gen. 1:26–28), were given only one limitation. “You are free to eat from any tree in the garden; but you must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die” (Gen 2:16–17). God sets the prohibition in the context of his limitless provision and gives no rationale other than a declaration of the consequences: death.

The narrative of temptation and sin (Gen. 3:1–6) introduces Satan as the “crafty” tempter; the serpent. He leads Eve to doubt God’s goodness and truthfulness, to allow her appetites to transgress God’s law limits, and to act on her desires in willful rebellion against God. She further compounds her sin by persuading her husband to sin (1 Tim. 2:12–13).

The immediate consequences of sin were entry of sin and guilt into the formerly perfect world. The couple experiences guilt, when their eyes are opened, they know shame, and they hide from the presence of God (Gen. 3:7–11). Immediately they “die” spiritually and in old age they will die physically. In fact, the whole creation becomes subject to frustration and decay (Rom. 8:20–22). As a result, a mitigated but real curse falls on Adam and Eve and all humankind. There is multiplied pain in child-bearing and a constant tension in Eve’s relation to her husband. She will desire to master him, but his role will be to have the leadership in the home (Gen. 3:16). The man will only by much toil wrest a living from the soil, a task of doubtful meaningfulness, since his end is physical death, in which he returns to the same soil from which he was taken.

The greatest consequence, however, is the introduction of original sin into human history (Rom. 5:12–19; 1 Cor. 15:21–22). Each succeeding generation will be born spiritually dead, lacking original right standing with God, charged with the guilt of the first human’s sin, with a sin nature driving them toward a life of sin, and with only one prospect for eternity: eternal condemnation (Gen. 4:1–8, 19; 6:2, 5; Ps. 51:5; Jer. 17:9).

The account of the fall of humankind does offer a glimmer of hope, however. The “seed of the woman” would be final victor in the continuing spiritual battle with the serpent’s seed. Addressing the serpent God declares the offspring of the woman will “crush his head” (Gen. 3:15). The rest of biblical revelation reveals that Jesus Christ is that offspring and in his death and resurrection he won the victory everyone who believes may claim as his or her own.

Animism, as well as a number of the world’s great religions, have myths of origin that include an account of the fall of humankind. These accounts to a greater or lesser extent agree in detail with the Genesis account. The student of comparative religion may posit “nostalgia for the beginning of things” as a “permanent part of man’s collective memory.” He or she will conclude that humans in many cultures “once positing it as a golden age” will then have to “explain the accident that produced the present situation” in which there is both physical and moral evil (Ries, 1987, 267). Since Genesis 1–3 presents itself not as a religiously generated myth but as a historical account of beginnings, it is better to explain all the similarities between Genesis and religious mythology as evidence of humankind’s common historical memory, which under the influence of the fall yields a variety of versions of what actually happened. The early chapters of Genesis then provide the missionaries with both opportunity and challenges as they approach other cultures. and religions with the gospel. The opportunity is “bridge building” to the culture by dealing in the area of origins from Genesis 1–3. The challenge is to effectively correct the religionist’s views on these matters so that clearer understanding of the truth of biblical revelation results.

Among animists many narratives of the fall may be found. These often stress the closeness of God and humanity in the “golden age,” a theme congruent with that of Genesis. The “accident,” which introduces death into the world, though sometimes a sin, in many instances is not. What brings the fall may be disturbing the gods with the noise of grinding millet (the Dogon of Mali) or an accident like falling asleep (Aranda of Australia). It may be a matter of an original archetypal message of immortality being changed in transmission or not passed on by the messenger (Ashanti of Ghana). It may occur because of human frailty. A Maasai myth tells of a package that humans are given by God and forbidden to open. However, their curiosity drives them to open it. In all these instances, biblical revelation’s moral and salvation history framework for the fall must be a necessary corrective.

Hinduism knows no definite occasion on which the fall of humankind occurred, only a gradual decline in the second of four ages of humankind’s history. The imputation of guilt from the first human to all succeeding generations is similar in principle to the concept of samsara and karma, though the difference is very important. In Scripture, it is only the guilt of Adam’s sin, not effects of the sinfulness of each succeeding generation, which is imputed to the individual. Neither Buddhism nor Chinese traditional thought contains myths of the fall of humankind. Islam’s Koran follows Genesis 1–3 fairly closely. It does provide an explanation for why Satan (Iblis) fell: his refusal to bow to Adam. While the guilt for the fall is imputed to the devil, humans only experience the sanctions and consequences. Original sin is minimized to the level of weakness, the habitual.

William J. Larkin Jr.

See also Sin.

Family Life of the Missionary. With the generational shift in evangelical missions, the family life of missionaries has become a crucial topic. Earlier volumes on Christian mission generally did not address the issue. In the age of rugged individualism it simply would not have occurred to people. That is not to say that missionaries in the past did not marry and have families, but it does recognize that the reduced life expectancy of missionaries in the nineteenth century made the subject somewhat moot, particularly since the children of missionaries most often remained in the home country for their education and safety. As the twentieth century progressed, children did go overseas with their parents, but usually spent most of their time in the protected and often insulated enclave of the missionary school.

In the mid-twentieth century, family issues began to receive expanded attention in missionary circles. This has had both positive and negative effects. On the positive side, it opened up a discussion of very real issues that impact both the effectiveness and longevity of missionaries. On the negative side, an almost idolatrous fixation on family needs has at times undercut the purposes for which missionaries go forth in the first place.

This is in many respects a time of transition in the way agencies and churches respond to issues of family life among missionaries. Most agencies today are highly aware that family issues are among the most important factors impacting both missionary recruitment and attrition. Woe to the agency that has not developed policies and made suitable provision. Perhaps chief among the issues is the education of children. Gone are the days when missionaries happily sent their children off to boarding school; most want multiple options.

A related issue of great importance is the status of the missionary wife. Here, too, maximum flexibility is desired and often demanded. For some the issue is finding a satisfying ministry niche, which may or may not parallel that of the husband. For others the primary issue is the freedom not to have significant responsibilities outside the home, particularly if there are children whom the couple desire to homeschool. Whatever the particular issue, maximum flexibility with understanding and encouragement is necessary. This can provide no small challenge to agencies and churches seeking to maintain cost-effective, accountable, and equitable policies. The good news is that significant research and many broadly based efforts and organizations have emerged to address such family issues as care for missionary children, reentry into the home culture (see REENTRY SHOCK), and retirement planning.

Gary R. Corwin

Farrar, Cynthia (1795–1862). American missionary to India. She was born in Marlborough, New Hampshire. When she was twenty years old she made a profession of faith and immediately joined the Congregational Church. After completing her studies at Union Academy in Plainfield, New Hampshire, she applied her teaching skills both in New Hampshire and later in Boston, Massachusetts. It was during this time that the Marathi Mission in western India requested that the American Board send an experienced single woman educator to their school. It was the belief of the mission that they needed expert and continual supervision that no one caring for a family and a husband could provide. Farrar received and accepted the challenge in May 1827, and sailed for India on June 5, 1827, becoming the first unmarried American woman to be sent overseas as a missionary by any American agency. During her thirty-four years with the Marathi Mission she successfully educated many young women who formerly were not allowed an education by their Hindu fathers. She gained the respect of the higher castes, the support of some prominent British residents, including the governor, and later, Bishop Carr provided her with funds to establish additional schools. In 1839, she was transferred to Ahmednagar, where she organized new schools that attracted the attention of some of the high-caste men who asked that she establish two schools for their daughters. Unfortunately the sponsors closed these schools when one of the Brahmin teachers employed by Farrar became a Christian. Shunning discouragement, she continued to direct mission schools and later a primary and secondary school before her death.
Farrar, Cynthia

WENDY S. LARSON

Farrow, Lucy F. (b. c. 1852). African American pastor, evangelist, and missionary to Liberia. Born in slavery in Norfolk, Virginia, Farrow was a niece of the abolitionist and journalist Frederick Douglass. She came in contact with Pentecostal evangelist Charles F. Parham in 1905 while pastoring a small Holiness church in Houston, Texas. By now a widow, she served for a brief time as a governess in the Parham household.

Farrow introduced William J. Seymour, a member of her congregation, to the Pentecostal movement and then arranged for him to attend Parham's Houston Bible School, where he accepted the latter's Pentecostal doctrine. In early 1906, Seymour traveled to Los Angeles, California, where he played a major role in the internationally significant Azusa Street Revival (1906–13). Farrow followed and ministered there, praying for seekers to receive the baptism in the Holy Spirit with speaking in tongues. Beginning in August 1906, she traveled across the country holding evangelistic meetings and four months later went as a missionary to Monrovia, Liberia, returning to Los Angeles in 1907. Farrow's contributions include her encouragement of Seymour to enter the Pentecostal movement, interracial ministry, and service in the vanguard of Pentecostal missions.

GARY B. MCGEE

Fearing, Maria (1838–1937). African American missionary to Zaire. Maria Fearing was one of the few single African American women to ever become a missionary. Through her hard work and dedication to the missionary efforts in Africa she became known as a “Mother to African Girls.” One of the most intriguing things about her was that her personal efforts to get to Africa were just as noteworthy as the work she accomplished while she was there.

She was born a slave in Gainsville, Alabama. Sometime during her childhood, she developed a desire to go to Africa. At thirty-three, she completed the ninth grade at Talladega College, where she also served as assistant matron.

At fifty-six, she volunteered for the Congo Mission of the Presbyterian Church. However, because of her age, the Committee for Foreign Missions turned her down. But that did not stop her. She sold her house, withdrew her savings, and applied again to the committee, offering to pay her own expenses.

The committee then agreed to accept her. She went to the Congo Mission in May 1894. Because of her hard work and devotion, within two years she was appointed a missionary with full support. She founded the Pantops Home for orphaned girls and was the director there until 1915.

She then returned to Gainsville, where she died in 1937. Perhaps one of her greatest legacies was that she did not let her age become an obstacle. Nor did she let the opinion of others hinder her from obeying Christ’s call to the mission field. As a result, many orphaned girls gained a “Mother in Africa.”

KATHY McREYNOLDS

Feminist Theologies. Although it can be argued that there is no such thing as feminist theology, only feminist theologies, this is only a response to the diversity of the women theologians engaged in the debate. This ignores the fact that there is an underlying common approach and agenda which is shared by women of other faiths, especially Jewish women. Consequently feminist issues have proved a fruitful ground for interfaith dialogue, as some of the titles below indicate. The literature in the field is now so vast that only... a few titles representative of the different insights and disciplines involved can be given.

Feminist theology is of necessity highly contextual. It addresses the factors governing women’s existence from a woman’s perspective. Women feel marginalized from the conduct of worship, from the decision-making processes of their faith community, and from professional training and the creation of academic theology and a living spiritual tradition. In some denominations, the study of theology may be restricted to those involved in the training for male-ordained ministry. However, this situation may be due to a lack of opportunity for women to take advantage of higher education in some countries, discrimination against single mothers in the wider society, and so on.

Feminist theologians have increasingly listened to their non-Western sisters and perceived that the dignity of women is indissolubly linked to their non-Western sisters and perceived that wider society, and so on.

discrimination against single mothers in the advantage of higher education in some countries, be due to a lack of opportunity for women to take advantage of higher education in some countries, discrimination against single mothers in the wider society, and so on.

Feminist theologians have increasingly listened to their non-Western sisters and perceived that the dignity of women is indissolubly linked to Human Rights, Poverty, and deprivation. They have appropriated the feminist concept of the patriarchy to locate the socioeconomic and religious causes of this. They criticize the traditions that depict women as Eves, temptresses, those who at best load men down with domestic duties that distract them from salvation, or who at worst are responsible for leading them into sin.

Together with secular feminists, feminist theologians object to women’s inferior status and to the cult of Mary exalting motherhood in the abstract while mothers are oppressed. They scrutinize the underlying issues of ritual purity which bar women from approaching the sacred, or exclude them from their own households during menstruation and childbirth, but reject the pro-abortion stance of secular feminists.

In feminist theology the sacred Scriptures are reclaimed for study, and reinterpreted both to retrieve women’s contributions as, for example, that of Miriam, Moses’ sister, of charismatic leaders such as Deborah, or of the founders of early Christian communities. Texts are also reinterpreted to address contemporary situations. Religious language is made ‘inclusive,’ feminine epithets and smiles applied to God, and liturgy rewritten while theology is restructured and a new image of God created. Fresh translations of the original Hebrew Scriptures have revealed a male bias which cannot be justified in terms of accuracy or theology.

Feminist theology seeks the liberation of women and men, but is not linked so closely to analysis of a particular political ideology as liberation theology is. Such earnest and thoroughgoing study of the Scriptures and the early fathers (or their equivalent in Judaism and Islam) and such openness to the moving of the Spirit can only benefit the tradition as a whole. It underlines the truth that to be effective a theology of mission must be fully contextual.

In many cultures the coming of the gospel meant education and liberation, and as Ruth Brouwer shows, missionary societies offered women meaningful service, lifetime careers, and management experience. Yet, ironically, since 1914 women have increasingly felt oppressed by evangelical structures. There are disproportionately few women missionologists compared with other theological disciplines and too often in evangelical congregations they are expected to keep silent. A radical reappraisal of all Christian traditions is necessary if the flow of women out of the churches into goddess worship, alternative communities, and Neo-Buddhism is not to become a flood tide.

ELEANOR M. JACKSON

Festivals, Religious. Religious festivals are cyclic phenomena in most, if not all, religious traditions. They are extremely varied in form and function. Such festivals include the Jewish Passover; the Christian Christmas; the Hindu Deepävali, Dasara, and Kubha Mela; the Xocoth Huetzi of the Aztecs; the New Yam festival of the Igbo; and the Muslim Ramadan. Religious festivals are fundamentally rites of symbolic, expressive communication and religious celebration. All religious festivals fulfill some of the social, psychic, and spiritual needs of the people who practice them, reflecting a universal, inner human quest to relate to the transcendental.

In the social dimension religious festivals function as significant means of informal socialization and contribute to a sense of corporate identity, thus promoting social cohesion. There is an aspect of gaiety and flexibility in the format of festivals, but where these elements are replaced by rigid formalism the rituals easily become a burdensome, legalistic ritualism. Ritualism destroys the very re-creative purpose of the festivals. This will only continue to be the case as these festivals can withstand the threat of Secularization through tourism and Consumerism. Taking a wider perspective, some religious festive cycles have been shown to be important as socioreligious mechanisms in maintaining a dynamic balance between consumption and conservation in the environment.

From a religious perspective, festivals establish and strengthen the link between the sacred and...
Festivals, Religious

the profane; the temporal existence and the experience of the eternal. They renew and transform the profane and affirm the essential goodness of life, while at the same time they critique its destructive elements. Festivals interrupt the mundane and profanity of life. Religious festivals raise the level of consciousness of the continuity of life by allowing participants to withdraw temporarily from profane time into sacred time while also bringing a measure of sacredness to all of life.

A religious festival often involves reenactment of historical or mythical events, making the sacred past present in experience or the benefits of the event made a present reality. It can also be a medium to communicate the experience of thanksgiving, atonement, redemption, and hope. The uniqueness of Christian festivals lies in their source in divine revelation of God and in the ritual meaning and perception of the participant’s role. Christians not only celebrate the past and present, but also anticipate a future life in the consummated kingdom of God. Christian celebrations involve reenactments that do not renew the initial redemptive act, but the benefits of that act are made present. The Christian is an observer and recipient of the divine act, not a participant in the divine act.

The Christian engaging in cross-cultural ministry must consider making use of the ritual symbolism to communicate the gospel to avoid a foreign message or SYNCRETISM. Religious festivals reveal the significant religious concerns of the practitioners and have an important social and possibly an ecological function. For these reasons Christians also need to consider the use of functional substitutes that are both indigenous and possibly an ecological function. For these reasons Christians also need to consider the use of functional substitutes that are both indigenous and Christian to fulfill at least the social (and environmental) needs.

Albert F. Tucker

See also Burial Rites, Rites of Passage.

Fetish. See Magic, Magick, Magical Beliefs and Practices.

Field Appointment. The designation of missionaries to particular fields is both the work of divine sovereignty and of personal choice. The apostle Paul’s calling was to the Gentiles (Acts 9), but he and Barnabas chose to visit Cyprus and Asia Minor (Acts 13) on the first missionary journey. J. Herbert Kane cites four aspects of making a choice for missionary service: the mission, the country, the people, and the vocation. These four factors are not presented in a fixed order, but the secret is to focus upon one of them and get clear guidance, then wait on the Lord for his leading on the other three. Today many mission agencies provide considerable counsel, advice, and the use of various forms of testing, including psychological inventories and language aptitude exams, prior to appointing a candidate to a designated field (see Candidacy). It is necessary to carefully consider the gifts, the abilities, the background, and even the candidate’s personality in making a field appointment.

By contrast many early societies offered much less help in this process and gave the missionaires total freedom without adequate accountability. Ultimately both the mission agency and the missionary need to arrive at a consensus of field appointment that could possibly include a designated PEOPLE GROUP and also a well-thought-out job description.

John Easterling

Bibliography. J. H. Kane, Life and Work on the Mission Field.

Field Responsibilities. A missionary’s lifestyle and field of service involve several parties: sending church, mission agency, co-workers, and nationals (including leaders and national churches). Field responsibilities include at least six areas: personal and family welfare, interpersonal relationships, effective communication, witness and evangelism, planting and/or development of the church, and leadership preparation. The personal needs of the missionary include spiritual growth, physical care, intellectual stimulation, and needs of the spouse and children. When these needs are adequately met, the missionary can then minister with greater freedom and success. Interpersonal relationships must start in the home as a foundation (see Family Life of the Missionary). The missionaries need to work as team members with an interdependent spirit of humility and love (see Teams in Mission). Missionaries need to develop a servant attitude in working with others. The open lines of communication among missionaries, mission administrators, and nationals create the basis of trust and a sense of concern. Second Language Acquisition and cultural understanding are necessary for identifying with the nationals and reaching out to those who do not know Christ. The development and planting of churches give permanence and stability to the emerging Christian community. The final goal of the missionary is selectively training local leaders who are spiritually mature and gifted (see Leadership). The end result will be Indigenous Churches, churches that are strong and ultimately independent from missionary leadership. Each field responsibility needs to be kept in balance with others to avoid Burnout and to maximize the missionary’s effectiveness.

John Easterling

Bibliography. P. A. Beals, A People for His Name.
Field, Adele Marion (1839–1916). American pioneer Baptist missionary to Thailand (1867–72) and China (1873–90). Raised a universalist, Field graduated from the State Normal School at Albany, New York, and taught school. Having converted to her fiancé’s Baptist belief, she sailed for 149 days to Hong Kong only to learn of her fiancé’s death. Another 34-day voyage took her to Bangkok. The only single woman at the Thai (Siamese) mission, she was criticized for socializing (playing cards, dancing, and reportedly smoking opium) with diplomats and businessmen. En route home after colleagues insisted she be recalled, she stopped in Amoy where the missionaries begged her to stay since she spoke the dialect. In China she began the much copied practice of training Bible women; worked on an Amoy dictionary published under the mission’s name; and was one of the few women to attend the 1877 Shanghai Missionary Conference.

Although not wealthy, just prior to retirement Field resigned so as not to receive her pension, declaring that she had never believed Baptist teachings. Once home she reported on anti-Semitic pogroms in Russia. In New York as a suffragette she organized the League for Political Education. She wrote books about China and articles about politics and her biological studies, particularly on ants. After a decade in New York she moved to Seattle, where she was instrumental in establishing the political processes of referendum and recall.

Kathleen L. Lodwick

Fiji (Est. 2000 pop.: 845,000; 18,274 sq. km. [7,056 sq. mi.]). Fiji comprises a group of some 330 volcanic islands in the South Pacific. Originally a British territory, Fiji’s population bears the impress of its colonial history. The British imported over 60,000 indentured Indian laborers between 1879 and 1916 to work in the sugarcane fields. The descendants of these laborers constitute a numerical majority on the islands, while the native Fijians constitute a minority. Fiji is 54.5% Christian (43% Protestant) and 35.5% Hindu. Evangelicals are found in all of the Protestant denominations but the Assemblies of God have been the most successful with over 32,000 members.

Todd M. Johnson

Financial Support. See Deputation.

Financing Missions. Biblical Models. Three biblical models of financing missionary efforts are found in the life of Paul. He wrote to the Philippians that he had learned to trust God in all circumstances to provide his needs (Phil. 4:12–14). A tentmaker by trade (Acts 18:3), he mentioned to the Ephesians and the Thessalonians that he provided his own needs through his labor (Acts 20:34 and 1 Thess. 2:9). Tent-Making Mission, as it is known today, is named after this practice. In writing to the Corinthians, however, Paul directly urged them to give generously (2 Cor. 8–9). His flexibility for financing missionary work illustrates a general principle that any method which is ethically sound and God-honoring may be considered acceptable.

Types of Missionary Support. The most common method of mission funding has long been the voluntary contribution of members of local churches, though there are multiple means used to channel what is given to where it is needed. Some denominational missions assess member churches on a per capita basis to fund the denominational mission efforts, while others allow each church to develop its own mission budget and give money as it sees fit. Non-denominational mission agencies also serve as administrative conduits through which money is collected and distributed (see also Faith Missions). Many agencies require each missionary to raise his or her own individual support, while others form a central pool for which every missionary raises money and out of which all salaries and project funding comes.

Following Paul’s example (Acts 18:3), many continue to engage in tent-making mission. This is perhaps the most common method of financing Third-World missionaries, whose churches and agencies often do not have the financial capability to underwrite international travel or urban mission work among the economic elite in the major cities of the world.

Since the dawn of political states looking favorably on Christianity, missions have also been financed out of state treasuries, including financial grants, land grants, and imperial patronages. During the colonial era, many Protestant efforts were financed by colonial grant-in-aid deals which mutually benefited missionary and colonial enterprise. The resulting entanglements of church and state, however, often left a mixed perception on the part of both missionaries and the national churches, with the latter seeing the former as agents of the supporting state rather than ambassadors of Christ.

Finally, contemporary economic trends in the West have enabled the development of numerous private foundations and trust funds, many of which underwrite projects and otherwise finance Christian charitable work as well as direct evangelistic endeavors.

Issues in Financing Mission. Recently, however, several issues of significance for future mission financing have been raised. First, at least in North America, mission giving has largely come out of discretionary income, which has been drying up over the last few decades. While a wealthy generation that is now in process of dying has been leaving large gifts to missionary work in wills and trust funds, such giving is generally not projected to extend beyond this generation.
Financing Missions

Second, many Western churches and agencies have begun to build giving policies around the financing of Third World missionaries, who are significantly cheaper than Western missionaries. In general this emphasis, based on new thinking of global partnership and cost-effectiveness, is a welcome change. Unfortunately, however, for some it has become an inappropriate vehicle to call for a cessation of supporting Western missionaries altogether (see also FOREIGN FINANCING OF INDIGENOUS WORKERS).

Third, some rightly question the amount that Western missionaries feel they must raise, which often adds up to many thousands of dollars per month to finance family travel and lifestyles which are often well above the level of indigenous populations along with benefits such as health insurance and retirement income. The implications of this for giving patterns and priorities is now being felt in churches, mission agencies, and on the various fields of service (Bonk; see also MISSIONARY AFFLUENCE).

Fourth, control of money and exercise of power cannot be separated as easily as we might like. This is especially significant when foreign funds have been used to initiate and preserve large missionary institutions (e.g., schools, and hospitals) which the local economy could not support unaided. Such institutions have tended to foster dependence rather than PARTNERSHIP in missionary efforts.

Finally, alarms over future Western missionary funding has begun to sound in many quarters. Models that have become traditional in the West such as the mission agency relying on local churches to passively and unquestioningly give whenever approached, no longer hold. Discretionary finances in the consumer-driven Western cultures appear to be dwindling, as in commitment to traditional mission fund-raising techniques.

In light of these factors, it will be increasingly important in the future to find new and appropriate ways to creatively trust God to supply the necessary means for engaging in the missionary task. However, since it is God’s intention to see the whole world reached, it does not seem unreasonable to assume that he will continue to provide the means to do so, though not necessarily in the ways we expect and not without our taking seriously our responsibility to the GREAT COMMISSION.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Finkenbinder, Paul Edwin (1921– ). American missionary evangelist. Born in Santurce, Puerto Rico, of missionary parents, he was bilingual in Spanish and English from an early age. After finishing his education in the United States and pastoring briefly a church in New Mexico, he and his wife Linda went to El Salvador in 1943 as Assemblies of God missionaries. People in El Salvador began calling him Hermano Pablo (Brother Paul) because they could not pronounce “Finkenbinder.” In 1955 he began broadcasting a five-minute radio program that eventually became known as Un Mensaje a la Conciencia (A Message to the Conscience). The program was especially aimed at the machismo of non-Christian men who considered religion womanly. In 1960 he began preparing television broadcasts as well. The Finkenbinders moved to Costa Mesa, California, in 1964 and that has been the base of Hermano Pablo Ministries ever since. By 1995 Finkenbinder’s programs were broadcast over 1,911 radio and 317 television stations in 28 countries. His column was carried in 179 papers. Besides being one of the leading Protestant broadcasters in Latin America, he led city crusades, pastor seminars, and university meetings and produced Christian dramatic films based on the Bible. His broadcasts and films have won numerous awards from Christian organizations.

ROBERT SHUSTER

Finland (Est. 2000 pop.: 5,201,000; 338,145 sq. km. [130,558 sq. mi.]). Finland is the fifth largest country in Europe (exclusive of the Russian federation). Although Finland is so vast, its population is only about one-third as large as that of the Netherlands. The industrialized southern section of the country is the most densely populated with about eight times as many people per square mile as in the northern two-thirds of the country. Finland is one of the leading manufacturers and exporters of timber and paper products. The economy depends heavily on the forestry industry.

Finland borders Norway on the north, the Russian federation on the east, the Gulf of Finland on the south, and the Gulf of Bothnia and Sweden on the west. The hostility of their neighbors has frequently forced the Finnish people to defend themselves. There have been battles with Russia and Sweden throughout the ages for control of the land. During the eighteenth century a growing separatist movement in Finland demanded independence. Independence was declared on December 6, 1917. As a result of the war of 1808–9, Sweden surrendered Finland to Russia. Russia allowed the Finns to retain their old Constitution. Finland continued to battle Russia for the Karelian territories, however. Finally, a peace treaty was signed in 1947.

Upon conquering Finland in the twelfth century, Sweden introduced Christianity. In the sixteenth century, as Sweden consolidated its authority in Finland, Lutheranism was proclaimed the official religion. Currently, the Lutheran and Orthodox churches are recognized as official state churches. The Finnish Constitution, adopted in 1919, allows freedom of worship.

Today, the Evangelical Lutheran Church claims 88.4 percent of the population of 5.2 million; the Orthodox Church, 1.1 percent; the Roman Catholic Church, 0.1 percent; and other denominations, 0.8 percent; 9.6 percent have no church affiliation. The Lutheran churches that are evangelical have been fairly successful with revivals and fellowship meetings. The attendance at their Sunday services is very low, however (4 percent). This may indicate that the traditional services are not meeting the needs of the members, while the more casual and personal fellowship meetings are fulfilling spiritual and relational needs. The free churches, which tend to be less traditional in their forms, are growing; and groups that target youth are proving successful. Given the economic recession that followed the collapse of the Soviet Union (unemployment in Finland has run as high as 18 percent) as well as other challenges of daily living, alcoholism has become a problem and provides a further challenge for Christian evangelism in Finland. Some Finnish Christians have chosen to focus on evangelizing their neighbors. The collapse of communism in Russia has provided others with an opportunity to share the gospel with the Russian people and to be a support to the Christians in Estonia.

MARKUS WAGNER

Finnish Mission Boards and Societies

FINNISH MISSION BOARDS AND SOCIETIES. Finland became independent only in 1917, after a century of Russian czarist rule and, before that, seven centuries of Swedish domination. The oldest and, until recently, largest sending agency, the Finnish Missionary Society, was founded in 1859 and traditionally was organizationally independent of, but closely linked with, the Lutheran Church. It sent out its first missionaries in 1870 to the northernmost region (Ovamboland) of what is now Namibia and a strong Lutheran Church eventually resulted in what remained its main receiving field. In 1901, missionaries were sent to China. After World War II they were withdrawn, but work, usually cooperating with other agencies, was begun in Tanzania, Taiwan, Pakistan, and Jerusalem. By the mid-1960s there were nearly two hundred missionaries with this agency, representing more than 90 percent of the national church’s total force, and supported by voluntary contributions rather than official church funds.

There are a few other small sending societies working within the national church. Mention should be made of the Lutheran Evangelistic Association, which began in 1873 for home mission work as part of a revival movement, but since 1900 has often supported around a dozen missionaries at a time in Japan in association with the Lutheran Church there.

The total of all Protestant free church adherents in Finland is probably under 3 percent of the population and is divided into several denominations, most of which have Swedish- and Finnish-speaking sections (which usually have separate mission programs). The Pentecostals apparently have more members than the combination of all the rest (Adventist, Baptist, Free Church Methodist, Salvation Army, etc.) In general, the small free church denominations take responsibility as a whole for their missionaries rather than through separate organizations. These missionaries often work in cooperation with international agencies, so that it is hard to identify a mission church of specifically Finnish free church origin.
Finnish Mission Boards and Societies

However, the free churches as a whole, and the Pentecostals in particular, contribute quite disproportionately to the total missionary force from Finland. In the early 1970s there were over five hundred Finnish missionaries and this was a doubling of the figure from a decade before. The Pentecostals were sending more than a third of them (and they were going to many different fields, especially in Asia). By the early 1990s, the total of missionaries had grown to over 1,300, serving with some twenty-two agencies, six of which work within the national church. Operation Mobilization has been especially successful in recruiting Finns to serve abroad, most commonly for shorter periods of service.

ROBERT SHUSTER

Fisk, Pliny (1792–1825). American missionary to the Middle East. Born in Massachusetts, he was educated in New England. In 1818 he and Levi Parsons were sent to the Middle East by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions to determine its desirability as a field for American missionaries. All this area—Greece, Asia Minor, Palestine, Syria, and Egypt—was then under the actual or nominal control of the Ottoman Empire. They arrived in Smyrna in 1820 and stayed in that area for the next two years, studying the languages, preaching, and distributing tracts. Fisk sent back reports on the spiritual condition of the region to the Missionary Herald. In 1822 they traveled to Egypt, where Parsons died. Fisk continued his travels. Although he hoped to base his work on reviving the existing churches, rather than creating new ones, his preaching and distribution of tracts and the Bible offended Muslim government officials, his preaching and distribution of tracts and the Bible offended Muslim government officials, Catholic priests, and the Maronite patriarch. By 1825, he joined three missionary recruits in Beirut, where a mission was started. He died in October of that year, just after finishing his Arabic-English dictionary. His efforts marked the beginning of American Protestant missionary work in the region. His niece Fidelia (1816–64) was, in the next generation, an influential missionary among the women of Persia.

ROBERT SHUSTER

Fiske, Fidelia (1816–64). American pioneer missionary to Turkey. Raised in Massachusetts in a strong Christian family that traced its American immigrant roots to 1637, Fiske made public confession of faith in Christ at the age of fifteen, and at the age of twenty-three began attending Mount Holyoke Seminary. After graduating, she taught at the seminary until compelled to go to Persia (now Turkey) by the request for help from a visiting missionary. She arrived in the small Nestorian Community in Urumiah, Persia, in 1842. Fiske saw that one way of raising the value of women in Persian Nestorian society was to educate them. Her task was difficult, for education was not valued in Persia and the Nestorian community, though viewed as heretical in the rest of the world, considered itself Christian. She enjoyed a great deal of success, watching several of her students mature into godly Christian women and providing a model for other girls’ seminaries which opened in cities throughout Persia. When forced by illness to return to America in 1858, she wrote the book Woman and Her Savior in Persia. After teaching for a year at Mount Holyoke Seminary, she died in the summer of 1864.

DONALD TINDER

Fison, Lorimer (1832–1907). English missionary to Fiji. Born in Suffolk, England, he attended Caius College, Cambridge, but was suspended. He went to the goldfields in Australia in the 1850s. Following his conversion in 1860 at an open air Methodist service, he began to preach. He was appointed as a Methodist missionary to Fiji and served there 1863–72 and 1875–84. Fison was the outstanding scholar missionary in Fiji during the nineteenth century and recognized as an authority on Fijian society. He strongly supported Fijian land rights and influenced government policy in this area. In the face of the exploitation of Pacific laborers he made strong representations on their behalf. While he championed the rights of Fijian ministers he adopted a gradualist approach toward the independence of the Fijian church. As principal of Navuloa Theological Institution (1877–84) he provided valuable resources for Fijian students. His breadth of religious outlook was seen in his condemnation of the Methodist-Catholic conflict at Rotuma. His pioneering anthropological work was recognized by honorary degrees and a Civil List pension. In 1884 he returned to Australia, where he edited the Methodist paper, The Spectator (1888–1905), and published Tales of Old Fiji (1907).

ALLAN K. DAVIDSON

Fjellstedt, Peter (1802–81). Swedish missionary to India and Turkey and pioneer missions promoter in Sweden. Born in Varmland, Sweden, he was a shy but very intelligent young man who changed his name to Fjellstedt at age sixteen. After completing his studies, he joined the Basel Mission Society (BaMS) in 1827 because the Church in Sweden had no structures for sending their own missionaries. Prior to departure for India, BaMS required that he return to his homeland to help foster interest in missions. His preaching inspired the formation of the Swedish Missionary Society in 1829. Six years later, a society of the same name but national in its scope was established. After a four-year term in India and another in Smyrna, Turkey, he returned to Europe, where he became a traveling preacher to promote mission interest across the Continent. His sweeping success in addition to his commitment to educating missionaries in biblical and theological studies led to the formation of the first mission institute in Sweden in 1846. As director of the Lund Institute he not only saw to the grounding of the students in the fundamentals; he also launched Lunds Mission-Tidning, a newspaper created solely for the purpose of informing people about the newly formed Lund Missionary Society and to stimulate more interest in the cause of missions. It is fair to say that, before his death, he had succeeded in making missions an important imperative in the life of the Swedish church.

WENDY S. LARSON

Flaw of the Excluded Middle. A concept developed by missiologist Paul Hiebert in an article in Missiology 10:1 (January 1982, pp. 35-47) and later reprinted in Anthropological Reflections on Missiological Issues. Hiebert observed that the Western two-tiered view of the universe typically left out an entire dimension seen quite readily by people of non-Western cultures. Hiebert built his analysis on a two-dimensional matrix. The first dimension is that of three worlds or domains: (1) a seen world (that which is of this world and seen), (2) the unseen of this world (that which is of this world but not seen), and (3) an unseen transempirical world (that which pertains to heavens, hells, and other worlds). The second dimension is that of two types of analogies people use to explain the powers around them: (1) an organic analogy (powers are personal, e.g., gods and spirits) and (2) a mechanical analogy (powers are impersonal, e.g., gravity and electricity).

Combining the seen/unseen/transempirical worlds and organic/mechanical analogies into a matrix, Hiebert's model highlighted the difference between Westerners, who tend to see only two worlds (the seen world and the transempirical world) and many non-Westerners who recognize the middle world, comprised of unseen powers (magical forces, evil eye, mana) and spirits that are very much a part of everyday human life (e.g., a person is ill because of a curse or a spirit attack). The blind spot in the Western worldview Hiebert labeled the flaw of the excluded middle.

His model was quickly picked up by missionaries and missiologists working among non-Western populations, especially those working in areas such as Spiritual Warfare. It was used to give legitimacy to demonic and spiritual explanations of phenomena that had been previously overlooked by Western theology, anthropology, and missiology, all of which tended to look for so-called natural explanations for the observed phenomena. As a tool it named an area many evangelical missionaries had missed in their training and identified the sources of their discomfort in finding ways to contextually address middle world issues in non-Western cultures.

For some, however, the pendulum has swung so far that the danger is a flaw of an expanded middle in which every strange event is thought to have a middle domain explanation; this is especially significant in the contemporary discussion of Territorial Spirits. Using the middle domain to explain all such events is taking Hiebert's analytic model beyond its intention, which was to address the ways events are explained in differing cultures rather than to give an ontological picture of the explanations behind such events.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

SEE ALSO Folk Religions.

Flynn, John (1880–1951). Australian Presbyterian minister, missionary, and founder of Australian Inland Mission. Developing a passion for Australian outback while on shearer's missions and teaching, Flynn used his church contacts to mobilize Presbyterian and wider church interest in the largely uncared-for outback. First through his highly successful publication Bushman's Companion (1910), then through the Oodnadatta Nursing Hostel (1911) Flynn began a long career of developing services and ministry to bush dwellers. The Oodnadatta institution developed along the lines of Flynn's vision for a "Mantle of Safety" into a chain of hostels, hospitals, and chaplaincies, followed by the foundation of the AIM Aerial Medical Service (AMS, a.k.a. Flying Doctor Service). Services were soon also extended to the aboriginal populations of the bush, though his care for indigenous people was long questioned by Charles Duguid. The AMS relied heavily on contact, leading Flynn to champion the use of radio in remote stations, leading to considerable technological advance. His ceaseless advertisement of his programs and his energetic apologetic for the bush caused him to become a key government advisor on services to the outback. The AMS was nationalized and became the Flying Doctor Service of Australia after 1942 (later "Royal"). Flynn was internationally recognized for his work, receiving an OBE and a number of honorary doctorates. He became the symbol of Christian involvement in national affairs, later appearing on the Australian $20 bill. Too activist and incarnational to be evangelical in his theology, Flynn was influenced in younger life by German romanticism and idealism. Long, thin, and given to drawling sermons, which told a story without “religious tags” or “emotional blackmail of any sort,” he suited the outback better than the polish required in the city. At his request, he was buried at the foot of Mount Gillen, outside Alice Springs, central Australia.
Flynn, John

MARK HUTCHINSON

Folk Religions. Most scholars trained in Western schools define religion in terms of the formal, institutionalized religions such as Christianity, Judaism, Islam, Hinduism, Buddhism, and Sikhism, most of which claim universal application. These have sacred texts and commentaries, philosophical traditions and orthodoxies, professional leaders and schools, and organized churches, temples, and mosques.

During the age of exploration, travelers, missionaries, and colonial administrators encountered a great many oral religions around the world. These centered around rituals, myths, ancestors, spirits, witchcraft, and magic, and were particularist in nature. Each tribe and people group had its own gods, and did not seek to convert other peoples to its beliefs.

The initial response of Western scholars was to see these oral religions as superstitions based on prelogical thought. They called these ‘ANIMISM,’ in contrast to ‘religions,’ which they believed were logical and true. They assumed that when the high religions came, the people would abandon their superstitions. Consequently, Christian missionaries rarely took time to study the traditional religions or to deal with them.

As missionaries and anthropologists began to study traditional religions, they found that underlying these are sophisticated conceptual systems that can be articulated by the philosophers in these societies. Moreover, they found that when traditional religionists became Christians, Hindus, or Muslims, they did not abandon their old ways, but added high religious beliefs over the old leading to two-tiered religious systems. While the leaders might be committed wholly to Islam or Hinduism, the common folk went to the mosque or temple to answer some questions, and to the shaman and witch doctor to answer other ones. Most converts were folk Muslims or folk Hindus. Christian missions faces the same problem of split-level religion. Lay Christians around the world go to churches on Sunday, but to traditional healers, exorcists, diviners, and priests during the week. To understand this religion of the common folk, we need to examine the nature of formal and informal religion.

Formal religions deal with ontological questions regarding the ultimate origins, meaning, and end of this world, of humankind, and of individual persons, which they affirm are universally true for all people. Most of the leaders are literate and develop sophisticated philosophical systems based on sacred texts to answer these questions, and are concerned that the laypeople learn and accept these truths. Formal religions have local traditions—the local gatherings of lay followers who live their lives out in the world, and have little knowledge of or time for the theological debates of the great tradition. They provide the people with a sense of the cosmic story and their place in it as they participate in the prescribed rituals.

But high religions often leave unanswered the existential questions ordinary people face in their everyday lives. What is the meaning of life here on earth when I am caught in meaningless drudgery to make a living? How can I prevent calamities such as illnesses and crop failures? Why did my child die so suddenly, leaving no one to care for me in my old age? People know that they need to care for their bodies to be healthy, and to plant and tend their fields to get crops, but when their folk sciences fail, what do they do? If their formal religion provides no answers, they turn to animistic practices—to magic, spirits, ancestors, divination, and other local religious practices.

Folk religions are ad hoc mixtures of local expressions of formal religions and local animistic beliefs and practices. They are sets of loosely related practices, often mutually contradictory, used not to present a coherent true view of reality but to produce immediate results. They provide answers to the existential questions of everyday life. One is the meaning of life here on earth, and an explanation of death, not for those who die, but for those who remain behind and must deal with the grief and loss. A second is the desire for a good life, and the need to deal with the constant crises of life such as illness, spirit possession, droughts, famines, and defeats in battle. A third is the need to make everyday decisions regarding marriage, farming, business, hunting and raids, and the problem that much is unknown. A fourth is the desire for justice and social order, and the constant experiences of injustice, offense, and pollution. Folk religions provide various courses of action to those facing illnesses, bad fortunes, sudden deaths, failure in love and marriage, and guidance for those making important decisions.

The relationship between the leaders of formal religions and the animistic practices of their followers is an uneasy one. In many cases, such as in Islamic fundamentalism, the leaders condemn them as heretical and seek to stamp them out, often by force. In other cases, such as in Hinduism, formal and local folk beliefs and rites are interwoven in complex accommodations. Tribal and local gods are absorbed into Hinduism by identifying them as incarnations of one of the high Hindu deities. Local rites are embedded in orthodox rituals, and goddesses and local spirits are enshrined under the trees and on the edges of Hindu temples.

Given this difference in focus, it should not surprise us that Christian missionaries and leaders trained in formal Christianity called people to eternal salvation, and often failed to address the everyday problems the people were facing. Consequently the people continued to go to traditional healers and diviners. In many cases, new converts knew that the leaders objected to their old ways, so they continued these practices in secret. Animistic beliefs and practices did not disappear, nor were they stamped out. They simply went underground. The notable exception are the independent churches arising around the world, which often seek to provide answers to the problems of everyday life (see African Initiated Church Movement).

Dealing with folk religious beliefs and practices remains an unfinished task in the contextualization of the gospel in churches around the world, young and old. They often have few answers to the questions of sickness, spirits, witchcraft, ancestors, and guidance, so Christians turn to their old ways for answers, even as they go to church for forgiveness and fellowship with God.

There is a growing awareness of the need for the church to provide a whole gospel that addresses both the ultimate and existential questions the common people face. It must present the Good News of forgiveness, salvation, and reconciliation with God. It must also show that this Good News answers the everyday questions of the people. If it does not proclaim a whole gospel, lay folk will continue to come to the church for eternal salvation, but turn elsewhere to deal with the spiritual problems of everyday life. The result will continue to be a two-tiered Christianity, which, in the long run, will make Christianity marginal in their lives, or turn it into Christo-Paganism in which the gospel becomes captive to the local culture and its worldview.

Paul G. Hiebert

Foreign Financing of Indigenous Workers.

Nineteenth-century missionaries often employed local personnel as evangelists, pastors, and Bible women, but eventually they came to realize that unhealthy dependency and “rice Christian” attitudes often resulted from this employer-employee relationship. In reaction to this problem, mission theorists insisted that churches and ministries in the non-Western world should be totally self-governing, self-propagating, and especially self-supporting (see Indigenous Churches). By the early twentieth century many missions had established firm policies against any mission pay or subsidy for local pastors and evangelists.

However, some people believed that insisting on full self-support was an overreaction. Instead, they advocated careful financial partnership with indigenous ministries, treating them as equals rather than employees. Partners International (then CNEC) was founded in 1943 for that express purpose. Among the most vocal advocates of financial support for indigenous workers were Robert Finley, founder of International Students, Inc. and Christian Aid; his brother Allen, president of Folklore. A wide range of stories, traditions, beliefs, and practices that have been preserved by a people but not accepted as part of the official religion. The church has regarded such traditions as mere superstitions, and the Enlightenment philosophers attacked them as unscientific and worthless. The first steps to study religious folklore were taken by the Grimm brothers, who were part of the nineteenth-century Romantic movement. The Grimms claimed that there was a direct relationship between ancient myth and modern fairy tales, which the folklorist should bring to light.

Much folklore is connected with the calendar or stages in the life cycle—birth, marriage, and death. Because a newborn child and its mother are especially exposed to danger, precautions must be taken. A common story is that the fairies may try to steal the baby and replace it with one that is deformed. Brides are encouraged to wear something borrowed and something blue. At a funeral the curtains of the house may be kept closed and the mourners dress in black. Many European people still touch wood for luck.

Folklore is particularly rich among children: studies have shown that they may retain elements that have passed out of use among adults. They have songs and rhymes addressed to ladybirds, butterflies, snails, the first tooth, and the new month. The sun may be asked to shine, and the rain to go away and come another day. Regional repertories are extensive, and though social mobility has increased, many of the stories remain.

David Burnett
Foreign Financing of Indigenous Workers

CNEC/Partners International; and Ian North, Australian founder of Ambassadors for Christ.

As Western colonialism dissolved, between 1946 and 1960, European and American mainline denominations quickly handed over leadership of the churches and institutions their missionaries had established in former colonies. To symbolize this new relationship, American Presbyterians even began to call their missionaries “Fraternal Workers.”

Theologically conservative missions were slower to change but as the churches in the Third World increased rapidly in size and maturity, attitudes among leaders of evangelical missions began to shift. In 1972 the Latin America Mission granted full autonomy to all its field ministries and openly espoused continual financial partnership with them. To a lesser degree, other missions began to follow suit.

Around 1980 two new evangelical partnering agencies were formed, Gospel for Asia and Overseas Council for Theological Education. By the late 1980s partnership with indigenous ministries as equals had become almost a watchword. Scores of new organizations were formed for the express purpose of supporting indigenous workers and ministries in the Third World, instead of sending out missionaries from the West. By 1996 there were more than 110 such organizations in North America alone. In October of that year the leaders of more than fifty of these new support missions met together at the Billy Graham Center in Wheaton, Illinois, for the first “Consultation on Support of Indigenous Ministries.”

The two most common questions that arise when considering foreign financing of indigenous workers are:

1. How can you give them financial assistance without creating unhealthy dependency?
2. How can you assure financial accountability and proper use of funds if you have no direct control over them?

Advocates of financial assistance for indigenous workers insist that interdependency between different parts of the Body of Christ is both biblical and healthy. Unhealthy dependency develops when one partner tries to exercise too much control. Usually it is the provider of financial resources that does so.

If most of the funding comes from a foreign source, then the recipients will feel they cannot risk offending that source. But if the vision, control, and a majority of the funding is indigenous and an open trust relationship exists between the two parties, then foreign funding can leverage and multiply the effectiveness of indigenous ministries without creating unhealthy dependency.

Accountability is greatly enhanced by funding only ministry teams that are organized and have governing boards or similar accountability structures. Giving funds to indigenous workers who are “lone rangers” is always fraught with danger; however effective or charismatic the leaders may be. It is perfectly proper to require regular financial reports by the recipients and even external audits where possible. However, the key to success is to have open trust relationships in a partnership between equals.

CHARLES BENNET

SEE ALSO Globalization.

Foreign Missions Inquiry, Laymen’s. Interdenominational endeavor that grew out of the concern of a number of Baptist laymen, including John D. Rockefeller, over the difficulties that foreign missions were encountering in securing support from contributors and young people. A committee was formed with a membership from seven denominations, including the Northern Baptists, Congregational, Methodist Episcopal, Presbyterian Church in the USA, Protestant Episcopal, Reformed Church in America, and United Presbyterian to try to formulate an effective approach to missions in the modern world. Each of these churches was informally represented by five individuals who made up the Directors of the Inquiry.

In the fall of 1930 three teams of carefully selected research workers, “fact finders,” were sent out to survey the missions of these denominations in India, Burma, China, and Japan. Their work was placed at the disposal of a fifteen-member commission of appraisal headed by the distinguished philosopher William E. Hocking. They spent about nine months visiting the countries surveyed and writing the report, Re-Thinking Missions (1932). A vigorous debate resulted, concentrating on the liberal theological convictions found in the document. The Christian message, the report explained, had passed beyond arguments “over details of the mode of creation, the age of the earth, the descent of man, miracle and law, to the state of maturity in which there is little disposition to believe that sincere and aspiring seekers after God in other religions are to be damned: it has become less concerned in any land to save men from eternal punishment than from the danger of losing the supreme good” (p. 19). It advocated that missionaries should cooperate with the good in other religions and cultures to secure social justice and to purify unhealthy religious practices, and that the ultimate goal should be the emergence of the various faiths out of their isolation into a world fellowship of religion. It also noted that the great dangers with which all religions had to deal were communism and secularism.

The report was widely criticized, especially in Europe, for its abdication of the basic MISSIONARY TASK of proclaiming the gospel. However, subsequent to the report, it proved impossible for the major Protestant denominations to return to missions with the same assurance of the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE (EDINBURGH 1910). Despite the controversy surrounding the Inquiry's conclusions, the wealth of information found in the "fact finders' reports published in the supplementary volumes continue to be valuable.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

Bibliography. W. E. Hocking, Re-Thinking Missions, A Laymen's Inquiry After One Hundred Years; K. A. Latourette, IRM 22 (1933): 153–73; idem, IRM 46 (1957): 164–70; Laymen's Foreign Missions Inquiry, Supplemental Series (7 vols.).

Foreknowledge. See Divine Election.

Forgiveness of Sins. The forgiveness of sins is at the very heart of the Christian message. It is a profoundly complex doctrine that ultimately includes our idea of God, of God's relation to the world, of the nature of humankind, of sin, of the incarnation, death, and resurrection of Jesus, of the last judgment, and of our eternal state in heaven or hell. The concept of forgiveness was at the core of Israel's worship in both tabernacle and temple, centering upon sacrifices—some even being named sin-offering, trespass-offering, and peace-offering. These offerings dealt with the problem of sin and restored peace with God by affirming the reality of forgiveness through a God-appointed religious practitioner.

But forgiveness of sin is not just a national or a theological issue. It is also a very personal issue, lying deep within the human heart. We all struggle with the realization that something is drastically wrong that we cannot put right. We have offended God and his moral laws and justly deserve judgment. Yet also deep within us we know that God can forgive us our sins, so we cry out to him for that remission. In the New Testament, the message of forgiveness was brought by John the Baptist (Luke 3:3), by Jesus in his earthly life (Mark 2:5, 7, 10) and in his post-resurrection state (Luke 24:45–47), by Peter at Pentecost (Acts 2:38), and by Paul as he traveled on his missionary journeys (Acts 13:38, 39). In the Book of Revelation the redeemed of God are those who conquered through the blood of the Lamb (Rev. 5:9; 7:14; 12:11) and Jesus is symbolically seen as the triumphant slain Lamb who can unfold the destiny of the nations and is worthy of all praise (Rev. 5:6–10). The Christian message is a message of forgiveness and the redeemed who spend their eternity with God are those who have been forgiven of their sins.

The Biblical Doctrine of Forgiveness. Theologically speaking, there are three basic components to the doctrine of forgiveness: the nature of humankind, the nature of God, and the provision that God has made to restore the broken relationship between himself and his fallen world.

The Fallen Nature of Humankind. It is not necessary to consider every aspect of the human person in order to discuss the nature of forgiveness; one alone is necessary, the fact of human sinfulness (see Sins). It is this negative quality, oddly enough, that lifts us most clearly above the rest of our earthly, created order and shows us most decisively what we are not to be, even though that is what we are. This is true because sin is a moral category and only moral, responsible beings may sin. And because guilt attends our sin, we are painfully aware that sin ought not to be there even though it is and it is unquestionably ours; we cannot honestly blame anyone else. All the major religions of the world have concepts of morality, sin, guilt, and responsibility (see also Human Condition in World Religions). The Bible, in particular, speaks with great force and clarity here, emphasizing the inherent nature of our sinfulness, its gravity, and its consequences. Sin is not simply something that we have done wrong or some hurt we have inflicted upon someone else; sin is an offense against God and God's moral requirements, requirements that derive from his very nature. Were the moral nature of the universe simply the result of God's decisions, they would not have ultimate ontic reality and could be changed at will. Rather, the moral categories—the violation of which makes sin sinful—are expressions of the very nature of reality as God has created it, with ourselves as God intended us to be, and with God himself as he eternally is (see Divine Attributes of God). Hence, David cries out, "I know my transgressions and my sin is always before me. Against you, you only have I sinned and done what is evil in your sight" (Ps. 51:3, 4). As the contemporary psychologist Karl Menninger puts it, sin is "an implicitly aggressive quality—a ruthlessness, a hurting, a breaking away from God and from the rest of humanity, a partial alienation, or act of rebellion. . . . Sin has a willful, defiant or disloyal quality. Someone is defied or offended or hurt" (Whatever Became of Sin? p. 19)—and that someone is God. The Bible presents an unremitting picture of universal human sinfulness, surrounded by the apostle Paul in Romans 3:10–18, concluding with “All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God” (Rom. 3:23).

Among the many dire consequences of sin, the most devastating is alienation from God, which results in eternal condemnation. The sinful mind is hostile to God (Rom. 8:7), sinners are the enemies of God (Rom. 5:10), we are dead in our trespasses and sins (Eph. 2:1), the wrath of God abides upon us (John 3:36), and sinners will not inherit the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 6:9) but “will be punished with everlasting destruction and shut out from the presence of the Lord and from the majesty of his power” (2 Thess. 1:8).
Forgiveness of Sins

The radical nature of our sinfulness renders us incapable of rectifying the situation. We are incapable of bringing anything of sufficient value or ultimacy to God of such a nature as to atone for our sins. We are, in fact, lost in our sins and totally unable to find a way out of our hopeless situation.

The Nature of God. As has already been seen, sin is, in essence, a violation of the nature of God, but what is it in God that is violated? Scripture speaking, it is the totality of God’s infinite perfections or attributes. All that God is recoils from that which is less than morally perfect and the attempt to single out one attribute or another that is most offended by sin would be to slice God up into categories as though God were some internally unrelated collection of qualities, rather than a unified, personal Being. Having said that, however, the holiness of God does stand out as the quality most obviously violated when human beings sin (Josh. 24:19; Pss. 5:4; 92:15; Hab. 1:13; Rev. 6:10). The Bible is replete with affirmations of God’s holiness and of the demand that we be holy (Exod. 15:11; Lev. 11:44, 45; Isa. 6:3; 1 Peter 1:15) and when we fail to live up to God’s standards we fall under the just judgment of God. God’s justice and impartiality decree that everyone be treated fairly and equally, which translates into everyone being equally under the judgment of God, since every one of us has violated God’s commands.

Were this the end of the story, humankind would be in a sorry state, for there could be no such thing as forgiveness. However, God’s love and his mercy work alongside his holiness and justice in such a way that all aspects of his being are satisfied. The Scriptures reveal a God, who although he is holy, also delights in mercy and forgiveness (Deut. 4:31; Neh. 9:31; Ps. 78:38; Isa. 55:7; Dan. 9:9; Luke 6:35). “Who is a God like you?” asks Micah, “Who pardons sin and forgives the transgression of the remnant of his inheritance?” Who, indeed? There is no other God who can forgive the sins of lost humanity.

The Provision of God for Forgiveness. There was only one way that the totality of God’s being could be satisfied that the demands of his holiness and justice be met while at the same time expressing God’s love and mercy. To do that God devised a plan of salvation that met his infinite demands and offered full salvation to the lost, at no cost to them, since they were in no position to pay anything. No human being could do such a thing, yet it had to be done on the human plane, because it was for the sake of human beings. The infinite demands of God could only be met by the infinite God himself. This line of reasoning underlies the New Testament’s doctrine of the incarnation, death, and resurrection of Christ. Only God could meet the demands of God, so the second person of the Trinity became one of us in order to pay the price of sin, freeing God up to offer forgiveness of sin to the lost (2 Cor. 5:21). As Paul put it, “God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself” (2 Cor. 5:19). In this way God could be both just and the One who justifies the person who has faith in Jesus, because all the requirements of his holiness, justice, love, and mercy have been met (Rom. 3:25, 26). Specifically, the redemptive work of God is the death of Jesus Christ on the cross. There the punishment due us was paid for by God himself in the person of his Son (Rom. 5:6–10; 1 Cor. 15:3; Gal. 1:4; Eph. 2:13). Jesus ties the forgiveness of sins directly to his coming death, when at the last supper he says, “This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins” (Matt. 26:28).

The Missiological Implications of Forgiveness. When considering the missiological implications of forgiveness, what stands out most prominently in the New Testament is the uniqueness of Christ, who he is and what he has done. Because there is only one God, there is only one Son of God, who died for sin once for all. There is only one plan of salvation and one Savior who must be proclaimed to all the earth for “Salvation is found in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given to men by which we must be saved” (Acts 4:12). The fact of Christ’s uniqueness and that forgiveness of sin may be found nowhere else lays a moral imperative upon the church to make his name known. There are not many saviors for many people, but only one savior for all peoples and that is the incarnate Son of God who died and rose again. It is this fact that underlies the command of God himself to us that repentance and forgiveness of sins be preached in Jesus’ name to all nations (Luke 24:47). Where else can salvation be found except in Jesus? Because of this, those who had experienced the forgiveness of their sins were to be empowered by the Holy Spirit and then become “witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth” (Acts 1:8).

Peter began this on the day of Pentecost in Jerusalem offering his compatriots forgiveness of their sins in Jesus’ name (Acts 2:38), continuing this to the Gentile Cornelius in Caesarea (Acts 10:43), then reaching others in Asia Minor (1 Peter 1:1, 2), ultimately giving his life for the gospel in Rome during the Neronian Persecution. Others went elsewhere. Paul traveled extensively across the Roman world, John went to Ephesus, Titus went to Crete, Mark went to Egypt, and Thomas, according to some records, went to India.

What motivated these early believers was certainly the uniqueness of their message, coupled with the command of God, but they had also experienced the love of God in their own forgiveness and hence wished to share that sense of release with others (2 Cor. 5:14). For whatever reason, the early church realized that the forgiveness of sins must be at the heart of their message (Acts 10:43; 13:38, 39; 26:17, 18), just as it must be today.

WALTER A. ELWELL

SEE ALSO Confession of Sin.

Forman, Charles W. (1916– ). Indian-born American missionary scholar and missionary in India. Despite being born in a family of Presbyterian missionaries that spanned three generations, Forman did not consider missionary work until he was an adult. While in seminary at Union (New York), already having completed a Ph.D. (history) at the University of Wisconsin, it suddenly dawned on him that he could teach seminary in an overseas setting. In 1945 he moved to the North India United Theological College in Saharanpur, where he taught until 1950. Three years after returning to the United States he succeeded KENNETH SCOTT LATOURETTE at Yale University, where he taught for the next thirty-four years.

Deeply involved from the beginning in the Theological Education Fund of the WCC, his extensive travels in the late 1950s provided exposure to the development of educational facilities in the South Pacific that were largely unknown in the West. The lack of available research and the indigeneous nature of the churches and institutions motivated him to concentrate his study and research in that part of the world. This led to positions such as chair of the Foundation for Theological Education in Southeast Asia from 1970 to 1989, publications such as The Voice of Many Waters: The Story of the Life and Ministry of the Pacific Conference of Churches (1982), and international recognition as an authority on the church in the South Pacific.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

France (Est. 2000 pop.: 59,024,000; 543,965 sq. km. [210,025 sq. mi.]). One of the largest countries in Western Europe and one of the ten wealthiest countries in the world, France has often been referred to as the “eldest Daughter of the Church” when reflecting on its rich Roman Catholic heritage, but since the Revolution of 1789, the society has become a hardened, secular state.

History of Christianity in France. The gospel was brought to France by the end of the first century A.D. via Italy and was firmly established in Lyons and Arles in the second century. The church father, Irenaeus, was consecrated the bishop of Lyons in A.D. 180 as he ministered among both the Greek-speaking community and in the vernacular. Serious persecution is recorded in A.D. 171 in both Lyons and Vienne. Further persecution under the Emperor Decius (A.D. 249–251) brought on the martyrdom of St. Denis, the Bishop of Paris, and Saturnin of Toulouse. By France

A.D. 312 Christianity became the official religion of France and gained further control of the society. The conversion of Clovis, the king of the Franks, on Christmas Day in A.D. 496 marked the beginning of the strong ties of the church and state. Columbanus (c. 543–615) and Boniface (680–754), early missionaries from the British Isles, journeyed through France.

The ties of church and state were strengthened under Charlemagne of the Holy Roman Empire in A.D. 800. The Crusades to recapture the Holy Land were first preached in A.D. 1095 by Bernard de Clairvaux. The church's power and intolerance grew and forced movements of laity that emphasized personal piety and the translation of the Bible into the vernacular. At the height of the Reformation the Protestants and their sympathizers were estimated to encompass nearly a quarter of France's population. This posed a tremendous threat to the monarchy and the Roman Catholic Church and ultimately led to a war of religion that drained France of many of her educated literate artisans and others. Many lost their lives and hundreds of thousands left France for Switzerland, Germany, South Africa, and even the American colonies. By the time of the French Revolution, the Protestants found more freedom but had little strength. Over the nineteenth century while the Roman Catholics sought in vain to regain their former strength and power over French society, missionaries/pastors from Scotland (Haldane) and England (Baptists and Methodists) established a foothold. In the early twentieth century the Salvationists and the Welsh Revival made their mark.

In terms of France's mission outreach, the French have played a significant role in Catholic missions. In addition to the work of the Paris Evangelical Mission Society, other smaller French Protestant mission societies have been active over the past two centuries (see also French Mission Boards and Societies).

People of France. There are growing ethnic minorities due to naturalization and immigration. The ethnic French are 74.7 percent with regional minorities including the Breton, Alsatian, Flemish, Basque, Corsican, and Catalan. National minorities include the Jews, West Indian Antilleans, Gypsies, and Reunionese. North Africans and Middle Easterners comprise 7.3 percent of the country but are nearly 50 percent of the population of Marseilles. Asians, coming from Vietnam, China, Laos, Cambodia, India, and Sri Lanka account for 1.3 percent of the population. Africans from the former colonies are less than 1 percent.

Religion of France. Since 1905 there has been a separation of church and state. The nonreligious are currently estimated at just over 19 percent; almost 8 percent are Muslim. Though over 70 percent claim to be Christian, the church attendance rate is only 13 percent. Less than 2 percent are Protestant, just over half of which are evangelical.

There are numerous missionaries serving in France from North America, the United Kingdom, Holland, Germany, Scandinavia, and Switzerland. Many of the newer evangelical churches in the metropolitan areas are being founded with help from missionaries.

France is described as an ideological vacuum and has become a mission field for Christians, both Protestant and Roman Catholics, as well as Muslims, Buddhists, and the cults.

John Easterling

Francis, Mabel (1888–1975). American missionary to Japan. Of the many things that could be said about Mabel Francis, the one statement at the top of the list is that she loved her enemies. She was an American missionary to Japan during World War II. At a time when the United States and Japan were waging war against each other, Francis was sharing the gospel of reconciliation.

Francis was born in Corinth, New Hampshire, where she was raised. She started teaching school at age 15. Soon thereafter, she began to feel a conviction from the Lord about her failure to preach the gospel. So she began holding Sunday afternoon church services in the schoolhouse. Revival broke out in that New England community, even among the most resistant people.

At age 19, Francis responded to God's call to missionary service in Japan. She began her ministry there in 1909 and remained in Japan for fifty-six years. When the missionaries were called to return to the United States during the 1930s, she decided to remain with the Japanese people.

She was deeply devoted to them and could not bear to leave them during their greatest trials. Due to the lack of financial support from the United States and the Great Depression, both she and the Japanese people suffered greatly. However, because of her courage, love, and consistency in preaching the gospel, many Japanese people were brought to the Lord.

Kathy McReynolds

Bibliography. M. Francis with G. B. Smith, One Shall Chase a Thousand.

Francis of Assisi (c. 1182–1226). Italian founder of the Franciscan Order. Francis worked in his father's textile trade until a serious illness brought him to a deep internal struggle. This conflict and a vision in 1205 led him to dedicate himself to a life of prayer and ministry among the poor. After a pilgrimage, during which he traded clothes with a beggar and personally ex-
Fraser, Donald

Franson, Fredrik (1852–1908). Swedish-born American founder of TEAM. Born in Nora, Sweden, in 1852, Franson immigrated to the United States at age seventeen with his mother and stepfather and settled in Nebraska. A profound conversion experience at age nineteen left him an intensely committed disciple of Jesus Christ. In 1875 he moved to Chicago and joined Moody Church, which commissioned him to conduct evangelistic campaigns among the Scandinavian immigrants in the United States. Ordained in the Evangelical Free Church in 1881, Franson continued to minister around the country. In 1890 he organized a missionary training course in Brooklyn and a mission board in Chicago. Having been heavily influenced by George Muller and Hudson Taylor, his was a mission based on prayer, faith in God’s provision, and an evangelistic focus. In the years that followed, hundreds of missionaries were sent out to China, Japan, India, and Africa under the Scandinavian Alliance Mission of North America. From the founding of the mission until he died in 1908, Franson traveled the globe preaching the imminent return of Christ and encouraging his fellow missionaries. The legacy of this man of faith, prayer, and unwavering commitment to his Savior continues today as his mission, which is now known as THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE MISSION (TEAM), fearlessly proclaims the truth of Jesus Christ around the world.

Wendy S. Larson

Fraser, Donald (1870–1933). Scottish missionary to Malawi. Missionaries influenced the parents of Donald Fraser, who was dedicated for ministry at birth. While a theology student, Fraser helped organize an international missionary conference entitled, “The Evangelization of the World in This Generation.” In 1896 the Scottish Free Presbyter-
Fraser, Donald

The Church sent him to Nyasaland to serve with the Livingstonia Mission. During furlough (1901) he married Agnes Renton Robson, a physician, who also had a mission call. She was active in the work, teaching women, giving medical care, and writing. They had five children; one died at birth. Fraser served in a large area where the British government did not have influence. His responsibilities included evangelization, leadership training, and overseeing a system of village schools. His writings show his obvious love of the Word and the people. His missiological principles included the following: use local customs to build biblical knowledge; dreams, knowledge of the spirit world, and group loyalty are important evangelism factors; evangelism is best done by local people; local elders must be involved in all church decisions; village schools are to be built and financed by the villages; Christians should be involved in ministry; and Africans should send missionaries. Fraser wrote several books and articles about Africa and how to reach Africans with the gospel.

Mikel Neumann

Fraternal Workers. Fraternal workers, a term used by denominations and mission agencies since the 1960s, refers to long- and short-term cross-cultural missionaries.

In the 1960s, the term “national church” was used to refer to the churches of Africa, Asia, and Latin America. Calls for a moratorium on sending missionaries from Europe and North America, and cries such as “missionary go home,” gave rise to the thinking behind “mission on six continents” at the 1963 CWME Mexico City Conference.

Mission on six continents called for new ways to refer to missionaries and their roles, especially among mainline churches of the United States and state churches in Europe, resulting in concepts like “mutual sharing of resources” and “partnership in mission.” Protestants and Roman Catholics rediscovered the local church as the primary mission agent, leading to a new view of the purpose and role of missionaries and mission agencies. An integral response to this was to refer to missionaries as “fraternal workers.”

“Fraternal workers” meant that missionaries were accountable to leaders in the receiving churches in an equal, cooperative relationship. Missions as organizations of expatriate missionaries were dissolved, recognizing the authority of the national churches. Mission agendas and projects were to be set by the receiving churches with specific goals and time lines. The “fraternal workers” became employees of the sending denomination or mission agency, transferred to work for the receiving church.

Although the motives behind using fraternal worker were well-intentioned, the results were mixed. The unique call, authority, giftedness, and leadership of the long-term cross-cultural missionary were undermined. The significance and contribution of long-term missionaries in contextualization of the gospel and in providing new vision and direction in world evangelization were diminished. The term lowered the motivation of churches and individuals in the West to support mission efforts financially and structurally, and its use in ecumenical and mainline Protestant circles paralleled their dramatic decline in mission funding and sending.

Charles Van Engen

Freedom. See Religious Freedom.

Freeman, Thomas Birch (1806–90). English missionary to West Africa. The son of a black African father and a white English mother; he was born in England two years after the slave trade had been abolished. A Wesleyan Methodist shoemaker led him to Christ. His African roots gave him an interest in African missions.

Freeman sailed for the Gold Coast in 1837 under the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society. This portion of West Africa (Ghana, Togo, Benin, and Western Nigeria) was known to the outside world for the brutal slave trade and the short life of white missionaries. His new bride died within two months of their arrival. His second wife died in 1841 after less than seven months in Africa. His ill health, discouragement of losing his wives, and lack of funds did not deter him from his work. In 1854 he married an educated African Christian. They had four children.

Freeman was instrumental in starting churches and schools throughout two great African kingdoms, the Ashanti and the Dahomey, where the gospel was unknown. While he never learned the local language, he made friends of powerful Africans who said, “He understands our customs.” He was the first missionary to visit the great cities of gold. He also observed the brutal atrocities of the slave trade that he fought. He was a peacemaker among Africans and between England and African kingdoms.

Mikel Neumann

Bibliography. A. Birtwhistle, Thomas Birch Freeman, West African Pioneer; T. B. Freeman, Journal of Various...
Visits to the Kingdoms of Ashanti, Aku, and Dahomi; F. D. Walker, Thomas Birch Freeman: The Son of an African.

Freire, Paulo Reglus Neves (1921–97), Brazilian educator and theorist. Born in northeastern Brazil on September 19, 1921, Paulo Freire’s early life was a journey from childhood poverty into secondary school teaching, adult literacy efforts, and political activism, culminating in a professorship at the University of Recife. There, along with students, he developed a highly effective literacy program which gained the support of the government and rapidly grew into a national movement.

The Revolution of 1964 forced Freire into exile. He first went to Chile where he worked in agrarian reform and wrote Spanish and Portuguese editions of his two most significant works, Education for Critical Consciousness and Pedagogy of the Oppressed. Later, he taught at Harvard University (1959) and served as a consultant with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in Geneva (1970–79).

When he returned to Brazil in 1980, Freire became involved in the Partido de Trabalhadores (Workers’ Party), in base ecclesial communities within the Roman Catholic Church, and in a spectrum of other teaching, consulting, and writing activities. He died May 2, 1997.

For Freire, the major problem of society is that the masses live in a culture of silence, dominated and oppressed by higher classes. Nondialogic or “banking” education, with its emphasis on depositing information in the minds of passive students, is a principal instrument of oppression. Education which liberates must be dialogic, problem-posing, and consciousness-raising (conscientizing).

Freire’s thought has had a global impact on adult education, international development, religious education, and missiology. His influence is seen in the writings of liberation theologians and in documents from the Second Latin American Episcopal Conference (Medellin, 1968). Evangelical appraisals of Freire’s contributions appear in publications of the Latin American Theological Fraternity. His ideas are also evident in Catholic and Protestant base ecclesial communities, in renewal movements in international theological education, and in the PRAXIS elements of THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION BY EXTENSION.

Lois McKinney Douglas

French Guiana (Est. 2000 pop.: 179,000; 91,000 sq. km. [35,135 sq. mi.]). French Guiana or Guyane is located on the northeast coast of South America, east of Suriname and with Brazil to the east and south. The name “Guiana” means “Land of Many Waters,” and was known as Cayenne in colonial times. The country continues to be dependent on France although it is an Overseas Department of France. It is known for its famous former penal colony of Devil’s Island.

The region was visited by the Spanish explorers early in the sixteenth century, who did not settle down because there was no gold. The British tried to take possession of the territory in 1654. Guyane became a French colony in 1667. Except for a Dutch attack in 1676, it remained undisturbed until 1809, when it was seized by an Anglo-Portuguese naval force. In 1814, France regained control until 1946 when the Colony of French Guiana became the Department of Guyane.

The predominant religion of Guyane is Roman Catholicism, although the majority of the population are nominally Roman Catholic. The first missionaries were Jesuits, followed by the Holy Ghost Fathers and other European orders. The Roman Catholic testimony spread among the maroons or Bush Negroes (descendants of escaped slaves). The work among the Djuka was especially successful. During the 1820s a colony was founded by Mother Anne Marie Javouhey, Superior of the Sisters of St. Joseph Cluny, for the freed slaves. In 1848 slavery was irrevocably abolished. French Guiana comprises the single diocese of Cayenne, suffragan to the archdiocese of Fort-de-France, Martinique.

Protestant testimony has not been in significant in the country. The local Anglican Church forms part of the diocese of Guyana, with the bishop residing in Georgetown. Other Protestant communities are the Seventh-Day Adventists and the Assemblies of God.

Pablo A. Deiros

French Mission Boards and Societies. France has been a mission field since the beginning of Christianity. Paul’s disciple Crescens possibly reached Gaul (2 Tim. 4:10 according to ancient manuscripts). The first congregations were Greek-speaking. Latin became common until French was shaped and established itself as a religious language. Worship in French became the rule in the sixteenth century in the emerging churches of the Reformation. The Roman Catholic Church of France followed suit only after the SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL allowed local languages to be used in the Mass liturgy (1963). Sermons, however, were always delivered in French. The level of language is differentiated according to educational, social, and geographical backgrounds. BIBLE SOCIETIES produce several translations from basic to literary French.

France today is both a mission field and a sending country. Home and foreign missions (based mostly in America, England, Holland, and Germany) are approaching secularized French populations and also linguistic minorities settled in France in growing numbers (North and West Africans, Asians, Eastern Europeans). A striking development was the creation of the Evangelical Gypsy Church in France through the ministry of Clément Le Cozsee and some American missionaries. This church was received in 1975 as a full member of the Federation of Protestant Churches in France. Similarly, some missionary groups are targeting so-called NOMINAL CHRISTIANS. Many scattered Pentecostal, Baptist, and independent evangelical congregations and networks have emerged mainly in the cities, either spontaneously or through the ministry of evangelists and missionaries.

While the consolidated Protestant population in France oscillates between 2 and 5 percent, Roman Catholic tradition is cherished by about two-thirds of the population. This includes a strong foreign missionary commitment, which interfered with French foreign policy in the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth centuries, when France officially protected Roman Catholic missions in China and the Pacific.

There are about 300 Roman Catholic missionary orders and congregations in France; among them at least 210 women’s congregations of French origin. But most of them have become international groups due to the Vatican strategy of centralization since 1922, and to international recruitment. At this time most of originally French Catholic foreign missions have moved their headquarters to Rome: the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, founded in 1816 by Eugène de Mazenod; the Holy Ghost Fathers, re-founded by François Libermann in 1848; the White Fathers, founded by Charles Lavigerie in 1868; the Christian Brothers, the Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny, the Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul, among many others. Until the decline of missionary vocations in the 1960s, France and the Netherlands had the highest ratio of missionaries in the world. Roman Catholic missions are supported by a worldwide fund established in Rome since 1922, but fund raising is also operated by local and regional missionary networks.

The internationalization of the Protestant missionary movement is probably even more evident. The PARIS EVANGELICAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY (1822–1971) always recruited its staff from many European countries and worked in close cooperation with the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, the BASEL MISSION, and the Methodist Mission. This mission board was restructured in 1971 as the French Evangelical Department of Apostolic Action (DEFAP). It recruits missionaries and volunteers on behalf of almost all denominations (Reformed, Lutheran, Moravians, Baptists, Mennonites, Free Churches). Other French evangelical missions are associated with Swiss, Dutch, German, English, and American mission boards.

Significant organizations in France are Action Chrétienne en Orient Fellowship (founded in 1922 by Paul Berron in Strasbourg, restructured in 1995), the Baptist branch of the European Baptist Union, the French branch of the Evangelical Leprosy Mission, the French branch of the Evangelical Mission in Côte d’Ivoire, the International Association for the Albert Schweitzer Hospital at Lambarene, Gabon.

When the churches in the mission fields became autonomous bodies in the 1950s and 1960s, mainline mission boards merged into the synodal structure of the French churches. This so-called churchification of missions led to the creation of a new intercontinental and interchurch body, the Apostolic Community for Apostolic Action (CEVAA) (1971), which presently operates on behalf of forty-seven churches worldwide, with headquarters in Paris. Its first executive secretary was Victor Rakotoarimanana, of the United Reformed Church of Madagascar. This body is directly supported by church synods, according to the respective financial capacities of the member churches. Swiss and French contributions make up 90 percent of the budget.

Relationships between Roman Catholic and Protestant missions used to be tense and even hostile until the SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL (1962–65) articulated a new theology of ecumenism. There have been many successful experiments in forms of common witness. Two ecumenical associations of missiologists have been established (1979 for mission history, 1994 for mission theology).

A puzzling development is the multiplication of highly profiled nongovernmental organizations in the field of development and relief, relying upon secular funding. Many of them have a Christian background, but are reluctant to cooperate with established churches and mission boards.

Marc R. Spindler

French Polynesia (Est. 2000 pop.: 242,000; 4,000 sq. km. [1,544 sq. mi.]). French Polynesia consists of some 130 islands in five groups located in the western Pacific halfway between Australia and South America. The French protectorate declared in 1842 was extended over the whole group by 1901. The country is an overseas territory of France with its people having French citizenship, representation in the French parliament, and their own Territorial Assembly. Nearly half the population are members of the Evangelical Church; one-third are Roman Catholics; and Freytag, Walter (1899–1959). German theologian and missiologist. He served as professor of missions and ecumenical studies at the University of Hamburg until his death in 1959, having graduated from Tübingen, Marburg, and Halle Universities and receiving his doctorate in psychology and education from the University of Hamburg in 1925.

One year after receiving his doctorate, Freytag became the director of the German Missionary Council. He led this ecumenical group of thirty missionary societies for thirty-three years. He assumed an important role at the organizing and founding of the World Council of Churches in Amsterdam in 1948. He also helped organize the East Asia Christian Conference in Indonesia in 1957.

Missiological interest and ecumenical involvement carried Freytag to the major International Missionary Council meetings in Jerusalem, India, Canada, Germany, and Ghana. At his death, Freytag was vice chairman of the International Missionary Council and chairman of the Division of Studies of the World Council of Churches.

Freytag’s missionary research in the 1930s carried him to New Guinea, Indonesia, and China to study the impact of Christianity upon those cultures. He published his conclusions in his book The Spiritual Revolution in the East.

Friends Missionary Prayer Board. The outgrowth of prayer bands started by Tamil young men in 1958, FMPB became a missionary sending agency in 1967 when its first missionaries were sent to Dharmapuri District. The mission expanded to North India in 1972. By 1978 there were 119 missionaries including wives. In 1987, 274 were reported, and 423 in 1992. By 1997 FMPB had a total of 620 missionaries and 120 field stations in 17 states. 300 local evangelists (converts) were trained as leaders in about 1,600 congregations begun by the mission.

FMPB is a lay Christian movement with an efficient organizational structure supported by prayer group members. Recruitment is through district “Gideonite Meets,” area-wide “Challenge Meets,” and prayer cell meetings where a missionary challenge and call for volunteers is given. Leadership carefully screens applicants. A rigid spiritual discipline is demanded. Candidates are sent for a year of training at Bethel Bible Institute, DanishPET, and other exposures. The first year in the field is considered probationary.

The major emphasis is on evangelism and church planting. Various social ministries are carried on providing needed health care, hygiene, water, child care, education, and other services. FMPB has experienced considerable group conversion in Gujarati and Bihar.

Friends (Quakers) Missions

gelical Friends Mission (EFM) is the missionary arm of EFi/North America and after its formation in 1975 became the most active Friends agency in establishing new churches among unreached peoples.

Friends United Meeting. Friends United Meeting (FUM) maintains missionary and fraternal church ties in East Africa (Kenya, Uganda, and Tanzania), Cuba, Jamaica, Belize, Palestine (Ramallah Friends School and Monthly Meeting), Mexico, and Native American missions in the United States. New works in the 1990s include contacts in Moscow, Russia, and in Tescui, Romania.

The overwhelmingly largest of FUM church plants is in Kenya, where perhaps more people call themselves Quaker than in any other nation. Roughly one hundred thousand adherents are now divided among a number of autonomous Yearly Meetings. The original “Friends Africa Industrial Mission” was begun about 1900 and promoted by the missionary efforts of three students from what is now Malone College in Ohio. In the beginning, it was a blend of technical training, medical ministry, founding of schools, and evangelistic church planting. One of the three students eventually left the Friends mission and paved the way for the large and prosperous work of World Gospel Mission, a phenomenon repeated by other Friends pioneers in Bolivia, Honduras, and elsewhere. Another started a new work in Burundi, later related to EFI.

Evangelical Friends Mission. Evangelical Friends Mission represents a fourth wave of Friends missions, beginning in 1975 in Mexico City. Other new missions started by EFM include a Muslim student ministry, the Philippines, Friends of Garhwal (North India), Nepal, Rwanda, and Siberia, Russia. After 1975, EFM also became a missions network for the member yearly meetings of Alaska, Evangelical Friends Church—Eastern Region, Northwest, Rocky Mountain, and Friends Church Southwest. These older missions and national churches include Bolivia, Peru, Guatemala, Honduras, and El Salvador; Bundelkhand province of India, Taiwan, Burundi, and Rough Rock Indian Mission in Arizona. The largest membership block of evangelical Friends work exists in Latin America, with perhaps fifty thousand calling themselves Friends (including Central Friends in Bolivia). New works were started in the late 1980s and 1990s in Indonesia, Cambodia, and Jamaica. The national churches of these Friends were loosely organized worldwide by the Evangelical Friends International Council with Regional Directors in Africa, Asia, Latin America, and North America.

Nonaligned but evangelical Central Yearly Meeting (Indiana) pursued a separate mission in Bolivia, with as many as five spinoff Yearly Meetings within that nation. Other individual Yearly Meetings cared for smaller and scattered missions efforts.

The close of the twentieth century found the two American Friends missions agencies (FUM and EFM) phasing out of older fields and passing into new ones. Missionaries like Everett and Catherine Cattell (India), Charles and Leora DeVol (China and Taiwan), Roscoe and Tina Knight (Latin America), and Arthur and Edna Chilson (Africa) represent a distinguished and vigorous history of cultural sensitivity, interdenominational leadership, and spiritual zeal. Their wholistic ministries stressed conversion evangelism and church planting along with education, human equality, women in ministry, and the guidance of the Holy Spirit in worship and service. Strong national leadership arose in East and Central Africa, Central and South America, and Taiwan. Were it not for twentieth-century missions, Quakerism would have nearly disappeared from the picture of world Christianity. Instead, the majority of Quakers are now non-Western evangelical Christians who have joined the missionary sending movement by commissioning workers to Nepal, Nicaragua, Peru, the Philippines, Siberia, and Zaire.

Ronald G. Stansell

Friendship Evangelism. Evangelism that emphasizes the crucial role that relationships play in constructing a platform from which the gospel can be communicated effectively. In this approach, friendships are not conceived of as supplanting the gospel. They are bridges over which the gospel may be delivered and received.

This approach is also commonly known as Lifestyle Evangelism. It highlights the necessity of living out the Christian life in a consistent and winsome manner in the context of family and friendships. This is foundational to the companion step of proclaiming the gospel. A living demonstration of the gospel must go together with its proclamation. This is particularly true in friendship evangelism. The foundational premise is that a lifestyle of obedience to the lordship of Christ makes one’s verbal witness credible.

The biblical basis for sharing the gospel along lines established by friendships and intimates is strong. The example of Jesus is instructive. He was known as a friend of sinners (Matt. 11:19). Yet for that reason the multitudes heard him gladly. The earliest disciples of Jesus were won by friendship. John the Baptist pointed two of his disciples and friends to the Lord. One of these, Andrew, immediately sought his brother, Peter. Philip, a likely friend of Andrew and Peter, was the next convert. In turn, Philip found his friend Nathanael and brought him to the Lord (John 1:35ff.). After Jesus had healed the Gadarene demoniac he instructed him, “Go home to your family, and tell them how much the Lord has done for you, and how he has had mercy on you” (Mark 5:19 [NIV]). In the Book of Acts the account of the Gentile centurion Cornelius illustrates this same principle. This seeker gathered together his extended family and close friends to hear the message that Peter was commissioned to share with him (Acts 10:24).

The advantages of friendship evangelism are significant. First, it makes use of the most natural avenue for the spread of the gospel. The close emotional and physical proximity of unbelieving intimates provides ample opportunities for witness. Second, the unbeliever who has observed a wholesome Christian witness from a personal friend is much more likely to receive the message of salvation and become a disciple.

Dangers are also inherent in this method. It is possible to allow the friendship factor to supplant a clear presentation of the demands of the gospel. A good testimony, as invaluable as it is, can never take the place of the gospel message in the process of salvation (Rom. 1:16). Also, one might be tempted to neglect strangers or slight acquaintances who need the gospel in favor of investing exclusively in closer friends.

The Christian has no right to limit obedience to the GREAT COMMISSION to a select circle. Nevertheless, believers should be cognizant of their responsibility to share the gospel with their friends and intimates. Even more, Christians of all cultures should be intentional in cultivating genuine friendships with unbelievers.

JEFFERY B. GINN

Bibliography. J. Aldrich, Life-Style Evangelism: Crossing Traditional Boundaries to Reach the Unbelieving World; D. Owens, Sharing Christ When You Feel You Can’t: Making It Easier to Tell Your Friends and Family about Your Faith in Christ; T. Stebbens, Friendship Evangelism by the Book; C. Van Engen, You Are My Witnesses.

Frontier Mission Work. See PIONEER MISSION WORK.

Frontier Peoples. See PEOPLES, PEOPLE GROUPS; UNREACHED PEOPLES.

The Fruit of the Spirit. The fruit of the Spirit as found in Galatians 5:22–23 is often contrasted with the gifts of the Spirit and made to say something quite different than originally intended. As Paul argues for a new kind of spirituality, so those who study this text today may find themselves arguing for a spirituality that differs sharply from that found in the church today.

The Context: Particularism or Universalism. The Book of Galatians can be seen as a sustained argument by one missionary for a universalist perspective against other missionaries arguing for a particularist viewpoint. Gentile Christians are being urged to embrace circumcision and the Law as a means of sanctification. Paul argues from his own experience (Gal. 1:1–2:14) and from the Scriptures (2:15–5:12) that God wills salvation for Gentiles and Jews through free grace, apart from the Law. This freedom can only be maintained by the Holy Spirit (5:13–6:10).

Flesh or Spirit. The most pervasive of several antithetical arguments in Galatians is that of flesh/law, related to Spirit. Paul asks: “Did you receive the Spirit by doing the works of the law or by believing what you heard? Are you so foolish? Having started with the Spirit, are you now ending with the flesh?” (3:2–3, NRSV).

Individual Spirituality or Community Spirituality. Paul accents community spirituality in Galatians. This becomes clear in his “one another” exhortations (5:13, 15, 26; 6:2); “let us” challenges (5:25, 26; 6:9, 10); and warnings about “biting and devouring” and “competing against one another” (5:15, 26). Individually each Christian “lives by the Spirit,” having “crucified the flesh,” (5:16, 24). Paul views Christians living out this new way of life in community (5:13–15, 26; 6:1, 2, 10). The Spirit empowers relationships in community.

The Meaning of Flesh and Spirit. One’s understanding of flesh and Spirit is crucial in interpreting the fruit of the Spirit in Galatians. Interpretations of flesh (sark) vary widely. The NIV translates sark as “human nature” in most places in Galatians while the NRSV retains the word flesh. The NIV translation conforms to the common evangelical view of the Christian life as a struggle between two entities in the person with the Christian caught in the middle, as in Galatians 5:17. This interpretation must be rejected.

Paul’s usage of flesh and Spirit in Galatians is rooted in his eschatological view of salvation history. For Paul salvation history divides between two aeons, with the death of Christ and the coming of the Holy Spirit marking this division. He reminds the Galatians that “the Lord Jesus Christ... gave himself for our sins to rescue us from the present evil age” (1:3) and recounts their salvation experience with the Holy Spirit (3:2). The flesh and Law dominates one aeon and the Spirit the other. To walk by the Spirit is to experience the empowering age to come (5:16, 18, 25).

Christ and Holy Spirit (two kingdom promises) introduce a new way of salvation. The crucified Christ and the empowering Spirit determine the nature of the universal gospel and the Spirit-empowered nature of the people of God. Partici-
The Fruit of the Spirit

Larism (flesh and Law) characterizes the old aeon. Seeking holiness without the enabling Spirit fulfills the desires of the flesh and puts one under the Law (5:16, 18, 19–21). The Spirit of Christ empowers Christians to experience the "already" of God's kingdom.

Fruit versus Works. The agricultural metaphor of fruit can be found throughout Scripture. Jesus uses this metaphor to show the results of one's relationship to God (John 15). Paul uses the metaphor to describe the life of the Christian (Rom. 6:22; Eph. 5:9; Phil. 1:11; 4:17). Paul contrasts the fruit of the Spirit (5:22–23) with the works of the flesh (5:19–21). Producing fruit through the empowering Spirit is not a passive experience, but a dynamic interaction between being led by the Spirit (the indicative) and walking by the Spirit (the imperative). Fruitbearing calls for disciplined obedience to the Holy Spirit, recognizing his presence in the community.

The word "fruit" may be considered plural or singular. Lists of vice and virtues are common in both biblical and extrabiblical literature. None of these lists are meant to be exhaustive. For example, this list leaves out such virtues as forgiveness and mercy. Lists of vice and virtues are meant to be exhaustive. For example, this list leaves out such virtues as forgiveness and mercy. Paul contrasts the fruit of the Spirit (5:22–23) with the works of the flesh (5:19–21). Producing fruit through the empowering Spirit is not a passive experience, but a dynamic interaction between being led by the Spirit (the indicative) and walking by the Spirit (the imperative). Fruitbearing calls for disciplined obedience to the Holy Spirit, recognizing his presence in the community.

The Fruit. Love—Christ, Paul, and John stress love as the foundational virtue. God is love. Christ's love for marginals in society distinguished him. Love calls us to place priority on people. Love fulfills the Law (5:14).

Joy—Joy is the keynote of Christianity. The Spirit's manifest presence in the church will be evidenced by joy.

Peace—Modern life brings deep personal anxieties, robbing people of peace. Personal peace flows from and into community. The Holy Spirit can enable diverse people to experience and maintain peace.

Patience—Also translated longsuffering. Living in community calls for an ability to put up with the foibles and idiosyncrasies of others. Without Spirit-produced longsuffering there will be anger and quarrels (5:20).

Kindness—Kindness manifests itself in the words we speak and the acts we engage in when in community. Kindness manifested strengthens those benefited.

Goodness—Not found in extrabiblical literature. Being generous or good is a quality of moral excellence. This word is used for God (Luke 18:18–19). It is the opposite of envy.

Faithfulness—This word pistis occurs twenty-two times in Galatians, normally translated faith. Faithfulness is perhaps correct here. The spiritual quality of loyalty, commitment, and steadfastness in our relationships in the body of Christ is the idea.

Gentleness—Perhaps the most difficult of the virtues to translate into English. At one time the English word "meekness" was a good translation. Because many people are opinionated, gentleness will curb inclinations to run roughshod over others.

Self-control—This could be one of the virtues whose primary application is individual, although certainly needed in relationships. Our passions must be brought under the control of the Spirit. Self-control is needed to avoid such sins as fornication, impurity, and drunkenness.

Application. Spirituality is determined by the empowering presence of the eschatological gift of the Spirit. Never before in the history of Christianity has this message been more needed than today. Missionaries establishing churches by preaching a gospel of grace may be tempted to introduce "law" for daily Christian living. For instance, missionaries in Africa confronted by polygamous marriages are tempted to lay down the law of monogamy. Dependence on anything except the Spirit leads to walking in the flesh. "Those who belong to Christ Jesus have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires" (5:24). Christianity as a way of life calls for the enabling power of the Holy Spirit.

For Western Christians this message is especially applicable. Modern evangelicalism, influenced by a highly technological society, is advocating a "technique" spirituality. Self-help and "how to" advice dominates. This new legalism characterizes Western spirituality. Paul calls for an abandonment of the flesh in all of its forms. Walk by the Spirit. Love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control characterize the community of faith when the crucified Christ and the empowering Spirit are present.

Harold G. Dollar

See also Conscience, Ethics, and Moral Development.

Frumentius (c. 300–380). Pioneer missionary to Ethiopia. Greek and Roman historians recount how the youthful Frumentius and his brother Edesius on a voyage from Tyre about 330 were shipwrecked on the Ethiopian coast and captured. They subsequently impressed the royal court at Axum so much that they were allowed to preach the gospel—a work continued by Frumentius after Edesius had returned to Tyre. About 339 Frumentius went to Alexandria, where Bishop Athanasius consecrated him as bishop and arranged for missionaries to join Frumentius in Ethiopia whose future church heads were known as “Abuna” (“Our Father”).

J. D. DOUGLAS

Fuller, Andrew (1754–1815). English founder of the Baptist Missionary Society. Born in Wicken, Cambridgeshire, Fuller joined the Soham Baptist Church at the age of sixteen. Though lacking formal theological training, he was called to be their minister in 1775. Seven years later he moved to Kettering, Northamptonshire, where he served until his death.

Fuller began to promote the missionary endeavors of the Baptist Church in about 1784. The Baptists of his time tended to push the tenets of Calvinism to the extreme belief that since God would call his elect, there need be no invitation to salvation through presentation of the gospel. After searching the Scriptures and studying authors like Jonathan Edwards, Fuller published an opposing view in 1785: The Gospel Worthy of All Acceptance, or the Obligation of Men Fully to Credit and Cordially to Approve Whatever God Makes Known. This book helped to ignite the fire of evangelism and missions among the Free Churches in England. It greatly impacted William Carey (1761–1834), who became the first missionary of the Baptist Missionary Society, which was founded in 1792 at Kettering. Fuller served as its first home director.

Fuller was given D.D. degrees by Princeton and Yale in recognition of his contributions. His complete works were first published in 1838 and have been reprinted several times.

GARY LAMB

Bibliography. T. E. Fuller, A Memoir of the Life and Writings of Andrew Fuller; A. G. Fuller, The Principal Works and Remains of the Rev. Andrew Fuller.

Fuller, Charles E. (1887–1968). American radio evangelist and founder of a school of missions. Having been influenced by A. B. Simpson, Charles Fuller’s father, Henry Fuller (1846–1926) set aside monies from his orange groves in Redlands, California, for the advance of foreign missions. Then in 1945 Charles Fuller, internationally known from his weekly hour-long broadcast (1937–67), felt God’s call to use this money to found a theological seminary with a zeal for missions.

Fuller asked Harold J. Ockenga to organize such a school because he both pastored a church in Boston supporting many missionaries and had the academic credentials needed. Fuller Theological Seminary (named after Henry Fuller) opened in Pasadena in 1947. The seminary’s missionary emphasis led 20 percent of its graduates from 1950 to 1960 to go into foreign missions.

In 1964, at age seventy-seven, Charles Fuller mandated David Hubbard, the seminary’s third president, to organize a school of world mission. It opened in 1965 with Donald McGavran as dean. His church growth principles, developed as a lifelong missionary in India, shaped its curriculum and faculty selection. Since then over 1,800 students who serve in more than 150 countries have graduated with mission degrees from Fuller.

DANIEL P. FULLER

Bibliography. D. P. Fuller, Give the Winds a Mighty Voice; G. M. Marsden, Reforming Fundamentalism.

Fund Raising. Missionary enterprises require adequate financial underwriting. Missions attached to mainline denominations may use special offerings (Southern Baptists) or assessments per church member (Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) to supply the needs. The missionary may have little to do in this process or may have only a catalytic role (Christian and Missionary Alliance) speaking at district missions conferences. For a growing number of evangelical denominational missions (Evangelical Free) and for all independent societies (AIM, SIM), fund raising is a task shared by the agency and the individual missionary. Churches may partner with a mission agency to help in underwriting the support of individuals, mission-run institutions, and special projects. These funds may (Overseas Missionary Fellowship) or may not (The Evangelical Alliance Mission) be pooled by the agency to underwrite the general needs of the mission.

The mission may provide significant help, training, and guidance for those raising funds, but many agencies rely on the individual to follow up contacts and raise one’s own support. The administrative cost of fund raising varies a great deal. In some cases there is practically no overhead because of volunteers in the home office (World Prayer League); in other cases it is a fixed percentage of all income (e.g., CBInternational—15 percent). Missions with a higher cost may often have greater benefits for their missionaries than do those with little or no administrative costs.

JOHN EASTERLING

Fundamentalisms. Certain dynamic and popular religious movements that have been a significant feature within World Religions during the twentieth century. Part of their power and appeal lies in their claim to rediscover religious authenticity and divine purpose amidst the confusions of modern life by attempting a retrieval of the original doctrines and practices of their particular religion. Such fundamentals in an unchanged form are regarded as being the answer to the needs of humankind in every age and context.
Fundamentalisms

Despite this focus on the past, fundamentalism is itself a product of the modern era. The history of the particular religion is seen as a record of general decline and compromise. The fundamentalist response to modernity stands as an alternative to the liberal approach, which sees the history of religion as progress and is willing to review religious doctrine in the light of modern knowledge as a means of achieving contemporary relevance.

The origins of the term “fundamentalism” in Christian circles are usually associated with the publication of a series of tracts entitled The Fundamentals (1909–15), which defended certain tenets of biblical orthodoxy as literally true. These included creation in six days, the virgin birth, the physical resurrection and bodily return of Christ. The fundamentalists affirmed the inerrancy of Scripture (including its descriptions of supernatural events) in contrast to the more liberal approach to the Bible, which was based on historical and source criticism and scientific opinion.

In the United States the fundamentalists became associated with revivalist movements and dispensationalism. Some fundamentals in their opposition to modernity separated from denominations that included modernists, while others (including Carl Henry) led the way for the evangelicals, Bible-believing Christians within many traditions who were more open to a cultural engagement with modernity.

Fundamentalist tendencies may be detected in other world religions (e.g., within Hinduism in the nationalist political forms of Shiv Sena and the Bharatiya Janata Party). However, the word “fundamentalism” has been more popularly associated with certain modern reform movements within Islam (e.g., from Ibn Taymiyah, d. 1328) and articulated a powerful message of religion, patriotism, and revolution. In the context of the decline of Islam (associated in part with the Western colonial era) they advocated a return to the roots of the faith. What was needed was not less Islam or adulterated Islam, but original and genuine Islam. The vitality of the fundamentalist agenda continued in the postcolonial era in opposition both to Western interference and to the secularized rulers in independent Muslim nations who misjudged the religious sentiments of the masses.

The central question is whether traditional Islamic institutions and law are now outdated and need to be modernized. Islamic fundamentalists believe that the relevance of the traditional sources of Muslim faith and practice was not limited to seventh-century Arabia, but that in their original form they are still suited to the modern era. Thus fundamentalists call for the implementation of Islamic law (shari’a) in such detail as the veiling of women, the prohibition of banking interest, certain forms of criminal punishment, and the execution of apostates.

Patrick Sookhdeo

Fundamentalist Denominational Missions. Many fundamentalist mission agencies emerged in the context of ecclesiastical controversy during the early twentieth century. Since most fundamentalist denominations are inherently separatistic, their approach to foreign missions has been very different from that of mainline Protestant denominations. Fundamentalists reacted to what they perceived as theological laxity and overly centralized bureaucratic structures in traditional Protestantism. In establishing alternatives to denominational mission boards, fundamentalists made concerted efforts to avoid these alleged pitfalls; hence, the relationships between fundamentalist denominations and the mission enterprises that they have supported have frequently been indirect and deliberately decentralized. In fact, very few fundamentalist denominations have mission agencies that are integrally or officially incorporated into a denominational framework.

Some of the earliest denominational missions of a fundamentalist cast resulted from the Landmark controversy in the Southern Baptist Convention, which began in earnest around 1850. Landmarkers believed that mission work was the responsibility of the local church, so they generally opposed the organized efforts of societies or denominational boards, including the SBC’s Foreign Mission Board. Conflicts surrounding Landmarkism were the most intense in Arkansas and Texas during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, eventually leading to the rise of two Landmark denominations, which are now known as the American Baptist Association and the Baptist Missionary Association of America. The Missionary Committee of the ABA, based in Texarkana, Texas, serves as a support agency that assists local churches in sending out missionaries who are engaged in church planting, theological education, evangelism, and literature distribution in Latin America, Europe, Africa, Asia, and Oceania. The BMAA, headquartered in Little Rock, Arkansas, reports itself as “a denominational sending agency,” an apparent shift from strict Landmark principles. It supports church planting, Bible distribution, theological education, and evangelism in Latin America, Europe, and Asia. Both Landmark denominational programs are small, with a combined overseas missionary corps of less than fifty.

The fundamentalist-modernist controversy of the 1920s and 1930s produced several fundamentalist quasi-denominational agencies. Fundamentalists, particularly in the Northern Baptist Convention (now the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.) and the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (northern), grew increasingly disillusioned with their denominational boards and turned instead to nondenominational faith missions, some of which predated the fundamentalist-modernist conflicts, or to new organizations that offered a denominational focus without being part of the mainline establishment. Overall, Baptist and Presbyterian fundamentalists wanted mission agendas with greater emphases on evangelism and doctrinal orthodoxy.

As early as 1920, Baptist fundamentalist William C. Haas, who earlier had worked with the Africa Inland Mission and the Heart of Africa Mission, set up the General Council of Co-operating Baptist Missions of North America in Elyria, Ohio. This agency became one of the endorsed missions of the General Association of Regular Baptist Churches, a fundamentalist denomination that resulted from a Northern Baptist schism in 1932. The GCCBMNA eventually expanded its ministry beyond Africa to include Latin America, Asia, and Oceania, and was renamed Baptist Mid-Missions in 1953. Currently based in Cleveland, Ohio, BMM’s more recent projects have centered on church planting, Bible translation, broadcasting, camping, correspondence courses, theological education, evangelism, literature production, literacy work, medical missions, relief aid, and aviation services. One of the larger fundamentalist agencies, BMM employs more than 600 overseas personnel.

Raphael C. Thomas, a former American Baptist Foreign Mission Society medical missionary in the Philippines, established the Association of Baptists for Evangelism in the Orient in 1927 after disputes with the ABFMS regarding doctrine and evangelism. This organization, renamed the Association of Baptists for World Evangelism in 1939, likewise received the accreditation of the GARBC. Its work has grown to include other parts of Asia, Latin America, Europe, Africa, and Oceania. With headquarters in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, the ABWE focuses today on church planting, evangelism, Bible translation, medical work, theological education by extension, and aviation services. Like BMM, the ABWE supports in excess of 600 overseas missionaries. These two agencies represent the bulk of foreign mission endeavor that is related to the GARBC.

One additional organization that emerged out of controversy in the Northern Baptist Convention was the Conservative Baptist Foreign Mission Society. The creation of CBFMS in 1943 pointed to continuing fundamentalist concerns about the NBC’s missionary program. The founders hoped to create a channel for NBC churches that wanted to support conservative evangelical missionaries, but they were not allowed to function under the NBC umbrella and thus formed the Conservative Baptist Association in 1947. The CBFMS, now called CBInternational, has been the main missionary arm of the CBA. Although established in the waning stages of the fundamentalist-modernist disputes, CBInternational now is considered part of the American evangelical mainstream, unlike BMM and the ABWE.

The most significant fundamentalist Presbyterian missionary society to appear during a period of conflict was the Independent Board for Presbyterian Missions, founded in 1933 by J. Gresham Machen. Machen had accused the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions of harboring modernists in its missionary corps, and wanted a missions alternative for conservatives in the Presbyterian Church. His involvement with the Independent Board led to his defrocking and the formation in 1936 of what was eventually named the Orthodox Presbyterian Church. Carl McIntire, a dissident who once was allied with Machen, subsequently gained control of the Independent Board and made it the virtual foreign missions department of his Bible Presbyterian Church. Today it is a very small agency, based in Philadelphia, with work in evangelism, church planting, theological education, and literature distribution. With the loss of the Independent Board to McIntire, the Orthodox Presbyterian Church launched its Committee on Foreign Missions in 1937. Headquartered in Willow Grove, Pennsylvania, this committee supervises less than twenty missionaries who are engaged in evangelism, church planting, theological education, literature distribution, and support of national churches in six foreign countries, most notably in Japan.

Along with several other independent organizations in the Baptist tradition, these fundamentalist missions have consistently maintained evangelism and church planting as missionary priorities. They also have contributed to the overall diversity of the American Protestant missions movement. At the same time, many of them have shown a divisive spirit and a marked unwillingness to cooperate with other evangelical agencies.
Fundamentalist Denominational Missions

JAMES A. PATTERSON

Funerals. See Death Rites.

Furlough. The period of time when the missionary is home from the field for a set period of rest, reentry (adjustment to the changes in one’s home country), taking care of personal and family needs, and giving reports to supporters. Since the 1980s, the word “furlough” has been replaced with the term “home assignment,” for the missionary is still on active duty while at home.

Missionaries are often assigned a percentage of time to spend in active ministry in churches. Certain missions with denominational underwriting (Southern Baptists) make this time strictly a period of rest and retooling, but most missions require missionaries to spend time visiting supporters. A furlough was often set on a four-to-one ratio—four years on the field and one year on furlough. However, medical, educational, and financial needs often required an extension to meet the personal situation of the missionary.

With the advent of inexpensive international travel, a greater percentage of missionaries are moving to summer furloughs every two or three years so as to not leave their ministry for an entire year nor to interrupt the educational programs of their children.

JOHN EASTERLING
Gabon (Est. 2000 pop.: 1,517,000; 267,667 sq. km. [103,346 sq. mi.]). Gabon is one of the most Christianized nations in Africa. Over 90 percent of the Gabonese population professes Christian faith.

The American Board of Commissioners was the first mission agency to send missionaries to Gabon. The missionaries arrived in Baraka, near present-day Libreville, in 1842. Thus began the evangelization of northern Gabon. American Presbyterian missionaries had been active on the island of Corisco, off the coast of Gabon, since 1849. The American Board of Commissioners joined the Presbyterian Mission in 1870. This led to the opening of the first Presbyterian mission stations around Lambaréné in 1874.

American Presbyterian missionaries had to curtail their activities, however, as France extended its colonial rule over Gabon toward the end of the nineteenth century. They sought cooperation with the PARIS EVANGELICAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY as a way of gaining protection from French authorities. The Franco-American cooperation in missions lasted from 1888 to 1892. In 1892, the Presbyterians ceded their work in Gabon to the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society and transferred their missionaries to Cameroon.

Over the years, schools and other forms of social work became the focus of the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society. The Lambaréné Hospital, founded by the Mission in 1913, is the best known example. It was directed by ALBERT SCHWEITZER from 1913 until his death.

When the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE established its first mission station in Bongolo in 1934 it found Protestants well established in the northern part of the country. It concentrated its efforts on southern Gabon. Eventually the Alliance extended its work nationwide. There are at least two factors behind that decision. First, Christians from Alliance churches moved to Libreville and other major urban centers in northern Gabon. Second, the churches of northern Gabon were increasingly less evangelical.

As the only major evangelical church in Gabon, the Alliance enjoys significant growth. It must deal, however, with nominal Christianity fueled by the respectable and politically powerful Catholic Church and Protestant Church of northern Gabon. It must also contend with Islam and a variety of cults. The missiological challenge in Gabon is one of reevangelization.

TITE TIÉNOU

Gairdner, William Henry Temple (1873–1928). Scottish missionary to Egypt. Born in Ayrshire, Scotland, at Oxford University he received his call to missionary service through contacts with the KESWICK and STUDENT VOLUNTEER movements. In 1899 he joined Douglas Thornton in Cairo, Egypt, to begin ministry with the CHURCH Missionary Society, and in 1901 was ordained in the Church of England. In 1902 he married Margaret Mitchell, who bore him five children.

Gairdner and Thornton established a reading room and bookstore, learning from patrons the arguments of Muslims against Christianity. Gairdner spoke of his frustration with these "masters of the art of disputing," preferring instead everyday conversation with individuals or small groups. In 1910 he studied Islam under Duncan Black MacDonald and Ignaz Goldziher, but felt that his goal of becoming a missionary scholar of Islam could not be realized due to the extensiveness of his ministry. However, in addition to administrative responsibilities, he taught classes on the Arabic language, published the journal Orient and Occident, wrote several book-length treatises on Islam, and developed dramatic productions for use in outreach ministry.

Convinced that inter-mission cooperation was necessary to erase the stigma of sectarianism, he participated in several ecumenical conferences and developed a relationship with the Coptic Church of Egypt.

LARRY POSTON
Gardiner, William Henry Temple

Bibliography. C. E. Padwick, Temple Gardiner of Cairo.

Gall (c. 560–645). Irish missionary to Switzerland. Gall, a gifted linguist and significant participant in the Celtic Missionary Movement, began his missionary career as one of twelve companions of Columbanus, the Irish abbot who traveled throughout Europe to reach the peoples there for Christ. During the journey, Gall became ill, and Columbanus, who was determined to continue to northern Italy and reach the Lombards, was forced to leave him behind.

Having recovered from his illness, Gall was convinced that God had called him to serve where he was. He was given permission to set up his own very modest living accommodations, and, after some exploration, found the type of place he sought. It was here that the famous night-time encounter with a bear (commemorated in the trademarks of St. Gallen) took place.

Gall is also remembered as a competent exorcist, and was reportedly given the land grant on which the monastery bearing his name sits by Sigebert after he cast demons out of the king’s daughter. Over the thirty-five years of his ministry, Gall acquired substantial prestige, seen in nominations to become bishop of Constance and abbot of Luzeuil. His commitment to a simple lifestyle, however, compelled him to turn both down. While there is little written evidence of his own personal evangelistic activity, he is known today as the apostle of Switzerland because of the evangelistic work of his followers. Gall died from illness on October 16, 645.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Bibliography. W. H. Marnell, Light from the West: The Irish Mission and the Emergence of Modern Europe.

Gambia (Est. 2000 pop.: 1,291,000; 11,295 sq. km. [4,361 sq. mi.]). The Republic of Gambia is surrounded on three sides by Senegal, with the Atlantic as its western border. Originally a British dependency, Gambia became a separate colony in 1888 and gained independence in 1965. In this predominantly Muslim country (85% of the population), mosques are found in the majority of towns and villages where the majority are Sunnis of the Malekite rite. African tribal religiousists comprise 11 percent of the population and are strongest among the Serer, Diola, Pacari, and Bassari peoples. The Constitution of 1970 guarantees freedom of thought, religion, public manifestation, and propagation.

The first permanent missionary was an Anglican chaplain who arrived in 1816, followed five years later by the British Methodists. While Catholicism touched Gambia through Portuguese traders around 1445, the first Catholic mission was not founded until 1849. The first Protestant group was Wec International, which sent missionaries in 1966. With only 3 percent of the population professing Christianity, it is evident that none of these organizations have been successful in attracting members. By 1982, both the Anglican and Methodists had indigenous and expatriate clergy while there were no indigenous Catholic priests. There is one diocese responsible directly to the Holy See.

The Gambia Christian Council, comprising Catholics, Anglicans, and Methodists, was founded in 1963 to cooperate in joint services and the production and distribution of literature. Radio Gambia also rotates among these three churches, broadcasting an epilogue every Sunday.

Bibliography. D. B. Barrett, WCE.

Gardiner, Allen Francis (1794–1851). English missionary in South Africa and South America. Born in a Christian family in the quiet Berkshire village of Basildon in 1794, Allen Gardiner became a restless adolescent and joined the British Navy at the age of fourteen. The death of his mother; a narrow escape from drowning off the Peruvian coast, and observing the lives of Christians in Tahiti seem to be the main factors leading up to his conversion to Christ. He was tempted to exchange his sailor’s garb for the minister’s gown but the words of the Apostle Paul, “Let every man, wherein he is called, therein abide with God,” convinced him to serve the Lord upon the seas, which he did for several years.

Throughout the 1830s he was used by God to initiate the gospel among the Zulus in South Africa. His stubborn perseverance finally won over the Zulu king Dingarn. But his heart was set on South America, especially the Patagonians of the southern cone. In 1838 he tried to reach them overland via Mendoza, Argentina, but this and following attempts failed. He returned to England in 1843 to try to persuade the Church Missionary Society to open Patagonia to the gospel. Having received a negative response from the society, Gardiner himself organized some backers. In 1850, together with a small band of committed Christians, he made one last attempt to reach the Patagonians by sea. Evangelistic encounters with the Patagonians did not produce the desired response. Sickness, scurvy, inclement weather, and a lack of food caused the members of the missionary band to die off one by one. Gardiner was the last one to perish, leaving behind only his journal. But it was the discovery and later publishing of that journal in Hope Deferred, Not Lost which stirred the hearts of many Christians around the world. The following year a vessel, the Allen Gardiner, carried new missionaries to evangelize the Patagonians. Thus was born the South American Missionary Society which for over a century has proclaimed the Word of God throughout Latin America.

LINDY SCOTT

GCOWE. See Global Consultation of World Evangelization '95 (GCOWE 95).

GCOWE II. See Global Consultation of World Evangelization '97 (GCOWE II).

Geddie, John (1815–72). Scottish-born Canadian Presbyterian missionary in New Hebrides (Vanuatu) and founder of the New Hebrides Mission. Son of a Congregationalist elder in Banff, Geddie joined the Scots diaspora to Canada in 1816 and settled in Pictou, Nova Scotia. He was active in Bible and Missionary Societies, in support of London Missionary Society (LMS), and with others prompted the establishment of the Synod of Nova Scotia mission to Polynesia in 1844. An experienced cabinet-maker, Geddie saw printing and medicine as essential aids in mission, to gain the “good favour” of Polynesians and to make the gospel available. He departed Halifax in November 1845 and was eventually assisted by the LMS in establishing a mission on Aneitum, where he produced an alphabet and within six weeks was able to preach in dialect.

Printing of elementary school books, Scripture portions, and finally the entire New Testament in Aneityumese (1863) followed, which was to have profound effects on the development of Vanuatu culture and nationality. Though obstructed by fever, storm, indigenous opposition, traders, extension of French imperialism, and Catholic missionaries, the LMS/Nova Scotian group extended their influence throughout the South Pacific.

The mission extended to other islands in the group, such that after his death it was said of Geddie that “When he landed in 1848 there were no Christians here, and when he left in 1872, there were no heathen.” Less imperially minded than Paton, Geddie led opposition to the indentured labor trade, and to the use of British military force in reprisals against aggressive indigenes. He made the most of and fostered Australia’s growing interest in missions and Pacific expansion, overseeing cooperative work between the Canadian and Australian Presbyterian churches. Wiry, intelligent, practical yet spiritual, Geddie was of the finest type of colonial Scot, producing a missionary church of lasting integrity and influence.

MARK HUTCHINSON

Bibliography. R. S. Miller, Misi Gete: John Geddie, Pioneer Missionary to the New Hebrides; J. Garrett, To Live Among the Stars.

Gender Roles. The term “gender” refers to the nonbiological, social, cultural, and psychological aspect of being male or female. Gender roles reflect the cultural norms of the society and can be defined as the learned or socialized differences in behavior between male and female. Society’s definition of feminine and masculine gender role expectations has changed throughout history and there continues to be pressure for the redefining of gender roles. Few areas of inquiry are so fraught with personal biases as the gender-role related characteristics of men and women. Though formerly research in this area was done primarily by men, a large number of research-trained women are now involved and new insights have resulted.

All societies provide institutionalized gender-appropriate roles. In some societies moving into womanhood requires special ritual and celebration for girls, often perceived as preparation for marriage. Gilmore (1990), who has researched the approved way of being an adult male in many societies around the world, sees manhood as generally needing to be achieved. It is a precarious state that boys must win against powerful odds and that can be diminished or lost as well. It involves conceptually separating adult males from the women and girls in society. Womanhood, in contrast, he sees as a natural condition that happens through biological maturation and is culturally refined or augmented through body ornamentation or cosmetic behavior.

Though male domination is a universal with men filling the positions of authority and power, women have great influence. Men and their values, status, and work, tend to be “in focus” while women have much responsibility and work hard in the background, more “out of focus.” In many societies a woman’s status depends on her husband’s status in society. In others, a woman’s status depends almost totally on her position among the other women. Another way of contrasting men’s and women’s status is to see men’s position as “public” and women’s as “private” (in the home). Men are most often seen as protectors and providers and women as childbearers and nurturers, both being necessary for the wellbeing of society.

The Bible clearly states that all humans are created in God’s image, both male and female (Gen. 1:27). Furthermore, humans, both male and female, have been given salvation and made ambassadors for God (2 Cor. 5:17–20). However, there are a variety of interpretations of what the Bible teaches concerning the relationships of men, women, and God. On the one hand, a hierarchical arrangement is perceived with woman under man who is under God (Mickelsen, 1983). On the other hand, equality between male and female is perceived with both being equally responsible to God (Spencer, 1985). Yet another interpretation focuses on complementarity with male and female using their God-given strengths for honoring and serving God (Hull, 1987).
Gender Roles

The institutionalized Western church has generally reserved the positions of authority, decision making, and top leadership for males. However, from the very beginning of the modern mission movement women have played an active role. Besides providing home-front support, they responded to God’s call and went to the field, first as wives and mothers but later as teachers, nurses, and nannies. Once on the field they became church planters, evangelists, preachers, and administrators. Their choice to become missionaries reflected their deep Christian commitment and their search for a structure that would allow them to unite the spiritual with practical needs in the world. In the early decades of the twentieth century women outnumbered men on the mission field by a ratio of more than two to one. They have been the “guardians of the great commission” (Tucker, 1988). Though there were forty-four women’s missionary boards sending both men and women to the field in 1910, today the authority structure and decision-making power in mission organizations is mostly in male hands.

It is important for missionaries to understand the fact that differences in gender roles are socially defined. In cross-cultural work the tendency is to impose the cultural patterns of the carrier of the gospel on the assumption that they are biblical without even investigating what it means to be male or female in the receptor society. The Bible, however, shows God working according to the gender role definition of each biblical society. In divided societies where women function in the women’s world and men in the men’s world, it is usually best that the carrier of the gospel be the same sex as the hearer. Women need to reach the women and the men the men in such a society. If one gender creates and sings the songs of the society, then that sex should be tapped as a key resource for that role in the church. Division of labor according to gender as prescribed by the society does not have to change when people become Christian. Leadership training in the church for males and females should be related to the roles they play in society. Brusco (1995) has done an excellent anthropological study on the effect of conversion to evangelical Protestantism on gender roles in Colombia. Her work shows how allegiance to Christ brings gender role changes.

Dealing with these and other changes is important to crosscultural communicators of the gospel. Often legislation allows for change long before there is a change in attitude and practice. For instance, in areas where the women’s role has been traditionally in the home and then they are given the option of training for a career; when they are working outside the home they continue to be unconsciously evaluated by society on how well they run their homes. New technologies, urbanization, education, war, and industrialization all result in subtle changes in gender roles. There needs to be sensitivity not just to the logistics of what is happening, but to the meaning of what is happening to both genders. Changes affecting the women also bring change for the men, and vice versa. All of these changes influence the structure and program of the church and development programs. Often a different approach is needed to reach those choosing to retain traditional role definition from those who choose change.

Marguerite G. Kraft

See also Women in Mission.

General Revelation. See Revelation, General.

George, Eliza Davis (1879–1979). American missionary to Liberia. Growing up in Texas during the late nineteenth century, Eliza George faced severe obstacles to her call to missions. Her vision of telling her brothers and sisters in Africa that Christ has died for them met with two major stumbling blocks. As a “black woman” she was told that she did not “have to go over there to be a missionary—we have enough Africa over here”; nor was she capable of pioneering work since an African American woman had never previously served as a foreign missionary. Yet she became “the first black woman from Texas to go to Africa as a missionary”—a pioneer missionary with remarkable accomplishments.

George arrived in Liberia in 1914, immediately establishing a Bible Industrial Academy for the training of fifty boys. Her great love became the holding of revivals in churches and in regions without churches. After fifty-five years of service in Africa in the face of continuing set-backs, “Mother” George left a legacy of the establishment of the Elizabeth Native Interior Mission with four substations, the founding of eight schools, and the planting of over one hundred churches in cooperation with local Christian leaders.

ROBERTA R. KING

Bibliography. L. Lutz, Born to Lose, Bound to Win: The Amazing Journey of Mother Eliza George; R. A. Tucker; GGC.

GEORGIA (Est. 2000 pop.: 5,527,000; 69,700 sq. km. [26,911 sq. mi.]). Georgia is a predominantly agricultural republic of the former Soviet Union, located in the southern Caucasus region on the Black Sea. Ethnic Georgians make up about two-thirds of the population, with most claiming allegiance to the Georgian Orthodox Church. This church, whose roots go back to the early centuries of the Christian era, is largely lacking in spiritual vitality today. There is also a sizable Muslim minority representing over 20 percent of the population. Less than one percent of the population is evangelical—mostly Baptists, with some Pentecostals. Despite Orthodox intimidation and opposition, which have led to restrictions on evangelism and the construction of new church buildings, evangelicals are increasing in number.

RAYMOND P. PRIGODICH

SEE ALSO Commonwealth of Independent States.

German Mission Boards and Societies

The German missions are children of revivals, and they differ depending from which revival they come. After an unsuccessful attempt by Justinian von Welz (1664), the first two German missions, the DANISH-HALLE MISSION (India, 1706) and the worldwide MORAVIAN MISSION (Herrnhut, 1732), were born in the pietistic revival (see PIETISM). Herrnhut managed to withstand the ENLIGHTENMENT and provided spiritual and organizational links to the classical missions of the GREAT AWAKENING, which came over to the Continent from Britain. Basel, through the Christentums-gesellschaft, served as a center of revival and missions for both Germany and German-speaking Switzerland. Several of the Basel auxiliaries developed into missions of their own. The first set of these Protestant classical German missions (BASEL, 1815; BERLIN, 1824; Barmen, 1828, Bremen, 1836) was interdenominational, based on Lutheran and Reformed churches, but not dependent on them. The second set of classical missions came from the more definitely Lutheran wing of the Great Awakening in Germany: Leipzig (1836), Neuenetdelsau (1841), Hermannsburg (1849), and Breklum (1876). The power of the classical missions lay in their revival spirituality, lay involvement, and organizational independence. Both groups together formed today the ecumenical missions and are largely integrated into the German Lutheran/Presbyterian territorial churches.

Next came the FAITH MISSIONS, originating in the Holiness revival (1859) which also came from Britain: Neukenrich (1880), Allianz Mission (1889), CHINA INLAND MISSION, German Branch (1896, later Liebenzell), Marburg (1899/1909), Sudan Pioneer Mission (1900), Mission für Söd-Ost-Europa (1903), and Licht im Osten (1920). The German faith missions originally followed the concepts of the British faith missions, but increasingly modified them to better suit the ecclesiastical environment. The only major mission then of the German “Free Churches” was the Baptist Mission (1890).

The Pentecostal revival (1907), not being strong in Germany, still produced some foreign mission work, starting with Velbert (1931). The Catholic missionary revival started after the Great Awakening, with major centers in France, Belgium, and Holland. Catholic missionary work relies heavily on missionary orders (Society of the Divine Word, St. Mary, 1875, the Mission Benediktines of St. Ottillien, 1887, and the White Fathers of Trier, 1894, being the first in Germany) and supporting societies (Franzkus Xaverius Verein, 1832, Kindheit-Jesus-Verein, 1843). Women far outnumber men as Catholic missionaries (Servants of the Holy Spirit, Reichenbach, 1887, the first German female missionary order). Though women also provided the larger numbers in the Protestant missionary force, they developed few women’s missionary societies (Deutscher Frauenmissionsgebetsbund, 1899).

The First World War disrupted German foreign missionary work severely, and the years between the wars were, as in other countries, years without revivals, when few new missions were founded. However, in the Third Reich the German Protestant missions as a whole took the side of the Confessing Church against the state-supported German Christians. Nazi rule and ideology did affect their work. The period after the Second World War saw a strong renewal of the efforts of the classical missions in a new ecumenical setting. A missiological reorientation connected with the NEW DELHI ASSEMBLY (1961) led to a closer integration of the classical Protestant missions into the territorial (mainline) churches, and to a reliance more on funds allocated by the churches than on funds collected by the missions.

During the same time the evangelical missions experienced a major expansion. The fact that over the decades most of the early German faith missions had become closely related to one or several fellowship movements within the territorial churches created room for new interdenominational missions. Many of them were German branches of interdenominational faith missions like WEC INTERNATIONAL, OVERSEAS MISSIONARY FELLOWSHIP, and Sudan United Mission. Taking ideas from the faith missions and from the Brethren missions, Ernst Schurrp developed Missionshaus Bibelstelle Wiedenest, which had originated in an effort to evangelize in Eastern Europe (Alliance Bible School Berlin, 1905) into a major evangelical mission with a strong congregational base. The Baptist mission was reorganized as European Baptist Mission, and a good number of new evangelical missions came into being (like Deutsche Indianer Pionier Mission or Kinderwerk Lima). A new departure was the founding of the Deutsche Missionsgemeinschaft (1951), also Vereinigte Deutsche Missionshilfe (1961), designed to send German missionaries to many international faith missions. The majority of the German missions and missionaries are now evangelical. The charismatic revival, which reached Germany in 1963, was slow in developing its own missions, but is now increasingly doing so, with the missions often being based in or almost identical with a local congregation. A new development is the transformation of the Vereinigte Evangelische Mission (Barmen/Bethel) into a worldwide fellowship of [equal] churches in mission (United Evangelical Mission, 1996).
German Mission Boards and Societies

In Germany the classical (ecumenical) missions cooperate in the Evangelisches Missionswerk (1975, successor to Deutscher Evangelischer Missionstag, 1922), the evangelical missions cooperate in the Arbeitsgemeinschaft Evangelikalischer Missionen (1969, with the Freie Hochschule für Mission), and the Pentecostal and charismatic missions in the Arbeitsgemeinschaft Pfingstlich-Charismatischer Missionen (1993).

KLAUS FIEDLER

German Society for Missiology. Deutsche Gesellschaft für Missionswissenschaft, founded at Berlin in 1918, was the first body of its kind in the world. It was designed “to promote the scholarly treatment of the history and theory of the Christian mission.” From the outset membership was, and still is, by election only. No fees are charged, and there are no restrictions in terms of gender, origin, or confession. For financial support the society has depended on grants from German churches and mission bodies. Activities of the society include publication of books and a periodical on missiology, promotion of research projects, and the granting of scholarships to deserving students. While the society is unable to endow chairs of mission in universities, it exerts influence in providing adequate representation of mission studies in theological education. In the 1960s and 1970s the society sponsored a series of consultations which resulted in the inauguration of the International Association for Mission Studies in 1972. Currently membership of the German Society for Missiology is two hundred members, half of them from outside of Germany.

HANS-WERNER GENSCICEN

Germany (Est. 2000 pop.: 81,700,000; 356,974 sq. km. [137,828 sq. mi.]). Christianity reached German territories when large parts still belonged to the Roman Empire. Professing Christians were among the Roman and Greek soldiers in the military strongholds at Trier, Cologne, Mainz, and Augsburg. Christianization started from outside, when whole tribes—Gates in the East and Franconians in the West—corporately accepted the new faith. Missionary work proper was introduced by Iro-Scottish (Columbanus) and Anglosaxons, particularly Boniface, the “Apostle of the Germans.” Under Charlemagne and Otto the Great, Christianity was enforced on still resistive tribes within Germany (e.g., Saxons) and beyond its eastern borders (e.g., Wends). The power of the sword was mitigated by the preaching and educating ministry of Benedictine and Cistercian monks, whose monasteries became centers of evangelistic, pastoral, and cultural activities. In medieval times German Christendom was characterized by the synthesis between imperial and ecclesiastic authority, some archbishops acting as secular princes in personal union. Thus the Christian religion was rather legalistic and superficial, permeated with pagan residues.

The Reformation brought a spiritual revolution, the impacts of which shaped German Christian culture for three centuries. Although historical circumstances impeded foreign mission ventures, the tenets of Luther’s theology dynamized the Protestant faith with evangelistic force. His rediscovery of the priesthood of all baptized paved the way for the laity becoming involved in domestic and foreign missions. It was, however, only by the breakthrough of Pietism around 1700 that the evangelistic potential of Lutheranism was fully realized. Because of the imperial reconquest of Reformed provinces to the Catholic faith, Germany was eventually divided into equal territories, in which either the Protestant or the Catholic faith became the established religion, the rights of which were guaranteed by the Treatises of Augsburg (1555) and Osnabrück (1668) after extended religious and political wars. No provision was made to tolerate the Anabaptists, many of whom eventually emigrated to America. Only after the Enlightenment did the religious climate change toward tolerance (and relativism), thereby facilitating the founding of religious societies and free churches under American and English influence in the middle of the nineteenth century.

The main impact of the Enlightenment and the French Revolution (1789–93), however, was the undermining of belief in the supernatural, the inauguration of an age of secularization, and the emergence of humanistic ideologies with atheistic tendencies. Church attendance dropped steadily in many regions, and whole sections of the population became nominal Christians. The two World Wars and the reign of anti-Christian totalitarian ideologies caused spiritual blackouts. In the eastern federal counties, only 32 percent of the population still hold at least nominal church membership (compared to 84 percent in the West).

Reevangelization. In view of the alarming process of de-Christianization, pietistic leaders assembled in 1888 in the Moravian colony of Gnadau and formed the German Association for Fostering Fellowship and Evangelization, shortly called "Gnadauer Verband." In 1848, Hinrich Wichern called Germans to meet the growing social and spiritual needs of the uprooted classes by engaging in a joint venture for "Inner Mission," which combined charity work with pastoral and evangelistic care. Home Missions were inaugurated to reach a variety of social segments. The evangelistic branch of the Inner Mission was called Volksmission. In order to ensure the spontaneous support of the believers, the Inner Mission maintained its independent status in close cooperation with church authorities. After World War II, however, the official churches acknowledged the diaconal and evangelistic functions as their own responsibility and integrated them into their structure. The Gnadau Association and the German Evangelical Alliance, however, continued to operate through their own agencies. In the wake of the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelism (1974), new initiatives were taken to unite all existing forces toward a new evangelization of the country. The following years saw several projects initiated, including the declaration of 1980 as "Missionary Year" and a "Year with the Bible" later on. The visits of Billy Graham to stage telecasted campaigns like Euro'70 and ProChrist proved to be inspirational for similar initiatives by German evangelical leaders. Large-scale Bible study meetings (Gemeindetage; Ludwig-Hofacker-Conferences) and national youth rallies (Christival) have attracted tens of thousands of participants.

Missiology. The German contribution to the development of missiology as a basically theological subject with interdisciplinary complementation is outstanding. The seminars of German mission societies contributed much to produce generations of well-educated missionaries, committed to biblical doctrines and sensitive to communicate them transculturally. German missionaries did outstanding work in reducing vernaculars to writing, creating an indigenous literature, and publishing substantial volumes of anthropological research. The oldest chair of mission studies still in existence is the one established for GUSTAV WARNECK (1834–1910) in Halle in 1896. Chairs for missiology were also instituted at other theological faculties (e.g., Berlin, Tübingen, Heidelberg, Hamburg) and seminaries. Ever since the historical World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh in 1910, German mission thinkers tried to make their characteristic contribution to the proceedings of the meetings of the International Missionary Council and the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism. The German emphasis was on the concept of Heilsgeschichte (salvation history), which stressed the eschatological orientation of the church's mission. Accordingly, they criticized all tendencies in ecumenical theology to interpret the Kingdom of God in terms of an ideological utopia. Outstanding spokesmen for this view were Karl Hartenstein, Walter Freytag, and Georg Vice- dom. When in Uppsala 1968 the WCC's theology of mission appeared to have substituted the horizontal for the vertical dimension of salvation, a group (Theologischer Konvent) of theologians who were in sympathy with the new Confession Movement "No Other Gospel" (1966) issued the Frankfurt Declaration on the Fundamental Crisis of Missions. German missiologists organized in the German Society for the Study of Missions (1918) and the Working Group for Evangelical Missiology (initiated by GEORGE W. PETERS in 1977). Missionaries do their professional studies either in the seminars of their societies or centrally at the Freie Hochschule für Mission in Korntal, which is now a branch of Columbia International University. Spiritual discernment with regard to heretical and syncretistic influences in missions continues to be a main function of the Theologischer Konvent in close cooperation with the International Christian Network (established in 1978 in London).

Ghana

Ghana (Est. 2000 pop.: 20,172,000; 238,533 sq. km. [92,098 sq. mi.]). Located on the west coast of Africa, Ghana is home to over fifty-seven indigenous language groups, with Akan, Ewe, and Ga being the three major ones. Ghana is primarily an agricultural country, with over 65 percent engaging in subsistence farming.

Formerly called the Gold Coast, Ghana received its current name when it became the first sub-Saharan country in Africa to gain independence from Britain under the leadership of Kwame Nkrumah in 1957. Ghana's post-Independence political history has been a checkered one. Nkrumah was overthrown by the military in 1966, followed by five military regimes and three short-lived civilian governments. Multiparty democratic elections were held in 1992.
Ghana

The first recorded contact of the church with Ghana came in 1471 through Roman Catholic priests who were chaplains to the Portuguese traders working in Ghana. The first Protestants were the Moravians who arrived in 1737 and among whom eleven died in thirty-five years of work. In 1828 the Basel Mission started work in the southeast among the Ga- and Twi-speaking people. The Methodist Church, Ghana, came into being through the instrumentality of a group of Ghanaian Christian young men led by de Graft, who requested Bibles from Britain through Captain Porters. In response, the British Methodist Church sent a missionary and some Bibles in 1835. Six of the first seven Basel missionaries and all three of the first Methodists died, and more missionaries were sent. Those who survived planted the church in Ghana. The Bremen Mission started work in 1847 among the Ewe in the German colony of Togoland. Catholic missionary work began again in the south in 1881 and the north in 1906. Near the turn of the century the African Episcopal Zion (1898), Seventh-Day Adventists (1898), and the Society for the Propogation of the Gospel (1904) began work. To facilitate social synchrony with the nationalists, the Basel missionaries brought in six West Indian Christian families to augment their team. Thomas Birch Freeman, an English Methodist of African descent, was the first missionary to reach the Asante (Kumasi) in 1839. The pioneer Basel and Bremen missionaries, J. G. Christaller and B. Schlegel, translated the Bible into the local languages and produced vernacular primers, grammars, and dictionaries for literacy work and evangelism. They also taught crafts and improved methods of agriculture.

We can trace the movement of independent African churches in Ghana to the visit in 1914 by William Wade Harris to southwest Ghana. Harris turned thousands away from fetishism in the Nzema area. The Assemblies of God was the first Pentecostal mission that came to Ghana through the northern borders from Burkina Faso in 1931. The Assemblies of God turned thousands away from fetishism in the Nzema area. The Assemblies of God was the first Pentecostal mission that came to Ghana through the northern borders from Burkina Faso in 1931. The genesis of the work that later developed into the Asamakese area. They were later served by James McKeown (from 1937).

The Christian Council of Ghana launched the Ghana Evangelism Committee (GEC) New Life for All (NLFA) outreach in 1974, mobilizing churches for aggressive evangelism. The work of Bible translation, Scripture Union in schools, and the NLFA campaign resulted in many thousands coming to Christ, and enabled renewal in the churches. From 1977 to 1986 church growth in Ghana exploded. The Presbyterian Church grew 211 percent, the Evangelical Presbyterians grew 500 percent, the Ghana Baptist Convention 169 percent, the Assemblies of God 550 percent, and the Church of Pentecost 200 percent. While today 64 percent of the population claims to follow Christ, 40 percent of these have a church affiliation and only 12 percent attend church regularly. Thus, there is still work to be done in reaching Ghana for Christ.

Jude Hama

Ghanaian Mission Boards and Societies.

Ghanaians have been active in missionary work ever since Philip Quaque (c. 1741–1816) was first engaged by the Anglican Church to reach people from his own country. The Presbyterian Church of Ghana and the Evangelical Presbyterian Church in Ghana were planted by German mission agencies, and became the first self-governing non-Western churches in Ghana after World War I. By 1980, there were 23 active mission agencies in Ghana. In 1993 it was estimated that over 670 Ghana missionaries had been sent out by some 44 agencies. The Church of Pentecost has placed workers in several African countries as well as in Europe and North America. Christian Outreach Fellowship, founded by William Ofori Atta, deploys cross-cultural missionaries to unreached people groups. Pioneers Africa, headed by Solomon Aryeutey, works among Muslims in Mali and has focused on unreached peoples in Africa.

Bible Translation and Christian literature distribution have been important facets of Ghanian mission endeavor. The growth of Bible translation work in the local languages is closely related to the story of the growth of missions in Ghana. The work of the Ghana Institute of Linguistics, Literacy, and Bible Translation (GILLBT) is recognized by both the church and the state. The use of the Jesus Film in local languages is helping Ghanians reach unreached peoples within Ghana’s borders.

There are several parachurch organizations that actively utilize Ghanian staff to reach Ghana and other countries for Christ. Gottfried Osei-Mensah was the first executive director of the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization. Theophilus B. Dankwa headed IFES-Africa and Sam Atiemo Youth for Christ. Isaac Ababio pioneered the Hour of Visitation Evangelistic Association. Florence Yeboah's GHACO Women’s Ministry is engaged in holistic mission. Scripture Union (SU) had been active in Ghana since the early 1950s, and many of the current Ghanaian church leaders came to Christ through the SU efforts.

As a result of the Ghana Church Survey published by the Ghana Evangelism Committee in 1989 and a subsequent national mission consultation in 1993, Ghana’s most neglected mission fields have become the target of pioneer outreachs by denominations, mission agencies, and 87 percent of the population is Christian. TheEnglish-speaking population lives in the Britishsector. According to 1998 estimates, there wereapproximately 30,000 in the British sector, includ-ing 20,000 Gibraltarians, 3,000 British expatriates,and 4,000 Moroccans. Sporadic outbreaks ofvandalism by Moroccans in 1997 and 1998 led toa wave of immigration to Europe, and 1,000 Moroc-Can Muslims have been expelled. Moroccans alsoentered the British sector in 1980. There are an esti-mated 3,500 Moroccans in the British sector, most ofwhom came in the mid-1990s. Great Britain and theUnited States are the largest sources of immigra-tion to Gibraltar. The British sector has becomea magnet for immigrants from a number of coun-tries, and each wave has brought its own problems.
Gifts of the Spirit

(celibacy, voluntary poverty, martyrdom, hospitality, missionar y, intercession, and exorcism), arriving at a total of twenty-seven spiritual gifts.

Among the various attempts to classify the gifts, the most plausible analysis distinguishes three categories: service gifts, miraculous gifts, and utterance gifts. Service gifts include a broad range of Spirit-inspired activity, such as giving, showing mercy, serving, helping, leading, and administering, designed to strengthen and deepen interpersonal relationships within the church community. Miraculous gifts, such as faith, healings, and miracles, are associated with manifestations of the Spirit's power. Utterance gifts, which include the message of wisdom, the message of knowledge, prophecy, teaching, tongues, interpretation of tongues, and exhortation, are forms of oral expression inspired by the Holy Spirit. While the significance and value of the gifts specifically mentioned in Scripture must not be undermined, the lack of any exhaustive listing indicates the possibility that the Spirit may supply other gifts in response to specific needs at any given time and place.

While research has proved that charismatic gifts have never been altogether absent through the history of the church, there has perhaps never been a time in the postapostolic period when the exercise of spiritual gifts has been as widespread and as integral a part of the church's life as today, although not without controversy. One question concerns the relationship of the gifts to an important Pentecostal distinctive: Are the gifts of the Spirit contingent on and a consequence of the baptism in the Holy Spirit, a special endowment of the Spirit subsequent to a consequence of the baptism in the Holy Spirit, or an event that happens apart from the Pentecostal belief in a special endowment of the Spirit subsequent to a consequence of the baptism in the Holy Spirit? A significant segment of charismatic Christians remain convinced that the gifts can be appropriated apart from the Pentecostal belief in a subsequent experience. This view has gained increasing acceptance and popularity among evangelicals, largely as a result of the influence of a relatively small but influential movement of so-called Third Wave evangelicals.

Another issue stems from a cessationist view of the charismatic gifts that limits supernatural manifestations of the Spirit to the apostolic age. Although the cessationist view is no longer widely held, it is nonetheless influential, due to its impressive theological pedigree and sophistication. In continuity with the position adopted by the Protestant Reformers, and essentially rehearsing the theological position of the great Princeton theologian, B. B. Warfield, a significant group of dispensationalist and Reformed evangelicals maintain that the spiritual gifts had only temporary significance and purpose: to authenticate the apostles as trustworthy authors of Scripture. Now that we have a complete and closed canon of Scripture, the gifts have fulfilled their function, and are no longer necessary nor to be found in the postapostolic age. In recent years, however, some persuasive scholarly responses have challenged the cessationist position. The debate continues.

A third question has to do with whether the gifts of the Spirit are to be understood in essentially natural or supernatural terms. Thus while some view the gifts primarily as natural abilities or talents dedicated to the Lord, others have emphasized the supernatural element to an extreme, denying the role of human faculties in the exercise of gifts. The biblical teaching seems to point toward a balanced incarnational understanding of the gifts, with an interpenetration of the divine and the human, the supernatural and the natural. The gifts of the Spirit are not just the wise stewardship of natural gifts and abilities, but the result of the immediate working of the Spirit in the life of the believer. A natural talent only becomes a gift of the Spirit when it is yielded to the Holy Spirit and used by the Spirit.

The New Testament clearly witnesses to the close relationship between Pentecost and the missionary witness of the church, a fact made particularly explicit in the Book of Acts (John 15:26–27; 20:19–23; Acts 1:8; 2:4ff; 11:28; 13:2, 4; 19:6; 21:4, 11). For the first-century church, the gifts were the fulfilled eschatological promise of God, experienced personally and corporately in powerful and visible ways, especially through the Spirit's gifts. In contrast to the experience of the church through most of its history, the New Testament seems to treat the manifestation of spiritual gifts as part of the normal life of the Christian community. The life and growth of the early church can be properly understood only when viewed in terms of a community of Spirit-filled Christians exercising their spiritual gifts.

The gifts of the Spirit impact the mission of the church in at least two significant ways. The first and less obvious way in which the gifts of the Spirit facilitate the church's mission is by equipping the believer for ministry within and to the church, strengthening the church, deepening its fellowship, and enriching the quality of its life. Effective Christian witness is only possible when there is a healthy church base experiencing genuine koinonia and manifesting authentic signs of kingdom life. The gifts of the Spirit constitute the basic divine equipment for mission and service. The New Testament promises of spiritual power and spiritual gifts are frequently linked to the worldwide mission mandate of the church (Mark 16:15–17; Luke 24:47–49; Acts 1:8).

Apart from specific gifts such as that of the evangelist or missionary, several other power gifts have been used in various evangelism and church planting efforts in recent years, especially in Two-Thirds World contexts such as Africa, Latin America, and Asia. Called POWER ENCOUNTER by many, this process signifies the use of different miraculous gifts, such as exorcism, healing and prophetic revelation to visibly demonstrate the power of Jesus Christ over spirits, powers, or false gods which hold the allegiance of an individual or people group. Exercise of the gifts of the Spirit thus announces the reality of the kingdom's arrival in Christ, and confirms the truth of the gospel message proclaimed.

The gifts of the Spirit are not to be viewed as optional appendages to the life of the church. They are neither temporally nor culturally bound, and their cross-cultural validity makes their presence a vital and necessary component of the church's cross-cultural witness.

Ivan Satyavrata

Gih, Andrew (1901–85). Chinese evangelist and founder of Evangelize China Fellowship. Born in Shanghai, China; he committed his life to Christ at age twenty-five. He organized the Bethel World Wide Evangelistic Band and conducted crusades to many parts of China.

In 1947 Gih founded the Evangelize China Fellowship to address the needs of a China devastated by external invasion and internal suffering. Organized in Shanghai as a Faith Mission and interdenominational in character, the mission was expanded to Hong Kong, Macau, and Taiwan. Ensuing years saw the work extended throughout Asia.

Primary and high schools for girls and orphans remain today as a testimony to Gih's compassionate concern for the marginal Chinese. Bible schools and colleges along with over fifty indigenous churches mark his commitment to personal redemption and renewal.

Gih was a traveler and preacher of international stature, circling the globe and building a global network of prayer and concern for the social and spiritual needs of Asia. His focus was one of wholistic ministry and indigenous effort. He was a visionary and missionary who could galvanize others into corporate action and service. He is a model and stimulant for indigenous outreach among the Chinese today.

Hoover Wong

Gilmour, James (1843–91). Scottish missionary to Mongolia. Born near Cathkin, Scotland, he received an M.A. from Glasgow University. Accepted as a student by the London Missionary Society, he went to Chestnut College in London for two years' education, during which time he was assigned to the Mongol mission, unstaffed since 1845. Well-known for his sense of humor, he sailed for China in 1870 and, “with only a few sentences of Chinese, two of Mongol and none of Russian,” set off with some Russians for Kalgan and Kiakhta. He acquired proficiency in Mongolian and produced several tracts and a catechism. He spent the winter of 1871–72 in Peking, returning to Mongolia in the spring (this set a pattern he would follow for many years). His eleven-year marriage to the sister of a colleague produced three sons. His only furlough was in 1882, and from 1883 to 1885 he served Mongols living in Peking. His first book, Among the Mongols (1883), received a rave review in the Spectator, where it was compared to Robinson Crusoe; one of his colleagues stated, “If you have not read the book, read it, there is a treat in store for you.” His second book was More about the Mongols (1893). He died in Tientsin on May 21, 1891.

Kathleen L. Lodwick

Glasser reflected on several vital issues—better missionary training, encouragement of national leadership, a positive approach to non-Western cultures, and the social concerns of the gospel. In 1970 he began to teach theology of mission at Fuller Seminary's School of World Mission, where he served as dean from 1971 to 1980.

Glasser's theology focused on the Kingdom of God, a framework that entailed evangelism and social concerns. His leadership in the broader missionary community included participation in both evangelical and ecumenical consultations. Solidly evangelical in his own faith, he sought to be a bridge builder. He helped establish the American Society of Missiology and the Zwemer Institute for Muslim Studies. Special evangelistic concerns have been the Chinese and the Jews. His extensive writings have been primarily in the form of journal articles.

Paul E. Pierson

Glegg, [Alexander] Lindsay

Glegg, [Alexander] Lindsay (1882–1975). British evangelist. Lindsay Glegg was possibly the best known British evangelist of the twentieth century. His father, Sir Alexander Glegg, was a leading London Congregationalist, but Lindsay was always interdenominational in his contacts and sympathies. As a young man, he was attracted for a time to the “New Theology” of R. J. Campbell, but at the Keswick Convention in 1905 he discovered a new commitment to Christ and repudiated liberalism. Like his father, he was an engineer and company director; but spent his spare time from 1917 as lay pastor of Down Lodge Hall, a mission hall in Wandsworth in South London, and in conducting some forty evangelistic campaigns throughout the British Isles. Glegg was involved in an extraordinarily wide range of evangelical organizations, including the Scripture Union, Christian Endeavour, and the Evangelical Union of South America, of which he was chairman for many years. He was a regular speaker at the Keswick Convention. In 1931 he was co-founder, with Thomas Cochrane, the former China medical missionary, of the Movement for World Evangelization. In 1955 he instituted the annual Christian Holiday Crusade held at Butlin’s holiday camp at Filey in Yorkshire. Glegg was involved in an extraordinarily wide range of evangelical organizations, including the Scripture Union, Christian Endeavour, and the Evangelical Union of South America, of which he was chairman for many years. He was a regular speaker at the Keswick Convention. In 1931 he was co-founder, with Thomas Cochrane, the former China medical missionary, of the Movement for World Evangelization. In 1955 he instituted the annual Christian Holiday Crusade held at Butlin’s holiday camp at Filey in Yorkshire. In later life Glegg was a close friend of Billy Graham. He continued preaching into his nineties.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. D. Douglas, Completing the Course: The Story of Lindsay Glegg.

Global Consultation on World Evangelization '97 (GCOWE II). A follow-up conference to GCOWE '95, the Global Consultation on World Evangelization '97, held June 30 to July 5, 1997, drew some 4,000 delegates from 133 countries to Pretoria, South Africa. Sponsored by the global AD 2000 and Beyond Movement, GCOWE II's main focus was on assessing how many of the movement's 1,739 designated “people groups” had been “adopted” for church-planting efforts by missions agencies and churches. After the conference, about 90 percent of the 1,739 groups in the “Joshua Project 2000” list were reported to have a church-planting “movement” (however large or small) or a commitment to mobilize a team of church starters.

As with GCOWE '95, less emphasis was placed on meeting AD 2000's goal of “a church for every people and the gospel for every person by the year 2000.” The AD 2000 Movement was launched in 1989 at the Lausanne II conference in Manila. By 1997 many leaders were speaking of the year 2000 as a kind of springboard for a new century of outreach, rather than as a deadline to “finish the task” of world evangelization. In Pretoria missiologist Ralph Winter urged that a more contextualized, de-Westernized gospel be presented to the huge and largely unreached blocs of Hindus, Muslims, and Buddhists.

Some observers said the movement was embracing a broader mission for the church beyond short-term evangelism and church planting. Ten consultations were convened during GCOWE '97, including ones for business executives, African initiatives, local pastors, children’s concerns, the poor, and the performing arts. Racial reconciliation, appropriate to the South African venue, was another major theme.

STANLEY M. GUTHRIE

Globalization. In the Bible God anticipated and commanded the globalization, or worldwide spread, of biblical faith. In the Old Testament, God blessed Abraham and promised that “all peoples on earth will be blessed through you” (Gen. 12:3). The people of God were told to “Declare his glory among the nations, his marvelous deeds among all peoples” (Ps. 96:3). The covenant community was open not just to Jews but to all who would follow Yahweh, such as Ruth of Moab. God’s grace and compassion reached even the wicked people of Nineveh through Jonah and Naaman the Syrian. The Servant of the Lord, fully realized in Christ, was to be “a light for the Gentiles, that you may bring my salvation to the ends of the earth” (Isa. 49:6).

In the New Testament, Jesus Christ told the disciples, “And this gospel of the kingdom will be preached in the whole world as a testimony to all nations, and then the end will come” (Matt. 24:14). After the resurrection, he commissioned them to reach beyond the Jews and “go and make disciples of all nations” (Matt. 28:19). Just before his ascension the Lord told them, “But you will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes on you; and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth” (Acts 1:8). Acts chronicles the beginning of this expansion. The Bible assures us that at the end of history there will be “a great multitude that no one could count, from every nation, tribe, people and language, standing before the throne and in front of the Lamb” (Rev. 7:9).

Globalization of the Church. Christianity has advanced unevenly around the globe during most of its first twenty centuries, with the church often slow to remember its evangelistic mandate. Despite occasional periods of persecution, until A.D. 313, when Constantine issued the Edict of Milan, the church exploded across the Roman Empire. For the next three centuries, the Christian faith continued to spread via monks and bishops into Ethiopia, India, Ireland, Britain, and along the trade routes toward Central Asia.

The coming of Islam brought a series of reversals. Lost to the Muslim invaders were the holy lands, North Africa, Asia Minor, and Persia. The church, however, continued to spread across Europe, to what are now Belgium, Germany, and the Netherlands, Russia also became Christianized. Nestorian Christianity made its way into China but did not last. Later, the Dominicans, Franciscans, and Jesuits brought Christianity into Central Asia, China, Africa, and Latin America.

Protestants, inspired by the example of David Brainard among the Indians of the New World and the Moravians of Germany, began to remember their missionary responsibilities. But not until 1792, with the spark provided by William Carey, did the Protestant Church begin large-scale outreach to other lands. The 1800s, sometimes called the Great Century of Missions, saw the proliferation of missionary societies, aided by the expansion of the great colonial powers into India, China, and Africa.

The advance of the gospel has been remarkable in the twentieth century, particularly the latter half. In 1960, an estimated 58 percent of the world’s Christians were Westerners; in 1990, only 38 percent were. Latin America’s evangelical presence exploded from a mere 50,000 in 1900 to 40 million in 1990. Today, with about one-third of the earth’s approximately 6 billion people, Christianity is present in every nation-state. Most of the growth has come in the former “mission fields” of Asia, Africa, and Latin America. From 1960 to 1990, the number of evangelicals in the West grew from 57.7 million to 95.9 million, while evangelicals outside the West multiplied from 29 million to 208 million. About three in four of the world’s evangelicals are non-Westerners. However; despite this growth, many people in the world’s vast Muslim, Hindu, and secularized blocs remain relatively untouched by the gospel.

Globalization of the Missionary Task. As Christians in the former missionary “receiving” countries have realized their responsibilities to be “senders,” the globalization of the missionary enterprise has begun to track the globalization of the church. The number of Protestant missionaries from the United States and Canada has declined, from 50,500 in 1988 to 41,142 in 1992, according to the fifteenth edition of Mission Handbook. South Korea and India each boast 4,000 missionaries, and their numbers continue to grow. Nigeria’s Evangelical Missionary Society sends about 950. While the precise figures are in dispute, the numbers of non-Western missionaries are certainly growing substantially faster than their Western counterparts (see Non-Western Mission Boards and Agencies). Some experts believe that Western missionaries will be numerically eclipsed by the turn of the century.

With the shifting balance of missions power have come calls for Western churches to stop sending missionaries and instead—or predominantly—send money to support “native missionaries” (see Foreign Financing of Indigenous Workers). These are said to be cheaper and more effective than Westerners. Such calls have been especially attractive to Western Christians, who find themselves increasingly inward-looking and financially pressured. While applauding the energy, vision, and commitment of the younger missionary movement, missions experts caution against idealizing the non-Westerners as without problems. They acknowledge weaknesses in the non-Western sending, training, and shepherding bases as well as dangers in sending money only—both for recipients and for senders. Non-Western churches and mission agencies are sometimes better at sending people out than keeping them there, they say. Much effort is being expended to shore up the training of non-Westerners in order to keep them in their assignments.

Most of the discussion about the relationship of Western and non-Western missions focuses on discarding old roles and developing partnerships in the common task of world evangelization. While Partnership most often refers to Western missionaries and non-Western “nationals” working one on one as equals, it can have a more structural meaning for missionary organizations. Agencies that cross ethnic or national lines to work together are said to be internationalized.
Globalization

Four types of internationalized organizations have been identified: cooperative (through informal sharing, such as the Missions Advanced Research and Communication Center), task-oriented partnerships ( spearheaded by groups such as Gospel for Asia and Interdev that bring several organizations together), international agencies (such as WEC International and the Society for International Ministries, which operate in many nations or have multinational leadership), and international movements in pursuit of a common goal or strategy. The AD 2000 and Beyond Movement, with its emphasis on “unreached peoples,” is an example of the latter. Such movements are effectively reaching across national, denominational, and ethnic boundaries and presenting a clearer picture of the globalization of missions at the dawn of the twenty-first century.

STANLEY M. GUTHRIE

Bibliography. D. Hicks, Globalizing Missions; L. Pate, From Every People; J. A. Siewert and J. A. Kenyon, eds., Mission Handbook; D. Hicks, Globalizing Missions; R. D. Winter, ed., Internationalizing Missionary Training; R. D. Winter and S. C. Hawthorne, eds., PWCM; J. D. Woodbridge, ed., AFC.

Gloukharev, Makarius (1792–1847). Russian Orthodox missionary to Siberia. Makarius Gloukharev was a missionary monk who served fourteen years in the Altai Mountains of Siberia. He was also one of the first missiologists to formulate a theology of missions for the Russian Orthodox Church. Makarius was born in the province of Smolensk in 1792. In the early 1820s, he retreated into the monastery caves of Kiev for a life of solitude. There he received his missionary calling.

Makarius traveled to the mountainous Altai region of Siberia in 1829, where 40,000 people lived. Early on he translated parts of the Bible and liturgical services into the indigenous language. He emphasized a long catechism before baptism, but his solid pioneer work led to the eventual baptism of over 25,000 Altai.

In 1843, Makarius left Siberia but continued his missionary effort by writing a challenging book entitled Thoughts on the Methods to be Followed for a Successful Dissemination of the Faith among Muhammadans, Jews and Pagans in the Russian Empire. Makarius understood that the best way to motivate the believers was to guide them in study of the Holy Scriptures. Since only a Slavonic text of the Bible existed, he began translating the Old Testament into vernacular Russian. In the midst of this final task, Makarius died.

LUKE A. VERonis

Gobat, Maria (1813–79). Swiss missionary to Jerusalem. Born in Zofingen, Switzerland, she helped her father, who was a director of schools and founder of a home for orphaned children. She served these destitute children throughout her youth. In May 1834 she married Rev. Samuel Gobat. Soon after the wedding, they left for Abyssinia, where Samuel had been working. Their journey was filled with such difficulty and hardship that their arrival in Abyssinia was delayed by two years. After the Gobats established their work in Abyssinia, they were forced to leave prematurely due to Samuel’s continuing health problems. Their journey back to Europe proved to be more treacherous; their newborn daughter died along the way.

Through a series of events, Samuel was nominated by Frederick William IV of Prussia to the see of Jerusalem. The Gobats served the people of Jerusalem, especially the children, for many years. Maria worked faithfully and diligently in all the schools and missions founded by her husband until her death, exactly twelve weeks after her husband’s.

KATHY MCReYNOLDS

God. The relationship between the Christian doctrine of God and mission is best explored within the context of salvation history. By tracing that path we see that mission is in fact God’s gracious, loving response to the problem of human sin. Every cardinal attribute of God is brought to bear on the problem of sin (see also Divine Attributes of God).

We begin with an attempt to assess the range or scope of God’s salvific desire. Using only the New Testament, we would have no difficulty concluding that God’s desire is universal (1 Tim. 2:1–6). He has acted to reconcile the world to himself (2 Cor. 5:19) and has gathered a people for himself from among the Gentiles, that is, from all nations (Acts 15:14). Most of the Old Testament, however, seems to be the history of God’s dealings with but one special people, Israel. Nevertheless, God’s desire to save all people of all nations can be argued from several Old Testament perspectives (see also Old Testament Theology of Mission).

First, it should be noted that God’s involvement in human affairs has not been limited to any one part of the race. This unlimited scope of God’s interaction with humankind is evident in several aspects of Creation. Scripture clearly portrays...
God as the Creator and Sustainer of the world and in particular the human race (Gen. 1:1–2:19; 14:19; Isa. 40:28). The intent of the command to be fruitful and multiply (Gen. 1:28; 9:1) is obviously universal as were the results of obedience. Thus, the repeated affirmation of his ownership of creation is justified (1 Sam. 2: 1–10; Ps. 24:1; Ps. 50). All peoples are his. All depend upon his custodial activity, that which sustains existence as we know it (Ps. 104:14).

The unlimited scope of God's dealings with humanity can also be seen in his sweeping and universal judgment of sin. The effects of Adam and Eve's fall were not limited to one people or ethnic group. As humankind began to spread out across the face of the earth, the effects of sin were carried with them and intensified (Gen. 3:1–7; 4:1–12; 6:5–8). At each stage of this devolution, God's response in judgment matched the range of sin's pandemic spread. In Genesis 3:14–19 judgment was meted out to each participant: the serpent, Eve, and Adam. Similarly, the flood brought divine wrath to bear on all sinners (Gen. 6:5–6). God's response is no less inclusive when sin once again engulfs humankind, as reported in Genesis 10–11.

But God's promises and implementation of restoration are also universal. In concert with each wave of judgment, God keeps hope alive with the promise of reconciliation. After the fall, in the midst of God's condemnation of the initial sin, there is a promise of the Seed, a descendent of the woman who would “crush the head of the serpent.” Many have referred to Genesis 3:15 as the first statement (protevangelium) of God's ultimate answer to sin, anticipating Christ's redemptive work on the cross. After the flood, God reestablishes his relationship to humans by entering into a covenant with the whole of humanity (Gen. 9:9–17). That the covenant with Noah has universal implications can be seen from the inclusive language (every living creature, all generations). After the affair at Babel, God calls out Abraham and promises that through him all nations will be blessed.

Thus, we see that the pattern established by God's general intercourse with humanity also applies to his judgment of sin. God's concern for reconciliation extends to every people (Pss. 67:4; 82:8; 96:10; Isa. 2:4; Joel 3:12; Mic. 4:3).

God not only desires salvation universally, he has taken concrete, practical steps to accomplish that. From the Old Testament perspective this is reflected primarily in the election of Israel (see also Divine Election). God enters a covenant with one person and his descendants. However, these developments alter nothing with respect to God's universal salvific will. In fact, the election of Israel is best viewed as a continuation of God's interaction with all nations. Each of the promises given in response to the first two stages of sin's spread, although universal in scope, do anticipate narrower foci of implementation (Gen. 3:15, the seed; Gen. 9:26, the blessing of Shem).

The locus classicus for the concept of election is Deuteronomy 7:6–8 (see also 9:4–6; 10:14ff.; 14:2). Here we see that in being chosen Israel is called a holy people and treasured possession. This description gives us significant insight into the nature of the election.

No human standard was applied and used as the basis for election. We see that Israel is not chosen on the basis of special social characteristics or cultic and moral integrity. In fact, we are told that they were the least among the nations. We know that they were just as vulnerable to the effects of sin as other peoples. So it is wholly because of God's love and grace that Israel is afforded such a privileged position. And yet, they were also not the only people to be favored by God. The nations remain in the purview of election. Deuteronomy 7:8 links election to the promise given to Abraham and with that to the universal scope of God's redemptive purpose.

The purpose of election also rests squarely within the context of God's universal design. The intended result was for Israel to be a blessing and a light for the nations (Gen. 12:3; 18:18; Gal. 3:8). Election does not only imply privilege, but also responsibility. The history of Israel is an extension of God's dealings with the nations to which Israel is to be light (Exod. 19:5–6).

Thus, it comes as no surprise that others were allowed to participate in the benefits of that privilege (Gen. 14:19, Melchizedech; Gen. 16:13, Hagar [Egyptian]; Exod. 12:38, 'mixed multitude'; Deut. 31:12 'foreigner'). In fact, there is so much material of this sort that many have inferred that Israel clearly understood the universal salvific implications of its election.

As we continue to follow the course of salvation history, we recognize that the developments described in the New Testament are largely the result of God having completed his plan of redemption. With the coming of Christ, we have the concretization of salvation, a new covenant, and a new people. Christ fulfills the promise made by God, initiates a new covenant, calls into existence a new people of God, and inaugurates the Christian mission (activation of witness).

In Galatians 4:4 we are told that when the “fullness of time had come, God sent forth his Son . . . to redeem those who were under the law.” The idea here is not that time has simply run its course, but that an appointed time or the fulfillment of the promise had arrived. God himself initiates the final stage in redemption history by sending his Son into the world.

The context for our understanding of these events is the one already established by the Old Testament, namely, that of the Abrahamic promise, the covenants, and the anticipated blessing of all nations (see also ABRAHATIC COVENANT). This is exactly the approach taken by Paul in Galatians 3. In Galatians 3:1–5 he raises the fundamental question of just how they received the gift of redemption (which is now a concrete reality). Their own experience provided an obvious answer. They received the gift of the Spirit as a result of their obedient response to the message of faith. In Galatians 3:6–9 Paul supplements this line of argument by appealing to Scripture (Gen. 15:6), showing that it was Abraham’s willingness to have faith in God’s plan and not some level of religious performance, which led to God declaring him righteous. That leads to the conclusion that the true children of Abraham are those (any, including the Gentiles) who have faith (Gen. 17:7; Rom. 9:6ff.).
God

The promise made to Abraham is referred to here as the gospel (Gen. 12:3; 18:18; 22:18; 26:4; 28:14). So it is faith, not ethnicity or keeping the law (3:10ff.), which leads to redemption. The law did not change the conditions of the promise (Gal. 3:15), it only revealed sin as sin. The object of faith is Christ, God’s plan, as accomplished by Christ (Gal. 3:10–14), which is precisely what the promise envisioned. This fact is established by highlighting the singular of the word “seed.” The promise was not intended to include all the descendants of Abraham, but the descendant, Christ (Gal. 3:16) and all those who are in him (Gal. 3:26–29). As in the Old Testament, the scope of the promise is universal (Gal. 3:8).

The Book of Acts picks up the theme of unrestricted mission. In 1:8 we see Jesus diverting attention from the question of time and placing it on the disciples’ responsibilities. These included worldwide outreach. Consider the similarities to the GREAT COMMISSION passages.

But not only has God kept his promise by sending the Son, he also enables the new people of God to fulfill their responsibility by sending the Spirit. Even a cursory reading of the Book of Acts impresses one with the prominence and importance of the holy spirit. And here we see how the work of the Spirit relates to that of the other members of the Godhead.

The Holy Spirit generates the missionary spirit. The drive toward spontaneous expansion comes only after Pentecost. The missionary spirit is first and foremost the spirit of sacrifice. The early Christians were willing to put their very lives on the line (Acts 15:26), give up everything familiar, family, homes (Acts 13:3), rather than retain the best for themselves, as is often the case today.

The missionary spirit is also a spirit of courage. Consider the way in which the apostles faced imprisonment, beatings, and a host of other dangers. The challenges were, of course, not just physical. They were willing to challenge existing paradigms and power structures (Acts 4:31; 21:3). Are we any less in need of courage?

The missionary spirit is the spirit of love. First Timothy 1:5 teaches that the sum of all teaching is love—unconditional love for all.

The Holy Spirit guides the missionary outreach of the early church. This was done in several ways. First, the Holy Spirit is presented as the initiator of missionary outreach (Acts 13:1ff.). Second, the Spirit inspires the proclamation of the gospel (Acts 10). Third, the Spirit guides the course of missions (Acts 16:9–10).

The Holy Spirit achieves the results. In John 16:8 Jesus teaches that it is the Spirit who opens the eyes of the world to its own sinfulness. There is no natural awareness of guilt. Consider the sermons given in Acts. They reflect a dependence on the Spirit in that (1) they call for a decision (Acts 2:28), (2) they promise forgiveness (Acts 2:28), and (3) they warn about the coming judgment.

Having followed the implementation of God’s plan of salvation, we conclude that it is God himself who has been and is engaged in missions. Several decades ago Georg Vicedom popularized the term MISSIO DEI in a book with that title published in 1961. In it he suggested that he was using the phrase in order to underscore the fact that mission is above all God’s work, that is, God is the active subject of mission. In that case mission is actually an extension of God’s salvific desire and activity. Vicedom goes on to challenge his readers by suggesting that if our assumption that God desires mission because he is himself involved in mission is correct, then the church can be God’s instrument and tool only if it allows itself to be used by him (p. 13). This may well be a needed reminder at the beginning of the twenty-first century. God, and not human agencies, is in charge of the mission of the church.

EDWARD ROMMEN

Gods and Goddesses. People have always considered everyday life to be closely associated with the sacred which is encountered in the form of powers and divine beings. Concepts of gods and goddesses have developed as answers to fundamental human questions of how one can cope in an uncertain world. This topic most aptly fits those religious systems classified as POLYTHEISM, where the divine is perceived as many distinct entities. Gods and goddesses have been perceived in every conceivable expression: the sun and moon, earth and sky, climatic phenomena, animals, heroes, and various aspects of human life.

In ancient agricultural societies the earth goddess was an important deity regarded as the giver of life and of fertility. Often seen as Mother Earth, in ancient Mesopotamia she was commonly known as Ishtar or Ashitree. She was known to the Israelites through the Canaanites, and many turned to worship her soon after arriving in the Promised Land (Judg. 2:13; 10:6). The goddess was also known in the ancient civilization of the Indus Valley prior to the Aryan migration from the north. Frequently the moon is associated with the goddess of fertility because she seems to relate to the rhythms of life. The rhythm of fertility is also symbolized by deities depicted as dying and then rising. The modern pagan movement in the West has sought to recover the worship of the Earth Mother, who is variously spoken of as Gaia or The Lady, and is considered in the threefold form of young maid, mother, and old crone.

Often associated with the earth goddess was the sky god who brings rain, which fertilizes the earth that produces the harvest. For example, in the ancient Middle East the goddess Ashitree was associated with the god Baal. The fertility rituals associated with these deities took place at mountain shrines spoken of as high places in the Old Testament (1 Kings 14:23). The Baals were often considered to be the lords of particular areas, so they had appropriate surnames, for example, Baal-Peor (Num. 25:3). Baal was the great fertility god of the Canaanites whose worship throughout Israelite history was a continual challenge to the worship of Yahweh.

In the more complex civilizations of the ancient world, the pluralism of deities was considered to operate as a pantheon, a community of gods and goddesses. The pantheon was based on a complex system of myths and legends that gave an explanation of the nature of the sacred in every area of social life. There was often a senior god conceived of as the father of the gods, a supreme being associated with the sky. For example, Zeus was the high god of the Greeks, Jupiter for the Romans, and Odin for the Vikings. Sometimes this supreme deity was regarded as old or remote, so that the real powers were with the more immanent and vigorous gods. In other cases, one god ruled, and the others performed the basic functions that maintained life and order. These gods married and had offspring, fought wars or made peace.

Civilizations like those of the city-states of Egypt, Mesopotamia, Greece, and the Aztecs had a hierarchical pantheon governing through a human ruler. A close relationship was sometimes conceived between a particular god and the political might of a city. Thus the Babylonians would take the idols of conquered nations back to their temples in Babylon as symbols of Babylonian domination.

Many gods had their own special domain. Those who displayed great physical powers often functioned as gods of protection and war. The Vedas of ancient India spoke of the storm god Indra, and Thor was the storm god of the Viking people. Mars was the Roman god of war protecting the state. Often the king was considered an embodiment of such a god. An example was the Japanese emperor, who was regarded as the sun god. Other deities were associated with the arts and technology. Thoth was the Egyptian god of wisdom, and Njord was the Scandinavian patron of shipping. Ogun was the Yoruba god for all those who worked with iron, the blacksmith, the goldsmith, the hunter, and even the taxi driver in modern times. The Greek god Hades, Seth of the Egyptians, and Ereshkigal of Mesopotamia received the dead into their abode. Thus there was a great variety of religious expression relating to state cults, local cults, and occupational cults. A deity might with time grow or decline in importance, so even within ancient societies there was continual change, making it difficult to draft simple typologies.

Scholars have attempted to distinguish between gods and ancestors, or between divinities and lesser spirits. An ancestor is usually a deified human, a cultural hero who through great exploits has risen to the status of a god (see Ancestral Practices). The famous Chinese general Kuan-ti was deified as the warrior protector of the empire. Although these distinctions may be useful, they can mislead, and it is usually best to begin with the categories that the particular society has set up. The Lugbara of Africa, for example, distinguish between ancestors and adro spirits. Ancestors remain close to the image of human beings, while the adro do the reverse of normal human behavior: they are cannibalistic, incestuous, and walk upside down. The ancestors express the pattern of the human world with its social order, while the adro represent the dangerous world of the bush. This contrast of opposites explains the perplexing features of life.

 Gods and spirits are often believed to be able to reveal themselves or express their will to humans. A common manner is through dreams, especially those that are vivid or unusual. People ponder these dreams and ask others to help interpret whether they are warnings or promises. Another means of divine revelation is through a trance; a person possessed by a deity. In these cases the god is believed to speak directly and express his will through the mouth or the actions of the individual (see Possession Phenomena).

In return gods and goddesses require homage and sacrifices. These are usually offered at spe-
RITUALS, however, often become elaborate, so that simple rituals of a person or a community. Most Hindus perform rules and TABOOS, to remove evil or sickness from a time of feasting and license. Sacrifices can also be required to make atonement for violations of a deity, but also the mood of the devotee. It is characterized by chanting of the sacred name, reciting and acting the great stories of the deity, and singing hymns of praise. Various combinations of human relationships have been used to depict devotion to the deity: servant to master, child to parent, friend to friend, lover to beloved.

Monistic religious traditions assume that the whole of reality is divine, but even here gods and goddesses can be an important feature, regarded as manifestations of the one divine reality. Within the Hindu tradition the bhakti way (bhaktimarga) is a type of devotion that leads to liberation. The worship of Vishnu in the form of Krishna or Rama is very popular in India, as is the worship of Shiva and his consort Sakti. Bhakti reflects not only a special relationship to a particular form of deity, but also the mood of the devotee. It is characterized by chanting of the sacred name, reciting and acting the great stories of the deity, and singing hymns of praise. Various combinations of human relationships have been used to depict this devotion to the deity: servant to master, child to parent, friend to friend, lover to beloved.

David Burnett

Goforth, Jonathan (1859–1936). Canadian missionary to China. First and last a soul-winner. Jonathan Goforth was born on a farm in rural Ontario, the seventh of eleven children. Converted at age eighteen, he soon influenced a high school teacher and an entire class to follow Christ.

Reading the memoirs of Robert Murray McCheyne, Jonathan caught the vision for a life of ministry and dedicated himself to foreign missions just before attending Knox College (Toronto). He married Rosalind Bell Smith in 1887 and was appointed by the Presbyterian Church of Canada to China, arriving there in 1888. Goforth's first focus was the North Honon Province, at that time a dangerous territory for foreigners. Given Jonathan's energetic and inspired commitment to soul-winning and to establishing a witness in new areas, the Goforths immersed themselves in the culture. Despite many setbacks and trials, including the deaths of several of their children, their first decade saw the cultivation of indigenous Bible teachers and evangelists.

The Goforths escaped with their lives during the 1900 Boxer Rebellion, although Jonathan was nearly killed. After a brief furlough in Canada they returned to China in 1901. Grief over modernism in the homeland churches and the powerlessness of the small satellite churches in China moved Jonathan to hunger and plead with God for revival. Jonathan personally witnessed the great Korean revival in 1907 and returned to China with the burning desire to see God's spiritual blessing fall there. On a speaking tour of established churches throughout Manchuria, Jonathan's desire was realized as the spirit of revival began to take hold. A preliminary pattern was soon established: deliberate and faithful prayer, clear testimony of revival in another place, preaching of the Word, and an invitation to confess sins and pray. Churches were revitalized and thousands of new converts were baptized between 1908 and 1913.

Holding to the absolute authority of the Word of God, the Goforths carried the message of salvation to the remote areas of Manchuria. They called on mission and denominational leaders there and in the homeland to forsake the compromise of modernism. Winsome and tireless, they continued in the ministry until 1934, when failing health led them to return to Canada. During their forty-six years of faithful ministry, God raised up over sixty Chinese evangelists and Bible teachers and established thirty new mission stations.

Janet Bruce

Goforth, Rosalind Bell Smith (1864–1942). Canadian missionary to China. When Rosalind and Jonathan Goforth lost all their worldly possessions in a fire during their first year of marriage and ministry in China, Rosalind felt God weaning her soul decisively from the past to their calling among the Chinese. The Goforths prayed earnestly for converts from the very first, and God answered. As a means of breaking into a foreign culture, they opened their first home in North Honon Province for daily tours and hundreds of local villagers responded. The visitors were ushered through the house in small groups and were given a short introduction to the God of the Bible and the Lord Jesus Christ.

Rosalind bore eleven children, five of whom died in China. An educated and capable woman, she managed the household details for her large family and frequently the mission bookkeeping and correspondence as well. She had a special role in evangelizing women and training some as Bible teachers. Following Jonathan's lead, she submitted her own will to God to leave the security of the home mission station and go with her husband and children to evangelize in distant areas. Bearing up under often primitive living conditions and difficult, dangerous travel, they believed and proved together that the safest place for them and their family was the path of duty. God raised up converts and disciplined thousands through their obedience and faithfulness.

In their later years, Rosalind was Jonathan’s eyes and he her ears as their health began to fail. They returned to Canada in 1934 and were able to record the essence of their lifework in several books before Jonathan’s passing in 1936 and Rosalind’s in 1942. Rosalind’s How I Know God Answers Prayer merited numerous reprintings and has influenced a generation of Christians to commit their lives to God and his blessing.

In 1906, Gordon was elected to the Executive Committee of the American Baptist Missionary Union and also founded the Sarah Gorham Missionary Training School. The school, which trained both boys and girls in religion and industry, was highly successful. By 1899, 250 to 300 pupils were enrolled.

After her arrival in Sierra Leone, she moved to Magbelle, a town on the banks of the Scarcies River. She was very active in the Allen AME Church and also founded the Sarah Gorham Missionary Training School. The school, which trained both boys and girls in religion and industry, was highly successful. By 1899, 250 to 300 pupils were enrolled.

Gordon, Adoniram Judson (1836–95). American Baptist missions promoter. Born in New Hampton, New Hampshire, educated at Brown University (B.A., 1860) and Newton Theological Institution (B.D., 1863), Gordon championed the cause of missions during his pastorate of Boston’s Clarendon Street Baptist Church from 1869 to 1895. He joined the Executive Committee of the American Baptist Missionary Union in 1871, and became chair in 1888. In 1884 he negotiated the ABMU takeover of the faltering British Congo River Livingstone Inland Mission. In 1889 he established the Boston Missionary Training School, which welcomed female students, sent out fifty missionaries in its first decade, and later developed into Gordon College and Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary.

Through extensive speaking and writing, Gordon promoted missions across denominational and international boundaries. In 1886 he helped launch what became the STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT. At the 1888 LONDON CENTENARY CONFERENCE on the Protestant Missions of the World he emerged as an international missions advocate. A premillennialist, Gordon did not conflate Christianity and Western culture, or favor the civilizing incremental missiology typical of the imperialist era. His views on world evangelization were articulated in The Ship Jesus (c. 1884), The Holy Spirit in Missions (c. 1893), his journal The Watchword, and the Missionary Review of the World, of which he became associate editor in 1890. Gordon is also remembered as a hymn writer, poet, educator, and social reformer.

The Gospel and Culture

Gorham, Sarah (1832–94). American missionary to Sierra Leone. She was born in Fredericksburg, Maryland. Little is known about her childhood or educational background. About 1880 she visited some relatives in Liberia. Deeply moved by the appalling living conditions she observed, she traveled about comforting those who were in need.

She returned to the United States and settled in Boston, Massachusetts. Shortly thereafter; she joined the Charles Street AME Church and became involved in humanitarian work. In 1888 she felt God’s call to the mission field and volunteered for the AME Liberian Mission.

She planned to go to Liberia, the place she had previously visited, but was moved by the Rev. Frederick to join him in Sierra Leone. At fifty-six years of age, Gorham became the first woman missionary appointed to a foreign field.

After her arrival in Sierra Leone, she moved to Magbelle, a town on the banks of the Scarcies River. She was very active in the Allen AME Church and also founded the Sarah Gorham Missionary Training School. The school, which trained both boys and girls in religion and industry, was highly successful. By 1899, 250 to 300 pupils were enrolled.

Gorham worked with extraordinary fervor and dedication. In a letter dated May 28, 1894, she wrote: “With all I am suffering and all I am enduring I would not give up this work under any condition.” Indeed, she did not give up her work until she was forced to.

In July 1894 she fell ill with fever and died on August 10. Like her Lord Jesus Christ, she literally gave her life for the work of the gospel.

The Gospel and Culture. The Gospel is God’s gift to humankind. Culture is a human creation. However, the gospel is expressed within culture and communicated through culture. “The Word became flesh [incarnation] and made his dwelling among us [enculturation]” (John 1:14a).

We create cultures because humans are created in God’s image (Gen. 1:26–31) (see IMAGE OF GOD). God creates; humans make artifacts. God speaks; humans develop languages. God is a covenant being; humans create social institutions. God is righteous; humans develop systems of mores. Religion develops out of human yearning for a relationship with the other dimensions of existence. Artifacts, languages, social institutions, mores, and religion are some dimensions of human culture.

Cultures are organized. Like an artichoke, cultures have a core with layers encircling that core.
The Gospel and Culture

The worldview is the cultural core—the understanding of the meaning of the universe and the person’s place within the universe. Moving outward from the core other layers include power, values, practices, and artifacts. The core fundamentally informs each of the other layers.

All cultures possess indications of truth and graciousness. For example, most African traditional religions assumed some form of life after death; there was a hint of gospel-like truth in that perception. Children were valued; the mother carried the newborn baby on her back for many months. Children grew up secure. Such indications of image-of-God-like truth and goodness are present in all cultures (Rom. 1:20; 10:8; Acts 17:22–23, 28).

All cultures also possess the imprint of evil and distortions of truth (Rom. 1:18–32). When Adam and Eve turned away from God, they did so because they wanted to “be like God” (Gen. 3:1–11). This declaration of independence from our creator is universal. We ourselves and our cultures become our ultimate loyalty, rather than our creator. Consequently, the gods we worship become the psychoprojection of our cultures. In various ways religions everywhere are inclined to become the mirror image of respective cultures; the gods of culture rarely call people to repent (Jer. 10:1–16).

The Bible pronounces the gods of culture as false. It is for this reason that repentance is the essential response of all who embrace biblical faith. God the Creator confronts the gods of culture. God calls people to repent, to turn away from the gods of culture they have created and worship rather the God who has created them (Exod. 20:3).

Jesus Christ is the supreme clarification event. As “God With Us,” he entered and lived within a particular culture with relevant, disturbing, revolutionary, life-giving power. Jesus is unprecedented. No human culture, religion, philosophy, or speculation ever imagined the possibility of Jesus Christ (Matt. 16:13–18). Jesus is the gospel. He is God’s salvation gift to humanity (John 3:16), and transformation gift to culture (Matt. 13:33).

Through the Holy Spirit, Jesus Christ seeks to make his home within the worldview and power centers of every culture (Matt. 5, 6, 7, 24:14). Missiologists refer to this as contextualization. The gospel should become relevant and revolutionary good news within every cultural context. The Dyak of Petussibau in West Kalimantan, who traditionally feared birds as omens of the gods, can discover that Jesus frees from bondage to squawking birds. However, a Harvard University astronomer would be quite amused if a Christian student were to tell him that Christ can free him from the fear of squawking crows. The cultural contexts in Boston and Petussibau are exceedingly different!

The church within every society needs to discern the aspects of the culture that the gospel blesses, and those dimensions that the gospel critiques and transforms. Acts 15 describes a conference in Jerusalem that convened to address such issues. Persons representing Jewish and Greek cultures participated. They heard accounts of what the Holy Spirit was doing in transforming lives, they searched the Scriptures for guidance, they listened to the counsel of the Holy Spirit, and in counsel together they bound some practices and loosened others.

This remarkable Jerusalem council affirmed salvation in Jesus Christ as the center of the church’s faith in every culture, but also freed the church to embrace cultural diversity. Consequently the global church can celebrate astonishing cultural diversity while enjoying unity in Christ.

The gospel is always clothed within the idioms of culture. That is the nature of the Bible and the church. Consequently, Christian missionaries carry both their culture and the gospel with them when they move from one culture to another. However, whenever a people receive Jesus Christ, they are empowered and freed by the Holy Spirit and the Scriptures to evaluate and critique both their own culture and that of the missionary. The presence of Jesus Christ within any culture is life-giving empowerment (John 8:31–36).

David W. Shenk

See also Christ and Culture.

The Gospel and Our Culture Network. The Gospel and Our Culture movement began in the United Kingdom in the early 1980s under the influence of Lesslie Newbigin’s challenge to the churches of the West to engage what he called the most important missionary challenge of the latter part of the twentieth century—the missionary encounter of the gospel with Western culture. His book The Other Side of 1984 sparked the movement in Britain, which first took the form as the Gospel and Our Culture Programme of the British Council of Churches. That programme later merged with the C. S. Lewis Society to form Gospel and Culture, which subsequently was taken under the wing of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

In North America, the Gospel and Our Culture Network formed in the late 1980s under the influence of Newbigin and others as an effort to engage the same challenge within the specific context of the United States and Canada. Coordinated by George R. Hunsberger, the network sustains a quarterly newsletter, an annual consultation, and a program of research, publication, and education for the purpose of providing useful research for the encounter of the gospel with North American culture and encouraging local action toward the transformation of the life and witness of the churches. The Church Between Gospel and Culture and Missional Church, the first two volumes in the network's Gospel and Our Culture Series, lay out the essential agenda for Western churches as one engaged in “assessing our culture, discerning the gospel, and defining the church” and call the churches to embody their essential missional character.

Parallel movements have emerged in other Western societies, most notably the Gospel and Cultures Trust in New Zealand, founded and led by Harold Turner. In addition, an international project led by Wilbert R. Shenk has begun producing a body of research and literature on the theme of a Missiology of Western culture.

George R. Hunsberger

Gospel, The. The gospel (euangelion) or “good news” has been entrusted to the church to proclaim to all peoples. It is variously described as an “eternal gospel” (Rev. 14:6), “the gospel of peace” (Eph. 6:15), “the gospel of Christ” (1 Cor. 9:12), “the gospel of the grace of God” (Acts 20:24), and “the gospel of the kingdom” (Matt. 24:14). These different designations do not mean different gospels, for there is only one gospel (Gal. 1:8). This word is also associated with the synonym kerygma, a noun used eight times in the New Testament to focus particular attention on the proclamation of the precise content of the gospel. These two words are identical in their definition of the gospel and both stress the fact that in essence the gospel concerns an event of surpassing uniqueness. Prior to the consummation of human history, when God shall “bring all things in heaven and on earth together under one head, even Christ,” it is his will that this gospel “must first be preached to all nations” (Eph. 1:10; Mark 13:10).

Although the uniqueness of this gospel event is clearly and frequently referred to in the New Testament as the sum total of the redemptive work of Christ, its full meaning is beyond human comprehension. When he embraced the cross this involved not only taking to his innocency the totality of human sin and shame in order to make it his own responsibility, but also included the curse of sin as well, which is death (2 Cor. 5:21; Gal. 3:13). He had to invalidate the claim and power of sin by entering into the death that is its ultimate penalty. His object thereby was to destroy it, for death is Satan’s greatest weapon (Heb. 2:9, 14, 15). In so doing he “disarmed the powers and authorities” under Satan’s dominion in order that he might send sin back to its demonic author. He thereby broke its tyranny and destroyed its power, and by this means removed its curse (Col. 2:15). Hence, the gospel is equated with this unique once for-all-time event: the death, burial, and Resurrection of Christ, followed by his subsequent exaltation to the right hand of God, where he was gloriously acclaimed and “made both Lord and Christ” (Acts 2:36). “The reason the Son of God appeared was to destroy the devil’s work” (1 John 3:8).

On this basis the people of God, in response to their Lord’s Great Commission to “make disciples of all nations,” have but one way to demonstrate their obedience to him. They are to confront the human race with the divine command: “Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins. And you will receive the gift of the Holy Spirit. The promise is for you and your children and for all who are far off—for all whom the Lord our God will call” (2:38, 39). From this it follows that the call to Repentance and Faith, with its promise of divine intervention, is of the very essence of God’s plan for the redemption of his people from the nations of the earth.

When one examines the total usage of the word “gospel” in the Scriptures the impression quickly grows that “preaching the gospel” cannot be confined to the mere recitation of the actual facts of Christ’s atoning and saving work. To the apostles all that he did was “in accordance with the Scriptures” (1 Cor. 15:3, 4). This meant nothing less to them than that the coming of Christ into the world (“when the time had fully come” Gal. 4:4) represented the central event in “salvation history.” It was almost of the order of an eschatological event at a critical juncture in the biblical record of Israel’s long and troubled history. Indeed, it also marked a distinctly new era in the fortunes of the nations, for by the gospel nothing less than “the Kingdom of God is being preached” (Luke 16:16). Since this would involve the reclamation of this fallen world from Satan’s control, the proclamation of the gospel from then on attained the order of something special in God’s dealings with not only Israel but with the Gentile world as well. This brought a sense of uniqueness to the calling of those who would go forth to the nations with this gospel. Indeed, Paul would speak of Christ having given to him “the ministry of reconciliation,” a ministry so sublime in his eyes that it was nothing less than “God making his appeal through us” (2 Cor. 5:18–20). All those who proclaim this gospel can truthfully... though humbly state that they are "God's fellow workers" (6:1). In their preaching of the gospel, what they share is "not the word of men, but as it actually is, the word of God" (1 Thess. 2:13). As a result their preaching was making actual and available to their hearers the very reality of God's salvation.

This brings up another point of far-reaching significance. The apostles unitedly and fiercely opposed any thought that the achievement of the world's reconciliation by Christ alone through his solitary cross was somehow incomplete. How could it be otherwise when at its heart was nothing less than God himself in his Son "reconciling the world to himself" (2 Cor. 5:19). As a result only human arrogance would dare to challenge its perfection by claiming that any human activity was needed to bring it to completion. The Christians at Ephesus were pointedly told: "It is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast" (Eph. 2:8, 9). Indeed, no person can make himself or herself fit for God's Presence, much less enter into personal relationship with him. The preaching of the gospel has solely to do with the person of Christ and must be kept free from all reference to legalistic Judaism or any other form of what has been popularly termed "works-righteousness." The followers of Christ in Crete were told: "When the kindness and love of God our Savior appeared, He saved us, not because of the righteous things we had done, but because of His mercy" (Titus 3:4, 5).

When Saul the Pharisee was confronted by the Lord on the road to Damascus, he not only had a vision of the risen, glorified Christ. Through repentance and faith the persecutor of the people of God found himself graciously called to the fellowship and service of the One whom he had so persistently and hatefully opposed (Acts 26:12–18). As the apostle to the Gentiles he was given a fivefold task (v. 18, see also Paul and Mission). He was to "open their eyes," for people by nature and satanic influence "cannot see the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God" (2 Cor. 4:4). Paul was then to "turn them from darkness to light," for people in their fallenness are not facing this Christ, the Light of the World, who alone can meet their need. But before they can effectively reach out to the Savior, they must turn "from the power of Satan to God." This is absolutely crucial, for it involves the conscious repudiation of all that has previously controlled their lives. The early church encouraged would-be followers of Jesus to renounce by solemn oath "the devil and all his works." It was felt that only then would they be able to commit their lives to the control of the Lord. And once this change of allegiance takes place they will be able by faith to "receive the forgiveness of sins" and subsequently "a place among those who are sanctified in Christ" (i.e., gain incorporation into a local congregation of fellow believers through baptism). Central in this evanglistic sequence is the fact that the gospel is a Person. To receive him (John 1:11, 12) involves consciously submitting to a new authority over one's life, even to Christ the Lord.

Arthur F. Glasser

Gossner, Johannes Evangelista (1773–1858).

German founder of the Gossner Mission Society. Born at Hausen in Bavaria, Gossner studied at Augsburg, Dillingen, and Ingolstadt. While studying, he was influenced by Johann Sailer, a pietist professor. Consecrated as a Roman Catholic priest in 1796, he served his first year as an assistant at Neuburg. As cathedral chaplain at Augsburg (1797–1804), his evanglistic views brought him into conflict with Catholic authorities. He had contact with both the Catholic and Protestant revival movements and belonged to a group of converted priests and laypeople that was suspended by the Inquisition in 1802.

Banished from Bavaria, Gossner answered a call from Czar Alexander I to Saint Petersburg in 1820 but was expelled in 1824. He formally left the Roman Catholic Church in 1826 and was ordained a Lutheran minister. While serving as pastor of the Bethlehem Church in Berlin (1829–46), he developed a vision for missions. Gossner founded a children's nursery in 1834, the Gossner Mission Society in 1836, and the Elizabeth Hospital in 1837. Over the next twenty years Gossner trained and sent out 140 missionaries around the world. He resigned from the pastorate in 1846 to devote his time to the hospital, counseling, and preaching. Among Gossner's publications were a German translation of the New Testament, a commentary on the New Testament, and a missionary journal Die Biene auf dem Missionsfeld (The Bee on the Mission Field).

Gary Lamb

Grace of God. The mission of God (Missio Dei) flows directly from God's gracious, merciful love for rebellious, sinful humans who deserve justice rather than mercy. "For the wages of sin is death, but the grace/gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 6:23). Traditionally, the grace of God has been understood to mean God's loving initiative in bestowing unmerited favor on humankind through Jesus Christ. The biblical idea of grace is foundational for the mission of the church.

First, grace is an attribute of God's being. In the Bible, God is known most essentially as "The Lord, the compassionate and gracious God, slow to anger, abounding in love and faithfulness, maintaining love to thousands and forgiving wickedness, rebellion and sin” (Exod. 34:6; see also Exod. 22:27; 33:19; Num. 14:18 Deut. 4:31; 2 Chron. 30:9; Neh. 9:17; Pss. 111:4; 86:15; 102:8; 112:4; 145:8; Jonah 4:2; Joel 2:13; Rom. 9:15). God's grace derives from God's love (see LOVE OF GOD). John says that “God is love” (1 John 4:8). In his freedom, God “so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son” (John 3:16). Paul's missionary vision was motivated by this love: “For Christ's love compels us” (2 Cor. 5:14, 20).

God's grace and mercy toward those who “like sheep have gone astray” (Isa. 53:6) motivates the church to mission. Second, the grace of God takes two forms: common or general grace directed toward all creation and special grace in relation to God's covenant children. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus affirmed God's common grace, saying: “(Your Father in heaven) causes his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sends rain on the righteous and the unrighteous” (Matt. 5:45). Common grace points the church to a wholistic, KINGDOM OF GOD orientation in mission that is concerned with all of God's creation. Common grace also provides the space for missionary CONTEXTUALIZATION, based on general revelation (Rom. 1), recognizing that in all cultures God has “endowed human beings with some inbuilt sense or presentiment of the divine existence. It is as if something about God has been engraved in the heart of every human being” (A. McGrath, p. 160, citing John Calvin, Institutes). This is what Don Richardson called REDEMPTIVE ANALOGIES, allowing for the possibility of conceptual bridges to those who do not yet know Jesus Christ, without going so far as to affirm the revelational stature of “natural theology” against which Karl Barth spoke so vehemently (cf. e.g., K. Barth, II:1, 134–78; D. Bloesch, 1992, 141–83; Berkouwer, 1955, 21–47).

Calvinist Reformed theology maintains a distinction between common or general grace and God's special grace that happens supremely in Jesus Christ through faith, brought about by the work of the Holy Spirit. In contrast, ARMINIAN THEOLOGY would affirm prevenient grace. Prevenient grace was taught by Jacobus Arminius (1560–1609) and was elaborated later by the Wesleys and Methodists. They affirmed that God's assistance is freely and graciously given to humans prior to their having saving faith and gives humans the inclination and ability to accept God's salvation in Jesus Christ. They saw “grace as a seamless garment; no difference exists between general and special grace. (Prevenient) grace provides for basic human needs, restrains evil, maintains civil justice, removes the guilt and penalty of original sin, implants the first wish to please God, convicts of sin, and grants all people the power to turn to God in faith” (Lewis and Demarest, 22–23; cf. also S. Grenz, 259; A. McGrath, 378).

Third, God's grace takes place fully and completely by God's sending his only Son, Jesus Christ. This truth keeps common grace or general revelation from becoming inclusivist or pluralist in relation to the religions. It keeps God's grace focused in the fact that it is unmerited, a merciful response to judgment. In Jesus Christ, God's grace abounds for our salvation. “God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us” (Rom. 5:8). The Bible emphasizes this active, direct, redemptive grace by stressing God's mercy—mercy that is not merited by human creatures (Deut. 4:31; 2 Sam. 24:11; 1 Chron. 21:13; Neh. 9:3, 31; Ps. 25:6; Jer. 9:12; Dan. 9:9, 18; Hos. 6:6; Amos 5:15; Mic. 6:8; 7:18; Luke 1:50; Eph. 2:4; 1 Peter 1:3). Paul stressed the inseparable connection of grace with the incarnation in Jesus Christ, by saying repeatedly, “the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ” (Rom. 3:24; 16:20; 1 Cor. 1:4; 16:23; Gal. 2:16; Eph. 2:5–8; Phil. 25; cf. also John 1:14, 17; Acts 15:11; Rev. 22:21).

Fourth, the church is the community of love, mercy, and grace. “As the Father has sent me,” Jesus told his disciples, “I am sending you” (John 20:21). Mission in grace means that the church is to be a “koinonia” fellowship of grace, mercy, and love (C. Van Engen, 90–92). “As I have loved you, so you must love one another. By this (everyone) will know that you are my disciples, if you love one another” (John 13:34–35). Jesus told his disciples to “be merciful, just as your Father is merciful” (Luke 6:36). Paul encouraged the church in Ephesus to “be compassionate with one another” (Eph. 4:32). Peter wrote to the churches, “Finally, all of you, live in harmony with one another; be sympathetic, love as brothers, be compassionate (merciful) and humble” (1 Peter 3:8). The preaching of the Word and the administration of the sacraments are means of grace not only for church members but through the church in evangelical proclamation of the gospel to the world.

Fifth, the mission of the church is itself a work of grace whereby the disciples of Jesus Christ participate in God's gracious initiative in showing mercy to the world. So Jonah was called to have compassion on Nineveh as God has compassion. In Acts, STEPHEN, one of the first deacons, was said to be “a man full of God's grace and power” (Acts 6:8). The disciples of Jesus share Christ's love, compassion, and commitment for all those who will come to faith. They commit themselves to world evangelization because "The Lord . . . is patient, not wanting anyone to perish, but everyone to come to repentance” (2 Peter 3:9). The grace of God means, therefore, that mission is not optional or extra to the life of the church; it is essential and integral to its very being. The church is God’s gracious missionary people, agents of God’s mercy, calling women and men to become disciples of Jesus Christ and responsible members of Christ’s church.
Grace of God

Charles Van Engen

See also Divine Election.

Graham, William Franklin (1918– ). American evangelist and Christian statesman. Reared on a dairy farm in Charlotte, North Carolina, he was converted in 1934 through the ministry of evangelist Mordecai Ham. He studied at Florida Bible Institute and then at Wheaton College (Illinois) where he met his future wife, Ruth Bell. Upon graduation he joined Youth for Christ and preached throughout the United States and Europe. The 1949 Los Angeles crusade placed Graham in the national spotlight and the following year the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association was formed. The London crusade of 1954 brought him international prominence. He has since preached in over 185 countries and territories of the world.

In his role as a Christian statesman he has counseled numerous United States presidents and world leaders. His impact on the evangelical world has been enormous, from his part in founding Christianity Today and Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary, to his bringing together mission-minded groups at conferences such as the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization (1974). He has preached the gospel to more people in live audiences than anyone else in history, estimated at over 210 million people. Hundreds of millions more have been reached through his use of radio, television, video, film, and print media.

Timothy K. Beougher

Graul, Karl (1814–64). German pioneer missiologist and missionary to India. Graul is regarded as one of the leading German missiological thinkers of the nineteenth century. He uniquely combined linguistic skills with the ability to integrate a broad range of knowledge in service of missions. He advocated the need for theologically trained missionaries at a time when such were hard to find. He pioneered thinking on indigeneity for mission-planted churches, emphasizing that they must be independent and intimately grounded in the cultural characteristics of the people among which they were planted. Core to his concept of indigeneity was the idea that those things which are morally neutral, including most of the cultures’ social order, need not be changed. This included, for example, the Caste system, which Graul felt should be allowed in the Indian church with the hope of eventual change.

Graul, a staunch Lutheran, directed the Leipzig Mission from 1844 to 1860. As director, he moved to Tamil where he lived for four years. Gifted in languages, in that short period he was able to learn Tamil well enough to establish himself as an expert in the language. He wrote extensively on Tamil, Vedanta Hinduism, and missionary principles and work. He was among the first to seek to establish a chair of missions at the university level in Germany. Though successful in setting up the opportunity, he died before he was able to assume the position.

A. Scott Moreau

Great Awakenings. The term “Great Awakenings” refers to a series of movements in western Europe and North America that began around 1725 and extended to the late nineteenth century. In generally accepted terminology, Revivals occurred within the church, bringing Christians to deeper personal faith and devotion, while awakenings resulted from revivals as the church moved powerfully into the world in evangelism, social transformation, and mission. But the two cannot be separated. Most scholars list three major awakenings during the period, even though the chronological boundaries cannot always be easily defined, and vary from area to area. The movements had their roots in English Puritanism and German Pietism, while Moravianism, which was part of the first awakening, was a catalyst in the wider church, especially in missions.

The First Awakening began in North America in the 1720s, led by Theodorus Frelinghuysen and Gilbert Tennent. Tennent’s father William was an Irish immigrant who established a “log college” to prepare ministers who were spiritually alive as well as theologically orthodox. Influenced by Pietism, they preached the necessity of conversion to Frelinghuysen’s Dutch parishioners and Tennent’s Presbyterians. The movement spread, and the revivalists began to itinerate. In 1741 Presbyterianists in the middle colonies divided over the issues of pastoral training, itineration, and the emphases of the revival. When they reunited in 1758, the revivalist group had tripled in number, while the anti-revivalist group had dwindled.

In 1734–35 Jonathan Edwards, a Congregationalist, led a revival in Northampton, Massachusetts, and neighboring towns. In 1740–42 the movement spread across much of New England and eventually across the American colonies as George Whitefield became the major figure. Formerly a member of the “Holy Club” at Oxford, he had experienced an evangelical conversion in 1735. On his second trip to America in 1739–40 he preached to large crowds in the middle colonies and New England in a unique display of interdenominational cooperation. Crowds flocked to hear him; thousands were converted and joined the churches. When Congregationalists in New England split over the revival, some became Baptists and later went to Virginia and the Carolinas, where their churches grew primarily among the poor. A spontaneous movement also began in Hanover County, Virginia, as lay persons came together to read the sermons of Whitefield and writings of Luther. Thousands came, special buildings were constructed, and Presbyterian churches were eventually established. The democratizing influence of Presbyterians and Baptists would bring change in the rigid social order of Virginia.

The focus of preaching in the awakenings was the necessity of conversion, personal faith in Jesus Christ that went beyond mere assent to orthodoxy to include personal assurance of salvation, and the call to a Christian lifestyle. Opposition arose, primarily for two reasons. Some, for reasons of spiritual complacency or theology, did not believe in the validity of the movement or its necessity. Others rejected it because of the excesses and fanaticism of some revivalists or because of preaching by laymen.

In Britain, praying societies similar to pietist groups in Germany were precursors. In Wales, Daniel Rowland, an Anglican vicar, and Howell Harris, a layman, were converted in 1735 and began itinerant preaching. In 1736 Whitefield began to preach widely and with great effect. He and his friends began a daily prayer meeting in 1737 for the renewal of the church. The following year John and Charles Wesley, already zealous in their religious devotion, came to personal assurance of salvation. John Wesley’s preaching on the new birth and the radical nature of discipleship soon resulted in his exclusion from most churches. He joined Whitefield in a pattern he would follow until his death in 1791—traveling four thousand to five thousand miles per year and preaching fifteen to eighteen times per week in streets, fields, and Methodist societies. The two eventually split because of Whitefield’s acceptance of Calvinism and Wesley’s rejection of predestination and acceptance of the doctrine of perfection. The bishop of London sharply criticized Wesley’s movement, saying it drew “to itself the lowest and most ignorant people.”

The awakening gave birth to the Methodist Church, while thousands joined Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Baptist churches. The successful antislavery movement in England found its roots here. Missionary work like that of David Brainerd among “Indians” was stimulated. Brainerd’s Journal would be powerfully used in subsequent missionary motivation. The awakening also produced a number of colleges, including Princeton and Dartmouth. It hastened separation of church and state in America and to some degree contributed to the American Revolution. Women played a role in the Wesleyan movement as preachers and class leaders.

The awakening died down in the 1760s and 1770s with the American Revolution and the growth of rationalism. In 1784 John Erskine of Edinburgh republished Edwards’ Call to Prayer for a Revival. Soon concerts of prayer were held across Britain and on the Continent. The directors of the newly formed London Missionary Society recommended that one meeting a month focus on prayer for missions.

By 1795 concerts of prayer had spread among churches of most evangelical denominations in the eastern United States, and three years later the awakening became widespread.

Revival came to Yale in 1802 under the presidency of Timothy Dwight, Edwards’ grandson, and one-third of the students professed conversion. The Haystack Prayer Meeting in 1806 at Williams College resulted in the beginning of the American overseas missionary movement. The revival was orderly in the East, but in the West and Southwest it was accompanied with many unusual manifestations. A camp meeting was held in 1800 in Kentucky with services held in the open air; families came from a distance. In 1801 the Cane Ridge Meeting was organized in Kentucky, which lasted six days and was attended by around 12,500. Hundreds were held the following years, and the camp meeting became an important method of evangelism in the southern United States, led first by Presbyterians and later by Baptists and Methodists. The latter two groups grew very rapidly to become the largest Protestant denominations in the United States, largely because of the awakening and because of their flexibility in ordaining pastors with little or no training and establishing churches quickly. Other results of this phase of the Second Awakening in the United States were the formation of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in 1810, the Baptist Foreign Missionary Society in 1814, and the Great Awakenings

Methodist Episcopal Foreign Missionary Society in 1819.

After the War of 1812 the awakening continued. Its most prominent exponent was Charles Finney, a Presbyterian who rejected the older Calvinist theology and adopted new techniques designed to lead people to conversion. In his 1830 campaign in Rochester 10 percent of the 10,000 citizens professed conversion and 450 joined the Presbyterian churches; other churches grew as well. This phase of the American awakening produced a number of interdenominational voluntary societies to promote educational and social reform and missions. At Oberlin College Finney encouraged the ministry of women. A strong antislavery movement developed in the North but not in the South.

In England the Methodists saw their total membership grow from 72,000 in 1791 to nearly a quarter of a million within a generation. Other churches also grew. The Protestant missionary movement, with roots in the earlier awakening, was launched. William Carey’s Baptist Missionary Society was formed in 1792, the interdenominational London Missionary Society in 1795, and the Anglican Church Missionary Society in 1799. Other societies were formed in Scotland and on the Continent. The evangelical movement was greatly strengthened in the Church of England, led especially by Charles Simeon, who was also a strong advocate for foreign missions. The Clapham Sect comprising Anglican evangelicals successfully implemented a number of social reforms, including the abolition of slavery. The Religious Tract Society (1799) and the British and Foreign Bible Society (1804) were established. Evangelicals sought to work out Christian principles in society. These included Robert Raikes and Hannah Moore, who founded the Sunday School movement; Elizabeth Fry, the prison reformer; and later the Earl of Shaftesbury, who campaigned for improvement of inhuman factory conditions. The Scot, Robert Haldane, used his wealth to establish a Society for the Propagation of the Gospel at home, which sent out over one hundred catechists and missionaries, and personally financed the training of three hundred students in a missionary training institute. Eventually he ministered effectively in Switzerland and France. In Norway a movement developed through the itinerant preaching of Hans Hauge, a lay preacher who traveled widely for eight years before being imprisoned for ten years. His societies remained in the Lutheran Church.

In Scotland the evangelical party maintained Sunday schools, protested against the exploitation of the poor, and promoted popular education. Its greatest leader, Thomas Chalmers, instituted an ingenious plan for the church to care for the poor.

Similar movements in Switzerland, France, Holland, and Germany resulted in philanthropic social action, Sunday schools, Bible distribution, and mission to the Jews.

The Second Awakening had significant results in the shape of the church in the United States. Baptists and Methodists became the major denominations. Evangelical Protestantism became a significant force at every level in Great Britain and North America, and the awakening provided the foundation for the overseas mission thrust of the second half of the century.

The Third Awakening began in 1857 in the United States, when Presbyterians, Baptists, and Methodists began meeting for prayer and discussion on the need for revival and awakening. That year Jeremiah Lamphier, a lay missionary in downtown New York for the Dutch Reformed Church, started a weekly noonday prayer meeting. Beginning with six men, within six months 10,000 businessmen were meeting daily to pray in 150 different groups. Similar prayer meetings began to spring up in other cities. A financial crisis had occurred shortly after he began, but there is evidence that the revival had begun prior to the crisis.

This Third Awakening saw laymen play a much stronger role. D. L. Moody began his Christian work in 1858 and two years later gave up his business interests to concentrate full time on Sunday schools and the YMCA, which had grown out of the Second Awakening. News from America reached the British Isles. Others began to pray, and increasingly people were converted. Twenty thousand met in the open air in Ulster, while in Scotland much of the northeast was affected, and the movement spread into the whole country. The revival began in Wales in 1858, reaching its height the two following years. Phoebe and Walter Palmer visited Newcastle in England in 1859, and the awakening began to increase in strength. William Booth, joined in preaching by his wife Catherine, began an itinerant ministry, which led to the formation of the Salvation Army. Theaters were used for Sunday evening services, which were attended by large crowds who would not have entered a church. The Salvation Army, the Keswick movement, Christian Unions in universities, and the growth of the Sunday School movement all resulted. A large number of itinerant evangelists came to prominence in the revival, the best known of whom was Moody.

The missionary movement received new impulses. J. Hudson Taylor organized the China Inland Mission in 1865. Moody’s Cambridge Mission in 1882 resulted in a number of conversions, including the Cambridge Seven, who went to China as missionaries. They powerfully influenced other students. Among the 251 in attendance at Moody’s student conference in 1886, 100 volunteered for mission, and the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions was formed. Under its auspices 20,500 young people from Europe and North America eventually went to Asia, Africa, and Latin America as missionaries. It also led to the formation of the World Student Christian Federation.

In the last third of the century “revivals” began to lose their character of widespread movements, becoming primarily mass evangelism, a technique for reaching people that was much less concerned with changing society. This was accentuated by the rise of theological liberalism and the social gospel.

Nevertheless, the Third Awakening, building on the previous two, shaped Anglo-American Protestantism and the missionary movement during the first half of the twentieth century, and provided most of its significant leaders.

Paul E. Pierson

Great Britain. See United Kingdom.

Great Century of Missions (A.D. 1792–1910). The “great century” is considered to have begun with William Carey and the organization of the Baptist Missionary Society in England in 1792. Carey is properly called the “Father of the Modern Protestant Missionary Movement,” because of his leadership in initiating this new and greatly expanded phase. But he was not the first Protestant missionary. Puritans had worked with Native Americans in New England in the seventeenth century, German pietists had gone to India early in the eighteenth, and Moravians had gone to at least twenty-eight countries in that century.

The movement had its roots in the spiritual dynamic of the first and second Great Awakenings on both sides of the Atlantic, and resulted in the organization of a large number of other missionary societies. In England they included the London Missionary Society (LMS, 1795), primarily by Congregationalists and Presbyterians, the Church Missionary Society (CMS, 1799) by evangelical Anglicans, and the British and Foreign Bible Society (1804) by evangelicals of various denominations. In the United States the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM, 1810) and the American Baptist Society (1814) were established. Others were organized in Scotland and on the Continent.

The first area of service was India, followed in 1813 by Burma (Myanmar). Beginning in 1796 LMS missionaries did heroic work in the South Sea Islands, where a number were killed. In 1820 John Williams went to Samoa with eight Tahitian teachers, and in a few years the Samoan church had sent missionaries to a number of other islands. ABCFM personnel arrived in Hawaii in 1820. Anglicans, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists arrived in Iran in 1811, Egypt in 1818, and Syria, Lebanon, and Turkey shortly afterward. The CMS began sending personnel to Sierra Leone in 1804, where in twenty years over fifty missionaries died of disease. But others took their places. The Basel Mission began work in Ghana in 1828, the Scottish Presbyterians went to Calabar (Nigeria) in 1846, and the LMS entered South Africa in 1799. David Livingstone, who arrived there in 1841, went north into Central Africa with the twofold goal of evangelizing and ending the slave trade. When Anglicans entered Uganda, Bishop James Hannington was speared to death, and later thirty-five Christian martyrs were burned alive by the chief of the Buganda people. But within a few years Buganda Christians were taking the gospel to traditional enemies, and one of them, Apolo Kivebulaya, won the trust of pygmies, learned their language, and translated the Gospel of Mark.

China prohibited the residence of foreigners until forced by the West to allow them to live in five ports after the treaty ending the first Opium War in 1842. The treaties after the second Opium War forced the government to allow Christians access to all of China after 1856. This resulted in a massive influx of missionaries by the end of the century, led by the China Inland Mission, organized in 1865. Four American societies entered Japan from 1859 to 1869, and American Presbyterians and Methodists arrived in Korea in 1884 and 1885. Protestant work began in the Philippines shortly after the Spanish American War. Permanent Protestant work began in Latin America after midcentury, when Presbyterians, Baptists, and Methodists arrived in Brazil, which enjoyed a measure of religious liberty. Work in other countries followed. Thus by 1910 several thousand Protestant missionaries were at work in Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

Carey’s goals, which most others accepted, were first, to preach the gospel by every possible means; second, to support the preaching by the distribution of the Bible in the languages of the people; third, to establish the church; fourth, to study the background and religious thought of the peoples; and finally, to train indigenous ministers. The nineteenth-century movement accomplished all of these objectives to some degree, although different missions and their workers varied in their emphases.
Great Century of Missions

In the words of two of the greatest mission leaders of the century, Henry Venn of the CMS, and Rufus Anderson of the ABCFM, the goal was to establish churches which would be “self-supporting, self-governing, and self-propagating.” An important assumption, with roots in the revivals which gave birth to missions, was that the preaching of the gospel would be accompanied by works of compassion and lead to positive changes in the societies where the church was planted. Naturally, in the minds of most missionaries those changes would include Western-style education, literacy, health care, and better treatment of women. Even though many of the changes looked very Western, that was not entirely negative. Carey worked, successfully, to end infanticide and suttee (the burning alive of widows with the bodies of their husbands) in India; Scottish Presbyterians were the first to speak out against female genital mutilation in Kenya; while others worked to end the painful and crippling practice of foot binding in China.

Thus, along with the preaching of the gospel, clinics, hospitals, and eventually medical schools were established along with facilities to care for marginalized people, the blind, lepers, and orphans. Missionaries established schools, seminaries, and universities. They did so, first, to train the children of new Christians and prepare church leadership, but they had other goals in mind: to raise the social and economic level of the people, and to win students and their families to the faith (see also Educational Mission Work). By 1826 the ABCFM had established twenty-six schools in Hawaii with sixty-six indigenous teachers and twenty thousand students. Projects to improve agriculture were initiated in several countries (see also Agricultural Missions). Members of the Swiss Basel Mission introduced the cultivation of Cacao into Ghana. Industrial schools and Western technology were also introduced.

Literacy, Bible Translation, and the production of literature were important. Many unwritten languages were learned, reduced to writing, and part or all of the Scriptures translated. By 1873 the Hawaii mission had published 153 different works plus thirteen magazines and an almanac in the local language which missionaries had reduced to writing. At the end of the century, the entire Bible had been translated into over one hundred languages, the New Testament into 120, and parts of the Bible into three hundred more.

Early in the century women began to seek a greater role in the missionary enterprise (see also Women in Mission). First, they organized themselves to raise funds, to pray, and to encourage their children and churches in mission. When the male leaders of the boards were unresponsive to their desire for a greater role, women’s missionary societies were organized. These, along with the older agencies, sent out many women who often did work in Asia and Africa denied to them at home. Eventually, nearly one-third of the missionary force would be single women and one-third married women. They pioneered in education and medical care for girls and women, while some itinerated as evangelists. Charlotte “Lottie” Moon became one of the best known of all Southern Baptist missionaries because of her vision, compassion, and ability to communicate with the church back home. Clara Swain, who arrived in India in 1870, was the first woman medical missionary appointed by any board. She was the first of many who not only treated women, whom men were not permitted to see, but pioneered establishing nursing and medical schools, opening these professions to women. When the first missionaries arrived in Korea, a woman had no status outside her home except for functions in traditional shamanism. But by the middle of this century, Helen Kim was president of Ehwa, the largest women’s university in the world, established by Methodists. She was also a leader in evangelism.

Shortly before the end of the century the evangelical consensus in Protestantism in general, and thus the missionary movement, began to break down. That consensus included four points: the assertion that the supreme aim of missions was to make Jesus Christ known as Savior and Lord, and to persuade persons to become his disciples and gather them into churches; allegiance to the uniquely divine nature of Jesus Christ; the willingness to defend the social dimensions of missions; and a pragmatic ecumenism. The advent of Darwinism and the undermining of biblical authority brought confidence in progress, a more optimistic view of human nature, and a lower Christology on the one hand, while the movement which would be known as fundamentalism adopted premillennialism, the view that only when Christ returned would the millennium be established and that thus the only important activity was evangelism (see Millennial Thought).

In this context two new movements arose. The first, the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions began among students at a conference led by D. L. Moody in 1886. Before its decline in the 1920s it had motivated the vocations of over 20,500 missionaries, most of whom served under the older boards. The other development was the rise of the Faith Missions, beginning with the China Inland Mission in 1865. It was soon followed by the Sudan Interior Mission, the Central American Mission, the African Inland Mission, and others. These were fundamentalist in theology, interdenominational, some led by laymen, and many of their personnel were graduates of the newly formed Bible institutes instead of universities and seminaries. This development of the fundamentalist and evangelical missions, along with the beginning of the Pentecostal movement in 1906 would eventually change the face of the missionary enterprise. At the same time, liberals and fundamentalists alike assumed that Western culture was Christian and superior to all others, and thus normative for all Christians, believing that the entire world would eventually adopt that culture.

Even though there were large people movements among some groups of animistic background (Karens in Burma, Mizzos and Nagas in Northeast India, untouchables in other parts of India, some African tribes and especially South Pacific peoples) most of the churches formed were still small. In Korea a revival from 1903 to 1907 laid the foundation for remarkable growth later. But even though most wanted only to preach a nondenominational “pure gospel,” as the LMS had urged, the churches established were similar to those from which the missionaries came. The Anglican Bishop Tucker serving in Uganda at the turn of the century wanted to see a church in which missionaries and Africans served side by side in a spirit of equality, but most churches were still dominated by Westerners. And while there were some exceptions in Korea and elsewhere, inadequate attention was given to preparing national leadership. In some areas, China and Africa especially, breakaway churches which sought to be more culturally indigenous, would later grow rapidly.

The climax of the “Great Century” came with the Edinburgh World Missionary Conference in 1910. Over 1,200 delegates from various mission agencies came together; however, all but eighteen were Westerners. It was a time of optimism as they planned for greater unity and advance. There was reason for celebration. For the first time in history, the Christian faith was now worldwide. The church, along with educational and medical institutions, had been planted in many countries. A growing number of national leaders was being prepared, establishing a foundation for growth in the future. The missionary movement had made a significant contribution in works of compassion with women and marginalized people, and had introduced such concepts even among some who did not accept the Christian faith. But there were also problems, some of which were seen, others not. The theological consensus regarding the nature and purpose of mission was ending. Western Christendom still failed to see the beam in its own eye: colonialism, ethnocentrism, and feelings of superiority. The church still looked very foreign in many cultures. And few if any realized that four years later Western Christendom would be plunged into one of the most meaningless and bloody wars in history. That would bring the end of confidence to much of the West and would raise a whole new set of problems for the missionary movement in the new century.

Paul E. Pierson

Great Commandment

Great Commandment. When considering missions, it is usually not the “Great Commandment” (Mark 12:28–34 par. Matt. 22:34–40; cf. Luke 10:25–28) but the “Great Commission” (Matt. 28:16–20; Luke 24:46–49) that takes center stage. Arguably, however, the Great Commandment provides a crucial foundation for the Great Commission, and a unilateral emphasis on the latter creates an imbalance that may render the church’s mission ineffective. We will first discuss the scriptural foundation for the Great Commandment and subsequently deal with its contemporary relevance for mission.

Scriptural Foundation. The Great Commandment, according to Jesus, is the Old Testament command to love God with all of one’s heart, soul, mind, and strength (Deut. 6:4–5), together with the injunction to love one’s neighbor as oneself (cf. Lev. 19:18b; on the question of who is one’s “neighbor,” cf. Lev. 19:34; Luke 10:25–27; and Matt. 5:43–48). To call this commandment the Great Commandment is to follow Matthew’s terminology (Matt. 22:36: “great”; 22:38: “great and first”), where “great” is probably used with elative force to denote what is “greatest” or “most important.” Mark simply numbers the commandments as “first” and “second” (Mark 12:38, 41; cf. Matt. 22:38). In Luke, the lawyer’s question is, “Teacher, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?” (Luke 10:25), raising the question of whether Luke’s account refers to a different event altogether, especially since, in Luke, it is not Jesus who is speaking but the lawyer (Luke 10:27).

The question of what constituted the heart of the Law was an issue widely discussed in rabbinic circles in Jesus’ day. Jesus’ emphatic statement, only found in Matthew, that the entire Law and the Prophets depend on the Great Commandment, is therefore of utmost significance (Matt. 22:40). Unlike the Decalogue, which is mostly given in the form of prohibitions, Jesus states this injunction in a positive way (cf. Matt. 7:12). By expressing the commandment in an absolute and categorical rather than a relative and limited fashion, Jesus stresses the priority of the inward disposition over the outward action. In keeping with Old Testament prophetic tradition, Jesus requires heart religion, not merely formalistic legalism. At the same time, it is not his desire to use this commandment to relegate every other obligation of the believer to the point of irrelevance.

What is the relationship between the Great Commandment and the Great Commission in Matthew’s Gospel? Since Matthew presents discipleship as the way of righteousness (cf. Matt. 5:6, 10, 20; 6:33), and since the Great Commission entails the teaching of converts to obey everything Jesus commanded, it is clear that the keeping of the Great Commandment is a prerequisite for the fulfillment of the Great Commission. Moreover, the latter entails, not mere EVANGELISM in modern parlance, where the term usually refers merely to the bringing of a person to the point of conversion, but the grounding of Christian converts in the way of righteousness, including the observance of the Great Commandment (and, ultimately, once again the Great Commission!). Finally, the concept of righteousness in Matthew, while possessing a spiritual core, is not limited to the religious domain but also has social and economic dimensions. In these ways Matthew lays a crucial foundation for the understanding of the relationship between the Great Commandment and the Great Commission in contemporary discussion.
Great Commandment

Contemporary Relevance for Mission. Historically, Anglo-Saxon Protestant missionary thought has emphasized the Great Commission, while the latter task never occupied an equally central position among Christians on the European Continent. The issue of the relationship between the Great Commission and the Great Commandment caused considerable discussion at the LAUSANNE CONGRESS ON WORLD EVANGELISM in 1974. While in the final conference document evangelism was named as the primary mission of the church, this drew the criticism of a significant number of participants, including John Stott, R. Sider, and others. After a reaffirmation of the primacy of evangelism by the Consultation on World Evangelization (COWE) in Pattaya, Thailand, in June 1980, the question was taken up again by the Consultation on the Relationship between Evangelism and Social Responsibility held in Grand Rapids, Michigan, in June 1982, an effort co-sponsored by the WORLD EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP (WEF) and the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization (LCWE) (see LAUSANNE MOVEMENT). This conference identified three kinds of relationships between EVANGELISM AND SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY: (1) social responsibility as a consequence of evangelism; (2) social action as a bridge to evangelism; and (3) social concern as a partner of evangelism. The delegates advocated a holistic approach to mission, since “seldom if ever should we have to choose between satisfying physical hunger and spiritual hunger, or between healing bodies or saving souls, since an authentic love for our neighbor will lead us to serve him or her as a whole person” (see HOLISTIC MISSION).

The key questions addressed at the 1982 consultation were the following: What is mission? How broad is salvation in Scripture? What is the relationship between the church and the kingdom? What is the church’s mandate for social justice? R. Sider and J. I. Packer, in contrast to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) at its BANGKOK CONFERENCE (1973), argued for a narrow use of salvation language, restricting salvation “to the sphere of conscious confession of faith in Christ.” A. Johnston, D. McGavran, P. Wagner, P. Beyerhaus, K. Bockmühl, and H. Lindsell joined in affirming this position against those who sought to define salvation more broadly. This latter group contended that salvation has not only personal but also social and cosmic dimensions, so that socioeconomic improvements should be described as an aspect of salvation, pointing also to Luke 4:16–21 (cf. Isa. 61:1–2). It was further argued that the lordship of Christ extends over all demonic powers of evil that “possess persons, pervade structures, societies, and the created order.”

How does Scripture adjudicate between these two positions? On the one hand, it cautions against a reductionistic focus on people merely as “souls” that need to be saved, so that the church’s task should not be conceived in merely “religious” terms. On the other hand, Scripture does affirm the primacy of a person’s spiritual dimension, so that the effort of leading unbelievers to a Christian conversion rightly belongs at the heart of the church’s mission. As noted, read in the context of Matthew’s entire Gospel, the fulfillment of the Great Commission entails a “commitment to both the King and his kingdom, to both righteousness and justice” (Bosh), while the making of disciples also involves teaching them to obey Jesus’ teachings which include loving God and one’s neighbor. Hence love for God and others ought to be the driving motivation for mission (see MOTIVE, MOTIVATION), since, in love, God sent his Son; in love, Jesus gave his life for others; and by our love, the world will know that we are his disciples.

ANDREAS J. KOSTENBERGER

Great Commission. The term “Great Commission” is commonly assigned to Christ’s command to his disciples as found in Matthew 28:18–20, Mark 16:15–16, Luke 24:46–49, John 20:21, and Acts 1:8. It is sometimes referred to as the “Evangelistic Mandate” and distinguished from the “Cultural” and/or “Social Mandate” found in Genesis 1:28–30 and Genesis 9:1–7 (see CULTURAL MANDATE). The prominence accorded to the Great Commission in the past two hundred years is not apparent in previous church history. The early church made remarkable progress in spreading the faith throughout the Mediterranean world by virtue of the witness of dispersed Christians and the missionary journeys of the apostle Paul and others. However, there is no clear indication in the Book of Acts that this effort was motivated by explicit appeals to the Great Commission. Rather, after Pentecost the Holy Spirit both motivated and orchestrated the missionary effort in accordance with that Commission. Similarly, throughout the early centuries when both the Eastern and especially Western branches of the church were expanding significantly, the Great Commission as such does not appear to have been a decisive motivating or defining factor.

In Reformation times concerns and controversies relating to the Great Commission had to do with its applicability. In 1537 Pope Paul III emphasized the importance of the Great Commission and said that all people are “capable of receiving the doctrines of the Faith.” However, sixteenth-century Catholic theology applied the text to the Church with its episcopy, not to the individual Christians as such. The Reformers generally taught that the Great Commission was entrusted to the apostles and that the apostles fulfilled it by going to the ends of their known world. This is not to say that they had no missionary vision. Hadrian Saravia (1531–1613) and Justinian von Welz (1621–61) found reason enough to write treatises in which they urged Christians to recognize their responsibility to obey the Great Commission and evangelize the world. Nevertheless, it remained for William Carey (1761–1834) to make one of the most compelling cases for the applicability of the Great Commission to all believers. First section of the treatise An Inquiry into the Obligations of Christians to Use Means for the Conversion of the Heathens (published in 1792) made a concerted argument that individual Christians should join together in an effort to take the gospel to the Heathen (at that time the common designation for the unevangelized) in obedience to the Great Commission. Some historians have concluded that the An Inquiry rivals Luther’s Ninety-five Theses in terms of its influence on church history.

By the middle of the nineteenth century a consensus on the applicability of the Great Commission had emerged but this consensus paved the way for differences as to its application, particularly in America. Not everyone agreed with the interpretation and approach of A. T. Pierson and others who, in the 1880s and 1890s, pressed the completion of world evangelization by the year 1900 in obedience to the Great Commission. The organizers of the great Edinburgh Conference of 1910 attempted to avoid controversy concerning the requirements of the Great Commission and the nature of mission by taking the position that the Great Commission is “intrinsic” rather than “extrinsic” (James Scherer’s words) to the church and its missions. In other words, it is not so much an exterior law that sits in judgment upon the missionary activities of the church, but an inner principle of church faith and life allowing for freedom in the way churches and missions interpret and carry it out.

Subsequent history has revealed how diverse and divisive such interpretations can be. The twentieth century gave rise to a number of significant points of departure in understanding. First, upon a review of history and the biblical text, some (e.g., Harry Boer) have concluded that, in the process of convincing Christians that the Great Commission applied to them, proponents unwittingly contributed to the idea that the validity of Christian mission rested primarily upon that command. This led to a corresponding neglect of the missionary role of the Holy Spirit and the missionary thrust of the whole of biblical revelation. Second, perhaps responding to the emphasis on the social task of the church in the WCC and especially at the 1968 General Assembly in Uppsala, some evangelicals (e.g., John Stott) revised their thinking on the Great Commission and now argue against the generally accepted position that the statement in Matthew 28:16–20, being the most complete, possesses a certain priority. Their revised position is that the statement in John 20:21 (“As the Father has sent me, so send I you”) takes priority and makes the Lord Jesus’ earthly ministry as outlined in Luke 4:18, 19 a model for modern mission. This interpretation opens the way for sociopolitical action as an integral part of biblical mission. Third, many Pentecostals and charismatics have given a certain priority to the Markan version of the Great Commission with its emphasis on the “signs following” conversion and faith—casting out demons, speaking in new tongues, handling snakes, drinking poisonous liquids without hurt, and healing the sick (Mark 16:17–19). This approach is generally dependent upon a consideration of the manuscript evidence relating to the shorter and longer endings of Mark’s Gospel. Fourth, some exegetes (e.g., Robert Culver) point out that the Matthew 28:18–20 text does not support the commonly understood interpretation with its overemphasis on “going” into all the world in obedience to Christ. Rather, the main verb and imperative is “make disciples.” The other verbs (in English translations) are actually participles and take their imperative force from the main verb. In descending order of importance the verbs are “make disciples,” “teach,” “baptize, and “go.” The text would be better translated “Going . . .” or “As you go . . .” and understanding enhanced by giving more attention to the grammatical construction of the original text. Fifth, Donald McGavran held that there is a clear distinction between disciple-making and teaching in fulfilling the Great Commission. The former has to do with people of a culture turning from their old ways, old gods, and old holy books.
Great Commission

or myths to the missionary’s God, the Bible, and a new way of living. The latter has to do with “perfecting” as many as will take instruction and follow the “new way” more closely. In obeying the Great Commission, “discipling” new peoples should never be discontinued in an effort to “perfect” a few. Though comparatively few agreed with McGavran early on, in recent years there has been a somewhat wider acceptance of certain aspects of his thesis. Sixth, Church Growth advocates generally and proponents of the AD 2000 and Beyond Movement especially (e.g., Ralph Winter) have placed great emphasis on the phrase panta ta ethne in Matthew 28:19 and have insisted that this is best understood as having reference to the various “people groups” of the world (see Peoples, People Groups). Originally Donald McGavran identified endogamy as a primary characteristic of a “people group” but subsequently other characteristics such as a common worldview, religion, ethnicity, language, social order, and self-identification have been emphasized. This understanding lends itself to a program of world evangelization whereby people groups are identified and “reached” by planting viable, New Testament churches that become the primary means of evangelizing the group socially to the fringes and temporally into the future. Seventh, in recent years a growing number of missiologists (e.g., Trevor McIlwain) have advocated a missionary approach that gives more serious attention to the Great Commission requirement to teach all that Christ commanded. To many missions people this has seemed altogether too encompassing and demanding. They have preferred to communicate basic truths about human spiritual need and the way in which the Lord Jesus has met that need by means of his death and resurrection. In a way the tension between these two approaches reflects a classic missions controversy as to whether missionaries should first communicate truths about the nature of God and his requirements as revealed in the whole of Scripture or are better advised to begin with the New Testament account of Jesus’ teaching and ministry. What is distinctive about the recent emphasis, however, is that its proponents usually link “all I [Christ] have commanded” in Matthew 28:20 with John 5:39 and a chronological teaching of the Bible as redemptive history.

However one may assess the foregoing (among other responses to the requirements of the Great Commission, it seems apparent that, unlike the first two hundred years of Protestantism, during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries the Great Commission came to play an extremely important role in missions and missiology. In fact, the authors of the FRANKFURT DECLARATION of 1970 placed it first in their list of “seven indispensable basic elements of mission.” In a way this growing appreciation for the Great Commission was reflected in the changed thinking of even the early-twentieth-century liberal scholar Adolf von Harnack. At first he concluded that the words of 28:18–20 probably constituted a later addition to the Gospel of Matthew. In later life he found it to be not only a fitting conclusion to that Gospel, but a statement so magnificent that it would be difficult to say anything more meaningful and complete in an equal number of words (see Bosch, 1991, 56–57).

David J. Hesselgrave

Greece (Est. 2000 pop.: 10,573,000; 131,990 sq. km [50,961 sq. mi.]). Bordered by Turkey, Bulgaria, Albania, and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Greece forms a geographical and cultural bridge between Europe and the Middle East. Of the more than 2,000 islands, only 169 are inhabited.

Paul was the first Christian missionary to Greece, establishing churches in Philippi, Berea, Athens, and Thessalonica (Acts 16–17). From the time of Constantine, Christianity has played a dominant role. Today some 16,500 Greeks attend churches of various Protestant traditions, most being Pentecostals. JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES have nearly twice as many adherents. It is the Eastern Orthodox Church which dominates, officially and culturally, this nation of 10.5 million. The common perception is that to be Greek is to be Orthodox. Although Greece formally adheres to international declarations on religious liberty, in practice non-Orthodox, and especially those who engage in active evangelism, face significant pressures. Too often, evangelical churches are perceived by Greeks as being foreign and unattractive.

Missionaries to Greece face the challenge of nationalism coupled with a strong group (as opposed to individual) orientation, both reinforcing the Orthodox identity of the people. Some evangelicals among the large Greek diaspora have been active in outreach to their homeland and should be encouraged to do more. Missionaries to Greece, whatever their national origin, should be prepared to cooperate with the existing evangelical entities—the two hundred congregations are already divided among forty denominations! Cooperation might both increase the effectiveness of witness and cut back the missionary attrition rate, reported at over 70 percent within the first four years.

Greece has an advantageous location for mission outreach to Muslims from the Middle East and the Balkans. Some outreach has been reported among Albanians, both in Greece and in Albania, as well as among transient and resident Middle Easterners. But animosity resulting from centuries of Turkish domination constitutes a barrier to outreach among Turks, whether in Greece or in Turkey. Other ethnic minorities, such as the Vlach and Bulgarian-speaking Pomas, are officially ignored by the government and may require special missionary strategies. Further, hundreds of towns and villages, especially in the north, and most of the islands have no permanent evangelical witness.

Greek evangelical missionaries currently number only a handful. While facing the challenge of their own country, they could also make a significant contribution in needy neighboring countries.

Elizabeth "Betty" Greene (1921–97). American missionary aviation pioneer. Born in 1921, she learned to fly at the age of sixteen. A member of the Women’s Air Forces Service Pilots during World War II, Greene performed high-altitude test flights, towed targets for live-fire gunnery practice, and flew a number of military aircraft, including the four-engine B-17 Flying Fortress.

Greene opened the Christian Airmen’s Missionary Fellowship (CAMF) office in Los Angeles in 1944 as the designated secretary-treasurer. Collaborer with Jim Truxton, she quickly became a major driving force behind the new organization. Greene worked with Truxton, Parrott, and Buyers on the incorporation papers for CAMF, which later became Mission Aviation Fellowship (MAF). She served both on the first board of directors and on the first executive committee. In 1946, Greene became CAMF’s first field pilot, flying a plane to SILS Jungle Camp in Mexico, MAF-US’s first foreign field. During her thirty-year career with MAF, Greene flew all over the globe, becoming the first woman to fly over the Andes. She also flew missionary tours in Nigeria, Sudan, Ethiopia, Uganda, Kenya, the Congo (Zaire), and Dutch New Guinea (Irian Jaya). On the forefront of promoting prayer for MAF, she launched a newsletter in 1945, “Wings of Praise and Prayer,” distinguishing herself as MAF’s prayer secretary.

Mary Jane Forbes Greene (1845–1910). American missionary to Japan. Having spent her young adulthood in Westborough, Massachusetts, Mary Jane Forbes both attended and taught at Mount Holyoke Female Seminary. Five months after her 1869 marriage, she arrived with her husband, Daniel Crosby Greene, in Yokohama to cofound the Japan mission of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. This undertaking became the most active Protestant mission in Japan during the Meiji era.

Returning to the United States for only four brief furloughs in forty-one years, the Greenes lived in Yokohama, Kobe, Tokyo, and Kyoto. During those years they saw Japan embrace both Western technology and ideology; the response to Christianity ranged from enthusiastic embrace to indifference. When religious freedom was declared in the 1889 Meiji Constitution, the interest in Christianity began to wane.

Mary Jane’s life in Japan revolved around her home, family, and mission networks. Her home, the Wayside Inn, was known for its hospitality to missionaries, expatriates, and the Japanese community. Her public missionary role included church and women’s work, with her most distinctive contributions coming in the areas of teaching and music performance. She suffered two bouts with cancer and died in Tokyo in 1910.

Bibliography. D. G. Buss, Concise History of Greece; T. Ware, Introduction to the Orthodox Church, rev. ed.

GARY LAMB

Bibliography. R. Clegg, Concise History of Greece; T. Ware, Introduction to the Orthodox Church, rev. ed.

TRACY K. SMITH

Greenland (Danish Autonomous Area) (Est. 2000 pop.: 60,000; 2,176,000 sq. km. [840,154 sq. mi.]). Most of Greenland, the world’s largest island, is glacial icecap. Approximately 80 percent of the inhabitants are Inuit Eskimos, most other residents being Danes. The island nation enjoys autonomy as a home-ruled government within the Danish kingdom. Official languages are Greenlandic, also known as Inupik, and Danish.

Greenlanders trace their history to the early Thule culture of about A.D. 900. Migrants from neighboring regions introduced new hunting and gathering techniques which enabled development of permanent settlements. Other changes in the methods of subsistence living led to the emergence of the Inussuk culture. Norsemen of the Viking cultures settled in Greenland’s eastern sector about 985. In the final waves of polar Eskimo immigration in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries from Canada and Alaska, the Inughuit settled in Avandersuaq (Thule).

The first Christians arrived with the medieval explorer Leif Eriksson about A.D. 990. Lutheran missionaries came in 1721; their work waned by 1860. The Moravians came in 1733; by 1900 they gave way to the Church of Denmark.

Measuring the exposure to the gospel, researchers conclude that Greenland is fully Christianized. Yet there is a high degree of secularization in this modern arctic society. Like Europe and North America, there is a rapidly emerging postmodern culture. Greenland has a need for...
Greenland

fresh methods of spiritual renewal, and even new life, amid its mix of post-Christian cultures.

KEITH E. EITEL

Grenada (Est. 2000 pop.: 94,000; 344 sq. km. [133 sq. mi.]). The southernmost of the Windward Islands of the Lesser Antilles, Grenada came to world attention when American President Ronald Reagan authorized an armed invasion in 1984. Grenada thereafter received sufficient foreign aid for its economy to rebound from the rapid deterioration of the early 1980s. A reported 60 percent of the population is Roman Catholic, with a third nominally Protestant. In the early 1990s six evangelical missions had two dozen missionaries on the island.

EVERETT A. WILSON

SEE ALSO Caribbean.

The Baptist Missionary Society appointed Grenfell to Cameroon in 1875. His bride, Mary Hawkes, died shortly after their arrival. He was one of two men who opened the Congo (modern Zaire) for missionary work in 1877. He married his second wife, Rose Patience Edgerley, in 1878. He buried several small children on the field. One daughter, who returned to work with him in Congo, died of fever in 1898.

He is best known for the steamship Peace, which he helped design and shipped unassembled to Congo. The engineers sent to help in the reconstruction died. From 1884 until 1907, he sailed the Peace the three thousand miles of the Congo River, opening new areas for mission work. The many converts positively impacted the area.

Cannibalism, slavery, virulent disease, war, and an antagonistic Belgian colonial regime were among the major obstacles Grenfell dealt with during his life in Congo. He was known as a peacemaker who believed that Bible translations in local languages and educational work were essential for a successful missionary effort.

MIKEL NEUMANN

Bibliography. S. J. Dickins, Grenfell of the Congo; H. L. Hemmens, George Grenfell, Pioneer in Congo; H. Johnston, George Grenfell and the Congo.

men, and established homes for their use. In 1892 Grenfell began his four decades of service to the scattered communities of Labrador; himself raising most of the funds, which from 1912 were channeled through the International Grenfell Association. He operated medical ships, and had hospitals and nursing stations located at strategic points along the desolate coast of Labrador; about which he provided valuable geographical data. He also set up orphanages, schools, cooperative stores, and other institutions designed to help the fisherfolk and their families. He fought unfair traders and liquor dealers. His enterprise was backed financially by friends in Britain and North America, some of whom came to give practical help. He received fellowships from both the Royal (British) and the American College of Surgeons, a knighthood from King George V (1927), and the first honorary doctorate in medicine bestowed by Oxford. Students of St. Andrews University in Scotland elected him as their rector.

Grenfell retired in 1935 and died in Charlotte, Vermont. He was author of some two dozen books, among them the autobiographical A Labrador Doctor (1922) and Forty Years for Labrador (1932).

J. D. DOUGLAS

Groves, Anthony Norris (1795–1853). English missionary to Iraq and India. Born in Newton, Hants, England, Groves worked professionally as a dentist in Plymouth, then Exeter. In 1816, he married Mary Bethia Thompson. They had two sons who wrote histories of the Plymouth Brethren that identify Groves as an early proponent of the movement.

In an influential book Christian Devotedness (1825) Groves repudiated institutional mission societies. Relying on prayer, the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, Christ-centeredness, and personal holiness, Groves pioneered the TENT-MAKING approach typical of FAITH MISSIONS. From 1829 to 1833, he served as a missionary in Baghdad, where his wife and infant daughter died. Subsequently, apart from two short visits to England, Groves served in South India with his second wife, Harriet Baynes, who in 1856 published a Memoir of A. N. Groves.

Groves deplored as “fallen” the state of the ancient Christian churches of India. He stressed church planting, self-support, and cultural sensitivity. Plymouth Brethren missionaries and his Indian disciple, JOHN CHRISTIAN AROOLAPPEN (1810–67), adopted this approach.

PAUL R. DEKAR

Grubb, Sir Kenneth George (1900–1980). British missionary statesman and missionary to Latin America. Kenneth Grubb (younger brother of Norman P. Grubb) was one of the most influential British missionaries and ecumenical statesmen of the mid-twentieth century. He was converted after the end of the First World War, following prayer on his behalf by Norman. Soon afterwards, he was accepted by WEC INTERNATIONAL to travel in Amazonia and compile a linguistic schedule of the Indian peoples of the Amazon basin. This was published in 1927. Feeling somewhat constricted within WEC, he left to join the research staff of the Survey Application Trust, for whom he worked throughout the 1930s producing a series of volumes surveying Christian prospects in Latin America. With the outbreak of war imminent, he was recruited by the British government as a Latin American specialist, and was promoted rapidly to become overseas controller of publicity within the Ministry of Information. In 1944 he became president of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS), an office he held for twenty-five years. Working closely with MAX WARREN, Grubb presided with a firm hand over the transition of the CMS into the postcolonial era. He was also an active, but not uncritical participant of the postwar ecumenical movement, serving for twenty-three years as the first chairman of the Churches’ Commission on International Affairs. For many years he edited the World Christian Handbook. He received his knighthood in 1953.

BRIAN STANLEY

Grubb, Wilfred Barbrooke (1865–1930). Scottish missionary to Latin America. Born in Edinburgh, into a medical family, Grubb was known as the “Livingstone of South America.” After joining the Edinburgh Medical Mission in 1881, he sought to take part in an expedition to Africa but was thought too young. Dwight Moody and Ira Sankey challenged Grubb to commit his life to missions in 1884. He was accepted by the South American Missionary Society (SAMS) at nineteen and left in 1886 for the Falkland Islands. He soon volunteered as a pioneer missionary and was appointed to work among the people of the Paraguayan Chaco in 1889.

Penetrating the interior of the Chaco, Grubb won the confidence of the Lengua Indians. Grubb strove for a holistic ministry incorporating education, medicine, and evangelism. He translated hymns, prayers, and a large portion of the New Testament into Lengua. The quality of his work and reputation prompted the Paraguayan government to appoint him as commissioner for the Chaco. Out of a desire to provide industrial training and work for the neglected Lengua, he formed the Chaco Indian Association in 1900.
Grubb, Wilfred Barbrooke

In 1914 Grubb joined an effort to initiate a similar mission in the Argentine Chaco. Having returned to England in 1921 with double pneumonia, he undertook deputation work for SAMS until his death in 1930.

GARY LAMB

Bibliography. W. B. Grubb, A Church in the Wilds; R. J. Hunt, The Livingstone of South America.

Guadeloupe (French Overseas Department) (Est. 2000 pop.: 462,000; 1,781 sq. km. [688 sq. mi.]). A former French colony, Guadeloupe had been an overseas department of France since 1946. The island’s residents are 85 percent Roman Catholic and 5 percent Protestant. After a stormy history of slave revolts, emancipation, and schemes to integrate the black citizens, the planters of Guadeloupe in the second half of the nineteenth century imported East Indian workers. This community presently makes up 10 percent of the population.

EVERETT A. WILSON

SEE ALSO Caribbean.

Guatemala (Est. 2000 pop.: 12,222,000; 108,889 sq. km. [42,042 sq. mi.]). A Central American country bordering Mexico, Belize, Honduras, and El Salvador, Guatemala has a population of more than 12 million, which is about 55 percent of Mayan origin. This is divided into twenty-one language groups, some with several dialects. The majority of the people live in the mountainous central highlands. The economy is largely agricultural, with coffee, sugar, bananas, beef, and cardamom the chief exports. Tourism and textiles are also important.

Guatemala has been traditionally Roman Catholic (with significant syncretistic elements of Mayan Animism) since the Spanish conquest in 1524. While a few Spanish priests like Fray Bartolomé de las Casas, later bishop of Chiapas, Mexico, sought to win converts by use of local languages and gentle persuasion, the church was overwhelmingly identified with the oppressive power structures that enslaved and decimated the Indians and tried to stamp out their culture.

Early Protestant missionary efforts, including those of British colporteur Frederick Crowe (1843–46), were unsuccessful due to opposition by Catholic clergy, but sowed seeds for the liberal reforms of President Justo Rufino Barrios, who promulgated freedom of religion in 1873 and later personally invited the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions to open work in Guatemala. As a result, the Rev. John C. Hill arrived in November 1882, with Barrios’s entourage and his support.

The Presbyterians were followed by the Central American Mission (CAM) in 1899, the Church of the Nazarene in 1901, and the Friends in 1902. These, with the Primitive Methodists (1922), adopted a comity agreement. In 1935 the five missions and their associated national churches formed the Evangelical Synod of Guatemala, precursor of the present Evangelical Alliance of Guatemala.

Progress was initially slow, but by 1982 evangelicals comprised nearly 20 percent of the population, and some seven hundred thousand gathered for a centennial rally. Explosive church growth in the 1970s was fueled by several factors: a proliferation of agencies and independent national churches, mass evangelism, the devastating earthquake of 1976, and political violence that claimed one hundred thousand lives over twenty-five years. Despite predictions evangelicals would be a majority by 1990, church growth leveled off in the mid-1980s and in 1995 evangelicals were about 24 percent of the population.

There are some 200 denominations with 16,000 local churches in Guatemala; over half of all evangelicals belong to the six largest groups: Prince of Peace Church, Church of God (Cleveland, Tenn.), Assemblies of God, Central American Evangelical Churches (CAM), Calvary Churches, and Elim Christian Mission. About two-thirds of the Protestants are Pentecostal.

Six seminaries, some twenty-five Bible Institutes, and various TEE programs provide leadership training, while fifteen evangelical radio and two television stations broadcast both evangelistic and teaching programs. Christian schools, many operated by local churches, are widespread.

Translation of the Bible and other materials into local dialects, along with cassettes and radio, has been a major factor in Mayan church growth; in 1995 four complete Bibles and fifteen New Testaments had been published, with work underway in nineteen additional dialects. Five radio stations broadcast primarily in Mayan languages.

Some 650 foreign missionaries serve with ninety agencies in the country, while two national agencies and several churches have sent about forty Guatemalans into transcultural ministries.

Bibliography. C. L. Holland, ed., World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean.

Guilt. Guilt refers both to an objective reality (of moral, sinful culpability) and to a subjective reality (a subjective perception and experience of oneself as culpable, a feeling of guilt). Both are relevant to missions.

Sinful human beings violate moral law(s)—both human and divine. They violate other persons—both human and divine. And they fail to exemplify and be characterized by the moral sentiments, character traits, and virtues called for by human conscience and by the God who created them in his own image. Objectively, then, all are guilty sinners deserving of death and judgment. It is this objective reality that explains both the need for Christ's work on the cross and the need for missions. And it is this objective reality of human sin and guilt that is a critical component of the missionary's message.

The call for repentance and faith is a call for an inner response in which one's subjective experience and perceptions are congruent with objective realities. The Bible itself (Romans 2) indicates that there is within each individual a set of inner perceptions and judgments (conscience) that does in fact ratify the biblical message of sin and guilt. Yet missionaries frequently complain that those to whom they proclaim the objective reality of sin and guilt do not subjectively perceive and experience themselves as sinful and guilty. In some contexts there seems to be no inner assent of conscience and soul to the message of sin, guilt, and judgment and the need for forgiveness and salvation.

In part, this is because missionaries often fail to understand subjective guilt, as it varies from culture to culture, and missiologists fail to address methodologically how objective guilt and subjective guilt should be brought together in the presentation of the gospel message.

No society can afford to affirm unbridled evil in all directions. All societies work to inculcate moral norms, interpersonal moral obligations, and personal character ideals in their members. Some cultures place formal moral codes, moral prohibitions, at the center of their moral system, carefully delineating the line at which an infraction occurs and punishment can be meted out. The transgressor in such a culture is likely to feel “law-guilt.” Other cultures put the moral focus on interpersonal sensitivity and obliga-

Guinea

Guinea [Est. 2000 pop. 7,759,000; 245,857 sq. km [94,925 sq. mi.]]. In 1919 the Christian and Missionary Alliance opened its first mission station in French West Africa as Baro, in present-day Guinea. The group of missionaries, led by Robert Sherman Roseberry (1883–1976), was conscious of the strategic importance of this new work. For them Baro was to be the beachhead for the evangelization of the vast territory then colonized by France. Just the year before, the French government had agreed to open its West Africa colony to Christian missionaries from other Western nations. This was one of the results of the 1918 Saint Germain Treaty. For Edith Roseberry this was providential in “opening French territories to the preaching of the gospel” (E. Roseberry, 1957, 39).
Guinea

Though evangelical missionaries entered Guinea only in 1919, the Christian faith had a longer history in that part of the world. In 1804, the Anglicans began work among the Susu of Guinea, and in 1861 West Indian Christians established the Pongas Mission in Conakry, present capital of Guinea. Neighboring Sierra Leone has had a vibrant and active Christian community since the eighteenth century. As African borders were still being drawn, the Christians from Sierra Leone carried the gospel to some of the people of the country we now call Guinea. Indeed, the Christian and Missionary Alliance entered Guinea from Sierra Leone. Yet little remains from the earliest Christian mission endeavors in Guinea. Today the Roman Catholic Church, the Christian and Missionary Alliance, and, to some extent, the Anglicans, are the only Christian communities with a continuous presence in Guinea since the beginning of their evangelistic efforts.

In 1967, Sékou Touré, then president of the country, decreed to expel all foreign Catholic and Protestant missionaries. This political decision may explain the privileged status enjoyed by the Catholic Church and the church related to the Roman Catholic Church in Guinea. The resilience of these two churches may be due to the fact that Guineans were their leaders and active agents.

Early in its work, the Christian and Missionary Alliance opened and operated a Bible school in Baro. It is remarkable that already in the 1930s there was a Guinean teacher at Baro, Jean Kéita, who had a great influence on the students.

Mission agencies such as the Open Bible Standard, the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society, and the United World Mission terminated their activities in Guinea in 1967. The Christian and Missionary Alliance was allowed to keep a few missionaries in selected areas and ministries. Only after Sékou Touré’s death in 1984 did Guinea open its doors widely to foreign Christian missionaries. Evangelical missionaries, in particular, built on the foundations laid by Guinean Christians during the twenty-year ban on foreign missionaries. The story of missions in Guinea thus provides a laboratory for testing the claim that “no heathen land will ever become Christian as long as its Christianity is exotic, propagated by foreigners and dependent upon them” (Brown, 310).

Guinness, Henry Grattan (1835–1910). Irish evangelist and mission organizer. Born in Dublin, Guinness went to sea at seventeen only to return home a year later and experience a conversion at the age of twenty. With a vision for missions and a passion for evangelism, he left New College, London, without completing his training and became an itinerant international evangelist. Despite poverty and persecution, he was ordained an evangelist in 1857 and preached to thousands throughout the British Isles and the United States during the great revival.

After visiting France in 1865, Guinness founded the McAll Mission. In 1873, he opened the East London Institute for Home and Foreign Missions at Harley House. Guinness’s influence also led to the founding of the North Africa Mission in 1881 and the Livingstone Inland Mission in 1887, which began in the Congo and expanded to South America and North India, eventually becoming part of the Regions Beyond Missionary Union in 1899. He encouraged the establishment of training centers in Boston and Minneapolis in 1889, which by 1910 had sent hundreds of graduates into the missionary endeavor. That same year Guinness received a D.D. from Brown University.
Guinness wrote two books that stirred international evangelical interest: The Approaching End of the Age (1886) and Light for the Last Days (1888). He believed that the world would end in 1919, but died without knowing that he was wrong.

Gary Lamb

Guru. A commonly used word in much of South Asia, particularly in the Hindu tradition, referring to teachers and spiritual leaders. Its etymology is uncertain. In ancient India instructions in the Hindu sacred scriptures were orally passed on to people through an unbroken chain of gurus. A guru’s house was called the academy, and his followers learned as they lived with their teacher in a strong bond of love and submissive obedience to him. He was considered to be the embodiment of his spiritual instructions, and was idealized as representing the deity.

Gurus were typically ascetics who were single, having no particular qualifications other than that of charisma in leadership. In the Sikh religion, however, the title “guru” refers particularly to the ten great original teachers and founders of the faith.

Since the 1960s, in the face of the emptiness of materialism and secularism, a great many people around the world, especially Western youth, turned to Eastern mysticism. In this context many gurus popularized the Hindu concept of salvation for individuals, communities, and nations. The lifestyles of these modern gurus are widely varied. Some are materialistic, distorting the Hindu faith and mixing religion and sex for their personal gains in the West. Others, however, are giants of religious philosophy and Eastern spirituality.

In the communication of the Christian gospel to the Hindus and the Sikhs the concept of guru as associated with Christ and the evangelist or discipler is both relevant and effective.

Saphir Athiyal

Gutiérrez, Gustavo (1928– ). Peruvian systematic theologian of Latin American Liberation Theology. Gutiérrez’s seminal work, A Theology of Liberation, has been translated into many different languages and still serves as the best introduction to that theological and pastoral current. A revised edition, with a substantial new introduction detailing Gutiérrez’s theological pilgrimage, was published to coincide with his sixtieth birthday and the fifteenth anniversary of the Bishops’ Conference at Medellín, Colombia, on which he had a profound influence. In this groundbreaking book, he discusses the foundational themes of liberation theology, which he further explores in later writings. These themes include the nature of the theological task, the contribution of the social sciences (in particular, Marxism) to the doing of theology, the mission of the (Roman Catholic) church in light of the problematic sociopolitical context of Latin America, the work of God in historical struggles of liberation, and the characteristics of a new spirituality concerned about the suffering and hopes of the poor.

Gutiérrez later focused his research and writing on a Dominican friar from the time of the Spanish conquest of the Americas, Bartolomé de las Casas (1474–1566). In this tireless defender of the indigenous peoples Gutiérrez observes a precursor of liberation theology who opposed the injustices of those in power and tried to understand the person and message of Jesus Christ in light of the needs of the oppressed.

M. Daniel Carroll

Gutmann, Bruno (1876–1966). German mission scholar and missionary to Tanzania. Born in Dresden, Saxony, into a family of humble circumstances, he entered the Leipzig Mission Seminary in 1895 and worked from 1902 to 1938 as a missionary on the slopes of Kilimanjaro in northern Tanzania, mostly in the Old Moshi (Kidia) congregation. As a missionary, he showed deep interest in Chagga culture, which resulted in both publications and the collection and preservation of the Chagga “tribal teachings” connected to the various transition rites so relevant in Chagga society.

Because of his many writings reflecting the work of the church in Old Moshi and beyond, he became one of the best known German missiologists before World War II. Gutmann’s aim was to root the church deeply in Chagga society, by basing the church’s work on the three primal ties of kinship, neighborhood, and age-group. These he considered to be part of the image of God and therefore valid not only for the Chagga but for all of humankind.

Gutmann is sometimes seen as an archconservative, which he was not, as his work in Old Moshi congregation and his support for the mission’s progressive educational system, based on Marangu, shows. His missionary approach, based on Lutheran premises, was very effective in coping with the quickly rising number of Christians, but when he tried to solve moral problems by making use of traditional Chagga concepts, he was often not supported by the Chagga Christians themselves.
Gutmann, Bruno

Klaus Fielder

Gütlaff, Karl Friedrich August (1803–51). German missionary linguist in China. Gütlaff has been called the “Apostle of China.” He was born in Pyritz, Prussian Pomerania; he died in Hong Kong. In 1821, he began study at a mission school in Berlin established by Johann Jaenicke, a devout Moravian pastor. The Netherlands Missionary Society sent Gütlaff to Batavia, the capital of Java, in 1827. There he married Miss Newell, the first self-supporting woman missionary in Java. Sadly, his wife died soon after their marriage.

Gütlaff was an outstanding linguist who published sixty-one books in various languages, including several translations of the New Testament. Although China restricted missionary work, Gütlaff made at least three voyages as surgeon and interpreter along the coast to China, Korea, and Japan, preaching and leaving tracts to nobility and peasant alike. He was employed by the East India Company, and self-funded much of his work. His attempt to utilize indigenous evangelists in China was not successful, but later missionaries learned from him. Gütlaff can be credited for helping lay the foundation for larger missionary work after his death. The greatest missionary contribution of Gütlaff was probably his inspirational example of holy consecration, sacrifice, love, eloquence, and zeal.

T. Van McClain

Guyana (Est. 2000 pop.: 883,000; 214,969 sq. km [83,000 sq. mi.]). Located on the north coast of South America, between Venezuela and Surinam, Guyana became a Dutch possession in the early seventeenth century. Sovereignty passed to Britain in 1814. In 1831, the three counties of Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice were united into one colony, British Guiana. With its capital city in Georgetown, Guyana has a population of over seven thousand people. East Indians constitute the majority of the population (51%), followed by black and mixed (43%), and Amerindians (4%).

The Moravian Brethren were the first to do missionary work among the Arawak Indians in Berbice, in 1738. In 1763 an insurrection of slaves moved the missionaries to Demerara, and by the end of the century their mission was abandoned. The London Missionary Society began its work in 1807 among the plantation slaves, with John Wray (d. 1837). Difficulties arose when the colonial government issued a proclamation prohibiting the slaves from assembling, even for religious purposes. By 1826 there was a congregation in Georgetown, and by 1835 there were three missionary stations in Demerara. The English Methodist Missionary Society sent missionaries from other colonies to Demerara in 1815. A congregation was organized, mostly of black slaves.

The Church Missionary Society began its work in 1829. They worked among the seventy thousand slaves (African and Creoles) that were in Demerara-Essequibo. Their efforts were also successful among the Indians of the Essequibo and Potaro rivers. However, the work was given up in 1856. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel began its work among the slaves in 1835. Churches and schools were erected. Other denominations came later: Plymouth Brethren, Salvation Army, Church of the Nazarene (1945), and Southern Baptists (1966). Roman Catholics constitute a minority.

After a compensated emancipation of the blacks in 1834, the freed slaves refused to work on the plantations. Only by the importation of East Indian indentured servants was the plantation system preserved. The bond servant migration ended in 1917. However, ethnic tensions have affected political life and the Christian testimony in Guyana through the years. The country became independent on May 26, 1966. Evangelization has proven to be difficult because of the various cultures, religions, and languages represented.

Pablo Deiros

Bibliography. P. Blanshard, Democracy and Empire in the Caribbean Area; R. V. Long, We Can, We Will; T. B. Neely, South America: Its Missionary Problems.
Hades. See Hell.

Haining, Jane Mathison (1897–1944). Scottish missionary to Hungary. Born to a farming family near Dunscore, Dumfriesshire, she was educated at Dumfries Academy and was very successful as a secretary for Coats thread business. At that time, she attended a meeting in Glasgow of the Church of Scotland Jewish missions. She sensed the Lord's leading and, after further training, offered herself to the Church of Scotland's Jewish missions. In 1932 she took up her post as matron of the girls' home of Jewish missions in Budapest, Hungary.

When World War II broke out, Haining was on leave in Scotland. When she learned that Hitler had invaded Poland, she hurried back to the girls' home in Budapest. Shortly thereafter, because of the growing tensions in Europe, the Church of Scotland recalled their missionaries. But Haining refused to leave her girls in their time of need. By that time, there was hardly any food or water available and the girls' home was in desperate need of repairs. Nonetheless, to the best of her ability, Haining provided for and comforted those who were in her care.

In May 1944 German authorities arrested Haining on suspicion of espionage. She was immediately taken to Auschwitz, where she was gassed, probably on July 17, 1944. She was the only Scot killed in a Nazi concentration camp.

Haining lived and died with those she came to serve. Her home church in Glasgow dedicated two stained glass windows in memory of her. They are fittingly named Service and Sacrifice.

KATHY McREYNOLDS

Haiti (Est. 2000 pop.: 7,959,000; 27,750 sq. km. [10,714 sq. mi.]) Haiti has had a tragic history since it became the first of the Caribbean states to gain independence and the first black republic to come into existence. By the 1920s, Haiti acquired its present character as a nation of peasant landowners raising food crops on their own small plots. The country soon developed a caste system of rural African peasants and light-skinned, urban elites who controlled government, the professions, and life in the capital.

While three-quarters of all Haitians are considered to be Roman Catholic, an equal proportion are considered spiritists. The proliferation of evangelical groups in Haiti has produced a combined community of more than 20 percent of the population. The Seventh-Day Adventists are the largest non-Catholic group, with Baptist and Holiness churches making up a significant proportion of the total.

EVERETT A. WILSON

See also Caribbean.

Hamer, Lilian (1912–59). English missionary to China and Thailand. She started out as a mill worker in Lancashire, England. At twenty-one years of age, she announced to her father that she was taking a nurse's training course to prepare for missionary service. Her father was so enraged that he asked her to leave home. Though she was devastated by her father's decree, she finished her nursing training and applied to the CHINA INLAND MISSION. Much to her dismay, CIM did not accept her. However, her first priority was to serve God; so she applied to the Red Cross and was accepted.

After she had fulfilled her obligation to the Red Cross in China, she reapplied to the China Inland Mission and, this time, was welcomed into the fold. In 1951 she was forced to leave China because of the communist takeover. But she returned to the Far East a year later to work among the tribes of Thailand. It was there that she specialized in the treatment of opium addicts. She would relieve their physical symptoms by use of medicine and then tell them that true freedom was found in Christ alone. An addict from the Lisu village was so impressed by her treatment that he had his kinsmen invite her to live among them.

