The realization of being convicted and then cleansed by a holy God will make one eager to respond in gratitude to the Lord's call: “Here am I—send me!” Isaiah is available to God to be used however God chooses. When the burden of unconfessed sin is lifted there is freedom and willingness to serve.

Distinguishing between Revival and Revivalism. Revival, seen as a synonym for spiritual awakening, should be distinguished from revivalism, which is generally identified with prominent evangelists and mass evangelistic crusades focused on reaching the lost with the gospel. Despite a close relationship between revival and outreach, revival should not be seen as the same thing as EVANGELISM or revivalism. Confusion has resulted from using the terms “revival” and “revival meeting” for settings designed for preaching the gospel to the lost. One could drive by two different churches and see the following signs: “Revival every Sunday night!” and “Revival every night except Sunday!” Given this confused usage of the term “revival,” one could be led to the absurdity of saying, “We had a revival, but no one was revived!”

Yet even though revival and evangelism are different in nature (as revival primarily deals with God's people whereas evangelism focuses on unbelievers), they both flow from the same source—the Holy Spirit. During times of revival, people call on the name of the Lord to be saved. Workers are raised up to go to the harvest fields of the world. An awakened church is an evangelistic church. An awakened believer is an evangelistic believer. When revival truly comes, evangelism will follow.

Revival reminds us that methods, as important and helpful as they are, must always remain secondary in importance to the presence and power of the Holy Spirit in the life of believers.

Revival and Missions. Revival has had a profound impact on missions. First, tens of thousands have come to faith in Christ in great sweeping movements of the Holy Spirit around the globe. John Eliot's ministry among Native Americans in Massachusetts and the Plymouth Colonies from 1647 to 1670 saw extraordinary results through periods of revival. From 1837 to 1843 a movement of revival swept Hawaii, with estimates as high as 20 percent of the population being converted to faith in Christ. The 1858 “Prayer Revival” saw scores of persons converted, with estimates as high as one million converts in the United States alone. Other countries which saw many come to faith in Christ during this period were Ireland, England, Scotland, Wales, South Africa, Scandinavia, Switzerland, Germany, and Canada.

The year 1860 saw revival in South India, the Ukraine, South Africa, and the Netherlands, while the following year a powerful awakening took place in Jamaica. The awakening of 1903 and following saw thousands converted in Wales, the United States, China, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Korea, Madagascar, Russia, Germany, and Sweden. East Africa had a tremendous period of revival from 1927 to 1935, as did China from 1927 to 1937, Ethiopia from 1936 to 1948, Indonesia from 1953 to 1971, and Canada in 1971–72.

This brief survey does not even begin to tell the full story. Numerous other examples could be cited of periods of awakening around the world.
Revival, Revivals

During times of revival, thousands have come to faith in Christ. Second, revival also has impacted missions through the raising up of laborers to go to the harvest fields of the world. As the Isaiah 6 passage reminds us, a revived Christian is a Christian who has been reawakened to mission. One can point to several examples from church history to illustrate this point.

In the 1720s a powerful movement of revival began in Germany under the leadership of Count Nicholas von Zinzendorf that resulted in a major missionary thrust for decades to come. The Moravian missionary movement began in 1732 with the sending out of two missionaries. During the next 150 years the Moravians would send out over two thousand missionaries to various foreign fields. Among those influenced by Moravian missionaries was John Wesley.

Wesley, along with George Whitefield, became key leaders in the eighteenth-century evangelical awakening in Great Britain. In addition to thousands of persons being converted, many organizations were formed to promote Christian work in Great Britain and beyond. These groups included The Religious Tract Society (1799), The British and Foreign Bible Society (1804), the London Missionary Society (1795), the Church Missionary Society (1799), and The Baptist Missionary Society (1792), which sent out William Carey as its first missionary. The astonishing missionary advance in the late 1700s and early 1800s can be directly attributed to spiritual awaking.

In 1806, the famous Haystack Prayer Meeting took place at Williams College in Massachusetts. Samuel J. Mills, a freshman at the college, helped lead a group of five students who were praying for revival on the campus. Being forced to seek shelter under the side of a large haystack during a storm, Mills challenged the others to join him in the task of taking the gospel to Asia. "We can do it if we will," he said. He led the group in prayer, providing the impetus for what would eventually become an unprecedented thrust in foreign missions. Mills would soon play a major role in the founding of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (1810), the American Bible Society (1816), and the American Colonization Society (1816). Thus, a plaque at the site of the Haystack Prayer Meeting bears the inscription, "The Birthplace of American Foreign Missions."

Other mission societies were formed during this period, including the New York Missionary Society (1798), the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society (1814), the Methodist Episcopal Foreign Mission Society (1819), the American Tract Society (1826), and the American Home Missionary Society (1826). awakenings at numerous schools and colleges during this period resulted in large numbers of students going to the mission field under the auspices of these newly formed societies. Missionaries were sent to existing fields, and new works were started in places such as Hawaii, Indonesia, and Madagascar.

Following the 1858 Prayer Revival, a worldwide interdenominational student missionary movement began to flourish. In 1886, the Student Volunteer Movement was founded. This movement heightened missions awareness and over the next several decades helped recruit some 20,000 students who went forth to serve on the mission field. Other significant organizations that grew out of the 1858 Revival include the China Inland Mission (see Overseas Missionary Fellowship) and the African Inland Mission.

The revival of 1904 and following brought the call of missions to many, including E. Stanley Jones. Touched by a revival while a student at Asbury College in 1905, Jones committed himself to go to India as a missionary. Jones was not alone in seeing God’s call to missions. As many as ten thousand missionaries went overseas from college campuses as a result of this awakening. This period also saw the beginnings of the Pentecostal Movement with the Azusa Street Revival. Pentecostal and charismatic groups continue to have a growing impact on the scene of worldwide missions (see Pentecostal Missions). While many other examples could be cited, this brief survey demonstrates the significant impact revival has had upon the missionary enterprise. It would not be an exaggeration to characterize the history of the modern missions movement as the story of revival. When genuine revival comes, believers are reawakened to their evangelistic and social obligations. Mission efforts are a natural fruit of revival.

A Coming World Revival? Having briefly traced through history the impact of revival on missions, we now look to the role that revival might play in the future of missions. While some biblical scholars believe conditions in the world will continue to get worse and we cannot expect a great revival during the end times, others believe in the strong possibility of a coming world revival. This revival would result in multitudes of people responding to the gospel message and would raise up a host of workers for that great harvest of souls.

The Bible is clear that the Great Commission will one day be fulfilled. There will be persons from “every nation, tribe, people and language” gathered around the throne, worshiping the Lamb of God (Rev. 7:9). While factors such as how one views the millennium, tribulation, and rapture will influence one’s interpretation of these events (see eschatology), many believe the church will see a universal outpouring of the Holy Spirit in the days ahead. This coming world revival could take place in the midst of great suffering. The situation in the world and in the church would go from bad to worse. The conditions described in Matthew 24:5 and in Revelation 6–17 would become a reality. But out of this adversity people’s thoughts would be turned to God. Many would acknowledge their need of a Savior.

The revival would sustain believers through their affliction and bring them to the true beauty of holiness. The church would be purified and empowered for ministry. There would be a great number of conversions as people cried out to the Lord. The revival would prepare the way for the return of Christ as Matthew 24:14 would be fulfilled (see End Times).

In summary, while there is no consensus on the likelihood of a coming world revival or on its timing in relation to other prophetic events, certainly the prospects of such a great revival is a summons to pray for such a work of revival around the world.

TIMOTHY K. BELOUGHER

Revolution. This term is generally associated with movements to overthrow existing governments through armed action and in that sense it is used to describe social processes as different as the American, French, and Russian Revolutions. The term may also be used to describe transformative processes that deeply affect cultural and social structures at their base in a slow and nonviolent way. The initial stage of Christian mission as recorded in the New Testament shows the transformative power of the gospel that upset existing structures and provoked reactions that ended in riots as in Philippi (Acts 16:11–40) or Ephesus (Acts 19:23–41). Roman authorities sometimes misjudged Jesus or Paul as political revolutionaries. Mission history at different moments records the revolutionary impact of the gospel, as in the transformation of the Roman Empire in the first two centuries, or the modernization of some Asian and African societies in our century. During the sixteenth century the Iberian Catholic mission in the Americas accompanied military conquest and the church became a symbol of the establishment and a defender of it against independence revolutions. Mission and empire were not so closely united in the Protestant missions of the nineteenth century, but missionaries still tended to support the imperial advance of their nation and worked within that frame (see also COLONIALISM). It is therefore understandable that theoreticians and leaders of revolutions such as Marx, Engels, or Lenin and their followers, would tend to see revolutionary movements as necessarily hostile to Christian mission. During the twentieth century, the revolt of Asian, African, and Latin American peoples against the European and North American colonial powers has been an important element of self-criticism for missions. Leaders of these revolutions were frequently inspired by Christian ideas of human dignity learned in missionary schools, but they adopted anti-Christian ideologies. The Marxist version of history that usually describes Christian mission as an ally of colonial powers should be matched with a more careful assessment of the liberating impact of mission work, such as that recorded by James Dennis in his three-volume Christian Mission and Social Progress. In spite of Western ethnocentrism the cultural transformation brought by Christian mission and Bible translation might be described as revolutionary. However, from the days in which Luke wrote Acts to the present situation, it has been necessary to state very clearly that the kind of deeply transformative social practice and proclamation of the gospel involved in mission does not imply the use of violent methods through which revolutionaries expect to change the world. This is a critical point because in some forms of liberation theology a theory of “just revolution” was developed adopting the medieval scholastic arguments in support of a “just war.” On the other hand, there are presently places where oppressed ethnic minorities have been successfully reached by the gospel and have experienced church growth. Such is the case of Nagaland in India, the Karen and Chin communities in Myanmar, or the Mayan peoples in Chiapas, Mexico. The freedom and progress brought by Bible translation and proclamation of the gospel is considered something revolutionary and threatening for the dominant ethnic groups. Christian mission walks a rather tight rope in such situations.

SAMPLER ESOCBAR

Rhenish Mission Society (Rheinische Missions Gesellschaft). Representing pacesetting evangelical organizations, the Rhenish Mission Society is noted for its world missions emphasis, lay involvement, and cooperation with former mission fields.

In 1799 twelve Elberfeld, Germany laymen formed the Bergische Bible Society and the Wuppertalth Tract Society. With the Barmen Mission Society (1815), these groups merged in 1828, forming the United Rhenish Missionary Society in Barmen. This organization focused on sending trained missionaries to non-Christian nations. Consisting mainly of Lutherans and Calvinists, their first missionaries arrived in South Africa in 1829.
Rhenish Mission Society

The first Rhenish missionaries to South Africa worked with a broad range of people groups. By the twentieth century this area had 54 missionaries and over 11,800 communicants. Although the Rhenish missionaries have been accused of cooperating with Western colonialism in some of their work, their efforts culminated in 1957 when the Lutheran Church of South West Africa became independent.

Work in Borneo (now Malaysia), Dutch East Indies, began in 1842 (some sources list 1834). No converts were recorded for eight years and eventually insurrections and financial problems ended this Rhenish work. Two missionaries arrived in China in 1846 and the society’s work there continued until 1951. The Chinese Rhenish Church, Hong Kong Synod, still exists today. In 1861 work began in Sumatra with the eventual rise of the Batak Protestant Christian Church. Work in eastern New Guinea began in 1885, but this effort was transferred to the American Lutheran Mission after World War I. By 1961 western New Guinea was added as a mission field.

In 1971 the Rhenish Mission Society and the Bethel Mission Society merged to form the United Evangelical Mission (German abbreviation VEM). In 1996 delegates from Asia, Africa, and Germany formed the “United Evangelical Mission—Community of Churches in Three Continents.” Headquarters for this multinational society remained in Wuppertal, Germany. Current emphases include social ministries such as hunger aid and refugee relief.

MICHAEL R. SPRADLIN

Ricci, Matteo (1552–1610). Italian Jesuit scholar and pioneer missionary to China. Ricci pioneered in Guangdong and Nanjing (1583–1601) before receiving permission to reside in Peking. Ricci mastered Chinese language, culture, literature, institutions, and government and further acculturated by adopting the prestigious attire of a Confucian scholar.

His books on Western science in Chinese were highly acclaimed and his “Great Map of Ten Thousand Countries,” annotated in Chinese, opened the Chinese to globalization heretofore unknown.

Ricci rejected Buddhist notions of rebirth but accepted “original” Confucian thought as essentially monotheistic and consistent with Christian morality. His apologetic work, The True Meaning of the Lord of Heaven (1603), made use of Confucian terms to argue for and illustrate the Christian faith. In his view traditional ancestor worship was not idolatrous but this was sharply disputed by Dominicans and Franciscans, leading to the “Rites Controversy,” which was finally decided by Clement XI (1704, 1715) against Ricci’s position.

At his death advances were modest: eight foreign priests, eight Chinese lay brothers, missions in four cities, and 2,500 “neophytes.” His grave was the gift of the emperor himself, a testimony to his stature as one of the most respected religious figures ever to come from the West.

JAMES F. LEWIS

Rice Christian. See Cultural Conversion.

Richard, Timothy (1845–1919). British missionary to China. Born in Ffaldybrenin, South Wales, on October 10, 1845, Richard was baptized at age fifteen and soon thereafter decided to be a missionary. At age twenty he was admitted to Haverfordwest Theological Seminary, where he sensed a call to mission work in China. He was sent by the Baptist Missionary Society to Shandong, North China, in 1869.

Once there, Richard realized that street evangelism and distributing Christian tracts were unfruitful. So he turned to writing on secular subjects such as modern science. He also raised funds and was the relief administrator for the famine in Shandong and Shanxi between 1876 and 1879. Among the Chinese literati, Richard established himself as a source of inspiration for reforms in education, agriculture, mining, transportation, and trade. After the Boxer Uprising in 1899–1900, Richard persuaded Qing officials to found Shanxi University. Throughout his career he had a deep interest in Chinese religions. His major publications include Calendar of the Gods in China (1906) and Guide to Buddhahood: Being a Standard Manual of Chinese Buddhism (1907). He died on April 17, 1919, three years after his retirement from China.

TIMOTHY MAN-KONG WONG

Richter, Julius (1862–1940). German missiologist. The son of a pastor, Richter was born near Osterburg in Brandenburg. His father died when he was young. After attending the Francke Stiftung, a private school in Halle, he went to Leipzig and then to Berlin to study theology. Having worked as a private teacher in Bad Boll following his theological examinations, he was accepted into the church seminary in Berlin (1886). Here he found an authoritative teacher in Rudolf Koegel. From 1887 to 1912 Richter pastored several different church parishes in the Brandenburg region. It was during these years that he began to write and publish articles concerning missions.

After receiving honorary doctorates from the Universities of Berlin (1908) and Edinburgh (1910), Richter began teaching at the University of Berlin, first as a private lecturer, then as a full professor of missiology (1914–30). He also served in official capacities at the Brandenburg Missionary Conference, the German Protestant Missionary Committee, and the German Society for Missiology. Richter’s numerous lecture tours took him across the world and opened to him distant relationships that allowed him to become one of the most significant ecumenical personalities of his day. In addition to his wish to serve his Lord alone, his varied work was characterized by a mentally sharp personality, tenacious industry, and a phenomenal memory.

Ridderhof, Joy (1903–84). American missionary to Honduras and founder of Gospel Recordings. Ridderhof ranks among the major pioneers of twentieth-century missions. Gospel Recordings, which she founded in 1939, by 1997 provided the languages a year, more than half of all extant languages. With a small band of volunteers and a handful of full-time staff, Gospel Recordings puts the good news in the heart language of more unreached people groups by far than anyone else in church history.

Ridderhof gained her hallmark perspectives on life as a young woman living in the home of Robert C. McQuilkin, first president of the fledgling Columbia Bible School (now Columbia International University): joy-filled faith and a passion for world evangelism. She testified of coming to Columbia from California a worried, fearful young woman and leaving as the first graduate of that institution, a new person. She went to Honduras as a pioneer missionary herself, but when illness kept her from returning there, she hit on the idea of sending her beloved people of Marcala “talking tracts”—recorded messages in Spanish. Within five years those recordings were being used over radio throughout Latin America. Invitations to record in Navaho and pleas from many missionaries catapulted her into a worldwide ministry. The rest is history. Averaging twenty new languages a year, more than half of all extant languages have now been recorded by teams sent out from over thirty countries by the Global Recordings Network.

Bibliography. S. M. Barlow, Light is Sown; P. Thompson, Faith by Hearing; S. B. Rossi, Singing in His Ways.

Riggs, Mary Ann Clark Longley (1813–69). American missionary to the Dakotas. The daughter of General Thomas Longley of Massachusetts, Riggs was educated to be a teacher by Mary Lyon, the founder of Mount Holyoke Seminary. After completing her studies, she was chosen to teach in a school in southern Indiana, where she met and married Stephen Return Riggs. The two departed for Bible translation and literacy work among the Dakota tribes of Minnesota in February 1837. The majority of their time among the Dakotas they lived and worked in Lac-qui-Parle, near Fort Rienville. Riggs taught the natives to read in Dakota and in English while her husband worked on translating the Bible. She also taught the women basic hygiene such as laundering clothing. The couple became involved in an experimental community, Hazelwood Republic, founded by the Dakotas, some of whom were the Riggs’ converts, and ruled by an elected president. This experiment was cut short by an uprising, after which the Riggs moved to Beloit, Wisconsin. Mary died there on March 22, 1869. After her death, Stephen completed the translation of the entire Bible and wrote an autobiography of their work among the Dakotas using Mary’s diary and letters.

Bibliography. S. R. Riggs, Forty Years with the Sioux; M. G. Humphreys, Missionary Explorers Among the American Indians.

Riis, Andreas (1804–54). Danish missionary of the Basel Mission Society to Ghana. Born in Luegumkloster, Denmark, and by trade a glassmaker; he studied at the Basel Mission’s seminary and was posted as a chaplain to the Danish enclave at Christiansborg on the Gold Coast (modern-day Ghana) in 1832. Of the nine Basel missionaries sent there between 1828 and 1839, he was the only survivor. Dissatisfied with serving the European community and the unhealthy conditions on the coast, in 1835 he established (without mission permission) a station at Akropong in the hills 30 miles inland from Accra. Because of various difficulties he returned home, and the mission sent him to the West Indies to recruit Afro-Caribbean colonists. He chose 24 former slaves known for their religious devotion and technical skills as farmers and craftsmen, and returned to Akropong in 1843. He set up a mission plantation that became the nucleus of a Christian community in the Gold Coast. Because of allegations that he meddled in local politics, engaged in rum-running, and abused Africans under his supervision, Riis was recalled in 1845 and dismissed from the mission. He then ac-accepted a pastorate in Norway and died shortly afterwards. Still, by his work at Akropong he essentially secured the Basel Gold Coast mission.
Ris, Andreas

Ulrich van der Heyden and Richard V. Pierard

Rites Controversy. See Accommodation; Roman Catholic Missions.

Rites of Passage. Activities, usually rituals, marking culturally recognized transitions from one place to another, or from one stage of life to another. A rite of passage may mark any change of status—geographic place, condition of life, social position, or age. It gives public recognition to changed roles and relationships in the community, provides for readjustment of the society, affirms its values and beliefs, and helps the individual adjust to a new status.

Life transitions that commonly involve rites of passage are birth, initiation (admission into distinct groups of the society may occur several times, on entering different groups), marriage, parenthood, death.

Three phases of rites of transition are recognized: separation, transition, and incorporation, though these often overlap in the ritual activities (see Ritual and Ceremony). Separation marks withdrawal from a group and beginning the move to another place or status. Transition is the time between stages, having left one place or state and not yet having entered the next. It is also called the liminal phase of passage or segregation. Transitional people occupy ambiguous social positions, exempt from ordinary distinctions and expectations, and are frequently cut off from normal social contacts and behavior (see Liminal, Liminality). Rites during the transition phase are often collective, building intense community spirit. A reversal of ordinary behavior may be a feature. Sometimes special conditions are imposed such as humility, poverty, obedience, sexual abstinence, or silence. Incorporation (also called integration or aggregation) is formally reentering society after completion of the rite. A new identity is recognized that establishes a changed social status. The missionary must consider if existing rituals can be given new meaning, or if a functional equivalent that is distinctly Christian can be introduced. Rites of passage can be a powerful medium for teaching and building Christian community.

Donald K. Smith

Ritual and Ceremony. All religions have ways to attract the attention of supernatural beings and forces. These highly symbolic actions take many forms: Magic, supplication, Sacrifice, or other means deemed necessary to restore and maintain balance between the supernatural and natural realms. Ritual brings Myth to life and, though a performance invoking the action of powers that would otherwise not be present, allows for a display of beliefs and values. Such sacred drama is often performed by a religious practitioner who assists common people who are not equipped to approach these powers alone.

Anthropologists recognize three broad types of ritual. (1) Rites of transformation include ceremonies associated with stages of the life cycle (e.g., birth, naming, initiation, marriage, retirement, death), the recognition of conversion, and revivals or pilgrimages (see also Rites of Passage). (2) Rites of crisis are associated with healing, decision making, or dealing with calamity. (3) Rites of intensification answer the human need for order and identity (birthdays, planned festivals, and ancestral traditions). Ritual often takes place in stages that remove people from the mundane (e.g., ablation, removal of shoes, or silence upon entering a house of worship), bring them into the sacred (through worship), and return them to the mundane (e.g., putting on one's shoes before reentering the streets), better equipped to handle life.

Typically approaching religion as cognitive rather than experiential, Western missionaries have thereby rejected a holistic coincidence of supernatural and natural. This separation has created confusion for people who attempt to make God relevant to daily living. But by adapting Christian rituals to specific cultural contexts missionaries can demonstrate how God enters into relationship with people; for example, they might make use of the analogies between Christian baptism and pre-Christian initiation rites. However, care must be taken to ensure allegiance to God rather than to the ritual. The focus must be on God's intention to impact human affairs rather than on the power of a ritual to attract God's attention.

R. Daniel Shaw

Roberts, W. Dayton (1917– ). American mission leader; author; and missionary in Costa Rica and Colombia. Born and raised by a missionary family in Korea, Roberts grew up deeply involved in the cause of mission.

After education at Wheaton College and Princeton Seminary, Roberts joined LAM in 1941. During his 41-year-tenure he spent five years in Colombia and the rest living or based in Costa Rica. A self-professed jack of all trades, Roberts' work included church planting, seminary teaching and leadership, and managing a radio station and a publishing house. He also directed Evangelism-In-Depth and facilitated the organization of CLAME (Latin American Community of Evangelical Ministries), a cooperative effort of several former LAM institutions. From 1982 he spent eight years before retirement working with World Vision in Monrovia, California, starting a journal, and directing MARC's publications program.

Roberts wrote no less than ten books, including Revolution in Evangelism (1967), Strachan of Costa Rica (1971), and more recently, PATCHING God's Garment (1994) and One Step Ahead (1996). His vision for mission is that of a holistic effort similar to a concert with a solo piano (EMQ 29:3 [July 1993]: 300–302). The piano is evangelism, and the rest of the orchestra the other elements of mission. While the piano is given the prominent role, all are needed for a successful performance.

A. Scott Moreau

Rodgers, James Burton (1865–1944). American missionary to Brazil and the Philippines. Born in Albany, New York, Rodgers received degrees from both Hamilton College and Auburn Theological Seminary, and was ordained by the Presbyterian Church in the United States. He and his wife Anna were appointed as missionaries to Brazil, where they served for two terms.

Having acquired the Philippines as a result of its victory in the Spanish-American War, the United States opened the islands for the first time to Protestant missionaries. Eager to enter quickly, the Presbyterian Church transferred Rodgers to Manila before the fighting there was over. Leaving his family in Hong Kong, Rodgers arrived in Manila on April 21, 1899, began regular services on May 7, and baptized his first Filipino converts on October 22.

As a pioneer missionary, Rodgers warmly welcomed all new missionaries to the islands, often meeting them as they docked, and helping them to choose ministry locations. Deeply committed to COMITY and ecumenism, Rodgers was instrumental in the creation of the Evangelical Union of the Philippine Islands (1901). This body set up and governed the comity agreements between his denomination, the Methodists, the United Brethren, and other groups that joined later.

Rodgers helped to found the Union Theological Seminary in Manila in 1907 and taught there from 1908 to 1932. He also worked to found the United Evangelical Church (1929). Retiring in 1935, he continued to live in the Philippines until his death in 1944 during the Japanese occupation.

Paul F. Hartford

Role. See Status and Role.

Roman Catholic Missions. Roman Catholic Missions and Mission Theology Before Vatican II. It was only in the context of the Counter-Reformation in the sixteenth century that the term “missions” came to be used to designate the Catholic Church’s activity of preaching the gospel. The early Jesuits used the term to describe efforts (1) to revive and nurture faith among Catholics, (2) to win back Christians who had become Protestant, and (3) to convert to Christianity those who had not yet been baptized. During this period the political expansion of Europe to Asia and Latin America by the Roman Catholic kingdoms of Portugal and Spain was intimately linked to missions in the third sense of the term.

Augustinians, Dominicans, and Franciscans accompanied the explorers of the Philippines early in the sixteenth century, and relatively quickly and with little opposition the majority of the population was baptized. Missionaries saw little of value in Filipino culture, however, and imposed European doctrinal formulations and religious practices. Such a tabula rasa approach to evangelization was taken also in India, both with the “Thomas Christians” found there, and with new converts as well. The Jesuit Francis Xavier also shared this attitude, although, unlike other European missionaries, he stressed the importance of preaching and instruction in the local language. When Xavier traveled to Japan, however, he was so impressed by the level of civilization and natural goodness of the Japanese that he abandoned this tabula rasa approach in favor of one of ACCOMMODATION, wherever possible, to local customs. This more “inculturating” approach was also championed by Alessandro Valignano, who first came to Asia as a Jesuit visitor in 1579. Valignano strongly supported the work of Matteo Ricci in China, who advocated the development of a Chinese Christianity, complete with the possibility of venerating ancestors. As missionaries from other orders began to work in China, however, such broad-minded acceptance of Chinese culture was opposed, and in 1742 any kind of adaptation was condemned at the conclusion of the famous “Rites Controversy.”

By the mid-sixteenth century the conquest of Latin America was complete, and with conquest came Franciscan and Dominican—and eventually Jesuit—missionaries. While the missionaries...
Roman Catholic Missions

were for the most part sincere, and made efforts to learn local languages and provide basic education, the success of their work was greatly hampered by the cruelty with which the indigenous peoples were treated by the conquerors. But the native people did have their champions in men like Antonio de Montesinos and especially Bartolomew de Las Casas, who worked for fifty years to convince the Spanish of the indigenous people's humanity and their need for basic human rights. Evangelization was also hampered by missionary attitudes that demeaned the local cultures and insisted that converts adopt a European lifestyle. In an effort both to protect the indigenous population from exploitation by the colonists and to form them in Christian living, villages or "reductions" were developed in which people could live in Christian community. These communities were developed especially by the Jesuits, who founded some twenty-three settlements in Paraguay in the seventeenth century. While life was peaceful in such communities, their weakness lay in failure to develop a sense of initiative and independence among the people. Until the system met its nemesis in the eighteenth century, not one candidate was brought forward for priesthood, nor one order of women religious founded.

In the sixteenth century, missions were directed by the Portuguese and Spanish monarchs and the missionary orders. While this had a number of advantages (royal protection, ready means of travel, financial assistance), the grave disadvantages of mixing political interests and trade with mission work, rivalry between the orders, and a limited pool of missionaries prompted Rome, as it was centralizing all of Catholicism in the wake of the Council of Trent, to place all missionary activity under a new curial body—the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Established in 1622, its aims were to free missionary work from the stranglehold of Spain and Portugal, to create dioceses and promote local clergy, and to recruit diocesan clergy to balance personnel from the religious orders. In a famous set of instructions in 1659, the Congregation urged that missionaries should not destroy what is good in a culture. "What could be more absurd than to transport France, Spain, Italy, or some other European country to China? Do not bring these, but the faith."

It was in this spirit that Robert de Nobili ministered in India in the first half of the seventeenth century. Influenced by the methods of Ricci, he determined to immerse himself in Indian culture. He avoided eating meat and wearing leather shoes, wore the robe of the Indian holy man, mastered classical Tamil, and attempted to recast traditional Christian teaching with illustrations from the Indian classics. Anyone converting to Christianity need not abandon the many Indian cultural practices that de Nobili deemed inessential to Christian life. Although blessed with considerable success, de Nobili was not without his critics, and in 1703 all his methods were condemned by the Roman legate Charles Tournon.

In what is now Vietnam, Alexander de Rhodes made two significant contributions to missionary work. First, he formed a company of catechists, laymen whom he trained to give both religious instruction and medical assistance. In lieu of an indigenous Vietnamese clergy, such action assured that Christianity would be taught skillfully and accurately. Second, Rhodes developed a way to write Vietnamese using the Roman alphabet, and set Christian doctrine in the ordinary language of the people. By 1658 it was estimated that there were 300,000 Christians in Vietnam.

Between 1645 and 1700 the Capuchins baptized 600,000 people in the region of the Congo and Angola, and from 1700 on the average annual number of baptisms was 12,000. The reason for this, it seems, was a rather lax policy of baptism. Elsewhere in Africa, by 1624 the Jesuits had some twenty missionaries working in the Zambesi region, and the Dominicans and Augustinians had stations on Africa's east coast, but the involvement of the missionaries in various tribal wars slowed progress considerably and strengthened the impression that to become Christian was to accept the sovereignty of Portugal. Despite heroic efforts, no real commitment was made to learn local languages or cultures, and there was little attempt to follow easy baptism with extended catechism.

In the sixteenth century, France began to exert its influence beyond Europe, particularly in North America. The first group of Jesuit missionaries was sent to Canada in 1632, and in 1639 Ursuline Marie de l’Incarnation and several companions were the first women missionaries to Canada. Work was slow and hard; the indigenous people treated each other and the missionaries with terrible cruelty, and many missionaries lost their lives, among whom were Jesuits Isaac Jogues and Jean Brébeuf and the layman Jean de la Lande. The Jesuit missionary Pierre Marquette is especially known for his explorations of the Upper Midwest.

The great effort of Roman Catholic mission work beyond Europe faltered gravely in the eighteenth century. The influence of Portugal and Spain began to diminish as Holland's and Britain's grew; the Roman decisions regarding Chinese ancestral rites precipitated a persecution in China; the suppression of the Jesuits in 1773 effected the withdrawal of several thousand missionaries from Asia and Latin America; the French Revolution and its persecution of the church virtually dried up the sources for French missionaries.
Roman Catholic Missions

It is rather astonishing, therefore, that the nineteenth century was to see an amazing revival in the Catholic Church in general, and in its missionary efforts in particular. Napoleon's humiliation of the pope at the end of the eighteenth century ultimately created a movement of papal support and religious renewal throughout the whole church. In 1814 the Jesuits were reestablished, and other orders discovered new life. In addition, the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries saw the foundation of more new orders of men and women dedicated to missionary work than had any previous era. These included the Sisters of Saint Joseph of Cluny (1805), the Oblates of Mary Immaculate (1816), the Marists (1817), the Congregation of Mary Immaculate (1862), the Mill Hill Fathers (1866), the Comboni Missionaries (men, 1867; women, 1872), the Society of the Divine Word (1875), Sisters of the Precious Blood (1885), and the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America (Maryknoll, 1911). The beginnings of large-scale lay participation in missionary work can be traced back to Pauline Jaricot, who in 1817 founded the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. The society solicited prayers, disseminated information, and collected funds for missionary support.

As the nations of Europe entered a new age of colonialism, they welcomed, for the most part, missionaries of all sorts to help in education and health care. While Catholics and Protestants often pioneered in their own missionary areas, they occasionally competed, shamefully, against one another. Missionary efforts in Africa flourished, despite the hardships of the climate. Both China and Japan opened up once more for missionary activities. Korea and Japan opened up once more for missionaries under the pressures of the colonial powers. Korean Catholicism struggled to grow, but was severely hampered by persecution at mid-century. Such legendary figures as Peter Chanel and Father Damien participated in the evangelization of the South Pacific.

In this great missionary era, however, there was little creative thinking. Nineteenth-century Catholic theology, with few exceptions, was inspired by the false universalism of Neo-Thomism. Loyalty to the papacy did indeed revitalize the church, but also made it Eurocentric and, like the colonial powers, derogatory of local culture. Any kind of adaptation was seldom considered, and local vocations to priesthood and religious life were, in the main, rarely encouraged.

A sign of renewal in Roman Catholic mission theology was the publication of five major missionary encyclicals in the twentieth century, inspired no doubt by the emergence of the Social Sciences and the pioneering missiological work of Josef Schmidlin, André Seunois, and Pierre Charles. Maximum illud (Benedict XV, 1919) taught the need to be sensitive to local cultures and called for the training of local clergy; Rerum ecclesiae (Pius XI, 1926), while likewise calling for a local clergy, also affirmed the pope's role in global evangelization and enlisted bishops as primary agents in the task. In Evangelii praecones (1951) and Fidei donum (1957), Pius XII stressed the supranationality of the church, and called for the development in Africa. John XXIII's 1959 Princeps pastorum laid the groundwork for Vatican II.

From Vatican II to the Present. The Second Vatican Council (1962–65), the most important event of the Catholic Church in the twentieth century, thoroughly rethought the theology and practice of mission. The "Dogmatic Constitution on the Church" (Lumen gentium, 1964) defines and describes the council's teaching on the church's identity, its organization, and its authority. In highlighting the universality of Christ, the Catholic Church is also defining itself as "the universal sacrament (sign) of salvation." It senses a "special urgency" in the task of "proclaiming the gospel of Christ to every creature."

The "Dogmatic Constitution" is noteworthy for two particular reasons, the first being the ways in which the Catholic Church continues to define itself in terms of a hierarchical structure (chap. 3) in spite of using the terms "mystery" (chap. 1) and "the People of God" (chap. 2) as controlling images of the contemporary church. The second is the way in which the Catholic Church identifies itself in relation to other religious and nonreligious realities. It is not clear whether the "Dogmatic Constitution" intends to identify the people of God with the Catholic Church exclusively, but it is clear that the traditional rubric "outside the church there is no salvation" is cited in a rather nuanced way. It is certainly ironic, at least from an evangelical point of view, that the groundwork is then laid for articulation of various ways in which members of non-Christian religions and even atheists can have a relationship with the church, even unconsciously (chaps. 14–16). It is encouraging to note, nevertheless, many statements of the GREAT COMMISSION and of the obligation of all disciples of Christ to use their individual abilities in the urgent task of global evangelization.

The biblical principles of a theology of mission are outlined in the council's "Decree on the Missionary Activity of the Church" (Ad gentes, 1965), the foundation of which is that "the pilgrim church is missionary by its very nature." The first paragraphs of the decree include a thoroughly biblical reflection on the trinitarian basis for mission, showing that the activity of preaching the gospel needs to be approached—even in Western culture—with different strategies. The evangelical will be uncomfortable with the juxtaposition of a particularist understanding of salvation and the assertion that "all people have a 'mysterious' relationship with the church (which) enlightens them in a way which is accommodated to their spiritual and material situation.
Roman Catholic Missions

Some months after the publication of Redemptoris Missio, two Vatican congregations issued “Dialogue and Proclamation,” a document which attempts to explain more fully the church’s views of non-Christian religions and its efforts to interact with adherents of those faiths. The complexities of religious pluralism are to be explored by means of dialogue, a Christian message is not to be imposed in this situation, for sincere persons are “saved in Jesus Christ and thus already share in some way in the reality which is signified by the kingdom.” Proclamation, on the other hand, is based on solid biblical material; here the integrity of the gospel demands avoidance of syncretism. Dialogue and proclamation must eventually come together. The gospel message needs to be included at some point in the practice of dialogue so as to provide the belief and faith called for in all Christians.

Contemporary Roman Catholic Mission Theology. Contemporary Roman Catholic mission theology revolves, then, around several interrelated themes. The first theme is that of proclamation, which holds the permanent priority in mission. Proclamation is rooted in the witness of Christian action and authentic Christian living, and blossoms into communication of the word (by a variety of media) only after discerning the presence of and listening to the Spirit in a particular context.

The second theme, interreligious dialogue, is recognized today as an integral element of mission that finds its deepest justification in the dialogue with which God effects salvation. While proclamation is concerned with presenting Christ, dialogue seeks to discover him in other faiths, ideologies, and secular situations, and calls for mutual conversion and transformation. Dialogue is like proclamation, however, in that it entails both nonverbal and verbal witness to the reality of Christ.

Inculturation, the third theme, finds its theological roots in the doctrines of the incarnation, sacramentality, catholicity, and revelation. Like interreligious dialogue, inculturation looks for the presence of God in human life and culture—and so goes beyond the former models of adaptation; like proclaimation, on the other hand, it calls for renewal and refinement of the human in the gospel’s light—and so is always somewhat counter-cultural in intent. In theological articulation, liturgical expression, and questions of church order, not only the classical sources of Scripture and tradition need to be taken into account, but also those elements (culture, location, social changes) that make up present human experience. Pope John Paul II has characterized inculturation as the center, means, and aim of the new effort of evangelization.

In the last several decades the theme of liberation has emerged as central in theological reflection on the church’s mission. While mission has almost always been involved in some kind of charitable or developmental work, current thinking would push beyond to ways of changing the underlying unjust and oppressive structures that keep people poor. Working for justice and integral liberation has been called constitutive of gospel proclamation, and inculturation is regarded as impossible without immersion in the reality of the poor and treating their religion—popular Christianity or non-Christian faith—with utmost seriousness and respect.

Finally, the church’s mission is more and more recognized in contemporary theological reflection as trinitarian in both origin and aim. Mission is rooted in the God who is radically with and for humanity, and who calls humanity to become partners in the divine work of reconciling all of creation. God does this in the warp and woof of history (Spirit) and in the concreteness of history (Jesus); humanity does this most consciously by aligning with God’s activity in the missional community of the church. The entire church is called to mission, and so clergy and religious are to minister actively in the world.

Contemporary Roman Catholic mission theology is greatly influenced by contacts with other Christian churches, Orthodox, conciliar, and evangelical. “Christian Witness—Common Witness” (1980), a joint agreement between the Vatican and the World Council of Churches, explores ideas for ecumenical cooperation in global evangelization and witness. A contribution to the ongoing discussions between conciliar Protestants and Roman Catholics, this document affirms certain perspectives on the church, defines the characteristics and results of effective witness, and even proposes various situations in which common witness can take place.

The Evangelical-Roman Catholic Dialogue on Mission (ERCDOM) took place over eight years (1977–84). The discussions demonstrated that evangelicals and Roman Catholics can talk together about issues of great importance without engaging in the usual polemics. The record of these meetings shows both integrity and candor regarding issues that have long divided the two groups. While there was considerable agreement on some of the basic points, there remains much that separates. “Evangelicals and Catholics Together” (1994) represents a more recent attempt in North America to identify areas of common concern to evangelicals and Roman Catholics and proposes strategies for future cooperation. The document demonstrates that there is much in common between the two groups, particularly when it comes to “cobelligerence,” that is, a common commitment against, for example, Relativism, anti-intellectualism, nihilism, and social abuse. Although areas of disagreement are acknowledged, there is little theological reflection, with the unfortunate result of some oversimplification and confusion. In the main, three issues need further investigation and discussion: the significance of the Protestant Reformation, the criteria for membership in the body of Christ, and the scope of the Great Commission as a mandate that engages all believers in Christ in all parts of the globe. It is certainly good and right that such discussions have taken place; in the future, however, provision should be made for the inclusion of those who can contribute significantly from the theological and biblical disciplines.

STEVEN B. BEVANS AND JOHN NYQUIST

Romania (Est. 2000 pop.: 22,607,000; 237,500 sq. km. [91,699 sq. mi.]). Romania is the largest country in the Balkans in southeastern Europe, bordering Ukraine, Moldova, Hungary, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and the Black Sea. Although a socialist republic under Soviet influence, Romania became increasingly independent after 1974 under the dictatorial leadership of Nicolae Ceausescu. His regime collapsed amidst violent public unrest in 1989. Today the country is governed by an executive president and a bicameral legislature. Eighty percent of the population is Romanian in ethnic background, another 12 percent is Hungarian, and the remaining 8 percent is made up of several Gypsy groups and Eastern European communities including Bulgars, Croats, Czechs, Moldavians, Poles, Serbs, Slovaks, and Ukrainians.

Despite the fact that manipulation and oppression of the churches was extreme before 1989, 89 percent of Romanians consider themselves Christian, with Orthodox representing nearly 85 percent of the country’s population. Nonreligious and atheists made up over 15 percent of the population in 1970 but have fallen to less than 10 percent.

Even with numerous evangelistic crusades and Western-based outreach, evangelicals have grown slowly from 6.9 percent in 1970 to 8 percent by A.D. 2000. However, a major renewal movement called The Lord’s Army is active within the Orthodox Church. Pentecostals, Christian Brethren, Baptists, and Seventh-Day Adventists are the largest evangelical groups. Much of the evangelical effort has been focused on Bucharest, the capital city. In recent years, many new groups, such as Calvary Chapels International (USA) have entered Romania for the first time, creating substantial followings. The Jesus Film and Radio Mission Work are two of the most effective means of evangelization.

TODD M. JOHNSON

Rouse, Helen (1925– ). English missionary to Zaire. After challenging medical tradition by training as a woman doctor at Cambridge, Rouse turned her indomitable spirit toward the Congo in 1953. A pioneer in medical mission methods, she envisioned training centers where African nurses would be taught the Bible and basic medicine. Returning to their villages they would handle routine cases, teach preventive medicine, and function as evangelists. During her twenty-five years of service, Rouse built two hospitals with training facilities plus the Evangelical Medical Centre in Nyankunde, Zaire. The center brought to fruition five outlying medical centers served by itinerating doctors with each center servicing ten to fifteen smaller rural hospitals.

Rouse, who suffered countless setbacks through her misunderstood status as a single woman, is also known for her impregnable stance against physical brutality during the independence uprising of the early 1960s. Most significantly, her early flaunting of paternalistic attitudes toward nationals through her interaction with them as friends, colleagues, and spiritual advisors, remains one of her major achievements as she opened doors for their Kingdom service. Leaving Zaire in 1973, she became an international speaker and writer for Christian missions.

ROBERTA R. KING

Bibliography. A. Burgess, Daylight Must Come: The Story of a Courageous Woman Doctor in the Congo; H. Rouse, Give Me This Mountain: An Autobiography; FJIJ.

Rouse, Ruth (1872–1956). English evangelist, scholar, pioneer ecumenical leader, and missionary to India. Rouse was tireless in reaching students in countless universities and colleges throughout the world at a time when few took such a role. Educated at Bedford College (1891) and Girton College, Cambridge (1893), she was nurtured in Charles Spurgeon’s Metropolitan Tabernacle, but converted to Anglicanism.

Missionary zeal marked Rouse’s life. She traced her conversion to the Children’s Special Service Mission. During college she signed the
Rouse, Ruth

STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT (SVM) declaration, "I am willing and desirous, God permitting, to become a foreign missionary." After Girton, she spent one year studying Sanskrit at the British Museum in preparation for a missionary career in India.

During Rouse's professional career, which spanned thirty years, she was responsible for fostering missionary interest throughout the world. Her numerous roles included being editor of The Student Volunteer, traveling secretary for the American SVM, cofounder of the Missionary Settlement for University Women at Bombay, executive committee member of the British SCM and WSCF, head of European Student Relief, educational secretary of the Missionary Council of the National Assembly of the Church of England (then the highest position a woman could have in the Anglican Church), and executive committee member and president of the World YMCA.

Russia and Kievan Rus (for Russia, est. 2000 pop.: 145,552,000; 17,075,400 sq. km. [6,592,812 sq. mi.]). Tradition says that in 988, Prince Valdimir of Kiev (Vladimir in Russian, Volodymyr in Ukrainian) chose Orthodoxy as the religion for his people after sending emissaries to investigate Orthodoxy, Catholicism, Islam, and the Jewish faith.

Orthodoxy remained the state religion for nearly a thousand years. During earliest periods of Russian history, the Orthodox patriarch had as much as, and sometimes more, political power than the czar. During the rule of Peter the Great, the patriarch and the Russian Orthodox Church were subjugated to the czar, but the church continued to exert great influence in society.

During the seventeenth century, a schism occurred in the Orthodox Church, resulting in the formation of the conservative Old Believers who split away from the state Orthodox Church. Later, sects such as the Dukhobors (Spirit-Wrestlers) and Molokans (Milk-Drinkers) emerged from Orthodoxy.

While Orthodoxy has always been and remains the predominant religion of Russia, in addition to the Old Believers and Orthodox sects, a small number of Catholics and Protestants entered Russia through emigration and acquisition of territory prior to the nineteenth century. Encouraged by the publication of the Bible in the vernacular, Protestantism flourished as an indigenous movement during the nineteenth century in the Caucasus, Ukraine, and St. Petersburg.

During much of this period before the Bolshevik Revolution in 1917, Protestants suffered reprisals from the state Orthodox Church. Following the overthrow of the czarist government in 1917, Lenin's Marxist followers instituted a policy of official atheism, and for the next seven decades, almost all religious believers suffered varying degrees of restrictions and repressions. Until 1929, the Bolsheviks restricted the state Orthodox Church most severely, allowing Protestants more freedom for expansion than they had experienced earlier.

With the ascendancy of Joseph Stalin in 1929, a campaign of terror closed most churches and brought imprisonment and death to millions of Christians of all confessions. However, during World War II Stalin permitted some churches to open in order to bolster the patriotism of religious citizens.

The rise to power of Nikita Khruschev in 1956 brought some cessation from the terror of Stalin. However, Khruschev unleashed a virulent anti-religious campaign closing more than half the Orthodox and Protestant churches in the USSR.

Under the Communists, repression of religion continued until the rise to power of Mikhail Gorbachev and his policies of glasnost (openness) and perestroika (reconstruction). In October 1990, a new Law on Religion was enacted, providing full religious freedom.

Following the collapse of the Communist Party and dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1991, Orthodoxy, Protestantism, and Catholicism expanded in Russia, with thousands of new churches opening. Seminaries, missions, and other parachurch organizations, generally prohibited during the Soviet era, were started. Several thousand foreign missionaries, primarily evangelical Protestants, entered the former Soviet Union, including Russia, in the early nineties. Tensions rose between Orthodox and Protestants, with Orthodox hierarchy advocating legislation on religion that would restrict foreign missionaries and non-Orthodox Christian confession.

SEE ALSO Commonwealth of Independent States.

Bibliography. M. Bourdeaux, Faith on Trial in Russia; N. Davis, A Long Walk to Church; J. Ellis, The Russian Orthodox Church: A Contemporary History; D. Pospielovsky, The Russian Church Under the Soviet Regime 1917–1982; I. S. Prokhanoff, In the Cauldron of Russia; W. Sawatsky, Soviet Evangelicals Since World War II; P. D. Steeves, Keeping the Faiths.

Rwanda (Est. 2000 pop.: 9,048,000; 26,338 sq. km. [10,169 sq. mi.]). Dotted with beautiful lakes, terraced hillsides, and mountains, at times snow capped, Rwanda is known as the Switzerland of Africa. Tradition holds that the Twa or pygmy peoples were the first to migrate into Rwanda about 1,500 years ago. Some five hundred years later, the Hutu arrived, with the Tutsi coming roughly four hundred and fifty years ago. The Tutsi established a monarchy including a feudal system of nobles and landlords. Through contract, Hutu farmers pledged their services to Tutsi landlords. All three people groups live intermingled rather than in distinct tribal groups and speak the same language, which has facilitated the spread of Christianity.

In the early colonial era, Rwanda was part of German East Africa. After World War I it became a protectorate of Belgium in which the Tutsi dominated under colonial authority. In 1959, the Hutu tribesmen rebelled and massacred thousands of Tutsi in a bloody uprising. The king and more than 140,000 Tutsi fled to Uganda. The people then voted to make the country an independent republic and gave the Hutu control of the government. Independence came on July 1, 1962.

The White Fathers, a Catholic mission organization, arrived in 1889, but no permanent stations were established until 1900. The first Protestants were Lutheran missionaries, who arrived in 1907. They were followed by Anglicans and Seventh-Day Adventists. Though over half of the population is aligned with the Catholic Church, all of the early denominations have had significant impact on the country. In 1927, the East African Revival broke out in Rwanda. It was characterized by confession of sin, repentance, and concrete salvation experiences, and the impact it left is still felt today throughout East Africa.

After World War II, additional evangelical mission groups from the United States and other countries arrived in Rwanda. Groups that stressed evangelism and worked in newly opened immigration areas grew rapidly. In the 1970s, the Catholic Church eased restrictions in Bible reading in Rwanda. This enabled a much greater emphasis on Bible reading and prayer within the Catholic Church.

In the early 1990s, as part of the government’s effort of democratization, restrictions on the entry and registration of new church groups were eased. Many new groups arrived and splinter groups formed.

In October of 1990 the Tutsi in exile in Uganda invaded Rwanda. On April 6, 1994, the president of Rwanda, Juvenal Habyarimana, was killed when his plane was shot down. This set off massive killings of Tutsis and moderate Hutus by extremist Hutus. By the end of the summer, the Tutsi invasion, known as the RPF (Rwanda Patriotic Front), had routed the existing Hutu-dominated military. One million refugees were in Tanzania, almost two million were in Zaire. Somewhere between five hundred thousand and one million people died. Many church leaders fled along with the educated and businesspeople.

In light of ongoing animosity fueled by generations of anger and hatred, the future for Rwanda remains uncertain. The church still offers hope, but many no longer trust the church because of the involvement of church people in the killings.

GLENN KENDALL

Ryang, Ju Sam

(1879–c. 1950). Korean evangelist, missionary, educator, and first Korean Methodist bishop. Ryang came to Christ from a Confucian background in 1902. He traveled to San Francisco in 1906, and started a Korean church there. Ordained as a Methodist minister in 1912, he returned to Korea in 1915 after studies at Vanderbilt and Yale. In Korea he took a teaching position at Methodist Union Theological Seminary, edited The Theological World, and served as a minister. For the rest of his career he promoted missionary work and tirelessly worked for the growth of the church. In 1921, he took oversight of the Siberia-Manchuria Mission, a Korean work in Siberia with which he maintained contact for the rest of his life. When the self-governing Korean Methodist Church was formed largely through his efforts in 1930, he was elected the first bishop. He served in this capacity until 1938. After North Korea took over Seoul in 1950, Ryang, then head of the Korean Red Cross, was abducted and never seen again.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Sabbath Observance. The Sabbath is the biblically mandated day of rest, specified in the Hebrew Bible as the seventh day of the week. Under the Mosaic Law, the penalty for nonobservance was being put to death, placed in parallel with being “cut off” from one’s people, usually taken to refer to death directly at the hand of God (Exod. 31:14–15). The theological rationale for the Sabbath is found in the completion of creation (Exod. 20:11) and in the redemption from slavery in Egypt (Deut. 5:15).

The exact nature of Sabbath “rest” is not defined in Scripture, though we find examples of activity that desecrates the Sabbath. In contrast, by the time of Jesus, detailed halakhah (legal rules of behavior) were in the process of being formulated among various Jewish groups. By the time of the Mishnah (c. A.D. 200) and the Talmuds (c. A.D. 400–550), the rabbinic halakhah enumerated thirty-nine categories of prohibited work, each subdivided into additional categories. This became the basis of modern orthodox Jewish Sabbath observance.

In modern times, some Christians apply the term “Sabbath” to the first day of the week and advance reasons for regarding the Sabbath as having changed from the seventh day. Others worship and rest on the them, the Sabbath is no longer in effect because it was part of the Mosaic Law that has been done away in Christ. Some Christian groups advocate continued observance of the seventh-day Sabbath rather than Sunday as a particular mark of obedience to God.

Sabbath observance has traditionally been considered one of the most important Jewish distinctives, and remains so for the minority of observant Jews. With this in mind, in Jewish evangelism Sabbath observance is sometimes relevant.

Some Jewish Christians who are evangelical in doctrine may choose to participate in Sabbath observance with the understanding that the Law of Moses is no longer mandated and that any such observance is voluntary. Participating in such Jewish traditions becomes a way of maintaining ties to their Jewishness and testifying to nonbelieving Jews that faith in Christ and Jewish identity are not exclusive. Other Jewish believers in Jesus will not feel a need to observe the Sabbath. In contrast to the seventh-day Christian groups, Jewish Christians who contextualize their faith through Sabbath observance do not place a particular emphasis on the Sabbath over and above other points of behavior. The Sabbath can be a bridge of testimony even to nonobservant secular Jews, since it is a cultural as well as a religious institution. An exception to the general nonobservance of the Sabbath among Jewish people is the situation in Israel, where the Saturday Sabbath is officially and legally observed. Because Israelis are mostly secular, however, this observance does not necessarily extend into the personal lives of the citizens other than by necessity.

Bibliography. D. A. Carson, ed., From Sabbath to Lord’s Day.

Sacraments/Ordinances. The spread of the Christian faith during the first centuries after Christ was attested by new believers not only by profession of faith in Jesus as Lord, but also by two visible rites—baptism and the Lord’s Supper—both of which were rooted in Judaism. Though relatively simple acts as described in the New Testament, in succeeding generations they evolved into elaborate liturgical events. By the middle of the third century (or even earlier), infants born to Christian parents were being baptized; and after the conversion of Constantine, adults en masse were initiated into the Church by baptism, many whose lives did not necessarily evidence a spiritual transformation.

Disagreements over the rites occurred early in Christian history, and rather than serving as marks of unity, they became issues of intense debate and ultimately grounds for sectarian divisions. Christians have continued to differ, for example, as to what the rites should be called, sacraments or ordinances. Likewise they disagree as to the number of sacraments, whether they are means or symbols of grace, who is authorized to ministrable rites, who are legitimate candidates for baptism, and what is the proper mode of baptism. Questions regarding re-baptism and the frequency for observing the Supper continue to divide Christians. While most Christian churches regard baptism as the sign and seal of one’s incorporation into Christ—and thus include the baptism of infants in their liturgies—Mennonites, Baptists, Disciples of Christ, Brethren, and Pentecostals traditionally insist on the baptism of professed believers only. Anyone baptized as an infant who desires to be a Mennonite or Baptist, for example, traditionally has been required to submit to re-baptism, a practice Catholic, Reformed, and other historic churches view as a perversion or outright denial of the essential meaning of baptism as a sign of one’s incorporation into Christ.

A striking example of non-Western Christians putting aside the traditional dissension over the sacraments can be seen in the mergers and formation of the Churches of South and North India, constituted respectively in 1947 and 1970.

One of the most serious and persistent problems evident in numerous mission areas, nevertheless, ensues from the insistence by many churches that the celebrant of the sacraments—particularly of the Eucharist—be an ordained clergyperson. The chronic insufficiency of ordained clergy, together with the vast and often growing number of believers, many of whom are dispersed over wide geographical areas, has often meant that new believers must wait inordinate periods of time for baptism, and congregants receive communion infrequently, if at all.

Despite the importance of baptism and the Eucharist, only occasional references to the rites are found in most histories of missions. Evangelical mission historians, for example, deplore the imposition of baptism on conquered “pagans” as a condition for peace exacted by European “Christian” conquerors during the Middle Ages. Equally troublesome, even for some Roman Catholic historians, is the baptism of hundreds, sometimes thousands of indigenous peoples, often in a single day and with little or no catechization, in sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Asia and Latin America. Also questioned is the clandestine baptism of infants in danger of death (articulo mortis) by Roman Catholic missionaries in nineteenth- and twentieth-century China.

In the Eastern Church, Orthodox missionaries, in keeping with their core theology, consider worship to be the essence as well as the purpose of mission. Consequently their task as they see it is to invite peoples everywhere to join in the continuing adoration of God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, with the central act of worship being the Eucharist, not the reading or the proclamation of the Word.

In some Asian and African churches today, indigenous elements such as rice cakes or bread made from potatoes, maize, and bananas are being substituted for wheat bread, and rice wine or honey and water for wine made from grapes.

Sacrifice

The call to follow Christ is a call to sacrifice because it involves a willing abandonment of self in favor of Christ. Christians should be willing to “give up everything they have” (Luke 14:33) as disciples of Jesus Christ (see Matt. 4:20; 22; Mark 10:21, 28, 52; Luke 5:28; John 1:43; 21:19, 22). In fact, on several occasions Jesus stressed that Christians are to give up their own life in deference to him (Matt. 10:37–39; Mark 8:34–38; Luke 17:33; John 12:25–26). Jesus is our hidden treasure and pearl of great value for which we willingly sell all that we have (Matt. 13:44–45). As such, forsaking everything else for Jesus is ultimately no sacrifice at all—it is the wisest choice. Missionary martyr Jim Eliot understood this and said, “He is no fool who gives what he cannot keep to gain what he cannot lose” (Hampton and Plueddemann, 1991, 16).

Paul, the great missionary, spoke of “Christ Jesus my Lord for whose sake I have lost all things” (see Phil. 3:5–9). Paul was willing to sacrifice and suffer because Christ had become his Lord and Master: “The lordship of Christ over us leads us to understand that we no longer belong to ourselves, but rather to him who bought us with his own blood (see Luke 6:46; Rom. 14:7–9; 1 Cor. 6:12–20; 1 Peter 1:18–19).

Paul expressed it well when he defined his identity in the following way: “the God whose I am and whom I serve” (Acts 27:33). He belonged to God so he had to serve him! Until the lordship of Christ becomes a central tenet in our worldview, the call to sacrifice in his behalf will be extremely difficult. But once the knee bows to Christ and he is enthroned in our lives, sacrifice can become joyful service to our King! Even suffering for his sake can become something for which we “rejoice” (Rom. 5:3, see also Matt. 5:11–12; 2 Cor. 4:17; 11:23–33). Missionary pioneer J. Hudson Taylor understood this and wrote, “What we give up for Christ we gain. What we keep back for ourselves is our real loss” (ibid., 119).

If a degree of sacrifice, then, is to be expected of all disciples, it should be even more so a hall-mark of Christian missionaries. On behalf of the gospel, they are often called to forsake many things that are otherwise biblically allowable: cherished relationships, life-long dreams, comfortable living conditions, personal goals and plans, homeland cultures and models of ministry, relative anonymity, financial security, and many personal possessions. They do this willingly, while understanding that such sacrifice may not be appreciated even by those whom the Lord has called them to serve. Why endure such things? The worth of souls, the sanctification of sinners, and the example and glory of Christ are the reasons expressed by missionaries as being sufficient to counter whatever afflictions, persecutions, or deprivations they may face in their labors.
Sacrifice

But where is the corresponding devotion to sacrifice for the missionary cause among Christian laypeople in our day? In a day of unparalleled affluence, many Western Christians are amassing luxury upon luxury and struggling to save for the future while millions of men and women made in God’s image perish for lack of gospel knowledge. It is little wonder that non-Western missionaries are taking the place of Western missionaries in their Great Commission-centered living.

May the Holy Spirit break our hearts and bow us before Christ the Lord so that lives of sacrifice become the rule instead of the exception in our churches! Otherwise we will languish in our luxuries. As the psalmist cried out:

“May God be gracious to us and bless us and make his face shine upon us, that your ways may be known on earth, your salvation to all nations’ (Psalm 67:1–2).

Ed Gross

Sacrifice in Other Faiths. Sacrifice (from the Latin sacer, “holy,” and facere, “to make”), in some form, is a central element in most religious traditions, both ancient and modern. Sometimes, particularly in the context of biblical theology, a distinction is made between offering and sacrifice, with the latter being a special subcategory of the former. When dealing broadly with the phenomenology of religion, it is useful not to make a sharp distinction between the two concepts. In a general sense sacrifice is an intentional ritual offering of something valuable to one or more divine beings, spirits, or sacred powers.

Rituals of sacrifice have been characteristic of ancient religions such as those of Mesopotamia, Greece, and the Aztec and Mayan civilizations; primal religions; African Traditional Religions; as well as Hinduism and the religious traditions of China and Japan. Although early Buddhism discouraged popular sacrifices to supernatural beings or spirits, on the folk level offerings of flowers, food, or incense to exalted figures continued. In China and Japan Buddhism became closely identified with the ancestor cult and folk Buddhism today includes offerings and sacrifices to a wide range of figures. Islam is in principle opposed to sacrifice, although on the popular level of folk Islam veneration of the saints and offerings to ward off the evil effects of demons are widespread.

Nature of the Sacrifice. In many traditions any individual is able to make an offering or sacrifice for personal reasons. More common, especially in highly stratified societies, is the presence of a special person or group who performs sacrifices. In some cases, as in early Hinduism, the power and legitimacy of the priestly class are linked to their unique ability to perform the sacrifice in the requisite manner. Often a special individual will represent a larger group. Thus, in China the emperor represented the entire nation in offering sacrifices to Shang Di. In Confucian societies the father or eldest son represents the family in making offerings to spirits of the ancestors.

Inherent in the idea of sacrifice is giving up something of value to a superior being or power. The substance of the sacrifice may be something living or symbolic of life. Blood offerings have been characteristic of many traditions. Sheep, goats, cattle, pigs, fowl, reindeer, horses, dogs, and camels have all been used in sacrifices. Human sacrifice has been practiced in some earlier traditions. In the ancient Aztec civilization the hearts and blood of thousands of victims were sacrificed as a means of placating deities and maintaining the cosmic order. Forms of human sacrifice seem to have been practiced in ancient China, Africa, India, Korea, and Japan as well.

A variety of substitutes for animal or human life in sacrifices have also been used. Such “parts-for-the-whole” sacrifices might include the offering of certain parts of the body such as fingers or hair, or blood drawn from one’s own veins. In other cases representations of humans or animals (clay or paper figures) might be constructed and offered in place of living beings.

However, bloodless or nonliving things may also form the substance of the sacrifice. Vegetative materials and foodstuffs, such as fruit, grains, baked goods, oils, alcoholic beverages, and milk products, have been used. Of particular significance in early Hinduism was the libation of soma, a sacred and intoxicating juice used in sacrifice. In Japan today Shinto ceremonies include offerings of rice, sake (rice brandy), fish, fruit, or vegetables as well as money, jewels, or special clothing to the kami or ancestral spirits.

Recipients of sacrifice include, but are not limited to, various divine beings. Monothestic traditions offer sacrifices to the one creator God.
African traditional religions that recognize a High God as the supreme deity nevertheless encourage sacrifices to intermediary beings and spirits who are considered more accessible. In polytheistic and animistic traditions recipients can include almost any being or power that inspires awe or fear, including not only deities but also various spirits, demons, animal guardians, natural objects (such as the sun or volcanoes), and spirits of departed ancestors.

Purpose of the Sacrifice. Some sacrifices seem to be intended as expressions of thanksgiving for benefits received, such as a bountiful harvest or victory in war. More common are sacrifices of supplication, in which a specific good is desired and the sacrifice is a means toward its realization. The desired benefit can be a material good (such as good crops, children, health, entrance into a desired school) or an intangible blessing (forgiveness for some transgression, inner peace, courage). Sacrifice can assume the form of a transaction between the sacrificer and the recipient—do ut des ("I give so that you will give in return"). Skillful manipulation of the sacrifice thus ensures well-being for the individual or group.

Sacrifices can be used to ward off undesirable consequences of action in this life. In Chinese folk religion, for example, one must be careful in construction and land development not to offend the many demons or spirits identified with roads, mountains, and fields. Similarly, traditions that give prominence to the ancestor cult emphasize the importance of appeasing the spirits of the dead through ritual presentations of food, drink, or other valued objects.

Missiological Significance. While many of the rituals of sacrifice in non-Christian religions will be incompatible with the teachings of Scripture, the phenomenon of sacrifice itself can serve as a point of contact between indigenous beliefs/practices and Christian faith. The practice of sacrifice implicitly recognizes that our present lives are in an undesirable state and that something must be offered to a superior being or power in order to attain a better state. Building on this insight the missionary can lead the other persons to acknowledge their deepest need for a restored relationship with God and then introduce them to the only truly effective Sacrifice—Jesus Christ, the perfect Lamb of God.

See also Atonement; Soteriology in Non-Christian Religions.

---

Saint Vincent and Grenadines

Saint Helena (United Kingdom Crown Colony) (Est. 2000 pop.: 6,000; 412 sq. km. [159 sq. mi.]). An island of volcanic origin in the southern Atlantic Ocean. It is well-known as the place of Napoleon’s exile and death. Eurafrican Whites make up 80 percent of the population, the rest being British and Americans. The vast majority are Anglicans, with a significant evangelical movement among these. Smaller groups include Baptists, the Salvation Army, and Seventh-Day Adventists.

Todd M. Johnson

Saint Kitts and Nevis (Est. 2000 pop.: 41,000; 261 sq. km. [101 sq. mi.]). A former British colony in the northern Leeward Islands, Saint Kitts has an almost entirely Afro-Caribbean population. The island was dependent on sugar production until the collapse of world prices left it reliant on foreign aid and tourism. Isolated from the influences that have altered the culture of island groups like the Bahamas, the Caymans, and the Dutch island, Saint Kitts is 95 percent Protestant, but only 10 percent evangelical.

Everett A. Wilson

See also Caribbean.

Saint Lucia (Est. 2000 pop.: 152,000; 622 sq. km. [240 sq. mi.]). Part of the British Caribbean Windward (southern) Islands, St. Lucia has close developmental ties to Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, but remains quite different religiously and linguistically. Although a British crown colony since the 1790s and officially an English-speaking population, a large proportion speak French Creole Patois, and three-quarters are Roman Catholic. Protestants constitute 18 percent of the population.

Everett A. Wilson

See also Caribbean.

Saint Vincent and Grenadines (Est. 2000 pop.: 117,000; 388 sq. km. [150 sq. mi.]). A former British colony, Saint Vincent is located between Saint Lucia and Grenada at the southern end of the Windward Islands. The population is 85 percent Afro-Caribbean with a substantial East Indian minority. Less Protestant than a number of other former British possessions, the people are 20 percent Roman Catholic.

Everett A. Wilson
SAINT VINCENT AND GRENADINES

SEE ALSO Caribbean.

Salvador Conference (1996). The 1996 Conference of the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism (CWME), which convened in Brazil, had the theme "Called to One Hope—The Gospel in Diverse Cultures." The objective was to discuss the results of a worldwide five-year study of the ways in which cultures and the gospel have influenced each other over the centuries (see also Gospel and Culture). Particular attention was given to authentic Witness within each culture, the gospel and cultural identity, local congregations in pluralist societies, and diverse expressions of the one gospel. The issue of religious Pluralism was largely avoided.

After considerable debate the delegates (over six hundred from more than eighty countries) retained commitment to the document "Mission and Evangelism: An Ecumenical Affirmation," which had been adopted by the WCC Central Committee in 1982. Even so, some delegates and officials suggested that this document was now outdated and needed to be replaced. The keynote statement by Bishop Lesslie Newbigin that the specific responsibility of the church was "to bear witness to the reality of Jesus' victory who by his ministry, death and resurrection has broken the powers that oppress us" drew the largest ovation of the entire conference. This responsibility, he added, "has to be the center of our mission."

ARTHUR F. GLASER

Salvation. The scriptural words for "salvation" in Hebrew and Greek refer to deliverance from any danger or distress. This article is concerned with salvation in its missiological context. So, it deals with salvation only as it relates to the rescue of humans from the cause and effects of Sin.

The History of Redemption. Sin entered the world through Satan's tempting of the first humans (Gen. 3; James 1:13). Adam and Eve yielded to Satan and chose to rebel against God by sinning. The effects of sin on Adam and Eve were: the loss of fellowship with God, the corruption of their entire being, their exposure to God's wrath and punishment including a life of misery, inevitable death and eternal separation from him (see Gen. 3:8, 24; Isa. 59:1–2; Gen. 6:5; Rom. 3:1–10; 8:7–8; Eph. 2:1–3; Job 5:7; Isa. 57:21; Rom. 5:14; 6:23; see also FALL OF HUMAN KIND). Adam stood as the representative of all his descendants. The consequences of his decision not to follow God were to affect forever his descendants and the world for good or for evil. All humankind has been affected by the consequences of the sin of its representative, and the fruit of which has been transmitted to each one through the process of birth (see Rom. 5:12; 1 Cor. 15:22; Ps. 51:5; 58:3; John 3:6). As a result, none of Adam's heirs are perfect. They are under God's righteous judgment (Ezek. 18:4; Rom. 1:18–20; 3:23).

The Bible, though, reveals from the very beginning God's response to sin as a gracious plan to reverse the horror of evil. Sin's instigator, Satan, would be crushed by one of Eve's male descendants (Gen. 3:15). Through subsequent revelations and the initiating of symbolic animal sacrifices, God taught the descendants of Adam that he loved them and would accept them if they dealt with their sins according to his will (Gen. 4:1–16; 6:8–9; Job 1:1–5; Heb. 1:1). His gracious plan of redemption has always been applied to sinners through the channel of Faith (Gen. 15:6; Heb. 2:4; Rom. 1:17; 3:19–26; Eph. 2:8, 9). And true, saving faith was always distinguished from a temporary or merely intellectual faith—which could not save (Heb. 11; Luke 8:13; James 2:19).

Later in Moses' record of human history, God called Abraham and promised to produce a nation through him and through his descendants God would bless all the nations (Gen. 12:1–3; 15:1–6; 17:6–7; Rom. 4:18–22; see also ABRAHAMIC COVENANT). The rest of the Old Testament is a complex history of how God in his providence graciously fulfilled that promise in ways that teach, help, and encourage believers of all ages (Rom. 15:4; 1 Cor. 10:6, 11; 2 Tim. 3:14–16).

He gave to Abraham many children (see Gen. 12–50) who "were fruitful and multiplied greatly and became exceedingly numerous, so that the land [of Egypt] was filled with them" (Exod. 1:7). Though they were populous enough to be a nation, they needed to have their own land, culture, and leadership to become a lasting, viable nation (see Exodus through Joshua). God led them to the land of Canaan through Moses and established them in the Promised Land through a faithful and courageous leader: Moses [whose name means "The Lord Delivers" and in Greek is the name Jesus]. Though warned of the consequences, the children of Israel rebelled against the Lord and his prophets and were sent into exile. In God's wonderful grace they were miraculously returned from exile into their own land, rebuilt their temple, and awaited the coming of the Promised One (see Judges through Malachi).

When the time was perfect "God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law" (Gal. 4:4a). He was the reality toward which all the Old Testament animal sacrifices symbolically pointed. So upon seeing him, John declared, "Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!" (John 1:29). Jesus was "the Lamb slain from the creation of the world” (Rev. 13:8). It was he who revealed his future coming to Abraham (John 8:56), to Moses (Deut. 18:15; Heb. 11:26), to the wandering Israelites (Heb. 4:2), to David (Acts 2:25–31), and to many others. Jesus taught that the Old Testament pointed to him (Luke 24:25–27, 44) and it was not until his followers understood this that they could understand the [OT] Scriptures (Luke 24:45) because “these are the Scriptures that testify about me,” he claimed (John 5:39).

An angel told Joseph to name Mary’s son “Jesus, because he will save his people from their sins” (Matt. 1:21). To accomplish salvation Jesus had to live perfectly under God’s law as a human and then willingly substitute his own life as a payment for the penalty that sin demands (Heb. 2:14–15; 2 Cor. 5:21). So, Jesus lived perfectly under the law—without ever sinning (Heb. 4:15; 1 John 3:5). He alone could look at his enemies and say, “Can any of you prove me guilty of sin?” (John 8:46). And at the end of his perfect life, in the most amazing expression of love ever shown, he subjected himself to the wrath and curse of God on the cross, dying in the place of sinners (Rom. 5:8; Gal. 3:12–14; Matt. 27:45–46).

It was only through a perfect God-Man, substituting himself and paying the debt that sin demands from God’s justice, that human sinners could be saved. There is no other possible way of salvation (John 14:6; Acts 4:12; Rom. 3:19–26; Gal. 2:21; 3:21). All that Jesus did, he did “to seek and to save what was lost” (Luke 19:10).

Following Jesus’ substitutionary death, God raised him from the dead, proving to all that he accepted his Son’s life and sacrifice, and forever establishing the truthfulness of all of Christ’s claims (Rom. 1:4; Acts 2:22–24; Phil. 2:5–11). After appearing to hundreds of disciples over a period of several weeks, Jesus physically ascended into heaven. The apostles who saw all of these things were transformed by the Spirit into courageous witnesses who traveled throughout the world proclaiming the good news of salvation through Jesus and making disciples. They taught the disciples to do the same until the return of Jesus (Acts 1:1–11; 1 Cor. 15:1–8; Acts 2:4; 8:1–4; 14:21–23; 1 Cor. 10:31–11:1; Phil. 4:9; Matt. 24:14). As the Son of Man, Jesus is now seated at the right hand of God’s throne where he sovereignly directs the affairs of all creation and represents his children until his return (Matt. 28:16–20; Heb. 7:22–26; 1 John 2:1; 1 Thess. 4:13–18).

This brief summary of the Old and New Testament story is given to show that the Bible is primarily a Book that reveals the history of salvation. Scripture is the story of God’s saving love. It primarily depicts how God prepared the world for the First Coming of his Son and what he has done and is doing to prepare the world for the Second Coming of Jesus Christ.

Missiological Application. The term “salvation” in the Scriptures is a complex concept, not used solely of the conversion of individuals. Salvation in its broad scriptural use is something that has a past, present, and future sense. God’s children have been saved (Rom. 8:24; Eph. 2:8; Titus 3:5), are being saved (1 Cor. 1:18; 2 Cor. 12:15), and shall be saved (Rom. 5:9–10; 13:11; 1 Thess. 5:8; Heb. 9:28; 1 Peter 1:4, 5). Western evangelicalism strangely stresses the past tense with almost no emphasis on the present and future. Missionaries and missiologists should question how significantly Western culture has influenced today’s quick-and-easy, low commitment presentations of the gospel.

Scripture also speaks of salvation as impacting one’s entire being forever. God’s children have been, are being, and shall be saved from sin, self, and Satan. The process of salvation, then, is lifelong and consummated only when believers are perfected in the likeness of the Savior at the resurrection. This challenges the emphasis of some who equate salvation with merely “making a decision for Christ.” It is far more than a simple decision to not want to go to hell sometime in the future. While it involves a personal choice, a true commitment to Christ is not merely a momentary, spiritual issue regarding one’s eternal destiny and having little to do with here and now. True conversion will affect all of life. Its many implications should be articulated by the witness and understood by the hearer before a call for commitment is ever made.

Paul was concerned with some who misrepresented Jesus because the preaching of another Jesus also produced another gospel—one that could not save (see 2 Cor. 11:4; Gal. 1:6–9). Missiology must be greatly concerned with how Jesus is proclaimed today since it is only through him that salvation can occur. Jesus declared that the correct perception of him and his saving work was as the Messiah promised by God (Matt. 16:13–17).

According to the Old Testament, the promised Messiah would save his people by fulfilling three functions: he would be a divine Prophet (Deut. 18:15), Priest (Ps. 110:4; Isa. 53:4–12; Zech. 6:13) and King (Ps. 2; 2 Sam. 7:16; Ps. 89:3–4). The apostles used the messianic Old Testament passages to prove that Jesus was the Messiah and to describe the salvation that was offered through him (see Acts 2:29–31, 36; 3:17–18, 22–23; 4:25–27). Instead of saying, “Accept Jesus as your personal Savior,” the apostles proclaimed that the multitudes should accept Jesus as their divine Prophet, Priest and King.

Is this an insignificant difference from the way evangelism is often done today? Not so if today’s presentation carves away Christ’s role as Prophet.
Salvation

and King over his children. Many might gladly accept him as their sin-bearing Savior who might not be so quick to accept him as their Guide and submit to him as their King! Missionaries and missiologists should take a close look at who the Jesus is that is being proclaimed and what level of commitment is being made by those who are responding.

The Great Commission involves salvation and is a command to make disciples (Matt. 28:18–20). In the early church every believer was expected to quickly become a disciple (Acts 6:1; 14:21–23). Summarizing how disciples are made, Jesus mentioned the importance of Baptism. Though it does not suit today’s evangelical custom, the New Testament very closely relates conversion and baptism as linked together in the normal process of salvation (see Acts 8:12; 18:8; 22:16; Rom. 6:3; 1 Peter 3:21). When asked by a crowd what they should do to be saved, Peter responded, “Repent and be baptized . . . for the forgiveness of your sins” (Acts 2:38). Did Peter understand how to evangelize? The Holy Spirit thought he did and saved 3,000 people! Why did Peter combine baptism with repenting? Perhaps he was seeking to fulfill the Great Commission as he had been taught. Baptism in the New Testament, though not an essential component for salvation (see John 3:16, 36, etc.), was an important element of the process of true conversion and was normative in the early church. Missionaries and missiologists should explore much more fully the commitment as important elements of New Testament discipling. They should continually warn the church of the consequences of exporting Western styles of evangelism that do not follow apostolic patterns.

Edward N. Gross

Salvation Army. The Salvation Army was created by William (and Catherine) Booth in 1878 by restructuring an evangelistic mission they had started thirteen years before in London. The new movement stressed the reality of Spiritual Warfare, but it drew as well upon the contemporary popularity of military uniforms, parades, and brass bands. It developed rapidly in England over the next two years.

The Army’s pioneer leaders were committed to evangelize among the “submerged tenth” of urban society, the marginalized and poverty-stricken who they believed had been overlooked by other forms of Christian outreach. Although their view of the activities of other Christians was too narrow, the early Salvationists were sincere and gave themselves completely to the crusade. From the start the Army’s leaders supplemented their evangelistic appeal by small-scale charitable activities. This was partly in response to the teachings of Christ in passages like Matthew 7:12 and 25:34–40, and partly out of the conviction that persons attracted by the prospect of temporal relief would be available, and willing, to listen to the gospel. Some of these early programs achieved permanent success. The Army’s Adult Rehabilitation Center program, for instance, is the world’s largest residential rehabilitation program for homeless alcoholics. The Army’s worldwide network of day-care centers, summer camps, and senior-citizen programs is efficient, popular, and respected by clients and professionals.

The Army took a worldwide view of its mission almost from the start. An early song proclaimed, “We’ll march our Army thro’ the world, And set the nations free.” The first country outside the British Isles to be invaded by the Salvation Army was the United States (1880), where the Army eventually gained respect and popularity after struggling against public misunderstanding, a pattern seen in other countries as well. By the time of William Booth’s death in 1912 the Army was established in nineteen countries and colonies of the British Empire and in twenty-one other countries, including Scandinavia, Germany, the Netherlands, France, and Switzerland.

Persons who are familiar only with the Salvation Army’s local relief activities may be surprised by the scale of its present operations. As of 1996, the Army conducted its evangelistic and relief ministry in 103 countries, including in the former Soviet Union. The Army preached the gospel in 160 different languages—including 23 within the United States alone. The international organization included 17,389 officers (clergy, of whom 3,645 were American, including the current general, Paul A. Rader, chosen in July 1994) and 858,694 senior soldiers (full-time adult lay members, of whom 83,690 were American).

Because the Army requires a strict code of obedience and sacrifice of its officers and soldiers, their numbers are not large, considering the scale of the Army’s worldwide religious and social service operations. General Rader has called for an international campaign to increase the number of soldiers to one million, a goal which will require great effort, but which Army leaders regard as essential if the movement is to expand its operations into new areas.

Edward McKinley

Bibliography. _The Salvation Army Yearbook_; E. McKinley, _Marching to Glory._
San Antonio Conference (1989). The WCC San Antonio conference had as its theme “Your Will Be Done: Mission in Christ’s Way.” It proved to be the most representative of CWME conferences, with solid numbers of women, Third World delegates, Catholic and evangelical observers, and an orthodox moderator.

Meeting six months before the Berlin Wall was dismantled, delegates from the Soviet Union were able to talk of the greater openness in their country and the importation of a quarter of a million Bibles. The conference was planned so that the voices of those not normally heard could be given maximum publicity. Worship and Bible study were integral parts of the conference, which divided into four sections that together reflected the fullness of the gospel. “Turning to the Living God” placed emphasis on the need to equip local congregations for the task of proclaiming the gospel and eliciting a search for personal faith, noting that the two-way relationship between mission and dialogue needed further study. The section on “Participating in Suffering and Struggle” sought to explore “the creative power of the Spirit in transforming people who suffer into those who struggle”; the question was raised as to how “resistance” could be part of mission in Christ’s way. The section on “The Earth Is the Lord’s” explored the reality that within many communities access to and ownership of the land was a key mission issue. “Towards Renewed Communities in Mission” emphasized the need to work out new patterns of partnership in mission that would be an authentic sign of gospel koinonia.

The conference affirmed that responding to the realities of the human struggle for justice as well as respect for God’s creation was part of mission, “just as inviting people to put their trust in God is part of that mission.” It affirmed a holistic view of the inseparability of the material and the spiritual, as seen in the ministry of Jesus, and that to withhold from the poor both justice and good news was to commit against them a “double injustice.” In part because of the affirmation of the need to share the gospel, evangelical delegates met on several occasions during the conference to draft a letter of support from the San Antonio program to the Manila Conference sponsored by the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization.

The San Antonio Conference seems to have proved a nourishing experience for those who attended, though it has been accused of so overloading the language of mission and evangelism that their particular meanings became submerged in a more general agenda. That said, a number of evangelicals were disappointed that more of San Antonio’s concerns did not more obviously feed into the Canberra Assembly of the World Council.

JOHN H. Y. BRIGGS

See also World Council of Churches Conferences.

San Marino (Est. 2000 pop.: 27,000; 61 sq. km [24 sq. mi.]). The Republic of San Marino’s area is mostly devoted to agricultural enterprises around Mount Titano. Two Italian regions, Emilia-Romagna and Marche-Montefeltro, surround the independent and neutral nation.

A stonemason named Marinus, according to legend, founded the community about A.D. 301. He had fled Arbe in Dalmatia because of Diocletian’s persecution of Christians. The district was a safe haven and has maintained that tradition. San Marino accepts refugees from any sort of tyranny or persecution.

The population is primarily Sammarinese and Italians. Roman Catholicism is dominant, but marginal groups like the Baha’i and Jehovah’s Witnesses work in San Marino.

KEITH E. ETTEL

Bibliography. D. B. Barrett, WCE; P. Johnstone, OW.

Sanctuary Movement. A sanctuary is a sacred place such as a temple, church, or mosque, which is recognized as a safe area for fugitives or criminals. Such places were known among the Greeks, Romans, and Hebrews (Num. 35:6–34). The right of sanctuary in a church was a common practice in medieval Europe, but with the growth of nation-states and more efficient systems of justice the tradition was discontinued.

The twentieth century witnessed the revival of this approach in the United States as many Christians felt that it was their mission to help illegal aliens escape from the injustices of global capitalism. These groups focused on aiding refugees who were fleeing their homelands in Central America. Due to the efforts of conservative governments to crush opposition and cooperate with multinational companies, these displaced people were forced to come to the United States to escape torture and death.

In 1982 Jim Corbett, a Quaker, and John Fife, pastor of the Southside Presbyterian Church in Tucson, joined with several others to start sanctuary churches. By 1986 over three hundred Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish groups had joined the movement and it had been recognized by such national bodies as the United Methodist Church and the Presbyterian Church, U.S.A. In addition to claiming religious and ethical precedents for their actions they cited the example of the “underground railroad” for escaped slaves as an example of civil disobedience. They also claimed that the immigration laws were unfairly enforced and that they contradicted the 1967 United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, which the United States had signed. On January 14, 1985, sixteen sanctuary workers were indicted for their assistance to illegal aliens and eight were later convicted but given suspended sentences. The trial of these individuals put the movement under considerable strain. Nevertheless it continued not only because it involved acts of compassion toward helpless people but also because it involved the relation of the Christian faith to nationalism and of individual conscience to the law.
Sanctuary Movement

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

Sanders, J. Oswald (1902–80). New Zealand missionary leader. Sanders, first general director of the OVERSEAS MISSIONARY FELLOWSHIP, was born in Invercargill, New Zealand, on October 17, 1902. Converted in his childhood, he committed himself to Christian service at a convention, and attended the recently formed New Zealand Bible Training Institute in Auckland, where he made such an impression that he was invited onto its staff and eventually became its superintendent. In 1946 he was appointed as Australian representative of the China Inland Mission. That mission was soon thrown into disarray when its missionaries were expelled from China in the early 1950s. The appointment of Sanders in 1954 brought to its helm a calm and incisive leader, who reorganized the CIM into the OVERSEAS MISSIONARY FELLOWSHIP, sensitively expanded its ministry both on the field and in its “home countries,” and pioneered the acceptance of Asians into the mission. He retired in 1969, but before his death in 1980 he served extensively in Bible College leadership, writing, and a worldwide preaching ministry. His first book was The Divine Art of Soul Winning, published in 1937. More than twenty-five books followed, including the well known Spiritual Leadership (1967), all combining strong faith with common sense. He was married first to Edith Mary Dobson in 1931, and after her death, to Mary Miller. He set the São Tomé and Príncipe (Est. 2000 pop.; 146,000; 964 sq. km. [372 sq. mi.]). Two large and several smaller islands 200 km. (120 mi.) off the west coast of Africa. As early as the end of the fifteenth century, the main islands of São Tomé and Príncipe were used as supply posts for Portuguese ships en route to India. Catholic work was undertaken from 1534, and in 1993 the population was estimated to be 97 percent Christian (4.9% Protestant, 91.9% Catholic, 0.1% marginal). Protestant work was initiated indigenously by an Anglican exiled to São Tomé in 1930. Protestants in Angola (also a former Portuguese colony) sent missionaries in 1957 and 1960.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Satan. The basic meaning of the word “satan” is “accuser”; the verb from which it is derived is used six times in the Old Testament (Pss. 38:20; 71:13; 109:4; 20, 29; Zech. 3:1) with that meaning. The term can also mean “adversary” or “slanderer.” In Zechariah it refers to an accusation made by Abishai against Shimei, which is true but not slanderous. However, in the five Psalm passages it is used of slander. Context determines its meaning.

The noun is used occasionally in the Old Testament of humans. David is the first human in the Old Testament called a “satan” (1 Sam. 29:4), meaning in context “an adversary.” Others include Abishai (2 Sam. 19:22), Solomon’s military enemies (1 Kings 5:4), Hadad of Edom (1 Kings 11:14), and Rezon of Syria (1 Kings 11:23, 25).

It is also used of celestial beings in the Old Testament. In Job 1 and 2, Satan is referred to fourteen times in the role of God’s adversary in the discussion about Job. In Zechariah 3:1–2, Satan stands at the right hand of the angel of the Lord to accuse Joshua the high priest. Of the almost twenty celestial references to Satan as an adversary of God, every instance but one uses the article “the” with the word referring to “the Satan.” This designates a particular adversary. The one case in which a celestial satan is not hostile to God is in Numbers 22:22, where that adversary is an angel (32) who is acting on God’s behalf. Of the Old Testament references to celestial adversaries only once is the word used without an article and thus appears to be a proper name: “Satan stood up against Israel and incited David to number Israel” (1 Chron. 21:1).

Satan is referred to much more frequently in the intertestamental literature, the Apocryphal, and Pseudepigrapha, than in the Old Testament. This may be because of the feeling that God had abandoned the Jews because of their sin, destroying the temple with its Most Holy Place. The Jewish people thus transcendentalized God and allowed for much more evil activity between heaven and earth than in earlier religious belief.
Surrogate terms such as Asmodeus, Azazel, Belial, Satanail, Mastema, and Semjaza are commonly used in this literature to designate Satan.

The Hebrew (Old Testament) word “satan” never appears in the New Testament, which uses instead a transliterated form of the Aramaic word satanas in its thirty-five occurrences. However, the Aramaic term is usually translated Satan in English versions of the New Testament, the same as the Hebrew word in the Old Testament. Equally often in appearance in the New Testament is the Greek word diabolos, translated devil. This is not a different term, only a Greek translation in the Septuagint of the Hebrew word satan. Thus, its meaning is the same. In Revelation 12:9, both terms, Aramaic and Greek, are used to refer to the great dragon John saw in his revelation: “and the great dragon was thrown down, that ancient serpent, who is called the Devil and Satan.” The word “devil” never appears in the Hebrew Old Testament.

Unlike the Old Testament, the New Testament always uses the word “satan” (adversary) to refer to Satan, the greatest enemy of God and Christ. Almost half (15) of the 35 occurrences of the word in the New Testament are in the Gospels. It appears only twice in Acts, 10 times in Paul’s letters, and 8 times in Revelation.

The New Testament, like the intertestamental literature, uses other words for Satan (2 Cor. 12:7) and the devil (Matt. 4:1). These include Beelzebul (Mark 3:22), Belial (2 Cor. 6:15), and possibly Abaddon and Apollyon (Rev. 9:11). Additionally, metaphors are frequently used to describe Satan, including the terms Strong Man (Matthew 12:29), Evil One (Eph. 6:16), the Destroyer (1 Cor. 10:10), the Tempter (Matt. 4:3), the Accuser (Rev. 12:10), and the Enemy (1 Cor. 15:25).

Some animal metaphors are used of Satan: the Serpent (Rev. 12:9), the Dragon (Rev. 12:7), and the Lion (1 Peter 5:8; 2 Tim. 4:17). He is also referred to in cosmic terminology as the Prince of Demons (Matt. 9:34), the Ruler of this World (John 12:31), the Prince of the Power of the Air (Eph. 2:2), and the God of this World (2 Cor. 4:4).

The origin of Satan is never revealed in the Bible. Since dualism is not an acceptable biblical postulate for a co-eternal existence of God and Satan (Satan is referred to in the Bible only in male terminology, as are also the angels), Satan’s origin must be accounted for as a created being. Isaiah 14:12 speaks of the “Day Star, son of Dawn” as “fallen from heaven” and Ezekiel 28:13 contains the phrase “you were in Eden, the garden of God . . . with an anointed guardian cherub . . . on the holy mountain of God . . . and the guarding cherub drove you out from the midst of the stones of fire . . . .” Some see the origins of Satan in these passages. However, in the immediate context, Isaiah is writing a taunt against the king of Babylon, and Ezekiel is describing the fate of the king of Tyre. Whether these are allegorical allusions to Satan as well is debatable.

Somewhat parallel passages in the New Testament may provide some insight into the question of the origin of evil angels. Peter speaks of angels sinning and being “cast into hell committing them to pits of nether gloom to be kept until the judgment” (2 Peter 2:4). The expression “cast into hell” is literally in Greek “tartarize them.” Jude writes: “And the angels that did not keep their own position but left their proper dwelling have been kept by him in eternal chains in the nether gloom until the judgment of the great day” (Jude 1:6 rsv).

Since Matthew refers to the devil and his angels, it is conceivable that the devil is himself a disobedient angel and the destiny of both is the “eternal fire” which is “prepared for them” (Matt. 25:41). Thus their destiny, if not their origin, is clear. However, Genesis has Satan present in the beginning of human creation tempting Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3:1; cf. 2 Cor. 11:3). He is in the form of a serpent on this occasion. That the serpent is indeed Satan is clearly stated in Revelation 12:9: “And the great dragon was thrown down, that ancient serpent, who is called the Devil and Satan, the deceiver of the whole world—he was thrown down to the earth, and his angels were thrown down with him” (cf. Rev. 20:2).

Satan’s power has always been limited by the will of God. Job was allowed to be afflicted by Satan, but only to the extent allowed by God. Even though Satan has the power of death (Heb. 2:14), the use of that power is subject to the will of the Almighty. Even though Satan had the kingdoms of the world within his power and could deliver them to Jesus at his temptation (Matt. 4:9), that power was derived from God (Luke 4:6) and these kingdoms are under his influence only because they have chosen to sin and follow Satan rather than God. “The whole world is in the power of the evil one” (1 John 5:19 rsv). But, “The Evil One cannot touch” those who are born of God and do not “go on sinning” as a way of life but remain dedicated to serving him (1 John 5:18).

Satan is responsible not only for tempting humans to sin against God but also for leading cosmic powers to influence the church toward disunity which Jesus said would cause the world to disbelieve in him (John 17:21). Thus, Paul writes that through the church the manifold wisdom of God is made known to the principalities and powers in the heavenly places (Eph. 3:10). In the first four chapters of this Ephesian letter Paul is arguing for the unity of Jews and Gentiles in the body of Christ, among other reasons because of its comic implications. The price of a divided church is a disbelieving world.
Satan

Satan is popularly but erroneously called Lucifer. This name does not appear in the Bible. The English term Lucifer is a translation of the Hebrew and Greek words for “light bringer,” meaning “light bringer,” which refers to the morning star or day star, Venus. The word appears in Isaiah 14:12 where Isaiah tauntingly calls the king of Babylon “Day Star, son of Dawn” because symbolically he has fallen from his position of power in the evening so soon after having arisen in the morning. In the history of biblical exegesis this passage was connected with Luke 10:18 in which Jesus said, “I saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven” and the word Lucifer came to be widely used as another name for Satan.

With the recent rise of interest in Satan and satanism in the West (see SATANIST, SATANISM), as well as an awareness of spiritual orientation of much of the rest of the world, it is crucial for missionaries from every culture to be aware of Satan and his schemes. Though there are excesses, the contemporary rise of the Spiritual Warfare movement is therefore a welcome development in mission. A mission theology of Satan and his work across cultural contexts is in the process of formation, and ensuring that it is biblically founded rather than experientially formed will remain a priority for missiologists in the future.

JOHN MCRAY

Satanist, Satanism. The medieval church equated all forms of witchcraft and paganism with satanism and resorted to witchcraft trials to suppress such practices. During the twentieth century, a new form of revitalized paganism sought to differentiate between pagans, who worship the Mother Goddess, and satanists, who worship the Christian devil or at least the ideas that he represents.

Practices associated with satanism include celebration of the black Mass, the desecration of sacred objects, animal sacrifices, black magic, malevolent sorcery, and the reputed murder, mutilation, or rape of human victims. These rituals draw on the power of Satan to realize a worshiper’s pragmatic and hedonistic purposes.

Followers of satanism fall into three categories. First are those who want to explore the realities of the so-called black arts, or those social rebels who want to shock others by embracing the forbidden world of Satan. The second consists of individuals who want to do evil and who draw on the metaphors and practices associated with malevolent sorcery and evil power. Such individuals usually act alone or in secret groups bent upon criminal or destructive activities. A third group are those who openly worship Satan and are members of a satanic church such as the Church of Satan founded by Anton LaVey or the Temple of Set.

Since the 1970s there has been widespread fear over the existence of a coordinated network of evil satanic cults that are rumored to engage in sexual orgies, cannibalism, blasphemy, and ritual murders of infants, some of which have been especially bred for this purpose. Members of this cult are alleged to be prominent citizens and well-placed leaders of the community who are involved in a nationally and internationally coordinated conspiracy dedicated to the subversion of society. They are believed to be responsible for the ritual deaths of tens of thousands of persons per year, but law enforcement agencies have never been able to uncover any credible evidence to support the existence of such an organization or their practices.

DOUGLAS J. HAYWARD

Saturation Church Planting. Saturation church planting methodology takes seriously the GREAT COMMISSION’s injunction to make disciples of all nations (Matt. 28:18–20). It adopts the strategy of mobilizing the entire body of Christ in whole countries in the effort to reach the goal of the Great Commission in each country by providing an evangelical congregation for every village, neighborhood, and kind and condition of people in the population.

The strategy recognizes that world evangelization can never be attained apart from providing visible congregations of redeemed people among every PEOPLE GROUP in the world. Saturation church planting recognizes that no single type of church can provide the needed resources for evangelizing an entire population. Jim Montgomery calls for a comprehensive, systematic plan in each country to mobilize the church to push toward the goal of evangelizing whole nations.

Saturation church planting also takes seriously the truth that every population, even in organized states, actually represents what Donald McGavran termed a “vast mosaic” of different groups of people, each with a different worldview and culture. Indonesia, for example, has some 360 distinct people groups among its millions of people. Even these groups can easily be subdivided.

To reach the people in all the groups demands a vast diversity of churches to match the vast diversity of peoples. Saturation church planting provides the strategy for providing this needed diversity.

The methodology understands that the evangelization of whole nations is rooted in the comprehensive purpose of God. This plan is seen in the Old Testament (Gen. 18:18; 22:17–18; 26:4; 1 Kings 8:43; Ps. 102:15; Isa. 45:22) as well as in the New Testament (Matt. 28:18–20; Acts 26:16–18; Rom. 16:26; 2 Peter 3:9; Rev. 15:4). Saturation church planting takes seriously this plan for discipling whole nations and all nations.

The method is enunciated most thoroughly in Jim Montgomery’s plan of DAWN (DISCIPLING A WHOLE NATION). This strategy calls for 7 million churches by A.D. 2000. If this goal is to be reached, the important place of house churches and unpaid workers must be stressed.

To evangelize the nations demands such a strategy as envisioned in DAWN and a commitment to a church among every people in order to bring whole nations to Christ. Every other strategy should be judged in relation to how it contributes to the goal of discipling whole nations and all nations.

EBBIE C. SMITH

Bibliography. B. Fitts, Saturation Church Planting: Multiplying Congregations Through House Churches; J. Montgomery; DAWN 2000: 7 Million Churches to Go; D. A. McGavran, Understanding Church Growth; E. C. Smith, Balanced Church Growth; C. P. Wagner, Church Planting for a Greater Harvest.

Saudi Arabia (Est. 2000 pop.: 21,257,000; 2,149,690 sq. km [829,955 sq. mi.]). Saudi Arabia is the heart of the religious world of Islam and home of more than 21 million people. At Pentecost Arabic was one of the languages heard and this was soon followed by the apostle Paul’s sojourn in Arabia. A despised nomadic tribe called the Salaiba is believed to be the remnants of an early Christian group. By the year 325 six bishops from Arabia attended the Council of Nicea. Shortly after 339 during the persecution by Sapor II, hundreds of Christians fled Persia seeking refuge in Saudi Arabia and established communities throughout the peninsula. The king of the Arabs in Hirtha, north of Qatar on the eastern coast, accepted Christianity in 512. By the year 525 Christianity was well established in Arabia.

However, a gradual decline began and in 570 when the prophet Mohammed was born chaos blanketed the area. A chaotic clash of religions including various Christian sects manifested itself in internal dissension, theological confusion, and lack of spiritual power. This marked the interaction of the Arians, Sabellians, and Nestorians. During the Caliphate of Omar even the tribute tax was no longer accepted. Nearly all who refused to adopt Islam were deported to Iraq. In the eleventh century the remaining Christians in the Hijaz section of Arabia who had not islamized migrated to Jordan and other countries in the north.

In 1811 HENRY MARTYN stopped for a time at Muscat on the southeast corner of Arabia and did some translation work. Ion Keith-Falconer started an independent work on the south coast at Sheik Othman in 1885 and then joined with the church of Scotland but died two years later. SAMUEL ZWEIMER of the Reformed Church of America established work in Basrah in southern Iraq and from there penetrated towns along the perimeter of the coast as well as made tours into the interior.

Schools and medical clinics were established around the perimeter of the Arabian peninsula. The unification of the peninsula under the house of bin Saud has given absolute power over the minds of all. Economic standards have risen from abject poverty. Education is now available to nearly everyone and medical facilities are superb. Almost all of this is now firmly in the hands of the government. This has given new power to resist the entrance of missionaries, Bibles, and even tent makers.

Radio and satellite television transmission is penetrating in an amazing way and positive responses come from all parts of Arabia. The weakness of the chaotic Christian witness led to the eclipse of Christianity and the rapid rise of Islam. Now Islam has a nearly vise-like hold on the minds of people there. A large evangelical workforce is sprinkled throughout Arabia from emerging sending fields such as the Philippines, Korea and Brazil. Many young people have studied abroad and returned with new ideas of the dignity and freedom of the individual. The penetration of radio and TV and the increased number of students studying abroad as well as the large number of believers in the expatriate labor force who are believers there is hope for a change in this most resistant nation.

GEORGE E. KELSEY

Schaeffer’s prolific book-writing career began late in his life with the ground-breaking The God Who Is There (1968) and concluded with The Great Evangelical Disaster (1984). His writing flowed from his concern to communicate the cogency of the Christian worldview to the increasingly post-Christian culture of the West. Hailed as “a missionary to the intellectuals” (although not an academic), Schaeffer engaged the world of culture—literature, cinema, and philosophy—from a full-orbed, evangelical perspective. In this, he inspired many Christians to be more intellectually active in their profession of faith.
Schaeffer, Francis

Schaeffer creatively combined a Reformed view of culture with an emphasis on cultural apologetics. Because Christ is Lord of all of life, Christians must endeavor to transform all of culture for the glory of God. This entails not only exegeting the Bible, but also exegeting culture to discover its intellectual and existential weaknesses and areas of despair. This missiological strategy remains indispensable for the postmodern situation of the West.

DOUGLAS GROOTHUIS

Schereschewsky, Samuel Isaac Joseph (1831–1906). Russian-born missionary to China and Japan. Born into a Jewish family in Tauraggen, Russian Lithuania, Schereschewsky received Jewish education during his teenage years. He left for Frankfort in 1850 and later attended Breslau University, where he became fluent in German. In 1854 he moved to the United States, where he was baptized as a Christian and received theological education. His mastery of several languages, including Hebrew, Russian, German, and English, was deemed an advantage for missionary work in China because of the difficulty of learning Chinese.

In 1859, he left for China as a missionary of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Episcopal Church. He stayed in China for more than two decades, and for almost a decade in Japan, where he died and was buried. He served as Bishop of China between 1877 and 1883. Throughout his missionary career, he made good use of his talent in linguistics for translation of the Bible and prayer books. Working with other China missionaries in Beijing, he completed translation of the Mandarin New Testament in 1872. He also worked with Joseph Edkins translating Matthew into Mongolian by 1872. In 1874 he completed the Old Testament in Mandarin. He also translated prayer books in Mandarin with John Burdon in 1872, and in 1881 he rendered them into the classical Chinese, popularly known as Easy Wenli by his contemporaries. He wrote also four short catechisms in Easy Wenli in 1881. He completed the New Testament in Easy Wenli in 1898, the Pentateuch in 1899, and the whole Bible in 1902. Furthermore, he helped found St. John’s University in Shanghai, which proved to be a major place for nurturing prominent figures in modern China.

TIMOTHY MAN-KONG WONG

Schmidlin, Josef (1876–1944). German pioneer of Roman Catholic missiology. Born on May 29, 1876, in Alsace, Schmidlin was ordained to the Catholic priesthood in 1899, and earned doctorates from Freiburg in philosophy (1901) and theology (1903). After ordination Schmidlin helped the noted historian Ludwig von Pastor with his monumental History of the Popes, and in 1906 was appointed the first private lecturer at the newly founded Catholic theological faculty in Strasbourg. Difficulties there, however, caused him to transfer to Münster, where in 1907 he was appointed lecturer in church history.

In 1910 Schmidlin lectured on Catholic missions in the German protectorates, but soon began the task (greatly helped by Gustav Warneck’s work, though perhaps, as a Catholic, more ecclesial in approach) of constructing a comprehensive Catholic missiology. Subsequently, a chair of Catholic missiology was established at Münster in 1914. A prolific writer, Schmidlin’s best-known books are Catholic Mission Theory and Catholic Mission History. He was editor of Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft (1909–37) and a frequent contributor to many other journals.

Forced to resign his chair at Münster in 1934 because of outspoken opposition to the Nazi regime, Schmidlin was imprisoned and executed on January 10, 1944. He is remembered today as the father of Catholic missiology.

STEPHEN B. BEVANS

Schmidt, Georg (1709–85). German pioneer missionary to South Africa. Born in Kunewalde, Moravia, Schmidt went to Herrnhut after his conversion in 1725 to join the Moravian Brethren. He returned to his homeland to preach but was thrown in jail. After his release he responded to Count Zinzendorf’s request for a missionary to work among the migratory Khoikhoi people at the Cape of Good Hope. Having sailed in 1737 on a Dutch East India Company ship, he journeyed into the interior and settled at Baviaanskloof (later renamed Gernadendal).

Gathering a small band of followers, Schmidt taught them to read and write, established an agricultural community, and provided religious instruction in Dutch. As he had no support from home or European co-workers, he made his living by farming. In 1742 Zinzendorf ordained Schmidt by mail, and he baptized the first five Khoikhoi converts. Since the Dutch Reformed clergy at the Cape would not recognize his ordination and objected to the Moravian teachings, he closed the mission in 1744 and went to Amsterdam to seek official sanction for the work. His tiny congregation waited in vain for his return, as the Dutch East India Company barred the annoying missionary from its territories.
Schmidt spent his later years serving the Brethren in various capacities and finally settled in Niesky, Germany, where he continued to pray regularly for his flock at the Cape. Herrnhut missionaries restarted the work among the Khoikhoi in 1792. They followed Schmidt’s precedent of gathering the congregation on a station, which eventually became the norm for missionary activity in South Africa.

Ulrich van der Heyden and Richard V. Pierard

Scholarship in Mission. See Missiology.

Schreuder, Hans Paludan Smith (1817–82). Norwegian missionary to South Africa. Schreuder was born in Sogndal, Norway, the son of a lawyer. An orthodox Lutheran, he decided in 1836 to become a missionary and studied theology at the University of Oslo. In 1842 he published a widely discussed article that called on the Church of Norway to engage in overseas missions; this appeal resulted in the formation of the Norwegian Missionary Society (NMS). The following year he went to Natal, South Africa, as the society’s first missionary to work among the Zulu. Denied entrance into the Zulu kingdom, he went to China in 1847 where he had no greater success, and after two years he was back in South Africa. King Mpande then allowed him to begin working in the Zulu lands, and within a few years he had founded several stations.

Schreuder was deeply interested in the Zulu language and produced a grammar in 1850. As he developed close ties with the Zulu king, he became involved in politics. In 1866 he was named bishop with responsibility over the NMS fields in Zululand and Madagascar. Feeling hampered by the NMS bureaucracy, he resigned his post in 1872, became an independent missionary, and founded a new society known as “The Church of Norway Mission by Schreuder.” After his death the society established ties with Norwegian-American Luthers who finally took over the field in 1927. Popularly known as the “Apostle of Zululand,” he died at his station Untunjambile.

Schwartz, Christian Friedrich

After release from the war Schrupp was one of the founders of the German IVF (Deutsche Studentenmission). In his spirituality he combined the Brethren’s strong emphasis on the local congregation with the evangelical parachurch movements’ emphasis on evangelism and missions.

In 1948 Erich Sauer called him to be a teacher at Wiedenest Bible School. This was an interdenominational Bible School based on the Brethren Movement in Germany. It was started in 1905 in Berlin as the Alliance Bible School to train Christian workers from and for Eastern Europe.

From 1952 on Wiedenest developed into a major mission sending agency. Schrupp developed his missiological concept of the “sending local church,” combining insights from Brethren missiology with those from the interdenominational FAITH Missions. In his concept, which was effectively applied in his Wiedenest Mission and influenced many other evangelical missions, the “commissioning” of the missionary, but equally for continued material and spiritual support.

Beyond his own mission he was instrumental in the founding of several evangelical cooperative institutions, notably the Arbeitsgemeinschaft Evangelikaler Missionen (Evangelical Missionary Fellowship) in 1969.

Klaus Fielder

Schwartz, Christian Friedrich (1726–98). German pioneer missionary to India. Born in Sonneburg, Prussia, he was left without a mother at a very early age. He entered the University of Halle at twenty, where he was greatly influenced by a missionary who had returned from India. He was eventually chosen to reinforce the work of the Tranquebar Mission. Ordained in 1749, Schwartz and his companions reached South India on July 16, 1750.

Schwartz decided early in his attempts at evangelism that it would be vital for him to know the Indian sacred books. His superior language ability and his readiness to endure hardships paved the way for his ready acceptance both by the common people and at the palace.

In 1766, Schwartz took charge of the new station at Trichinopoly, where he served the rest of his career. He preached faithfully in the city and surrounding villages, quickly forming a congregation. In addition to preaching and teaching, Schwartz showed concern for the people’s physical needs, distributing food to thousands in times of famine.

Schwartz died on February 13, 1798, forty-eight years after his arrival in India. It was said that prince and peasant, soldiers and civilians, Christian, Hindu, and Muslim alike mourned the friend they had lost. Schwartz never married, and when he died left nearly $50,000 to the Indian church. He and the other early Lutheran missionaries earned a reputation in South India for piety, wholehearted devotion to the Lord, and self-sacrificing love for the people.
Schwartz, Christian Friedrich

Stephen Hoke

Bibliography. V. S. Azariah, India and the Christian Movement; H. H. Holcomb, Men of Might in India Missions; P. Thomas, Christianity in India and Pakistan.

Schweitzer, Albert (1875–1965). German theologian, musician, and missionary doctor. Born in Kaysersburg, Alsace (at the time part of Germany), the son of a Lutheran pastor, he studied in Strasbourg, Paris, and Berlin. As a young man he had embarked on a successful academic career; with major works on Bach and Jesus, but he decided in 1906 while serving as a preacher in Strasbourg to become a missionary. He studied medicine, applied to the Paris Evangelical Mission (which reluctantly accepted him because of his highly unorthodox views), and went to Gabon (French Equatorial Africa) in 1913 where he founded a hospital in Lambarene. During World War I he was interned and deported to Europe, where he lectured, gave organ recitals, and continued his writing. During this time he developed his famous “reverence for all life.” In 1924 Schweitzer returned to Lambarene and continued his work as a missionary doctor. Through his writings and subsequent lecture tours he promoted his views on sharing suffering, atoning for crimes and injustice against Africa committed by European Colonialism, and striving for a better world that would be a “realm of harmony.” He received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1952.

Ulrich van der Heyden

Science and Missions. A classical view of science and mission identifies science as one of the main components of the culture of the West, namely, Europe and North America, and mission as reaching other peoples of the world with the Christian message. The relationship between science and mission is, in this view, one aspect of the relationship between Western culture, with its scientific worldview, and non-Western cultures, with their traditional forms of knowledge. This view has lost its dominance in recent times since the West is no longer seen as the exclusive possessor of rationality, and Christianity is losing its influence in the West while it is increasing in other regions of the world. However, mission can still be characterized as the enterprise that brings the light of the gospel to people who live in the darkness of not knowing the living God. And many Christians expect that the benefits of a rational order of life, which are in large measure created by science, will follow as part of the changes related to embracing the gospel.

At the same time, it is widely believed in the West that the Enlightenment brought about by science has shown the irrationality of religion in general and of Christianity in particular. This claim has been debated for centuries, and the various responses to it have shaped Christian theology in a profound way. It is probably fair to say that the main question concerning the relation between science and religion, if we are to judge by the frequency with which it emerges, remains: Is it possible to be rational and have religious beliefs?

We are faced with a paradoxical situation. Science and mission seem to go hand in hand in winning over the non-Western and non-Christian world, while science and Christianity are at odds at the mission’s home base. It is possible, of course, to maintain that the conflict is a consequence of a distorted view of both science and Christianity. For only scientism, an interpretation that grants science prerogatives beyond knowledge validation, condemns religion as the survival of ancient myths from a time of ignorance. However, no matter how well articulated and cogent the argument reconciling science and religion, the knowledge-intensive culture of what used to be the Christian world is not returning Christianity to the prominent place it once had.

There are two important consequences of this situation. First, the West is now a critical field of mission for Christianity. Of course, science is not the only reason, and may not even be the most important one, for the retreat of Christianity in the West. But as we articulate the message of the gospel for a post-Christian, knowledge-intensive society, we must broach anew the issue of the role and authority of science in the culture. In so doing, we must recognize that not only has the position of Christianity in this society changed, but science has also changed. The image of the individual genius wrestling with nature to uncover its secrets was never very accurate, but is much less so today. Science has grown to gigantic proportions and is carried out by large bureaucratic organizations in a complex web of relationships involving government, industry, the military, and the educational sectors. Most scientists are employees, many not even very highly ranked, and can hardly aspire to fill the role of guides of the unenlightened masses that the disputes with the clergy of earlier times suggest. Science or, more descriptively nowadays, technoscience is simply an aspect of production in a complex and differentiated economy. It does not receive its power from being true but from being effective, an outcome that is always contingent.
Scotland

Scotland (78,000 sq. km. [30,116 sq. mi.]). Scottish Christian identity reflects its Celtic roots and historic relationships with England and Ireland, and places farther removed (Norway, France, Germany, Geneva, Rome, the Americas, and the former British Empire). Internal divisions and tribal, geographical, political, economic, and theological strife have left their mark. Scotland's sense of unity has been supported by democratic and egalitarian ideals, spiritual, educational, political, and economic interests, and negatively by antipathy toward the English.

There are traces of Christian presence from Roman times. Evangelization is associated with Ninian around 500, and follows Columba's arrival in Iona in 563. Celtic Christianity was challenged by Roman practices at Whitby in 664, and suffered from Viking invasions around 800. It gave way to English and Roman forms under Queen Margaret (1046–93). Monastic orders and the diocesan organization were extended by her son David I (c. 1085–1153). The medieval period saw frequent wars with England, and an increase in nationalism.

The Reformation brought Scotland politically closer to England and theologically to Geneva. Documents of this period include John Knox's (1514–72) History, the Scots Confession of 1560, and the First and Second Books of Discipline (1560 and 1578). Presbyterian organization reflected a shift of power away from bishops and the crown. Royal attempts to anglicize the church met with resistance in the National Covenant of 1638, and helped draw Scotland into the English civil war. The influence of Scots on the Westminster Confession of 1646 was profound. After the Restoration of 1660, Covenanters were persecuted until the Presbyterian settlement of 1690.

The eighteenth-century Church of Scotland became polarized between a conservative, government-orientated, Moderate party, and Evangelicals, or Populars. This led to a number of secessions. Revivals were experienced in Cambuslang in 1742, and elsewhere. By 1834 Evangelicals had a majority in the General Assembly, but the "Ten Years Conflict" led to the Disruption of 1843 when a third left the Church of Scotland in protest at state interference. Many of the tensions in this period of intellectual ferment, economic growth, and social change, can be seen in the life of Thomas Chalmers (1780–1847). The nineteenth century saw growth in Catholic numbers and in Baptist, Episcopalian, and independent groupings. Christians as a whole responded to opportunities for mission around the world and in the growing cities and deserted Highlands.

Scotland today faces the forces of secularism and spirituality common to Western societies. Like others, Evangelicals share a commitment to the value of education and have their roots in the Reformation, the Covenants, revivals, Calvinism, English Puritanism, and the Disruption. Iona's place in the national spiritual heritage has been rediscovered since its reconstruction and the formation of the Iona Community in 1938.

Theological scholarship remains a strength, despite suspicion about creativity. Others take theological formulations for granted. The social implications of Christianity are generally accepted. Primal religion is often close to the surface. Robert Burns and Walter Scott are enduring humanitarian influences. From 2000, the challenges of political devolution will include the healing of ancient enmities, and for Scots to own responsibility for their future.
Scotland

JOHN ROXBOROUGH

Scott, Peter Cameron (1867–96). Scottish missionary to Kenya and founder of Africa Inland Mission. He was born near Glasgow on March 7, 1867, into a Christian family. They immigrated to the United States in November 1879. He became sick at age nineteen, and was sent back to Scotland to recover. While there, he visited the grave of a younger sister and vowed that if he was healed he would give his life to God's service. His health was restored, but after he returned to the United States he put aside his gravesite promise. Endowed with a gifted singing voice, Scott faced a crisis of the will when deciding whether to apply for an opera chorus position. Reminded of his promise, he rededicated his life to God's service.

He began a three-year training course, but was accepted by the Missionary Alliance before finishing the course. In November 1890 he sailed for West Africa, arriving in January 1891. There he was joined by an older brother who died within a few months. Scott was stricken with fever, and returned to the United States to recover. For the next two years, he studied Africa and determined that East Africa was in great need of mission work.

In 1894 he visited London, and at the grave of Livingstone God gave him a vision and commission for a chain of mission stations stretching across sub-Saharan Africa through which the continent could be reached. He returned to the United States, and formed the Africa Inland Mission (AIM). Its first missionaries departed for Africa in August 1895. The first station was planted on November 17, 1895, at Nzawi near Machakos, Kenya. Within ten months four stations had been planted. Scott died of complications from malaria on December 4, 1896, at the age of twenty-nine. By 1996 AIM had over eight hundred missionaries and was represented in fifteen African countries and several urban centers in the United States.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Bibliography. C. S. Miller, Peter Cameron Scott: The Unlocked Door.

Scottish Mission Boards and Societies. Scotland’s contribution to world mission is related to its experience of mission at home, the role of diaspora Scots in other parts of Britain and around the world, and its changing circumstances as a nation whose history is integral with that of Europe. It is also affected by its Celtic and Calvinist heritage and marked commitment to education.

The evangelization of Scotland was associated with Celtic monasticism and new orders in the medieval period. By the 1500s responsibility for mission had shifted to rulers. Scots had limited opportunities, rulers in no position to extend their territory, no missionary orders, and closed monasteries. Nevertheless the Confession of 1560, and the Westminster Confession and its catechisms, allowed for world mission. In 1698 a doomed attempt at colonization in Central America included Church of Scotland ministers with a missionary mandate. In 1723 Robert Millar of Paisley’s History of the Propagation of Christianity called for mission to pagans. By the 1740s the Society in Scotland for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge (founded in 1709) supported work among North American Indians as well as charity schools in the Scottish Highlands. Education and a bias toward English were common to both. Its annual sermons show Scots thinking about mission into the 19th century.

In 1742 the Cambuslang Revival inspired a call for prayer which helped form the backdrop to the Baptist Missionary Society, founded in England in 1792. Scots were active in the formation of the Missionary Society in London in 1795 (see COUNCIL FOR WORLD MISSION) and provided many of its directors and some of its most notable missionaries including DAVID LIVINGSTONE, John Philip, and JAMES LEGGE. In 1796 the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland declined involvement, but theology students debated the needs of the non-Christian world. Local societies were formed in many places. The Glasgow and Edinburgh societies supported their own missionaries for a time. By 1800 there was little to show for the expenditure of money and lives. Later success depended on persistence, the lessons of experience, and the opening up of new opportunities, particularly after mission in India became legal in 1813. In the early 1820s student societies were founded in all four Scottish universities.

In 1824 the Church of Scotland took steps to engage in missions as the national church. By 1830 ALEXANDER DUFF was headmaster of the Church of Scotland’s school in Calcutta. That year there were in Edinburgh, along with Bible societies, the Scottish SPCK and the Scottish Missionary Society, societies connected with the CMS, the LMS, Moravians, as well as others directed at Jews and for the abolition of slavery. Visiting missionaries, publications, correspondence, and systematic fund raising nurtured interest.
The 1830s were a peak of Scottish recruitment into the LMS. By the 1840s overseas mission was an accepted, though not central, dimension of Christian identity. After the Disruption of 1843 those who left the Church of Scotland for the Free Church were replaced. Livingstone's example as an explorer missionary calling for "Christianity, commerce and civilization" in Africa was widely heeded. The Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society began in 1841.

Duff's belief that a Christian worldview would demolish Hinduism captured people's imagination in Scotland at least, but Hinduism proved resilient. Missionaries who preferred vernacular education to English were vindicated in the long run. Duff's vision that missions were the chief end of the Christian church, and his occupancy of the first chair of mission studies anywhere, set up by the Free Church of Scotland in 1867, give him a place in history. The chair did not last. The elder Duff lacked the magic of his youth, mission work was no longer in question, and future problems were not envisaged. Given the belief that missions should be integrated with other theological disciplines, it was not difficult to believe it could also be left to them. Scots missionaries offered the best of their own experience of salvation, and articulated theologies, which took other religions seriously. A proclivity for higher education often included an appreciation of artisanal skills.

John Wilson engaged in polite debate with Hindus. James Legge became the most important Sinologist of the nineteenth century. J. N. Farghah talked in terms of fulfillment—Christ as the Crown of Hinduism. Mary Slessor achieved in Africa what was still difficult for women in Britain. The World Missionary Conference (Edinburgh 1910) had a strong Scottish flavor. James Hastings' Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics can be seen as a missiological statement. Today the Board of World Mission of the Church of Scotland maintains links with mission fields and offers training back in Scotland. The Council for World Mission, formerly the LMS, has links with the Congregational Union in Scotland and provides a model of post-colonial mission partnership. Roman Catholics share in mission overseas through Catholic orders and through the Scottish Catholic International Aid Fund.

John Roxborough

Scudder, Ida Sophia (1870–1960). American missionary to India from the Reformed Church in America. Born in India, she greatly resisted continuing in the tradition of her famous American missionary medical family yet became a renowned pioneer in medical mission work. What began in 1895 with a vision to meet the medical needs of women in India grew into an internationally acclaimed medical institution in Vellore. Initially establishing a hospital and medical training institution for women, Ida initiated "Roadside" clinics that grew into a highly organized system of mobile clinics. In 1959 alone, "roadside" treatment was extended to 92,756 patients. Gifted as a fundraiser; she founded a medical school for women in 1913 that was later transformed in 1938 into a coeducational institution. Her most daring challenge, the Christian Medical College and Hospital, stands among leading international institutions.

Besides the mobile dispensary, Scudder introduced a medical college for women, a college of nursing, mobile eye camps, neurology and neurosurgery departments, a cardiothoracic department, a rehabilitation center for leprosy patients, heart surgery, a mental health center, and a rural hospital. Her legacy of commitment to service, training, and research for the needs of India continues today. She died in 1960 greatly honored by the people whom she served.

Robert R. King

Bibliography. R. P. Beaver, American Protestant Women in World Mission; A. Brouwer, Reformed Church Roots; N. Hardesty, Women Called to Witness; D. Luidens, Into all the World; D. C. Wilson, ML, pp. 307–15; idem, Dr. Ida: The Story of Dr. Ida Scudder of Vellore.

Second Language Acquisition. From the time that God confounded the languages at Babel (Gen. 11:7–9) there has existed the necessity for people to learn other languages and cultures. Joseph, for example, learned the language of Egypt so well that when his brothers went to Egypt to get grain they did not realize that Joseph could understand them, since he was speaking a language fluently and using an interpreter to talk with them (Gen. 42:23). At the birth of the church God demonstrated the importance of language by communicating through the disciples in such a way that people heard the message each in their own language (Acts 2:6–12).

God's eternal plan is that people from all languages will worship and serve him (Dan. 7:13–14; Rev. 5:9–10). So, he sends his followers to the uttermost parts of the earth (Acts 1:8), to evangelize and disciple and teach all the peoples of the earth (Matt. 28: 19–20). This task that he has given the church necessitates that we be willing to reach people of all languages and that we be able to communicate clearly with the people in a language they understand in order to disciple and train them. Language learning is clearly part of our mandate.
Second Language Acquisition

Some, however, might assert that only those people gifted in languages should endeavor the task of learning another language. Although a high level of natural ability enables language learning to be more rapid and easier, lack of such ease in learning does not render a person ineffective in learning another language. Anyone who is motivated to learn and who decides to participate with the people of the language and submit to change can achieve at least functional bilingualism given normal aptitude and sufficient opportunity. Even a learner with low aptitude can achieve a good measure of success in the normal use of the language provided the person is well-motivated and has a good opportunity to learn the language (Larson and Smalley, 1974, 3, 51).

Learners with lower language aptitude need to plan to invest greater time, determination, discipline, and effort in language learning and should seek optimum opportunity and resources for learning. There are classes and training programs designed to help prepare potential learners for entry into another language and culture. These pre-field classes may include training in language learning strategy and tactics, phonetics, grammar, use of resources, applied linguistics, linguistic analysis, interpersonal skills, culture learning skills, and anthropology. While all learners would benefit from such training, it is especially helpful for those who face a challenging situation, whether through lower ability or lack of resources and programs in the language.

One of the key factors in learning a language is the learner’s settled decision that he or she wants and needs to learn the language. For a missionary, this would be predicated upon a prior decision to follow the Lord’s call to a particular people and to love the people who speak this language. Effective language learning necessitates a decision to learn the language and to involve oneself with the people of that language. Without such a firm decision it becomes easier to quit than to persevere in language learning.

Willingness to be a learner is a necessary corollary for effective language learning. A learner is one who recognizes a linguistic or cultural need and is willing to be vulnerable enough to expose that lack to others and allow others to help one learn. One who is a learner is willing to make mistakes and learn from them, willing to reach out to people who are different from oneself, willing to step outside one’s own culture and begin to enter another’s world, and willing to persevere in learning.

If the desire is to reach out to people and enter into life with them then the learner will make any life-style changes necessary to facilitate this involvement. The learner can take the effort to develop friendships with people who speak that language and spend time with them in learning activities as well as in relaxed social times, in order to hear the language, to practice speaking, and to experience the culture. The learner may choose to live in a neighborhood where the language is spoken so that there will be more opportunity to hear the language, to interact with people, and to form friendships. For greater and more intimate contact with the language and culture the learner should consider living for a period of time with a family who speaks that language. This will maximize involvement in the community, increase exposure to the language, enhance language learning, and give greater insights into the culture.

In addition to benefiting from contact with the community, the learner should take advantage of whatever other learning resources are available. In many languages, there are significant resources in the language such as written materials for learners (language text books, grammars, dictionaries, books for early readers, language analyses, dialect surveys), radio and television, tape recordings, videos, and computer programs. Use of these resources will enhance and facilitate learning.

Each learner should also seek a learning situation that corresponds with his or her needs, strengths, and learning style. In many languages there are excellent language schools, in others there are trained teachers or tutors. The learner should make appropriate use of this assistance. Lack of a school or program does not render language learning impossible but it does require more creativity and discipline from the language learner. If resources are scarce or unavailable, it behooves the learner to lean even more heavily on learning through contact with native speakers in the community.

Ideally, the language learner should plan on spending a minimum of a year in intense language learning focus with few if any other activities that would take one away from the language, and then spending at least some time daily on language learning for the next several years. The one who has learned how to learn can continue to learn as a way of life for the rest of his or her years in the language.

Elizabeth S. Brewster

See also Adjustment to the Field.

Second Vatican Council (1962–65). When in 1959 Pope John XXIII made the unexpected announcement of an ecumenical council, he called the leaders of the global Roman Catholic Church together for the first time since Vatican I, almost a hundred years earlier. His convocation of this council reflected his genuine desire to update and renew church life, and in particular to raise the question of the central mission of the Church. The Church needed to look outside as well as inside, attempting to come to terms with a world which had undergone deep and significant changes since the last council. Previous popes had addressed various problems facing the Church, but when Pope John called bishops from Africa, Asia, Latin America, and even from countries under the grip of totalitarian political systems, he was taking an unprecedented step. From the Catholic perspective, this would be the first truly ecumenical council.

The council’s four sessions included two-month convocations in the Vatican with more than 2,500 bishops participating. Endless committees and subsequent reports stretched the hearts, minds, and bodies of the participants, and many of the documents reflect a sometimes rough summary of the attempt to blend the reports with finished papers. And although few of the bishops understood the impact those documents would have, we now have a much clearer picture of the ways and means of the Catholic Church. Not least in the catalogue of images was the understanding of the Catholic Church regarding world mission and evangelization.

Sixteen documents of uneven significance emerged from the council and a wide consensus of observers and interpreters recognizes six of those in a special way. Perhaps the most helpful observation of the council at this point in history—more than thirty-five years later—is to understand the tension during the council between theological conservatives and progressives. Changes are never easy and when one considers the nature of the Roman Catholic Church, the task of renewal might seem almost impossible. But when some of the bishops prevailed in their attempts to prod the church into engaging the modern world, the outcomes were less than predictable. And these winds of change were most obvious in the dialogue among the bishops relative to the meaning of the church and the gospel mandate “to make disciples of all nations.”

The six documents which relate directly to world mission are as follows:

1. Lumen Gentium (“The Light of the Nations”), The Dogmatic Constitution of the Church;
2. Dei Verbum (“The Word of God”), The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation;
4. Ad Gentes (“To All Nations”), The Decree on the Missionary Activity of the Church;
5. Unitatis Redintegratio (“Restoration of Unity”), The Decree on Ecumenism; and
6. Nostra Aetate (“In Our Times”), The Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions. A seventh document on religious freedom (Dignitatis Humanae) is also significant but due to space limitations is omitted in this discussion.

Lumen Gentium (“The Light of the Nations”) is a magisterial document which reflects an orthodox Catholic theology on the nature of the Church as well as the implications of these reflections for the Church’s central mission. Essentially the Church is pictured by the images of mystery, the People of God, and a hierarchical structure, displaying again the distinctives of both conservative and progressive ecclesiologies. Articles 13–17 represent the core of Catholic reflection on the universal nature of the Church’s mission as it relates to its own, to non-Catholics, and to non-Christians. The ambiguities so characteristic of this document raise concerns about Universalism and the nature of the gospel itself. Many Scriptures are brought to bear on the text and the GREAT COMMISSION passages are in abundance. Evangelicals would have welcomed even more reflection on the biblical texts, with more than what in many cases appear to be merely parenthetical references to texts.

Dei Verbum (“The Word of God”) is an important document for evangelicals to study for several reasons, not least the obvious awareness of the evangelical tradition of biblical scholarship and church practice. The Scriptures are given prominence in this document, particularly in reference to the proclamation of the gospel. But it is unfortunate that some of the positive contributions of a fresh approach to the Bible are blunted by the traditional teaching of interpretations being subject to the magisterial office. Evangelicals can be encouraged to find the exhortation to the pastors of the Church to give much more attention to Bible study and sermon preparation, making the Scriptures more accessible to the entire Church universally. In the end, the traditional two-source theory of revelation prevails, even though it has been recast with God being the original source and Church tradition and Holy Scripture standing equally in the life of the Church.
Second Vatican Council

Gaudium et Spes ("The Joys and Hopes") is the lengthiest of the sixteen documents, and although there is some ponderous repetition, the document itself bears a sympathetic reading. The culture of modernity is addressed and the document demonstrates the desire on the part of progressive Church leaders to interact with the secular and material world. This pastoral constitution is unique in that the discussion surrounding it arose during the council itself without following the protocol of pre-council preparations and paperwork. In the present situation where the Western church is struggling with its relationship with its own cultural developments, Gaudium et Spes pioneers in certain areas where the Church has avoided interaction with those outside the Church and perhaps even critical of it. The Preface, in fact, makes it clear: "... the Church now addresses itself without hesitation, not only to the sons of the Church and to all who invoke the name of Christ, but to the whole of humanity."

Ad Gentes ("To All Nations") is the most "evangelical" document in the way it addresses itself to the understanding of the Great Commission and the strategic implications in the life of the Church, locally and globally. The most quoted sentence in the entire document is the first of the doctrinal principles: "The pilgrim Church is missionary by her very nature" which represents a clear reflection of Lumen Gentium in the way that missionary activity was located within the center of the Church's life instead of on its periphery. It is also important to note that this document on missions is the final product of a long and arduous process that extended throughout most of the four years of the council. The several principles stated in Ad Gentes stem from a clear biblical understanding of the necessity of explicit gospel proclamation as the hallmark of missionary activity, incorporating those who respond into the local body, the church. Furthermore, this missionary effort pertains to the whole church, and not just the clergy or those orders of missionaries exclusively set aside for such ministry. It should not be forgotten that ten years after the conclusion of Vatican II, Pope Paul VI called another synod of bishops, after which he issued an even more carefully worded (and one might say "powerfully worded") statement, the Apostolic Exhortation, Evangelii Nuntiandi (Evangelization in the Modern World). This document, read alongside Ad Gentes, provides solid biblical and theological insights for missiologists and missionaries alike.

Unitatis Redintegratio ("Restoration of Unity") breaks new ground in the Roman Catholic understanding of its role in Christian dialogue with Protestants. Reflecting on the Ecumenical Movement begun earlier in the twentieth century, the bishops took some steps to recover lost ground since the schisms of the eleventh and sixteenth centuries. Vatican II began calling Orthodox and Protestant Christians "separated brethren" and looked for openings for bilateral discussions with various denominations. Four notable points can be observed which will highlight the contours of the document: (1) The Church's willingness to share blame for separations in past centuries; (2) the Church's affirmation of genuine Christianity as consisting in "all those justified by faith through baptism (being) incorporated into Christ"; (3) the calling attention to "an order of 'hierarchy' of truths (which) vary in their relationship to the foundation of the Christian Faith"; (4) the encouragement which the Catholic Church takes from their observation of the "love, veneration, and near cult of the sacred Scriptures (which) lead our brethren to a constant and expert study of the sacred text." These are significant movements which bear even more reflection for future conversations.

Nostra Aetate ("In Our Times") represents the shortest and, in the minds of many, the most controversial document. In our day of religious pluralism and political correctness, the "Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions" makes an uncertain sound, particularly in the light of the high theology of Ad Gentes. The document places Hinduism, Buddhism, and Islam in the best possible light, mixing Scripture quotations in almost syncretistic fashion. There are two positive aspects of Nostra Aetate: (1) the lengthy section on the Jews addresses issues especially significant in light of World War II and correctly sees the strong biblical connection between Judaism and Christianity; (2) toward the conclusion of the document, the centrality of the cross of Christ for salvation is brought into focus, restating the necessity of the Church's preaching in proclaiming the "cross of Christ."

It is no exaggeration to say that when Pope John XXIII called for "a new Pentecost," few realized what kind of "depth charges" would be set off. It could also be said that Catholics living in the period even ten years prior to the council might not recognize the Church today. But in the end, the emphasis on proclamation to those who have not heard the gospel is biblical, and theological reflection is always required when attempting to carry out the Great Commission in the way the Lord of the Church, Jesus Christ, intended.

JOHN W. NYQUIST

SEE ALSO Roman Catholic Missions.

Secularism.

The ideology of secular humanism is expressed in the “Secular Humanist Declaration” (1981), which affirms ten points: free inquiry, separation of church and state, freedom, critical intelligence, moral education, religious skepticism, knowledge through reason, science and technology, evolution, and education. Underlying these points is a commitment to an agenda which will reduce the influence of religion in society and elevate the authority of a rationalism based upon reason and science.

As the world increasingly is influenced by modernization and secularization, missionaries in both the West and non-Western cultures will need to deal with secularists who have little interest in religion. Effective ministry will involve not only proclamation of the gospel but also exposing the inadequacies of secularism as a worldview.

WILLIAM H. BAKER

SEE ALSO Atheism AND Modernity.

Secularization. Secularism represents a philosophical viewpoint that began to germinate with the Renaissance and came to full flower during the ENLIGHTENMENT. It emphasizes the autonomy of the individual and the power of human reason, which provided the seed bed for the development of the scientific method. It maintains that the only real world is that of sensory experience and regards the universe as a closed system in which humankind operates without recourse to any real or imagined powers outside of itself. Another ramification is the denial of moral absolutes.

Based on the assumption that the world has evolved, secularism represents a significant epistemological shift away from the classical focus on design and purpose in a divinely created order, to an understanding of the universe as the product of chance and random relations that trigger chains of cause and effect. With God removed from the scene, either through the remoteness of Deism or Atheism’s denial of his existence, there is no appeal beyond the authority of science.

Secularism represents a rival, anthropocentric religion, an absolutizing of what were previously regarded as penultimate concerns. All religions are relativized, the products of particular historical and socioeconomic contexts. They represent the ways in which various cultures have tried to answer ultimate questions and provide ethical norms and moral sanctions. Their value is judged on their ability to provide coping mechanisms, and not on their truth claims in regard to the nature of God and his relationship to the created order.

865
Secularization

Secularism the philosophical perspective should be distinguished from secularization the social phenomenon, the process through which successive sectors of society and culture are freed from the influence of religious ideas and institutions. On the positive side, secularization has effectively challenged the fatalistic attitudes and fear-inducing superstition of prescientific worldviews, which discouraged intellectual creativity and social progress. But negatively it has compartmentalized life, leaving it without any sense of purpose or cohesiveness. Secularization relativizes and marginalizes religion to the extent that it is allowed into the public sphere only for the purpose of serving the interests of a secular society, whether by providing social cohesion (civil religion in the United States) or adding a splash of color and dignified pageantry (ceremonial religion in Europe). There is ambivalence toward religion as a source of ethical norms. Both historically and sociologically, its role is pervasive, and yet in the legislative and judicial process arguments based on religious convictions are excluded.

As to the future impact of secularization on religion, the social scientists of the 1960s were confidently predicting the demise of religion. A counter-position argued that the process of secularization in fact causes people to starve for the transcendent, and thus it may unwittingly be sowing the seeds for a revival of religion. The growing attraction of New Age religions, coupled with the impressive growth of many Christian churches that are worship- and experience-oriented, gives credence to the latter viewpoint. It is further strengthened by the crumbling of the Newtonian worldview in the wake of the findings of quantum physics regarding the random activity of subatomic particles, and the latest theories of astrophysicists regarding the origins of the universe.

When developing a mission approach to secularized persons, we should bear in mind that many are searching for meaning to life and have a desire for self-transcendence, even though they may not be able to articulate their deep-seated restlessness. They long for a sense of fulfillment in life and are baffled by the contradictory aspects of human nature, the inner struggle between knowing the good and doing the evil, and the need to find ways to balance personal freedom with mutual accountability and social justice.

EGGIE GIBBS

Segundo, Juan Luis (1925–96). Uruguayan Roman Catholic theologian, one of the earliest and most prolific craftsmen of liberation theology. Born in Montevideo, he spent most of his life in that city, but received his training under the Jesuits in San Miguel, Argentina, and Louvain, Belgium, and brilliantly defending two theses before a jury of the Sorbonne, being awarded the highest classification for the Doctorat ès Lettres in theology. These did not distract him from his major concerns as a pastor, delving deeply into whatever academic disciplines could help him defend the poor and oppressed as well as articulate for them a theology they could apply in their daily living. This he accomplished through his five-volume work Theology for Artisans of a New Humanity. Equally important was his contribution as the most original and most profound of the Latin American liberation theologians, with The Liberation of Theology, in which he emphasized the need to maintain the liberating character of theology by following the proper method to interpret the scriptural text to bring out its relevance to the needs of Latin America. A necessary corollary to this was his goal to formulate an authentic Christian theology and a true image of Jesus of Nazareth, which he accomplished through his five-volume work Jesus of Nazareth Yesterday and Today. His concern for his people would not allow him to accept teaching posts in many institutions in Europe and the Americas, but his short lectureships, as well as his books and articles, still stand as his testament to the world as a whole.

PAULO E. PEREZ

Selywn, George Augustus (1809–78). English missionary and first Anglican bishop in New Zealand. Born at Hampstead, England, he was educated at Eton and St. John's College, Cambridge. Ordained a priest in 1834, he taught at Eton and was a curate at Boveney and Windsor. Consecrated bishop in 1841, Selwyn arrived in New Zealand in 1842 charged with oversight of the missionary work among Maori and the rapidly growing English settler population. His relationships with the Church Missionary Society and its missionaries were fraught with tension, in part because of evangelical suspicions of his sympathy with the Tractarians. Selwyn was a great visionary but his comprehensive educational institution at St. John's College in Auckland failed to achieve his expectations. The development of the Melanesian Mission from 1849 was innovative with his use of New Zealand as a base to bring Melanesian students for training as evangelists. His last attempt was the 1857 constitution of the church based on synodical government and lay participation. Selwyn attempted to defend Maori interests but his chaplaincy to the British troops in the wars of the 1860s destroyed his influence with Maori. He made a notable contribution to the first Lambeth Conference in 1867 and the development of pan-Anglicanism. He returned to England in 1868 as Bishop of Lichfield.

ALLAN K. DAVIDSON

Senegal (Est. 2000 pop.: 9,495,000; 196,722 sq. km. [75,954 sq. mi.]). Despite a 90% Muslim majority, Senegal is a secular state with freedom of religion. Senegalese reservations, mostly African Sunnis of the Malikite rite, is concentrated to the north. Portuguese explorers brought the Catholic Church to the Senegalese coast in 1445, baptizing the Senegalese chief Behemoi in 1486. By 1490 the first establishments were set up, and by 1514 the diocese of Funchal, including Senegal, was created. In 1840 three Senegalese priests were ordained. The vicariate of The Two Guineas became the vicariate of Senegambia in 1863 and later of Dakar in 1936. Dakar, Senegal’s capital, became an archdiocese in 1955 with the first African bishop consecrated in 1962, just two years after independence from France.

The Paris Mission’s activity in 1863 resulted in the Protestant Church of Dakar, one of the two largest Protestant Churches whose membership is 60 percent European. With the government encouraging churches and religious groups to play a role in development, religious broadcasting has been accepted and used by the Assemblies of God, Catholic Church, Reformed Church, Conservative Baptists, and WEC International (first arrived from Britain in 1935).

GARY LAMB

Serampore Trio. A popular, shorthand term used by mission promoters and historians to refer to the close partnership of three English Baptists who codirected the Serampore Mission in Bengal between 1800 and 1823: WILLIAM CAREY, JOSHUA MARSHMAN, and WILLIAM WARD. Based at a tiny Danish colonial enclave thirteen miles up the Hooghly River from cosmopolitan Calcutta, the Serampore Mission grew out of the BAPTIST MISSION SOCIETY’S (BMS) venture in Bengal, particularly as the pioneer triumvirate established financial and managerial independence of the administration in London.

The trio established the Serampore Union in 1807 as a way of regulating the internal affairs of their mission community. Some time around 1816 it became known as the Missionary Union at Serampore. This in turn was institutionalized informally to constitute what became known as the Baptist Mission at Serampore and later the Serampore Mission. Escalating disagreements with the BMS, especially over the founding (1818) and development of Serampore College, finally led to a costly split in 1827. The end of this schism began in 1837 with the death of the last member of the triumvirate. The Serampore Mission and college then limped along until an amicable settlement was reached with the BMS in 1855.

A. CHRISTOPHER SMITH

Serbia. See YUGOSLAVIA.

Serra, Junípero (1713–84). Spanish missionary to Mexico and California. Born José Miguel on the Spanish island of Majorca to a farming family, Serra joined the Franciscan Order and took the name of Junípero (1730). After his ordination (1738), Serra went on to receive a doctorate in theology at Lullian University, where he accepted a teaching post from 1743 until 1749.

Sensing God’s call, he sailed to Mexico to engage in mission and ministry among indigenous peoples there. He served in Mexico until 1767, and then took up work in Spanish-occupied lower California. Beginning in 1769, he accompanied the Spanish military expeditions north along the coast of California; by 1782 he had established nine missions across California including those in San Diego (1770), San Francisco (1776), and San Buenaventura (1872). At times frustrated with military treatment of the indigenous peoples, he wrote his Representación (1773) declaring to the Spanish viceroy in Mexico City thirty-two points of appropriate missionary conduct. Prior to his death it was calculated that he had baptized some six thousand and confirmed five thousand.

Contemporary assessments of Serra’s work have been highly politicized, with apppellations ranging from saint to sadist. The process of canonization and his inclusion as a figure on a U.S. postage stamp has raised many questions to the fore, with indigenous Americans and notable historians protesting that even Serra’s treatment of local populations was inhumane and barbaric.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Sexual Mores

Sexual Mores. The student of cross-cultural phenomena confronts a bewildering array of ideas about and practices of sexuality. Many of these ideas and practices will conflict with the cross-cultural worker’s own socially conditioned beliefs and practices. Some of these ideas and practices may well conflict with biblical revelation.

The dual nature of this conflict sets the stage for missionary involvement in the sexual mores of the receptor culture. The cross-cultural worker may support mores that differ from his or her own socially conditioned views but that do not violate either biblical teachings or principles (i.e., bride price). The missionary may be compelled to advocate to local innovators changes in sexual mores that actually conflict with or violate biblical teachings or principles (i.e., female genital mutilation). In any case, the cross-cultural worker must seek to understand fully the meaning of the cultural practice and the biblical principles involved. Any proposed change in mores will proceed from this dual perspective.

ERBIE C. SMITH

Seychelles (Est. 2000 pop.: 77,000; 455 sq. km. [176 sq. mi.]). The 90-some granitic and coraline islands of the Republic of Seychelles stretch out over 154,000 square miles of the Indian Ocean, making their Seychellois people one of the most difficult to access in terms of physical geography. The outlying islands are isolated and consequently have not been given a clear challenge regarding the lordship of Christ.

Although the collapse of communism in other world areas has brought about political reform and multiparty elections, Seychellois youth have been hardened against biblical truth by a decade of Marxist orientation. The Catholics and Anglicans have openly opposed one-party rule but many of the members of the larger churches have syncretized the sacraments of baptism and confirmation with traditional beliefs and superstitions. Innovative outreach strategies to youth need to be developed and effective prayer teams challenged to pray that evangelical ministries will experience a strategic loosening of restrictions.

Christian radio has, in recent years, been effective in creating new opportunities for informing, educating, and challenging the Seychellois populace to the claims of Christ. Although almost all Seychellois claim to be Christians (97%), missiological strategies depend on new evangelical congregations challenging indigenous believers to develop ministries that answer the questions regarding traditional practices.

CLINT AKINS

Shalom. Hebrew word meaning wholeness. It is translated into English using such terms as completeness, soundness, peace, well-being, health, prosperity, and salvation. It implies a state of mind that is at peace and satisfied, and social relationships characterized by harmony and mutual support. It is based on three fundamental principles: this world and all in it belongs to God; all humans share equally in God’s loving concern (God shows no favoritism to some people or nations); and the reign of God in creation and in human communities leads to peace, justice, and truly fulfilled lives. Shalom is a transcultural and timeless concept, but like other such symbols it finds its expression in the concrete situations of real life in real cultures and real history. In the Old Testament, the focus is more on earthly wholeness. In the New Testament, the dimension of eternal life comes into sharper focus.

One attribute of shalom is agape, the identification with and unconditional commitment to the other (see Love of God). This is not a response to the desirable, lovable, or admirable, but to the needy, undesired, unloved, and enemy. Shalom initiates action, accepts vulnerability, bears suffering, and always hopes for the best. The supreme manifestation is Christ’s crucifixion. A second attribute is righteousness. In Scripture, true shalom and righteousness flow from right relationships with God (Isa. 60:17), and reflect his character of righteousness, love, justice, peace, and perfection. There can be no shalom while one persists in sin and evil (Isa. 48:18; 54:13), and the renewal of righteousness is essential to the restoration of shalom. A third attribute is peace. This is not, as the modern world sees it, simply freedom from feelings of guilt, serenity, and peace of mind, nor merely the absence of war. It actively seeks harmonious, mutually edifying relationships in community life. A fourth attribute is concept of health. Shalom communicates the sense of human well-being in which physical, emotional, mental, moral, and spiritual health are inextricably intertwined. Unlike the Western worldview, which differentiates between spirit and body, spiritual and material realities, the Hebrew worldview views humans as whole beings in which spiritual, moral, mental, and physical attributes are inextricably intertwined. A fifth attribute is koinonia. Shalom speaks of social fellowship and communal harmony among friends, parties, and nations.

Shalom is an essential part of God’s cosmic plan, and is one of the threads running through Scripture linking cosmic, human, and individual histories into a single, coherent story. It began at Creation, when God saw all he had created and it was good. Only man by himself was not good (Gen 2:18), because he was not in community.

The fall shattered this harmony (see Fall of Humankind). In the biblical worldview, sin is at root the breaking of shalom, the severing of relationships. It began with the break in right relationships with God when humans put themselves as the center of their being and worshiped themselves. It led to broken human relationships between genders (Gen. 3:15), brothers (Gen. 4:8), and human communities (Gen 11:9). The result was jealousy, hatred, ethnocentrism, rivalries, injustice, violence, and war.

The establishment of shalom is at the heart of God's plan of salvation. In Christ, God reached out to save fallen humans and to reconcile them to himself. Salvation begins with forgiveness with God through Christ Jesus, and finds expression in the restoration of human relationships to God, and to one another in the church, the body of Christ. Shalom is associated with a peace covenant, in which this restoration of relationships and righteousness takes place (Num. 25:12; Isa. 54:7–8; Ezek. 34:5).

The final and full manifestation of shalom will occur when Christ returns and the kingdom of God is established over all creation. Then shalom and righteousness will reign in Zion (Isa. 60:17; Ps. 85:8–9), and violence and destruction will occur no more. Shalom is both a present reality in the life of the believer and the church, but also a future culmination in which all creation will be restored in harmony under the reign of Christ.

Shalom is of the essence of the kingdom of God. It symbolizes the presence of God, who works to restore the entire creation to fulfill the purposes for which he created it. In the signs of this kingdom, such as salvation, reconciliation, and healing, people see the presence of God in this world, bringing life out of death, love and peace in the midst of hate and violence, and meaning to meaninglessness. Nature itself is included in God's salvation, for it will be a part of the new heaven and new earth that are essential in God's work to restore shalom throughout all his creation.

Shalom is to characterize the ekkllesia, the church, the assembly or gathering of God's people. It is the test and hallmark of the church's divine nature as the outpost of the kingdom now on earth—the community that emerges when the covenant relationship between God and his people is restored, and that gives expression to the harmony intended by God. This church is not a social institution, although it finds expression in social forms. It is the community of the Spirit open to all who turn to God for reconciliation. At its heart is koinonia, the fellowship and harmony that give rise to a new saved and saving community based on the covenant of love that binds people together in mutual submission to one another. It is a new community that breaks down the walls of language, race, class, gender, and nationalism. It is also called to make peace, to seek social justice, provision for the needy, including widows, orphans, and the poor; and protection of the exploited and oppressed. Above all, it is apostolic, sent into the world with a divine commission to proclaim that the rule of God is at hand, that Jesus is Lord, and that people should change their ways and love in the light of the new reality and form new communities of followers.

Shalom is to characterize the life of the individual Christian, unlike the West, which sees autonomous, free individuals as the fundamental units of human reality, and differentiates between personal and social systems. Scripture sees individuals as fully human only as they are a part of communities of shalom, and healing as rooted in the community. Dan Fountain points out that "God's plan for the world is this: That all persons everywhere, in every nation, know God's saving health and be delivered from disobedience, disruption, despair, disease and all that would destroy our wholeness."

Paul G. Hiebert

Shaman, Shamanism. Shamans are part-time religious specialists who serve as intermediaries between humans and the supernatural, and who seek spiritual remedies to individual problems. As such, they are said to live in the middle zone between humans and the supernatural. The word “shaman” comes from the Tungus, also called the Evenki, most of whom live in Russia, China, and Mongolia.

Shamans often invite spirits to possess their bodies in order to receive spiritual power, especially for curing. They are purported to be possessed by spirits in trances, also termed altered states of consciousness, which they enter through use of drugs (e.g., Yanomani shamans in southern Venezuela and northern Brazil), rapid drum beats (e.g., devotees during Hindu religious festivals in Malaysia), light flashes, and music. During trance they are either possessed by a spirit or their souls leave their bodies to ascend to the realm of the spirits (see also Possession Phenomena).

The spirits, also termed “familiars” or “intermediaries,” may be animal spirits (e.g., among some of the indigenous people of Siberia and the Yanomani, whose shamans are indwelt by the Jaguar spirit, among others). One Yanomami shaman stated,

I'm a man of the spirit world, “shamans” we are called. The shaman is almost always the leader of his village. If he is a good shaman—

I mean that if he can avoid the bad spirits and get the good ones—he can lead his village to good hunting, tell them when and where to plant, who to make war with—all the things that will make them into a great village (Ritchie, 1996, 18).
Shaman, Shamanism

Shamans are clairvoyant, in that they can “see” in the spiritual realm. They claim to have perception, knowledge, or information about individuals that is received from a spiritual source, such that they are often aware of what is happening in their communities without having been told by another person. As one Yanomani shaman stated, “I just knew.” One Bajju former shaman in Nigeria alleged that her ability to perceive in the spiritual realm came from “medicine” of special leaves in water with which she washed her face each morning.

Means of becoming a shaman include a visit by a spirit, a dream or vision, often following an illness, inheritance, an accident or unusual event, or a spontaneous call. People may recognize a change in behavior of a prospective shaman, such as hysteria, having prophetic visions or attacks that leave him or her unconscious. Such an individual then apprentices himself or herself to an established shaman to learn about shamanistic beliefs and practices, names and functions of spirits, techniques, and perhaps a special language. There are both men and women shamans, though gender is culture-specific.

The duties and religious obligations of shamans vary from culture to culture. However, their primary function is to cure illness by using the supernatural for the benefit of individuals and the community. Some treat illness by blowing smoke over patients. Others purportedly extract objects; others do cupping, placing animal horns or other containers over places on a patient’s skin in order to bring heat to that part and perhaps to purportedly extract an object from it. Most shamans prescribe herbal medicines. The use of trance behavior, often accompanied by spirit possession, is common.

Since Western medicine rarely deals with spiritual causes of disease, shamanistic activities continue to be important to people in non-Western countries in the contemporary world. The services offered by shamans deal with a missing component of treatment. In Africa, a frequent diagnosis by shamans is that an individual has offended an ancestor, often one’s deceased parents or grandparents, and thus is sick. In that case the usual prescribed remedy is sacrifice to the ancestor (see Ancestral Practices).

Some have referred to shamans as “witchdoctors,” a derogatory term that fails to recognize the spiritual world to which these religious practitioners relate. Missionary and church teaching that their activities and beliefs are superstition begs the question of the reality of the spirit world, antagonizes those who know it is real, and serves to drive the activities of shamans underground. Shamans’ motives often overlap with those of missionaries, local Christians, and health professionals—to bring healing and well-being to their people. Recognizing their important role in the religious structure of a society should encourage missionaries to befriend them, share the gospel of Jesus Christ with them, and pray for them. Relating to shamans often involves Spiritual Warfare.

Shamans are distinct from priests, full-time religious specialists who are often organized and part of a sacred tradition. The term “diviner” refers to part-time religious specialists who deal with the spiritual realm with some divination involved. While diviners overlap with shamans in their activities, their use of divination to ascertain why people are ill, die, or suffer misfortune sets them apart (see also Divination, Diviner). Shamans also contrast with magicians, who use specific rituals to produce a specific result, and sorcerers, who use their powers for evil.

Carol V. McKinney

Shame. In order to inculcate and motivate morality in its members, a society may seek to instill guilt for violating persons or moral rules. Or it may seek to instill shame for moral failure. Rather than motivating by the threat of punishment, such a society motivates by threatening disapproval and shame to those who fail to exemplify desirable virtues, and by offering honor and respect to those who exemplify prescribed character traits.

While most societies cultivate and are attentive to shame, Western societies have tended to be much more attentive to guilt than to shame. Westerners typically see shame as a more superficial response to moral failure than guilt, wrongly assuming that shame is the tendency to feel bad only when caught. In consequence Western missionaries often go to non-Western societies with poorly developed understandings of shame, and with negative attitudes toward the way shame functions in people’s lives. They mistakenly believe that their own inclination to stress guilt over shame is simply a reflection of biblical priorities. In fact, shame is the focal emotion in the Genesis creation account, and is a focal emotion throughout the Scriptures.

Shame involves seeing oneself as deficient with reference to certain character ideals. We often become aware of ourselves through the eyes of others. We suddenly see ourselves as others see us. While it is true that shame arises out of, and is in large part caused by, the disapproval of significant others, the source of the shame is our thoughts about ourselves. Shame is not fully determined by the negative evaluation of others. What elicits shame is the acceptance of the neg-
Shi’ite, Shi’ism

Shellabear, William Girdlestone (1862–1947). English Bible translator, orientalist, and pioneer Methodist missionary in Malaysia and Singapore. As an English soldier in Singapore in 1887, Shellabear was impressed by Malays under his command. He learned their language and began what was to be his life’s work of sharing his faith while striving to preserve Malay culture. He joined the American Methodist Mission and in 1890 founded the Methodist Publishing House. He was active in the leadership of the mission in Singapore and Malaya, and edited the Malaysia Message as well as classic Malay writings. His grammar, dictionary, and Bible translation remained in print for decades. In 1916 he left Malaya and studied Islam at Hartford, Cairo, and Leiden. From 1922 until his death he edited the Muslim World and in 1925 he became professor of Islamics at Hartford. He maintained his hope that Malay-speaking Christians would understand the religion of their Muslim neighbors, and that Muslim Malays would learn from their own scripture something of the Christian truth which impelled him to write. His respect for Muhammad combined with his commitment to Christ as the only known way of salvation marked him apart. His vision for a Malay-speaking church, and belief that Malay should be the unifying basis of Malayan society were long ignored.

Shi’ite, Shi’ism. The Shi’ite branch of Islam comprises about 10 percent of all Muslims and is subdivided into three principal groups: the Zaydis (primarily in Yemen), the Isma’ils (in Asia, Syria, and East Africa), and the Twelve-Imam Shi’ites or Twelvers. The Twelvers are by far the largest group, comprising most of the population of Iran, 50 percent of Iraq, and scattered communities in Lebanon, Pakistan, Syria, and the Gulf states. Shi’ism has been the official religion of Iran since the sixteenth century.

The term “Shi’ite” comes from the Arabic shīʿat Ali, “party of Ali.” The roots of Shi’ism go back to Muhammad’s death and the ensuing leadership struggle. Shi’ites claim that Ali, as closest relative to Muhammad and husband to the Prophet’s daughter Fatimah, was the rightful successor to Muhammad. Ali eventually became Caliph but was assassinated. His son, Husayn, raised a revolt and was killed at Kerbala in 680. This is the central event of Twelver Shi’ism.

The Shi’ites understand Muhammad and Ali to have possessed special status with God that gave Shedd, Russell Phillip (1929– ). American missionary to Latin America. Born to missionary parents in Bolivia, he received degrees from Wheaton College and Graduate School, Faith Theological Seminary, and the University of Edinburgh. After short terms in U.S. pastorates, he taught for three years in the Leiria and Lisbon Portugal seminary, and then moved to Brazil where he has been for more than thirty years. As a New Testament professor he has taught mainly at the Baptist Theological Seminary in São Paulo, has been visiting professor at several U.S. seminaries, and has been the principal lecturer at numerous pastoral and youth conferences. Because of his pastoral experience in founding churches he has become known as a pastor to pastors. His writings include more than a dozen books and a variety of articles, mainly in Portuguese and most of which have to do with New Testament and the church. He is founder and visionary of the Nova Vida Publishers, as well as chief editor of Biblica Nova Vida (New Life Bible; 200,000 copies in print) whose commentary notes are written by him and others. His current special interests are Latin American cross-cultural missions, revival in the Brazilian churches, and opening of traditional Protestant denominations to the charismatic movement.

Shi'ite, Shi'ism

them an absolute right to rule the Muslim community. This status was passed down through the descendants of Ali the Imams, who have both spiritual and political preeminence. They are said to possess secret knowledge, spiritual powers, and special favor with God. The Imams function as intermediaries between humankind and God and are necessary for the salvation of believers. Sunni Muslims, by contrast, have generally seen the claim of the Imams to all spiritual and temporal authority as an extension of the Persian "priest-king" paradigm and have rejected it.

In 873 the twelfth Imam, Muhammad, disappeared as a young boy. Until 940 he was represented by wakils, who claimed to be in communication with him. Since that time, Shi'ites have awaited his return as the Mahdi (or "guided one"). They believe he hears prayers and intercedes in human affairs. However, this situation left a considerable void in both political and religious leadership and authority.

Aside from the Imamate, Twelveer Shi'ite theology and ritual do not differ greatly from the Sunni tradition. There are distinct shrines and pilgrimage sites associated with the Imams. Perhaps the greatest difference lies in the highly charged emotional climate of Shi'ite religiosity. The major distinctive of Shi'ism is its understanding of religious leadership. For the past two hundred years, Shi'ite mujtahids (leading clerics) have gradually enhanced the level of their authority. They are much more tightly organized with a much more clearly defined hierarchy than their Sunni counterparts. All Shi'ites must identify with and then adhere personally to the superior authority of a mujtahid. Today, the top level of the Shi'ite Ulema, the Ayatollahs, function as the representatives of the Twelfth Imam on earth. This gradual rise to power culminated in the Iranian Revolution, in which the Ayatollahs seized both religious and temporal power in the name of the Hidden Imam. The hostility and tensions between Sunni and Shi'ite Muslims, which had been on the wane for much of the twentieth century, has again heated up due to the efforts of Iran to export its brand of Islamic revolution to other Muslim states.

The other divisions of Shi'ites play a significant role in some areas of the Islamic world. The Zaydis reject the doctrine of the Hidden Imam and hold that any adult male descendant of Ali can lead the community. They survive only in Yemen, where the Imams held political control until 1962. Doctrinally, the Zaydis are the closest Shi'ite branch to Sunni orthodoxy and have experienced far less tension with the Sunni majority.

Isma'ilism is essentially Islamic Gnosticism, holding that the Qur'an contains secret, hidden meanings. This superior, allegorical insight was secretly transmitted to Ali and down through the line of Imams. Only through initiation and graded secret teaching can one have access to this divine Truth, which is not accessible to other religions or the mass of Muslims.

JAMES DARRELL CHANCELLOR

Shinto. The term "Shinto" covers a broad range of religious activities in Japan, from various types of FOLK RELIGION to the private rituals of the imperial family. Prior to World War II Shrine Shinto was officially the state religion. However, the new postwar Constitution clearly mandated the separation of religion and state, although the interpretation and implementation of this principle continues to be controversial. On a popular level, Shinto continues to be influential as folk religion, with many Japanese worshiping Shinto deities. As folk religion, Shinto includes various ritual festivals and ceremonies as well as ancestor worship organized along the lines of family or clan (see ANCESTRAL PRACTICES). The earliest archaeological and historical records indicate the presence of Shinto beliefs and practice. The traditions of Shinto, sometimes in a more pure form and other times more syncretistic, have been maintained continually until the present.

Of particular significance for Shinto are the Kojiki (Book of Ancient Traditions) from A.D. 712 and the Nihonshoki (Chronicles of Japan) from A.D. 720, the oldest literary works in the Japanese language. These ancient texts, along with their recensions, commentaries, and writings of scholars such as Kamono Mabuchi (d. 1769), Motoori Norinaga (d. 1801), and Hirata Atsutane (d. 1843), who worked for the revival of a purified Shinto, provide our primary sources on Shinto. The Kojiki is written in an entirely Japanese style, in terms of both language and content. The Nihonshoki, by contrast, includes many Chinese modes of expression and philosophical concepts. Both texts, however, present the same Japanese view of creation. "Creation" occurs without any Creator or first cause; matter appears before mind and deity has no existence apart from matter. The creation myths portray a process of evolution that continues until the gods themselves evolve into their final form.

According to the creation myths, the highest deity is the goddess Amaterasu, whose grandson Ninigi descended from heaven to earth. Ninigi's grandson, whose mother was a dragon in the form of a woman, was Jimmu, whom the myths present as the first emperor of Japan. The Kojiki and Nihonshoki, which form the foundation for all subsequent works of Shinto, depict Japan as the center of the earth and the Japanese emperor as the first of men and vicar of the gods.
Central to Shinto is reverence for the kami or gods. Shinto is explicitly polytheistic. Awe-inspiring or extraordinary things such as thunder, rocks, mountains, animals, certain human beings, departed ancestors, and the emperor all can be regarded as kami. Shinto contains no explicit moral codes. One’s duty is to live in fear and reverence for the memory of the dead and to imitate noble examples of the gods and illustrious ancestors. All “sin” is viewed as a kind of pollution. Thus purification rites, in the form of ritual offerings, prayers for cleansing, and lustrations, are prominent in Shinto.

Shinto became influenced by Confucianism and Buddhism, which were introduced into Japan from China. In the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries Shinto scholars attempted to purge Shinto of foreign influences and to restore a purified Japanese Shinto. Inclusion in this restoration was the tendency to view the military rulers of Japan (shogun) as political usurpers and the emperor as the sole legitimate ruler. A revitalized Shinto promoted reverence for the emperor, which soon grew into a zealous determination to restore the emperor to political rule and to eliminate foreign influences from Japan, including the “alien” religion of Buddhism. The Meiji Restoration of 1868 resulted in the restoration of the emperor to political rule. The nineteenth-century purificationists and restorationists thus set Japan on a course leading ultimately to World War II. Christians who refused to participate in Shinto rituals—not only in Japan but also in Korea, which Japan ruled as a colony—were often severely persecuted. The particular point of controversy usually concerned the worship of the emperor in state-sponsored Shinto shrines.

The postwar democratic Constitution of Japan has deprived Shinto of its special status, but it has also guaranteed it, along with all religious institutions, freedom of religion. Beginning in the 1960s, however, many politically conservative Japanese have pushed the government to support officially the Yasukuni Shrine, a Shinto shrine in which the spirits of soldiers who died in Japan’s modern wars are worshiped. Despite widespread opposition from other religious groups due to the clear violation of the constitutional prohibition of such action, the government supported certain Shinto rites as part of the recent enthronement ceremony of Akihito, the current emperor. Thus both on the popular level of folk religion and in the public sector Shinto continues to exert considerable influence in Japan.

HISAKAZU INAGAKI

Short-term Missions. A term typically used to describe missionary service, normally involving cross-cultural immersion, that is intentionally designed to last from a few weeks to less than two years.

Short-term missions finds its roots in the Scriptures and, in a broad sense, can be understood through the words of Jesus in the Great Commandment (Matt. 22:37–39) and the Great Commission (Matt. 28:18–20). In a sense Jesus establishes the guidelines for the early short-term mission experiences and demonstrates what is at the core of short-term missions in the sending out of the twelve (Matt. 10:1–42) and the seventy-two (Luke 10:1–20). He states quite clearly that those who are sent must love the Lord their God with all their heart, soul, and mind and then love their neighbor as themselves. From that posture, they must recognize that all authority has been given to him; therefore, they should go and make disciples of all nations.

Scope. As a modern-day phenomenon, the short-term missions movement has spanned the globe and has provided opportunities for thousands of individuals to experience, for a brief time, the world of missions. The length of service often varies from a week to several years. Mission agencies, churches, high schools, colleges and universities, parachurch ministries, families, and individuals are increasingly exploring and promoting short-term missions. The wide variety of people taking advantage of these opportunities include youth, college and university students, single adults, families, and seniors. The kinds of work that individuals and teams engage in include, but are not limited to, construction projects, teaching English, athletics and sports, drama and the arts, medical and health care, evangelism and discipleship, church planting, youth ministries, camp work, prayer and research, and general assistance.

Growth. The short-term missions movement has grown dramatically over the past several decades. Mission agencies, church denominations, and parachurch organizations as well as independent teams continue to contribute to the large numbers involved in the short-term missions enterprise. During the late 1990s, more than thirty thousand individuals joined forces each year with career missionaries and nationals to serve in urban centers, towns, and countries around the world. This rapid growth is due in part to modern travel that allows individuals to journey to the remotest areas of the world in a relatively short time. There continues to be a desire on the part of those who go to make themselves available in service without committing their entire lives to a missions career. There has been an overwhelming acknowledgment of short-term missions in recent years, and, though there is much discussion about the practice, it is obvious...
Short-term Missions

that short-term missions is a powerful and effective force in the modern missions movement.

The Critics. Many have been critical of short-term missions for numerous reasons. One of the main criticisms focuses on the motivation of those who go. Many career missionaries feel that short-term missionaries lack real commitment and endurance. Often the national church questions the presence of the short-term worker in their culture because it appears that the motivation of the short-timer is unclear. Some feel that the short-term workers provide a distraction for career missionaries. Other concerns focus on the perception that the results from short-term ministry are unreliable and there is little lasting fruit produced from the work of the short-term workers. Many suggest that the financial costs are too high and possibly take money away from career missionaries.

The Value. Despite the many criticisms, short-term missions is moving forward. The short-term missions movement definitely has been a key factor in the mobilization of world mission globally. The present generation of missionary candidates tends to make their decisions and commitments based on the knowledge gained through firsthand experience. As a result of short-term service a world vision can be developed that in turn affects the mobilization efforts of the church at large. In addition, many feel that short-term missions provides valuable respite for career missionaries, brings a fresh enthusiasm from the outside, and accomplishes practical projects as well as significant ministry. Obviously, many who serve in short-term missions are likely candidates for long-term service, and in fact, a significant number of career missionaries today have had a short-term mission experience. Those who return without making a commitment to long-term service are able to impact the churches that they are a part of with a global awareness and an expanded vision of God’s work in the world. As a result, the prayer efforts and the giving patterns for missions are enhanced.

Needs. The short-term missions experience is valid, but there are some important components that must be put into place to ensure its effectiveness. A careful selection process should be established so that those who are sent know the purpose for which they are being sent and are willing to go as learners and servants. Clear communication channels should be established with churches, nationals, and missionaries on the field in order to clarify expectations. Thorough preparation for those on the field, as well as the short-term workers, is essential. A clear understanding developed through training in the areas of spiritual formation, cultural issues, and interpersonal dynamics is necessary. Short-term workers should also understand the biblical basis of their service. Realistic expectations for the short-term worker must be explored. Those expectations should assume a posture of learning and a desire to serve with the national leaders and career missionaries in a supportive partnership. One of the most important dimensions of any short-term mission is careful reflection at the end of the experience. Short-term workers must debrief and process their experience so that they can be responsible with what they have been allowed to experience. This will not only enable short-term workers to understand their mission experience better, but it will allow them to communicate their vision to others.

Conclusion. The short-term mission movement is rooted in the Scriptures and will continue to be a driving force for the advancement of the global cause of Jesus Christ. Short-term missions must continue to be tied to long-term missions. Partnerships must be forged between the ones who go, the national hosts, the career missionaries, the sending church, and those with whom the short-term workers serve. Training, preparation, and careful follow-up will be vital elements to the effectiveness of the work. As these areas intersect, short-term missions will fulfill its intended goals and will continue to enable people to develop a global missionary vision and make an impact for the cause of Christ.

DENNIS MASSARO

Bibliography.

congregations even before evangelical Western missionaries visited the colony.

The Church Missionary Society (CMS) began work in Sierra Leone in 1804, followed by the Wesleyans in 1811. Many other missions operated in the country, but most remarkable was the policy of the CMS, which included a vision for an indigenous African church, led entirely by Africans.

This vision was enhanced by the arrival of the Recaptives. These were slaves rescued by British Naval Ships. They became the evangelistic target of the Nova Scotians and the CMS, with the goal of equipping them for the evangelization of their own people.

A typical product of this mission was Samuel Adjai Crowther (1806–1892), who was rescued from a Portuguese slave ship in 1822. While in the custody of a CMS missionary, Crowther embraced Christianity and later became the first student of the CMS’s indigenous missionary institution, Fourah Bay College, established at Freetown in 1828. He was consecrated as the first African Bishop of the Anglican Church in 1864.

Crowther was one of the CMS representatives on the first Niger expedition. After observing a remarkably high death toll among the European members (48 out of 150 died in six months), Crowther came to the conviction that Africans were best suited for the evangelization of Africa. Indeed, such was the swiftness with which Europeans generally succumbed to the dread malaria fever that Sierra Leone earned for herself the unenviable name of the “White Man’s Grave.” The Niger mission and later, the Delta Pastorate in 1892, were results of Crowther’s vision. Both ventures were largely staffed by Africans (Creoles).

Despite their remarkable success in taking the gospel to other parts of Africa the Creoles unfortunately failed to evangelize the natives of their own country. Hence with the discovery of quinine, an effective antidote against malaria, evangelistic efforts were taken over by Western missionaries, eventually stifling Crowther’s vision for an indigenous African Church.

Despite commendable efforts by foreign missions for over two centuries now, the Creoles are by and large, only nominally Christian, while the indigenous people are still largely unreached. About 50 percent of the population are African traditional religious. Islam claims about 30 percent. Christians are estimated at about 20 percent, of which 5 percent are evangelicals.

Frequent political unrest and economic instability have often led to the evacuation of all foreign missionaries, placing the responsibility of evangelization on national Christians. In a sense, this serves as a reminder of the value of Bishop Crowther’s vision as a missionary strategy for Sierra Leone.

David Musa

Signs and Wonders

Signs and Wonders. Biblical expression that refers to God’s powerful and miraculous interventions in creation. In Scripture, these acts were performed by God through his servants and included miraculous healings, demonic expulsions, control over natural phenomena, and power encounters. Signs and wonders usually occurred in conjunction with the proclamation of God’s message in the Old Testament or with proclamation of the Kingdom of God in the New Testament. The purpose of the signs and wonders was to reveal the glory of God and his grace and power, to authenticate God’s message and messenger, to confirm Jesus Christ as the promised Messiah, and to usher in the kingdom of God. The healings and demonic deliverances of Jesus and the disciples were considered part of the gospel itself. In the Book of Acts, signs and wonders followed the apostles and accompanied the verbal proclamation of the gospel. There is a pattern of growth and expansion of the church that followed these recorded miracles in Scripture. In many cases persecution followed the period of growth.

Records and references to different types of signs and wonders were prevalent in the writings of the early church fathers. From the fifth century until the twentieth century, reports of miracles, however, decreased, although there are numerous accounts of miracles and power encounters in conjunction with frontier missions. For example, power encounters, demonic deliverance, and healings are attributed to missionaries such as Boniface (680–754) and Ulfilas (c. 311–383).

In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the scientific, rational, Western worldview shaped the missionary perspective of supernatural phenomena (see also Enlightenment). Emphasis was placed on verbal proclamation without any distinctive manifestations of God’s supernatural power, and supernatural phenomena were explained in nonsupernatural terms. Recently, however, many missionaries have found the need to combine the preaching of the gospel with some form of power manifestation to reach the people (see also Power Mission and Powers, The). This is most prominent in areas and cultures that adhere to some form of supernatural worldview. In many cases, these signs and wonders are followed by conversions and explosive church growth.

A renewed emphasis on signs and wonders brought forth by the charismatic and Third Wave movements has reestablished the need and place of signs and wonders in the evangelism process. This topic has become widely debated among theologians and missiologists. The two main Bibliography. L. G. A. Banbury, Sierra Leone; Or the White Man’s Grave; C. P. Foray, Historical Dictionary of Sierra Leone; P. Falk, The Growth of the Church in Africa; J. Page, The Black Bishop: Samuel Adjai Crowther.

Questions in the discussion are: Do signs and wonders still exist today as they did in biblical times? What part should they play in evangelism and missions today?

On one end of the spectrum is the cessationist view that signs and wonders ceased with the age of the apostles since their purpose was to confirm the message preached by the apostles. Signs and wonders may occur today at the initiative of God in areas where the gospel is introduced for the first time. However, such occurrences are very rare. Generally it is assumed that healings and other signs and wonders are no longer seen today and that verbal proclamation of the gospel is sufficient.

On the other end of the spectrum is the Pentecostal view that every Christian and church should experience and minister with signs and wonders. Healings, deliverance, and power encounters are part of the gospel message. Effective evangelism occurs where the gospel is proclaimed with power; and the signs and wonders that accompany such evangelism are the same as those in the New Testament. John Wimber popularized one expression of this position and played a key role in the increased use of signs and wonders among Western missionaries.

A third view affirms the presence of signs and wonders as important tools of evangelism and church growth, yet does not see them as normative. Proponents of this view affirm the need for signs and wonders in mission, but caution against an overemphasis and unbalanced view. They caution that in practice, signs and wonders have often taken center stage, at the expense of the verbal gospel message. Furthermore, they warn that it is easy to fall into a formula approach, an evangelical form of magic. Finally there is the concern that often miracles are reported and claimed where there are none. Signs and wonders are affirmed, but there is a need for an overall balance in the reliance on the miraculous in evangelism.

The debate remains as to the nature and place of signs and wonders in evangelism and mission. The conclusion of these questions is based primarily on the paradigm from which these issues are addressed. The evidence shows that many of those ministering with signs and wonders have and are experiencing conversion growth. This is especially the case among resistant peoples. The proclamation of the gospel in conjunction with signs and wonders has been the deciding factor for the conversion of many.

Mark Wagner

See also Flaw of the Excluded Middle; Miracles in Mission.

Sikh, Sikhism. Sikhism is a syncretistic religion combing the salient features of Hinduism and Islam. The word “Sikh” is derived from its Pali origin “Sikka” or the Sanskrit word “Sishya,” meaning disciple. All Sikhs are the disciple of ten venerated “gurus” or teachers whose lives and teachings became the foundation of the doctrines and practices of Sikhism (see also Guru).

Beginnings and Growth. Sikhism had a two-fold origin, one in the Hindu Bhakti (devotion) Movement, and the other in Sufi mysticism of Islam. Guru Nanak (1469–1539) the founder, lived in northwest India. Influenced by mysticism of both religions, he taught that there is only one God and he created all people equal. He rejected elaborate religious rituals, and the Brahmins’ monopoly and authority in religious matters. After his time there were nine more great gurus.

Because of increasing Muslim opposition to the Sikhs, they grew into a militant sect and a political power. The tenth guru, Govind Singh, baptized five men from five different castes forming them into a fraternity called Khalsa. He gave them and himself the common surname Singh (“lion”), a surname used widely today. Women were given equal rights with men in worship and all affairs. Ranjit Singh united all Sikhs and established a kingdom as the Mogul power weakened.

Presently Punjab State has mostly a Sikh population. The Sikhs play a prominent role in agriculture, dairy industry, many business enterprises, and the military. One extremist segment of the Sikhs seeks autonomy and independence for their state through acts of violence.

Religious Teachings and Practices. A popular morning prayer of the Sikhs describes God as “The One, the Truth, the Creator, Immortal and Omnipresent.” The belief in one God is strong. Many names of God taken from Hinduism and Islam are recited for the inner cleansing of the worshipers. Representation of God in images and idols is prohibited.

The Hindu cyclical theory of reincarnation and karma is upheld. If one lives faithfully in devotion and selfless service, after many births he/she will become one with God or achieve moksha or salvation. Though there are three broad ethnic groupings among the Sikhs, the Caste system which is integral to the Hindu theory of transmigration of souls is clearly rejected. The most authoritative and the only canonical scripture is Adi Granth, the first book containing about 6,000 hymns. The scripture is often viewed as representing the deity.
Where there are five baptized Sikhs there is a khalsa or a “community of the pure” and regular reading of the scripture. Boys and girls are initiated into khalsa at the age of puberty. There is no professional priesthood. The place of worship is called gurdwara, or the gateway to the guru. The Sikhs observe several of the Hindu festivals and the birthdays of the main gurus.

In the communication of the gospel to the Sikhs, one main link is their strong belief in one God who is actively present in the world and who may be approached by personal devotion. In recent years, a significant member of Sikhs in the West have been open to the gospel of Christ.

Simonton, Ashbel Green (1833–67). American pioneer Presbyterian missionary to Brazil. Named for the president of Princeton College, who was an advocate of mission, Simonton was dedicated to ministry by his parents, graduated from Princeton College, studied law, and professed conversion in a revival in 1855. Entering Princeton Seminary, he was motivated to missionary service through a sermon by Charles Hodge. He arrived in Rio de Janeiro in 1859, the second Protestant missionary resident in Brazil.

Simonton’s accomplishments were impressive. He learned the Portuguese language extremely well, and in 1862 baptized his first Brazilian convert and organized the First Presbyterian Church of Rio de Janeiro. After his wife died in childbirth in 1864, he continued his ministry despite the loss. He established the first evangelical newspaper in Brazil in 1864, and the following year took part in the ordination of the first Brazilian Protestant minister, José Manuel da Conceição, a former Roman Catholic priest. Along with two other missionaries and Conceição, he organized the first presbytery. He also established the first Presbyterian seminary with three candidates for the ministry. Worn out from his labors and ill with fever, he died on December 9, 1867.

Simpson, Albert Benjamin (1844–1919). Canadian missions motivator and founder of the Christian and Missionary Alliance. Born of Scottish Presbyterian parents, he sensed a call to preach when he was a teenager, and went on to Knox College, Toronto. His first missionary interest sprouted during these years. During his ministry in Louisville, Kentucky, he maintained interest in overseas work through the Evangelical Alliance. In 1878 Simpson had a dream that drove him to commit himself to world missions. Unable to go overseas himself, he became a missions motivator and moved to Thirteenth Street Presbyterian Church in New York City. After he started an independent church, Simpson in 1887 founded the Christian Alliance as a home mission agency and the evangelical Missionary Alliance as a foreign society. Ten years later they formed the Christian and Missionary Alliance. Simpson’s view of missions was simple: focus on Jesus Christ. Christ must be preached to the world, at home and abroad; Christ must be appropriated for Christian living and service. Simpson developed the Fourfold Gospel: Christ as savior, sanctifier, healer, and coming king. He stressed both the urgency of world evangelization and the cooperation of all Christians to do it.

Sin. There is perhaps no concept more central and strategic to the Christian message than that of sin. The concept of sin is central to the biblical narrative of salvation history. It is central to the Christian explanation of suffering and death and is a crucial component of the meaning of the cross. It is key in any evangelistic presentation of the gospel and essential to the call for repentance and faith, in salvation, in sanctification, and in biblical eschatology. And it is foundational to the missionary mandate. It is because of sin and the eschatological consequences of sin, that missionaries go forth preaching a message of judgment and hope.

Missionaries cannot afford simply to take for granted their use of the concept of sin, for at least two reasons. On the one hand missionaries often go to societies in which a sense of sin, and a language for speaking of sin, seem to be markedly absent. On the other hand, many missionaries come from increasingly post-Christian societies where the concept of sin and judgment has come under attack and strong disapproval. Missionaries themselves are increasingly disapproved of as supposed purveyors of an unhealthy sense of sin and guilt. It is important, then, for missionaries to carefully reconsider their understanding and use of the concept of sin.

One might suppose that the concept of sin is simple, not complex, easy to translate and explain in other languages. Such is not the case. When accurately understood, sin carries a heavy load of meaning. Built into the meaning of that one word are ethical/moral, theological, anthropological, and eschatological implications.
Sin

Ethical/Moral. The language of sin presupposes a vigorous notion of good and evil, right and wrong, true moral obligations, normative ideals, and absolute standards. To violate what is ethical and good, to transgress against another person, to fail to exemplify the oral character traits one should, is to sin. Theft, murder, adultery, incest, slander, drunkenness, envy, and witchcraft are spoken of as sins.

At one level this is not a particular problem for missionaries, since all cultures have discourses of moral condemnation—discourses which presuppose notions of good and evil, right and wrong. At another level, missionaries face two distinct problems. First, cultures differ in terms of the ethical and moral norms and ideals which are recognized or stressed. Missionary messages about sin may thus presuppose notions of good and evil, right and wrong which contradict the consciences of those to whom they speak. This has many practical and profound implications for missionaries who hope to make the conscience of their listeners an ally rather than a foe (for a full treatment of such implications, see Priest, 1994).

Second, the biblical themes of God as the source of moral standards and of moral evil as disobedience to God, are implied by the biblical language of sin—but are not necessarily shared by the cultures of the world.

Theological. Dictionaries stress that “sin” is a religious term. “Sin” differs from “immorality,” “evil,” or “crime” in that it implies a vertical Godward dimension—a theological orientation. Sin is “against God.” The Genesis 3 narrative of original sin focuses not on a horizontal relationship (theft, adultery, murder), but on the vertical one, relationship to God. The prohibition, “Don’t eat the fruit!” was of a nature to factor out all other issues except the simple issue of relationship to God. The narrative is one a child can grasp. But the vertical and horizontal are linked. After God is rejected, then Cain kills Abel.

In Psalm 51 David cries out to God, “Against you, you only have I sinned. . . .” David has committed adultery, lied, and murdered faithful Uriah. He has sinned against many, but it is the horror of his failure toward God which grips him. In the Bible God is the central equation, the fundamental fact, the integrating factor of the universe. The ten commandments begin with God, and on that foundation move to the horizontal. Ethics and morality are grounded in theology. Whatever else sin entails, it is rebellion against God.

Missionaries often discover that the society to which they go is more likely to link morality to the ancestors than to God. While many societies will have a vague notion of a high god, such a god is distant and not intimately concerned with people’s ethical behavior. Instead of assuming a strong sense of God and a linkage between God and morality, missionaries must help to construct and re-articulate who God is, as well as the linkage of God and morality. The sense of sin is greatest where the sense of God is greatest (cf. Isa. 6). But the willingness to face God with our own sin will come only where a powerful message of love and grace makes such possible.

Missionaries in secular societies face their own difficulties. Here several centuries of effort have gone into denying that God is necessary to ethics and morality. As a result, the term “sin” has been moved to the margins of moral discourse. Nonetheless, as many philosophers have recognized, the effort to provide foundations for morality and ethics apart from a transcendent source, has utterly failed. The astute apologist will find it possible to present a persuasive witness that God is essential as the foundation of morality, and move from there to the gospel—including discussion of sin.

Anthropological. The concept of sin, as used in Scripture, implies truths about people. It implies, first of all, a high view of human personhood. It would not be meaningful to apply the word “sin” to a tornado, a snake, or a dog. People are active moral agents with free will. Sin is presented in Scripture as evil which is actively chosen by culpable human agents. Such agents are not simply products of heredity or environment. They are active in choosing between good and evil.

The concept of sin also implies a terrible truth about the human condition. Subsequent to the first primordial sin, all humans enter the world as sinners. “Sinful” is an adjective which applies not just to acts, but to people. It is not just that people occasionally commit sinful acts. They are themselves sinful. Sin is not simply episodic (like crime), but a pervasive on-going condition. People are sinful at the deepest levels. Repeatedly the Bible stresses that the outward acts simply reveal something about the inner state: the dispositions of the heart, such as lust, covetousness, and pride.

The concept of sin points to both freedom and captivity. People who actively and freely choose that which is wrong find themselves also to be “slaves” to sin. These twin themes are both important to any presentation of the biblical view of the human condition. Again, such a presentation must take into account what the relevant culture says about human nature, in order to more effectively articulate and communicate the biblical view. For example, one may have to counter the claim of human determinism—that humans are therefore not accountable—or the claim that humans are by nature good, and not sinful.

Eschatological. The word “sin” carries with it the idea of culpability and deserved punishment. “In the day that you eat of it, you shall die.” “The wages of sin is death.” The very language of sin carries with it the idea of deserved and future
Singh, (Sadhu) Sundar

Since early times, expatriate missionaries have used Singapore as a center for outreach to the region. From the 1980s a fresh missionary impetus arose out of the Singapore churches themselves. Singapore is now a center for theological education and mission, assisted by excellent communications and a stable political situation. Increasing affluence, in what is still a religious society, accompanies an intense commitment to hard work. Singaporean culture finds some Christian values, including evangelical and Pentecostal emphases, congenial, though social criticism requires sensitivity. Formal ecumenical engagement has not flourished since independence. Its leadership was associated with expatriates during the colonial era, and pragmatic leadership today sees little point in trying to resolve differences in a dynamic situation where more seems to be gained by independent action. Singapore’s strategic links, including with mainland China, will continue to have importance for Christian mission.

JOHN ROXBOROUGH

Singh, (Sadhu) Sundar (1889–1929). Indian evangelist and missionary. Sundar Singh was born in a well-to-do, pious Sikh family in the Punjab area of North India in 1889. In 1904 a vision of Christ led to his conversion and expulsion from home. Shortly after his baptism on September 3, 1905, he began the life of a wandering renunciant (sadhu). He remained loyal to the institutional church despite criticisms of it and refusal to take membership in any particular body. He was an itinerant evangelist among Hindus as well as a Christian conference speaker.

From 1917, visits to South India, the Far East, and finally Europe and North America brought Sundar to fame. The mid-1920s found him in seriously weakened health and the center of a storm of controversy. Sensationalist accounts of Sundar’s preaching visits and amazing deliverances from persecution in Tibet, Nepal, and other Himalayan regions were the basis of attacks on his character and credibility. Claims made about an ancient Christian monk and a secret sannyasi mission still defy clear explanation.

Sundar saw visions of other worlds, and these lie behind a number of his small books written during the years of poor health. He is a striking example of viewing Christian life and faith from an Eastern perspective, and this gives enduring value to his writings. In broken health in 1929 he died attempting another visit to Tibet.

H. L. RICHARD

Single Missionary

Single Missionary. Jesus lived his earthly life as a single man. The apostle Paul, who was probably single himself, encouraged others to adopt a single lifestyle (1 Cor. 7:35). Roman Catholic missionaries have almost always been single. Even with the increasing involvement of lay men and women in contemporary Catholic mission, the presence of the celibate religious remains the norm.

In contrast, modern Protestant missions have been largely led by married men. Early missionary societies sent single women overseas only in rare instances to help with household chores and to work with women and girls.

Then, during the last half of the nineteenth century, women's missionary societies began to appear. By 1907, 4,710 single women were serving with more than 40 foreign boards. Emerging FAITH MISSIONS also attracted single women. In 1882 CHINA INLAND MISSION reported 56 wives and 95 single women within its ranks. This was the period when women like ADELE FIELD developed the “Bible women” plan for training Asian women as evangelists, and MARY SLESSOR of Calabar exchanged a Victorian lifestyle for “up country” ministry in pioneer tribal areas.

As the twentieth century progressed, women's societies began to merge with denominational boards. Single women lost access to many leadership roles and their numbers began to decline. A 1996 survey of 61 agencies affiliated with INTERDENOMINATIONAL FOREIGN MISSION ASSOCIATION (IFMA) reported that only 11.4 percent of career missionaries were single women.

Although fewer in numbers and influence than they once were, these women are still making their presence felt in mission activities ranging from evangelism, church planting, and theological education to international development, medical work, Bible translation, literacy, communications, and the arts. A few have broken though a “glass ceiling” to serve on agency boards and in mission leadership positions.

Single men are having a missions impact as well, especially in remote frontier areas. Many more are needed. The Mission Handbook: North American Protestant Missions Overseas (11th ed.) observed that the number of single men in missions dropped from 3,905 in 1938 to 903 in 1976. IFMA's 1996 survey reported 144 single men serving as career missionaries with their affiliated agencies.

Singles from the newer sending countries are joining the global missions force, perhaps in greater numbers than in the older countries. A 1994 survey of 64 Korean agencies reported 12.7 percent single women and 7.4 percent single men among their missionaries. A similar Brazilian survey reported 20 percent single women and 10 percent single men. These Two-Thirds World missionaries include persons like Kai-Yum Cheung, founder of a lay school for evangelists in Hong Kong, and Najua Diba, Brazilian missionary to Albania, who has evangelized hundreds and planted at least three churches.

Journal articles about single missionaries tend to be problem-focused, examining issues such as loneliness, living arrangements, acceptance by missionaries and national co-workers, and communication with married couples. Discovering a cultural identity can be particularly difficult. Single men in parts of Africa are not considered adults until they marry. Single women in some situations have been mistaken for a missionary's second wife or mistress. Sometimes solutions to problems of this nature can be found in adopting a culturally understood role for a single, such as that of a religious person who has chosen not to marry.

More research related to single missionaries is needed. The extent of their involvement in missions needs to be described and compared in national and international studies. More biographies of missionaries from the newer sending countries need to be written. Attitudes toward singles require examination, along with theologies of singleness. Agency policies need to be evaluated. Mental health concerns among singles deserve more attention, as do issues related to housing needs, living allowances, and marriages to nationals.

Most important, factors contributing to the declining numbers of singles must be discovered and a concerted effort made to reverse a trend that is depriving the world missions movement of some of its choicest servants.

Lois McKinney Douglas

Sisson, Elizabeth (1848–1934). American evangelist, author, and missionary to India. Born in New England, Sisson was converted in 1863 at New London, Connecticut, and joined Second Congregational Church. She subsequently felt called to ministry while attending an Episcopal ordination service and was later “sanctified” under the ministry of William S. Boardman, a prominent leader in the Holiness movement.

Sisson went to India in 1871 as a missionary with the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS and served in the Madura region of present-day Tamil Nadu. After becoming seriously ill, she returned to the United States in 1887. As a Holiness evangelist, she traveled to California in 1889 and met Carrie Judd Montgomery, a prominent figure in the Christian and Missionary Alliance. Sisson became associate editor of Montgomery’s Triumphs of Faith, published many articles, and wrote several books. She identified with the Pentecostal movement after receiving baptism in the Holy Spirit at the campground at Old Orchard, Maine. In 1918 the Assemblies of God granted her ministerial credentials and she continued in evangelistic work until age eighty. Sisson’s endeavors in India represent the contribution that single women have made to modern missions, while her evangelistic activities reflect the significant role that women played in the early expansion and self-understanding of the Pentecostal movement.

GARY B. McGEE

Bibliography. E. Sisson, Faith Reminiscences and Heart-to Heart Talks; idem, Foregleams of Glory: Resurrection Papers; Faith Reminiscences in Trinity College.

Skepticism. See AGNOSTICISM.

Slavery. See ABOLITIONIST MOVEMENT.

Slessor, Mary (Mitchell) (1848–1915). Scottish missionary to Nigeria. Born in Aberdeen, Scotland, and raised in a one-room home in Dundee, she received only basic education and worked in a textile mill. Converted in her teens, she sought to reach the city’s deprived youth. Her interest in the United Presbyterian Church’s outreach in Calabar led her there after brief training in 1876, at a time when the region was a slave-trade center uncontrolled by any colonial power. Initially at the coast, she learned languages, customs, and religions, and how to cope without Western “necessities.” After twelve years she went to join the Efiks, and in due course became an accepted insider among them. With her chief aim to win Africans for Christ she combined a deep concern for their moral and social welfare. She stoutly opposed slavery, witchcraft, trial by ordeal, human sacrifice, and twin-killing (rarely had she fewer than a dozen babies in her huts). The fifty churches and schools she set up were run by local Christians. When British rule extended over the territory she was made the first woman magistrate in the empire (in 1892). She encouraged commerce between the coast and inland areas, and in 1895 helped found the Hope Waddell Institute, which trained Africans in trades and medical work. From 1903 she worked at Itu among the Ibo people. Hailed affectionately as “the White Queen,” she was a pioneer to the end, believing that “Every day’s duties were done as every day brought them, but the rest was left with God.”

J. D. DOUGLAS

Slovakia. See CZECH REPUBLIC AND SLOVAKIA. (Est. 2000 pop.: 5,468,000; 49,035 sq. km. [18,932 sq. mi.]).

Slovenia (Est. 2000 pop.: 1,945,00; 20,251 sq. km. [7,819 sq. mi.]). Slovenia, a former republic of Yugoslavia, is a semi-mountainous state in central Europe bordered by Austria. Slovenes make up 90 percent of the population. Slovenia is over 91 percent Christian and 87 percent Roman Catholic. The Evangelical Christian Church in Slovenia, a Lutheran movement with over 25,000 members, is the largest evangelical group in the country. Baptists, Brethren, and Pentecostals all claim smaller numbers of adherents.

TODD M. JOHNSON

Small Groups. At the close of the twentieth century there were a significant number of excellent books about small group ministry, cell groups, home groups, growth groups, or the many other names by which this phenomena appears. Wuthnow states that 40 percent of Americans partici-
Small Groups

Participate in a small group. The mega-churches of Asia, Latin America, Africa, and increasingly in Europe and North America are based on a small group model. While small groups are seen as enhancing church growth, Wuthnow says that they are more the result of a healthy church than the cause of it. Recent research in churches on five continents confirms that fact. Small groups often are introduced in a growing church to meet the needs of that growth. Small groups introduced into a stagnant church often have little effect.

A variety of names has sprouted many definitions. One such definition might be the following. A small group consists of five to fifteen people meeting together regularly to fulfill the one-another commands of Scripture, while being integrally related to a local church, and having an outward focus on the world with the overarching purpose of glorifying God.

Icenogle states that small group ministries find their roots in the Old Testament but in general they are patterned after New Testament concepts, especially the ministries of Jesus and Paul. In the early 1990s Carl George popularized the term “meta-church” to describe a structure for cell (small) group ministry. The meta (change) model denotes both a change of form as well as a change of mind. The model includes home-based groups, cell group leaders trained by senior leadership, and a large celebration service that brings the cell groups together for worship. This concept allows for a flexible model which can be applied to any size church. However, having a small group-based church does not guarantee flexibility.

Cell-based churches are those churches in which the principal life of the church is in the cell groups. The imagery comes from the living organism in which the cell is a small part of the body. Without the cell there would be no body. Yet together the cells combined to form the body. Small group-based churches worldwide have similarities which emphasize the important relationship between the small group and large group. (1) Senior leadership in each church has a dynamic vision of what the church is with small groups being a significant factor in that vision. (2) All small groups are integrally related to a local church’s celebration. (3) Churches invest primarily in people not property. Many of these churches must rent facilities for the larger worship celebration. (4) Evangelism, modeled and facilitated by the leadership, is a key factor in the church’s life. (5) Well-developed programs furnish an increasing supply of new leaders while enhancing the skills of growth. (6) Prayer strategies are proactive undergirding all of church life. (7) Worship is meaningful in both the small and large groups.

While small group churches have similarities, the small groups themselves have certain common characteristics. They present a high level of commonality. Members of the small group have a unifying characteristic that brings them together. The members have a group consciousness, a collective perception of unity whereby they identify with each other. They share a common purpose which may be either explicit or implicit, and demonstrate interdependence in satisfaction of needs. The members need to help one another to accomplish the purposes for which they joined the group. Additionally, members influence one another as a result of continuous interaction and communication. Finally, the small group shows an ability to work in a unitary manner, acting as a single organism (see Knowles, 1973).

Ralph Neighbour has pointed out that the small group model is effective for bringing people into the church and growing them in the faith. There are many reasons small groups are effective. Two of the most important may be noted.

First, church outreach moves along the natural networks in any society through interpersonal relationships with family, friends, and colleagues. These natural bridges link people together. Evangelism and Christian nurture occur through these social networks. Within the small group, community is built which strengthens the church, including the larger community celebration. Besides following the natural networks within a given society, small groups also have the ability to move into other societies through the weaker links members have with those groups that are more culturally distant.

Second, small group churches tend to be more relevant as they take advantage of cultural and social similarities of the group. The commonality is much higher in the small group than in the larger church celebration service so specific needs can be met within the group as the Bible is applied to daily life.

Mikel Neumann

Bibliography. W. A. Beckham, The Second Reformation, Reshaping the Church for the 21st Century; J. Comiskey, Home Cell Group Explosion; C. George, Prepare Your Church for the Future; G. M. Icenogle, Biblical Foundations For Small Group Ministry; M. Knowles and H. Knowles, Introduction to Group Dynamics; R. W. Neighbour, Jr., Do We Go From Here? A Guidebook for The Cell Group Church; R. Wuthnow, Sharing the Journey, Support Groups and America’s Quest for Community.

Smalley and his wife Jane went to Indochina in 1950 to serve under the CMA. In 1954 he ac-
Smith, Nico

Smith, Edwin Williams (1876–1957). Scholar and South African pioneer missionary to Zambia. Smith was born in the Cape colony (South Africa) of missionary parents, and educated in England. Returning to Africa in 1898 as a Primitive Methodist missionary, he labored in Lesotho and South Africa before doing pioneering work in northern Rhodesia (Zambia) among the Ila people. He reduced their language to writing and helped produce the first Ila New Testament. He returned to England during World War I, serving in France as a chaplain of the armed forces. After the war he joined the British and Foreign Bible Society, becoming secretary for Western Europe and, eventually, editorial superintendent (1933–39). From 1939 to 1943 he lectured as visiting professor at the Hartford Seminary Foundation in the United States, and in 1943 he became the head of the School of African Studies at Fisk University.

He wrote extensively on social, political, religious, biographical, and anthropological African themes. His writings display a remarkable combination of profound Christian faith, deep concern for the spiritual and general welfare of African peoples, and keen scholarly insight into the social and political problems of the day. They include The Handbook of the Ila Language (1907); Robert Moffat: One of God’s Gardeners (1925); The Golden Stool (1926); The Christian Mission in Africa (1926); and Aggrey of Africa (1929).

KEVIN ROY

Smith, Nico (1929– ). South African missiologist and pastor. Smith served as a missionary in South Africa to the Venda people. However it was not until later in his career when he was professor of missiology at the University of Stellenbosch that he began to see the corrosive effects of apartheid. His opposition to the system of separation of the races was based in his Christian beliefs. He edited Storm-Kompass (Storm Compass) a collection of essays by twenty-four Afrikaner intellectuals condemning apartheid. Resigning his chair at Stellenbosch, he pastored a black Dutch Reformed Church in Mamelodi near Pretoria. Convinced that Christians from the various racial groups in South Africa needed to have contact to be the church, he founded Koinonia, an organization dedicated to providing opportunities for Christians to visit across the racial divide. He was active in the negotiations with the ANC before the government opened talks. Convinced that unless God intervened, there would be genocide in South Africa, Nico spoke of the church being the buffer between the two sides of any racial conflict. It is in part because of the work of Nico and other Afrikaners that there was a peaceful transition to black African majority rule in the post-apartheid era.

JAMES J. STAMOOLIS

Bibliography. R. de Saintouge, Outside the Gate.

Smith, Rodney ("Gipsy") (1860–1947). English evangelist. Born to gypsy parents in England, he was converted in 1876. In 1877, William Booth heard him sing and pray in a meeting, and asked him to become an evangelist in the Salvation Army, a position he held until 1882. He became known as "Gipsy Smith" and in 1889 made the first of many trips to the United States to hold evangelistic meetings. In 1892, he held services in Edinburgh, out of which grew the Gipsy Gospel Wagon Mission. He preached evangelistic crusades around the world from 1897 to 1912. His services were an alternation of singing and preaching, and he performed both tasks. He would preach for a while and then, without warning, launch into a song to reinforce his point. He was once asked in America if he would accept an honorary D.D. He inquired what that meant, and when told it stood for Doctor of Divinity, he replied, "My divinity don't need no doctor." He died while en route to America for another meeting. His legacy is seventy years of preaching the gospel throughout the world. He helped to popularize the practice of using decisions cards to keep records of the number of converts.

TIMOTHY K. BEOUGHER

Bibliography. D. Lazell, From the Forest I Came; H. Murray, Sixty Years an Evangelist: An Intimate Study of Gipsy Smith.

Smuggling. In missionary contexts this refers to carrying Bibles, books, videos, tapes, or other Christian items into a nation or region without the knowledge or approval of government officials. Smuggling activities have ranged from carrying a single copy of Scripture to shipping thousands of copies using trucks or airplanes to transporting whole printing presses for clandestine production and distribution. While no definitive numbers exist, one researcher estimates the presence of 2,000 groups or individuals involved, with perhaps a million Bibles smuggled annually in the Middle East and China alone (of a total of 64 million Bibles distributed worldwide, legally and otherwise). For most organizations, smuggling is just one ministry among many.

Some form of Bible smuggling has been done since at least the time of William Tyndale, who distributed copies of the Bible in vernacular English. Smuggling came to the fore in the latter half of the twentieth century in reaction to athe-istic communist regimes that attempted to control or destroy evangelical churches. The most prominent smuggler has been Brother Andrew, whose book, God’s Smuggler, detailed his efforts behind the Iron Curtain and sparked widespread support for this kind of ministry. Brother Andrew founded the agency Open Doors. Other smugglers include Richard Wurmbrand of Romania, who came to prominence testifying to the U.S. Senate in 1966, and L. Joe Bass, founder of the controversial agency Underground Evangelism. Another prominent organization is The Bible League, which distributes Scriptures to the burgeoning but illegal house churches in China, which have a continuing Bible shortage despite the existence of the government-sanctioned Amity Printing Company.

While the church’s need for Scriptures in communist and Islamic countries was and is extensive, smugglers have come under sharp scrutiny on a number of fronts. Christian critics have pointed out that some smugglers are more concerned with fighting communism than building the church, and that in fact some of their efforts hurt believers more than they have helped. High overhead costs are another target. Promotional literature, occasionally faulted for its sensationalism, has sometimes been accused of ignoring the needs of recipients. Other critics say smuggling is not needed in areas where governments allow Scripture distribution through government-sanctioned channels such as Amity.

Another ethical issue is whether disobeying governing authorities is right for the Christian (Rom. 13). Many smugglers, however, cite Peter’s words before the Sanhedrin as justification for obeying God rather than people (Acts 4:19). They say God’s command to spread the gospel takes precedence over any human law to the contrary. However, some Christians are troubled by the lying that sometimes accompanies smuggling. Brother Andrew in fact says he is against smuggling, which he defines as using any method necessary, including lying, to sell materials and make a profit from them. Andrew says his organization simply asks churches what they need and then supplies it.

While the former Soviet bloc countries have opened up and now allow more religious freedom, the situation is still unsettled. Nationalist-inspired religious protectionism from the dominant Orthodox and Islamic hierarchies will likely continue to make Christian smuggling an option in the future. In communist countries such as China and Vietnam, and in the Muslim world, smuggling will likely continue to be one way to provide the oppressed with God’s word.

STANLEY M. GUTHRIE

Bibliography. D. Barrett, IBMR 21:1 (January 1977): 24–25; Brother Andrew, God’s Smuggler; Editors, Eter-
Social Sciences. Specialization and integration in the social sciences are relatively recent developments in the larger academic disciplines in comparison with studies of the humanities (e.g., philosophy, literature) and the natural sciences (e.g., physics, chemistry). That they are social evidences the people component; that they are sciences shows commitment to certain methodological presuppositions across each of the fields.

While there are several ways of classifying and categorizing disciplines in the social sciences, for the purposes of this article and in their relationship to mission and missiology they include Anthropology, Communication, Economics, Education, Linguistics, Modernization Theory, Politics, Psychology, Religion, Research, and Sociology.

Anthropology is the study of humankind in individual and multiple cultural contexts; communication, the process of information flow among people; economics, the realities of exchange and use of exchange instruments in the world; education, the process of imparting information from one generation to the next, usually in formal contexts such as schools; linguistics, the development and use of language; modernization, a conglomeration of trends with social impact (from Terrorism to Urbanization); politics, the study of political power within cultures and countries; psychology, the study of the mental processes and mechanisms of people; religion, the study of the various ways people express their faiths; research, the issues of how to uncover information concerning human societies (e.g., through Qualitative Research) and sociology the study of the way people associate and relate to each other. Obviously there are significant areas of overlap among each of these disciplines (e.g., Anthropology of Religion, History of Mission, Sociolinguistics, urban anthropology, psycholinguistics, and so on).

Until recently, evangelical Christians in general were suspicious of the social sciences. This stemmed at least in part from an association of these fields of study with sociocultural evolutionists such as Charles Darwin and Herbert Spencer; anti-Christian psychologists such as Sigmund Freud, and economic and sociopolitical theorists like Karl Marx. Additionally, many in the social science fields treat religion as only one aspect of human life, often a peripheral aspect, rather than recognizing it as being at the core of who we are as people.

The presumed conflicts between the social sciences and mission are not unfounded, for most schools of the social sciences rely on nonbiblical assumptions of knowledge and truth, methodology and measures, universe and humanity. Further, at least in the early developments of the disciplines, they often exhibited an unreserved optimism concerning human nature and future destiny.

Interaction of the Social Sciences within Mission. Following the pattern of formation and development of disciplines in the natural sciences, social scientists began by seeking to establish disciplinary distinctiveness for public recognition and after a period of formulation, flourishing, and full-blown growth, the current trend is interdisciplinary integration instead of isolationist specialization. Today social scientists learn from related disciplines, benefit from research done in other fields, borrow and exchange methodologies and techniques from one and another, and are beginning to collaborate in interdisciplinary projects.

For the past several decades, various disciplines and products of the social sciences have been accepted and utilized by Christians for mission. For example, many missions departments in Bible schools and seminaries have anthropologically trained faculty and offer courses in missionary anthropology. With increasing regularity, missionaries are trained in communication studies to enhance their ability to share Christ with non-Christians in culturally relevant ways.

The encouraging trend is that many godly Christian scholars with expertise in the social science disciplines are working toward integrating their academic excellence with Christian faith for mission purposes. As a result, and as mentioned above, an increasing number of Christian workers involved in mission receive basic training in mission-related subjects (e.g., anthropology, linguistics) as part of their ministry preparation.

Though missiology has been a recognized academic discipline in Europe since the turn of this century, the first contemporary conservative evangelical institution in North America to have official degree programs in missiology was the School of World Mission at Fuller Theological Seminary, beginning in September of 1965. Increasingly higher level academic programs (Ph.D.s in particular) are utilizing intercultural studies as their guiding orientation, incorporating formal studies in the social sciences at the advanced level.

It is true that Christians are not of the world but are sent to the world to evangelize (John 17). Concerned Christians are utilizing knowledge and techniques of several related disciplines in the social sciences (ethnogeography, ethnohistory, statistics, communication science, etc.) to answer the following types of questions: What are the social structures and undergirding cultural values that drive people of a given culture? How do they see the world and communicate their thoughts and feelings about their perceptions to others? How do people associate with each other and what rules govern role and status in a given society? What social and cultural dynamics are involved in religious conversion? How are people motivated, and how do they make decisions? What are the means of social change in a culture? What is the impact of urbanization on traditional religion and WORLDVIEW? Many more such questions could be stated. All focus on the human realities with which every culture must grapple. The social sciences help missiologists understand the people of a culture and thus assist fostering SHALOM in a given community.
Social Sciences

Theories and insights of the social sciences can enhance the Christian’s knowledge of how to remove barriers and to build bridges in communicating the gospel to a given group of people. Factors of resistance to the gospel, which include religious background, cultural tradition, language limitations, social structure, and psychological orientations, are to be seriously considered as they impact the missionary task of sowing the gospel seed. Effective applications of the study of these and other important social issues should lead to programs and strategies in mission action. In the midst of seeing the importance of the social sciences, however, the missionary cannot lose sight of the fact that ultimately it is God who brings about the growth of his church. While through history he has chosen to honor careful and prayerful research, thought and planning in outreach ministry, it is still true that he alone draws people to himself and enables their response to Christ.

The interdisciplinary use of the social sciences in missiology has proven to be helpful and fruitful in the CHURCH GROWTH MOVEMENT, a driving force behind the use of the HOMOGENOUS UNIT PRINCIPLE, the understanding of ethnolinguistic peoples and MASS MOVEMENTS, the efforts to evangelize the UNREACHED PEOPLES, and the 10/40 WINDOW.

The current trend of interdisciplinary integration in the social sciences provides an excellent opportunity for Christians to benefit from their insights and implementation. The increasing number of professionally trained social scientists who are also productive workers for the gospel will contribute much to world evangelization, and missionaries will do well to be trained in the various disciplines of the social sciences in preparation for the task of calling those who do not yet know Christ to worship the King of kings.

Socialist, Socialism. A socialist is an advocate of an economic system based on the abolition of private ownership of the means of production and distribution. Socialism differs from COMMUNISM in the sense that socialism is a stage in the transition from capitalism to communism. Whereas socialism abolishes private production, communism abolishes private ownership, thus the principle of socialism would be “from each according to his abilities, to each according to his work,” while communism would say “from each according to his ability to each according to his needs.”

Originating with Henri de Saint-Simon’s Nouveau christianisme (1760–1825) which proposed that religion should guide society toward improving the conditions of the poor, Christian socialism developed through such men as John Stuart Mill and Friedrich Engels to the originator of the “social gospel,” Walter Rauschenbusch, and eventually to theologians Paul Tillich and Reinhold Niebuhr.

The sharing of property and goods in Acts 2:43–44 should not be confused with socialism, because the Jerusalem Christians voluntarily liquidated their property to meet some extraordinary needs, and such extensive actions did not continue on into the apostolic age. The fatal flaw in socialism, so far as Christians are concerned, is in the biblical teaching on the depravity of humanity which ultimately causes pure socialism and communism to fail, because they are based on the supposed perfectibility of man and woman.

WILLIAM H. BAKER

Socialization. See Enculturation.

Society for International Ministries (SIM). A missionary society founded in 1893 when Walter Gowans and ROWLAND BINGHAM of Canada and Thomas Kent of the United States landed in Nigeria determined to evangelize the Sudan region of Africa. Gowans and Kent died during the first year. Bingham, however, persisted and in
Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG)

1901 the first station was established at Patigi on the banks of the Niger River.

In 1893 Benjamin Davidson, a Scotsman, began work on the island of Ceylon, while two Australians, Charles Reeve and Edward Gavin, established a base in Puna, West India. In South America, George and Mary Allen founded the Bolivian Indian Mission (later called Andes Evangelical Mission) in 1907.

Thus, missionaries from Australia, Canada, Great Britain, New Zealand, and the United States independently pioneered missionary work in Africa, Ceylon, India, and South America. Four different societies—Ceylon and India General Mission, The Puna India Village Mission, Bolivian Indian Mission, and the Sudan Interior Mission—resulted from their efforts. These four mission groups joined together in the 1980s to form the SIM.

As an international sending society, branches have been formed in Australia, Canada, East Asia, New Zealand, South Africa, Southern Europe, United Kingdom/Northern Europe, and United States of America, which together form the sending base for the 1,841 members (1995) serving in twenty-five countries.

The society is also an interdenominational faith mission. Each member is accepted on the basis of a personal relationship with Jesus Christ and agreement with the mission's evangelical doctrinal position. Each member must have total trust in God for the supply of all financial need, since the finances of the mission are all based on the proviso "as the Lord provides."

The objectives of the mission are twofold. On the one hand, it exists to develop and encourage interest in missions and to train and send out missionaries in keeping with the Great Commission. This focus is centered on local churches wherever they exist. It is a teaching and training role that assists recruits to fulfill the responsibility of their churches to be concerned both locally and for the whole world (Acts 1:8).

On the other hand, the mission also exists to fulfill the unfinished task of evangelism and to plant churches in parts of the world where the gospel has not been proclaimed adequately. Its goal is to begin, nurture, and equip churches and work in a loving, trusting, interdependent relationship with them.

The means to these objectives are multifaceted with a wide range of ministries in such things as aviation, evangelism and church planting, health care, relief and development, media, translation, linguistics, and literacy, along with theological and Christian education.

To this end, SIM has been blessed of God during the twentieth century in seeing more than ten thousand local churches brought into being. The mission believes the local church is God's plan for worship, witness, and the training of believers. The task of the mission, along with evangelism and church planting, is to provide leadership training that in turn enables those churches to train and send out their own missionaries.

These churches banded together in 1980 to form the Evangel Fellowship, which included member church associations comprising more than eight thousand local congregations from twelve non-Western countries. Under the leadership of Panya Baba, in 1996 Evangel Fellowship formed the Evangelical Fellowship of Missions Association. The purpose of this new association was to stimulate mutual prayer for missions efforts of Fellowship members, encourage the formation and strengthen existing national movements, and coordinate joint mission efforts. The association enhances partnership and interdependence between these churches from the Third World and SIM. In this effort a fresh group of totally committed missionaries has been organized and mobilized to partner in the task of world evangelization.

IAN M. HAY

Bibliography. R. Bingham, Seven Sevens of Years and a Jubilee; W. H. Fuller, Run While the Sun Is Hot; idem, Tie Down the Sun; J. H. Hunter, A Flame of Fire: The Life and Work of R. V. Bingham.

Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG). The SPG, the first Anglican missionary agency, was founded in London, England, in 1701 at the instigation of Thomas Bray and a group of landed gentry and clergy who upon Bray's return from a survey of colonial religious conditions. Their twofold intention emerged in a matter of weeks: to bolster Anglican Christianity among emigrants settled in the diversifying religious landscape of British colonies in North America and the Caribbean, and to secure "the conversion of heathens and infidels" in those colonies. The SPG was supported by voluntary subscriptions at the outset, but was firmly tied to established English institutions. It was incorporated by a royal charter and its first meeting was convened under the chairmanship of the archbishop of Canterbury. The ninety-six members of its original corporation envisioned the proper Protestant proclamation of the gospel to result in the creation of a self-supporting Anglican parish system and Prayer Book liturgy modeled on those of the mother country.

Under such competent missionary-clergy as the former Quaker George Keith, SPG clergy traveled throughout the colonies preaching, establishing congregations, recruiting missionaries, and sending reports to London. Typically, the congregation would provide the church a parsonage and a minimum salary; the SPG would outfit the missionary with a library, transatlantic fare, and a supplementary stipend. Success came soon. In the first forty years, seventy missionaries arrived and one hundred churches were built; by 1759 the Anglican Church in South Carolina was self-sufficient. But missions to indigenous people were few and unsuccessful (including those of a failed SPG missionary to Georgia, the young John Wesley), and SPG missionaries had to face the entrenched and hostile descendants of Puritan settlers the farther north they ventured.
Sociology of the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG)

At the turn of the century, driven from the colonies by the American Revolution, several problems burdened the SPG: a lax Georgian spirituality leading to a dependence on government grants, and from 1799 an Anglican competitor, the self-consciously evangelical and conversionistic Church Missionary Society. The SPG had to rethink its identity, theology, and strategy and compete for British resources. Renewal of the society came about in the shape of the “Hackney Phalanx,” a distinctly high church group led by Joshua Watson with an incarnational and sacramental view of its overseas ministry. To that end it set up diocesan SPG committees, raised funds, sent off scores of missionaries, expanded the geographic scope of the Society to keep pace with growing British imperialism, widened the mission of the SPG to include educational and medical projects, and supported it all by its own income. By 1900 SPG missionaries were working throughout the British Empire in 115 languages on their full range of projects, having helped create a significant number of autonomous Anglican dioceses.

The present century has been full of tremendous change for the SPG; it has felt the full weight of modernity bear down upon its mission and organization. Early in the century its faith in ecumenism, globalization, and indigenization drew it into the great Protestant optimism of the 1910 World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh. However, as the decades passed trends of all sorts, from postcolonialism to secularism and pluralism, challenged the self-concept of the Society. A drop in funds, recruitment, and projects prompted a merger of the SPG with the Universities’ Mission in Central Africa (1965) and the Cambridge Mission to Delhi (1968). The new mission was called the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel; its new mandate has called its members to be “servants of the church” throughout the world, those that offer their experience and skills wherever needed, under the rubric of a compassionate and holistic gospel.

Paul H. Friesen

Sociolinguistics. The study of the many ways people use language in social interaction. Specialists in the discipline often distinguish between two major subdivisions, the sociolinguistics of society and the sociolinguistics of language. Each focuses primarily on one of the two ends of a continuum, with society at one extreme and language at the other.

The Sociolinguistics of Society. The sociolinguistics of society deals with the ways language and language-related decisions influence or shape groups of people, ranging from small subgroups within a society to entire nations. It includes the study of phenomena such as the attitudes of one group toward their own language and toward the languages of other groups, the survival and death of languages, the roles of individual languages in multilingual countries, and the spread of English as an international language.

Each of these areas of inquiry has practical implications for the members of a society. In multilingual countries, for example, the use of one language in government and/or education, usually elevates the status of its speakers while simultaneously marginalizing the speakers of other languages within the country. Likewise, in many nations the rapid growth of English as an international language has improved the financial status of those who can use it as the common language for conducting business transactions. Furthermore, the unprecedented growth in the number of speakers of English has fostered an increased sharing of ideas by researchers and practitioners in the various subfields of science and technology.

Mission agencies frequently draw on sociolinguistic data when they select the languages their personnel should learn, often encouraging the study of languages with the greatest numbers of speakers of the greatest perceived importance within the country or region. In addition, missionaries do sociolinguistic research when they conduct language surveys in order to make well-informed decisions about translation and literacy needs.

The Sociolinguistics of Language. The sociolinguistics of language addresses the ways various social factors and other variables influence or shape the language of its individual users. These include factors such as the speaker’s social status, sex, and level of education, and for a given communicative exchange, the level of formality of the context, and the relationship of the participants.
When interacting with others, speakers who know a language employ more than the phonological, grammatical, and semantic patterns of that language. They also know how to produce utterances that are appropriate for a wide variety of social settings. For example, they know how to modify their speech or writing when addressing adults versus children, when addressing family members versus strangers. They generally know when to speak, how long to speak, and when it is more appropriate to remain silent. This often intuitive knowledge is part of their sociolinguistic competence (Savignon, 1983, 41–42).

Sociolinguistic competence refers to a person's knowledge of and ability to use the verbal and nonverbal social rules of language. That is, it includes the ability to produce language that is within an acceptable range and to interpret the intended meaning from the language used for various speech acts (e.g., greetings, small talk, persuading, apologizing, complaining, sympathizing), relationships or social roles (e.g., friend/friend, stranger/stranger, insider/outsider, older person/younger person, person of higher status/person of lower status), situations (e.g., lady buying food in the market, elementary teacher telling a Bible story to children, doctor examining a patient, traveler inquiring about lost luggage at the airport), and psychological roles (e.g., formal/informal, happy/unhappy, patient/impatient, sensitive/insensitive, caring/indifferent, courteous/discourteous) (Canale and Swain; Dickerson; Larson).

This branch of sociolinguistics is highly relevant for missionary language learners. As Kindell (1995, 171) points out, "The missionary who wishes to communicate the Gospel effectively must learn . . . a range of appropriate [linguistic] behaviors for that society." She notes that for adults who are learning to represent Christ in a society, the acquisition of sociolinguistic norms is one of the most important tasks of the language learner, as well as one of the most difficult.

LONNA J. DICKERSON

SEE ALSO Linguistics, Linguistic Theory.

Sociological Barriers. Jesus succeeded in breaking through social and economic barriers in order to reach people with the gospel. Huge crowds followed him. He accepted invitations from people from every strata of society, and ministered to the sick, the demonized, Gentiles, women, children, and other groups awarded little or no status in his day. Yet Jesus’ approach was not merely a method; it reflected a genuine attitude of the heart that all creatures are equally precious in the sight of God. Paul, likewise, was concerned to remove legitimate obstacles in order to maximize people's opportunity to hear the gospel. While being careful never to compromise the offense of the cross itself, Paul sought to “become all things to all men” in order to at least “save some” (1 Cor. 9:19–23).

To this day, economic and sociological factors loom large in missionary proclamation. The CHURCH GROWTH MOVEMENT has advocated the HOMOGENOUS UNIT PRINCIPLE as well as a focus on receptive, responsive people groups to enhance the influx of new believers into the church (see RECEPTIVITY). Betty Sue Brewster has urged missionaries to bond with nationals rather than being submerged in a missionary subculture (see BONDING). Jonathan Bonk has recently examined disparities in living standards between Western missionaries and nationals. Roger Greenway and others have advocated a simpler lifestyle for missionaries. Proponents of the Church Growth Movement have alerted the missions world to the need to pay attention to sociological factors within the societies in which missionaries work. Mission work will be more effective if attention is paid to social stratification, homogeneous units, and webs of relationships. Homogeneous units are sections of society in which all the members have some characteristic in common, such as language or dialect, ways of life, standards, level of education, self-image, places of residence, and other characteristics. This insight has led later missiologists to define people groups as significantly large sociological groupings of individuals who perceive themselves to have a common affinity for one another (Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization).

DONALD MCGAVRAN observed that people like to become Christians without crossing racial, linguistic, or class barriers. He concluded that church planters who enable people to become Christians without crossing such barriers are significantly more effective than those who place them in people's way. Not merely rational, denominational, and theological elements play a significant role in conversion, but also environmental factors, be they economic (see ECONOMICS) or sociological. McGavran also noted that Americans are accustomed to a unified society and consequently do not like to face the fact that most human societies are stratified along socioeconomic and other class lines. Some contend that church growth advocates assess people's receptivity too optimistically and that its methods are largely products of Western pragmatism and utilitarianism. The rise of seeker-oriented
Sociological Barriers

Churches in North America and elsewhere has demonstrated how the removal of socioeconomic obstacles and the targeting of specific segments of society with the gospel may lead to significant, even explosive, church growth. It has been objected, however, that even necessary obstacles to conversion and Christian growth, such as adequate instruction on the cost of discipleship, have occasionally been removed. Indeed, care must be taken not to sanction capitalistic, self-serving lifestyles and aspirations with the blessing of the gospel. Jesus' message to a similar audience may have been more confrontational and radical, rather than being directed primarily to meet people's needs while deemphasizing certain offensive elements of the Christian message.

Today mission has frequently become, not merely a calling from God, but a career. North American missionaries have grown more concerned about having incomes, health insurance, and retirement benefits comparable to professionals in their home country. Moreover, it has become increasingly common for missionaries not to serve for a lifetime but merely for a term, so that provision is made for circumstances conducive to their return home even before departure. Together with their dependence on foreign support while on the field and the frequent requirement for them not to engage in formal employment while serving with a missions agency, barriers are erected that set many missionaries up for failure from the very outset. This is not to minimize legal requirements for residency in the respective countries where missionaries serve or to belittle the needs of missionaries. It does, however, call for a conscious return to the attitudes modeled by Jesus, Paul, and the early church, and for a conscious effort to legitimately remove economic and social barriers for the sake of those who are to be reached with the gospel.

Andreas J. Kostenberger

See Also Conversion.

Bibliography. D. McGavran, Understanding Church Growth; G. W. Peters, A Theology of Church Growth; C. P. Wagner, Church Growth and the Whole Gospel.

Sociology. Study of human relationships and interaction. It employs methods of empirical and theoretical research in looking at group behavior, organizational life, and social problems. Sociologists look for patterns in human behavior in the attempt to both understand and predict forms of group, institutional, and social life.

The predictive function of sociology is often controversial. Taken to the extreme, it can result in sociological determinism, the notion that all human behavior is determined by social forces and location, and can be predicted through the assemblage of sufficient sociological data about a group or individual. But such rigid determinism is dangerous and antithetical to a biblical understanding of humanity and the sovereignty of God. Rather, the predictive function of sociology is best understood as a tool that helps discern patterns of human interaction in such a way that those engaged in significant roles within a given society will be able to plan, govern, negotiate, organize, and even evangelize within a given social order with some empirically verifiable idea of what is happening around them.

In doing sociological investigation, sociologists collect significant amounts of social data in order to establish some empirical basis for their conclusions. Quite often, the “common wisdom” of a society about a certain group, people, or behavior is based on stereotype, myth, or social location, rather than actual observation. Sociology serves an important function by exposing false ideas and beliefs about society and people, and giving accurate information that can aid in forming both public policy and social consensus.

There are two general areas of concern for the sociologist—the institutional life of a social group and the means of interpretation by which a group comes to understand its life together. The institutional life of a group is referred to as its social structure, or substructure. We can define the substructure as the system of shared relationships of the group. This would include patterns of behavior that are regularized by occupation (teacher, bus driver, nurse, mechanic, or musician) or family status (mother, father, cousin, son, grandparent) or religion (pastor, member, Baptist, Methodist) or political association (mayor, citizen, Republican, Democrat, ward leader, judge). Often, modern society is said to be composed of seven major institutions: family, government, economic/financial, religion, education, health/medical, and information/media.

The means of interpretation by which a social group understands its life together is called its culture, or superstructure. We can define the superstructure as the system of shared understandings of the social group. This includes patterns of ideas, values, beliefs, attitudes, and language that are common to the group. While anthropology is the social science most often associated with the investigation of human culture, sociologists are also concerned with questions of meaning and belief. Indeed, it is quite difficult to study the substructure and institutional life of a people without some basic understanding of how the group itself interprets its various forms of human interaction.

At one time, sociology was viewed with suspicion by orthodox Christians. This was due to sociology's strong reliance on empirical methodology, as well as the discipline's roots in nineteenth-century positivistic philosophy, which sought to place humanity at the center of the universe rather than God. However, the discipline has emerged as a helpful tool to the church in general and missionary movements in particular, as Christians have sought to contextualize sociological findings within a biblical-theological framework, and see how discerning patterns of human interaction have aided church leaders in negotiating the relationship between church and society. In his important text, Sociology and the Human Image (1982), British sociologist David Lyon shows how a Christian theological anthropology—an understanding of humankind as created in the Image of God, and in need of full restoration of that image through a personal relationship with Jesus Christ—is a necessary corrective to early excesses of sociological thinking about human interaction that rejected the idea of humanity-in-response-to-God and sought to establish the total autonomy of humanity and human will. While Lyon stops short of arguing for a “Christian sociology” he does aver that Christians can learn much from the empirical study of patterns of human interaction.

The problems of sociology’s root are real, but clearly surmountable. Auguste Comte, the nineteenth-century French philosopher, coined the term by joining the Latin word socius (relationship) with the Greek word logos (study/knowledge) and deemed his new “sociology” a philosophy that would replace theology as the principal lens through which the human condition could be analyzed and understood. In his writings he called for the replacement of theologians by philosopher-entrepreneurs as the “new priests” of the emerging world order. While not as openly hostile to religion, Englishman Herbert Spencer also joined the rapidly growing sociological movement. His signal text Principles of Sociology (1882) drew from Darwinian philosophy, applying evolution, natural selection, and “survival of the fittest” to human social development. In these early years, sociology was as much a philosophy as a human science. It did, however, place increased emphasis on empirical research as the method of analysis. Indeed, much of Spencer’s knowledge of so-called primitive societies, a knowledge base necessary for his theories of human social development, came from information collected from the missionaries of his time.

As an empirical discipline, sociology began to look particularly at social problems, and became a primary tool in the hands of persons interested in political, social, and even religious solutions to the social ills of the day.

While French sociologist Frederic Le Play introduced the case study method of research (the study of a single group in great detail to discern social patterns and problems), the first major case study done in the United States was undertaken by African American social scientist W. E. B. DuBois beginning in 1896. Published as The Philadelphia Negro (1899), the study analyzed the problems of the black community and its environs and, consistent with the aims of the sociological research of the day, included specific recommendations for social policy and reform.

As sociology developed in the twentieth century, its methods became more varied and its subject matter more diffuse. Sociologists such as Talcott Parsons concentrated on general theories of society and social organization. Influenced by both the positivism of Comte and the functionalism of the German social thinker Max Weber, Parsons argued that society was held together by consensus—‘equilibrium’—and that its varied parts were understood best in terms of their function in maintaining the stability of society as a whole. Others, such as W. I. Thomas and C. Wright Mills, looked at the smaller relationships within society to show how the simplest forms of human interaction could be the starting point for understanding the more broad patterns of human behavior.

There are two ways to look at field development in sociology. The first, related to method, divides social research and theory into several areas such as (1) general sociological theory—investigation into the general ordering of society and the interactions of its various institutions mentioned above; (2) community studies—the study of human life in and adaptation to the environments of neighborhood of geographical area such as the city, suburb, rural community, or exurb most often using case study method; (3) demography—the study of the distribution, movements, and changes of populations; (4) social organization—the study of institutional life: the ordering of social organizations and associations for common purpose in the social order; and (5) social change—the investigation of those forces in society that cause social change, and the processes through which a group moves in changing, such as assimilation, disintegration, conflict, and even war.

The second involves fields of investigation and data gathering, such as race and ethnicity, gender studies, religion, family studies, urban and rural sociology, and even political and economic life. In the case of the latter, cooperation with specialists in political science and economics can yield important insights concerning the nature of social organization. Indeed, all of the social sciences have roots in the quest for greater understanding of human society ushered in with the ENLIGHTENMENT. The study of RACE and ETHNICITY have been important as human societies have witnessed increased interaction between various ethnic groups within society in general, and in the United States, where race and ethnicity has long been a central interest to sociologists in particular. Gender studies have become increasingly important as social changes in the roles of women and interaction between women and men becomes evident in society.
Sociology

The increased urbanization of societies across the globe has yielded a significant increase in interest in urban sociology. As mission specialists become aware of the growing importance of cities in society, and the effect that urban ways of life are having on whole cultures, urban sociology becomes an important tool in mission studies. Sociologists and missions specialists look at the impact of cities on family organization, economic well-being, socialization patterns, and the interpretive schemes of a given culture, and offer church leaders important counsel in issues of evangelization and the contextualization of the gospel.

Harold Dean Trulear

Sociology of Music. Related to ethnomusicology, the sociology of music may be broadly defined as the study of relationships between societies and the music they produce. Whereas traditional Western musicology focuses on individual composers and musical works, the sociology of music aims at understanding the social contexts that shape composers, performers, listeners, and their music.

The sociology of music begins in the later work of Max Weber. Weber saw Western music as broadly reflective of the gradual rationalization of society. Musical indications of this rationalization include the establishment of a notation system, the standardization of scales (particularly the well-tempered scale), and the development and acceptance of harmonic, melodic, and rhythmic patterns. These aspects of Western music provide the basis by which large and complex works may be performed by up to several hundred musicians working from the same score. Weber understood these results as neither intended nor predictable, but reflective of fundamental aspects of Western conceptual thought which shows deep influence from the Reformation.

T. W. Adorno supports Weber's position but asserts that the process of rationalization includes increasing controls that force Western artistry into bondage, either to totalitarianism or to capitalistic economic forces. Adorno identifies the Nazi use of German music (particularly the works of Richard Wagner) as a form of imperialism. However, he does not feel that Western free societies offer a liberating alternative. For Adorno, the capitalist free market is another form of tyranny that forces composers and musicians to write for the market, rather than from artistic inspiration. Both the totalitarian and the free market approaches include artistic subjugation, although the capitalist forms of control are more difficult to specifically identify. Adorno feels the genuine artist is one who breaks with either form of control in order to create from critical artistic motivation. His heroes include J. S. Bach, L. Beethoven, and A. Schoenboerger.

Investigation of music as a means to resist imperialism occupies a prominent place in writing since World War II. Of particular interest are several studies that explore the uses of music to support, maintain, and develop ethnic and religious identity—particularly when that identity is dominated or threatened. African American music and its social aspects provides much material for research in North American culture. Another example is the study of music in European Jewish communities under Nazi occupation.

In a recent work, P. J. Martin defends the socialization view of musical ideals and meanings. This position opposes views that advocate either the superiority of Western music (rooted in Social Darwinism) or the existence of musical deep structures (inspired by N. Chomsky's work in linguistics). According to Martin, musical ideals and meanings are entirely enculturated through socialization. These ideals may be observed through a given society's concepts of 'right' or 'wrong' musical patterns as well as meanings and associations commonly attributed to music styles and specific works.

Awareness of the general phenomenon of music socialization can greatly aid missionaries in the acculturation process. Arts of every kind provide windows into societies. Music, in particular, often expresses deeply held values, ideals, and myths. Careful research of a society's historic and contemporary artistic output is often beneficial in aiding missionaries in accurately acculturating into a host worldview.

In addition, a thorough understanding of the host culture's musical styles and associated meanings may give missionaries powerful tools for witness and Christian growth. Appropriate indigenous musical styles and texts address both the cognitive and affective dimensions, combining to create a medium that often overshadows the traditional spoken or printed word.

Finally, missionaries may significantly aid in the development of emerging Christian communities by encouraging critical appraisal of music from external sources. It is virtually impossible to impede outside music influences, but through thoughtful evaluation, local Christian communities can determine what aspects of style, content, and composer-performer intentions are appropriate. In addition, encouraging communities to create musical styles and works that express Christian convictions within their unique cultural contexts can enhance local identity as well as enrich the worldwide church.

Steven J. Pierson
Sociology of Religion. The study of religion has been attempted through the research paradigms and methodologies of the academic disciplines of theology, psychology, history, philosophy, and the twin disciplines of the social sciences—anthropology and sociology. While methodologically diverse a social science approach to the study of religion has traditionally been threefold: to identify, to describe, and to explain the diversity of practices and beliefs associated with human understandings regarding the nature and purpose of their existence, which generally includes their relationship to and understanding of the numerous. Social scientists have never been able to offer a universally agreeable definition for religion and those that have been proposed range from the parsimonious definition offered by E. B. Tylor, “the belief in spiritual beings,” to the cumbersome definition of C. Geertz, “a system of symbols which acts to establish powerful, pervasive and long-lasting moods and motivations in men by formulating conceptions of a general order of existence, and clothing these conceptions with such an aura of factuality that the moods and motivations seem uniquely realistic.” While Geertz manages to avoid the use of such terms as supernatural, sacred, or spiritual, social scientists acknowledge that in spite of the inadequacies of language the sociological study of religion attempts to identify human understandings and responses to such phenomena. As such, the sociology of religion has encompassed such religiously associated topics as Ritual and Ceremony, Cosmology, social organization, Myth and Religious Scriptures, religious practitioners, and any other associated beliefs, practices, or experiences (see also Belief Systems). At times social scientists have coined terminology to identify religious phenomena (such as Animism, or the many terms that classify various divination techniques; see Diviner, Divination). At other times they have borrowed foreign terms from cultures under investigation (such as Totem, Taboo, and mana). One of the major challenges to the social sciences in respect to the task of identification of religious phenomena is the problem of similarity versus diversity. The broad diversity of religious beliefs and practices required careful ethnographic analysis of particular cultural practices prior to making cross-cultural comparisons or concluding that a given phenomenon is present in that culture.

With respect to the descriptive task of the social sciences, sociologists and anthropologists have discovered that some religious concepts are universal, that religious ideas and practices are intricately interwoven with other cultural concepts and institutions, that religious institutions reflect a culture’s other social institutions, that religious sentiments constitute an important aspect of the social and cultural identity of a group, and that religion acts as a powerful motivation for behavior. They have further adopted what has come to be known as “an insider” or etic approach and “an outsider” or emic approach to describing cultural concepts.

In their attempts to explain religious beliefs and behavior social scientists do not have a unifying theory of religion on which they can agree, nor do they have a shared set of methodological tools by which to approach the study of religion in culture. At the heart of the problem associated with explanations of religious behavior is the issue of research bias, in which the theoretical or ideological presuppositions of the researcher influence the end results of the research.

Early sociological research sought to demonstrate that religion is the product of evolutionary development and forced a considerable amount of selected cultural data into their system until the whole theory collapsed under the weight of contrary data. Later functionalist and psychopathological theories sought to explain religious sentiments and practices as the product of ignorance, neurosis, false consciousness, or outright manipulation. Most such attempts to portray religion as irrational have not fared well and have in some instances reached ignominious dead ends.

In more recent years new and competing theories of religion have emerged that have sought to acknowledge a degree of legitimacy for religious beliefs and practices. While most social scientists continue to be skeptical or even hostile toward the subject matter of religion they have sought to record its implications in society. This has led them to inquire into such matters as the costs and benefits of religious behaviors, and the ecological and cultural consequences of any set of religious practices. The purpose of such studies has been to apply empirical testing, formulate falsifiable propositions, and demonstrate meaningful correlations between beliefs and social practices without at the same time becoming involved in the task of falsifying the doctrines or teachings of a given religious system. Critics of this approach to the study of religion accuse social scientists of confusing the benefits and sociocultural consequences of religion with the source or primal cause for the emergence and continuance of a religious system.

Postmodern social scientists have embraced a blend of humanist and interpretive approaches to conclude that the goal of a sociological study of religion ought to be that of recording and interpreting the meaning of religion in the lives of its believers. Such an approach rejects the notion...
Sociology of Religion

that the sociological study of religious behavior can properly ascertain an objective and scientific description of cause and effect in religion because the supernatural cannot be subjected to such testing methods. Social scientists, they claim, should focus on the evocation and description of religious phenomena, and then, rather than trying to explain such behavior based on a secularist or ethnocentric theory, to interpret its meaning as perceived by the participants. This approach has sparked a lively debate within the discipline by those who see no logical guidelines to prevent researchers from flights of fantasy in their interpretive descriptions of religious experiences. In order to gain greater acceptance in the discipline this particular approach to the study of religion will have to ascertain commonly agreed hermeneutical guidelines for the legitimate interpretation of religious behaviors.

There has been a long history of antagonism between theology and the social sciences primarily because of the secularizing influences and critical scrutiny of the scientific community that has denied the epistemological validity of faith, revelation, and intuition. On the other hand scientists also recognize that science is not the perfect approach to truth and that all knowledge is at best tentative.

Douglas J. Hayward

See also Anthropology of Religion and Phenomenology of Religion.

Sodality and Modality. Roman Catholics have found the term sodality handy to refer to groups of younger and older women organized in a fellowship to handle some function within a parish. They apparently needed a word that did not include whole families but could refer to fellowships along age, sex, or task lines. The Protestant church historian, Latourette, employed the term in that same sense.

Cultural anthropologists came along and expanded the usage to include groups such as customary teams of young men who would together handle, say, irrigation duties. They have used it to refer to any coherent sub-group within a community which does not include entire families but only teams, task forces, or social groups of some kind. This has been the meaning when paired with the newly coined term, modality.

The very word sodality harks back to the Latin, meaning social group. But why would a term like this be in a dictionary of missions? And how did modality get connected to it? The author of this entry once wrote an article distinguishing between church communities and mission bodies, and needed a pair of general terms to do so. Jim Reapsome retitled that article (Evangelical Missions Quarterly, Oct. 1970), as “Churches need missions because modalities need sodalities.” Later, in a much more detailed historical study, “The Two Structures of God’s Redemptive Mission” (Missiology 2:1 [January 1974]: 121–39) this writer compared the synagogue as a modality to the sodalities constituted by Pharisaic mission bands that “traversed land and sea to make a proselyte,” and, consequently compared the Antioch congregation as a modality related to, but not with authority over, the sodality of Paul’s missionary band (which was not responsible to just one church). Then, in a major jump of time the parallel logically arose between the later Roman parishes as modalities when compared to the Roman orders which could be called sodalities along with what Protestants often call parachurch structures (see also Parachurch Agencies and Mission)—which normally do not count whole families as members. In a “missionary family,” for example, usually only the adult members of the family are considered members of the mission. They are the ones who have made a second adult decision to become members. Some others have referred to the same distinction with the phrases church structures and mission structures, the difficulty being that it is important to insist that both structures are equally part of the church of Jesus Christ.

It is especially important to note that the sodality/modality distinction does not correspond precisely to the common church/parachurch terminology. One difference is that the sodality/modality terms in broad meaning may refer to secular entities, not just Christian entities. Even more specifically, many misunderstand the sodality/modality terminology to categorize denominational mission boards as modalities (just because they are closely allied with modalities) and fail to see that sodalities may (and should) track closely with one or more denominations, and often do, just as military structures are usually linked closely to civil modalities. Also, in America, a newly founded “church” fellowship is very much like a sodality if it is merely a “gathered” congregation of individual believers. It does not neatly fit into the modality category though it may be heading in that direction. The “churches” of the mission field and in the New Testament are often basically clusters of extended families and thus, like small towns and other civil entities, true modalities.

Ralph D. Winter

Soga, Tiyo (1829–71). South African pioneer minister, missionary, writer, and translator. Son of a Xhosa leader, Soga was among the first of his people to receive an education. He attended a mission school, Lovedale. Taken to London in 1846 to escape war, he was baptized and returned to South Africa in 1848. He took a teaching post, but had to escape again in 1850, leaving for Scotland in 1851 to study at the University of Glasgow. He was the first South African ordained in the Presbyterian Church (1856). After marrying a Scottish woman in 1857, he returned to the Cape province in South Africa as a missionary among the Ngqika at Mgwali (1858–68) and Titura (Transkei; 1868–71). He preached and taught literacy, relying on indigenous helpers to spread the work. His translation of Pilgrim’s Progress into Xhosa had a deep impact on the language.

Traditional missionary practice of the time was to separate converts from their traditional religious practices, about which Soga was ambivalent. For example, he generally accepted Xhosa customs, but specifically rejected circumcision in an encounter with church members in 1863 (he himself was circumcised). He fought against the dehumanizing colonialist attitudes while remaining within the Presbyterian Church, showing how to develop self-identity without a complete rejection of the colonial order. Long before political independence, he taught that the indigenous Africans had a rightful place in their political heritage. His life and teachings have resulted in his being regarded by some as the father of black nationalism in South Africa.

A. Scott Moreau

Solomon Islands (Est. 2000 pop.: 444,000; 28,896 sq. km. [11,157 sq. mi.]). A sparsely populated archipelago of densely forested, mountainous tropical islands about 1,000 miles northeast of Australia in the Pacific Ocean. The Kwaraee, at just 9 percent of the population, is the largest ethnic group among at least 70 other groups. The people are 96 percent Christian but this is shared between Anglicans, Protestants, and Roman Catholics. The largest Evangelical movements are the South Sea Evangelical Church, planted in 1904 from Australia, and the Seventh-Day Adventists, each representing over 30,000 members.

Todd M. Johnson

Soultau, Henrietta Eliza (1843–1934). English missionary candidate assessor. Born into a fervent Brethren family, Soultau was the second of nine children. She came to Christ after months of anguish were answered with a vision in which she realized that she had not surrendered to him.

In 1866, she heard Hudson Taylor speak and gave herself to God’s service in China. Her father died in 1875, and she was finally free to apply to the China Inland Mission (CIM). However, she was rejected from field service for health reasons and redirected to start a boarding school for missionary children in England. She ran the school for the next fourteen years without regular income, trusting God to meet their needs.

In 1889, Taylor asked her to found and direct a school in which the suitability of potential missionary candidates would be assessed. She carried on with the lessons learned in trusting God for the boarding school and ran the candidate school finances by faith. She directed the house from 1889 until 1916, assessing almost 500 of the single women who were accepted for service in China through CIM.

Her only visit to China came on a seventeen-month expedition in 1897 and 1898, when she toured forty-four mission stations. Soultau died of complications from a stroke, leaving a legacy of being instrumental in sending literally hundreds of women into the labor of the harvest.

A. Scott Moreau

Somalia (Est. 2000 pop.: 10,787,000; 637,657 sq. km. [246,199 sq. mi.]). To be a Somali is to be a Muslim. Somalia, composed of one major language and ethnic group, the Somalis, has practiced the Islamic faith, brought by Arab and Persian traders, for nearly one thousand years. Entrenched in their Sunni or Sufi Islamic traditions, many of the 10 million Somalis have had the opportunity to hear the gospel, yet few have responded.

The lack of mission effectiveness is intricately linked with the history of the country. Both religious and political factors have worked together to make this nation highly resistant to Christianity. Modern Christian mission work, initiated by Swedish Lutheran missionaries, began in 1898. They claimed 350 converts by 1935 when Mussolini expelled them out of the country. In the 1880s the Roman Catholic Church founded schools, hospitals, and churches in association with the Italian colonial administration. Meanwhile, British colonial authorities forbade all mission work north in Somaliland where a revolt sparked by the conversion of Somali orphans to French Catholicism was led by fanatical Muslims from 1900 to 1920. Other evangelical mission work (SIM and Eastern Mennonite Board) continued up to and beyond independence in 1960, when Somaliland and Somalia became one independent country.

However, the socialist “revolution” of 1969, with the coming of Maxamed Siyaad Barre to power, expelled from the country virtually all Western organizations, including missionaries. In 1977, Somalia suffered a disastrous defeat at the hands of Ethiopia, opening up the country to foreign and Christian relief and development agencies working with refugees. Civil war broke out in northeastern Somalia in 1977 and 1982 in its bid for independence. This war eventually spread throughout the country by 1988. The infrastructure of the country was totally destroyed and the nation has disintegrated into warring clans. In 1992, the UN recognized Somalia as one of the world’s worst humanitarian disasters. The outlook remains devastating with the wealthy, educated, and politically important having fled the country due to severe persecution.
Somalia

Less than one thousand (.01%) of the 10 million Somali people, including those living in East Africa, the Middle East, Europe, North America, and other countries, are known to be Christian. The result of the civil war is no viable Christian church and total destruction of previous Christian work. Islam grows stronger with an increasing emphasis on fundamentalism. Hearts continue to harden. Outsiders who offer help are welcome but evangelism is perilously dangerous and not tolerated.

Robert A. King

Sorcery. See Witchcraft and Sorcery.

Soteriology in World Religions. Religions generally assume that human beings are in some kind of undesirable condition and that a much better state can be attained, either through one’s own efforts or through the intervention of some other power. Although generally used of salvation in Christian theology, soteriology (from Greek soteria, deliverance, salvation) can also refer to the common religious theme of deliverance from a present predicament. However, strikingly different views on the nature of and means for achieving the soteriological goal are found among the various religious traditions.

The Soteriological Goal. The soteriological goal of a particular tradition must be understood with reference to the tradition’s diagnosis of the problem and its views on the nature of the religious ultimate.

Although they differ on particular issues, monotheistic religions generally understand the human predicament as the result of moral failure to live in accordance with God’s righteous ways (sin). Accordingly, the soteriological goal is the restoration of a proper relationship with God and living eternally in the presence of God in heaven or paradise. Christianity, which emphasizes the radical corruption of human nature and its complete inability to save itself, views salvation as including not only eternal life with God in the future but also the possession of new life in Christ in the present.

Religious traditions from the Indian subcontinent view the human predicament in terms of samsara, the ongoing cycle of birth, death, and rebirth in which suffering is inevitable. The religious goal thus is moksha, or liberation from the entire cycle of rebirths through overcoming the chains of karma, the principle regulating rebirths.

Both monistic and theistic traditions within Hinduism hold that Brahman is the one ultimate reality, but they have rather different views on what liberation from samsara means. Theistic traditions claim liberation results in a blissful state of union with Brahman in which liberated souls retain distinct identities and consciousness. Monistic traditions understand liberation as the lifting of the veil of ignorance that prevents one from realizing the essential identity of the self with Brahman.

Buddhism originally identified the religious ultimate and the soteriological goal in nontheistic terms as nirvana, the paradoxical state characterized by release from the cycle of rebirths and elimination of passion and craving. As Buddhism moved into China and Japan, the religious goal tended to focus upon “enlightenment” or “awakening” in the present more than liberation from the cycle of rebirths. The ideal became harmony within the social and cosmic order, which is achieved through a penetrating insight into the true nature of things. There is also a strong theistic strain in Chinese and Japanese Buddhism, exemplified in the Pure Land traditions that view the Amida Buddha in theistic terms and anticipate future rebirth in the paradise of the Pure Land. On a folk level, many Hindus and Buddhists recognize that complete liberation from samsara is impossible in this life and thus they are content with working toward a somewhat improved state in the next life.

Animistic and shamanistic traditions tend to identify salvation with deliverance from forces and powers causing suffering and misfortune in this life. Religious Taoism is concerned not only with prosperity and well-being in this life, but also with achieving immortality beyond this life.

Means for Achieving the Goal. Religious traditions can be divided broadly into two classes: those that regard the soteriological goal as attainable solely through one’s own efforts and those that hold that it is the result of assistance from some other power or being. Among monotheistic traditions, Protestant Christianity unequivocally maintains that salvation is entirely a gift of God’s grace and rests upon the substitutionary and atoning death of Jesus Christ upon the cross (see Atonement). Salvation is appropriated by an act of faith in which Jesus Christ is recognized as one’s Lord and Savior. ISLAM, however, rejects the idea of substitutionary atonement. There is no need for a savior; each person is solely responsible for his or her own sins and will be judged impartially by Allah on the basis of faithfulness to Allah’s precepts. Admittance to paradise is based upon an impartial weighing of one’s conduct in this life.

The notion of salvation/liberation as a gift of grace is also found in theistic forms of Hinduism and Buddhism. The bhakti (devotion) tradition in Hinduism emphasizes passionate devotion and love to a particular deity (Shiva, Vishnu) in recognition of aid granted or anticipated. Similarly, the Pure Land sects of Buddhism stress that rebirth in the Pure Land is entirely the gift of the grace of Amida Buddha.

Other traditions explicitly link attainment of the soteriological goal with proper actions or insights that are cultivated through strict discipline. Thus, THERAVADA BUDDHISM holds that nirvana is attained solely through one’s own efforts in carefully following the Noble Eightfold Path, and ZEN BUDDHISM, rejecting dependence upon the grace of another, maintains that enlightenment is gained through rigorous self-discipline. Similarly, Hinduism recognizes not only the way of devotion but also the way of works (proper compliance with one’s duties as defined by one’s position and stage in life) and the way of knowledge (proper insight attained through careful study of the sacred texts and rigorous discipline of the psychic/physical faculties) as effective paths to liberation. The eclecticism of Hinduism is reflected in the attitude that there are many different ways to approach the divine; there is no one way that is right for all people at all times.

Animistic and shamanistic traditions stress observing proper ritual so as to appease the spirits and forces that influence conditions in both this life and the afterlife. Religious Taoism seeks immortality through restored harmony with the Tao by means of moral conduct, alchemical techniques, and hygienic, dietary, and respiratory disciplines.

Significantly, most traditions emphasize that what one believes about reality directly affects whether one will attain the soteriological goal. This raises the inescapable question of truth: What is the cause of our present predicament and what is the proper cure for this problem? Scripture maintains that the root cause of all suffering and evil is sin, the deliberate rejection of a holy God and his righteous ways. The heart of the Christian gospel is the announcement that salvation—forgiveness for sin, new life in Christ, and a restored relationship with God both now and forever—is possible through repentance and faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe.

Harold A. Netland

South Africa

Soteriology. See Salvation.

South Africa (Est. 2000 pop.: 46,215,000; 1,221,037 sq. km. [471,442 sq. mi.]). The present-day boundaries of South Africa date from 1910 when four British colonies were united to form the Union of South Africa. However, there has been a continual Christian presence in the region for about 350 years, which can be subdivided into three major periods: (1) the Dutch period (1652–c. 1800), (2) the British period (c. 1800–1910), (3) the modern period since 1910.

The Dutch Period. In 1652 the Dutch East India Company established a settlement at the Cape of Good Hope for the purpose of providing supplies for their ships trading in the East. The Company provided ministers of religion to care for the spiritual needs of the employees who were of the Reformed faith. Some of these ministers also attempted to evangelize the indigenous Khoikhoi people, resulting in the baptism of a few Khoikhoi before the end of the seventeenth century. To the original Dutch community were added settlers of German and French Huguenot extraction. Out of this community was to develop in time the Afrikaans-speaking people and the family of Dutch Reformed churches, which is today the largest Protestant community in South Africa.

The first full-time missionary to the Khoikhoi was the Moravian GEORG SCHMIDT, who arrived at the Cape in 1737. Authorized only to teach the Khoikhoi, his baptism of five converts in 1742 offended the Reformed ministers in the Cape who did not recognize him as an ordained minister competent to administer baptisms. Schmidt was obliged to withdraw from the Cape, and it was fifty years before the work of the MORAVIANS was resumed at Genadendal, where Schmidt had begun.

The British Period. In the political, spiritual, and social realms South Africa experienced momentous changes during the century of British rule. The closing decade of the eighteenth century saw a revival of missionary interest among Protestant churches in Europe and America, with the result that many agencies entered South Africa with the aim of spreading the gospel among the indigenous peoples there. In 1799 the London Missionary Society began its labors, which resulted in time in the United Congregational Church of Southern Africa. Van der Kemp, Philips, Moffat, and Livingstone are just some of the names of those who came to Africa through the LMS.
South Africa

The arrival of British settlers in 1820 brought with them Methodists, Anglicans, Presbyterians, and Baptists, who all sought to establish their respective denominations and reach out to the African peoples. Under the dedicated leadership of men such as Barnabas Shaw and William Shaw (not related) the Methodists were especially successful in extending their church among the African peoples and today the Methodists are one of the largest Protestant bodies in South Africa. Presbyterian missionary efforts produced Lovedale, which was to become one of the foremost educational centers in South Africa. Under the vigorous leadership of their first bishop, Robert Gray, Anglicanism was placed on a sound organizational and pastoral footing and attention was given to missions. German and British Baptists came together to form the Baptist Union, characterized by evangelistic zeal.

Although Roman Catholics were the first to make contact with the original inhabitants of South Africa through explorers such as Bartholomew Diaz (1488), they had been excluded from the Cape under Dutch rule. The appointment of Raymond Griffith as Vicar Apostolic for South Africa in 1837 saw the extension of Catholic churches throughout the area. Missions were undertaken by many religious orders, including the Assumptionists, Jesuits, the Order of Mary Immaculate, and the Trappists. Perhaps the most famous of the Catholic missions in South Africa was Mariannhill in Natal, a work that led to the creation of a new religious order, the Religious Missionaries of Mariannhill. The Roman Catholic Church is the largest single denomination in South Africa today.

Discontent with British rule led many of the Afrikaans-speaking Boers to leave the Cape Colony and establish independent republics in the north, taking with them their Reformed faith and establishing churches in their new homelands. The Boers distrusted the British and their missionaries, favoring instead the German Lutheran missionaries. The Berlin, Rhenish, and Hermannsburg missionary societies helped establish Lutheranism in South Africa. Revival among the Dutch Reformed churches in the Cape and the able leadership of Andrew Murray led to vigorous missionary efforts made by that denomination.

On the political front British military campaigns subdued the independent Xhosa and Zulu chiefs and defeated the Boer republics. All four British colonies were united in 1910 into the Union of South Africa and granted independence—under white rule. The Modern Period. Out of the bitterness of the Boer defeat rose the Afrikaner nationalist movement, which was to culminate in the triumph of the Nationalist Party and the establishment of apartheid in 1948. This policy was defended by most Afrikaans-speaking white Christians as the only realistic solution to the problem of racial conflict and rejected by most other Christians as discriminatory and unjust. Opposition by the world, sustained criticism by the South African Council of Churches and other Christian bodies, as well as growing resistance offered by the ANC and other liberation movements eventually forced the Dutch Reformed Church and the Nationalist Party to concede that apartheid was both unworkable and unjust. Liberation movements were unbanned, apartheid legislation repealed, and elections were called for in 1994. The ANC won these elections and formed a government of national unity with other political parties.

On the spiritual front, the early twentieth century saw the beginnings and rapid rise of the Pentecostal movement as well as an explosive growth of African independent churches (see African Initiated Church Movement). The latter usually represent an amalgam of Pentecostal, revivalist, ritualistic, and traditional African religious elements, with liturgies and ceremonies unique to southern Africa. Divided into over four thousand separate groups, African independent churches number some 10 million people (see also Zionism, African Church). Among the mainline churches the largest are the Roman Catholic, Reformed, Methodist, Anglican, and Lutheran. Recent years have seen a rapid increase of independent charismatic churches.

South African Christians have not only exerted themselves to evangelize their own country but have been involved in missionary outreach beyond their borders. In 1889 the South African General Mission was founded in Cape Town, later becoming the Africa Evangelical Fellowship (AEF), which today is working in fourteen lands of southern Africa (including Madagascar, Mauritius, and Reunion). In the early decades of the twentieth century, the Dutch Reformed Church had established vigorous works in Nigeria (among the Tiv people), Malawi, and Zimbabwe. C. M. Doke, a pioneer Baptist missionary to Zambia, translated the Bible into the Lamba language. He later taught African languages in the University of the Witwatersrand (Johannesburg), and today is honored as having been one of the greatest scholars in his field. Another South African scholar to achieve world renown was Dutch Reformed missiologist David Bosch.

At present there are about six hundred South African missionaries (mostly Protestant) serving in over fifty foreign countries through more than twenty-five missionary agencies. More than half of these are working in other African countries; the remainder serve in Asia, Latin America, Europe, and the Middle East.

Many challenges still face the Christian community in South Africa: the evangelization of millions of non-Christian fellow citizens (African traditionalists, Hindus, and Muslims); the promotion of peace and reconciliation in a deeply divided society; the need to bear witness to God's justice and righteousness in the face of massive crime, economic inequalities, and sexual permissiveness. "God's rainbow people" (the appellation coined by archbishop Desmond Tutu) stand poised also to make a greater contribution to the evangelization of all the nations of the world.

KEVIN ROY

South African General Mission. See Africa Evangelical Fellowship.

South Korea. See Korea, South.

Southern Baptist Convention, IMB. In 1845, because of mounting sectionalism in the United States due to the Abolitionist Movement, the Baptist churches of the South split from the Northern churches and formed the Southern Baptist Convention (SBC). Two factors brought about the division. The slavery question was the occasion, but missiology was a factor. Baptists of the North had declared neutrality on the slavery question, but the Acting Board of their missionary society declared later, in response to an inquiry from Alabama Baptists, that it would not appoint a slaveowner as a missionary. Northern and Southern leaders agreed that further cooperation in missions was impossible. The Southern leaders, claiming they were prevented from fulfilling the Great Commission, then called for a constitutional meeting that met in Augusta, Georgia, in May 1845, and founded the SBC.

The first action of the new SBC was to appoint a Foreign Mission Board (FMB). China was its first mission field. The FMB, in contrast to the missionary society of the Northern Convention, was a "board" of a centralized convention of churches, not a "society" of individuals. Therefore, the FMB pioneered a new type of missionary entity—a cooperative, comprehensive, denominational entity based on the voluntary cooperation of local congregations.

The FMB barely survived the agony of the Civil War and the Restoration period. After reacting to several wars, internal controversies, and financial debt, the FMB began to expand its work after the turn of the century. Since World War II its numerical growth has been phenomenal. In 1995 it had over 4,000 foreign missionaries working in 131 countries. In 1997 the name was changed to International Mission Board (IMB).

The IMB members are pastors and laymen representing the states of the SBC. They in turn monitor the staff of the IMB, which operates out of headquarters in Richmond, Virginia. The fields are divided into nine areas, each with its own area director. The IMB staff dictates the general philosophy of the IMB, but most of the missionary strategy is left to the area directors and their regional "missions." The "missions" work alongside national entities in the areas where they reside. Until World War II, most IMB missionaries were located in China, West Africa, and Latin America but since then the work has spread to Europe, Eastern and Southern Africa, and the Pacific Rim. Newly opened fields include the Commonwealth of Independent States and Unreached Peoples in the 10/40 Window of North Africa and Central Asia.

The IMB defines its philosophy as "comprehensive"; therefore, there are all types of IMB missionaries—medical doctors, nurses, agricultural experts, administrators, engineers, maintenance men, teachers, musicians, and a host of other specialists—who complement the work of the field missionary, who is basically an evangelist and church planter.

The IMB missionaries count on a support system. Baptist State Conventions contribute through a Cooperative Program. About half the IMB budget comes from an Annual Christmas Offering in honor of Lottie Moon and by Woman's Missionary Union, an auxiliary of the SBC. The IMB has become one of the largest missionary sending bodies in the history of Christianity.

JUSTICE C. ANDERSON

SEE ALSO Baptist Missions.

Sovereignty of God. Though an emphasis on the sovereignty of God is frequently associated with Calvinism, God's sovereignty, or God's supreme power and authority, are conspicuous biblical themes in both the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. Creation is the work of God (Gen. 1:1; Neh. 9:6; Ps. 102:25; Acts 14:15; and Heb. 11:3). God is the creator of all living things (Gen. 1:20–27; Ps. 8:3–8; Isa. 51:13; and Acts 17:28). God rules over all of God's handiwork (Job 12:17–25 and Prov. 21:1). God also rules over the nations of the world, not simply Israel (1 Chron. 29:11; Ps. 47:2; 83:18; 93:1; and Acts 17:24–31). God is the only God (Ps. 96:5). No one can interfere with God, "stay God's hand," or resist God's ultimate will (Deut. 4:39; Job 9:12; Dan. 4:35; Rom. 9:19).

Finally, God's reign is eternal (Exod. 15:18; Ps. 10:16; Dan. 4:3).
Sovereignty of God

In the New Testament, God's kingdom, not the church, is unquestionably the principal theme of Jesus’ teaching and preaching (Matt. 3:2; 4:17; 5:3, 10; 6:33; 10:7; 11:11; 13:24, 31, 33, 44, 45, 47; 25:34–35; Mark 1:14; 9:1; 10:14, 23, Luke 4:43; 8:1; 9:2; 10:9; John 3:5; see KINGDOM of GOD). But Jesus, according to the Gospels, also spoke of his kingdom (Matt. 16:28 and Luke 22:30), and he declared, "My kingdom is not of this world" (John 18:36), an indication that it was a radically different kind of order.

All this language is, however, symbolic. These are figures of speech, and we miss their authentic meaning and import when we literalize or attempt to historicize them. Furthermore, God as sovereign is a metaphor based on a regal model, namely, God as king, and all that God has created is subject to God: it is God's property. This kind of language was readily understandable in an age when earthly kingdoms were commonplace and when kings ruled absolutely. But that time has passed, and few kingdoms have survived the steady march toward democracy or more participatory forms of government. In this sense, the regal model for understanding God's authority is anachronistic. Furthermore, other paradigms of God's authority and relation with creation and with humanity are found in the Scriptures. More important, they are more easily comprehended—God as parent, for example (Ps. 68:5; Isa. 64:8; Matt. 6:9; 7:11; Luke 15:11–32; Rom. 8:15; 1 John 3:1); God as friend (James 2:23); God as helper (Heb. 13:16); God as shepherd (Ps. 23; Isa. 40:11; and Luke 12:32); God as teacher (Exod. 4:15; Ps. 25:12; Isa. 2:3; Jer. 32:33; and Micah 4:2); God as redeemer (Ps. 130:8; Jer. 50:34; God as potter (Isa. 64:8); God as judge (Gen. 18:25; Ps. 96:13; Matt. 25:31–46; and Heb. 12:23); and God as fortress, refuge, and rock (2 Sam. 22:2; Pss. 18:2; 91:2; 144:2). These last references from the Psalms also portray God as stronghold, deliverance, shield, and savior.

Even though the metaphor of God as sovereign is dated, it represents a valuable theological insight if it is not forced or literalized. Recognition of God's authority as the guiding principle for individual and collective living is sorely needed in our time. Yet when God's sovereignty is used to exalt some persons and degrade others, or when kingdom imagery is employed as the pattern for all human relationships, unfortunate results usually follow. Authoritarianism such as that exercised in hierarchically arranged families, churches, or governments may claim to be earthly manifestations of God's sovereign kingdom, but oppression is commonplace. Furthermore, when God's sovereignty is regarded as absolute, history is usually seen as predetermined, and the possibility of free will is nullified. The papacy in Rome and Geneva under Calvin are examples of God's sovereignty historicized.

Ecclesiastical authoritarianism, double-edged predestination, hyper-Calvinism, and the repudiation of all human efforts to engage in mission and evangelism are logical corollaries.

It is a mistake, however, to conclude that any emphasis on God's sovereignty inevitably undermines missionary and evangelistic passion. JONATHAN EDWARDS as well as WILLIAM CAREY were convinced Calvinists. They believed in God's sovereignty. But few in Christian history have been more passionate for the proclamation of the gospel and the salvation of the lost than were they.

In our time, the idea of God's sovereignty is probably best regarded not as a manifestation of power, but as an indicator of divine purpose. God is a God of purpose, and God's purpose is the salvation of the whole of creation. Israel and the new Israel are indispensable parts of that purpose.

ALAN NEELY

Spain (Est. 2000 pop.: 39,848,000; 504,782 sq. km. [194,896 sq. mi]). Bordered by France, Andorra, and Portugal, Spain is located at the western end of the Mediterranean Sea. Native ethnolinguistic groups speaking languages other than Spanish include Catalonians, Galicians, Basques, and Gypsies.

The earliest confirmed accounts of Christianity in Spain date to the third century. Earlier influence may have come through the apostle Paul (Rom. 15:24). But neither this nor the legend that the apostle James is buried at Santiago can be proven.

Christianity was strong enough in Spain to survive the Muslim advance from North Africa, which, after several centuries of conflict, was finally repelled in 1492. The Spanish Inquisition then eliminated most remaining Muslim and Jewish influences as well as those of the Reformation. Meanwhile, Spanish Roman Catholic missionaries joined with explorers and soldiers in conquering new territories in the Americas and Asia.

Modern Protestant missionary efforts in Spain date to the mid-1800s. Plymouth Brethren held house meetings as early as 1836. Churches were opened in Malaga, Granada, and Madrid in the 1860s. But Protestant growth remained slow in the ensuing decades; Roman Catholicism dominated the culture even when, at times, legal barriers were lowered.

With the end of the Franco regime (1939–75) Spain embarked on major change. With enhanced religious liberties came social changes that tended to deaden spiritual interest. Today
Spiritual Formation

Speer took an active role in the early days of the ecumenical movement as seen in the old Federal Council of Churches (now the National Council of Churches of Christ) and the former International Missionary Council, from which came the World Council of Churches. In the face of those who diminished the uniqueness of Christ for the sake of interreligious dialogue, Speer stood firmly for Christ’s supremacy and wrote extensively on the finality and incomparability of Christ. Along with keeping the proclamation of the gospel primary in missions, he foresaw the dangers of paternalism and the demise of colonialism.

JIM REAPSCME

Spiritual Formation. Spiritual formation is the driving force for world mission. Cross-cultural mission is the task of helping people in other cultures come to Christ and be formed in his image. The task of the missionary is teaching people to obey all Jesus commanded (see Obedience). The missionary Paul did not claim to have finished his task until the whole body attained to the whole measure of the fullness of Christ. The ongoing task of cross-cultural spiritual formation includes justification, sanctification, and glorification, and will not be finished in this world.

Spiritual formation is also the driving force for all aspects of human development. People who are not being formed in the image of Christ are not fully human, and thus in an important sense they are lacking in cognitive, social, and moral development. There should be no tension, then, between spiritual formation, community development, and meeting human need.

Spiritual formation is far more than mere behavioral change. People can memorize Bible verses, attend church five times a week, pray for an hour a day, and fast weekly, and still make no progress in spiritual formation. Of course, outward behavior is important, but only as a genuine indication of inner heart development. While we praise the Lord for the growth of churches around the world, numerical church growth is not necessarily an indicator of spiritual formation. Neither is spiritual formation the mere transmission of biblical or theological information. People with advanced degrees in theology have not necessarily made any progress in spiritual formation.

Spiritual formation is a process that takes place inside a person, and is not something that can be easily measured, controlled, or predicted.

Speer, Robert E. (1867–1947). American missions statesman and ecumenical leader. Born in Pennsylvania, he developed an interest in missions while he was a student at Princeton University. He traveled for a year during the heyday of the Student Volunteer Movement, spreading missions interest across the campuses of America. He went on to Princeton Theological Seminary, but left after a year to join the Presbyterian Board. However, Speer was much more than an administrator. He was a powerful speaker, keen writer, and perceptive analyst of missions affairs. He wrote sixty-seven books, the most notable of which was The Unfinished Task in Foreign Missions, based on his lectures at Union Seminary, Richmond, in 1926. Speer’s travels kept him in close touch with field affairs. An avid reader, he combined mission and secular issues in his writings and lectures. He tried to look at contemporary trends in the light of world missions history. Whatever the issues, Speer maintained that the church’s primary task was to bring Jesus Christ to the world. He also combined evangelism with concern for people’s physical and social needs.

one finds materialists, atheists, New Age adherents, and those who, especially during Holy Week, cling to conservative Catholic traditions. But rare is the Spaniard who demonstrates serious interest in the gospel. In 1993 evangelical Christians numbered only 78,000 out of the total population of 42,000,000.

Missionaries to Spain should work closely with the existing churches. Those displaying willingness to learn will find most Spanish churches eager for partnership. Missionary assistance is needed in various support ministries including pastoral counseling; youth, sports, and camping programs; and some teaching positions. Those with experience among Muslims may be able to reach the large population of resident and transient North Africans. Further, thousands of towns across Spain have no evangelical church and await persevering pioneer workers.

While Spaniards are sensitive to the needs of the world, not many evangelicals have become missionaries. Even as Spain receives Latin American evangelists, few of her well-trained Bible teachers serve to strengthen Latin American churches. Spain’s historical and geographical links to North Africa suggest potential for a significant missionary contribution to that region even as the evangelization of Spain remains a daunting challenge.

DAVID GREENLEE

Bibliography. J. Morris, Spains; T. Wickham, The Missionary in Spain: Adaptation or Interpretation?

Special Revelation. See Bible.

Speer, Robert E. (1867–1947). American missions statesman and ecumenical leader. Born in Pennsylvania, he developed an interest in missions while he was a student at Princeton University. He traveled for a year during the heyday of the Student Volunteer Movement, spreading missions interest across the campuses of America. He went on to Princeton Theological Seminary, but left after a year to join the Presbyterian Board. However, Speer was much more than an administrator. He was a powerful speaker, keen writer, and perceptive analyst of missions affairs. He wrote sixty-seven books, the most notable of which was The Unfinished Task in Foreign Missions, based on his lectures at Union Seminary, Richmond, in 1926. Speer’s travels kept him in close touch with field affairs. An avid reader, he combined mission and secular issues in his writings and lectures. He tried to look at contemporary trends in the light of world missions history. Whatever the issues, Speer maintained that the church’s primary task was to bring Jesus Christ to the world. He also combined evangelism with concern for people’s physical and social needs.
Spiritual Formation

Spiritual formation is a lifelong process and is not a precise task that will be finished by the year 2000 or even 3000. A Plea for a Paradigm Shift in World Mission. The dominant current paradigm for mission is that of an efficient machine. Spiritual formation is neglected because it does not easily fit the assembly-line paradigm. The factory paradigm encourages missionaries to set objectives for mere outward behavior: It is primarily interested in quantities. How big is the church? What is the rate of growth? How many unreached people groups can we identify? The factory paradigm does not fit the real world. Can you imagine the absurdity of a family trying to raise children with an assembly-line worldview? Parents feeding the baby would be challenged to promote the most weight gain with the least amount of food. Child-rearing experts would challenge parents to set growth objectives for the child to grow six inches in the next eighteen months. Efficiency experts would suggest a ten-year plan to produce as many babies as possible with the least amount of cost. They might do computer projections on “baby growth” to the year 2000 and beyond.

The mechanistic paradigm makes an idol of efficiency, control, predictability, and measurement. Just as the farmer cannot force growth by pulling a stem of wheat, so spiritual formation cannot be forced.

Spiritual formation is a battle between evil and godly forces (see also Spiritual Warfare). Prayer is a powerful force for spiritual formation. By prayer, the Spirit helps us see the relationship between the problems in our own lives and solutions from the Word of God. Prayer unleashes the power of the Holy Spirit to enable us to obey everything Jesus commanded.

The best way to facilitate spiritual formation is to make available the means of grace that God uses to promote the process of maturity. The primary means of grace are the Word of God, the Spirit of God, and the people of God. The Holy Spirit helps individuals understand and obey the Word of God as they are taught by people with spiritual gifts.

As Christ is being formed in people, they will progressively evidence the fruit of the Spirit, have a burden for the lost, and possess a passion for world mission. The goal of mission is to foster the life-long process of spiritual formation among every tribe, people, and language so that together we may sing the Hallelujah Chorus at the wedding feast of the Lamb. Worship is both the motivation and the goal of spiritual formation in world mission.

See also Moral Development and Spirituality.

Spiritual Gifts. See Gifts of the Spirit.

Spiritual Mapping. See Powers, The.

Spiritual Warfare. Spiritual warfare is the Christian encounter with evil supernatural powers led by Satan and his army of fallen angels, generally called demons or evil spirits (see Demon, Demons). The original battle was between Satan and God, but on the level of the heavens, the war has been won decisively by God (Col. 2:15; 1 John 3:8). On earth the battles continue, but the issue is to determine not who will win but whether God’s people will appropriate the victory won for them by the cross and the resurrection.

The conflict began in the Garden of Eden as recorded in Genesis 3 and will continue until the fulfillment of the events predicted in Revelation 20. Scripture makes it clear that Satan leads the anti-God and anti-Christian forces as “the prince of this world” (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11) or “the god of this world” (2 Cor. 4:4) and as a leader of the fallen angels (Matt. 25:41). It is also clear, however, that although Satan gained some measure of control through the events in the garden,
God retains ultimate sovereignty over his creation. God’s people are assured of victory in the battle when they engage the enemy on the basis of faith and obedience—the conditions set by God in his covenant with Israel and the implications of submitting to God in James 4:7.

Every battle Israel fought in the conquest of Canaan was won or lost on spiritual considerations. When Israel obeyed God’s commands and acted on the basis of faith, God gave them victory no matter what the military situation. The battle was ultimately between God and the gods. While idols are treated in the Old Testament with contempt as utterly devoid of spiritual power (Ps. 114:4–8; Isa. 40:18–20; 44:9–20; Jer. 10:3ff.), the god or spirit behind the idol was treated as real (cf. Deut. 32:17; Ps. 106:37; 1 Cor. 10:18–20). Yahweh was often compared to the gods (1 Kings 8:23; 1 Chron. 16:25; Pss. 86:8; 96:4; 135:5). That was not a comparison with nothing. It was the sovereign God compared to the angels who were in rebellion against him.

This battle is portrayed in the Gospels and in the rest of the New Testament. Paul states clearly that “our struggle is . . . against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms” (Eph. 6:12). These are real enemies, and resistance against them will involve spiritual warfare. While we are assured of victory in the battle, we are never assured that we will not have to fight in the battle.

The influence of the Enlightenment and later the evolutionary hypothesis began a process which has resulted in the secularization of the Western worldview. As a result, biblical references to the role of spirit beings in the realm of the created world are often misinterpreted or ignored in dealing with the text, and many missionaries have gone to the field with a defective worldview, resulting in serious flaws in their approach to animistic belief systems.

At the other end of the spectrum, there is a tendency to overemphasize the role of spirits which produces a Christian SYNCRETISM with ANIMISM. People use the Bible as a good luck charm to protect one from evil spirits, prescribe certain words or expressions to be used in dealing with demons, or assume that knowing the name of a demon gives more power over it. People coming from animistic backgrounds also fall into syncretism, but that is usually because the Christians who introduce them to Christ do not help them understand the Christian worldview as it relates to issues of spiritual power.

Much of this confusion stems from the fact that Satan’s primary tactic is deception. That does not mean that everything a demon says is a lie. Deception gains its power by concealing the lie in surrounding truth. What is needed is discernment, not simply in responding to what a demon may say but in dealing with the deceiving spirits that are constantly trying to confuse our belief system (Rev. 12:9; 1 Tim. 4:1).

The primary issue in deception is always truth, and Satan deceives especially concerning the source of power and of knowledge. God has provided all the power and knowledge we need to live as “more than conquerors” in Christ; but ever since the Garden of Eden, Satan has been trying to cause us not to trust God to provide the power we need and to doubt our ability to know God and to trust the Word of God.

Satan uses his power to cause us to fear him. For Christians to fear Satan they must first doubt the power and provision of God for victory over Satan. Thus he accomplishes two goals: to cause Christians to doubt God and to gain some measure of control over them through fear.

But Satan will also seek to entice people—believers or unbelievers—to take power from him rather than from God. He comes as an angel of light and makes his power seem desirable. This brings one into contact with a long list of occult practices such as fortune telling, magic, sorcery, and witchcraft. Satan has enough power to produce some striking results—“counterfeit miracles, signs and wonders” (2 Thess. 2:10). Some people only ask, “Does it work?” rather than “Is it from God; is it true?” Many people end up with a spiritual stronghold in their lives because they have fallen for Satan’s deceptive use of power.

Ultimately spiritual warfare is the battle for the mind. Satan knows that people will always live what they really believe, even if they do not live what they profess to believe. Since one’s belief about God is foundational to all other beliefs, Satan will almost always begin by trying to pervert one’s belief about the character of God. It happened in Eden. Satan said that God’s statement about dying if people ate of the fruit was a lie and that God could therefore not be trusted. He also implied that God could not love them and withhold that beautiful, desirable fruit from them. Once they began to question the integrity of God, they came under Satan’s control.

It appears that Satan’s great desire is to be God (Luke 4:5–7; 2 Thess. 2:3, 4). This is also seen in the Old Testament in the conflict between God and the gods. As noted above, the real power behind the “gods” in the Old Testament is Satan and his host of evil spirits. This same principle applies to all religious systems which set forth a god other than the Yahweh of Scripture. So the battle is still in process. Unfortunately, many missionaries have failed to help their converts make a thorough worldview change from an animistic view in which the spirit world is manipulable to a Christian view in which a sovereign God is in control. Not only can God not be manipulated by us, there is absolutely nothing we can do to commend ourselves to God. We are utterly dependent on his grace as a means of dealing with our sin.
Spiritual Warfare

and relating to him on a daily basis. The very definition of sin is dependent on one's view of the holiness and sovereignty of God. A low view of sin stems from a low view of God.

Thus winning in spiritual warfare always needs to begin with a right view of God and with a right view of what it means to be a child of God. If we say that we are children of God by faith but believe that we have to earn our daily standing with God, we become the victims of an impossible situation. By grace God makes us “co-heirs with Christ” (Rom. 8:17)—a standing which we could never earn by our own efforts. Believing that this is indeed our position “in Christ” provides the only viable position from which to resist the enemy. The battle looks very different from the vantage point of the throne of God than it does from the context of the circumstances of our lives on earth.

In missionary ministry this battle may well be more like a POWER ENCOUNTER than the battle for the mind which underlies it. Paul says that his call was “to open their eyes, to bring them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God” (Acts 26:18). Thus evangelism is a kind of power encounter; and converts need to understand clearly that they are moving from one realm of spiritual power to another.

Often associated with conversion is the destruction of objects used in non-Christian religious practices. This is a visible renunciation of the old ways and old worldview, but it is also a challenge to the “gods” behind the objects to defend themselves if they are able.

Missionaries may well see overt demonic activity (see POSSESSION PHENOMENA), and they need to know how to minister with confidence in such a situation. Many places have been opened to the gospel through seeing a person set free from evil spirits. Spiritual practitioners in other religions may challenge Christians to demonstrate their power in a variety of ways. The missionary needs to be prepared to respond appropriately. Ultimately prayer may be the most important weapon in the Christian’s arsenal against the enemy.

TIMOTHY M. WARNER

SEE ALSO Powers; Signs and Wonders.

Spirituality. Christian spirituality intersects the Christian mission at three critical points. First, the Christian mission is an extension of and an expression of authentic spirituality. True spirituality includes service in response to the call of God and the brokenness and alienation of the world. Christian spirituality includes sacrificial service for Christ. To walk with Christ is to respond to his mandate to make disciples.

The church in worship becomes the church in mission; a truly biblical spirituality will incorporate mission and one’s participation in mission. If we are teaching people to walk in the Spirit under the authority of Scripture, then we will be teaching them and enabling them to participate in mission through sacrificial service and intercessory prayer.

Second, the spirituality of the church sustains Christian mission. Prayer and the disciplines of the spiritual life are an essential source of grace, wisdom, and emotional and spiritual strength in Cross-Cultural Ministry. The awareness of call or a vocation to Christian mission arises from one’s spirituality. But ideally we fulfill the whole of the missionary task in continuous response to the call of God and the prompting of the Spirit.

Whether we speak of the individual missionary, the church engaged in mission, or the mission agency, the work of worship, prayer, meditation, and each of the spiritual disciplines enables the church to fulfill its mission with integrity, passion, and joy.

The dynamic relationship between spirituality and mission is obvious in the Book of Acts. For example, the elders in the church in Antioch were in prayer and fasting when they sensed the prompting of the Spirit to set aside two of their number for missionary service (Acts 13:1–2). It is also evident in the life of Jesus, whose confidence in his own call to preach “to the neighboring towns” arose directly out of his early morning prayer (Mark 1:35–38). And in the apostle Paul we see a dynamic connection, especially in 2 Corinthians, between his own journey of faith, prayer, and obedience, and his call to apostolic ministry.

Missionary endeavor is fruitless apart from a vital relationship to God in prayer—not just the prayer of intercession, but also the prayer of communion and contemplation.

Third, mission is calling the nations of the world to a true spirituality: a life lived in submission to Christ and a communion with Christ Jesus as Lord. Mission is more than evangelism; it includes enabling people to respond to the gospel and walk by faith in the fullness of the Spirit. Christian mission is incomplete if it does not include the introduction of new believers to the nature of the Christian experience in communion with Christ and in community with the church. This is part of what it means to make disciples (Matt. 28:16ff.).

But as Christian spirituality develops among a people, it will reflect the historical, geographical, and cultural background of these people, if it is truly an indigenous expression of their Christian faith (see INDIGENOUS CHURCHES).
We cannot demand or expect uniformity when it comes to spirituality. There will be certain normative elements, such as the centrality of Christ, the authority and priority of Scripture, the place of community and the church, and the critical place of personal and corporate holiness. But beyond certain common elements that are essential to a Christian spirituality, the work of the Spirit will be evident in remarkable diversity. In this regard, the Christian community in each land is well-advised to listen and learn from others. Those in the West can learn from those in Africa, who in turn might learn from the spiritual experience and journey of those in Latin America or Asia.

GORDON T. SMITH

SEE ALSO Spiritual Formation.

Sri Lanka (Est. 2000 pop.: 19,504,000; 65,610 sq. km. [25,332 sq. mi.]). Sri Lanka is an island located 50 miles southeast of the tip of India. Of the inhabitants, 74 percent are Sinhalese, 18.2 percent Tamil, and the rest are of various Asian or Eurasian extractions.

The Chronicle of Mahavansa, maintained by Buddhist monks from about the sixth century A.D., portrays a violent history of successive invasions and cultural upheaval. The Indian Hindu prince Vijaya conquered the land in 504 B.C. A sophisticated society developed after the third century B.C. when the Sinhalese officially adopted BUDDHISM. Tamil invaders dominated the island between the third and thirteenth centuries A.D. From 1517 to 1948, Portuguese, Dutch, and finally British colonialists ruled. Not until 1803 did ancient Kandy, in the interior of the island, succumb to invaders when the British occupied and finally annexed it. Sri Lanka became an independent Commonwealth member in 1948 and gained admission to the United Nations in 1955. In 1972, the name was changed officially from Ceylon to Sri Lanka.

Tensions have always been high between the Tamils in the north, the Buddhist majority in the south and central areas, and the Muslims. Ongoing ancient rivalries have been erupting since 1983 when civil war broke out between the Sinhalese and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, a rebel faction desiring separate-nation status.

A tradition holds that Christianity entered Sri Lanka through the apostle Thomas. In A.D. 537 a Nestorian sojourner documented numerous churches and adherents. Later, the Portuguese introduced Roman Catholicism, the Dutch brought Reformed traditions, and the British established Anglicanism. Mission strategists document small unreached groups in Sri Lanka, namely, the Indo-Portuguese Burghers and the original inhabitants of the island, the Veddah people.

KEITH E. EITEL

Statistics. See QUANTITATIVE RESEARCH; MISSION METRICS.

Status and Role. When social scientists refer to status, the term is less freighted with implications of value than in more popular usage. Status, in SOCIOLOGY, refers to the position an individual occupies in a group or society. It is based on the common recognition within the group that the individual occupies the position, not the perceived value of the position. Status is distinguished from roles in sociological theory in that individuals occupy a status and play a role. Roles define the rights, functions, obligations, and interactions of persons. Status refers to the position from which individuals act out their roles.

A status will have wide recognition and group consensus over its definition. There are two types of status, ascribed and achieved. Social scientists define ascribed status as one that is given by society and over which we exercise little if any control, such as age, gender, or ETHNICITY. An achieved status is the result of some action on the part of the individual, such as teacher, student, shopkeeper, consumer, church member, or police officer.

Understanding status and role is significant in missions studies because they are important keys to understanding CULTURE. The statuses of parent, laborer, minister, and athlete all point to certain images of how we expect people to behave in a given social interaction. Sometimes these images are less clear than others, but it is the general consensus of the society or group around these images that enables us to understand them as statuses within a society. It is the action carried out by the person in a particular status that we call a role. For example, consumers in some cultures interact with the marketplace through bargaining over prices. Shopkeepers are expected to enter into a process of negotiation over prices. In other countries, such as the United States, prices generally are attached to goods, and consumers are expected to pay the marked price. In some cultures, university students are expected to learn by synthesizing and analyzing material, and then produce a relatively original final paper. In other cultures, students are expected to master the thought of the instructor and, in deference to the teacher’s wisdom, replicate his or her thought as the mark of educational accountability. In all cultures, people learn the roles—specific behaviors, values, and skills—that are appropriate to a given status.

Also, making the distinction between achieved and ascribed status helps us in CROSS-CULTURAL...
Status and Role

MINISTRY. For example, many cultures have rituals that make adulthood an achieved status (called RITES OF PASSAGE), whereas others follow laws that make adulthood ascribed (such as an eighteen-year-old voting age or individuals being tried in court as adults at a selected age). Knowing the difference can be crucial in developing cross-cultural ministries to adolescents and young adults.

What most people call status, social scientists call “social status.” This refers to rank, honor, and esteem. Max Weber called it “social honor.” In virtually all societies, relative prestige becomes a measuring stick for ranking individuals. In some societies, economic resources determine social status. In others, personal resources such as courage, intelligence, and leadership ability serve to determine social rank. In complex societies, a combination of ascribed (race, ethnicity, gender, age, even ancestry) and achieved (wealth, education, income) statuses determine social ranking.

Florence Steidel (1897–1962). American missionary to lepers in Liberia. Born in Greenfield, Illinois, and reared in Missouri, Steidel responded to the call to missions in 1924 during prayer when she saw in a vision suffering people with no one to help them. Preparatory studies took her to a Bible institute in Chicago, Benton College of Law in St. Louis, Missouri, and nurse’s training at Missouri Baptist Hospital from which she graduated in 1928. For additional studies in theology and missions, she enrolled at the Woman’s Missionary Union Training School, Louisville, Kentucky, a Southern Baptist institution, and graduated in 1931.

Joining the Pentecostal movement, Steidel went to Liberia in 1935 as an Assemblies of God missionary. In 1942 she returned to the United States to recuperate from tuberculosis. Returning to Liberia two years later, she founded New Hope Town as a center for the care of lepers. There she supervised construction of more than seventy buildings, helped the community become self-sufficient, and established a school for the training of ministers. Steidel’s contributions to the nation won the recognition of President William V. S. Tubman, who made her a Knight Official of the Humane Order of African Redemption in 1957—the first woman missionary in Liberia to be so honored. She continued working at New Hope Town until her death.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. I. Spence, These Are My People: Florence Steidel.

J. JULIUS SCOTT

Stephen, King of Hungary (975–1038). Founder of Hungary and initiator of Christianity among the Magyars. Born as Vajk, Stephen took a Christian name when he was baptized with his father Geza in 985. Inheriting the Magyar chieftainship in 997, he aggressively pursued a Christianizing program initiated by Geza. With a crown received at Stephen’s request from Pope Sylvester II, he was enthroned as king on Christmas Day A.D. 1000. A strong supporter of the church, he invited the Benedictines to come and engage in the task of evangelizing the Hungarian population. Through them he organized bishoprics and abbeys and engaged in building churches throughout the kingdom. He also vigorously attacked pagan rites and symbols, seeking to eliminate them as an important step in the evangelization and the development of the political state of Hungary. Though later pagan kings sought to undo his influence, by the end of the eleventh century Christianity was generally accepted by the Hungarian population.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Stephen of Perm (1340–96). Russian orthodox missionary to Siberia. Stephen of Perm was one of the founding fathers of Russian Orthodox missions. Born in 1340, he was part of a small Muscovite settlement in northwest Siberia surrounded by the pagan Zyrrians of Perm. In 1365, on the day Stephen took monastic vows, he voiced to the bishop his desire to one day return to Perm and proclaim the gospel among the Zyrrian people.

He spent his early years in the monastery cultivating a deep spiritual life of prayer, fasting, and continual study. He also began translating the Bible and liturgical services into Zyrarian, even having to create a Zyrarian alphabet.

In 1378, Stephen settled among the Zyrrians and began to preach against their rampant idolatry and to show the impotence of their gods by destroying their idols and shrines. Eventually he challenged their main magician to a divine trial in which both were to walk through a burning hut and throw themselves into an opening in the ice of the Vicheda river. When the magician refused, the people turned against him and demanded his death. Stephen, however, preached God’s mercy and called the magician to repent or be exiled. Stephen became the first bishop of Perm in 1383. His final words before his death were, “Live godly lives, read the Scriptures, and obey the Church.”

LUKE A. VERONIS

Stern, Henry Aaron (1820–85). German pioneer missionary among Jews in the Middle East. Born in Unterreichenbach to a Jewish family, Stern came to faith in Christ in 1840 through the influence of Dr. McCaul. Graduating from Hebrew College of the London Jew’s Society, he was appointed a missionary to the Jews in the Middle East. He began his work among the Jews in Bagdad, which served as his base of itinerating operations until 1859. During his stay he made trips to Crimea and Arabia, evangelizing Jewish populations as he traveled. News of the Abyssinian Jewish populations in Ethiopia led to his transfer to Cairo and later Abyssinia. British mishandling of the Abyssinian King Theodore’s request for closer relations resulted in Stern being imprisoned as retribution in 1863 until 1866. Reimprisoned shortly after, Stern was not finally freed until 1868, when Theodore was defeated by British troops. Stern immediately returned to England, and large audiences came to hear his story. In 1871 he was appointed senior missionary, continuing his work among the Jews in England. He wrote several books of his missionary journeys and his imprisonment.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Stevenson, Marion Scott (1871–1930). Scottish missionary to Kenya. Daughter of a minister of the Church of Scotland, two of her uncles were missionaries in India. Her father died in 1877, and she was educated in Edinburgh, showing talent in languages. Although she suffered from ill health, she was active in encouraging mission projects in the Church. In 1903 she attended a Scottish “Keswick” and received spiritual blessing. After her mother’s death in 1904 she felt free to pursue overseas work, and was passed as fit in 1905. After a course at Deaconess Hospital she sailed for Kenya in early 1907.

The Church of Scotland Mission in Kenya had then only one station, Kikuyu (Thogoto), fifteen miles from Nairobi. Marion was the first single woman to join the work, and had first to learn the difficult Kikuyu language. She began to visit the homesteads and was able to start a class, with boarding facilities for a few girls. In 1912, after her first leave in Scotland, she moved to a new center, Tumutumu, where she had to start again from the beginning, using a new dialect. Tumutumu was her home for the rest of her years in Kenya, though she also started a school at the third station, Chogoria. In 1929, after illness, she returned to Scotland, dying in Edinburg in June 1930. A member of the United Kikuyu Language Committee, her main contribution had been her work for women and girls.

JOCELYN MURRAY

Stewardship. In the parable of the talents (Matt. 25:14–30), Jesus teaches that we have been entrusted with certain special resources which belong to God, and we are responsible to use them wisely and for God’s glory. If we approach stewardship and mission in this light, it appears that we will be held accountable before God as to how we manage and use the resources he has given to us and what we produce with them. These resources include not only the finances and what they will purchase but also the people of God, for they are our most valuable resource. Stewardship means that our resources must be invested wisely, with much prayer. This is especially so today due to the escalating cost of missions. Churches and mission agencies, therefore, must be responsible to choose missionaries, ministries, methods, and locations carefully.
Stewardship

This kind of stewardship is being seen as people in churches are holding mission agencies and missionaries accountable for the result of their work. This productivity is being measured not only in terms of the effectiveness of the ministry but also the cost of it. This means that churches are evaluating mission agencies in terms of their past performance, their specialty in ministry, their cost-effectiveness, the receptiveness of their ministry targets, their training programs, and the clarity and intent of their statement of faith. They are also evaluating missionaries in terms of their training, experience, ability, and their theological beliefs and practices. Many churches are responding to this responsibility by being more personally involved in training their missionary candidates and by sending their members to mission fields on vision trips and for short-term missions. Churches are also finding alternatives by funding more cost-effective ministries such as foreign churches are also finding alternatives by funding countries due to modernization and urbanization of indigenous workers, supporting ministries to Vision trips and for short-term missions.

Mission agencies are responding to this need for increased stewardship with tighter controls through such means as specific and regular reporting to donors. Yet such mission leaders as David Hesselgrave are calling for agencies to put less emphasis on statistics and more emphasis on effectiveness in their reporting. Also there is more emphasis on training and equipping missionaries. This is becoming one of the primary tasks of the mission agency. The stress on missionaries and their families is increasing because of the complex cultures emerging in the receiving countries due to modernization and urbanization and due to economic and political upheavals. Thus the agencies are finding that they must screen and develop their missionaries spiritually, theoretically, emotionally, psychologically, and physically for cross-cultural ministry (see also Candidate Selection). The agency is also paying more attention to the assignment and the management of the individual missionary in terms of location and task on the field. An unwise assignment match between missionary and ministry can end a potentially fruitful missionary career within one term. This is probably the greatest waste of all.

There are some very helpful programs being used to assist missionaries and their families. There are missionary training centers designed to prepare missionaries for cross-cultural life and ministry. There are missionary maintenance programs designed to counsel them and to keep them going back. There are programs for missionary children to help them adjust when they return to their home country for university. These have proven to be extremely helpful and should continue with the understanding that they are part of good stewardship (see also Member Care in Missions).

It is clear that there is tension in the matter of stewardship in mission. Many unreached areas are expensive and relatively unproductive, and yet we have the command to disciple the nations. This means that ultimately we cannot measure our success by the productivity of our effort or its cost-effectiveness but by our faithfulness to be good stewards of the gospel that God has also given to us and by our obedience to his Word. For in the final analysis, it is the words of our Lord, “Well done, good and faithful servant,” that we long to hear.

Stewart, Louisa (c. 1850–95). Irish missionary to China. Raised in Ireland under the influence of the Anglican Church, she first served with the Irish Missionary Society in her home country. She later married another Irish missionary in the Anglican Church, Robert Stewart. Noted for their evangelical zeal, promotion of missionary education strategies, and unselfish service to others, both became well recognized missionary representatives in Great Britain, Australia, and Canada. The Stewarts left for China soon after their marriage, arriving in Fujian province in 1876. Using Christian materials as a major part of the curriculum in day schools for boys and girls, education became their major means for establishing indigenous churches.

The employment of single women missionaries to open many inland stations was another distinctive strategy. In addition, Louisa was a pioneer in training mature Chinese Christian women to become indigenous missionaries called “Bible women.” Convinced that illiterate women could be taught to read more quickly through a romanized colloquial text, Louisa was also a major figure in the translation and publication of the romanized New Testament in the Fuzhou dialect.

By 1895 the Stewarts’ educational strategies had proven immensely successful. During the Sino-Japanese war, a secret society called the Vegetarians publicly opposed their missionary Security enterprises. The chaos they incited in Fujian province led ultimately to the Stewarts’ martyrdom on August 1, 1895.

Lauren Pfister

Bibliography. M. E. Watson, Robert and Louisa Stewart—In Life and In Death.

Stockton, Betsey (1798–1865). American missionary to Hawaii. The first single woman missionary to a foreign field from North America was a mulatto woman born to a slave mother in Princeton, New Jersey, in 1798. As a toddler Betsey Stockton was given to the family of a prominent Philadelphia clergyman, Ashbel Green, who later became president of the College of New Jersey (Princeton University). Green and his sons home-school Betsey in all the disciplines of religious instruction and general knowledge. She was an avid reader with a keen mind and sensitive spirit. After a conversion experience and official manumission in her late teens she became increasingly convinced that the Lord was calling her as a missionary. Under a unique appointment arranged by Ashbel Green through the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions she was sent in 1822 with the first reinforcements to the Sandwich Islands (Hawaii) attached to the family of Charles Stewart. There she and the Stewarts and another family opened the station at Lahaina on the island of Maui. Betsey Stockton started the first school in the islands for the children of commoners. Returning to the homeland after three years because of the illness of Mrs. Stewart, Betsey helped found schools for Indian children on Grape Island in Canada, later opening a school for black children in her native town of Princeton, which she served with distinction until her death in 1865.

Eileen F. Moffett

Storytelling. No more powerful teaching or research tool exists than that of storytelling. Whether in cultural, psychological, or organizational analysis, preaching or teaching theology, and more recently, Evangelism and follow-up, this communication mode is trans-historical, trans-generational, trans-gender, trans-cultural, and trans-disciplinary. Stories move the world.

Since the 1980s, Christian workers began to (re)capture the significance of story in ministry. Fighting against a number of myths, such as assuming that stories are for children, stories focus on entertainment, stories are used by the unsophisticated, and stories compromise theology, this generation of pioneers fought to reinstate story as a legitimate communication tool.

Stott, John Robert Walmsley

The support for these pioneers came from numerous disciplines. Anthropologically, people define Worldview through stories and Myths. Stories of real and fictional characters and animals determine the soft boundaries of belief and behavior, distinguishing one group from another. Researchers therefore analyze the lifestories of different generations and genders to understand better those they came to serve.

Psychologically, the use of narrative in the life-span development of people through the use of case studies when presenting theories is sanctioned. The telling and hearing of stories can provide the emotional and therapeutic support necessary to cope with life’s ups and downs.

Pedagogically, storytelling finds legitimacy in learning styles around the world. From children to grandparents, stories socialize listeners into new tasks, attitudes, and behaviors in informal, non-formal, and formal settings.

Organizationally, leaders tell stories of past and present heroes to define vision and values. They listen to the stories of workers and customers to pinpoint tension areas and find solutions.

Theologians and teachers have noted God’s interest in narrative. Discovering that the Holy Spirit designed Scripture so that approximately 75 percent is in a narrative genre, and recognizing Jesus’ preference for storytelling, they now promote the Bible as God’s sacred Storybook.

Missiologically, the story format of God’s sacred Storybook suggests that translators translate the Old Testament as well as the New, evangelists incorporate both Testaments in witness, and teachers ground fragmented theologies in the unified story of Scripture from which they derive.

Tom A. Steffen

Bibliography. P. G. Hiebert and F. F. Hiebert, Case Studies in Missions; L. Ryken, How to Read the Bible as Literature; B. Witherington, Paul’s Narrative Thought World: The Tapestry of Tragedy and Triumph; T. A. Steffen, Reconnecting God’s Story to Ministry: Crosscultural Storytelling at Home and Abroad.

Of his more than thirty books probably the best known is Basic Christianity (1958), translated into some thirty-six languages.

His contribution to evangelical biblical and missionary scholarship is incalculable. More than any other he was responsible for displacing the negative and polemical character of early-twentieth-century evangelicalism, substituting a more patient and irenic, but still uncompromisingly biblical approach. He encouraged the highest possible levels of scholarship, especially in younger scholars. The Langham Trust and the Evangelical Literature Trust are practical expressions of that concern. The primacy of Scripture in formulating doctrine may be said to be the keystone to his thinking.
Stott, John Robert Walmsley

His influence went far beyond the Anglican communion. His influence on the formulation of the Lausanne Covenant is everywhere recognized, and his Commentary on it accepted as definitive. His 1975 Christian Mission in the Modern World is a further indication of his missiological concerns.

Over the years he has wrestled with such issues as the charismatic movement and the role of social action in Christian mission, and his balanced views on both have profoundly influenced evangelical thinking. More controversial was his debate with David Edwards which gave rise to Essentials (1988) and evidence that Stott was at least sympathetic to Annihilation thinking with regard to the nature of hell. It must be added that Stott staunchly affirms his belief in hell and in eternal punishment (ERT 18:1 [1984]: 33).

F. Peter Cotterell

See also Lausanne Movement.

Strachan, R. Kenneth (1910–65). American missionary to Costa Rica and founder of Evangelism-in-Depth. Born in Argentina, Strachan grew up in Costa Rica in the family that had founded the Latin America Mission, of which he became president when his father Harry died in 1945. He was thoroughly familiar with evangelistic crusades in many cities. But he felt something was missing: the involvement of lay people in prayer, door-to-door witnessing, and bringing people to hear the evangelists. He made a profound impact on the world of missions by applying the theory of total church mobilization to countrywide evangelism in Central America, South America, and the Caribbean. He coined the phrase “Evangelism-in-Depth” for this movement, which was used in eight countries. His plan called for all evangelical churches and missions to combine their efforts for nationwide campaigns that included a number of regional campaigns leading to one in the capital city. Strachan taught this concept widely and motivated many national church leaders to adopt it. Not all churches and agencies cooperated, and he was criticized by some. Strachan believed in using national evangelists as well. Thousands of Christians were trained and revitalized. Evangelical unity was demonstrated. More than one hundred thousand people were converted to Christ, in spite of opposition from Roman Catholic priests in many places.

Jim Reapsome

Strategic-Level Prayer. See Territorial Spirits.

Strategies in Mission. Many people moving out in mission do not seem to think much about strategy. At least the mainstream of missions at any given point in history has been what others are already doing. The constant element may have been a desire to share the riches of the gospel, but the actual technique at any point has usually been assumed.

One of the first major movements was the phenomenon of the highly individual initiatives of the Irish peregrini. They set out with the idea of monastic centers as a main strategy—the nature of the movement from which they derived. And it worked. The Benedictine movement gradually took over the Irish centers of biblical study, devotional life, and evangelistic outreach, adding so many Roman elements of industry and science that these centers became the nucleus of most of the major cities of Europe. Whole kingdoms came into the fold when strategically located Monasteries worked. The Benedictine movement gradually demonstrated. More than one hundred thousand people were converted to Christ, in spite of opposition from Roman Catholic priests in many places.

Many approaches represented contextualization so radical that they would not readily be conceived of today yet they went on with clear success. Can you imagine the orgy of a Spring goddess of fertility becoming an Easter sunrise service? But it worked. For that matter, can you imagine the entire Roman Empire deciding to become Christian? That event remarkably benefited the faith in many ways.

Much of the expansion of the faith in Europe—the overall phenomenon of the so-called conversion of barbarian Europe—was due to the prestige of the gospel representing the extension or renewal of the highly respected Roman civilization (minus its legions), much as modern missionaries have on their side whatever respect (or disrespect) people around the world have for the achievements of the West minus its colonial domination. That is, factors that are often unconscious, or not acknowledged, have given a gust of wind to strategies which might not otherwise have worked as well.
But behind what did or did not work lies the question about what it really is to do mission. Conscious strategy would have to build on basic concepts of what the goal is understood to be. What are we trying to do to people, their families, and societies? Is it merely a case of transmitting a message of hope and pardon? Do we demand that people repent and believe? Is it a case of bringing about “the obedience of faith” (Rom. 12:5; 16:26)? Is it something else to pray that his kingdom come (Matt. 6:10), and to “preach the kingdom” (Acts 28:31)? “As my father has sent me, so send I you.” Are those marching orders? John records “the Son of God appeared for this purpose, that he might destroy the works of the devil.” Have missionaries been doing this?

They have fought ignorance, poverty, injustice, disease. Does that in itself clarify a strategy for mission? Somewhat. But missionaries have also carried disease with them. In North America in the early twenty-first century age stratification and family-dissolving individualism have progressed to the point that the American model for church planting consists to a great extent of the understandable concept of finding loose individuals and collecting them into fellowships which are like surrogate families. This does not work very well in a traditional society where natural families are already the basic structure. In that case the strategy sometimes becomes one of extracting people from real families in order to produce the expected fellowship.

Probably the strategy least likely to succeed is the one in which large, enthusiastic local congregations in the West send people out to reproduce the precise image of their Western fellowship, by-passing the mission agencies which over a period of many years have adjusted to some extent to the mixed realities of the field cultures and have accumulated wisdom rather than having to reinvent the wheel. Often an individual missionary family is less of a threat than a team, which often finds it more difficult to get close or much less inside a strange society.

God often has initiated a breakthrough by miracles and healings, and the very wording of Paul’s summary in Acts 26:18–20 would seem to predict the early possibility of a Power Encounter in which it is decided once and for all whether God or Satan has the upper hand within a given group. But can you plan this out? Turn it on? And, over the long haul is it proper to expect that the primary means of fighting rampant disease, for example, is to appeal to God for miracles? Do a thousand mission clinics and hospitals have a reason for existence? Are amazing new insights into microbial realities allowing and insistently requiring new strategies for destroying “the works of the devil”? Mercy ministries may be seen as bait; are they also essential to defining the very character of a loving God—and, by contrast, the character of our great enemy?

One of the most pursued strategies has been the planting of a string of “missions.” Despite grumblings about “the mission station approach” the idea has prevailed of planting a complete community self-sufficient in food production, education, medicine, and even blacksmithing, masonry, and the importation of foreign building methods, materials, and patterns. Whether Roman Catholic, Moravian, or Protestant, this strategy has been, rightly or wrongly, one of the most enduring techniques, especially in frontier, pioneer, literally dangerous situations, where the “station” is in a certain real sense a fortress. The very opposite, say, that of a young, unarmmed man going out and handing himself over to a tribal society for better or worse and becoming a functional part of that society has also worked. Somewhat similar, but not willingly, at first, would be the case of ULFILAS, who, as a captured slave in the fourth century was forced to become bilingual and was enabled eventually to contribute to the immensely influential Gothic Bible.

Much less frequently in the twenty-first century will we find conditions in which a lone individual might be the intended method as the means of significant mission. The world has changed beyond imagining, introducing obstacles and opportunities that can hardly be predicted from one day to the next. The very nature of the expanding kingdom of God is quite unclear in detail, but unquestionably it is a global phenomenon. And this certainly affects strategy.

For example, it is dramatically new that the Christian movement is leaping and abounding in the non-Western world without a parallel in the West. It is dramatically new that the former “mission fields” are now sprouting hundreds of mission societies of their own and thousands upon thousands of their own missionaries. Some of these new missionaries are often strikingly more able to fit in, while others are often embarrassingly less willing to adapt, just as Western missionaries have been known to be. In sheer number of agencies, associations of agencies, regional gatherings, global gatherings, scholarly gatherings, and scholarly societies, the situation is unprecedented.

When it comes to strategy one of the largest and yet most puzzling challenges is the emergence of a major phenomenon of indigenous movements that are neither fish nor fowl. In Africa at the turn of the millennium, the so-called AFRICAN INITIATED CHURCH MOVEMENT involves over thirty million people. Many of the leaders of this phenomenon are illiterate but quite intelligent, their movements fed by a few who read for the benefit of the rest. Their theologies range from what Westerners might approve to what staggers the imagination—such as the concept of...
Strategies in Mission

divine persons as members. Few missions have developed a strategy for assisting these new churches to move in the right direction.

In India the very possibility of Hindus who continue to be Hindus in many cultural dimensions but who devoutly read the Bible, worship, and seek to follow Christ has many wondering. While no one knows how large this phenomenon is, some scholars estimate that it is as large as the explicitly Christian movement, and to some extent more earnest than those who, by now, are brought up culturally as Christians. Strategies being developed to reach out to assist fellowship with people like this are likely to have as little initial acceptance as Paul’s idea of uncircumcised Gentiles.

But parallel, if not similar, reasons for not identifying with Western Christians exist in both China and the world of Islam, and in both cases millions are profoundly impressed by the person of Jesus Christ and the strange power of the Judeo-Christian Bible. Strategies at the beginning of the Third Millennium must take into account the possibility that far more of what we call Christianity is simply reflective of a particular cultural background of one portion of the globe. And, the way things are going, Western Christianity now incorporates many detestable, even demonic, elements such as radical age segregation, the temporary family structure, and the world’s highest divorce rate, delinquency rate, and prison population. Meanwhile, many other non-Christian societies exhibit stable family life. It already appears to be true that the faith of the Bible is now out of the control of the West. Just as the Roman tradition eventually lost control of European Christianity, the non-Western world is growing without adopting all of the features Westerners might expect or desire. What strategy can we develop in this situation? Missionaries have traditionally been willing to put up with deviations that might startle people back home. But probably the greatest obstacle to the development of effective new ways of working on the field may be the very fact that we have not been willing to employ mission field perspectives in our own backyards. Outgoing missionaries have no missiology to follow. Who among us has been able to know what to do with the burgeoning Mormon movement or the New Age movement?

Undoubtedly new strategies will be developed both through the inherent creativities of isolation and the methodical comparison of notes. The world is both bigger, more fluid, and more complex than ever. It is also smaller and more amenable to nearly constant interchange between workers who were once far more isolated from each other all across the world.

Some of the most pregnant possibilities, undreamed of before, are arising out of strategic partnerships and dozens of other ways in which workers are able to encourage and enlighten one another. Conversation and interchange have become virtually instantaneous compared to the need for endless months for travel or even for mail to get around the globe. Working closely together has always been a marvelous phenomenon in the world of overseas missionaries, and new levels of collaboration are now well established, possibly leading to new innovations in mission strategy in the future.

RALPH D. WINTER

Studd, Charles Thomas (1863–1931). English pioneer missionary to China, India, and Africa. Son of a wealthy planter, Studd was converted under D. L. Moody (1876), educated at Cambridge, and played cricket for the English national team. He was one of the famous “Cambridge Seven” who sailed for China in 1895 with the CHINA INLAND MISSION. While there, he adopted a Chinese lifestyle and gave away his considerable inheritance to Christian causes, preferring to trust God completely. Ill health brought him home in 1894, and following several years working among students in America, he served as pastor of the Union Church at Ootacamund, South India (1900–1906). Despite continued health problems he founded in 1912 the Heart of Africa Mission (later the WORLDWIDE EVANGELIZATION CRUSADE), working in Congo until his death. He gave himself unreservedly to spreading the gospel, reducing local languages to writing, and translating the Scriptures. His motto was, “If Christ be God and died for me, then no sacrifice can be too great for me to make for him.”

J. D. DOUGLAS

Student Mission Work. Ever since Daniel and his three friends were taken from their homeland and placed in the court of King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon, students have had an active role in being missionary witnesses in foreign cultures. Students often have the enthusiasm and freedom to move easily into other cultures with the gospel. Furthermore, as in Daniel’s time, students have the abilities and educational qualifications that make their presence in a foreign culture both acceptable and desirable to the host culture. Consequently it is not surprising that many of the great missionary initiatives in the last few hundred years have come from students.

In the early seventeenth century, seven law students from Lubeck, Germany, committed themselves to world missions while studying in Paris. At least three of them went to Africa, including Peter Heiling, who spent twenty years in Abyssinia (Ethiopia) where he translated the Bible into Amharic and eventually died as a martyr for the cause of Christ.

The great Moravian missionary movement began in the student days of Count Nikolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf, who, while studying, formed the Order of the Grain of Mustard Seed, which had as one of its purposes “to carry the gospel of Christ to those overseas who had never yet heard the message.” Much of modern worldwide missionary movement can be traced to the hearts of those students who gathered together to pray for world evangelism.

Charles Wesley helped form the “Holy Club” at Christ Church College in Oxford in 1726. This group became involved in reaching out to the poor and those in prison. Subsequently in 1735, Charles and his brother, John, joined in a missionary effort among indigenous Americans in Georgia. It was a continuation of their desire to know God better which began in their student days at Oxford.

One of the most influential pastors in England during the early 1800s was Charles Simeon. He had become a believer in Christ during his student days at Cambridge. After graduation he was ordained to the ministry and served at Holy Trinity Church in Cambridge for fifty-four years. It was during these times that he influenced hundreds of students to know Christ and to serve him throughout the world. The British and Foreign Bible Society began in Cambridge in 1811 and the strongly missions-oriented Inter-Varsity Fellowship of England traces its roots directly to Simeon and student work at Cambridge.

Students in America were also key to missionary vision and commitment. In 1806 a group of students at Williams College in western Massachusetts met two afternoons each week to pray. One such meeting was particularly dedicated to pray that students would have an increased interest in foreign missions. However, the students got caught in a thunderstorm and sought refuge under a haystack. There they prayed and the result was the first student missionary society in America. According to Kenneth Scott Latourette: “It was from this Haystack Meeting that the foreign missionary movement of the churches of the United States had an initial main impulse.”

Later in that century, in 1883, the Princeton Foreign Missionary Society was formed by students and in 1885, 251 students from eighty-nine colleges in the United States attended a conference at Mt. Hermon with D. L. Moody. A direct result of this conference was the formation of the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions in 1888. Its famous watchword was “the evangelization of the world in this generation.” It is estimated that in the next fifty years more than twenty thousand students became active missionaries as a result.

In 1936 a new missionary thrust developed among students with the leadership of Robert McQuilkin, founder and president of Columbia Bible College. This new movement became the Student Foreign Missions Fellowship and spread rapidly to scores of primarily Christian colleges in the United States. Later, in 1945, the SFMF became the missionary arm at Christian schools for InterVarsity Christian Fellowship. This merger formed the backdrop for the first IVCF-SFMF international student missions convention held at the University of Toronto in 1946. Two years later the convention was held at the University of Illinois at Urbana, where it has been held since then on a triennial basis and become known simply as “Urbana.” During the fifty-year history of Urbana, nearly 200,000 delegates have attended these missionary conventions and approximately 125,000 of these delegates have made commitments to be actively involved in the world mission of the church.

In the 1950s other organizations focused on students came into being. Campus Crusade, The Navigators, The Fellowship of Christian Athletes, Youth for Christ, Youth With a Mission, Operation Mobilization, and many other parachurch groups are actively involved in student missions projects. Church groups and most Christian colleges send thousands of young people overseas in short-term missions teams every summer.

One other dimension of student missions is the tremendous impact on world missions of campus revivals in the United States. Jonathan Edwards observed that the First Great Awakening had its greatest impact “chiefly among the young.” David Brainerd was one such young person at Yale who committed his life to the evangelization of Native Americans. In the revival of 1904–8, E. Stanley Jones was a student at Asbury College who committed his life to going to India in missionary service. It has been estimated that perhaps as many as 10,000 to 15,000 students went overseas from this awakening.

In 1950, revivals at places like Asbury College and Wheaton College were dramatic. At Wheaton 39 percent of the class of 1950 devoted at least part of their lives to full-time Christian ministry. Another wave of revivals took place in 1970 with at least 130 colleges, seminaries, and Bible schools being touched by unusual spiritual activity and commitment. The Wheaton revival in 1995 has had a significant impact on students praying for greater involvement in world missions.

It is difficult to fully assess all of the dimensions of student mission work. However, it is not difficult to observe that students have had and will continue to have a significant role in world missions. In our current “information age,” student status provides access to all parts of the world. The most endearing qualities of students, though, are their spiritual commitment and zeal.
Stressing urgency and purpose, the motto was "evangelization of the world in this generation." Its chairman. The motto of the SVM was "the Interseminary Missionary Alliance, with Mott as the sponsorship of the YMCA, the YWCA, and the American colleges. This was significant in the life of JOHN R. MOTT, a student at Cornell.

The major speakers at the Northfield conference, which was attended by 251 students, were D. L. Moody and A. T. PIERSON, a Presbyterian minister and well-known advocate of missions. Wilder attended while his sister prayed. She had faith that for revival and mission, Robert formed groups that met daily for prayer. Another influence was the visit of J. E. K. Studd, brother of one of the Cambridge Seven, who spoke at a number of American colleges. This was significant in the life of JOHN R. MOTT, a student at Cornell.

The major speakers at the Northfield conference, which was attended by 251 students, were D. L. Moody and A. T. PIERSON, a Presbyterian minister and well-known advocate of missions. Wilder attended while his sister prayed. She had faith that there would be a hundred volunteers enlisted at the conference. Midway into the conference students asked for permission to speak on various areas of the world and their needs, and to encourage others to sign a commitment to missionary service. At the final prayer meeting the one hundredth student signed the pledge. Wilder and John Forman were appointed traveling secretaries and visited 162 educational institutions the following year. In 1888 SVM was formally organized under the sponsorship of the YMCA, the YWCA, and the Interseminary Missionary Alliance, with Mott as its chairman. The motto of the SVM was "the evangelization of the world in this generation."

Stressing urgency and purpose, the motto was sometimes criticized as being too American and too activist. However, it was not meant to be a prophecy; rather, it stressed the responsibility of Christians in each generation to proclaim the gospel to the whole world. Each volunteer signed a statement: "It is my purpose, if God permits, to become a foreign missionary." The SVM gave strong emphasis on the authority of Scripture, prayer, and the need for the power of the Holy Spirit. It taught that the needs of the world constituted the imperative for mission, and that no other special call was needed. Succeeding Wilder as traveling secretary in 1889, ROBERT E. SPEER visited 110 institutions and gathered 1,100 new volunteers. SAMUEL ZWEMER was another early leader. Almost 600 volunteers from 159 institutions attended the quadrennial convention in 1891. The following year Wilder traveled to Britain, and the movement was launched in a number of European countries. It grew rapidly until after World War I. The 1920 convention was attended by 6,890 people from 949 schools, and that year 2,783 new volunteers enrolled. By 1940 at least 20,500 missionaries had sailed from North America and Europe to various mission fields. The movement more than tripled the number of missionaries from North America. They served primarily under the Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, and Congregational churches. The majority went to Asia, with smaller numbers going to Africa, Latin America, and the Middle East. In addition, an educational program to study missions spread rapidly. At one time over 40,000 students at 700 institutions were involved. Thus the movement not only multiplied the number of missionaries from the West, but also greatly increased the number of those at home who supported missions. The SVM was instrumental in forming the World Student Christian Federation in 1895, laid much of the groundwork for the 1910 WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE, and contributed significant leadership to the early EUMENICAL MOVEMENT.

After World War I the SVM began to decline. By 1940 it had ceased to be a decisive factor in students' religious life and in the promotion of mission in the churches. This was due first to the loss of a clear theological focus. After World War I theological liberalism and doubts about the validity of Western culture led to a turning inward. A desire to tackle the problems of Western society coupled with doubts about the validity of world evangelization. The generation of leadership that succeeded Mott and Speer had considerably less ability. The economic depression of the 1930s was another negative factor, along with a decline in missionary education. The movement no longer had much impact by 1940 and, after merging with other organizations in the 1950s, was officially terminated in 1969.

PAUL E. PIERNER

Student Mission Work

for the kingdom of God. They are not yet entrenched in institutions and genuinely share the freshness of their faith with those who do not yet know Jesus. They accept the multicultural realities of the world without the prejudice of previous generations. They have great passion and compassion for those in need and are ready for a full commitment to career missionary service.

ROBERT A. FRYLING

The Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions (SVM). The Student Volunteer Movement was organized in 1888, the result of a student conference held in July 1886 at Northfield, Massachusetts. It had several roots. One was the Society of Brethren, which had been established to stimulate mission interest at Williams College (see HAYSTACK MEETING) and then spread to at least forty-nine other institutions by mid-century. A second was the college ministry of the YMCA, led by Luther Wishard, who was deeply committed to foreign missions. Third was the Princeton Foreign Missionary Society; it was led by Robert Wilder, the son of a retired missionary to India who in his own student days had been a member of the Society of Brethren. Wilder at Princeton and his sister Grace at Mount Holyoke College were both committed to motivate students to missionary service, then made a covenant to pray for a thousand missionary volunteers. Concerned for revival and mission, Robert formed groups that met daily for prayer. Another influence was the visit of J. E. K. Studd, brother of one of the Cambridge Seven, who spoke at a number of American colleges. This was significant in the life of JOHN R. MOTT, a student at Cornell.

The major speakers at the Northfield conference, which was attended by 251 students, were D. L. Moody and A. T. PIERSON, a Presbyterian minister and well-known advocate of missions. Wilder attended while his sister prayed. She had faith that there would be a hundred volunteers enlisted at the conference. Midway into the conference students asked for permission to speak on various areas of the world and their needs, and to encourage others to sign a commitment to missionary service. At the final prayer meeting the one hundredth student signed the pledge. Wilder and John Forman were appointed traveling secretaries and visited 162 educational institutions the following year. In 1888 SVM was formally organized under the sponsorship of the YMCA, the YWCA, and the Interseminary Missionary Alliance, with Mott as its chairman. The motto of the SVM was "the evangelization of the world in this generation."

Stressing urgency and purpose, the motto was sometimes criticized as being too American and too activist. However, it was not meant to be a prophecy; rather, it stressed the responsibility of Christians in each generation to proclaim the gospel to the whole world. Each volunteer signed a statement: "It is my purpose, if God permits, to become a foreign missionary." The SVM gave strong emphasis on the authority of Scripture, prayer, and the need for the power of the Holy Spirit. It taught that the needs of the world constituted the imperative for mission, and that no other special call was needed. Succeeding Wilder as traveling secretary in 1889, ROBERT E. SPEER visited 110 institutions and gathered 1,100 new volunteers. SAMUEL ZWEMER was another early leader. Almost 600 volunteers from 159 institutions attended the quadrennial convention in 1891. The following year Wilder traveled to Britain, and the movement was launched in a number of European countries. It grew rapidly until after World War I. The 1920 convention was attended by 6,890 people from 949 schools, and that year 2,783 new volunteers enrolled. By 1940 at least 20,500 missionaries had sailed from North America and Europe to various mission fields. The movement more than tripled the number of missionaries from North America. They served primarily under the Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, and Congregational churches. The majority went to Asia, with smaller numbers going to Africa, Latin America, and the Middle East. In addition, an educational program to study missions spread rapidly. At one time over 40,000 students at 700 institutions were involved. Thus the movement not only multiplied the number of missionaries from the West, but also greatly increased the number of those at home who supported missions. The SVM was instrumental in forming the World Student Christian Federation in 1895, laid much of the groundwork for the 1910 WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE, and contributed significant leadership to the early EUMENICAL MOVEMENT.

After World War I the SVM began to decline. By 1940 it had ceased to be a decisive factor in students' religious life and in the promotion of mission in the churches. This was due first to the loss of a clear theological focus. After World War I theological liberalism and doubts about the validity of Western culture led to a turning inward. A desire to tackle the problems of Western society coupled with doubts about the validity of world evangelization. The generation of leadership that succeeded Mott and Speer had considerably less ability. The economic depression of the 1930s was another negative factor, along with a decline in missionary education. The movement no longer had much impact by 1940 and, after merging with other organizations in the 1950s, was officially terminated in 1969.

PAUL E. PIERNER

Sudan (Est. 2000 pop.: 32,079,000; 2,505,813 sq. km. [967,494 sq. mi.]). Sudan, a land often referred to throughout the Old Testament as either Kush, Nubia, and Ethiopia, has long thirsted to know the living God. Isaiah 18 pronounces a prophecy against Cush, the Upper Nile region, but also proclaims “people tall and smooth-skinned, from a people feared far and wide” (v. 7) will come to worship the Lord Almighty.

Historically, the blooming of a Christian church began in the sixth century with the Byzantium/Egyptian missionary thrust. It had withered out by the sixteenth century. The key factor for this demise was the coming of Islam, a long process that began in the tenth century. The destabilization of Nubian states in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries by Mamluk warlords led to Islamic conversion of Nubia. Sudanese Islam follows Sufism, a mystic form of Islam.

The modern missionary period first saw the Catholics establishing a mission in Khartoum in the mid-nineteenth century. Daniel Comboni with his perceptively innovative mission strategy, “A Plan for the Regeneration of Africa by Means of Africans,” of 1864 is regarded as the founder of the Catholic Church in Sudan. Comboni’s method included buying slaves, educating them in Italy and Khartoum, and commissioning them for the work of the church in Sudan. Comboni also founded the Verona Fathers, a mission society, to carry out the plan.

Following the Anglo-Egyptian Conquest of 1898, three main strands dominated twentieth-century missions. The Verona Fathers, the Church Missionary Society of the Anglican Church, and the United Presbyterian Church of America each attempted to make inroads into Sudan. The Anglo-Egyptian administration feared Islamic rebellions and dictated the missions’ agendas. Thus, the Conventions of 1899 forbade all direct evangelism but allowed educational and medical work. The strategy became holistic, seeking to minister predominantly through education, medical ministries, and Bible translation.

Independence in 1956 sparked civil war. The Islamic north wanted to impose Islam and arabization on the Christian south. The war continues until this day. Since 1956, there have been two main phases of rapid church growth. The churches of Equatoria, the southern belt, saw revival from 1960 to 1972. The second phase experienced an unprecedented, totally indigenous movement among the Dinka and Nuer beginning in 1983. In response to the need for an African identity as Christians, the church placed a strong emphasis on cultural forms—healing, prayer, dance with mime, and singing—that gained a high impact for the gospel.

Missiological challenges for today include the overwhelming need for leadership training in order to baptize and train thousands of new converts. Hundreds of evangelists, mostly women and young boys, are leading churches with minimal or no training. Literacy and theological education through open learning are imperative. One young pastor, for example, returned from training and baptized nine thousand converts his first year. The Sudan is experiencing a devastating war, a profound destruction of traditional life, horrible ethnic clashes (one million Christians killed), and failure of the economy and social systems. Yet the gospel is moving forward, in isolation from Western influence, with great responsiveness. The Sudan is thirsting to know the true, living God.

ROBERTA R. KING

Sudan Interior Mission. See Society for International Ministries.

Suffering. The universal symbol of Christianity is the cross, a symbol of suffering, specifically, the suffering of Jesus. To reflect upon the life of Jesus is to remember his suffering. As the Servant Songs of Isaiah anticipated, Jesus “was despised and rejected, . . . a man of suffering and acquainted with infirmity” (53:3 nrvs, see also 50:6 and 53:4–5, 7–12). Likewise, it has been the fortune of those who follow Jesus to experience suffering. "Remember the word I said to you,” Jesus reminded his disciples, “‘Servants are not greater than their master.’ If they persecuted me, they will persecute you’” (John 15:20). No sooner did the church begin to flourish then the apostles were arrested and threatened. They and others were imprisoned and murdered (Acts 4:1–22; 5:17–33; 7:54–60). But their suffering was seen not as an affliction; it was rather a means of witness. “They rejoiced that they were considered worthy to suffer dishonor for the sake of the name” (Acts 5:41). Though the words of the writer of 1 Peter were addressed to first-century Christian slaves, they have been regarded, and rightly so, as applicable to all of Jesus’ disciples: “For to this you have been called, because Christ suffered for you, leaving you an example, so that you should follow in his steps” (1 Peter 2:21).

The Christian mission—if it is Christian, that is, Christ-like—is a replication of the mission of Suffering

Jesus, and in due time will involve suffering. In his second letter to the church at Corinth, Paul recounts his own suffering in the spreading of the gospel (11:23–28), and he reminds his readers that though suffering is a part of being a disciple, it also is a form of witness. “We are afflicted in every way,” he writes, “but not crushed; perplexed, but not driven to despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; struck down, but not destroyed; always carrying in the body the death of Jesus, so that the life of Jesus may also be made visible in our bodies” (4:8–10).

It is important to remember, as Douglas Webster observes, that the Greek word for Witness, martys, soon acquired a new meaning, one who died for the faith, and it has been transliterated as martyr, thus “combining the ideas of mission and suffering” (1966, 104). To be a witness will therefore result in suffering, sometimes in death. This has been particularly true for missionaries. For some, mission has meant violent death, for example, John Williams, Eleanor Chestnut, and Archbishop Oscar Romero. For others it has meant harassment, arrest, and months or years in prison, for example, Adoniram Judson and William Wade Harris. How many have suffered the loss of spouses and/or children, for example, George Schmidt, E. R. Beckman, and Carrie Sydenstricker? Who knows the number who have experienced terribly unhappy marriages because of abusive or mentally ill spouses, for example, William Carey, Robert Morrison, and Martha Crawford? Abandonment by colleagues or supporters has pushed some to the brink of despair, for example, Rowland Bingham and C. T. Studd. Oppression of the poor and the defenseless invariably weighs heavily on compassionate missionaries and missionary bishops, for example, Bartholomew de las Casas and Festo Kivenge. Significant, therefore, is the apostle Paul’s conclusion following his recitation of personal suffering. He says, “And besides other things, I am under daily pressure because of my anxiety for all the churches” (2 Cor. 11:28). Many of the sufferings experienced in mission stem from apprehension and pain for Christ’s people.

To be involved in the mission of Jesus Christ, therefore, is to experience suffering, and one of the most vivid reminders of this fact is when we as Jesus’ followers gather for the celebration of the Eucharist, a reenactment of the sufferings of our Lord. Whether we hold to the real or symbolic presence in the elements, we should always remember that “the breaking of the bread” and the “drinking of the cup” happens repeatedly outside as well as inside the walls of the church.

ALAN NEELY

See also Martyrdom and Persecution.

Bibliography. A. J. Gittins, Bread for the Journey; J. S. Pobee, Mission in Christ’s Way; R. A. Tucker, FJIJ; D. Webster, Yes to Mission.

Sufi, Sufism. Sufism is the mystical dimension of Islam. The term most likely comes from the Arabic suf (wool): the early Sufis wore plain woolen clothing to symbolize their commitment to poverty and simplicity. Sufism is the Islamic expression of the broad religious movement that seeks direct knowledge of God; it is the inward path to union with God that complements the outward, formal religious tradition. Sufism derives its doctrines and methods from the Qur’an and Islamic traditions, though it reflects influences of Greek and Persian philosophy, Christianity, and even Hinduism.

The ultimate goal of the Sufi is to experience the oneness or unity of God. The movement toward this goal is termed the Way or the Path. The Path is subdivided into three basic steps: makhafah, the way of purification; mahabbath, the way of love; and ma’rifah, the way of knowledge. Aspects of the Sufi way include the disciplines of poverty, servanthood, subjugation of the self, and above all the remembrance of God. The remembrance of God is enhanced through meditation, sacred dance, and the constant repetition of the divine name. The final goal of the Sufi quest is fana, best translated as annihilation or extinction. Through annihilation first in the shayk, or religious leader, then in the Prophet, and finally in Allah, one is able to die to self and this world and to exist in God alone.

In the early centuries of Islam, Sufism was a “movement without a name,” a diverse spiritual movement within the broader tradition. In time, distinct brotherhoods or orders formed around particular teachers or saints, shayks, all of whom traced their spiritual lineage back to the Prophet. These brotherhoods came to dominate the religious landscape of many parts of the Islamic world. They also functioned as the principal missionary arm of Islam in Africa, Central Asia, and the Indian subcontinent.

The twelfth through the fourteenth centuries were the golden age of Sufism. Sufi masters such as Suhrwardi, Ibn Arabi, Jalal ar-Rumi, and al-Ghazali were known throughout the Islamic world for their poetry and religious insight. However, as the Orders increased in fame, influence, power, and wealth they fell prey to many of the temptations that accompany power and wealth. They were also subject to political manipulation. In some places, hundreds of thousands of persons found their primary religious identity in a local shayk or brotherhood. This gave rise to popular devotional Sufism, with an emphasis on psychic phenomena, communication with the spirit world, magic, and extraordinary physical feats as demonstration of spiritual power. In the past two
Many Muslims have followed Sufi practices historically. In Africa and Asia, Sufism has been an important religious force for centuries. In the Islamic world, Sufism has been viewed as a means to achieve a deeper spiritual connection with God. In modern times, Sufism has been studied extensively by scholars, and its influence on Muslim culture continues to be felt in many parts of the world. However, there are concerns that Sufism may be in decline, particularly among younger generations who may not see the same appeal as their predecessors did.

Sufism has been studied by scholars such as M. Lings, A. Schimmel, and J. Darrell Chancellor. Their work has helped to shed light on the history and significance of Sufism in the Islamic world. In particular, the work of the late Bengt Sundkler, a missionary in East and Central Africa, has been important in understanding the role of Sufism in Muslim culture.

Sundkler, Bengt

Sunday Observance. See Sabbath Observance.

Sunday, William Ashley ("Billy") (1862–1935). American evangelist. A native of Iowa, he played professional baseball from 1883 to 1891. He was converted through the ministry of the Pacific Garden Mission (Chicago) in 1886, married Helen (“Nell”) Thompson in 1888, and a few years later left baseball to work with the YMCA (1891–93). He assisted J. Wilbur Chapman in the planning and promotion of evangelistic crusades from 1894 to 1895 before launching out on his own. Sunday was a master of organizing citywide meetings and preached revival meetings in churches, tents, and large wooden tabernacles throughout America until his death in 1935. His able assistant, song leader, and soloist was Homer A. Rodeheaver. His crusade ministry was characterized by advanced planning, detailed organization, massive publicity, and passionate evangelistic preaching. He also preached often on morality, the evils of alcohol, and American patriotism. His animated style drew huge crowds and generated large love offerings, which eventually led to Sunday being criticized for an ostentatious lifestyle. Sunday popularized the phrase “hitting the sawdust trail,” referring to those who responded by coming to the front during the invitation time. His legacy is the many converts (estimated as high as one million) who responded to his invitations.

Sundkler, Bengt

Sundkler, Bengt (1910–95). Swedish missiologist and missionary to Africa. From 1937 to 1945 Sundkler was a missionary in East and Central Africa before moving to South Africa. His work in South Africa led to his pioneering study of African Independent Churches, Bantu Prophets in South Africa (1948). In 1949 he became professor of missiology at the University of Uppsala in his native Sweden. He interrupted his academic work briefly to become Lutheran bishop of Bukoba, Tanzania. In 1974, after retiring from Uppsala, Sundkler returned to his study of African independent movements in Zulu Zion (1976). This more mature work represented an increasingly positive evaluation of independent movements although he remained alert to instances where the African zionist prophet attempted to eclipse the centrality of Christ (see also Zionism, African Church).
Sundkler, Bengt

Sundkler’s emphasis in all his work was the need to translate Christianity into the categories of African culture and thought without losing the essence of the message which he saw in terms of Luther’s theology of the cross. While he commended those who had translated the Bible into Africa’s vernacular languages he believed that “another and no less important work of translation remains to be tackled.” The challenge of theological translation remains one of Sundkler’s most important legacies to African Christianity.

MARK SHAW

Sung, John (1901–44). Chinese evangelist. Sung was born in Hinghwa (Xinghua), Fujian province, the sixth child of a Methodist minister. He was impacted by the Hinghwa revival of 1909, and began assisting his father in preaching. He received his Ph.D. in chemistry from Ohio State University. Upon self-evaluation he gave his life to the ministry, and attended Union Theological Seminary in New York. In February 1927 he had a deep spiritual experience of repentance from sin. He was sent to a mental institution for six months, after which he returned to China. He was a highly effective evangelist, often using eccentric methods of illustration. From 1932 to 1934 he joined the Bethel Evangelistic Band, traveled 54,823 miles, preached at 1,199 meetings, and spoke to over 400,000 people. Over 18,000 were converted. He began traveling in Southeast Asia in 1935. His preaching was centered on the need for thorough repentance. Numerous Christians in China and Southeast Asia can trace their conversion or total consecration to the preaching of John Sung.

SAMUEL LING

Suni, Sunnism. The Islamic world is divided into two broad traditions, the Sunni and the Shi’ite. The Sunni tradition stretches from West Africa and Central Europe to East Asia. Approximately 85 percent to 90 percent of all Muslims are Sunni. The Sunni tradition accommodates a wide range of cultural expressions and intensity of religious commitment, but remains centered on a set of core beliefs and practices.

The full name of the Sunnis is ahl as-sunnah wa-l-ijma, “the People of the Sunnah and the Consensus.” This fuller term for the Sunnis points to the centrality of the legacy of the Prophet Muhammad and primary role of the community of faith. The term “Suni” comes from the Arabic sunnah, the “custom of the Prophet.” Sunnis often refer to themselves as “the orthodox.” They recognize the validity of the first four Caliphs (the Righteous Caliphs), after Muhammad, as the founding figures of the Islamic community. The caliphs are said to have succeeded to Muhammad’s authority as head of the community, but not to his function as prophet “Messenger of Allah.” In this recognition, they at once affirm that ultimate authority in Islam rests with the ummah, or Islamic community, and deny any unique or special religious or political authority to the physical descendants of Muhammad or Ali, his cousin and son-in-law. The Sunni tradition holds strongly to Muhammad as model human, the Qur’an and Hadith as normative scripture, the Five Pillars as normative for religious practice, and the Law of God as complete guide for all human endeavors.

There are four schools of law among the Sunnis: the Hanbali, Maliki, Hanafi, and Shafi’i. These schools emerged in the eighth and ninth centuries and over time each came to dominate general geographic regions. The Maliki school is found primarily in Africa and the Arab West; the Hanafi school dominates most areas formerly part of the Ottoman Empire. The Hanbali school is found in the Gulf region, and the Shafi’i school is observed in East Asia. While Sunnis regard each school as “orthodox,” each individual Muslim is expected to adhere to one school.

For Sunni Islam, the center point of the faith is the Community of Believers. A few observations about the Ulema, the professional class of religious leaders, will bring this in focus. The Ulema are the custodians of knowledge about the Qur’an, the Prophet, and the Shari’ah. They serve as teachers, prayer leaders, and preachers in mosques, Qur’an reciters, and professors of religion and sacred law in universities. They are very loosely organized in any institutional sense and draw their authority only from their ability to reach consensus themselves and bring that consensus to bear on the larger community. They do not constitute a priesthood, and in small or rural communities most of the functions of the Ulema are performed by lay Muslims.

JAMES DARRELL CHANCELLOR

Suriname (Est. 2000 pop.: 447,000; 163,265 sq. km. [63,037 sq. mi.]). Located on the north shore of South America, Suriname (formerly Dutch Guiana) is bounded on the west by Guyana, on the east by French Guiana, and on the south by...
Brazil. The country was visited early in the sixteenth century by Spanish explorers who were not attracted to the region because there was no apparent source of wealth. The Dutch came as early as 1613, and the British in 1630. Finally the Dutch acquired Suriname from Britain in 1667 in exchange for their colony in New York. These two colonial powers, however, competed with each other to establish a foothold in the region. In 1799 the colony was conquered by the British and remained under their rule until 1802, when it was restored to the Netherlands. It became a British colony in 1804 and a Dutch colony (1814). In 1954, the Dutch colony was recognized at a level of equality with the Netherlands; independence finally was granted in 1975.

The most important religions include the Dutch Reformed Church, Moravianism, Roman Catholicism, Hinduism, and Islam. Against the prevailing point of view of the Dutch Reformed Church at his time, Justinian von Welz (1621–68) was of the conviction that the command of Christ to preach the gospel to all the world was still valid. He went as a missionary to Suriname, where he eventually lost his life. The Roman Catholic Church has not been very influential; it was not until 1842 that they created a vicariate apostolate. The most remarkable mission, however, has been that of the Moravians among the Indians and later extended to the maroons (known as “Bush Negroes,” the descendants of escaped slaves), and to other blacks on the plantations on the coast. The maroons of Suriname have long been the hemisphere’s largest maroon population. The Moravian testimony began in 1738, in the midst of many sufferings. Six years passed before the first convert was baptized. From that time on, the work spread and grew, and has continued until the present day. Moravian missions brought education and medical care to some remote areas. They also produced a good deal of missionary ethnography, especially about the Saramaka, the most important of the six Bush Negro tribes of Suriname. A major problem for church growth today in Suriname is the fact that immigration to the Netherlands has been very heavy. As a result, the total population of the country has persistently declined in the last two decades. Many Protestants among the Bush Negroes are now living, working, and continuing their education in the Netherlands.

Pablo A. Deiros

Bibliography. J. T. Hamilton, A History of the Missions of the Moravian Church During the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries; idem, Protestant Missions in South America; J. Holmes, Historical Sketches of the Missions of the United Brethren; J. E. Hutton, History of the Moravian Missions.

Swaziland

Swain, Clara A. (1834–1910). American pioneer missionary physician in India. Born in Elmira, New York, and raised in Castile, New York, Swain attended seminary and taught public school before beginning her medical apprenticeship in 1865. She received her M.D. in 1869 from the Woman’s Medical College of Pennsylvania. The Woman’s Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church sent her as the first female medical missionary to the Orient. She and Isabella Thoburn, an educator, left to work with women and orphans in India in 1869. In addition to her medical practice, Swain established a course of medical training for young Indian women. Because she did an effective job of respecting caste and working with women and children from all parts of society, she was given 40 acres by a Muslim prince in 1871. There she established the first hospital for women in India. She needed a three-year furlough from 1876 to 1879 to regain her health.

In 1885, she was invited by the Rajah of Khetri, Rajputane to become the palace physician for his wife. Her condition for acceptance was that she be allowed to evangelize in conjunction with her medical work. Because his wife responded so well to Swain’s treatment, the Raj invited her to provide medical care for other women in the area and enabled her to open a dispensary. Swain effectively used music to share the gospel with many under her care. She retired in 1896 and returned to New York.

Margot Eyring

Swaziland (Est. 2000 pop.: 980,000; 17,364 sq. km. [6,704 sq. mi.]). Swaziland, the smallest nation in the southern hemisphere, is wedged between the Republic of South Africa and Mozambique. It gained its independence from Britain in 1968. The Swazi originated from several different clans in Mozambique, but were eventually amalgamated into one nation to withstand the onslaughts of the warring Zulus.

The gospel first came to Swaziland as a fulfillment of a vision King Somhlolo had in the mid-1830s in which people with straight hair and strange-colored skin would come. Almost a decade later Somhlolo’s son, King Mswati, heard about white men among neighboring people. He sent a delegation to them and, in 1844, two Methodist missionaries arrived, bringing two Basotho evangelists whom they left to begin the work.

Today, with 80 percent claiming to be Christian, Swaziland could be considered a country saturated with the gospel. There is, however, a high degree of nominalism and of those who claim to be Christian, only one in four recognizes a need to be an active member in a local church and only one in three is a faithful church attender.
Swaziland

Key church leaders are currently praying for renewed spiritual awakening among the nation’s churches. While the church is involved in many areas, major hindrances to the spread of the gospel still remain. These include traditional religion, polygamous values, the universalistic views promoted by some African independent churches, syncretism, the institutional approach of mission societies and parachurch organizations, and churches that do not understand the changing society.

Major challenges confront the Swazi church. There still remain many targets for evangelism. Solid biblical principles concerning family life, the selection and training of church leaders, the proper stewardship of money, and meaningful prayer urgently need to be taught and modeled. AIDS-related ministries are required to care for both children and parents.

Because the church is not keeping up with the population growth the Swaziland Evangelism Task recommended the church in Swaziland strive to have 30 percent of the population as active members by the year 2015. Additionally, there is the growing conviction that it is time for the Swazi churches to involve themselves in God’s global purposes to reach all nations with the gospel.

Thomas J. Kopp

Sweden (Est. 2000 pop.: 8,972,000; 449,964 sq. km. [173,731 sq. mi.]). The largest and most populous of the Scandinavian countries, Sweden exercises significant international influence in science, manufacturing, and politics. The Nobel Prize, instituted by Swedish inventor Alfred Nobel, is considered the premier scientific award in the world. Natural resources and careful management produce internationally known products such as Volvo automobiles, SKF bearings, and Hasselblad cameras. Swedish democratic socialism seems based on a dominant cultural value of equality. Other principal values include a love of untamed nature and individualism. The latter sometimes clashes with socialism, yet apparently functions to maintain political and social balance. Prominent Swedish politicians include former UN secretary general Dag Hammarskjöld and prime minister Olaf Palme.

The most common Swedish philosophies find roots in naturalism, pragmatism, and existentialism (first conceived in Scandinavia). Naturalism prevails in the universities and science, pragmatism in industry and politics, and existentialism in personal choice and experience. Once rooted in Christian THEISM, Swedes have recently turned away from organized Lutheranism toward ATHEISM, AGNOSTICISM, or personal religious experience, the first two finding basis in naturalism, the latter in existentialism. Recent prosperity movements have attracted a number of adherents among Christian youth, perhaps stemming from the movement’s combination of theistic pragmatism and existentialism.

The Swedish approach to existentialism can be readily observed in literature (Strindberg, Lagerququist) and film (Bergman). Special artistic attention is often given to existential angst, which may be described as an overwhelming hopelessness. The tendency toward loneliness and angst may also contribute to ongoing concerns over depression and alcohol misuse.

Swedish Christianity, once dominated by Lutheranism, currently displays a variety of convictions. Led by King Gustav Vasa and Luther student Olavus Petri, Lutheranism began to replace Catholicism in 1524. Until the twentieth century, Swedish Lutheranism tended toward the traditional. More recently, liberalism has pervaded the Swedish Lutheran theology, philosophy, and practice.

Seventeenth-century pietist and Moravian movements significantly influenced the formation of the free church movement, started in the 1830s by English Methodist missionary George Scott. Although Scott was forced to leave Sweden, the movement survived, gaining strength toward the end of the nineteenth century. Since the 1930s, however, membership in nearly all denominations has diminished. The free church is currently defined by the government as anything not related to the state church. Included are various Baptists, Mission Covenant, Methodists, evangelical Lutherans, Pentecostals, Holiness Union, Swedish Alliance, and the Salvation Army. Together, active free church members comprise under 10 percent of the total population. War and political refugees, however, have significantly added to the numbers of Catholics and Muslims. A recent vote (1995) called for a separation of the state–church relationship after the year 2000, Sweden being the first Western European country to do so.

Swedish Christianity has provided many influential evangelical leaders. Included are evangelist C. O. Rosenius, Mission Covenant leader and theologian P. P. Waldenström, Pentecostal leader Levi Petrus, and The Evangelical Alliance Mission founder FREDERIK FRANSON. Swedish mission efforts are considerable, especially when considering the relatively small number of evangelicals. Included are substantial (often tax supported) programs for hunger and development that stand beside traditional efforts in evangelism, church planting, and Bible translation.

Steven J. Pierson

Swedish Mission Boards and Societies. Sweden, the most populous of the Scandinavian countries, has also made by far the largest contribution to the worldwide mission of the church. Like the others, at least 90 percent of its people are (for the most part nominally) related to the national Lutheran Church. But whereas in Denmark there are seven times as many parishes of the national church as in all other Protestant denominations combined, and in Norway and Finland the parishes greatly outnumber the total of free churches, in Sweden the situation is reversed. There are over twice as many free church congregations as parishes of the national church. Moreover, unlike in many countries, the free churches have been concerned almost since their beginnings not only with national revival but also with worldwide mission. However, it is now widely recognized that the pervasive secularization of Sweden is affecting not only the dominant church (where attendance rarely reaches 5 percent of the membership), but even the free churches which, whether Pentecostal or not, have also been declining lately in active participants. The implications for future missionary effort are therefore ominous unless this is reversed.

From the early 1970s into the 1990s, the number of foreign missionaries sent out through some thirty agencies has been about 1,800. Probably less than a fifth of these have been through either of the two larger and some smaller Lutheran agencies; about half of them have been Pentecostals. Since 1912, in the wake of the Edinburgh World Missionary Conference, there has been a national missions council, but the work is still basically carried on by the individual agencies and denominations.

Within the framework of the national church there are two main agencies, quite distinct in how they relate to it. The older is usually translated as the Evangelical National Missionary Society, founded in 1856. It is basically a voluntary and lay initiative to promote renewal within the church and so most of its efforts are within Sweden. However, it also sent its first foreign missionaries, in 1865, to Africa, and then in 1877 to India. In the 1960s it had 120 foreign workers, five-sixths of them in eastern Africa.

Unlike many national churches, in Sweden it was decided, through confessional pressure, to make missions an endeavor of the official structures of the whole body, and so in 1874 the Church of Sweden Mission was organized. An earlier initiative dating from 1835 was soon incorporated, but the intention of soon drawing in the above society was not achieved. In 1876, the church sent its first missionaries to South Africa and also to India. In 1918 it entered China. Missionaries spread elsewhere in Africa, especially in Tanzania after the Germans had to leave because of World War I. By the 1960s there were nearly two hundred missionaries, all but 15 percent in southern Africa.

Pentecostalism came to Sweden early in the twentieth century and by 1907 the first missionaries left for China. The key leader, Levi Pethrus, not only built up the huge Philadelphia Church in Stockholm (which was expelled in 1912 from the Baptists), but also promoted foreign missions. In 1916 the first missionaries were officially sent out to Brazil, and this vast country has been a major and successful field for them ever since. In 1920, outreach was begun elsewhere in Europe. Pentecostal missions have been distinguished from the Lutheran and even some other free church missions by their eagerness to witness in Latin America and elsewhere in Europe. However, the more common areas of China and Africa were also entered. In the latter, a major field was the eastern Congo, from which they spilled over into the deeply troubled countries of Burundi (where the Swedish Pentecostals built the largest Protestant denomination) and Rwanda (where they were second only to the Anglicans). A crucial feature of Swedish Pentecostalism, typically not shared by many other Pentecostal movements, is its strong congregational nature. Perhaps this is a reaction to the connectionalism of the state church. The coordination of the movement is maintained through conferences and voluntary cooperation and various specialized agencies. The mission agency, the Swedish Free Mission, upholds this pattern. For missions this has meant that a large degree of responsibility has been accepted by the individual congregations in sending out missionaries and a close personal attachment is felt toward them. The result was that by 1945 there were some three hundred Pentecostal missionaries with a 50 percent increase by 1960, and currently there are about three times as many as in 1945.

The smaller free churches have generally maintained more centralized structures than the Pentecostals. The older Baptist Union has had Congo as its main field, having entered in 1914, and had thirty-five workers there in the 1960s with only a few elsewhere. The Oerebro Mission goes back to the 1890s and a split with the Baptists that would now probably be called charismatic in nature. They are now roughly as large as the older Baptists in Sweden, and also seem to be much more foreign missions-minded (from which interesting conclusions are obvious). Their first missionaries went to India in 1908, to Brazil in 1912, and to Congo in 1914. By the mid-1960s they had at least 160 foreign workers divided fairly evenly over Brazil, Africa, and Asia. Like Örebro, the Swedish Alliance Mission is also a denomination as well as a sending agency, though it apparently began in the last century just to be the latter. By the mid-1960s it had about eighty-five missionaries mostly in South Africa and Asia.

Swedish Mission Boards and Societies
Swedish Mission Boards and Societies

Swiss Mission Boards and Societies. Swiss mission boards and societies take shape according to the complex linguistic and political divisions of the country. An authority of coordination is the Swiss Council of Evangelical Missions, which includes three categories of members, while being itself a corporate member of the World Council of Churches Unit on Mission and Evangelism.

The first category is the mission board of the established Reformed churches of French-speaking Swiss cantons. It is called Département Missionnaire, with headquarters in Lausanne. Half of its budget supports the Evangelical Community for Apostolic Action in Paris. Together with other groups including evangelical, it publishes a review of missiology, Perspectives Missionnaires.

The second category is the umbrella organization of German-speaking missions, known as KEM (Kooperation Evangelischer Kirchen und Missionen). This council acts on behalf of several established churches and mission boards in sixteen Swiss cantons. Its most famous member is the Basel Mission, established in 1815 as a German-Swiss missionary society, presently in process of fundamental restructuring, aiming at sharing missionary power with its overseas partners. It publishes, together with the German Society of Missiology, a missiological quarterly, Zeitschrift für Mission. KEM includes other old missionary societies, like the Moravian Mission, the East-Asia Mission, the Evangelical Methodist Mission Board, the South-Africa Mission, the Nile Mission, and the Kwango Mission in Congo-Zaire.

The third category includes associated members without voting rights, belonging to non-denominational groups and evangelical free churches. Among them are the Salvation Army, the Foundation for Church and Judaism, the Swiss Bible Society, the Blue Cross, the YMCA/YWCA, Scripture Union, the Evangelical Braille Mission, the International Missionary Alliance, and the Evangelical Missionary Service.

The last named is in itself a significant French-speaking network, acting on behalf of forty evangelical free church assemblies. It continues the Laos Mission founded in 1902, having a particular concern for Asian diasporas in Europe while accepting new partnerships in Asia and Africa. It is a member of the Federation of Francophone Evangelical Mission.

Well-known international missionary societies are represented in Switzerland: Wycliffe Bible Translators, Society for International Missions, Sudan United Mission, OMF International, Open Doors, WEC International, TEMA (The European Missionary Association), Christian and Missionary Alliance, and Leprosy Mission International. Some coordination is provided in German-speaking Switzerland by the Working Group of Evangelical Missions, acting on behalf of 30 missions representing 900 missionaries.

Geneva is also the seat of the World Council of Churches Unit on Mission and Evangelism, which implies significant interaction with Swiss missionary societies. It publishes the well-known International Review of Mission.

Roman Catholic missionary societies (except the Jesuits, prohibited until 1973) first worked for Catholic expansion in Switzerland, before joining fields overseas. The Bethlehem Foreign Missions is the only Swiss-founded society (1921). They publish the scholarly quarterly Neue Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft/Nouvelle Revue de Science Missionnaire. It is to be noted that the Orthodox Church with its center at Chambéry, near Geneva, is increasingly mission-oriented.

Switzerland (Est. 2000 pop.: 7,494,000; 41,293 sq. km. [15,943 sq. mi.]). Switzerland is a confederation of twenty-three almost autonomous cantons, each having its unique religious and political structure. Freedom of religion is guaranteed by the federal Constitution but without strict separation between church and state. In the sixteenth century, a majority of cantons and cities voted for the Reformation. Among other Reformers, Huldrych Zwingli (1484–1531) and his successor Heinrich Bullinger (1504–75) in German-speaking cantons, John Calvin (1509–64) and his successor Théodore de Beza (1519–65) in French-speaking cantons, successfully shaped the Swiss Reformation with its distinct Presbyterian polity and its concern for intellectual development. The supreme authority of the Bible was proclaimed. A doctrinal agreement on Bible interpretation was formulated in 1566 in the Second Helvetic Confession.

A minority remained in the fold of the ancient Roman Catholic Church, with its peculiar love for cloisters and holiness. The cities of Fribourg and Lucerne have been ever since the centers of Swiss Catholicism. The Catholic University of Fribourg, created in 1889, grew rapidly as a center of excellence in theology, including missiology.
and other sciences. In the twentieth century it was committed to the renewal of Thomism (the philosophy and theology inherited from Thomas Aquinas) with Cardinal Charles Journet, a friend of Jacques Maritain. He was very vocal in his political fight against Nazi and communist totalitarian ideologies, while the Catholic hierarchy stuck to the principle of neutrality, very dear to Switzerland.

The independent spirit of Swiss Catholicism manifested itself in a spectacular way after the First Vatican Council (1870) when some Catholic bishops refused the new dogma of papal infallibility and created the Old Catholic Church (1874), which joined other non-Roman Catholic Churches mainly in Holland to form the Union of Utrecht (1889). Meanwhile the Catholic population increased through natural demographic growth and immigration from neighboring Catholic countries such as Italy, France, and Austria, later from Spain and Portugal. Geneva, once the symbol of Protestantism, now has a Roman Catholic majority.

In 1858 Protestant churches formed a national conference that became in 1920 the Swiss Federation of Evangelical Churches, including national as well as free churches (above five thousand members), with an efficient interchurch aid and relief network.

In spite of lingering traditions, every canton is now confronted with the problem of the coexistence of several Christian persuasions, from no-church movements in the wake of theosophy or akin to the Moral Rearmament, to all kinds of fundamentalism. Religious pluralism is still augmented by foreign adherents or indigenous converts belonging to world religions and new religious movements, not to mention agnostics.

Influential theological currents emerged in Swiss history, like the Enlightened Pietism of Jean Frédéric Ostervald (1663–1747), a kind of second reformation, the Free Church movement with Alexandre Vinet (1797–1847), the so-called modern theology, the religious socialism of Leonard Regaz (1868–1945), the dialectic theology of Karl Barth (1886–1968) and Emil Brunner (1889–1966).

With its multilingual population (German, French, Italian, Romansch, Spanish, Portuguese) and its neutrality, Switzerland is a privileged location for international organizations, philanthropy, and ecumenical relations. The International Red Cross was founded by Henri Dunant (1863); the World Council of Churches was established in Geneva in 1948.

Marc R. Spindler

Symbol, Symbolism. A symbol is something used to stand for something, such as an olive branch representing peace. Recent studies in human cognition have demonstrated that when we categorize objects in a taxonomy, there is one level that is more basic than the others. This “basic level” is the most abstract level at which we can form images. We can form an image of a dog or a cat, but not of the more abstract concept of an animal. The basic level is also the level at which we experience life. We interact with our pets as dogs and cats, not as animals. That we experience life at the basic level underlies our need to use the imagery of symbols to express more abstract concepts.

This need to use symbols for abstract concepts also makes us prone to idolatry. We have a propensity to visualize the object of our worship, to create images of our gods. It is quite possible, therefore, that when God responded to Moses’ request for a name to give to the idolatrous Egyptians, he gave Moses “I Am” so as to preclude them from representing him by an image (Rom. 1:23). Therefore, we need to keep in mind that the symbols we use to represent gospel truths have the potential of replacing those truths.

When people create a symbol to represent an object, the symbol usually bears a resemblance to that object. When a symbol closely resembles an object, however, it is a small step to the belief that the symbol mirrors the real world, that it exists apart from human creativity, and that it has inherent meaning.

The belief that symbols have inherent meanings that must be discovered underlies the practice of magic, divination, numerology, and astrology. It may also underlie the behavior of those who forbid others to use certain symbols because they regard those symbols as inherently evil. A recent example in the United States is the public pressure put on Procter and Gamble to drop their logo of the woman and the stars.

Many people regard symbols as having assigned meanings agreed on by a given society. The fact that the meanings are assigned by a given community not only allows a symbol to serve in communication within a society but also militates against the casual use of symbols for intercultural communication. In one case, the introduction of baptismal names to symbolize new life in Christ was reinterpreted as a ruse to elude Satan, because Satan recognized people only by their prebaptismal names, but their new, baptismal names were the secret ones written in the Lamb’s book of life (Rev. 2:17; 3:5). Therefore, we need to exercise care in using symbols to communicate gospel truths interculturally.

That the swastika arouses strong emotions points out that symbols are powerful because they are interpreted holistically as a gestalt. The sight of a swastika by a victim of the Holocaust transcends anti-Semitism to invoke the gestalt of the Holocaust with all the experiences and emotions of the perpetrators, the victims, and the complacent third parties. The viewers' emotional responses are grounded in the associations the symbol brings to their minds. Therefore, we need to keep in mind that simple symbols can represent very complex gestalts.
Symbol, Symbolism

KENNETH A. MCELHANON

Syncretism. Blending of one idea, practice, or attitude with another. Traditionally among Christians it has been used of the replacement or dilution of the essential truths of the gospel through the incorporation of non-Christian elements. Examples range from Western materialism to Asian and African animistic beliefs incorporated into the church. Syncretism of some form has been seen everywhere the church has existed. We are naive to think that eliminating the negatives of syncretism is easily accomplished.

To examine practices for syncretistic tendencies, we must first use a phenomenological approach in which we simply uncover what is actually happening or being taught. Built on that, we use theological and cultural analysis to understand what is happening. Finally, we evaluate what we have discovered in light of biblical truth. As a replacement of essential elements of the gospel with alternative religious practices or understanding, syncretism must be exposed and challenged. The means by which this is done are critical, and must be culturally informed.

Biblical Discussion. Case studies of syncretism are found throughout the Bible. Israel, forsaking the command to love God alone (Deut. 5:1–6:5), borrowed from the Canaanites ideas such as idolatry (Judg. 2:19; Ps. 106:35–39), shrine prostitution (1 Kings 14:24), and witchcraft (2 Kings 17:16–17). The attitude of syncretism is captured in 2 Kings 17:41: "Even while these people were worshipping the Lord, they were serving their idols." Old Testament exemplars who fought syncretism include the prophets as well as David, Hezekiah, Josiah, Nehemiah, and Ezra.

At the time of the New Testament, the domination of Rome intensified the possibilities of syncretism. Perhaps the most significant issue dealt with in the early church was that of the nature of Gentile inclusion in the Christian community (Acts 15; Gal. 2). The author of Hebrews wrote to Christians who were tempted to return to the Law (Heb. 5:11–6:12; 10:19–39). We also see warnings against syncretistic tendencies throughout the Epistles (e.g., 1 Cor. 10:20; 2 Cor. 11:13–15; Gal. 1:6–9; 3:1–6; Col. 2:8–23; 1 Tim. 1:3; 6:3; 2 Peter 2:1; 1 John 4:1–6).

Throughout the centuries since the New Testament era, the church has constantly wrestled over the issues of culture in relationship to Christian commitment (Visser ’t Hooft).

Modern Discussion. Many scholars today challenge the need to define syncretism in its negative traditional sense. The meaning of the term has broadened to a more neutral concept of interpenetration of two or more paradigms. In this sense, since all churches are culture-based, every church is syncretistic. Such a broad definition, however, results in a term that loses useful analytic meaning.

A second significant issue is that the person or people who define syncretism are those who are in power. Practices which are threatening may be labeled syncretistic simply because they threaten the established order. This highlights the need for hermeneutical communities comprised of people of various cultures who together examine the contemporary phenomena under question in light of the biblical worldview.

A final issue is that all churches are in some sense syncretistic. The human heart regularly manufactures idols which find homes in the churches of the people who generate them. No church in any culture is free of the accretions of culture, and none of us is as objective in seeing syncretism within our own culture as we would like to think we are.

Suggested Guidelines. While “syncretism” does not appear in the Bible, it expresses a biblical concept. The broadening of discussion on syncretism in scholarly discussion has resulted in some observing that the Bible itself is syncretistic. Such use of the term masks the biblical concept of gospel truth relevant to all cultures being normative for all Christians at all times.

Biblically speaking, syncretistic ideas and practices are wrong because they violate the first commandment. In saying this we are not ignoring the complexities raised by recent hermeneutical discussions. There are convoluted interpretive issues which the worldwide church must tackle, but we cannot do so if we turn from the normative nature of the Bible as the cornerstone for discussion of the faith.

Because of the convoluted nature of culture, the declaration of syncretism in a particular setting cannot be simply left in the hands of expatriate missionaries. The local community must be empowered to biblically evaluate their own practices and teachings. Missionaries must learn to trust that indigenous peoples are able to discern God's leading and trust God to develop and maintain biblically founded and culturally relevant Faith and Praxis in each local context. Finally, Christians of every culture must engage in genuine partnership with Christians of other cultures, since often the outsider's help is needed to enable local believers, blinded by culture and familiarity, to see that which contravenes scriptural adherence to the first commandment.

A. Scott Moreau

See also Christo-Paganism.

Syria (Est. 2000 pop.: 17,329,000; 185,180 sq. km. [71,498 sq. mi.]). Syria experienced some of the earliest missionary efforts in the first century. Antioch became a leading sending center and an important area producing many of the earlier church fathers. One only needs to think of the tremendous influence of John Chrysostom on modern commentaries to see the scope of influence of Syria. From Edessa, modern Urfa, the church moved east to Afghanistan, China, and Mongolia as well as south through Iraq to Saudi Arabia.

Much theological controversy weakened the witness of the church in Syria. In addition she was always restive under Byzantine rule. Many Christian villages as well as leaders welcomed and even plotted with the Arab Muslim armies whom they felt would liberate them. That freedom was short lived as the development of Muslim thinking led to rather stringent policies that deprived them of many basic rights. Christian communities exist all over Syria embracing the various theological positions apparent in the struggles of the early centuries of the church’s presence.

In the latter part of the nineteenth century the Presbyterians came to Damascus and established branches throughout the country. The Christian and Missionary Alliance sent a number of excellent missionaries and there remain many groups in that communion. A group of British women started a mission that for nearly a century sent out only women missionaries. This has now expanded to include men. These groups stressed schools, camps, and evangelistic outreach through literature and personal contacts. With the change of government in the latter half of the twentieth century most Westerners had to leave the country. By then some Baptist, Nazarene, and other groups had been started. A strong church exists in Damascus and good branches of several denominations are able to continue to function. It is nearly impossible for a typical Western missionary to be granted permission to work because of political factors more than religious factors. Yet during the last decade of the twentieth century many keen expatriates have had excellent opportunities for witness and ministry. Some are students, while others are teachers. With the strong impact of both radio and TV as well as Bible distribution, Theological Education by Extension and general interaction with Arab believers in adjacent countries, there is promise of real expansion and development in the immediate future.

George E. Kelsey

Systematic Theology. The foundational, organized, and comprehensive reflection by Christians on the faith of the church; systematic theology seeks to answer questions like “What do we believe?” “Why do we believe that and not something else?” “On what grounds is our belief justified?” “What is the relationship between the various concepts that we believe?” and “How do we articulate that belief so that it may have appropriate meaning in today’s contexts?” Wayne Grudem gives a concise definition: “Systematic theology is any study that answers the question, “What does the whole Bible teach us today about any given topic?” (1994, 21). Stanley Grenz emphasizes the missional aspect of systematic theology: “Theology (is) a practical discipline. It is the intellectual reflection on the faith we share as the believing community within a specific cultural context. But it has as its goal the application of our faith commitment to living as the people of God in our world” (1993, 17–18).

Systematic theologians differ in their approach to the discipline. Some see God himself as the object of study, while others understand their work as reflection on the knowledge of God’s revelation. They may differ in the sources they draw from for that knowledge: the Bible, Christ, the church, the history of dogma, or the preaching of the church.

Systematic theology builds on biblical theology and historical theology. Biblical theology has to do with the identification and understanding of the theology of the authors and books of the Bible in their cultural and historical contexts. Historical theology has to do with knowing the development of the church’s doctrines in the way they were formed during the history of the church. Systematic theology seeks to find a way to bring together the testimony of the biblical authors with the contemporary questions of Christians in their contexts. Different traditions and various systematic theologians have built their systematic theologies upon a number of different foundations: the teachings of the church, the Bible, concepts of God’s revelation, the Holy Spirit, or (especially, since Schleiermacher) humanity and its intellectual abilities. “None of these can serve as founda-
Systematic Theology

During the first three centuries after Christ, systematic theology was inherently missional. The theologians of the church were primarily involved in Apologetics, that is, the carefully reasoned presentation of the truth of the gospel to people in their contexts who were not yet Christians. By the fifth century, however, the missional character of theology began to be lost and systematic theology became increasingly an introverted activity, used to justify why the church’s doctrine was right and why options offered by other Christians were wrong. The disciples and followers of the sixteenth-century Reformers essentially followed a similar dynamic, using theology as a tool to prove why their church was right and other traditions were wrong. Thus the missional dimension of systematic theology—the presentation of the truth of the gospel to those who were not yet Christian—was lost. Lately, the missionary aspect of systematic theology is being recovered through a movement known as Contextualization.

Since the 1960s there has been a growing realization that all theology is influenced by the context in which the theologians find themselves. Thus all theologies are seen as contextual. Harvie Conn says, “The contextual character of all theology… has been misplaced, buried under the weight of the Western respect for the expert (in this case the theologian)…. The pastoral dimensions of theology are befogged by the church’s understanding of theology as a schooling science, abstract, done by experts, yielding universal principles applicable to all times and cultures. The concrete relation of theology to the life of the people of God remains obscured. Inevitably, the focus of such theology remains fixed around the traditional (themes) of anthropology, Christology, soteriology, etc. (themes) reflecting thematic arrangements for the study of theology as it has, in its past, addressed Western contexts and Western worldviews. To what part of the historical tradition… will (Christians in the Two-Thirds World) go to find answers for such problems as ancestor worship, the power structures of animism, (matters of spiritual power encounters), and the Muslim misconstructions of Jesus as the Son of God” (Conn, 1984, 299–300)?

During the past hundred years or so theologians and missiologists have struggled over where to place mission in the curriculum of traditional theological reflection. Jongeneel asks, “Does mission, dogmatically-speaking, belong to the doctrine of God the Father; of God the Son, and/or of God the Holy Spirit (in relation to the three major parts of the Apostles’ Creed)? Or is mission merely an appendix to the doctrine of vocation? Or is it an important issue in ecclesiology? Does mission ethically-speaking, belong to the so-called general part of the discipline (principles of ethics): is it good, a virtue, and/or a duty?… Or does it belong to a particular part (for instance, social ethics)” (Jongeneel, 1997, 11)? One thing is clear: systematic theology that is not missional is not true to the biblical portrayal of a loving, self-revealing, covenanting God who “so loved the world that he gave his only Son” (John 3:16). And missiology that does not reflect carefully, deeply, and systematically on the nature, mission, and purpose of God may be church extension or expansion of empire—but it is not participation by the church of Jesus Christ in God’s mission through the empowerment of the Holy Spirit.

Orlando Costas suggested a way to preserve the missional dimension of theology: build it into one’s definition. “Theology is the reflective activity of the Christian Church that tries to understand the mystery of faith, describe its implications for life, and make visible its mission in the world” (cited in Kirk, 1996, 7).

CHARLES VAN ENGEN

SEE ALSO Theological Method and Theological Systems.

Szabó, Aladá (1862–1944). Hungarian revivalist and missions promoter. Born in a countryside village, Szabó never lost his passion for inflaming the hearts of the grassroots masses of people who were of ordinary heritage. In 1880 he entered the Reformed Theological Academy at the University of Budapest. One year later he met Andrew Moody, a Scottish missionary working among the Jewish population in Hungary. Moody took Szabó under his care and fanned into flame the passion for mission which was to characterize Szabó’s ministry.

During his life, Szabó sought renewal of the Hungarian church through crossing three barriers: nationalism, confessionalism, and feudalism. Nationalism kept the church focus geographically inward, seeking nation building as inextricably tied to kingdom building; Szabó encouraged a vision for the entire world. Lutheran and Reformed confessionalism vied competitively for the hearts of the Hungarian people; Szabó worked interdenominationally. As a result of a feudalistic mentality the clerical leaders ignored the needs of the masses, who were increasingly being attracted to sects; Szabó compassionately reached out to them and mobilized them for the missionary effort.

Though never himself a missionary, he is a key figure in the history of Hungarian missionary work. Kool relates, “Szabó became the herald of the [Hungarian] 20th century foreign mission movement by ‘contextualizing’ the Scottish Puritan and German Pietistic traditions and making them part of Hungarian theological thinking” (1993, 157).

A. Scott Moreau

Taboo. The word “taboo” is of Tongan origin (tabu) and designates a person, thing, or action that is forbidden due to its sacred or supernatural character. The primary function of the category of taboo is that of protection, and this usually occurs on three levels: social, economic, and religious. Taboos possess functional purpose rather than moral value.

On the social level, chiefs and rulers, along with their property, are designated taboo to protect the monolithic social structure of the tribe or group. Economically, certain animals are designated taboo to protect them from misuse by the people (conservation). For instance, the Maori of New Zealand declared digging up sweet potatoes before they were ready to be cooked and eaten a taboo to counter greed and waste. On the other hand, certain foods (pork and shellfish) have been declared taboo to protect people from disease through improper preparation of the foods.

Religiously, taboos have often been created to accommodate fear of the unknown, such as the birth of twins in animistic settings (namely, only animals have multiple offspring). A dualistic worldview is often characteristic of a taboo-oriented belief system. Thus, taboo is not so much concerned with what is morally right or wrong but rather with what functions to keep away offense. Such worldviews are often related to ancestor or spirit worship, and the offense associated with the taboo can extend to the non-physical spirit world as well. Unquestioning loyalty with respect to the taboo is required of the tribal members, great responsibility rests with the shaman or religious leader not to lead the group into error that might result in the negative effects of the offense upon the group. “Salvation” then consists in maintaining a healthy balance (tension) between “good” and “bad” taboos.

It is essential that missionaries working in cultures in which taboos are prominent understand the nature and function of the taboos. Such understanding and sensitivity will not only prevent unnecessary offense, but it will provide valuable insights into the basic values and fears of the culture. Biblical answers to the fears underlying taboos can then be suggested.

CLINT AKINS

SEE ALSO Primal Religions.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. Ruud, Taboo.

Taiwan. See China (Taiwan).

Tajikistan (Est. 2000 pop.: 6,973,000; 143,100 sq. km. [55,251 sq. mi.]). In Central Asia, Tajikistan is the southernmost republic of the former Soviet Union and also the poorest. Unlike most other Central Asian peoples, the ethnic Tajiks, who make up 60 percent of the population, are of Iranian rather than Turkic stock. There is also a sizable Uzbek minority, making up nearly 25 percent of the population. While over 80 percent of the population is nominally Sunni Muslim, animistic practices and ancient Zoroastrian traditions dominate the people’s everyday lives. Evangelicals make up well under 0.5 percent of the population, with most being Slavic or German. However, several hundred Tajiks have come to Christ, and a number of Tajik congregations have been established, especially in and around the northern city of Khojent.

RAYMOND P. PRIGODICH

SEE ALSO Commonwealth of Independent States.

Tambaran Conference (1938). By the time the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL met at Tambaran (Madras), India, in 1938, the global spread of the Christian church had become clear for all to see, for representatives of the younger churches provided more than half the official delegates for the first time at an ecumenical conference. As they discovered one another, more than one delegate also discovered what it was to become a world Christian.

The location of the conference, which received wide publicity, had to be moved from China to India because of the outbreak of war in China. Within the conference, however, fellowship be-
Tanzania

Tanzania (Est. 2000 pop.: 34,074,000; 945,087 sq. km. (364,898 sq. mi.). The United Republic of Tanzania lies just south of the Equator on the east coast of Africa. Its central plateau, averaging over a half mile in altitude, sustains magnificent herds of African wildlife but due to aridity and insect-borne diseases, large areas are not suitable for modern agriculture. Therefore the more than 34 million people are clustered in the fertile lands in highland regions, around the great lakes of Victoria and Tanganyika, and in the cities, notable Dar Es Salaam on the Indian Ocean and Mwanza on Lake Victoria. Only 5 percent of the land is productive, tilled by 85 percent of the population.

Prior to the coming of Bantu peoples from the Congo basin, the area was inhabited by an aboriginal people referred to as Khoisans. They were hunters and gatherers, employing a unique click language. Over a thousand years ago Cushitic-speaking herders and Nilotic peoples from the north entered the region, inhabiting areas suitable for cattle grazing. About the same time the great migration of Bantu-speaking agriculturists from the Congo basin settled in lands suitable to their lifestyles. Today 90 percent of the population is Bantu, 6 percent Cushitic and Nilotic, with Khoisans a mere fraction of a percent.

Prior to the coming of Christianity over a hundred years ago the groups followed ancient folk religions in which the ancestral spirits played a pivotal role. A small minority of coastal people embraced Islam. Muslims from the Arabian region settled along the coast and in the offshore island of Zanzibar in the seventeenth century where they plied their trade in ivory, slaves, and cloves. Around these Arabic settlements grew a culture that spoke a Bantu language with many Arabic words and concepts. This is the Swahili language, which is now widespread across eastern Africa. Islam and the Kiswahili language spread along the trade routes, as far inland as the great lakes of Tanganyika and Victoria.

Tanzania was not impacted by the Portuguese or Spanish mission efforts of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, probably because Tanzania was under the sovereignty of the Arab rulers and traders. Because it was an important center of the slave trade which sold African slaves in Eastern nations, Zanzibar became the focus of modern Christian missions. British and German missionaries aided in the Abolitionist Movement. After a series of meetings of European nations (1895, 1900), Germany assumed political control over Tanzania, which it held until the conclusion of World War I. The League of Nations then requested the United Kingdom to hold Tanzania as a Protectorate, not a colony. The United Kingdom fulfilled its mandate and granted independence to Tanzania in 1961. In 1963 the former Tanganyika and Zanzibar (which between the Chinese and Japanese delegations offered a powerful witness to how the Christian faith can overcome barriers of nationalism. With many delegates experiencing the movement from mission to church, it was not unnatural that they should seek a major discussion of the nature of the church. The report of the conference was, in fact, entitled "The World Mission of the Church." But there was a context to that mission. Thus the hopeful signs in the life of the church were set over against a world that seemed to be on the edge of catastrophe. This was recognized by the conference in its identification of the rise of a militant “new paganism” demanding quasi-religious devotion from its followers. Out of pastoral concern for Christians in the Soviet Union, the Axis countries, and Japan, no specific situation was identified. The need to complete the evangelistic task and to relate it to the new world situation came together in the conference message: evangelism was the task “of the whole church for the whole world. . . . Nothing in the present world situation invalidates the gospel. . . . World peace will never be achieved without world evangelization.” It has been said that “while the Jerusalem Conference (1928) put the center of mission in the sociology of religion from Leiden. Hendrik Kraemer’s The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World, with its insistence on “biblical realism,” commissioned by the Council, had been published just prior to the conference. The Economic and Social Environment of the Younger Churches, edited by J. Merle Davis, influenced other aspects of the conference.

A clear christocentric focus enabled the conference to tackle difficult issues of colonialism and nationalism, the relations between Western mission agencies and the emerging Asian churches, and the attitude of the churches to Asian syncretism. The need for some formalization of the link between the IMC and the about-to-be-formed World Council of Churches was already becoming obvious.

John A. Y. Briggs

See also World Council of Churches Conferences.

Tanzania

also gained independence) joined, thus the name Tanzania.

While under German control, Tanzania received missionaries from the German Lutheran Church, the Anglican Church, a variety of Roman Catholic orders, and Scandinavian and American evangelical missions. These mission agencies utilized medical services, education, and development efforts to spread Christianity. Almost all of the 120 plus ethnolinguistic peoples in Tanzania received some services from the mission agencies and in many groups the church flourished. Today only a few pockets, mainly aboriginal peoples, are considered "unreached." The Bible had been translated in 18 of the 131 languages but vast sections of the population can speak and read Kiswahili. Almost all of the citizens of the land use both their tribal language and Kiswahili. Tanzania is now about 50 percent Christian, 30 percent Muslim, and 20 percent followers of African TRADITIONAL RELIGIONS. Tanzania has begun to send out missionaries of their own. Christian youth movements thrive and the evangelical unity is commendable. The church confronts poverty, disease, and lack of essential services.

Tanzania, one of the poorest nations in Africa, embraced a modified form of socialism, Ujamaa, from 1969 to 1992, which served to further impoverish the nation. The nation has experienced steady but painful economic growth since 1992, utilizing open-market policies to stimulate investments and local development. The nation is seeking to exploit, once again, its vast resources of gold and diamonds while increasing food production.

DONALD R. JACOBS

Taoist, Taoism. Taoism, along with Confucianism and Buddhism, is one of the three major philosophical and religious systems in China. Although his historicity has been questioned, Lao-tze, a sixth-century B.C. contemporary of Confucius, is regarded as the founder of Taoism. Lao-tze had no interest in Confucian teachings on social conventions and ethical principles, advocating instead a return to the primitive simplicity of nature.

The Tao-te-ching, the key text of Taoism and traditionally said to be authored by Lao-tze, presents the Tao as the ultimate principle and source of all things. The Tao is utterly transcendent and defies all linguistic description, for "the Tao that can be described is not the eternal Tao" (Tao-te-ching, ch. 1). It is formless and impersonal, yet eternal and present everywhere. Immaterial, it is nevertheless the fountainhead of all material things. "The Tao engenders the one, the one engenders the two, the two engenders the three, the three engenders the myriad things" (ch. 42). All things flow from the Tao and return ultimately to the Tao. The Tao is both one and many, transcendent and immanent, being and nonbeing, action and nonaction, strong and weak. All opposites and contrasts are harmonized in the Tao.

Epistemologically, philosophical Taoism stresses inner intuitive enlightenment more than discursive reasoning. Thus a person with deep understanding can fathom the entire universe without leaving home. When one is in tune with the Tao, one sees that becoming and change happen only within the phenomenal world. Ultimately all differentiation between the universe and the individual disappears as the two are essentially one. This leads to the search for a mystical union with nature characteristic of religious Taoism.

Taoism emphasizes a return to a state of primitive simplicity and spontaneity, an original state of innocence. It assumes a latent goodness inherent in human nature [te]. What is, is good. Chuang-tse, a fourth-century B.C. Taoist, advocated following the heart's natural inclination since it reflects an originally good nature. The heart is to be one's teacher. Since one is born with a good nature, there is no need to strive to be good—the moment one consciously strives to be good, one deviates from the Tao. "It is only when one has lost the Tao that he would settle for virtue, it is only when one has lost virtue that he would settle for humanity [jen], it is only when one has lost humanity that he would settle for righteousness [yi], it is only when he has lost righteousness that he would settle for propriety [li]" (ch. 58). Rejecting common social principles and conventions, Lao-tze advocated nonstriving, contentment, meekness, modesty, and simplicity as ethical ideals.

Taoism called for an extreme laissez-faire approach to government, stressing noninterference. The analogy with water was used. Although water is gentle and passive, it is the strongest and most resilient force in nature, opening passages in the hardest rock and accomplishing difficult tasks without brute force. Similarly, the best government is that which rules through noninterference, just "letting it be." For it is by following natural inclinations that original goodness is achieved.

Although philosophical Taoism had influenced Chinese culture for centuries, it was not until the second century that religious Taoism became an institutional religion. A blend of Taoist philosophy, ying-yang, and folk religion, religious Taoism emphasizes mysticism, personal freedom, and the yearning for immortality. Adherents seek freedom from all restraints—whether physical, social, or mental—culminating in an immortality that transcends life and death. Chang Tao-ling (2nd cent.), credited as the founder of religious Taoism, claimed for himself the title “Heavenly Master.” He held that there is a supreme god ruling over the pantheon of deities, a heavenly system somewhat similar to the earthly governmental bureaucracy.

The immediate objective of Taoist religion is to obtain health, longevity, and well-being in this life, whereas the ultimate goal is to become one with nature, living as the immortals. The immortals are said to be beings who have obtained total freedom from all restraints of the physical world. Free from even the law of gravity, they float in the air like feathers, wandering among scenic mountains and streams without a care in the world.

The basic means for attaining immortality is through internal and external alchemy along with other occult practices. Internal alchemy regulates the vital forces [ch'i] through yoga and breathing exercises so that harmony is achieved between the individual and the universe. External alchemy involves taking elixirs such as pure cinnabar. On a popular level, religious Taoism involves elaborate ceremonial rituals, exorcism, seances, feng-shuei (lit. wind and water, and attempt to harmonize with nature), fortune telling, astrology, and belief in deities who can bring good fortune or inflict harm, depending on their treatment.

As an institutional religion Taoism has today lost much of its status due to corruption within the priesthood as well as the impact of modernization. But one should not conclude that it is no longer significant in Chinese culture. Its influence has permeated many aspects of daily life, and in recent years there appears to be a resurgence of religious Taoism, especially among the educated classes in Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Southeast Asia.

JOHN D. L. HSU

Taylor, (James) Hudson (1832–1905). English missionary to China and founder of the China Inland Mission (now Overseas Missionary Fellowship). Born in Barnsley, England, where his pharmacist father was a Methodist local preacher, he was converted at age seventeen and set his heart on going to China. He even interrupted medical studies at the London Hospital to go there in 1854 under the short-lived China Evangelization Society, but soon committed himself to an independent ministry. Failing health forced him to return to England in 1860. There he worked on Bible translation, completed medical studies, and in 1865 published China: Its Spiritual Needs and Claims. Having found no society willing to sponsor him, he established the China Inland Mission, its candidates selected less for educational than for spiritual qualifications. In 1866 sixteen of them sailed with Taylor for itinerant work in a land where “a million a month [were] dying without God.”

Taylor’s fervor was matched by pioneering audacity. He adopted Chinese dress and customs, paired foreign missionaries with national Christians, directly solicited no funds (“Jehovah-jireh” was a favorite word), and saw the establishment of churches as less important than the task of presenting the gospel to as many as possible before the Lord’s return. No distant board controlled the Mission; decisions were taken on the field. By 1891 Taylor led some 640 workers, but his influence and his principles extended far beyond CIM. He mobilized and motivated people for worldwide mission.

He lost two wives and four children to disease and famine. Soon after seeing seventy-nine colleagues and children slain in the 1900 Boxer Rebellion, ill health led to his retirement. In 1905 he undertook a last visit to his beloved China, and died there at Changsha.

J. D. DOUGLAS

Taylor, John Vernon (1914– ). English author, missionary statesman, and missionary to Uganda. After taking a degree in English at the University of Cambridge, Taylor studied theology and was ordained an Anglican priest; his subsequent career has been spent entirely in the service of the Anglican Church. He taught at Bishop Tucker Theological College in Uganda for ten years, then took on the role of general secretary of the evangelical Church Missionary Society (1963–75), and finished his formal career as bishop of Winchester (1975–85) in Britain. He has published prolifically, from the 1950s to the 1990s, often on missions topics; The Growth of the Church in Buganda (1958), Christians of the Copperbelt: the Growth of the Church in Northern Rhodesia (1961), The Primal Vision: Christian Presence Amid African Religions (1963), and his widely read The Go-Between God (1972) are among these books. Taylor is most significant perhaps, to the development of Protestant missionary thought, as an evangelical spokesman for genuine openness to God’s ongoing work in human society. Thus in a period of rapid global change and conservative reaction he has advocated the search for divine truths in other religions and the benefits of Pentecostalism; he has also argued for the formation of countercultural Christian communities of witness, the creation of a just world economy, and a broader interpretation of mission and missionaries—all without sacrificing the uniqueness of the Christian gospel or the distinctness of the missionary enterprise. “True theology,” he wrote in 1994, “must inevitably be incarnational.”
Taylor, John Vernon

Paul H. Friesen

Taylor, Kenneth Nathaniel (1917– ). American Bible translator and publisher. Born in Portland, Oregon, he received his education at Wheaton College, Illinois (BS, 1938), Dallas Theological Seminary (1943), and Northern Baptist Theological Seminary (ThM, 1944). Although ordained by the Central Bible Church, Portland, in 1944 for pastoral work, Taylor's lifelong interest in communicating the gospel in print was with him from the beginning. He served as editor of His Magazine, worked with Good News Publishers, directed Moody Bible Institute's Literature Mission, as well as the Moody Press, until founding his own publishing company, Tyndale House Publishers, in 1963.

Taylor is best remembered for his paraphrase of the Bible, begun in 1962 as Living Letters and completed in 1971 as the Living Bible. This was later totally revised as the New Living Translation (1996), by a team of ninety evangelical scholars under Taylor's direction. Taylor has also written numerous popular and children's books.

Taylor's interest in missions was also lifelong, and he was instrumental in founding Evangelical Literature Overseas (1953) and Short Terms Abroad (1965). His current involvement is by way of the Tyndale House Foundation and Living Bibles International, an organization whose purpose is to create Living Bibles in the major languages of the world for more effective communication of the gospel. Taylor's personal involvement has him connected in one capacity or another with Euroevangelism of Canada; Daystar, Nairobi; Hellenic Missionary Union, Athens, Greece; Middle East Media, North America; Fellowship of Christian Unions, Kampala, Uganda; and the Ethiopian Evangelical Christian Association.

Walter A. Elwell

Taylor, William (1821–1902). American author and missionary in Africa and Latin America. Taylor served as the second Methodist Episcopal missionary in California (1849–56) before embarking on a global career, during which crucial roles were played in the development of Methodism in Australia, India, England, the Caribbean, Latin America, and Africa. On the basis of his experience in South Africa, he developed (1866) the theory of “Pauline Missions.” The central themes of the theory were that the results of mission were equal with all of the sending churches and that they should be self-supporting, self-governing, and self-propagating (see Indigenous Churches). The most complete statement of this theory was Pauline Methods of Missionary Work (Philadelphia, 1879).

After being forced by the Methodist Episcopal Missionary Society to cease functioning as a missionary, he went to Chile, where he established the Methodist Episcopal Church. Seeing the need for more “Self-Supporting” missionaries, he established a sending agency, the “Building and Transit Fund,” to help Wesleyan/Holiness missionaries get to the mission field. Despite the antagonism of the Missionary Society, he was elected “Missionary Bishop” in 1884 and sent to Africa, where he established churches in Liberia, Congo, Angola, and Mozambique. Taylor became a model and inspiration for much of Wesleyan/Holiness missions. Many of the “Taylor” missionaries became Pentecostal after 1906, and he served as a theologian for early Pentecostal missions, especially in Europe.

David Bundy

See also Wesleyan/Holiness Missions.

Teaching English to Speakers of Other Languages (TESOL). The worldwide demand for English language instruction has made the teaching of English as a foreign or second language a significant strategy in contemporary missions. This demand is due to a number of factors, including the influence of English-based media and technological information, the widespread use of English for conducting international trade, and the desire for higher education in English-speaking countries. Since, in one estimate, 80 percent of the world's scientific and technical information is published in English, the language has become important in many countries as a means to modernization and participation in the global community.

Mission organizations have responded to the demand for English instruction in a variety of ways. English language teaching has allowed Christian workers (often referred to as tentmaking missionaries) to gain access to areas of the world where it is difficult for missionaries to obtain visas. In countries with fewer restrictions,
English language specialists often work in tandem with missionaries and national Christians to conduct evangelism and establish churches. In addition, the increase in non-Western missionaries has created a demand within the missions community for English language instructors to work in contexts such as theological institutions and missionary training centers.

In general, teaching English as a foreign language (TEFL) refers to instruction in countries where English is not the native language, while teaching English as a second language (TESL) refers to instruction in English-speaking countries. A common umbrella acronym is TESOL, "teaching English to speakers of other languages."

History. The association of TEFL with missionary work in the early missionary conventions. The greatest concerns were that English language instruction would tend to associate Christianity with Anglo-Saxon culture, and that graduates of mission schools would become culturally separated from their own peoples.

During the second half of the twentieth century TEFL became associated with the tentmaking model of missions described by J. Christy Wilson Jr., who was himself initially an English instructor in Afghanistan in the early 1950s. A global survey in 1957 located 257 missionaries teaching English in 24 countries, with the largest number working in Japan. During the subsequent three decades, political change in China, Southeast Asia, the former Soviet Union, and central Europe created the opportunity for thousands of Christian EFL teachers to work in countries which were, to varying degrees, closed to traditional missionary work. In the 1980s several Christian agencies responded to this demand by specializing in training and sending short-term English teachers, while a number of established mission boards and agencies added TEFL to their global strategy. A 1996 survey of 250 mission organizations found that 65 had EFL-teaching openings or anticipated openings in the near future.

Concurrent with the rise in demand for TEFL in Europe, Asia, and Latin America was an increase in immigration to North America in the decades following the 1960s. Government funding of English instruction for immigrants led to the establishment of ESL classes in public schools, college, and adult education programs. This in turn stimulated the development of TEFL/TESL as a specialized field, with its own professional organization (TESOL, Inc., initiated in 1966), a growing body of research, scholarly and pedagogical journals, and professional preparation programs at the master's and doctoral levels.

Mission Strategy. As a strategy for evangelical mission, TEFL takes a variety of forms which are often related to the needs and limitations of a particular context. In countries which prohibit missionaries, such as communist and Islamic nations, English language teaching allows Christian workers to gain entry. These workers may include professional teachers who are unconnected with any Christian organization as well as missionaries who teach English primarily to maintain their visa status. In restricted locations, EFL teachers frequently work within secular schools and institutions. In some countries, most notably China in the 1980s and 1990s, the demand for English instruction is strong enough to make it possible to send large numbers of teachers for short term (ranging from one month to two years), with a limited amount of preservice training.

Less restricted contexts allow a broader range of options for the use of TEFL as a mission strategy. In nations such as Japan and Thailand, the ranks of English instructors include professional Christian teachers in secular institutions as well as career missionaries who use TEFL as a means of making evangelistic contacts. The latter approach often involves strategies such as short-term English camps, private tutoring, and informal classes using a Bible-based approach.

Another major use of TEFL occurs within evangelical contexts such as theological institutes, schools for missionary children, and missionary training centers. English has become the lingua franca of an increasingly diverse missionary population. In parts of the world which have a limited number of theological texts in the local languages, EFL instruction may be provided to allow seminary students and pastors to read the broad range of works published in English.

The rise of TEFL as a mission strategy has been paralleled by an increase in the availability of professional training programs and curricular materials. Some mission agencies have responded to the demand for English instruction by providing in-house training programs, while others send prospective teachers to one of the dozens of teacher education programs available at secular and Christian colleges and universities. Major publishing houses such as Cambridge University Press offer a variety of EFL textbooks ranging from basic “life skills” English for refugees and immigrants to English for professionals in the fields of medicine and engineering.
Teaching English to Speakers of Other Languages

The association of English with Western culture continues to be a concern for missionaries and mission agencies. However, the character of English instruction and the nature of the English language itself have both changed since the 1910 Edinburgh conference. In the postcolonial era, English instruction is provided in response to demand rather than imposed by a foreign power. By providing this instruction, the missionary teacher often fills a role which is perceived by nationals as acceptable for a foreign worker. In addition, the rise of indigenous dialects of English—in India, Nigeria, and many other countries—has broadened the language beyond its Anglo-Saxon base. English is one of the few major languages with more second-language speakers than native speakers.

With the passage of time, increasingly varied forms of English will evolve—a process accelerated, perhaps, through the use of computer technology. As it adapts to international demand by taking increasingly varied and specialized forms, TEFL is likely to remain a significant avenue for missionary outreach.

ALAN A. SEAMAN

TEAM. See THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE MISSION.

Teams in Mission. A ministry strategy and organizational structure that uses a small-group format and emphasizes interdependent relationships in order to accomplish a given task. Applied to the missionary context, the term has been used to describe a wide variety of structures and strategies, including short-term teams, evangelistic teams, church-planting teams, strategic-ministry teams, and structures in wider interagency partnerships.

The concept of team mission has found increasing popularity in recent years. Parallel to current management trends that emphasize employee empowerment and group decision-making, it also reflects a deeper understanding of community within the body of Christ by stressing interdependent relationships, mutual care and nurture, and the balance of spiritual gifting.

Team structures are therefore seen as providing a more biblically correct model of the nature of the church. When team members develop and use their own SPIRITUAL GIFTS and natural abilities and, in their areas of weakness, depend on the gifts and abilities of others, the newly planted church gains valuable insight into the interdependence necessary if it is to survive and prosper. Team structures are also an advantage in the process of CONTEXTUALIZATION, for theology is seen as belonging to the church collectively, and not to individuals or professionals. New contextual theologies grow out of the mutual efforts of many Christians to understand and apply the gospel to the specific context.

The emphasis on team structures is not entirely new. It has been suggested that Paul’s missionary journeys involved a team structure that was both fluid and mobile. Several individuals are mentioned in Acts as ministering alongside of Paul and Barnabas (or Paul and Silas).

Team structures in mission have the advantages of providing companionship, continuity, and balance as well as strength and a greater objectivity in decision making. Weaknesses include increased potential for disagreement and disharmony, concentration of power, stifling of individuality and initiative, inflexibility, and the fostering of dependency. In some PIONEER MISSION WORK, concentrated team structures may be impractical. In such settings a sense of community and teamwork can usually be achieved on a wider scale rather than through immediate physical proximity. Healthy missionary teams strive to balance these advantages and disadvantages.

Teams should be formed before departure to the field. It is also recommended that teams include experienced as well as inexperienced missionaries, and that they have a realistic view in regard to continuity. Not all of the initial members will remain with the team, and new members should be added, especially where the goal is to create a structure that will readily include national members and eventually become the local ministry team.

Lastly, it should be pointed out that a true sense of team does not come with an organizational structure, but with dynamic interaction and the development of relationships over time and, most notably, through crisis and conflict resolution. People working in the same place may be a group, but it takes commitment and mutuality in the face of the task at hand to weave the fabric of a team.

PAUL F. HARTFORD

Technology. Missionaries and mission agencies use technologies both for internal functioning and to accomplish their primary external mission.

Communicational Technologies. The range and decreasing cost of communications technologies are placing virtually every missionary worldwide within an almost instantaneous interactive situation. Cellular and satellite phones in urban and rural areas have opened telecommunications to local missionaries who in the past had no access to phone communications. E-mail provides a wide range of communicational opportunities. Through internet links one can not only have text-based communications, but graphics and audio as well. It is anticipated that interactive audio and video connections will soon not only be possible (as they now are), but will also be very practical and economical.

With the commitment of missions like Mission Aviation Fellowship (MAF) to link what they describe as the “telephone disadvantaged world” with the rest of the world through radio-based E-mail, the possibility of easily accessible two-way communication through E-mail is now being realized. By 1996 MAF had established approximately fifty “hubs” worldwide through which people could have access to internet-based E-mail. While often these connections are based on a relay system, the delay is hours rather than days or weeks. Some of these connections are phone-based and others are high-frequency radio-based.

With the rise in accessibility to the missionaries some questions have arisen related to the new forms of communication. Whereas in the past missionaries have often been distant in terms of time and geography, with E-mail they are just a click of a mouse button away. Some churches and individuals have sought to communicate more often with the missionaries and expect more and “better” reporting from them with less delay. With the current “faddishness” of E-mail some missionaries find themselves swamped with E-mail requests awaiting immediate response. The senders of E-mail and faxes, knowing that their messages arrive virtually as they send them, often expect answers back in the same way and in the same day.

Mission administrators then raise several crucial questions: Do the benefits justify the investment in the equipment and training costs? Are the technologies contextually appropriate? Will the use of the new technologies facilitate the reaching of the mission field or not? Many technologies are available and affordable, but irrelevant or distracting.

Access to information about new technologies is often available through shared databases available publicly in either electronic bulletin boards or internet connections or privately through a fee structure. Through the worldwide web one can access any of several search “engines” to identify information sources. If one does not have access to these databases, most research libraries have facilities to search a wide range of databases that touch on virtually any topic that has been put either in print or in an electronic medium.

New and useful technologies are becoming available in every arena of mission activity whether evangelism and church planting, leadership development, or relief and development. One could cite the software that Wycliffe Bible Translators is developing in morpheme parsing as a significant technological step forward in linguistic analysis. It facilitates a more rapid and accurate translation process as well as helping with literacy development. Or, one could mention some newly discovered “technologies” in the area of church growth that facilitate the wholistic growth of the church. One could show the new technologies being used in mission aviation to make flying safer. The application of new electronic technologies to education and the equipping of leaders generates much excitement and anticipation across the mission community. It will be helpful to briefly address some of the concerns about technologies in the arena of education for leadership development (see also Educational Mission Work).

Educational Technologies. Whether one lectures using a chalkboard or satellite-based teleconferencing, the primary purpose of using different technologies in leadership education is to enhance learning. The use of different technologies extends the potential range of learning experiences, and provides the opportunities for more appropriate response and the contextualization of the learning. The use of technology may increase the potential access to the learning by reducing the constraints of time, cost, and venue.

The appropriate selection of the technologies requires sensitivity to and knowledge about the local situation, learners, the people the learners will be working with, and the agency using the technologies. The following issues must be taken into account: purpose of learning; objectives for content; control (who makes/participates in the decision making?); characteristics of the learner (e.g., learning style, competence in subject area, familiarity with the technology, relevant experience, motivation, relevant skill level, spiritual maturity); overall educational delivery system, including the balance of formal, nonformal, and informal modes, and the administrative support system; costs to learner, agency, and community; available resources to the learner and for production, delivery, and support; instructors’ com-
Technology

Competence, commitment both in the subject area and with the technology; skill objectives; and spiritual formation objectives.

In addition to an in-depth understanding of the community to be served, the students, the teachers, the agency providing the technology, and the technology’s local application should also be understood before a significant commitment is made. Any change in the technological sphere of an educational enterprise can be expected to bring unpredictable changes in every part of the community. A change in technology may be expected to bring changes in the worldview of the community, including its assumptions, values, forms, and expected ways of behavior. A technological change will result in a change in culture. The more technological change is introduced, the more cultural change can be expected. The more quickly it is introduced, the more one can expect cultural dissonance around the technology.

When selecting an educational technology the following values should be considered: the use of multiple sensory channels; the immediate use of the proposed learning in which analogous or equivalent immediate feedback is provided; active rather than passive participation by the learner; an employment of variety, suspense, and humor; opportunity for the learner to use his or her own experience to discover what is to be learned; building on prerequisites without repeating them and transferability of the learning.

Given the expectation of culture change when any new technology is introduced, the wise planner will ask about the kinds of culture change that will need to be addressed in advance. What assumptions need to be challenged? What values need to change? What behaviors will be affected? These kinds of questions of each of the involved constituencies should be addressed (e.g., learners, communities to be served, educational/training agency). It should not be assumed that instructors who are familiar with one set of technologies will automatically be skilled in the use of another. Similarly, the support of one set of technologies may require a change in one’s “philosophy of education.” For example, one may have to move from a teacher-directed, content-focused kind of education to a more student-directed, interactive, function-focused kind of education.

In anticipation of the required or expected cultural changes a wise planner will begin initiating the steps to facilitate these changes in the community. As new technologies are becoming available some educators are suggesting changes in interdisciplinary organization. Missiology often requires multidisciplinary research. Planners should then organize the information along less strict disciplinary lines or more multidisciplinary lines.

Educators also suggest that we implement design learning flexibility with both administrative and delivery structures more contextually designed. In some cases they would be more individually structured and in other cases more community/cooperatively structured. Different technologies lend themselves to this kind of flexibility. Some technologies serve individuals better whereas others serve groups well. For example, audiotapes tend to serve the individual better, whereas videorecordings may be used as well with groups. Retraining faculty and students about the new technologies provides skills and reduces fear.

Additionally, timing issues need to be designed more flexibly. Such issues include duration, beginning and ending points, and when a person can begin in terms of personal experience/pre-requisites and allowance of self-pacing. Further, constraints related to venue, student selection, and class size may be treated more flexibly with the use of new technologies.

The use of computer-mediated courses has generated much interest in training circles. Computer-mediated courses are now available in missiology from the United States and one would expect in some other countries very soon. As areas develop access to the internet, these courses will become available. Other missiological information is becoming increasingly available on CD-ROM.

Missionaries and mission agencies should and will continue to explore and use an increasingly broad variety of technologies. However, the selection of the technologies to be used should be based on considered criteria, especially that of cultural sensitivity and availability, rather than just contemporary faddishness.

Edgar J.Elliston

Tekla-Haymanot (c. 1215–c. 1313). Ethiopian evangelist and monastic innovator. Tekla-Haymanot is a legendary figure in evangelical renewal of the Ethiopian church. He was born into a Christian family and came to know Christ at an early age. After joining a monastery and studying for ten years, he moved to Tegré as part of an attempted pilgrimage to Jerusalem. The attempt never came to fruition, but Haymanot remained in Tegré another twelve years before returning to his home area, which was predominately non-Christian at the time. He began to preach the gospel, and disciples gathered around him. He founded a small community, which became a significant learning center and from which most of the monastic communities in Ethiopia derive their origin. Unconfirmed stories abound concerning Haymanot’s exploits, including reports of many miracles that greatly assisted his evangelistic efforts.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. A. Budge, The Life and Miracles of Tekla Haymanot; T. Tamrat, Church and State in Ethiopia 1270–1527.

Television Evangelism. Today, television watching is the primary way in which people in many countries spend their free time; the average household watches several hours of television daily. Unlike radio, which can be listened to while driving, washing dishes, or looking at each other, television requires everyone to face in the same direction and pay full attention.

From the beginning, the United States opted for commercially based television, and noncommercial public broadcasting has had difficult times. In Europe, led by such agencies as the BBC in Britain, television has been financed by a license fee paid by all owners of television sets; but with the advent of satellite-based broadcasting the commercial model is advancing rapidly all over the world.

For the Christian evangelist, television has a number of strengths. It is a medium that reaches a large group of people at the same time. It can utilize numerous types of presentation: lecture, dialogue, drama, dance, music. On the other hand, television is very expensive and, given the size of the audience, tends to cater to the lowest common denominators. Furthermore, it usually operates in an entertainment environment. Such problems may seem insurmountable for Christian churches, but the medium is too powerful to be left exclusively in the hands of those who have no Christian interest and concerns. We should note that Christian use of television in the United States is already a billion-dollar enterprise.

The church will have to learn that television writes its own rules. Television communicates in the living rooms of the audience, and here the Christian communicator will be judged on equal terms with other television producers as to skills and mastery of the medium. The screen has to be filled with scenery, people, motion, and visual effects, and not just a talking head.

The electronic church is basically an American phenomenon. We have seen the rise of the televangelists, the superstars of American religious television. They have been the topic of many books and articles, ranging from horror stories to unreserved praise. The misbehavior of a few has had significant influence on the perceived credibility of all television preachers.

Ben Armstrong, former chairman of the National Religious Broadcasters, has come out strongly in favor of the electronic church as a revolutionary new form of the worshipping, witnessing church. Malcolm Muggeridge, on the other hand, claimed that Jesus would decline the offer, treating it as the fourth temptation. He was concerned about the fact that television centers on violence, sex, and deceit. There are times, Muggeridge conceded, when television can communicate true life, as was the case of the television program he made with MOTHER TERESA of Calcutta. True life and testimony seem to be well suited for television.

Other parts of the world have seen the development of low-cost city stations serving a limited community. There are also major developments in the area of satellite television. SAT-7 is a new initiative broadcasting into the Arab world, and a new Thai operation is giving space to a Christian channel that will cover most of East Asia.

Among the potential program formats, we should mention the big worship service—a church service actually produced for television. A good example would be the Hour of Power, the Sunday morning service of the Crystal Cathedral in California with Robert Schuller. This program has been on the air since 1970. Other formats include talk shows, such as the 700 Club with Pat Robertson. Still others have experimented with short programs or spots. There are many children’s shows. A real potential would be to develop new forms of teaching the Bible, for biblical illiteracy is becoming a serious issue in both church and society.

The challenge is to integrate television with other forms of evangelism, in particular with the outreach of the local church. To do that, the issue of financial support will need to be solved. There is also a need to find ways to minimize the negative impact of television on family life. Initiatives in this direction have been made by the Lutherans in Japan.

VIVGO SOGAARD

SEE ALSO Media.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Armstrong, The Electric Church; W. F. Fore, Television and Religion: The Shaping of Faith, Values, and Culture; M. Muggeridge, Christ and the Media; V. B. Sogard, Media in Church and Mission: Communicating the Gospel.

ten Boom, Corrie (1892–1983). Dutch missions advocate. The daughter of a watchmaker in Haarlem, Corrie ten Boom lived the first four decades of her life in her father’s home. When Germany invaded Holland during World War II, she joined in the resistance movement by providing a hiding place for Jews. Corrie and her family were betrayed to the Gestapo by fellow countrymen in 1944. Her father Casper and sister Betsie died in prison, but Corrie was released from Ravensbruck concentration camp after eleven months. Almost immediately she began sharing with her fellow countrymen the lessons of hope and forgiveness that she had learned in Ravensbruck.

When the war ended, Corrie began sharing her message around the world, presenting the gospel at every opportunity. She gave special attention to Germany, opening a home of healing for those who had been traumatized in the concentration camps. She traveled extensively throughout Europe, made trips to Vietnam during the Vietnamese War, delighted in smuggling the gospel into Soviet Russia with Brother Andrew, and visited prisons where she was warmly welcomed. Her special love for Jews took her often to Israel. She also wrote several books, made several films, and worked with the Billy Graham Association. In August of 1978, Corrie suffered a stroke that kept her housebound until she died in 1983.

Grace L. Klein

Bibliography. C. Carlson, Corrie ten Boom: Her Life and Her Faith; C. ten Boom, The Hiding Place.

10/40 Window. The term “10/40 Window” has been used to describe a rectangular-shaped window 10 degrees by 40 degrees north of the equator spanning the globe from West Africa to Asia, including over 60 countries and more than 2 billion people. The majority of the unreached peoples of the world—those who have never heard the gospel and who are not within reach of churches of their own people—live within this window (see Peoples, People Groups).

At the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization (1974), Ralph Winter rocked the evangelical world with the challenge of unreached peoples. At the Lausanne Congress II in Manila (1989), Luis Bush gave the ethnic orientation of unreached peoples a new geographical focus. There, during a plenary session of the congress, he presented the strategic concept of the 10/40 Window for the first time.

There are three major reasons for the dire spiritual state of the 10/40 Window. First of all, the 10/40 Window is the home of the world’s major non-Christian religions: Islam, Hinduism, and Buddhism. Over 1 billion Hindus and almost 240 million Buddhists live in this region.

Second, the poorest of the poor live in the 10/40 Window. The remarkable overlap between the fifty poorest countries of the world and the least evangelized countries of the world is no coincidence. After observing that the majority of the unreached people live in the poorest countries of the world, Bryant Myers concludes, “the poor are lost and the lost are poor.”

Third, there has been a lack of missionaries serving among the peoples of the 10/40 Window. Only about 8 percent of the missionary force presently focuses on this needy and neglected area. Historically, the three religious blocs of this region (Muslim, Hindu, and Buddhist) have been considered resistant. But lack of fruit among these people may not be due to resistance so much as neglect. Generally, the church has made little effort to reach these peoples. The Bible is clear that little sowing leads to little reaping.

For these three reasons, the 10/40 Window represents what some missiologists describe as Satan’s stronghold. From a careful analysis of the 10/40 Window, it appears that Satan and his forces have established a unique territorial stronghold that has restrained the advance of the gospel into this area of the world. In this region of the world, Paul’s description of Satan as “the god of this age who has blinded the minds of unbelievers” (2 Cor. 4:4) can be clearly seen. Clearly the forces of darkness stand behind the overwhelming poverty and spiritual bondage of this region.

Therefore, the 10/40 Window serves as an important and strategic tool for the completion of the Great Commission. It helps the church visualize its greatest challenge and focuses the church on its final frontier. The 10/40 Window calls for a reevaluation of the church’s priorities, a refocusing of its energies, and a redeployment of its missionaries. Luis Bush, the international director of the AD 2000 and Beyond Movement, sums it up well: “If we are to be faithful to Scripture, obedient to the mandate of Christ, and if we want to see the establishment of a mission-minded church planting movement within every unreached people and city . . . so that all peoples might have a valid opportunity to experience the love, truth and saving power of Jesus Christ, we must get down to the core of the unreached—the 10/40 Window.”

Richard D. Love

Teng, Philip (1922– ). Chinese churchman and mission advocate. Born in Shandong province, China, the son of a Presbyterian minister, Teng was converted in 1939 and dedicated his life to full-time ministry in 1940. He graduated from National Northwest University in 1946, having majored in foreign languages. He attended New College, Edinburgh, Scotland (1947–50), and received the bachelor of divinity there. He arrived in Hong Kong in December 1950 and taught at Bethel Bible Seminary and the Evangelical Free Bible Institute. In 1956 he began teaching at The Alliance Bible Seminary, and in 1957 he accepted the call to pastor the North Point Alliance Church, which experienced tremendous growth and planted seven churches by 1979. He edited the Chinese edition of Decision magazine (1973–77), and became the founding honorary president of China Graduate School of Theology in 1975. In 1976 he became the first chairman of the Board for the Chinese Coordination Center of World Evangelism, and worldwide network of Chinese churches promoting unity and missions. He has promoted missionary endeavors since 1961, and became a missionary in East Kalimantan (southern Indonesia) in 1978. His writings emphasize the centrality of a vital personal relationship with Jesus Christ and the challenge of evangelism and missions in the contemporary context. Since retiring he continues to speak, teach, and write for a broad audience worldwide.

Samuel Ling

Tent-Making Mission. The apostle Paul witnessed while he earned a living by making tents in the city of Corinth (Acts 18:3). This is how tent-making got its name. Tent-making mission has gained prominence in recent years, but tent-makers are not new. They are as old as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. While being semi-nomadic cattle-ranchers, they became witnesses to the living God, Yahweh, before the Canaanites. In the early church, persecution scattered believers from Jerusalem to Antioch and beyond. Those scattered went about bearing testimony as they worked their trades. The modern missionary movement sent out people as medical missionaries, social work missionaries, educational missionaries, and agricultural missionaries. They pursued their missionary calling while utilizing their professional skills.

Why has tent-making gathered considerable attention among the missionary strategists during the past decade? The reason is simple: missionaries as missionaries have not been permitted to go where the majority of non-Christian people are. During the past decades, missionaries have gradually been ousted from the countries of their service as communism, totalitarianism, and Islamic regimentation began to spread. Despite the collapse of Eastern European countries, the Berlin Wall, and the Soviet Union, the number of non-Christians in “closed” countries has been on the rise due to the resurgence of traditional religions and ideologies. The movement for reaching the unreached has added value to the acceptance of tent-making as a mission strategy.

Who, then, are these tent-makers? They may be defined as cross-cultural workers with a secular identity called to make disciples within “closed” countries. This understanding is more exclusive than other definitions. They are “cross-cultural workers,” not mono-cultural workers. Christian witnessing to people of the same cultural background is the duty of all believers, and not to be categorized as something extraordinary. “With secular identity” refers to one’s witnessing through one’s occupation. “Called to make disciples” refers to one’s sense of calling as a tent-maker with the intentionality to make disciples. Finally, tent-makers as defined here serve “within closed countries” (see Creative Access Countries).

There are two main areas of dispute among those favoring the tent-making strategy. First, the matter of tent-makers serving “within closed countries.” The preference here for exclusivity is one of strategic concern. It is imperative that tent-makers receive special training with a focus on a special people group. Reaching those behind closed doors stipulates special preparation. Learning the language and culture of the people requires time and discipline. The success of their ministry depends on it. Their service as tent-makers may be prolonged rather than short-lived. Obviously tent-making is applicable in “open” countries. Second is the issue of support methods. We should not make this an issue to divide those who are advocates of the tent-making strategy.

In Acts 18:1–5, we see Paul supporting himself by teaming up with Aquila and Priscilla as tent-makers. Later when Silas and Timothy arrived in Corinth from Macedonia, Paul devoted himself exclusively to preaching. Paul vehemently defended fully-funded spiritual ministry (1 Cor. 9:1–14). There are various ways of doing ministry. On his part, he opted not to receive church support, not on principle but for a pragmatic reason. For he has indeed successfully argued for the legitimacy of accepting church support for his ministry.

What are the qualifications of tent-makers? The tent-makers must be (1) physically, emotionally, and spiritually self-reliant; (2) adaptable; (3) biblically literate; (4) alert to the emerging mission context; (5) trained in meeting needs vital to the people group they seek to penetrate; (6) trained in long-term and low-profile evangelistic skills; (7) equipped with broad new strategic thinking; and (8) prepared with a special strategy for responding to opportunities presented by need.

How does one go about finding a tent-making job across cultures? One must be creative and persistent in job hunting like anyone else. One may consult sources such as InterCristo, the International Placement Network, and the International Employment Gazette. One may look for international employment on the Internet. One may inquire regarding job availability through one’s professional association or examine the job listing in a professional journal. Possibilities abound in high-tech fields. Foreign embassies are worth checking. Potential tent-makers may latch on to government or intergovernmental assignments. They may go to work with humanitarian relief and development organizations. Teaching English to Speakers of Other Languages (TESOL) is in high demand all over the world. One can serve as a teacher in most fields and at all levels, as a medical doctor, as a nurse, as an engineer, as a farmer, and as a “professional” student.
Tent-Making Mission

There are some problems associated with tent-making. For security reasons, the “success” stories are in short supply. Often we hear only of failures, tent-makers coming home due to their inability to adjust to the culture of the host country, family reasons, or inadequate preparation. It is difficult to do the required balancing act between job and ministry successfully. There is often not enough time for ministry because of the job pressures. Tent-makers are to witness through their occupations, but some employers prohibit such witnessing activities. Despite these difficulties, tent-making missions must continue to be explored. The future context of mission as a whole demands it. Tent-makers are the agents of strategic missions for tomorrow as well as today.

TETSUNAO YAMAMORI

Territorial Spirits. The Bible speaks of evil angels or spirits that exercise significant influence and control over people groups, empires, countries, and cities. These pervasive powers not only work to bring harm and misery, but more importantly, they strive to keep people from coming to a knowledge of the one true God. Since the mid–1980s, some evangelists and missiologists have begun advocating an aggressive strategy for doing spiritual battle with these so-called territorial spirits as a means of more effective evangelism (see Powers and Mission, The).

Although there is not extensive information in the Bible about territorial spirits, there is sufficient discussion to affirm their reality and provide some insight into their nature and activities. In a passage that highlights God’s sovereignty over the nations, God is said to have divided humanity “according to the number of the sons of Israel” or, as the Septuagint and a scroll of Deuteronomy from Qumran put it, “according to the number of the sons of God”—a reference to angels (Deut. 32:8). The passage thus appears to be teaching that the number of the nations of the earth is directly proportional to the number of angels. This passage was widely understood in Judaism to mean that certain angels are associated with particular countries and peoples.

Some of these angelic rulers evidently have rebelled against God. Rather than direct the people’s worship to the one true God, they have sought veneration for themselves and have falsely presented themselves to the people as “gods” (Ps. 82:1–8). The prophet Isaiah foretells the future judgment of these patron angels of the nations: “In that day the Lord will punish the powers in the heavens above and the kings on earth below” (Isa. 24:21).

These powers who have masqueraded as gods are, in reality, demonic spirits. The same chapter that reveals the allotments of humanity to angelic guardianship (Deut. 32:8) speaks of Israel provoking God to jealousy by embracing foreign gods (Deut. 32:16). Israel actually “sacrificed to demons” (Heb. = shedim; Greek = daimonia) (Deut. 32:17). They forsook the one true almighty God and gave their devotion to fallen angels, to demonic spirits. Of course they did not realize that they were worshipping evil spirits. These principalities and powers pulled off an effective hoax by deceiving people into thinking that they were the omnipotent rulers of heaven and earth.

The Septuagint version of Psalm 96:5 also unMASKS the true identity of the various gods of the nations: “For all the gods of the nations are demons, but the Lord made the heavens.” All of the rituals, prayers, sacrifices, and worship offered to the gods of other nations were not really offered to “gods” at all. They were accorded to angelic imposters usurping the rightful place of the one true God.

A particularly appalling aspect of this grand demonic deception is the horrific sacrifices that these rebellious angels demanded of the people as their “gods.” They went so far as to elicit human sacrifice. The psalmist laments one of these sad chapters in the history of Israel: “They worshipped their idols which became a snare to them. They sacrificed their sons and their daughters to demons. They shed innocent blood, the blood of their sons and daughters, whom they sacrificed to the gods of Canaan, and the land was desecrated by their blood” (Ps. 96:36–38). The Gods and Goddesses of the Canaanites were, in reality, demonic spirits. They tempted the people of Israel and solicited their worship under the guise of local deities. They were what many are calling today “territorial spirits.”

The most well known and illustrious passage about territorial spirits is Daniel 10. Since the text describes angelic powers that have specific connections to the successive empires of Persia and Greece, they might more appropriately be called “empire spirits.” These evil angels are mentioned to Daniel by an interpreting angel, perhaps Gabriel (see Dan. 9:21), who came to explain a vision God had given to him. Gabriel reveals that there was a heavenly struggle that hindered his coming to Daniel for three weeks: “The prince of the Persian kingdom resisted me twenty-one days. Then Michael, one of the chief princes, came to help me, because I was detained there with the king of Persia” (Dan. 10:13). Later, Gabriel informs Daniel that the heavenly warfare would continue, but would not include a struggle with another angelic prince: “Soon I will return to fight against the prince of Persia, and when I go, the prince of Greece will come. . . . No one supports me against them except Michael, your prince” (Dan. 10:20–21). Both the prince of Persia and the prince of Greece in these passages are not references to the human rulers, but to angelic forces. There is a clear consensus among Bible scholars on this foundational point. This interpretation is strongly suggested by the fact that the archangel Michael is also referred to as a “prince.” The Septuagint (Theodotian) translation of the Hebrew term sar is archon, a word that was used by Paul (see Eph. 2:2; 1 Cor. 2:6, 8), John (John 12:31), and other first-century and early Christian writers for angelic powers.

The New Testament gives us little direct teaching about angelic patrons over cities, territories, regions, or nations. Jesus says nothing about these higher-level spirits. Neither does the Book of Acts contain explicit teaching about them. Paul’s references to the “principalities and powers” are not directed toward issues surrounding regional or city spirits. His teaching is focused on the variety of ways evil spirits directly oppose believers. Some interpreters have seen territorial dimensions in his list of principalities and powers. His teaching is focused on the variety of ways evil spirits directly oppose believers. Some interpreters have seen territorial dimensions in his list of principalities and powers.

In Ephesians 6:12, but the whole context of this passage has to do with the believers’ daily direct struggle with the demonic (see Spiritual Warfare). Paul’s most pertinent teaching is his comment in 1 Corinthians 10:20 that “the sacrifices of pagans are offered to demons, not to God.” Here he reaffirms the Old Testament notion that idolatry and false religion are animated by the demonic as part of their attempt to subvert the plan of God and seek worship for themselves.

Throughout the Bible there is never any intimation that these powers rival God in any way or present a serious threat to the fulfillment of his plan and purposes. God is sovereign and is infinitely more powerful than any of the spirits or angels. The Father earnestly seeks the full devotion of his people. He wants believers to call directly on him for wisdom, strength, and help.

Terrorism. In the two years following June 1991, in the southern Philippines there were four missionaries killed, two raped, and six kidnapped. In addition, thirty-five were injured in a terrorist bombing. This is but one example of the risks missionaries are confronting as they propagate the Christian message of peace in a world of violence. Other areas of ongoing instability include Colombia, Peru, Liberia, Sudan, and Afghanistan.

Two of the main sources of terroristic activity are fundamentalist Muslims and communist guerrillas. These fringe groups have no affinity with Christianity. Therefore, the foreign missionary becomes a high profile person through whom they may make a religious or political statement. Missionaries are also usually unarmed and thus totally vulnerable as a “soft target.”

Evacuation of missionary personnel from areas of danger is an emotional topic in mission circles. One side holds to a “stay at all costs” position. They demand the right to make an individual decision on the field level without reference to home base directives or to local embassy advisors. The other extreme represents those who are ready to evacuate at the first sign of danger. Most missionaries would be positioned between these two extremes.

Nationals in Bangladesh, Liberia, and Ethiopia expressed serious reservation as to how the missionaries fled their countries in times of danger. The local people felt forsaken by their spiritual guides. It would seem imperative that major decisions regarding evacuation be taken in tandem with these national believers.

One of the few evangelical organizations that is working with mission boards in risk assessment as well as in assisting in the release of kidnapped missionaries is Contingency Preparation Consultants. This group has held seminars in a number of countries for mission leaders.

Biblically, one finds the apostle Paul enduring extreme hardships as well as purposefully walking into dangerous situations. However, on at least seven occasions he fled from those who threatened his life, almost always upon the advice of the local people. This subject remains one of the most difficult areas with which missionaries and missions boards have to deal.

Phil Parshall

TESOL. See Teaching English to Speakers of Other Languages.

Testimony. See Witness.

Thailand (Est. 2000 pop.: 61,909,000; 513,115 sq. km. [198,114 sq. mi.]). Thailand is a country whose 62 million people have accepted Christianity reluctantly and slowly. The origins of Christianity are attributed to the coming of the Portuguese Catholic missionaries in 1498, folfollowed by Protestant missionaries in 1828, more than 300 years later. The arrival of both Protestant and Catholic missionaries was met initially by disinterest, followed soon by sporadic regional hostility. Few martyrs can be counted among those early missionaries, but that factor should not be viewed as any positive regard for Christianity. It was seen as the religion of Western hegemony in Southeast Asia and thereby regarded as a threat to Thai nationalism. From those early days Christianity has been regarded as a “foreigner’s” religion and those that embrace it as luuk farang, the “child of the foreigner.”
Thailand

Several factors can be cited for that phenomenon. First among these is a tightly knit blend of conservative Theravadic Buddhism and animism, a pervasive form of religion that Christianity has found very difficult to penetrate. In their naivety, the early missionaries, and many up to the present time, assumed that animistic phenomena were simply the residue of superstition and that Western science and education would dispel or replace indigenous or traditional perceptions of reality. Roman Catholics and conciliar Protestants believed in large part that long-term enculturation or Christianization via education would achieve that end, while evangelical and fundamentalist Protestants believed the “new birth” and “growth in Christ” would accomplish it.

Another important factor for the slow acceptance of Christianity in Thailand is the influence of nationalism and a “scientific worldview.” Added to that is the impact of globalization on Thai culture coupled with a more positive national self-image based primarily on economic development and education.

It is difficult to evaluate other factors such as the loss of influence of Christianity due to the popular notion that the West, and its religion by association, is “morally decadent.” The strengthening of ASEAN ties also contributes to this, as does the influence of Eastern religions in the West. Generally, Thai people view Christianity as a “foreigner’s religion,” though the intensities of that view are differently perceived.

A variety of methods and strategies have been employed throughout the history of Christianity in Thailand. Each strategy mirrors the unique purposes and theological distinctives of the respective mission agencies. Some methods resemble “Jesus, meek and mild,” while others reflect the authoritative powerful Christ with the demoniac (Matt. 8:31). One might assume that because of this broad variety of Christian expression there is also a corresponding diversity in the strategic methods employed. The interesting fact is that most mission organizations used similar strategies (mission station, itinerant evangelism, preaching points, church structure, schools, hospitals, etc.). Any differences are primarily in the manner, intensity, and applications in which similar strategies were employed (see Wisely, 144–64).

Christianity in both its Catholic and Protestant forms remains a struggling religious minority, its most significant obstacle not being syncretistic Buddhism, but its Western form of Christianity.

New approaches that take seriously traditional indigenous worldviews and that seek to devise relevant cultural practices are at work. The extent to which these new approaches will be effective in moving the percentage of Christians beyond the one percent barrier is not known, nor predictable.

THOMAS N. WISELY

The Evangelical Alliance Mission (TEAM). Based in the United States and Canada, the Evangelical Alliance Mission is an interdenominational mission agency whose purpose is “to help churches send missionaries to plant reproducing churches” in lands where awareness of the gospel is minimal. Forty percent of its missionaries are deployed in the 10/40 Window. Reflecting the globalization of the Christian mission, TEAM missionaries partner with missionaries from evangelical agencies based in Australia, France, Germany, Holland, Japan, Sweden, Switzerland, Taiwan, Thailand, the United Kingdom, and Venezuela.

Founded in 1890 by evangelist FREDRIK FRANSON, TEAM was a product of the nineteenth-century spiritual renewal that swept the Scandinavian countries and produced the free evangelical churches of Europe and North America. The mission’s character was shaped by a compelling belief in the necessity of personal conversion, by a commitment to start visible churches of earnest Christians, by a premillennial expectation of the “any day” return of Jesus Christ, and by the bold and direct evangelistic methods of D. L. Moody, in whose campaigns Franson worked.

In 1889, when J. HUDSON TAYLOR called for one thousand missionaries to evangelize China, Franson, who was preaching in Germany at the time, informed Taylor of his determination to recruit and send one hundred of them. Before his death in 1908, the Scandinavian Alliance Mission of North America (as it was then called) had suffered its first martyrs in China and Mongolia and had expanded its work into six countries. Today, nine hundred TEAM missionaries serve in some forty areas; in addition, fourteen mission agencies and church fellowships in Europe and North America were either founded or early influenced by Franson.

The mission’s general directors, after Franson, have been J. H. Hedstrom, T. J. Bach, David H. Johnson, Vernon Mortenson, Richard M. Winchell, and George W. Murray. After World War II, the mission changed its name to TEAM to reflect the broadening of the missionary force beyond the original Scandinavian constituency. The mission also joined the Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association (IFMA). In the years to follow, several smaller, specialized agencies merged with it, including Tibetan Frontier Mission (1946), Door of Hope Mission (1959), Caribbean Broadcasting Company (1963), Sudan United Mission, North American Branch (1969), Peruvian Gospel Fellowship (1975), Orinoco River Mission (1980), Japan Evangelical Mission (1982), and Bible Christian Union (1994).

The largest bloc of TEAM missionaries work directly in starting new churches, while the rest engage in leadership training, community development, radio and television production, Bible translation, literature production and distribution, education, and health ministries that support the church-planting effort. More than one hundred years after its founding, the aims of the mission echo the instructions given by Franson to his early recruits: “Our common goal must in every case be the salvation of souls and their continuing both in grace and in the work until the Lord returns. The essential task thus will not be to set up stations, but to get living congregations into being, whose continuing joy it will be to send out new missionaries from their own midst.”

David Broucek

Theism. See Monothesim.

Theodicy. See Problem of Evil.

Theodore of Tarsus (c. 602–690). Early English Christian leader: This key man in English history can best be described in relation to others such as Wilfrid, Willibrord, and Boniface—all of them part of a single, major transition in the long story of the British Isles.

The Celtic peoples were a tribal group in Paul's day that ranged from Ireland through England and the Continent, across a belt that stretched clear to Paul's Galatia. By Paul's day they had been overrun in southern Britain by what would become four centuries of Roman domination of literacy and civil order.

When Rome was threatened by invasion from the East it began to withdraw its legions from Southern England, allowing “the coming of the Anglo-Saxons,” tribal peoples whose successive invasions would return England to illiteracy for the next two centuries. However, by the end of the Romano-Celtic period of British history the Irish, Welsh, and Scottish Celts (today's names) had already begun to develop a very scholarly and unusually mission-minded version of Christianity that was considerably different from the Latin-Roman forms, being tied more closely with the Greek-Roman tradition.

The power vacuum created by the withdrawal of the Roman legions from England (c. A.D. 440) left Irish and Scottish Celtic Christianity to try to bring a semblance of order. Meanwhile, with the fall of the Western Roman Empire, Latin Christianity became a stable and influential Christian tradition no longer tied to a menacing empire and, by the time of Theodore's birth 150 years later, had sent Augustine of Canterbury to reach out to the Anglo-Saxons settlers in England. After another sixty years the conflict between Celtic and Roman traditions was superficially solved by the Synod of Whitby, led by a young man named Wilfrid. Supposedly this event (c. 664) brought the Celtic tradition into the (Latin) Roman rite, but it was a tenuous achievement.

A master stroke of the Western Roman church leaders was achieved when they appointed Theodore of Tarsus Archbishop of Canterbury. Theodore hailed from the eastern end of the Roman Empire, the source of much of what was Celtic Christianity. Thus, just as the Jerusalem Council asked Barnabus (who was both Greek and Jewish in culture) to go to Antioch to see to things there, Theodore was asked to go to Britain. Firm but patient, an organizer, scholarly, keen to disciple, in the next thirty years he was able to somehow gain the acceptance of those on both sides of the divide that had become both a Celtic-Anglo divide and then a Celtic-Roman polarization. According to Bede, Theodore was the first real Christian leader of all England.

By being even-handed, however, Theodore incurred the wrath of the younger, wealthy, and royally connected Wilfrid, who felt he ought to have been much more pro-Roman.

As late as Theodore's century, to people living in the forests of what we today call England, Rome was still an impressive word. The Mediterranean church (still bridging Latin and Greek) was the most durable institution, surviving the fall of the Roman Empire, and remained more nearly intact than any other institution. Understandably, in the British Isles, the virile, earlier Celtic form of Christianity characterized by some Eastern (Greek) Christian customs (Easter date, tonsure, the penitentials, Egyptian art, etc.) would eventually conflict with the imported Latin tradition. Theodore's significance in this story is that more than any other one person he was the firm hand affecting a melding of the virile Celtic Christianity and the prestigious Latin Roman version, a contextualization which was to last for many centuries.

Ralph D. Winter

See also Celtic Missionary Movement.
Theological Education by Extension

Theological Education by Extension. Theological education by extension (TEE) is a term that describes a method and a movement that appeared in the missions world in the early 1960s. Responding to the rapidly changing patterns of the church, the ministry, and leadership training, TEE revolted against the residence type of theological education. It espoused a new form of education, “which yields to the life cycle of the student, that does not destroy or prevent his productive relation to society, and does not make the student fit into the needs of a residential school.” It was theological education for church growth.

Brief History of the Movement. TEE was born in Latin America, occasioned by the general needs of Latin American evangelicals, particularly by the Presbyterians in Guatemala in 1962. They had an excellent seminary of the traditional type in Guatemala City with a highly qualified faculty. But a survey revealed that in twenty-five years the seminary had prepared only ten pastors who were actively serving the denomination. At that time only six students were enrolled—hardly sufficient to serve two hundred rapidly growing churches in one of the most fertile fields of all Latin America. Something was radically wrong.

Providentially, a trio of highly qualified, unusually creative, and evangelically concerned missionary professors made up their faculty. Ralph Winter, Jim Emery, and Ross Kinsler all had multiple degrees in engineering, anthropology, and theology. They moved from the city to the rural area where most of the churches were, but this did not solve the problem. A radical change in structure was necessary.

The church leaders could not come for training if it required residence away from their homes. From this sprang the idea of a decentralized seminary. If the potential students could not come to the seminary, the seminary would go to them! Regional centers were established. Courses on three levels were adapted to the schedules of the students. Textbooks were put into programmed instruction. Care was taken to maintain academic excellence. Enrollment immediately increased from six to fifty students—and the TEE movement was born.

Five advantages of the new TEE program were noted by the missionaries. First, the door was opened for leaders who desired to reach a higher level of training. Second, the leaders could receive theological training in the context of their own subculture. Third, the system permitted those students who had low motivation to leave without losing face. Fourth, instead of lowering academic levels, the extension student learns better and develops better study habits in his or her home. Finally, extension is much more economical than the conventional seminary, and it saves much time for the professor.

Thus a radical new form of theological education arose in a tiny country of Central America. Soon it became more widely known and its leaders went on the road to respond to requests from other fields with the same problems. The new method spread to Bolivia, Colombia, Brazil, Mexico, and Argentina during the 1960s and into most Latin American countries in the 1970s. From there it has spread to Asia and Africa, maintaining its basic principles while assuming different forms. TEE’s adaptability has been one of its strong points. It targets established leaders instead of prospective leaders.

For almost a decade the TEE Movement met different degrees of opposition from traditional theological educators. This was due to some unmerited criticism of residential forms by TEE proponents. However, after realizing that TEE was not necessarily a substitute for, but a complement to, resident theological education, the two sides have gradually fused and see each other as mutually beneficial.

Methodology of the Movement. TEE can better be understood when one keeps in mind that it does not espouse the extermination of resident structures, but only their extension. TEE suggests that the seminary become student-centered instead of institution-centered. The seminary simply extends its theological education in several ways. Geographically, the seminary goes to the student in his or her natural habitat. Chronologically, the schedules of classes are drawn up after consulting the students. Seasonal classes and schedules must be considered. Culturally, the course material may be the same, but the Center adapts the content to the needs, customs, language, and thought patterns of the Center area. Academically, courses may have to be offered at several different levels, geared to the local environment. TEE is apt to reach people of different social and economic classes and prepare bivocational ministers. Finally, economically TEE avoids the enormous expense of maintaining institutional buildings and salaried faculties.

The TEE Movement has spread to all areas of the world of mission. Most missiologists agree that it is not a substitute for resident theological education, but a needed complement, especially in theological education on cross-cultural mission fields.

Justice C. Anderson

See also Bible Education by Extension.

Theological Education Fund. See THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION IN NON-WESTERN CONTEXTS.
Theological Education in Non-Western Contexts

Theological education refers to the intentional and supervised equipping of the church’s leadership. As such, theological education is and always has been an essential element of the task of missions. From the apostolic band of the New Testament age and the catechetical schools of the postapostolic period to graduate seminaries scattered throughout the contemporary world, theological education is the most compelling and prominent form of EDUCATIONAL MISSION WORK. Nevertheless, Johnstone (1993) reports that an inadequate supply of trained leaders—a failure of theological education—hobbles the vitality and expansion of the church in nearly every nation of the world at the close of the twentieth century.

The present failure does not reflect a lack of attention or effort. As Roman Catholic missionaries of the sixteenth century followed the Conquistadors to the New World and beyond, they established universities for training indigenous priests on the model of those in Europe. Early Protestant missionaries took apprentices, whom they trained as “evangelists.” During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, other missionaries founded hundreds of Bible schools in the non-Western world, beginning with Carey’s College of Serampore. Lacking the skills needed to design culturally appropriate educational programs, Protestant missionaries, like Catholics of an earlier era, replicated (with minimal adjustments) the Western schools in which they trained. The results of this effort are mixed. On the one hand, we observe the tragic lack of effective leadership that Johnstone reports. On the other hand, the vast majority of leaders in non-Western churches today are products of these schools.

The most concentrated modern effort to reshape theological education in the non-Western world was launched in 1958 by the Theological Education Fund (TEF), which came under the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1961. In three “mandate periods,” stretching from 1958 to 1977, TEF channeled substantial resources from the West into theological education in the non-Western world. Twenty-seven theological schools in Africa, Asia, and Latin America received grants of $100,000 or more, further grants were made to develop libraries at three hundred theological schools, and programs were established to write, translate, and publish theological texts. More than four hundred Third World nationals received scholarships for graduate and postgraduate theological studies in the West.

The impact of TEF on non-Western theological education was enormous. Unfortunately, sensitivity to contextual issues surfaced late, and even then the appropriateness of Western educational models went largely unchallenged. Since Third World educators received scholarships to liberal theological schools in the West, perhaps the TEF’s most enduring legacy is promotion of Western liberal and postliberal theology among Latin American, African, and Asian churches.

THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION BY EXTENSION (TEE) also has dramatically impacted the training of the church’s leadership in the non-Western world. In 1963, the faculty of a traditionally Western seminary in Guatemala faced the ineffectiveness of their training programs and determined to change. TEE emerged as an attempt to make ministry training accessible to functioning church leaders without disrupting their productive social, economic, and ministry relationships. This was achieved through self-instructional textbooks and frequent (often weekly) “seminars” led by a “center leader” or “tutor.”

Dialogue between TEE educators and faculty at “residential” schools sometimes has turned acrimonious. Nevertheless, TEE has brought significant benefits to theological schools and the churches they serve. Although no firm statistics exist, thousands—perhaps hundreds of thousands—of church leaders in Latin America, Africa, and Asia have received some biblical or ministry instruction through TEE and BEE (see BIBLICAL EDUCATION BY EXTENSION) which they could not have obtained otherwise. Furthermore, many theological educators in “residential schools” have been sensitized to educational issues and methods that challenge them to rethink their approach to ministry training.

As part of TEF’s Second Mandate, regional associations of Conciliar theological schools were organized to regulate academic standards. Evangelical educators founded the INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF ACCREDITING FOR EVANGELICAL THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION (ICAA—now ICETE) in 1980. Just as missionaries modeled schools on their alma matters in the West, so the regional accrediting agencies established during the 1960s and 1970s borrowed heavily—sometimes wholesale—from North American accrediting structures. Many theological schools have been challenged by ACCREDITATION to improve facilities and strengthen faculty qualifications and instructions. Nevertheless, assumptions underlying Western theological education and relationships between the theological school and its constituent church have all too often gone unexamined.

In 1983, ICAA adopted a “Manifesto on the Renewal of Evangelical Theological Education,” which pledged to “introduce and reinforce” twelve critical aspects of theological education. The stirring rhetoric of the ICAA “Manifesto” has been grist for faculty discussions in many theological schools, but educators must tap their own creativity to discern how advocated commitments can be implemented. As a result, in most nations theological schools and churches continue to await a renewal of ministry training that
Theological Education in Non-Western Contexts

ROBERT W. FERRIS

Theological Method. Theology has traditionally been the exclusive domain of the cultures of Europe and to a lesser degree in North America. But as a result of successful missionary work theologizing is no longer limited to one cultural context. Churches have been established in almost every region of the world and many potentially different types of theology do, or certainly will, co-exist in the world church. This, however, should not be viewed with indifference since the interdependence of all theological activity makes each ethnotheology equally responsible for the truth and unity of the faith of the whole worldwide church. Each theology should be pursued and practiced within the framework of this universal continuity as well as the local context of its own culture. What does this mean for theological method?

Theology does not derive its unity, that is, internal structure, from any particular method or from practical concerns, but rather from the object of theological investigation, namely, God. Accordingly theology is best understood as the study of God in which the unique nature of its various subdisciplines is determined by the foundational principle sub ratione Dei (attempt to relate all data to God). This is what distinguishes theological activity from all other disciplines (e.g., anthropology) which concern themselves with the same or similar issues. The universality of theological activity grows out of several assumptions about the nature of the human and the divine as well as the nature and task of theology.

Since there is one God, and since the plight of humanity is the same in all societies, and since our yearning for release is answered in the sacrificial death of Christ, these essential elements of God’s self-revelation will correspond to universally known elements of the human dilemma. On the basis of this fundamental continuity it seems reasonable to assume that all people and languages possess the thought categories to understand and accept those elements of the Christian message which have salvific import.

Assuming that God is the all-determining sustainer of reality (Heb. 1:1–4) and that his self-revelation is mediated through that reality, it follows that divine reality must be viewed as a universally present concept. Thus, theological activity, which seeks to ascertain and systematize knowledge about that reality (God) can, by definition, never be limited to any one of the many cultural contexts which comprise the whole of human reality. In other words, theological activity is universal, in terms of both its appropriateness and its potential fruitfulness.

The nature and the task of theology remain the same across all cultural and linguistic barriers. This can be summarized in terms of a threefold definition of theology adapted from interaction with John Feinberg.

First, theology is the inductive discovery of truth from any and all sources concerning the being, acts, and relationship to God. The data needed by the theologian are available from a variety of sources and can be grouped into two general classes: (1) Divine Revelation, that is, the self-revelation of God as evident in creation, in the life and work of Christ, and in Scripture; (2) the human situation, that which is observable (experiential) including both the negative and the positive, and the contemporary and historical aspects of human existence. As used here, the positive aspects are seen to issue from God’s creative involvement with humans and are reflected in individually expressed rational, emotional, and social traits as well as their cumulative expressions, that is, philosophy, science, art, community, and tradition. The negative aspects give evidence of sin and its effects and confront us with questions of evil, injustice, death, and the like. This categorization is not intended to imply parity between the two sources of data, but some degree of correlation. The cultural context of the theologian influences preunderstandings as well as the fundamental questions. Not in the sense that the questions in any way dictate the content of revelation, but rather in the sense that revelation is sufficient.

Second, theology is the analytic penetration of the meaning of each portion of inductively discovered truth. Each of these must in turn be keyed to pertinent biblical data. Exegetical tools (see EXEGESIS) and hermeneutical principles (see HERMENEUTICS) are used to determine the meaning of a given passage. This provides a basis for evaluating inductive conclusions and enables further refinement or, where necessary, reformulation.

Finally, the theologian must synthesize each portion of truth into an internally consistent and logically ordered system which speaks to the issues of one’s day. This provides a framework for a deductive process that allows valid derivation of additional conclusions.

All Christian theologies, regardless of where or by whom they are constructed, are related to one another by virtue of: (1) both positive (knowledge about God) and negative (sin) elements of the human situation; (2) a common context, the church; (3) common theological task; and (4) an essentially similar methodology. Since theologi-
The theological method is determined by the nature of the theological task and its raw material, the methods needed for determining the meaning of a given biblical text, formulating its principles, systematizing the concepts, and interpreting collective Christian experience (tradition) are going to demonstrate a degree of similarity from culture to culture.

The question arises as to whether we can or should have some kind of standardized methodology, "a fixed base, an invariant pattern, opening upon all further developments of understanding" (Crowe). If our definition of the theological task is correct and if the basic methodological framework is going to remain relatively unchanged from culture to culture, then we are still left with the problem of how to formally incorporate cultural differences in both our definition of doing theology, as well as our theological treatment of locally informed topics, like ANCESTRAL PRACTICES. Perhaps it would be useful to distinguish between method and model (Schökel).

A method is a defined and controllable way of proceeding. A model is a system of elements constructed to give a unified explanation of a set of observed data, or it is a system already known and tested in one field which is transferred to a new field of investigation. In both cases the model contains a surplus meaning which it puts to the service of the research. Once it is accepted it guides subsequent observation and explanation of data. It becomes an a priori form of the research and its methods. We commit ourselves to models, but we make use of methods. For example, historians make use of the same sources, use similar methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The similar methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian.

The question arises as to whether we can or should have some kind of standardized methodology, "a fixed base, an invariant pattern, opening upon all further developments of understanding" (Crowe). If our definition of the theological task is correct and if the basic methodological framework is going to remain relatively unchanged from culture to culture, then we are still left with the problem of how to formally incorporate cultural differences in both our definition of doing theology, as well as our theological treatment of locally informed topics, like ANCESTRAL PRACTICES. Perhaps it would be useful to distinguish between method and model (Schökel).

A method is a defined and controllable way of proceeding. A model is a system of elements constructed to give a unified explanation of a set of observed data, or it is a system already known and tested in one field which is transferred to a new field of investigation. In both cases the model contains a surplus meaning which it puts to the service of the research. Once it is accepted it guides subsequent observation and explanation of data. It becomes an a priori form of the research and its methods. We commit ourselves to models, but we make use of methods. For example, historians make use of the same sources, use similar methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian.

The question arises as to whether we can or should have some kind of standardized methodology, "a fixed base, an invariant pattern, opening upon all further developments of understanding" (Crowe). If our definition of the theological task is correct and if the basic methodological framework is going to remain relatively unchanged from culture to culture, then we are still left with the problem of how to formally incorporate cultural differences in both our definition of doing theology, as well as our theological treatment of locally informed topics, like ANCESTRAL PRACTICES. Perhaps it would be useful to distinguish between method and model (Schökel).

A method is a defined and controllable way of proceeding. A model is a system of elements constructed to give a unified explanation of a set of observed data, or it is a system already known and tested in one field which is transferred to a new field of investigation. In both cases the model contains a surplus meaning which it puts to the service of the research. Once it is accepted it guides subsequent observation and explanation of data. It becomes an a priori form of the research and its methods. We commit ourselves to models, but we make use of methods. For example, historians make use of the same sources, use similar methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian.

The question arises as to whether we can or should have some kind of standardized methodology, "a fixed base, an invariant pattern, opening upon all further developments of understanding" (Crowe). If our definition of the theological task is correct and if the basic methodological framework is going to remain relatively unchanged from culture to culture, then we are still left with the problem of how to formally incorporate cultural differences in both our definition of doing theology, as well as our theological treatment of locally informed topics, like ANCESTRAL PRACTICES. Perhaps it would be useful to distinguish between method and model (Schökel).

A method is a defined and controllable way of proceeding. A model is a system of elements constructed to give a unified explanation of a set of observed data, or it is a system already known and tested in one field which is transferred to a new field of investigation. In both cases the model contains a surplus meaning which it puts to the service of the research. Once it is accepted it guides subsequent observation and explanation of data. It becomes an a priori form of the research and its methods. We commit ourselves to models, but we make use of methods. For example, historians make use of the same sources, use similar methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian. The different methods, but the different results reveal the ideological bias (model) of the historian.
Theological Systems

systematically, rationally, and without the necessity of any accompanying faith in the supernatural character of its objects of study. Theological systems were thought to be freed to become a Neoplatonic search for abstract, rational essences, unhindered by historical, geographical, or social qualifiers.

Interruptions. The springtime of missions in the thirteenth century saw the formation of the Franciscan and Dominican orders and their missionary thrusts into places like China and Mongolia. By the beginning of the sixteenth century, the sea routes to Africa, Asia, and the Americas had been discovered. “God and gold” drove explorers and evangelists into a larger new world. The fledgling Jesuit order was born.

But, with notable exceptions, the significance of that larger world for systematic, theological reformulation was lost. In contextual response to the Reformation movement the Council of Trent (1543-63) standardized a rigid liturgical and theological uniformity on the Catholic Church. The Catholic world of theology and mission was Latinized (Shorter, 1992, 146-47).

Protestantism’s response to an expanding world was also mixed. Calvin and Luther restricted their understanding of mission largely to the reform of the existing church. Their affirmation of the global witness of the church to the Triune God remained a rich but untested potential (Scherer, 1987, 54–66). It was the Anabaptist movement that broke through the links between the territorial church and society and sought to liberate that broken through the links between the territorial church and society and sought to liberate their affirmation of the global witness of the church to the Triune God. The Catholic world of theology and mission was Latinized (Shorter, 1992, 146-47).

At the same time, the missionary dimensions of Reformation—and then Puritan—thelogizing was fashioning a delayed entrance. The creeds of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries rejected the path of scholastic abstractionism and saw themselves as habitus, a revived church’s reflections on God’s mission in the world. The Reformation focus on sola scriptura and sola gratia turned theology from a metaphysical science of ontological speculation to a systematic search for God’s wisdom that would speak pastorally to a Catholic context.

The polemical roles of those creeds as a teaching instrument for the instruction of church members and teachers expanded as the crisis demands of the time faded. Theological systems, properly committed to discerning the full teaching of Scripture, found themselves dividing into Calvinist versus Remonstrant (Arminian), everybody versus Anabaptist.

Compartmentalization Confronted. During the first two centuries after the Reformation, that missionary dimension of theology seldom became intentional. In abandoning monasticism, the Reformers had abandoned the prime missionary agency of the past. Without international contact with non-Christian peoples, they were torn by endless disputes, battling for sheer survival, and impacted by their own forms of scholasticism. Protestants, like Catholics, affirmed their theology as universals, bottom-line systems whose centuries-old cultural, social, or historical influences had become invisible in the context of mutual confrontation and self-definition.

The explosion of the territorial boundaries of Christianity that came with the missionary movement of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries was to change that isolation of missions from theology for both Catholic and Protestant. Christian theological systems, long embedded in the Anglo-Saxon world, began their gospel dialogue with very different cultures. As they did so, their own cultural conditioning slowly became visible.

The long confusion of “Christianizing” with Western “civilizing” came more and more to the surface in the missionary confrontation. The universal message of the gospel had not been carried in a vacuum across the globe. In the providence of God, the reflective task of the Western church also had been shaped, both for good and ill, by a cultural, social, historical, and linguistic context (Muller, 1991, 201–14). Once again, missions had become the instrument calling for a new look at theological systems.

A New Partnership of Missions and Theology. In the closing decades of the twentieth century the hermeneutical task behind theology’s systematic constructions is becoming consciously global. There is a new sensitivity to how understanding takes place when the gospel’s meaning is carried across social, ethno-cultural boundaries and speaks to different needs. More are recognizing now the impact of the human context “as part of the interpretive task of the church throughout the ages” (Muller, 1991, 202).

From the maturing world church are emerging theological reflections that bear the title of their geographical origins—Asian Theologies, African Theologies. Others have originated in Anglo-Saxon contexts and speak to ethnic and gender-based issues of power and powerlessness—Hispanic Evangelical Theologies, Black Theologies, Feminist Theologies. Still others respond to issues of wealth and poverty, of political oppression—Liberation Theologies and Korean Minjung Theology.

Many of these new explorations remain deeply touched by a Neo-Enlightenment skepticism regarding the full integrity of the Scriptures. Such formulations too frequently place context above biblical text and minimize the hermeneutical priority of exegesis in their search.

These limitations create nervous concerns in the Anglo-Saxon evangelical community. Old expectations of a theology without context return: if the Revelation of God is transcultural, shouldn’t we expect the human exercise of theological reflection to sound the same across time and space, a theologis perennis? Legitimate fears of syncretism arise: are these new paths falling into a theological pluralism that cannot draw boundaries between Truth and error?

Expectations appear more positive in “Third World” settings where mission and theology have closer ties. Christian humility acknowledges its partnership debt to Western theological systems borrowed from the missionary. Christian hopes for the global progress of doctrine asks, “How can we do justice both to the absoluteness of Scripture’s united testimony and to the uniqueness of our context in which it must speak again?” And Christian zeal for the gospel makes sure the question asked has a missionary intention and a missionary dimension.

Theology of Mission

A discipline that reflects the presuppositions, assumptions, and concepts undergirding mission theory. Prior to the 1960s, a number of important people like Gisbertus Voetius, Josef Schmidlin, Gustaf Warneck, Karl Barth, Karl Hartenstein, Martin Kähler, Walter Freytag, Roland Allen, Hendrik Kraemer, J. H. Bavinck, W. A. Visser ‘t Hooft, Max Warren, Olav Myklebust, Bengt Sundkler, Carl F. H. Henry, and Harold Lindsell reflected theologically on mission. As a separate discipline with its own parameters, methodology, scholars, and focuses, theology of mission really began in the early 1960s with the work of Gerald Anderson.

Ten years later, in The Concise Dictionary of the Christian World Mission, theology of mission was defined as “concerned with the basic presuppositions and underlying principles which determine, from the standpoint of Christian faith, the motives, message, methods, strategy and goals of the Christian world mission.”

Theology of mission is multidisciplinary. Missiology is a multidisciplinary discipline that draws from many cognate disciplines. Within missiology, theology of mission examines the various cognate disciplines and clarifies their proximity to or distance from the center, Jesus Christ, asking whether there is a point beyond which the cognate disciplines may no longer be helpful or biblical. Theology of mission integrates who we are, what we know, and how we act in mission. It brings together our faith relationship with Jesus Christ, our spirituality, God’s presence, the church’s theological reflection throughout the centuries, a constantly new rereading of Scripture, our hermeneutic of God’s world, our sense of participation in God’s mission, and the ultimate purpose and meaning of the church and relates all these to the cognate disciplines of missiology. Theology of mission serves to question, clarify, integrate, and expand the presuppositions of the various cognate disciplines of missiology. As such, mission theology is a discipline in its own right, yet is not one of the related disciplines alongside the others, for it fulfills its function only as it interacts with all of them.

Theology of mission is integrative. When mission happens, all the various cognate disciplines occur simultaneously. So missiology must study mission not from the point of view of abstracted and separated parts, but from an integrative perspective that attempts to see the whole together. Theology of mission has to do with three arenas: (1) biblical and theological presuppositions and values are applied to (2) the ministries and mission activities of the church, set in (3) specific contexts in particular times and places.

First, theology of mission is theology because fundamentally it involves reflection about God. It seeks to understand God’s mission, his intentions and purposes, his use of human instruments in his mission, and his working through his people in his world. Thus theology of mission deals with all the traditional theological themes of systematic theology, but it does so in a way that differs from how systematic theologians have worked. The differences arise from the multidisciplinary missiological orientation of its theologizing.

In addition, because of its commitment to remain faithful to God’s intentions, perspectives, and purposes, theology of mission shows a profound concern about the relation of the Bible to mission, attempting to allow Scripture not only to provide the foundational motivations for mission, but also to question, shape, guide, and evaluate the missionary enterprise itself (see also biblical theology of mission).

Second, theology of mission is theology of. In contrast to much systematic theology, here we are dealing with an applied science. At times it looks like what some would call pastoral or practical theology, due to this applicational nature. This type of theological reflection focuses specifically on a set of particular issues—those having to do with the mission of the church in its context. Theology of mission draws its incarnational nature from the ministry of Jesus, and always happens in a specific time and place.
Theology of Mission

Such contextual analysis facilitates a better understanding of the concrete situation, an understanding that helps the church hear the cries, see the faces, understand the stories, and respond to the living needs and hopes of the persons who are an integral part of that context. Part of this theological analysis today includes the history of the way the church’s missions interfaced with that context down through history. The attitudes, actions, and events of the church’s missional actions in a context will influence subsequent mission endeavors there.

Thus some scholars who deal with the history of theology of mission may not be especially interested in the theological issues as such, but may be concerned about the effects of that mission theology on mission activity in a context. They will often examine the various pronouncements made by church and mission gatherings (Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Ecumenical, Evangelical, Pentecostal, and charismatic) and question the impact of these on missional action. The documents resulting from these discussions become part of the discipline of theology of mission.

Third, theology of mission is specially oriented toward and for mission. Reflection in this arena is found in books, journals, and other publications dealing with the theory of missiology itself. However, neither missiology nor the theology of mission can be allowed to restrict itself to reflection only. As Johannes Verkuyl stated, Missiology may never become a substitute for action and participation. God calls for participants and volunteers in his mission. In part, missiology’s goal is to become a “service station” along the way. If study does not lead to participation, whether at home or abroad, missiology has lost her humble calling. . . . Any good missiology is also a missiologia viatorum—“pilgrim missiology” (1978, 6, 18).

Theology of mission is praxeological. Theology of mission, then, must eventually emanate in biblically informed and contextually appropriate missional action. The intimate connection of reflection with action is through a process known as praxis. Although there have been a number of different meanings given to this idea, Orlando Costas’s formulation is one of the most constructive.

“Missiology,” Costas says, “is fundamentally a praxeological phenomenon. It is a critical reflection that takes place in the praxis of mission. . . . (it occurs) in the concrete missionary situation, as part of the church’s missionary obedience to and participation in God’s mission, and is itself actualized in that situation. . . . In reference to this witnessing action saturated and led by the sovereign, redemptive action of the Holy Spirit, . . . the concept of missionary praxis is used. Missiology arises as part of a witnessing engagement to the gospel in the multiple situations of life” (1976, 8).

The concept of praxis helps us understand that not only the reflection, but profoundly the action as well is part of a “theology-on-the-way” that seeks to discover how the church may participate in God’s mission in the world. The action is itself theological, and serves to inform the reflection, which in turn interprets, evaluates, critiques, and projects new understanding in transformed action in a constantly spiraling pilgrimage of missiological engagement in a context.

Because of the complexity of the inter- and multidisciplinary task that is theology of mission, mission theologians have found it helpful to focus on a specific integrating idea that serves as a hub through which to approach a rereading of Scripture. This “integrating theme” is selected on the basis of being contextually appropriate and significant, biblically relevant and fruitful, and missionally active and transformational.

Clearly we are trying to avoid bringing our own agendas to the Scripture and superimposing them on it. Rather, what is being sought is a way to bring a new set of questions to the text, questions that might help us see in the Scriptures what we had missed before. This new approach to Scripture is what David Bosch called “critical hermeneutics.”

In 1987, the Association of Professors of Mission said,

The mission theologian does biblical and systematic theology differently from the biblical scholar or dogmatician in that the mission theologian is in search of the “habitus,” the way of perceiving, the intellectual understanding coupled with spiritual insight and wisdom, which leads to seeing the signs of the presence and movement of God in history, and through his church in such a way as to be affected spiritually and motivationally and thus be committed to personal participation in that movement . . . . The center, therefore, serves as both theological content and theological process as a disciplined reflection of God’s mission in human contexts. The role of the theologian of mission is therefore to articulate and “guard” the center, while at the same time to spell out integratively the implications of the center for all the other cognate disciplines (Van Engen, 1987, 524–25).

Thus we find that theology of mission is a process of reflection and action involving a movement from the biblical text to the faith community in mission in its context.

Theology of mission is definitional. One of the most interesting, significant, yet frustrating tasks of mission theology is to assist missiology in defining the terms it uses, including a definition of "mission" itself. By the way of illustration, the following may be offered as a preliminary definition of mission

Mission is the People of God intentionally crossing barriers from Church to non-church, faith to non-faith to proclaim by word and deed the coming of the Kingdom of God in Jesus Christ, through the Church's participation in God's mission of reconciling people to God, to themselves, to each other, and to the world, and gathering them into the Church through repentance and faith in Jesus Christ by the work of the Holy Spirit with a view to the transformation of the world as a sign of the coming of the Kingdom in Jesus Christ.

Theology of mission is analytical. Theology of mission examines the theological and theoretical assumptions, meanings, and relations that permeate mission. To do this, mission theologians have found it helpful to partition the task into smaller segments. We noticed earlier that Gerald Anderson used the terms "faith, motives, message, methods, strategy, and goals." Jim Stamoolis studied Eastern Orthodox Mission Theology Today by analyzing "the historical background, the aim, the method, the motives, and the liturgy" of mission as that took place among and through the Eastern Orthodox.

Following this method, some mission theologians organize their questions around the fact that mission is Missio Dei, it is God's mission. So one finds a number of mission theologians asking about "God's mission" (missio Dei), mission as it occurs among humans and utilizes human instrumentality (missio hominum), missions as they take many forms through the endeavors of the churches (missiones ecclesiae), and mission as it draws from and impacts global human civilization (missio politica oecumenica).

So theology of mission is prescriptive as well as descriptive. It is synthetic (bringing about synthesis) and integrational. It searches for trustworthy and true perceptions concerning the church's mission based on biblical and theological reflection, seeks to interface with the appropriate missional action, and creates a new set of values and priorities that reflect as clearly as possible the ways in which the church may participate in God's mission in a specific context at a particular time.

When theology of mission is abstracted from mission practice it seems strange and can be too far removed from the concrete places and specific people that are at the heart of God's mission. Theology of mission is at its best when it is intimately involved in the heart, head, and hand (being, knowing, and doing) of the church's mission. Theology of mission is a personal, corporate, committed, profoundly transformational search for a trinitarian understanding of the ways in which the people of God may participate in the power of the Holy Spirit in God's mission in God's world for whom Jesus Christ died.

Theology of Religions. The wide range of Christian theological response to the existence of other world faiths has, for convenience if not total adequacy, been classified into three broad positions: exclusivism, inclusivism, and pluralism.

Exclusivism. The word is not being used in a personal, attitudinal, or social sense, that is, pride, superiority, and a desire to exclude others. Rather the word is theologically concerned only with the matter of where truth and salvation are to be found. It is the view that, if Jesus Christ is uniquely the truth, and the only way of salvation other faiths being true in the same way, or being ways of salvation.

Exclusivism affirms that there is one living God, the Creator, who, in response to the radical fall of humanity, has taken action to reveal himself and to save his creation through the particular historical events recorded in the Bible, namely, the history of Israel and the Gospel story of Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus was the unique and final incarnation of God in a single historical human life. He both completed God's self-revelation and achieved God's work of salvation on the cross. Through his resurrection and ascension God vindicated him as Lord and so he is rightly to be worshiped as such. Salvation is therefore to be found only in and through Jesus Christ. Adherents of other faiths, in common with all human beings, are made in the image of God and share in the benefits of General Revelation in...
Theology of Religions

Conscience and nature. But other faiths as such cannot be ways of salvation, for that is only in Christ. There is therefore a radical discontinuity between the revelation and salvation of God in Christ and the tenets and claims of other religions. Exclusivism maintains that the central claims of Christianity are true, and that where the claims of Christianity conflict with those of other religions the latter are to be rejected as false. Salvation is not to be found in the structures of other religious traditions (see also Uniqueness of Christ).

Though clearly identified with the evangelical theological tradition, exclusivism has a variety of views within it and questions to face. One major divide relates to the fate of the unevangelized—those who never in their lifetimes hear of Jesus Christ. Granted that salvation is only in Christ (the ontological necessity of Christ for salvation), is salvation also restricted to those who come to know him explicitly (the epistemological necessity of Christ)? Those who affirm that it is so restricted (labeled “restrictivists” by others) point to key texts such as John 14:6 and Acts 4:12. Others (nonrestrictivist exclusivists) are cautiously optimistic that God will save some who, while unreached by Christian evangelism, turn in some way from sin to God in repentance and faith. They point to the fact that Old Testament believers were saved but had no knowledge of the gospel of Jesus Christ in its New Testament form. Still others (advocates of “the wider hope”) affirm that through Christ God will save multitudes who had no earthly opportunity to know and trust him. They point to the “pagan saints” of the Old Testament (non-Israelites who became believers) as examples of a wide phenomenon, not exceptions, and to texts such as Revelation 7:9 as implying a very wide optimism of salvation (see The Unevangelized).

Exclusivism also has to wrestle with the extent to which it recognizes general revelation in other religions, and with the phenomenon of the actual worship of their adherents. In what sense is the living God active in the context of another faith if it includes some elements of truth that would be biblically valid, and what is the spiritual status of the prayers and devotion of human beings who have no knowledge of Christ?

Inclusivism. The one all-important point that exclusivism and inclusivism have in common is their commitment to the centrality of Jesus Christ. They are in agreement that Christ is the supreme and final revelation of God and that he is the one through whom ultimately people can and will be saved. However, whereas the exclusivist says that if Christ alone is the truth and the Savior, then that excludes all other faiths as vehicles of truth or salvation, the inclusivist argues that ultimately all truth is God’s truth, wherever it is found. So Christ, who is the Truth, must therefore include all that is true in other faiths, elements of truth which must ultimately be from and through Christ. Christ is thus in some way present and active within other faiths, though in hidden ways, but is clearly and fully known only within the Christian faith. Inclusivism speaks, therefore, of continuity (rather than the exclusivist’s discontinuity) between other faiths and Christianity, or it sees Christianity as the fulfillment of what is looked for, or hidden, or being prepared for, in other faiths.

Mainline Protestant inclusivism tends to give a high value to the existence of general revelation within other faiths, but to stop short of allowing that other religions can be salvifically effective. Roman Catholic inclusivism, however, since the work of Karl Rahner, and especially Vatican II, has been willing to affirm that the grace of God operates salvifically in other religions, but that it is grace in Christ. Those who genuinely respond to God’s grace as experienced in another religion are implicitly responding to Christ and may therefore be called “anonymous Christians.” They will be saved by Christ, but through the “sacraments” of their own religion, unless and until they are confronted with the gospel. So Christ remains definitive and normative, but salvation is somehow available through other faiths. Those who advocate inclusivism obviously want to steer between the rocks of narrowly dogmatic exclusivism (especially restrictivism), and the whirlpool of relativism and pluralism, which they equally strongly reject. They want to hold on to the uniqueness of Christ, and yet to find legitimate theological space within an understanding of God’s sovereignty for the existence of non-Christian religions.

Inclusivists wrestle with the question as to whether other religions can be means of salvation, even if ultimately salvation depends on the work of Christ. But actually, the very question itself, “Is there salvation in other religions?” is strange, when considered from a biblical point of view. It seems to take for granted, as the premise on which the question rests, that salvation is something you get through a religion. But the radical biblical affirmation is that there is salvation in no religion. Religion does not save anybody. God does. And the Bible tells the story of what God has done in history to save his whole creation, including humanity. Salvation is the achievement of God on our behalf, not the end result of religious activity on our part. It is this fundamental fact about the Christian gospel—that it is the declaration of historical events by which God has intervened in Christ to save us from our sin—which exposes the inadequacy of all other religions. There is no salvation in them, not because they have nothing in common with Christianity in their beliefs (some do), but because they do not recount these events and therefore do not put people in touch with what God has already done to save them.

Pluralism. It is important to distinguish between pluralism as an ideological or theological stance and the simple fact of the social plurality of religions in many countries. It is one thing to respond to the latter with respect, love, and tolerance; it is quite another to accept the relativist philosophy that underlies theological religious pluralism.

Both exclusivism and inclusivism wish to be “Christocentric”—to preserve the centrality of Christ himself, whether in exclusive or inclusive terms. Christ is the center and the standard (norm) for all other faiths. Pluralists advocate a “theocentric” theology of religions, which places God (theos) at the center of the religious universe, not Christ or Christianity. All human religions (including Christianity) can then be understood as valid but different culturally and historically conditioned human responses to this one “Ultimate Divine Reality.” Each response is partial and incomplete, but has its own element of truth and saving validity for those who follow it. Salvation is thus to be found in any or all faiths, including, but not confined to, Christianity. Christ and Christianity, instead of being the center of the saving and revealing work of God, “go into orbit” along with other faiths, as just one among many planetary responses to the gravitational pull of the sun of “transcendent reality” (another pluralist term) at the center. Or, to change the metaphor, the different religious names for the divine, are like the masks worn by classical actors. Each “face” may look very different, but the reality behind is single. The religious “ultimates” of the world faiths are the personae, or impersonae of the truly ultimate, which actually transcends all their partial (and mutually contradictory) insights and is “itself” beyond our knowledge (see also Religious Ultimacy).

Among the criticisms of the pluralist agenda in the theology of religions the following seem particularly serious. First, pluralism conceals an epistemological arrogance. It relativizes all the truth claims of the world faiths (not just those of Christianity) to a penultimate status while absolutizing its own stance as arbitrator. It fails to justify the epistemological grounds on which it claims sure knowledge about something (“the real”) of which all religions have no ultimate knowledge. Second, it is subject to the self-destructive weakness of all radical relativisms, in claiming absolute truth for its own claim that all truth claims are relative. Third, it renders “God” abstract and impersonal, since “he/she/it” cannot be named, defined, or characterized in terms of any of the great religious traditions. The real, as it is in itself, is not to be identified with Yahweh, Allah, Jesus, Brahman, or any other. The rich biblical personal characterization of God is thus discounted as a mask, with no ultimate truth attaching to it. Fourth, it relativizes and diminishes Jesus, rejecting the classical incarnational Christology of the church as being only confessional or functional language with no ontological referential value. Thus, fifth, it requires a mythical reading of the New Testament in order to retain a semblance of using Christian vocabulary, but without historical realism. And finally, it renders Christian worship idolatrous and Christian mission invalid, inasmuch as pluralism requires that Christians, although they may continue to revere Jesus as their own saving point of contact with God, must surrender any claim to his absolute deity, Lordship, or claim on all people.

For these reasons, although pluralists tend to preserve the vocabulary and concepts of the Christian tradition, it is highly questionable whether pluralism can be regarded as a valid option for Christian theology of religions.

Theravada Buddhism. Theravada Buddhism is one of the three main branches of Buddhism, along with Mahayana and Vajrayana. Unlike Vajrayana, the relatively homogeneous branch of Buddhism centered in Tibet (see Tibetan Buddhism), Theravada is a relatively diverse collection of traditions connected as much by geography and culture as teachings. Theravada is the main tradition of the southeast Asian countries of Sri Lanka, Burma, Thailand, Laos, and Cambodia. Mahayana is the Buddhism of China, Japan, and Korea.

The name Theravada is the movement’s self-chosen designation, meaning “the way of the elders (theras).” It has been called other things. In the first and second centuries A.D., when Mahayana Buddhism was growing in India and later China, Mahayanists called Theravadin Hinayana or the Lesser Vehicle. Mahayana, of course, means Greater Vehicle and this little bit of name-calling was the Mahayanists’ way of claiming greater depth and profundity for their teaching.

Both Theravadins and Mahayanists trace their roots back to the sixth century B.C. and the life and teachings of a man named Siddharta Gautama (566–486 B.C.) who came to be known as the Buddha or the Enlightened One. It is almost impossible to tell whether Theravada or Mahayana is prior. The best reconstruction of Theravada history begins about 110 years after the Buddha’s death when a major schism took place over the rules of discipline which the Buddha left
Theravada Buddhism

To guide the monastic community, the Sangha. One group, the Sthaviravadins (the Sanskrit variant of the Pali Theravada) favored keeping the rules of discipline static while the Mahasamgikas favored change as cultural conditions warranted. Through numerous other splits (eighteen eventual sects is the usual number given), this traditional group, the Sthaviravada, seemed to maintain an identity, and when an early Indian king Asoka (272–236 B.C.) decided to send missionaries to carry the Buddha's teachings to neighboring countries, Theravada was the variant that stuck in southeast Asia, particularly Sri Lanka and Burma.

Despite its variety, we might identify seven distinctive aspects of Theravada Buddhism:

1. Theravadin tend to emphasize the monastic life and the arahat ideal. Arahats are mostly monks, spiritually accomplished and on the way to Enlightenment, the goal of Buddhism.
2. Theravadin use Pali as their liturgical and philosophical language. Pali was probably the language of the Buddha.
3. Theravadin, more than other schools of Buddhism, emphasize the historical life events of Gautama Buddha. Like other Buddhists, they recognize that there have been many other Buddhas, but for Theravadin, Gautama, especially his life in India, is central.
4. Theravada Buddhism is located geographically in southeast Asia.
5. Theravada is distinguished by its emphasis on Pali commentaries (atthakathas) written to elucidate the many volumes of the Pali canon, the main scriptural books of the Theravada Buddhists. The commentaries were put in their final written form in Sri Lanka in the fifth century A.D. by Buddhaghosa, Theravada Buddhism’s greatest scholar and intellect.
6. Although most of the sections of the Theravada Pali canon have similar books in other Buddhist traditions, one section, the scholastic Abhidhamma Pitaka, is unique, emphasizing the signature doctrines of Theravada Buddhism, anatta (no-self) and anicca (impermanence).
7. Throughout history, most Theravada Buddhist cultures have had a distinct symbiotic relationship between monastery and monarchy. In general, southeast Asian Buddhist kings have seen themselves as supporters, protectors, and, upon occasion, purifiers of the order of the monks, the Sangha. The monks, in turn, have tended to see themselves as spiritual and sometimes political advisors to the kings.

In many ways, Theravada Buddhism occupies a similar place in the overall scheme of Buddhism as evangelical Christianity does in Christianity. Both place a heavy emphasis on a specific scriptural tradition, although both their concepts of the authority of their scriptures differ. Both place a heavy emphasis on the historicity of their founders, Gautama and Jesus. Both are missions oriented, with similar “Great Commission” charges from their founders to go and preach the dhamma/gospel. Both have a vision of each individual being on a spiritual journey to escape the shortcomings of this life in anticipation of a better state to come, and that a life of moral purity is an important foundation for taking that journey.

It is this last point, however, that most clearly illustrates some of the sharpest differences between the two paths. Theravada Buddhists do not see a god or gods as being central figures in helping the spiritual seeker. Theravada Buddhism has sometimes been called a non-theistic religion because of its insistence on the ultimate aloneness of each of us. Although the Buddha did not deny that the gods of the Hindu pantheon are helpful at certain lower levels of the journey, he was adamant that when it comes to final Enlightenment each of us must “come and see” (ehi pas-sako) for him or herself. And in the end it is an ironic journey, because the “self” that successfully “comes and sees” turns out to be an illusion, swallowed up in the oneness of Nirvana.

TERRY C. MUCK

SEE ALSO Buddhism, Mahayana Buddhism, and Tibetan Buddhism.

Third Culture Kids (TCK). A “third culture kid” (or TCK) is an individual who, having spent a significant part of the developmental years in a culture other than that of the parents, incorporates elements of his or her parents’ culture with elements from the culture of the host country to form a personal combination of cultures or “third culture.” Third culture kids are not only children of missionaries but also children of diplomatic, international business, military, and other personnel who have lived overseas.

The factors that most significantly influence the TCK’s life and worldview are the mobility and cross-cultural experience that characterize impatient with those less knowledgeable and dis-world. At the same time he or she may become that the TCK feels deeply the pain of the real guistic skills. An associated challenge is the fact arena where they often display exceptional lin-experience the challenge of personal values being ity to see differing points of view, TCKs often ex-
they do. In addition, with their exposure to dif-movably and comfortably between them, they understanding of different cultures and may move easily and comfortably between them, they are generally comfortable and cable of getting around in the world, even moving from one country to another. At the same time, however, such common tasks as writing a check or using new phone systems may seem daunting. As a result, TCKs often subjectively experience being “out-of-phase” with monocultural peers, feeling they don’t fit in.

There are other issues related to the dimensions of mobility and cross-cultural experience.
Leave-taking is one; relationships another. Because the average TCK moves eight times by the age of eighteen and may have to deal with people of many cultures, he or she often becomes quite adaptable, unshaken by change, and may be quite adept at building relationships and empathizing sensitively with others. A strong sense of independence and realistic views about loss and death are also developed. During adulthood, however, the TCK may experience a deep sense of rootlessness, a tendency to have too many relationships to manage, and difficulty planning. The pain associated with leave-taking as children often results in survival responses such as a “get close quickly, detach quickly” response in relationships, and there may be issues of unresolved grief from the many separations. Consequently, guardedness in relationships, almost automatic withdrawal from intimacy, and a flattening of emotions are common.

Because of the variety of experiences developmentally, TCKs have to deal with issues of cultural balance and skills as well as a unique personal worldview. While on the one hand they often have an understanding of different cultures and may move easily and comfortably between them, they also may experience the sense of being a “hidden immigrant”—appearing to others as if they should fit into a culture while not feeling as if they do. In addition, with their exposure to different cultural value systems and resultant ability to see differing points of view, TCKs often ex-prience the challenge of personal values being unsettled and in constant flux. The unique and expanded worldview of TCKs often leads to a desire to become involved in the international arena where they often display exceptional linguistic skills. An associated challenge is the fact that the TCK feels deeply the pain of the real world. At the same time he or she may become impatient with those less knowledgeable and discerning and may be perceived as being critical and arrogant.

DAVE WICKSTROM

SEE ALSO Missionary Children.

Bibliography. D. Pollock, The TCK Profile; R. Van Reken, Letters Never Sent; D. Walters, An Assessment of Reentry Issues of the Children of Missionaries.

Third Wave. See Pentecostal Movement.

Third World. The term, Third World, refers to those nations primarily in Africa, Asia, Latin America, and the Pacific which emerged from the colonial era after World War II. Having its origin in the commercial class of the French Reduction (third estate), the term Third World was coined first by the French intellectuals in the late 1940s and later by leaders of the nonaligned nations movement at a conference in Indonesia in 1955. Popular usage of the term has shifted from the political connotations with its emphasis on opposition to the colonial powers and the cold war nuclear threats of the first (capitalist) and second (communist) worlds, to a focus on the is-tances which are common in the Third World nations. Because the Third World represents approximately 4 billion of the world’s population (6 billion), attempts have been made to change the term to the Two Thirds World. Despite these efforts, the Third World remains a primary term of identification.

History. The emergence of the Third World may be viewed as the product of two major forces—external forces linked to the era of imperialism and internal forces linked to nationalism and Revolution (Gheddo; Isbister). The period of Western imperialism began with the explorations of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The discov ery of new lands under the thrones of Europe gave rise to a period of rapid expansion of empires and the establishment of colonial rule (see Colonialism). Along with colonial rule came the inerviable access to the resources of the colonies and the economic advantage for the “mother country.” The massive impact included the systems of education, economics, healthcare, justice, and government which were established as part of the process of colonization. Perhaps the most virulent import were the languages of the colonial empires. Although the colonial landscape changed with the Industrial Revolution, it continued unchallenged through the end of the nineteenth century with the rapid colonization of Africa and parts of Asia by the Western nations.
World War I marked the end of the era of imperialism and the foreshadowing of the period of Nationalism which would follow World War II.

Beginning with the independence of India
(1947) and China (1949), the political map began its most radical change in history. The spread of nationalist movements was fueled by the economic recovery in the West, the cold war tensions, and the social climate brought about by the formation of the United Nations. Nationalist leaders emerged from within the colonies with the momentum born of promises of a better world. While in some cases armed revolutions ensued, for the most part the nationalist movements pressured the already weakened governments of the West, resulting in the formation of newly independent nations. By the 1980s, the majority of the world had won or been granted political independence. Due in large part to the rapid political upheaval, the promises of better times have largely gone unachieved. Forces such as the vestiges of colonial structures, a global economy with advantages to the industrialized nations, unstable political climates, armed conflicts, and the population explosion contribute to a staggering array of challenges for the newly formed states of the Third World.
Third World

Third World Issues. Although the nations of the Third World represent the widest possible diversity of cultures, religions, and lifestyles, there are common issues which distinguish them from the more developed nations. The foremost issue facing the Third World is widespread Poverty (Isbister). While poverty is to some extent relative and occurs in every nation, the extreme effects of poverty are experienced to a disproportionate degree in the Third World. In an attempt to avoid overstating the gap between rich countries and the Third World, the World Bank uses a “purchasing power parity” which in its estimates of per capita income reveal that U.S. incomes vary from 3 times higher than the richer countries of the Third World to 20 times higher than the poorest countries (Isbister). Another way of understanding poverty is in absolute terms or income levels at which people are unable to afford food which is nutritionally adequate and essential non-food items. Using an absolute standard, the United Nations Development Program estimates that one-third of the Third World lives in poverty with even higher proportions in Asia (60%) and Africa (50%).

The problems which cause or result from poverty are complex; however, a number of critical issues surround the extreme poverty of the Third World. The issues of health and physical well-being are of primary concern. Diseases which are linked to the shortage of potable water and inadequate nutrition plague the Third World. While the capacity to produce food and essential non-food items varies among nations, the difficulties of distribution and generation of sustainable income to purchase available supplies are common problems of the Third World. Added to these critical issues are the challenges of establishing appropriate education, sustainable development, healthcare, adequate housing, and equitable economic growth. Along with the debt crises, these issues are shaping the agenda of the Third World and to an escalating extent that of the industrialized world.

Missiological Considerations. One of the spin-offs of the independence movements among Third World nations has been an increasing attitude among Western Christians that missions to the Third World should be from the Third World. In other words, independence for the church is akin to that of the nations. While it is true that an increased partnership must be realized, it is also true that the church in the Third World cannot address the problems alone (see Globalism). As Johannes Verkuyl put it, “interdependence is not only a necessity of life but also a calling with which we have been charged.” Interdependence demands a “vision of transformation” which includes not only the generous sharing of resources, but a sustained commitment to the concerns of both evangelism and sociopolitical involvement (Samuel). The commitment was summarized well in the theme of Lausanne II, “calling the whole Church to take the whole Gospel to the whole world.” The precarious position of the Third World raises major concerns for missiological reflection which include an ongoing commitment to “teaching them to observe” and “love your neighbor as yourself” (Matt. 22:39; 28:20).

C. Douglas McConnell

Third World Mission Boards and Societies. See NON-WESTERN MISSION BOARDS AND SOCIETIES.

Third World Women. Wherever Christianity has spread women have been deeply involved in that spread in a variety of ways. In recent discussion, the term Third World (or Two-Thirds World) has been used to describe the non-Western population. The simple truth is that throughout the history of the church, everywhere the vast majority of the women involved have been marginalized socioeconomically and culturally.

Focusing on the more recent historical context, Western women were involved in educational, medical, and social ministries, many of these among Third World women themselves. Gradually the recipients have become partners in mission, even though they often lack access to the economic resources of their Western counterparts.
Third World Women

Often separated from men in their social life, Third World women typically focused their own mission work among other women. Examples of women from indigenous churches engaged in mission include the Mar Thoma Church of India, who deployed women missionaries in 1919.

Third World women have been engaged in a wide variety of missionary endeavors. Many evangelists serve as missionaries within their own borders. Aleyamma Ommen of India, for example, traveled to different parts of the country with a band of people singing and preaching. Medical work was also started among women in India, China, and Africa, where culture forbade women from having male doctors. Medical and nursing colleges were started and women were trained as doctors and nurses to meet this need. A similar situation evolved in social work. Missionary women wrote and fought against social injustices, including widow burning, temple prostitution, foot binding, and so-called female circumcision. By the 1950s, many Third World women had taken up the responsibility to engage in this work. In the late 1800s and early 1900s, Pandita Ramabai was a pioneer in social development for women. Many of the Third World churches followed the Western example of organizing women’s auxiliaries and organizations. The Mar Thoma Church, for example, started a women’s voluntary Evangelistic Society (Sanadha Savika Sangam) in 1919. Even though women’s participation in official church leadership positions was limited, they were still vitally involved in witnessing, social work, raising funds for churches, and training women to be models in their Christian lifestyle.

Formal theological education for women in Third World settings started with the development of training centers. By the 1960s many such centers had developed into theological colleges. Though many women were trained, formal leadership positions in the church were often unobtainable. More recently, however, some of the mainline churches in India have begun ordaining women. Generally most evangelical churches have not yet followed this practice, though many of them are debating the issue.

When we look at the missiological theories applied in mission work by Third World women, we can see several gradual changes taking place. Initially their work was confined to ministry among women and children. Later, in conciliar circles, Third World women were deeply involved in theological reflection and cooperation in different evangelical and non-evangelical organizations, including the World Council of Churches (WCC), the Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians (EATWAT), various National Christian Councils, the Lausanne Movement, and the World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF).

Slowly the emphasis has been changing to focus on both men and women in mission. Women’s leadership in the churches became an important issue in the Ecumenical Movement of the 1970s, when the word “sexism” was used to describe gender discrimination. Throughout this time, Third World women maintained a strong biblical emphasis, rarely questioning the authority of the Bible. However, they were struggling to change some of the misunderstandings of the teachings of the Bible in relation to women’s leadership. Many feel that unnecessary restrictions were put on women because of these misunderstandings. Following the UN “Decade of Women” (1976–85), on Easter Day in 1988 the WCC launched a decadal emphasis on the empowerment of women to participate in the decisions which affect them. Numerous activities promoting women’s development and empowerment were organized in churches and church assemblies around the world.

Third World women have also become more actively involved among the evangelical organizations such as Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization, and the WEF. In 1980 only 9 percent of the participants were women, but by 1989 about 25 percent of the conferees at LAUSANNE CONGRESS II in Manila were women. Many of these were from the Third World and a few were involved as committee chairs and speakers, including Juliet Thomas and Sakhi Athyal. One result has been that women’s role as leaders in the churches is increasingly discussed and accepted.

In their opportunity for mission women from the Third World have come a long way. But change is still needed in many areas. While the process of change has already started, it is important to recognize the possibilities of the critical importance of women as responsive entry points to resistant people groups in evangelism and community development. In China, the house church movement has grown largely through the ministry of women. Of the fifty thousand prayer cells in Paul Cho’s church in Korea only three thousand of the leaders are men. So in many countries women’s leadership in mission is crucial. There is an urgent need to recruit, train, and support far more women if we are to reach the unreached. It is not a matter of competition between men and women, but of necessity of sharing the load together: men and women need to work together as a community of believers in the Third World for the purpose of God’s mission and the church’s commission.

Sakhi Athyal

Third World Women

from the Third World; J. Webster and E. Webster, The Church and Women in the Third-World.

Thoburn, Isabella (1840–1901). American pioneer missionary educator in India. The sister of the well known Methodist Bishop of India, James Thoburn, she was sent to India by the Women’s Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Church as one of the first single women sent out for educational work. During her thirty years in Lucknow, India, she proved to be an excellent teacher, administrator, and true friend to the students. She started a school with six Christian girls which grew to twenty-five in a month and eventually became a nine-acre complex for both boys and girls.

Convincing Indian parents about educating girls was a difficult task. One of the issues she struggled against was the caste system. She believed in educating all the caste girls and boys equally, but at the same time she wanted to respect the Indian culture. Her success in establishing a girls school for elementary and secondary education led her to attempt to start college education for women. She wrote articles and spoke out for their cause. In 1887 she opened a Christian College for women in Lucknow, India. That college produced many women leaders and scholars.

Thoburn was a deaconess missionary. Her mission theory came from the ideology of “women’s work for women,” based on the idea that education was the key for the liberation of women around the world. She also believed in creating the best leadership for women in India, and in this she succeeded.

Thoburn, James Mills (1836–1922). American Methodist bishop and missionary in India, Myanmar, and Singapore. Thoburn has been called “Methodism’s missionary expansionist par excellence.” He was raised in Ohio and later attended Allegheny College in western Pennsylvania. Coming to personal faith in Christ as a teen, he soon heard a distinct call from the Lord to “go preach my gospel.” Within three years he was on his way to North India. After an initial tour, Thoburn took the advice of fellow-missionary William Taylor and transferred to the teeming city of Calcutta, where he had great success in revival/evangelistic meetings.

From Calcutta, Thoburn moved to Burma and ministered to an Anglo-Burmese community in Rangoon. Within a few years he transferred to Singapore and successfully planted a passion for missions in the English-speaking church of that city. Within fifteen years Methodist work began in Sarawak, Sumatra, Java, the Philippines, and the Malay Peninsula. Thoburn’s insistence of self-government and self-support in these fledgling communities did much to assure their internal strength and durability. Thoburn’s call for resident bishops in foreign fields initially caused a sensation, yet at length became the standard, quite fruitful approach of Methodist missions worldwide.

Thomas, Madathilparampil Mammen (1916–96). Indian theologian, thinker, and ecumenical leader. Born in Kerala, India, in 1916, he gave leadership to many local, national and international organizations such as the World Student Christian Federation, East Asia Christian Council, Christian Institute for the Study of Religion and Society (1962–76), and World Council of Churches (of which he was the Moderator 1968–75). He also served as the governor of the State of Nagaland.

He taught as a visiting professor in numerous centers of learning such as Union Theological Seminary (New York), Princeton, Perkins School of Theology, the Selley Oaks Colleges, and the University of Hamburg. During the last years of his life until his death in 1996 he wrote prolifically, and encouraged several forums dealing with human rights. It is estimated that the articles, book reviews, booklets, and books he wrote number over 1,500. The scores of books he wrote include The Acknowledged Christ of the Indian Renaissance, The Christian Response to Asian Revolution, Salvation and Humanism, and My Ecumenical Journey. His approach was to use the rich values in different ideologies such as Marxist thought, Gandhi’s teachings, and Hindu spirituality for christocentric action and reflection. This may be termed “Christ-centered syncretism” or “spirituality for combat.”

According to him in Christ only we find the ideal humanness, in his death limitless love, and in his lordship the unity of all humankind. The church’s mission is to see the presence of Christ and his work in all peoples’ search for full humanity in their God-given liberty and freedom.

Bibliography. J. MICHAEL CONNOR

Thompson, Elizabeth Maria Bowen (1794–1869). English missionary to Lebanon. Born in England and raised in a Christian home, Elizabeth Bowen came to Christ as a child. Called early to the mission field, she joined the Syro-Egyptian Mission. While in Syria she met and married James Thompson, a medical doctor.

From early on Bowen devoted her energies to opening schools and teaching women who longed for access to education. This work was cut short when her husband offered his medical services during the Crimean War. He came down with malignant fever shortly after their arrival, and soon died. After his death, Bowen returned to England.

In 1860 she joined the efforts of the Syrian Temporal Relief Fund, which helped Maronite Christian widows who escaped to Beirut after Syrian persecution. Her desire for a more hands-on ministry led her to Beirut, where she opened up her home to the widows and taught them basic skills that enabled them to support themselves and their children.

Her ministry expanded dramatically. Within three months, five schools were operating. Invitations began to come to open schools in other villages. Thompson traveled throughout the country, opening and staffing new schools. By 1864 a total of eighteen schools were founded. She dedicated the rest of her life to ministering to those decimated by war, opening schools for the disabled as well as the widows.

Thompson, Muriwhenua (1930–92). New Zealand evangelist. Thompson was born in Marama in northern New Zealand. While his own hopes centered on playing in a band, his mother’s dream of him working as a member of the clergy led her to enroll him for boarding at the United Maori Mission while he attended school in Auckland. It was there that the influence of missionary Charlie Bennett played a crucial role in his coming to Christ.

Born with a heart problem, Thompson was often bedridden. After coming to Christ, he used those times to read about evangelists and preachers. Increasingly influenced through their lives to follow the path of an evangelist, he eventually joined Open Air Campaigners, a group promoting open-air evangelism and giving Thompson freedom to express his personality.

For the next several decades, Thompson’s fiery preaching was heard throughout New Zealand. He was instrumental in kindling a revival in the Solomon Islands during a tour in 1970. On his return to New Zealand he was the chief speaker for the Marches for Jesus held in twelve major cities from 1972 on.

Throughout the years he also played a key mediatorial role between Maori activists and European conservatives, always hoping for reconciliation and redressing of grievances over issues of land, politics, and power.

Bibliography. D. Stewart, AFC, pp. 200–204.

Thompson, Thomas (1708–73). English pioneer missionary to America and Ghana. In 1745 Thompson left a promising position as fellow and dean of Christ’s College, Cambridge, to become a missionary under the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL (SPG) to New Jersey in America. There he came in contact with slaves and this inspired in him a desire to take the gospel to Africans in West Africa. The SPG agreed to send him and Thompson arrived in what is today Ghana in 1752 as the first Anglican missionary to any part of Africa. Due to ill health, Thompson was able to stay in Africa less than five years and he returned to England in 1756.

During his brief time in Africa he engaged in evangelism and teaching and baptized a number of African converts. Three converts, African boys under the age of twelve, were sent to England for further education. Two died but one, Philip Quaque, survived and was ordained in 1765 as the first African (and the first non-European since the Reformation) to receive Holy Orders in the Church of England. Quaque in turn returned to the Gold Coast under the SPG, where he served as a missionary until his death in 1816.

Bibliography. T. Thompson, An Account of Two Missionary Voyages.

Thomson, James “Diego” (1788–1854). Innovative Scottish pioneer missionary to Latin America. Born in Scotland, Thomson was one of the first Protestant missionaries to Latin America, arriving in Argentina in 1818 as an agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society. He also represented the Lancastrian Educational Society, which promoted schools in which older students helped teach the younger ones and the Bible was the primary textbook. The liberal political climate in the newly independent South American countries and discreditation of conservative Catholic clergy from Spain opened the door for amazing success. Thomson established some one hundred Lancastrian schools in Buenos Aires alone and was made an honorary citizen of Argentina and of Chile, where he was invited by the government in 1821. In 1822 he went to Peru at the request of the Liberator, San Martin, and then to Ecuador, distributing Bibles everywhere. In Colombia he founded a national Bible Society whose directors included ten Catholic clergy. Sadly, a conservative political reaction and Vatican pressure undid most of Thomson’s work in South America, although seeds remained. In Thomson, James “Diego”

1827 Thomson was sent by the Bible Society to Mexico, and later worked in the Caribbean. After another attempt in Mexico in 1842, he spent the rest of his ministry in the evangelization of Spain.

Stephen Sywulka

Three-Self Movement (China). After the People’s Republic of China (PRC) was established (1949), a group of 40 Chinese Christian leaders met in Beijing in July 1950 to draft a manifesto calling for the end of all Chinese church ties with Western denominations and mission agencies. A year later (April 1951) about 150 representatives of China’s larger denominations met in Beijing and formed the Chinese Christian Three-Self Reform Committee. The designation “Three-Self” was taken from Rufus Anderson’s definition of the aim of missions as “the planting of churches which would be self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating” (see Indigenous Churches). This committee was charged to replace the National Christian Council (formed in 1922) as the voice of Chinese Protestantism, since the council’s “cultural imperialism” (Western ties) and theological liberalism (conservative churches refused to join) were regarded as unsuited to the new era. In 1954, with the official endorsement of the government the committee formed the Chinese Christian Three-Self Patriotic movement (TSPM) to represent Chinese Protestantism before the PRC authorities. By 1958 this organization had established branches in every province under the direct control of the national Religious Affairs Bureau. Separate Protestant denominations ceased altogether, and soon almost all churches in China closed down.

Then followed the Cultural Revolution; madness overtook the nation, and Christians suffered unbelievably. Fortunately, the coming of Deng Xiaoping to national leadership and his stress on “New Realism” eventually brought political relaxation. The TSPM reappeared and began to encourage and oversee the reopening of churches along with the restoration of their properties. By 1990 more than 6,000 churches were functioning, and over 15,000 other meeting points were registered for religious use. At least fourteen TSPM seminaries reopened and renewed former theological liberalism (conservative churches refused to join) were regarded as unsuited to the new era. In 1954, with the official endorsement of the government the committee formed the Chinese Christian Three-Self Reform Committee. The designation “Three-Self” was taken from Rufus Anderson’s definition of the aim of missions as “the planting of churches which would be self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating” (see Indigenous Churches). This committee was charged to replace the National Christian Council (formed in 1922) as the voice of Chinese Protestantism, since the council’s “cultural imperialism” (Western ties) and theological liberalism (conservative churches refused to join) were regarded as unsuited to the new era. In 1954, with the official endorsement of the government the committee formed the Chinese Christian Three-Self Patriotic movement (TSPM) to represent Chinese Protestantism before the PRC authorities. By 1958 this organization had established branches in every province under the direct control of the national Religious Affairs Bureau. Separate Protestant denominations ceased altogether, and soon almost all churches in China closed down.

Then followed the Cultural Revolution; madness overtook the nation, and Christians suffered unbelievably. Fortunately, the coming of Deng Xiaoping to national leadership and his stress on “New Realism” eventually brought political relaxation. The TSPM reappeared and began to encourage and oversee the reopening of churches along with the restoration of their properties. By 1990 more than 6,000 churches were functioning, and over 15,000 other meeting points were registered for religious use. At least fourteen TSPM seminaries reopened and renewed former theological liberalism (conservative churches refused to join) were regarded as unsuited to the new era. In 1954, with the official endorsement of the government the committee formed the Chinese Christian Three-Self Reform Committee. The designation “Three-Self” was taken from Rufus Anderson’s definition of the aim of missions as “the planting of churches which would be self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating” (see Indigenous Churches). This committee was charged to replace the National Christian Council (formed in 1922) as the voice of Chinese Protestantism, since the council’s “cultural imperialism” (Western ties) and theological liberalism (conservative churches refused to join) were regarded as unsuited to the new era. In 1954, with the official endorsement of the government the committee formed the Chinese Christian Three-Self Patriotic movement (TSPM) to represent Chinese Protestantism before the PRC authorities. By 1958 this organization had established branches in every province under the direct control of the national Religious Affairs Bureau. Separate Protestant denominations ceased altogether, and soon almost all churches in China closed down.

Then followed the Cultural Revolution; madness overtook the nation, and Christians suffered unbelievably. Fortunately, the coming of Deng Xiaoping to national leadership and his stress on “New Realism” eventually brought political relaxation. The TSPM reappeared and began to encourage and oversee the reopening of churches along with the restoration of their properties. By 1990 more than 6,000 churches were functioning, and over 15,000 other meeting points were registered for religious use. At least fourteen TSPM seminaries reopened and renewed former theological liberalism (conservative churches refused to join) were regarded as unsuited to the new era. In 1954, with the official endorsement of the government the committee formed the Chinese Christian Three-Self Reform Committee. The designation “Three-Self” was taken from Rufus Anderson’s definition of the aim of missions as “the planting of churches which would be self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating” (see Indigenous Churches). This committee was charged to replace the National Christian Council (formed in 1922) as the voice of Chinese Protestantism, since the council’s “cultural imperialism” (Western ties) and theological liberalism (conservative churches refused to join) were regarded as unsuited to the new era. In 1954, with the official endorsement of the government the committee formed the Chinese Christian Three-Self Patriotic movement (TSPM) to represent Chinese Protestantism before the PRC authorities. By 1958 this organization had established branches in every province under the direct control of the national Religious Affairs Bureau. Separate Protestant denominations ceased altogether, and soon almost all churches in China closed down.

Tilak, Narayan Vaman (1862–1919). Indian poet, hymn writer, and contextualizer. Narayan Vaman Tilak was born in a Brahmin family in 1862 in a village in what is now Maharashtra in western India. His mother and her father introduced him from infancy to the devotional (bhakti) piety of popular Hinduism. He was a gifted writer who is acknowledged as one of three poets responsible for a rebirth of Marathi poetry at the turn of the twentieth century.

Tilak was baptized in 1895 and his gifts were immediately employed for Christ; the many hymns he composed continue in wide use wherever Marathi is spoken. Some ten years after his baptism he intentionally adopted the poetic style (and even religious content to a large extent) of the Hindu bhakti poets, adding immensely to the power of his lyrics. He performed kirtans (recitation/song performances in traditional Hindu style) to present Christ appropriately to Hindus. He is most widely quoted for his claim to have come to Christ over Tukaram’s bridge, Tukaram being generally acknowledged as the greatest of the medieval Marathi bhakti poets.

In the two years prior to his death, Tilak struggled toward a truly fresh expression of Christian faith that would impact the Hindu world. He concluded that he was called to be a Tukaram and a St. Paul combined in one, and began a brotherhood of both baptized and unbaptized disciples of Christ. His early death ended this striking effort, one of the few attempts in Protestant mission history to respond seriously to the demands of resistant Hindu contexts.

H. L. Richard

Ting, Li-Mei (c. 1875–1937). Chinese evangelist and missions mobilizer. Born in Shandong province, Ting was deeply affected by the Boxer Uprising of 1900. He preached to students in China, challenging them to devote their lives to full-time ministry. In 1909, more than one hundred students responded during a revival in Shandong province. In 1910 the Chinese Student Volunteer Movement was formed, with guidance from the YMCA Student Department. Ting resigned from his pastorate to give leadership to the movement. In twelve years 1,570 enlisted, 530 for full-time ministry. He is remembered for his insights into the Scriptures, intensive zeal for evangelism, and compelling presentation of China’s need for educated pastors.

SAMUEL LING

Tippett, Alan R. (1911–88). Australian missiologist and missionary to Fiji. Tippett, the son of a Wesleyan pastor, spent his childhood in Victoria, Australia. After studies at Queen's College of Melbourne University, Tippett was ordained in the Methodist Church and with his wife, Edna, served in rural Victoria. The Tippetts were appointed to Fiji in 1941, where they served for twenty years. Tippett held many positions distinguishing himself as a pastor, church leader, and educator. Tippett's commitment to the Fijians led him to learn the local language, giving his first sermon in Fijian some two months after his arrival, and to regularly minister in the villages. During his last furlough from Fiji, Tippett pursued an M.A. from the American University in Washington, D.C. Tippett’s early writings caught the attention of Donald McGavran, who invited Tippett to join him at the newly founded Institute of Church Growth in Oregon in 1961. Tippett took at the Institute and pursued a Ph.D. in anthropology at the University of Oregon. In 1965 he joined McGavran in establishing the School of World Mission at Fuller Theological Seminary. During the following twelve years, Tippett greatly influenced missiology and church growth through his interdisciplinary approach in teaching and writing. Tippett's scholarly contributions included his role as the founding editor of the journal, Missiology. Tippett retired in 1977 and returned to Canberra, Australia, where he continued to be influential through his writings.

DOUGLAS McCONNELL

Tithe, Tithing. Tithe (the giving of one-tenth of one’s income) was an Old Testament ordinance designed by God primarily for the maintenance of the temple service (Deut. 12:2–7; 17–19; 14:22–29) and for charitable purposes to support widows, orphans, aliens, and the Levites (those who had inherited no property in Israel) (Deut. 26:12). It was an ancient custom (Abraham had paid tithes to Melchizedek; Gen. 14:20) and the underlying principle was that God owned everything and had given us of his bounty. In recognition of that, we should return something to him to be used for the purposes of ministry. In the New Testament, except for one casual reference to Abraham (Heb. 7:2), tithing is mentioned only critically, and that by Jesus, because tithing had become a source of spiritual pride and abuse among the religious legalists of his day. Complex regulations were in the process of being developed regarding the tithing of virtually everything, rules that were later codified in the Mishnah. Jesus points out that such meticulous calculation was hypocritical when used as a cloak to cover neglect of what really mattered—“the weightier matters of the law, justice, mercy and faithfulness” (Matt. 23:23; Luke 11:42). The Old Testament prophets also recognized that following the letter of the tithing laws was meaningless apart from a sincere heart committed to the Lord (Amos 4:4). The self-righteous Pharisee mentioned by Jesus in his parable, who included tithing as one of his noblest virtues, epitomized this attitude (Luke 18:9–14).

Although tithing was open to abuse, the fundamental principle that God’s people should support the ministry is maintained in the New Testament. Jesus accepted financial support for his ministry from those who followed him (Luke 8:1–3) and even maintained a surplus, necessitating a treasurer (John 13:29), the money being used for charitable purposes. Jesus was operating on the principle that was later taken up by the early church that “the worker is worth his keep” (Matt. 10:9–10) and should therefore not need to make excessive provision for himself because the ministry should be supported by those who are able to provide. This became the rule laid down by the apostle Paul, one that he traces directly back to Jesus, that “those who preach the gospel should make their living from the gospel” (1 Cor. 9:14). Paul sees it as a privilege that we can share in the work of the ministry by giving, and he uses Jesus as an example—he was rich and became poor for us, so that we through his poverty might become rich (2 Cor. 8:1–15). So Paul gratefully received gifts for his ministry (Phil. 4:14–18) and accepted contributions for the needs of others (Rom. 16:25–27), but he also worked with his own hands (as a tentmaker) to provide for himself (Acts 18:3; 1 Cor. 4:12). He had learned through this to trust the Lord who can supply all our needs according to his riches in glory through Christ Jesus (Phil. 4:19).

The New Testament teaches that everything belongs to God and we owe everything to him. We are to engage in honorable work, support our families, cheerfully support the ministry from our means, give as we are able, and more if necessary, counting it a privilege to participate in the...
Tithe, Tithing

work of God in this way. If God leads us to give a tithe of our income to such work, that would certainly be acceptable to him. If God should lead us to give in other ways and according to other formulas, that would also be an acceptable procedure. In the end we should know that we brought nothing into this world and we can take nothing out (1 Tim. 5:7), that an inordinate grasping of our money brings nothing but trouble (1 Tim. 4:10), and we should be building up treasures in heaven, not on earth, by the way we handle our finances.

WALTER A. ELWELL

SEE ALSO Stewardship.

Togo (Est. 2000 pop.: 4,818,000; 56,785 sq. km [21,925 sq. mi.]). Togo is a small country located in West Africa along the Gulf of Guinea between Benin and Ghana. It has a 32-mile (56 kilometers) coastline on the Atlantic Ocean and extends 320 miles (540 kilometers) inland. Its main ethnic groups include the Ewe, Mina, and Kabye. The introduction of Christianity to the area is directly related to the presence of Europeans. The Portuguese came in the late fifteenth century and by the nineteenth century the coast area was competed over mainly by the French, British, and Germans who wanted the area’s trade especially in slaves. In 1884 the Germans claimed a protectorate over the territory through a treaty with a village chief. The Germans lost this colony in World War I when it was divided among the British and French. In 1957 the British section was joined with Ghana and the French Togo became an independent state in 1960.

While Catholic mission work along the coast began early, a permanent chapel in the area was not established until 1835, primarily for Brazilian families who had returned. This work was led by the Sacred Heart of Mary headquartered in Gabon. The Catholic community was only firmly established when the Society of the Divine Word assumed responsibility in 1892 through the end of German colonial rule. Togo was made a separate vicariate in 1914. Evangelism in the north was slow and not encouraged by the colonial governments. In fact, missions was prohibited in the north until 1912 because of local opposition and a Muslim presence. After WW II the Catholic community grew rapidly and presently is the largest church in Togo.

Protestant work began in Togo at an early date. The Moravian Brothers under Count Nikolaus von Zinzendorf’s leadership sponsored a number of early missionary efforts to Africa. Especially prominent was Jacob Proffen, son of a Danish soldier and African princess, who began to evangelize the area around Togo from 1737 to 1769, including educating local children despite opposition from European officials.

The Bremen Missionary Society (Norddeutsche Missiongesellschaft) led the first sustained Protestant evangelizing effort beginning in the 1850s and later joined by the Basel Mission. They were very successful in creating a Protestant community in the south, but were forced to leave at the end of German rule.

As a result of the expulsion of German missions in WW I, the Protestant churches in Togo eventually created an autonomous church, later known as the Eglise Evangelique du Togo, under indigenous leadership. This church has been active in evangelizing and in education and is one of the major indigenous churches in West Africa and the largest Protestant church in Togo today. The Methodist Church is the oldest major Protestant church in Togo today. Its founding goes back to the evangelization of Africans by Thomas Birch Freeman and Thomas Joseph Marshall in the mid-nineteenth century. In the twentieth century it lost many members to the Prophet Harrist movement, but continues to be a major religious presence in the coastal areas.

The Assemblies of God have had the most active Protestant work in the north beginning after WW II. In the 1970s the Togo government became less hospitable to religious groups and in 1978 limited recognition to Muslims, Catholics, and five Protestant churches. In 1990 greater religious freedom was granted to other churches and missions.

CHUCK WEBER

Tokelau (Est. 2000 pop.: 2,000; 10 sq. km [4 sq. mi.]). Three coral atolls, Fakaofo, Nukunonu, and Atafu, make up Tokelau, a non-self-governing territory under New Zealand, located north of Samoa between 8 and 10 degrees south of the equator in the central Pacific. Seventy percent of the population of two thousand are members of the Congregational Christian Church (formerly LMS), and 25 percent Roman Catholics.

ALLAN K. DAVIDSON

SEE ALSO Polynesia.

Bibliography. A. Hooper and J. Huntsman, eds.; Matagi Tokelau: History and Traditions of Tokelau.

Tonga (Est. 2000 pop.: 102,000; 747 sq. km [288 sq.mi.]). The Kingdom of Tonga comprises three major groups and many smaller islands in the central south Pacific, east of Fiji. The majority of the population of 102,000 belong to one of the four Methodist churches with the Free Wesleyan Church the largest and most dominant. Roman Catholics and Mormons each have fifteen percent of the population and Seventh-Day Adventists five and one half percent.

Allan K. Davidson

See also Polynesia.

Torrey, Reuben Archer (1856–1928). American evangelist and educator. Born in New Jersey, he graduated from Yale College and Yale Divinity School, and later studied at German universities in Leipzig and Erlangen. He was ordained to the ministry in the Congregational Church in 1883 and served churches in Ohio and Minnesota. In 1889, D. L. Moody named him superintendent of the Chicago Evangelization Society (now Moody Bible Institute), a position he held until 1908. From 1894 to 1906, he also served as pastor of the Chicago Avenue Church (later renamed Moody Memorial Church). He traveled worldwide from 1902 to 1906, carrying out evangelistic crusades throughout Canada, Europe, Asia, Australia, and New Zealand, as well as in major cities in the United States. He founded the Montrose (Pennsylvania) Bible Conference in 1908. From 1912 to 1924, he served as dean of the Bible Institute of Los Angeles (BIOLA). He also served as pastor of the Church of the Open Door in Los Angeles from 1915 to 1924. He wrote over forty books, including How to Work for Christ (1901) and The Person and Work of the Holy Spirit (1910). He also wrote many articles for The Fundamentals (1910–15), a work that mirrored Torrey’s conservative theological beliefs.

Timothy K. Breughler

Totalitarianism. “Totalitarian” refers to “...a system of government which tolerates only one political party to which all other institutions are subordinate and generally demand total subservience of the individual to the state” (Oxford English Dictionary, 2nd ed.). Possoney quotes Gurian’s definition as “the defication of a power system—the power system directed by that group which came into being as its creator and claims to act as its realizer.” When applied to Christian missions, it points to the life of the church and its expanding/growing movement being realized under and in spite of oppressive political and religious systems. The related term, “authoritarian,” also supports complete submission to authority, perhaps without some of the strongly pejorative values of totalitarianism.

Throughout biblical and church history, God’s people have been forced to grapple with life under totalitarian regimes. The Old Testament provides a catalogue of diverse conditions: under the Egyptian oppression, the young nation of Israel under various shorter-lived oppressive regimes of closer neighbors, the destructive/transforming captivities to Assyria and Babylon, and the later servitude under the Roman Empire. Christ emerges to minister in the context of Roman imperial totalitarianism, the Great Commission is given to the early church very familiar with political and religious oppression. Throughout church history, God’s global people have found peace and prosperity an uncommon commodity, with the reality being more a context of poverty, weakness, violence, and oppression.

A contemporary typology of totalitarian regimes offers two major categories with their own subsets and variants: (1) secular state totalitarianism (Marxist, tribal, extreme nationalistic); (2) theocratic state totalitarianism and other religious totalitarianisms (Islamic, Hindu, Buddhist, Roman Catholic, Orthodox, and even Protestant). The subtle Western spirit of “political correctness” is nurtured by a ideological/cultural totalitarian virus.

Contemporary mission and church history finds the church engaging a spectrum of oppositions as it strives to exist and thrive in diverse political and religious contexts. Following the collapse of Russian and European Marxism, an unwarranted euphoria swept the world, and idealists heralded a new era of global peace, justice, and democracy. That did not happen, and today nearly 120 nations restrict, in part or totally, open church life or access to foreign missions. Totalitarianism is inherently structured into the heart of humanity individually and collectively as well as in all created political and religious systems. One of the prime reasons we still have so many unreached nations and people groups is simply because they are difficult to reach—and the difficulty is often directly related to the specter (and spectrum) of totalitarianism found in these regions.

William David Taylor

See also Church and State.

Totem, Totemism

Totem, Totemism. Totemism is a culturally constructed system of identifying kin groups by postulating a special relationship between human beings and nature, whereby each kin group in a society takes the name of an animal or plant species. Such an identification may lead to sympathetic relationships between human beings and their corresponding totems, which may mean that human beings are prohibited from killing or eating an animal or plant that bears their own name.

Totemic representations serve, among other things, to legitimate social groupings, explain certain behavioral patterns, support exogamous marriage practices, and establish an orderly system for classifying humanity and nature. The term “totem” is derived from the North American Ojibwa word ototeman, which was used to designate the various clans including Eagle, Reindeer, Otter, Bear, Buffalo, Beaver, and Catfish. The practice of naming kinship groups in this manner has been recorded in North American cultures, among the Australian Aborigines, and globally, where it may be found in various adaptations.

Totemism has been one of the most abused cultural concepts in anthropology. Anthropologists in the nineteenth century interpreted totemism from a cultural evolutionary perspective and identified the concept of totemism as an early stage in the evolution of religious belief. Durkheim, who has become famous for his argument that God and religion are the product of culture, made totemism a key element in his argument, focusing particularly on the totemic practices of the Australian Aborigines, who it was believed “had the most primitive and simple religion which it is possible to find.”

Sigmund Freud added to the confusion regarding the true nature of totemism by fantasizing that the totem animal is in reality a substitute for the father and that morality, religion, and family concepts find their origins in this primitive concept. All this, in spite of dubious data and the lack of historical evidence.

Studies in totemism continue to attract the interest of anthropologists from various theoretical perspectives, including structuralists following the lead of Levi-Strauss, and cultural materialists following Marvin Harris, as they seek to both interpret the cultural significance of totemism and to reinforce their own theoretical perspectives.

Inasmuch as totemism has social, epistemological, ecological, and religious implications, sensitive missiologists need to be aware of the role totemism plays in forming the self-identity, social structure, and perceptions of the world of a given people.

“Uncle Cam” Townsend was born in southern California. He worked tirelessly to see the Bible translated into minority languages. He founded the Summer Institute of Linguistics (1936), the Wycliffe Bible Translators (1942), and JAARS (1948).

Townsend went to Guatemala in 1917 to sell Spanish-language Bibles. In 1919 he was challenged by the fact that the Indian population did not understand Spanish well enough to benefit from the Spanish translation of the Bible. With his wife, Elvira, he learned the complex Cakchiquel language. By 1931 the Cakchiquel New Testament was completed.

When Townsend returned to the United States, he decided to train others to translate Scriptures for indigenous groups of Latin America. In 1934 Townsend taught two students at what he called “Camp Wycliffe.” Townsend founded the Summer Institute of Linguistics in 1936 and the Wycliffe Bible Translators in 1942. In 1944 Townsend’s first wife died; he married Elaine Mielke in 1946.

Townsend was convinced that the heart language was the most effective tool for evangelism. He emphasized the use of linguistics and modern technologies such as airplanes and radios. He also promoted a nonsectarian strategy of service to all.

Peter James Silzer

Training of Missionaries. Jesus and Paul placed high priority on training people for ministry (Matt. 4:19; 2 Tim. 2:2) with the goal of producing effective workers with servant hearts capable of expanding Jesus Christ’s rightful reign over his creation, leaving future generations a legacy to emulate. Training curriculum includes the “what,” “who,” “where,” “when,” “why,” and “how” in praxis.

Preferred cross-cultural training begins with conceptualizing the product. What will it take to accomplish the end goal? This calls for a ministry profile, that is, a comprehensive picture that addresses long-term training needs from the perspectives of character, commitment, competence, and culture.
Transcendence of God

Just as Jesus and Paul placed great emphasis on character, so must the trainees’ profile. How have the trainees’ spiritual pilgrimages prepared them for cross-cultural ministry? What scaffolds exist? What gaps remain? Trainers will also want to know the trainees’ level of commitment to God, the ministry team, and the task. Do track records demonstrate staying power? What must be done to improve these? Competency addresses the trainees’ needs in relation to exegeting and communicating Scripture, the use of spiritual gifts, cross-cultural tools to exegete the community, skills in team development, conflict resolution, planning and problem solving, support maintenance, ministry, and contextualization. Culture refers to the trainees’ grasp of the target culture, mental, emotional, and physical adjustment, flexibility, and empowerment. Such a profile discerns the gaps between the trainees’ present state and the training path trainees must traverse to minister competently cross-culturally.

Profile-based training can take place through three forms of education: formal, nonformal, and informal. Formal education tends to take place in designated locations, be expert-centered and sequenced, focuses on individual achievement, covers topics broadly and in depth, and takes extended amounts of time, making it costly. Nonformal education tends to be held in locations of convenience, be participatory in nature, addresses specific topics in depth, focuses on individual or group improvement, and tends to be short in duration, making it more affordable. Informal education happens any time, any place, without cost, as people dialogue about a host of personal or ministry topics. Wise trainees will take advantage of the distinctives that each educational mode offers.

Cross-cultural training should reflect much more than the acquisition of cognitive knowledge. Whenever possible, it should be field-based, mentor-intensive, and team-oriented; require immediate application; and include constructive feedback that addresses the cognitive, affective, and behavioral domains.

Like much Bible training, most receive their missionary training piecemeal. A little theology here, a little character development there; a little experience here, a little cross-cultural communication there; a little evangelism here, a little follow-up there; a little prayer here, a little spiritual warfare there. A more systemic profile-based training model geared to the whole family is needed to counteract such fragmented, individualized training. Such a model will address training long term, covering pre-field, on-field, and post-field (furloughs) training. This training model recognizes the need for ministry-long training that addresses character, commitment, competence, and culture. Such comprehensive training will require international partnerships among assemblies, agencies, and academics.

Profile-based training calls for evaluation benchmarks. Such evaluation helps ensure that trainees continue to lessen the gap between inadequate and adequate training.

Effective cross-cultural workers trained throughout ministry will seek to exemplify high Christian morals in word and deed, all in a contextual manner. They will resist the temptation to import materials and methods that cannot be reproduced readily by the hearers/readers. Rather they will seek to empower responsibly the new community of faith, remembering Jesus’ words: “anyone who has faith in me will do even greater things than these” (John 14:12).

Tom A. Steffen

Tranquebar Mission. See Danish-Halle Mission.
Transcendence of God

mission of the transcendent God left him speechless before the glory of one who was “high and lofty” (Isa. 6:1). In Isaiah we are also reminded that God is so completely different and other that he cannot be compared with anything in the created order. “To whom then will you compare me, or who is my equal? says the Holy One.”

The danger in both worship and mission is the temptation to control God or confine God to ideas or spaces. An appreciation of God’s transcendence sustains humility and frees us from the pettiness of idolatry. Christian worship depends on symbols and words, but always with a recognition that nothing we say or see can ever fully contain all of God. In mission we proclaim God through words, through analogies and pictures, but always recognizing that these point to a reality that cannot be contained by human language.

The confidence of Christian mission is that deep within every human heart there is a longing for transcendence, a recognition in each conscience that there is One who is wholly other, who cannot be constrained by things or explained by words. And mission attempts to draw men and women to the transcendent God who is known through immanence of the Incarnation in men and women to the transcendent God who cannot be constrained by things or explained by words. In mission we proclaim God through words, through analogies and pictures, but always recognizing that these point to a reality that cannot be contained by human language.

The biblical basis for transformational development is Colossians 1:15–20. This passage has three key points. First, Christ is supreme in all of creation. Development that is transformational points toward the supremacy of Christ, and affirms that the development activities that improve human welfare bear witness to the character and activity of God through Christ.

Second, God reconciles the seen and unseen elements of creation to himself through Christ. This reconciliation is critically important to transformational development. The Greek term in the passage, apokatallasso, meaning to reconcile, is a unique expression of katallasso, the common word meaning to reconcile. The apostle Paul seems to have coined apokatallasso to communicate a comprehensive view of reconciliation, particularly things that might not otherwise be reconciled. He used the term on two occasions. On one occasion, Paul used it to affirm that God fosters a relationship with the entire creation. God reconciles the seen and unseen elements of creation to himself through Christ (Col. 1:20), affecting every area of life.

Third, Peace is the result of God’s reconciling work through Christ. Peace, meaning a sense of harmony in creation, results when communities of people realize that they, through the empowering of God, can meet their physical, social, emotional, and spiritual needs. By integrating and addressing these needs, transformational development affirms that God’s reconciling work through Christ brings the fullness of peace to a fallen creation.

Bruce Bradshaw

Bibliography. B. Bradshaw, Bridging the Gap: Evangelism, Development and Shalom; P. G. Hiebert, Anthropological Reflections on Missiological Issues; R. Sider, One Sided Christianity?

Translatability. A concept introduced and explored by Lamin Sanneh, the notion of translatability indicates the process by which the Christian message shows its capacity to enter each cultural idiom and commence there a challenging and enduring dialogue. This deepens the notion of translation to something more than merely substituting words or grammar from one language for words and structures from another.
It suggests that there is something inherent in the Christian faith, evident from the New Testament onwards, that renders it compatible with all cultures. The genius of the Christian religion is its ability "to adopt each culture as its natural destination and as a necessity of its life." By entering the vernacular of each culture, the gospel provides the resources for self-realization and cultural fulfillment on the one hand, and it promotes the possibility of change on the other.

Translatability has two important implications. One consequence is that every culture is relativized. None may be justifiably absolutized as the final form of Christian faith and life. The missionary church has no monopoly on the form of faith required in the receptor culture, just as the early Judaic church could make no claim upon Gentiles that they be circumcised. The other consequence is that every culture is revitalized by its hearing of the gospel in its vernacular. It is destigmatized. It is treated not as inferior or untouchable but as the proper instrument for the expression of the divine message.

GEORGE R. HUNSBERGER

Translation. Transmission of a message from one language to another whether in written or oral (interpretation) form. Nida and Taber define translation as “reproducing in the receptor language the closest natural equivalent of the source language message, first in terms of meaning and secondly in terms of style.” Translation seeks to accurately convey the meaning of the original message via clear and natural linguistic forms in the receptor language. Translation is thus based on a correct understanding of the original message set as it is in particular forms in the source language; it is also subject to the available structures of the receptor language. Translation does not occur unless the original meaning is communicated. A translation can then be evaluated in terms of how faithfully it conveys the original message, how clearly it conveys that message to speakers or hearers in the receptor language, and how naturally the message is expressed in the receptor language. Accurately conveying the meaning of the original message is paramount, style secondary.

Translation is based on the premise that every language is capable of expressing human thought. A speaker or an author expresses a given message in a given social and physical context using particular words and phrases based on his or her intent (e.g., to inform, to persuade), assumptions about what the hearer or reader will understand, couched in the linguistic and rhetorical tools he or she controls (e.g., rhetorical questions, metaphors). The translator must understand this original message before beginning translation. Thus, language analysis or exegesis is an initial step in the translation process. Since languages are distinct and have different ways of expressing meaning, a particular word or phrase in a language may have numerous meanings. “Chris’s house” expresses a different relationship between Chris and the house than “Chris’s spouse” or “Chris’s hand.” A “hand” on an arm is different than a “hand” on a clock or a “hand” of bananas. To “give someone a hand” may involve physical assistance or applause, depending on the context. Linguistic forms convey different meanings in different contexts.

In addition to the referential sense of words, translation must also consider connotative meaning. A speaker or author may choose words with strong negative or positive connotations. These meanings must be understood in their temporal and cultural context.

Transferring the message from the source language to another language involves determining which forms in the receptor language will adequately convey the original meaning. Very rarely will the same form be appropriate for the multiple senses of a word in the source language. The source language may have multiple senses for a particular word that demand separate forms in the receptor language (the English noun “key” is translated llave in Spanish if it is for a lock, clave if it is for a code, and tecla if it is on a keyboard). Conversely, the source language may have separate lexical items that are appropriately translated with one word in the receptor language, (Indonesian padi, beras, and nasi are all “rice” in English.) The lack of simple one-to-one correspondences between languages motivates the translator to seek the most appropriate way to express the meaning of the receptor language in words and phrases understood well in the receptor language.

The receptor language also determines the grammatical form of the translation; if words are simply translated one by one from the source language the result is merely a glossed text, not a translation. Interlinear translations of texts provide helpful insights about the source language, but are not properly called translations as such.

Translation and interpretation are one task with two modes of expression. In both tasks, the meaning of an original message must be conveyed accurately, clearly, and naturally in another language. Interpreters provide oral expression of the original message within moments of hearing it. Translators typically have a relatively extended period of time to study the original message before providing a written form in the receptor language. In Bible translation especially translators enjoy the benefit of detailed studies of the original message to aid them in their analysis.
Translation

Translation is modeled in Scripture as a means to convey a message to people who do not understand the language of the original message (Mark 5:41; 15:34; John 1:38). The postexilic Jews may have used interpreters to bridge the gap from the classical Hebrew of the Torah to the Aramaic of the audience (Neh. 8:8).

Agencies such as the United Bible Societies and the Wycliffe Bible Translators (along with the Summer Institute of Linguistics) have focused on translation as a missionary tool, specifically for Bible translation. Translation theory has been advanced by Christian authors; Eugene A. Nida wrote several seminal works on the theory and practice of translation. Countless other agencies around the world rely heavily on interpreters and translators to convey their message to people who speak a language not mastered by their missionaries. Mission interpreters and translators need to be well trained to translate accurately, clearly, and naturally.

Peter James Silzer

See also Bible Translation.

Translation Theory. Translation is the process whereby a message is transferred from one lexico-cultural context to another in such a way that the receptors respond as though the original communication had been in their context. Because the biblical authors in general, and God in particular, intended to be understood and have an impact on those who received the message, a translation of Scripture, like the original communication, must make sense, that is, it must be coherent. Furthermore, the parts of the text must interact and present the author’s intent. Just like the original, a translation must communicate within its own linguistic and cultural context. The problem in translating is to convey through the chosen medium both the verbal and nonverbal elements. For the assumptions and concerns of both the author and original receptors are for the most part not those of an audience in another time and place with different communicational expectations.

While Eugene Nida’s “code model” of communication with its focus on the author's message was effective for Exegesis, the more recent theories focus on relevance and the area of Hermeneutics, for the receptors must necessarily make inferences about an author’s intent. Both exegesis and hermeneutics are essential for meaningful communication. Hence the basic question for a translator is not “How do I translate this?” but “How would the author have communicated this message in the present-day linguistic and cultural context?” There must be faithfulness both to the source and to the receptor. If both are not taken into account, the translation runs the risk of miscommunication.

Translation theory today is increasingly emphasizing the process of translation as well as the end product. Translators need a thorough understanding of the contexts of both source and receptor (see Bible Translation). Also stressed is the impact of the translators’ own language and culture upon their understanding of the languages and cultures of source and receptor. The perspectives of source, receptor, and translator combine to create the translation context. Keeping all these perspectives in view will help translators ensure relevance through their exegetical and hermeneutical endeavors.

Another development in recent years is an increased interest in discourse theory. Textual linguistics enables a translator to understand the author’s organization of a text. This discourse analysis illuminates the author’s logic—the way the parts go together to create a whole. Why was a particular subject, argument, or procedure presented at a particular point in the text? How does one maintain that logic to impact the new audience? An appreciation of the genre or style of text will also enable translators to use the available linguistic and cultural elements in such a way as to ensure communication.

Along with discourse analysis is the necessity to understand the semantic elements chosen by an author for a particular context. How are these elements employed in order to convey a particular message? Appreciation of both the macrostructure (discourse analysis) and the microstructure (semantic analysis) is essential for effective and relevant communication. Once the elements of a text are isolated (exegesis), they can be meaningfully presented so that receptors can reconstruct the author’s intent as it applies to their circumstances (hermeneutics).

The process of analyzing and then transferring discourse and semantic structures and meanings to another context creates many translation problems. Transferring the meaning of figures of speech that are highly specific to the original language and culture is difficult, particularly if no such idiom appears in the receptor context. In addition, each language introduces and then recalls referents to mind in its own way, thereby creating a huge problem of pronominal reference. Furthermore, the matters of order, introductions and conclusions, and quotations must be handled to ensure communication of the message. Each translation context poses different problems and requires specific solutions.

This raises the question of how much latitude can be allowed in making adjustments. To determine the answer, translators must have knowledge of the entire translation context. Such knowledge will help them determine how the receptors will interpret the message and the extent to which it must be adjusted to ensure communication of the author’s intent and meaning to the new context. Unless all cultural and linguistic adjustments necessary for relevant communication are made, the translation is not complete.

The objective of a translation, then, is effective and relevant communication of what the original author intended. To the extent possible, receptors should have no doubt as to what the author meant. Discussion should pertain not to the meaning, but to the application of that meaning in the new context. So when a message is enounced in Scripture (what God said to all human beings), we must first discern God’s intent and the eternal nature of the message (what which transcends all specific human contexts), and then present God’s meaning for a particular situation. Both the generality and the particularity are essential for translation. Translation that meets these criteria serves the cause of mission by enabling people to understand and apply God’s message to their lives without depending on someone else to tell them what it means.

R. Daniel Shaw

Transmigration. See Reincarnation and Transmigration.

Trasher, Lillian (1887–1961). American missionary to orphans in Egypt. In denying her personal aspirations and desires, Lillian Trasher marveled at God’s multiplication of her original plans at the end of her life. Her dream for a family of twelve children had grown to the birth and establishment of an orphanage in Egypt that housed some 1,400 children and widows at the completion of fifty years of ministry. After hearing the call to “be a missionary to Africa,” Trasher broke her engagement to a pastor and responded to the call to “be a missionary to Africa.” In denying her personal aspirations and desires, Lillian Trasher marveled at God’s multiplication of her original plans at the end of her life. Her dream for a family of twelve children had grown to the birth and establishment of an orphanage in Egypt that housed some 1,400 children and widows at the completion of fifty years of ministry. After hearing the call to “be a missionary to Africa,” Trasher broke her engagement to a pastor and began language study, Trasher soon found herself wanting to look after every neglected child she saw. Her missionary colleagues found this unacceptable. Stepping out in faith, she rented a house and founded the orphanage that became her distinguishing mark in ministry. By 1916 the Assemblies of God officially accepted her as one of their own missionaries. Spiritual victories were sparse in the first sixteen years of ministry, yet in 1927 she witnessed the greatest revival she had ever seen. At the time of her death, her ministry of compassion had touched more than eight thousand orphans.

Robert R. King

Bibliography. L. Trasher, Letters from Lillian; R. Tucker, GGC.

Trident. See Counter-Reformation.

Trinidad and Tobago (Est. 2000 pop.: 1,380,000; 5,130 sq. km. [1,981 sq. mi.]). The Republic of Trinidad and Tobago reflects both a strong Protestant Christian tradition and a strong Asian religious influence. Afro-Caribbeans constitute about 40 percent of the population, as do East Indians. The Protestant community is made up largely of-mainline groups with 10 percent of the population considered evangelical. A quarter of the population is Hindu, with another 6 percent Muslim.

Everett A. Wilson

See also Caribbean.

Trinity. Whereas in recent decades much scholarly thought about God has been drawn toward process theology or to some form of universalism, a small but healthy list of books has probed classic Trinitarianism, and some of this work has sketched the missiological implications.

Rejecting the speculative and frequently postmodern argumentation of the former, the latter approach anchors itself in what the Bible says about God’s dealings with his covenantal people, and with the world, across the centuries, culminating in his gracious self-disclosure in Christ. While the biblical witness strenuously insists on the oneness of God, this one God is not simplex: the biblical material cries out for the kind of elaboration that issued in the doctrine of the Trinity. If the later elaborations (e.g., technical distinctions between “person” and “substance”) should not be read back into the pages of Scripture, it does no harm to apply the term “Trinity” to what the Bible discloses of God, provided anachronism is avoided.

Even the Old Testament includes hints of the non-simplex nature of the one God (see, e.g., Erickson). But the biblical furnishing of the elements that called forth the doctrine of the Trinity comes to clearest focus in its treatment of Jesus the Messiah. Already in the Old Testament, one stream of prophetic expectation pictures Yahweh coming to rescue his people, while another stream pictures him sending his servant David. When these streams occasionally merge (e.g., Isa.
Trinity

9; Ezek. 34), they do so in the matrix of anticipated mission.

Selected features of New Testament witness to God as triune become clear when their missiological bearing is articulated.

First, the kind of monotheism disclosed in the Bible is far more successful at portraying God as a loving God than any simplex-monotheism can ever be. A unitarian God may be thought to love his image-bearers in the space-time continuum. But it is very difficult to imagine how such a God could be said to be characteristically a God of love before the universe was created, unless the word “love” is stretched to the breaking point. Although little is said in the Bible regarding the intra-Triune relationships before creation, there are important hints. The Son enjoyed equality with God before the incarnation, but, far from wishing to exploit his status, in obedience to his Father’s commission emptied himself, became a servant, and died the odious death of the cross (Phil. 2:6–11). In John’s Gospel, the Son’s love for the Father is expressed in unqualified obedience (e.g., John 8:29; 14:31). The Father’s love for the Son is displayed both in withholding nothing from him and in “showing” him all that he does, including commissioning him with a mission that ensures all will honor the Son as they honor the Father (John 3:35; 5:16–30). Embedded deeply in Paul’s thought is the conviction that the Father’s giving over of the Son to death on the cross is the ultimate measure of God’s love for us (Rom. 8:32; cf. 1 John 4:9). The love of God that ultimately stands behind all Christian mission is grounded in, and logically flows from, the love of the Father for the Son and of the Son for the Father. As much as the Son loved the world, it was his love for the Father which drove him to the cross (hence the cry in the Garden, Mark 14:36). The Father loved the world so much that he sent his Son (John 3:16). Thus it was the Father’s love for the Son that determined to exalt the Son and call out and give to him a great host of redeemed sinners.

Second, the doctrine of the Trinity stands behind the incarnation. If God were one in some unitarian sense, then for God to become a human being the incarnation would either so exhaust God that the incarnated being would have no one to pray to or the notion of God would have to shift from his transcendent personhood and oneness to some ill-defined pantheism. Incarnation in the confessional sense is possible only if the one God is some kind of plurality within unity. The Word who was with God (God’s own companion) and who was God (God’s own self) became flesh, and lived for a while among us (John 1:1, 14). The Lion of the tribe of Judah comes from God’s own throne (Rev. 5).

For God to become human, something other than a simplex monotheistic God was necessary. This is more than a technical point. The high point of revelation is the coming and mission of Jesus Christ (cf. Heb. 4:1–4). His disclosure of God (cf. John 14:7) not only through instructive words and deeds of justice and mercy, but supremely in the cross, depends on the incarnation, which itself is dependent on biblical Trinitarianism. Conversely, if it were not for the incarnation of Jesus Christ, if it were not for what the incarnate Lord accomplished, it would be difficult to assign any sense at all to the conviction that believers come to “participate in the divine nature” (2 Peter 1:4).

Moreover, the sending of the Son becomes the anchor for the sending of the disciples (John 20:21). As he has had a mission from his Father, so we receive our mission from him. Indeed, in this sense the Christian mission is nothing more than a continuation of the mission of the Son, the next stage as it were. None of this would be particularly coherent if unitarianism replaced Trinitarianism.

Third, although orthodox Trinitarianism insists that all three persons of the Godhead are equally God, it insists no less strongly that each does not perform or accomplish exactly what the others do. The Father sends the Son, the Son goes: the relationship is not reciprocal. After his death and exaltation, the Son bequeaths the Spirit: the reverse is not true. The Spirit is given as the “down payment” of the ultimate inheritance: that cannot be said of the Father or the Son. When the exalted Christ has finally vanquished the last enemy, he turns everything over to his Father: once again, the two persons of the Godhead mentioned in this sentence could not have their roles reversed without making nonsense of the biblical narrative.

The bearing of these observations on missiological thought is twofold. First, God discloses himself to the ideal community, the archetypical community, “a sort of continuous and indivisible community,” as the Cappadocians taught (the words are attributed to Basil of Caesarea). This stands radically against the isolated individualism espoused by many forms of liberal democracy. It is an especially important component of our vision of God in all attempts to evangelize and disciple societies less enamored with individualism than are many Western nations (see also INDIVIDUALISM and COLLECTIVISM).

Yet the Persons of the Godhead are not three indistinguishable godlets, like three indistinguishable peas in a pod. They interact in love, and, in the case of the Son to the Father and of the Spirit to the Son and to the Father, in obedience, they each press on with distinctive tasks in their unified vision. In confessional trinitarianism, the three Persons of the Godhead are equally omniscient, but they do not think the same thing, that is, the point of self-identity with...
Trotter, Dawson E. (1906–56). American evangelist and founder of The Navigators. Born in Bisbee, Arizona, he moved to Lomita, California, where at the age of twenty he came to faith in Christ, largely by memorizing Bible verses. He began to do evangelism, both on the streets and in the churches. He continued to memorize Bible verses and within three years could recite one thousand verses. After Trotman introduced Bible memorization to a sailor in Los Angeles in 1933, he organized his ministry to sailors, calling it The Navigators—“A Bible Club for Service Men.” During World War II it grew significantly. Trotman never completed college and remained a layman. He built the work of The Navigators on strict personal discipline and Scripture, as well as a passion for people.

After the war, The Navigators spread across U.S. campuses, churches, and communities, and then overseas. The mission emphasized Bible memory, small-group Bible study, evangelism, and discipleship. Philosophically and strategically, Trotman built his work on 2 Timothy 2:2. This self-reproducing ministry was soon taken up by many mission agencies. By 1994 The Navigators had some 3,300 workers in 90 countries.

Trotman drowned in upstate New York while saving the life of a girl who had been pitched overboard from a powerboat. Two of Trotman’s sermons have been published: “Born to Reproduce” and “The Need of the Hour.”

DONALD A. CARSON

SEE ALSO Image of God.

Trotter, Isabelle Lilibas (1853–1928). English missionary to Algeria and founder of the Algiers Mission Band. Born in London and brought up in comfortable circumstances, she was educated at home by French and German governesses, and showed talent in languages and in water-color painting. Living with her widowed mother (who died in 1879), she undertook voluntary Christian work and was influenced by speakers she heard at Holiness conventions. Feeling called to work in North Africa, she spent some time in preparation at the Mildmay Mission (East London), and in 1888 traveled to Algeria, with three women companions. She was able to speak in French to local people immediately, and Algiers was her home for the rest of her life.

Work had been started in several North African countries by Edward Glenny (North Africa Mission) and others, and in Egypt by the Egypt General Mission. Eventually the Algiers Mission Band united with the North Africa Mission (now known as Arab World Ministries). Other women joined Trotter; she spent a good deal of time in Egypt writing and translating material for the Nile Mission Press, started in 1905. She also wrote and illustrated several devotional books about her work. She died in Algiers in 1928. As founder of the Algiers Mission Band, her life typifies the initiatives taken by women to “proclaim the Good News” at a time when their gifts and calling were often ignored.
Trotter, Isabelle Lilias

Jocelyn Murray

Trumbull, David (1819–89). American pioneer missionary and journalist in Chile. Born to a well-to-do family in Elizabeth, New Jersey, Trumbull studied at Yale College and Princeton Seminary. While at Yale he came to Christ (1839), having been deeply impacted during the Second Great Awakening by Charles Finney’s preaching. In 1845 he was ordained by the Congregational Church and appointed by the Foreign Evangelical Society as a chaplain to sailors from a base in Port of Valparaiso, Chile. Out of his work came the planting of Union Church, organized to meet the needs of the expatriate residents. On his first furlough (1850), he married Jane Fitch. Upon their return, she organized and directed a girl’s school for the daughters of English families in Valparaiso, the first Protestant school in Chile.

Chile’s population was controlled by the Spanish-descended Roman Catholic ruling class who used the Constitution to maintain Catholic domination. In this context, Trumbull was a powerful and persuasive advocate for religious freedom. His persistent efforts were rewarded with legal and eventually constitutional reform, starting with the passage of the interpretive Law in 1864 which prohibited public non-Catholic worship, thereby implying that private worship was legal and giving the first opportunity for evangelization among Spanish-speaking Chileans.

Trumbull’s influence grew throughout his career. He founded two schools, a Bible Society, and two newspapers. The latter served as the platforms for his advocacy. After forty years of service in Chile, in 1886 Trumbull applied and was accepted for Chilean citizenship; he is acknowledged to be among the most significant Protestant missionaries to ever serve in Latin America.

A. Scott Moreau

Truth. In common use truth refers to that which is correct, actually exists, or has occurred. Philosophers investigate the nature of truth itself in the areas of knowledge, beauty, and morals. From the ENLIGHTENMENT (early eighteenth century) onward they have sought a truth which can be verified by science with accuracy. Immanuel Kant (1724–1802) raised the question of whether truth in itself is knowable or only as the knower perceives it. He opened the way to extensive questioning of even the existence of truth. Relativists may deny its existence in any objective, absolute sense in favor of a “truth” which is dependent upon knower and circumstances. Existentialists and their successors argue that truth emerges from experience. Postmodernists hold to a PLURALISM of many different “truths,” whatever is true for a particular person or group is correct for them, even if it contradicts the truths held by others.

Throughout the Bible one can detect different nuances concerning truth. The common connotations of correctness and accuracy are assumed. The Old Testament frequently stresses faithfulness, reliability, and morality whereas in the New Testament the emphasis is more upon true statements and teachings and attitudes and actions consistent with God’s nature and will.

In both Testaments truth is a quality of God, at times almost becoming a personification of him. Speaking of God both the psalmist (119:160) and Jesus (John 17:17) affirm, “Your word is truth.” The Holy Spirit is “the Spirit of truth” (14:17; 15:26; 16:13; cf. 1 John 5:7). Hence, God’s communication of truth is in complete harmony with his nature (he does not lie, Num. 23:19; 1 Sam. 15:29); God’s revelation of his person, works, and will are accurate and trustworthy. Ultimately, Jesus Christ himself is truth. “I,” he said, “am the way, the truth and the life, no one can come to the Father but by me” (John 14:6). He himself is the embodiment of truth—truth that is both personal and absolute, eternal and relational, objective and experiential. What philosophers, kings, sages, scientists, common people, priests, prophets, shamans, and diviners seek is found in him. In Jesus all things find their form, function, relation, and meaning. As the truth itself, Jesus reveals the truth about God, the universe, and their relationship. He is also the only way to the reestablishment of a right, accepting relationship with God.

God’s servants and representatives are to be people of truth. They are to reflect and point to the truth which is Jesus Christ. They are to report, to bear testimony to the Truth. The facts and implications they report must be accurate, even when they might be threatening or irritating, or bring hostility. In their own lives and activities they are to tell the truth and be characterized by faithfulness and dependability as they live the truth.

This is the background and presupposition for “truth and missions.” Missions and missionaries must be committed to truth and be characterized by it. They must proclaim the pure truth of the gospel. God’s truth, which is sure (Titus 1:9), absolute, changeless, and “committed once and for
Tucker, Alfred Robert

(1849–1914). English missionary to Uganda. An artist and an athlete from the Lake District of England, Tucker felt a call to the Anglican ministry. Ordained at the age of thirty-three, he was soon moved to take up evangelism among the peoples of Eastern Equatorial Africa (Kenya and Uganda), was accepted by the evangelical CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY in 1890, and was promptly consecrated bishop of that diocese. His task was daunting: the missionaries there were few and disheartened; their first bishop had been executed recently, and the second had died en route from England to the diocese. Tucker took up his charge with great enthusiasm, even impatience, in three key areas, often making enemies in the British government as a result. Above all, he campaigned tirelessly for a self-governing Anglican diocese, traveling thousands of miles throughout his diocese, preaching and ordaining indigenous priests in great numbers, and then promoting schools and hospitals. He can be recollected in his own Eighteen Years in Uganda and East Africa (1908). He was greatly loved by Ugandans and so has been best memorialized in their establishment of Bishop Tucker Theological College.

Tsizhehena, John (c. 1840–1912). Malagasy evangelist in Madagascar. Tsizhehena represents the host of indigenous Christian leaders of the early missionary era, whose almost unknown labors contributed much to the eventual establishment and expansion of the Christian church.

As a young man, Tsizhehena had contact with Anglican (CMS) missionaries in Vohemar in the north of the island. He came to faith in Christ following a deathbed vision which also marked his dramatic restoration to health. Later, with other Christians, he moved to a part of the northeastern coast remote from the rest of the Anglican community. Here, determined not only to evangelize the surrounding region, but also to remain faithful to Anglican worship and liturgy, Tsizhehena took the pragmatic step of declaring himself “The Right Reverend Lord Bishop of the North, D.D.” Wearing appropriate home-spun attire, with no administrative or financial help from outside, he moved out from his base at Namakia with others of like zeal and evangelized the surrounding region, baptizing new converts, founding churches, and ordaining priests and deacons. For litany, Tsizhehena followed closely the Book of Common Prayer; for certain special ceremonies (such as the consecration of a new church building) he improvised his own liturgies.

Just prior to his death Tsizhehena agreed with an Anglican missionary bishop from the capital Tananarive that all the churches in his diocese would form part of the Anglican Communion in Madagascar, a communion that now numbers sixty to seventy thousand members.

Gordon Molyneux

Tucker, Alfred Robert

(1849–1914). English missionary to Uganda. An artist and an athlete from the Lake District of England, Tucker felt a call to the Anglican ministry. Ordained at the age of thirty-three, he was soon moved to take up evangelism among the peoples of Eastern Equatorial Africa (Kenya and Uganda), was accepted by the evangelical CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY in 1890, and was promptly consecrated bishop of that diocese. His task was daunting: the missionaries there were few and disheartened; their first bishop had been executed recently, and the second had died en route from England to the diocese. Tucker took up his charge with great enthusiasm, even impatience, in three key areas, often returning to England in order to accomplish his goals. He helped negotiate a stable and just political environment in the midst of wrangling between German and English imperial officials, and in spite of tensions among Muslim, Roman Catholic, Protestant, and indigenous religious adherents, frequently butting heads with authorities of all groups. He fought vigorously for the land claims of local chiefs and against forced labor, making enemies in the British government as a result. Above all, he campaigned tirelessly for a self-governing Anglican diocese, traveling thousands of miles throughout his diocese, preaching and ordaining indigenous priests in great numbers, and then promoting schools and hospitals.

He can be recollected in his own Eighteen Years in Uganda and East Africa (1908). He was greatly loved by Ugandans and so has been best memorialized in their establishment of Bishop Tucker Theological College.

Tunisia lies at the heart of 63,170 sq. mi. for Islamization. Countries of Libya and Algeria provide pressure under strong state control, and the neighboring Islamic fundamentalism is present and vocal but restricted to informal groups meeting in homes. Islamic states are monitored closely by the government and religious church growth is minimal. Tunisian Christians Cyprian made their mark. Today, however, Christian leadership. Men such as Tertullian and Tunisian giants were among the ranks of early Christian influence during the Roman era, twentieth century. From this center of early embrace the Christian message again in the itself to its Islamic invaders, and the slowest to earliest to receive the church, the last to release gates is moderate, the toleration of Christian witness one of the highest in the region.

Fifteen, and the Human Development Index is the highest in North Africa. The population is highly valued and the literacy rate is 63 percent to the seven churches (Rev. 1–3) were all written to locations in western Turkey.

For the next millennium, the Byzantine blend of Christianity and Greek-Roman culture dominated the area until the Western Christian crusaders sacked Constantinople in 1204 and the Ottoman Turks took it in 1453 to make it their imperial capital. For the next five hundred years Christians were a tolerated minority in a great Muslim empire.

So at the beginning of the third millennium after Christ Turkey is one of the most totally Muslim nations of the world, with only a few tiny remnants of the ancient apostolic churches left after massive population changes following the breakup of the Ottoman Empire after World War I and the creation of the modern state of Turkey under the brilliant leadership of Kemal Ataturk. Modern evangelical witness through the work of the ABCFM had begun in the mid-nineteenth century, but after stiff opposition from Ottoman authorities to Christian witness among Turks sealed by a number of Turkish Christian martyrs, the nineteenth-century missionaries turned their efforts toward the traditional Christian communities of Armenian, Chaldean, Assyrian, and Greek origin. In these communities there had been significant evangelical renewal for more than fifty years, through the beginning of World War I.

Tucker, Charlotte

Tucker, Charlotte (1821–1893), English missionary in India. Tucker was born on May 8, 1821, to a father who was a Bengal civilian who became the chairperson of the East India Company called “John Company.” She loved to work with the poor. When she was at the age of fifty-four she heard the call from God to go to India and joined the Zenana Mission. She began her language study before she sailed to India and was prepared to begin her work of communicating the gospel as soon as she arrived.

Tucker’s work focused on women in bondage. Known by some as “the Lady of England,” she was a popular author and a woman of some means. She devoted eighteen years of her life to trying to win women in bondage to Christ, giving them medical care and educating them.

In addition to the Zenana work, Tucker also helped with boys in a boarding school and wrote some 68 books. Her best known title was The Bee and the Butterfly. Because of her close identification with the poor and downtrodden, she earned their love and respect, being given the nickname “Aunti Dear.” On December 2, 1893, she passed away, a missionary who faithfully served the Lord in India even though she never saw significant results from her labors.

Bibliography. A. R. Buckland, Women in the Mission Field; R. A. Tucker, GGC.

Bibliography. R. Daniel, This Holy Seed.

Turkey (Est. 2000 pop.: 67,748,000; 779,452 sq. km. [300,946 sq. mi.]). The earliest recorded missionary expansion of the Christian church beyond the borders of the Jewish community itself took place in what is today modern Turkey (Acts 11:20). Antioch of Syria, where followers of Jesus were first called “Christians” and where a lively Hellenistic Christian congregation was nurtured by Barnabas and Saul (Acts 11:19–30), is at the beginning of the third millennium a bustling Turkish provincial capital called Antakya.

The “first missionary journey” of Barnabas and Saul (Acts 13–14) had its origin in Antioch, and most of their destinations on that first apostolic mission were also located in modern Turkey, places such as Perga, Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. For Saul, who became known as Paul on this trip, it was entirely natural to begin his apostolic labors in these regions, for his birthplace had been Tarsus, another city of modern Turkey that still carries the same name.

By the end of the first century, the Christian church was strongly rooted in all the areas of what is modern Turkey, having been blessed by the apostolic witness not only of Paul but also of John and probably other apostles as well. The letters to the seven churches (Rev. 1–3) were all written to locations in western Turkey.

For the next millennium, the Byzantine blend of Christianity and Greek-Roman culture dominated the area until the Western Christian crusaders sacked Constantinople in 1204 and the Ottoman Turks took it in 1453 to make it their imperial capital. For the next five hundred years Christians were a tolerated minority in a great Muslim empire.

So at the beginning of the third millennium after Christ Turkey is one of the most totally Muslim nations of the world, with only a few tiny remnants of the ancient apostolic churches left after massive population changes following the breakup of the Ottoman Empire after World War I and the creation of the modern state of Turkey under the brilliant leadership of Kemal Ataturk. Modern evangelical witness through the work of the ABCFM had begun in the mid-nineteenth century, but after stiff opposition from Ottoman authorities to Christian witness among Turks sealed by a number of Turkish Christian martyrs, the nineteenth-century missionaries turned their efforts toward the traditional Christian communities of Armenian, Chaldean, Assyrian, and Greek origin. In these communities there had been significant evangelical renewal for more than fifty years, through the beginning of World War I.
The political and military settlements after World War I left the new nation-state of Turkey with scarcely any evangelical Christian witness. By the mid-1960s, however, Christian tentmakers from various nations began to find their way into Turkey, and in the next thirty years a small Turkish evangelical community began to emerge, by the end of the century numbering perhaps one thousand in a nation of more than 67 million.

RICHARD SHOWALTER

Turkmenistan (Est. 2000 pop.: 4,551,000; 488,100 sq. km. [188,455 sq. mi.]). Turkmenistan is a Central Asian republic of the former Soviet Union that is 80 percent desert. More than 85 percent of the population is of Turkic stock, with ethnic Turkmen alone making up about 70 percent. Turkmenistan is quite poor and has been particularly slow to experience any significant economic development. More than three-quarters of the population is at least nominally Sunni Muslim, and religious liberty is restricted. Evangelicals make up a lower percentage of the population than in any of the other ex-Soviet Central Asian republics, accounting for a measer 0.01 percent, most of whom are Slavs. Outreach efforts are few, and only a handful of people have so far come to Christ.

RAYMOND P. PRIGODICH

See also Commonwealth of Independent States.

Turks and Caicos Islands (United Kingdom Dependent Area) (Est. 2000 pop.: 17,000; 500 sq. km. [193 sq. mi.]). Uninhabited when discovered by Ponce de León in 1512, and consisting of two groups of thirty islands in the Caribbean, the economy of Turks and Caicos is dependent on tourism, offshore finances, and fishing. In 1993 the population was estimated at 99 percent Christian (84.5% Protestant, 12% Catholic, and 2.5% marginal). Protestant work has been primarily Baptist (since the mid-nineteenth century), Methodist (since the turn of the twentieth century), and Anglican (since the eighteenth century).

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Turner, Harold (1911– ). New Zealand pioneering religious scholar and educator. Born in Napier, New Zealand, Turner was called into mission after the first year of an engineering curriculum in New Zealand. Following initial academic and pastoral work in New Zealand, he took a position at Goldsmith’s College, London, as a means of making his way to Africa. This was realized with an appointment to the Faculty of Theology at Fourah Bay College in Sierra Leone. It was there, through a chance meeting with a member of the Church of the Lord Aladura on a beach in 1957, that he was exposed to the dynamic nature of the African Initiated Church Movement. Transferring to the University of Nigeria (Nkassa), where he taught religious studies, he came across the works of Eliade and began to build a phenomenological orientation toward religious studies (see Phenomenology of Religion), reflected in Profile through Preaching (1965), his ground-breaking two-volume History of an African Independent Church (1967), and From Temple to Meeting House: The Phenomenology and Theology of Places of Worship (1979), which he considered his most relevant (and overlooked) contribution to missiology. During his career, he pioneered the phenomenological study of New Religious Movements, in the process building a significant collection of resources related to their study housed at the Centre for New Religious Movements (Selly Oaks) and represented in Bibliography of New Religious Movements in Primal Societies (6 vols.).

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Two-Thirds World

Two-Thirds World. Synonym for terms such as “Third World,” “Non-Western World,” and “The South.” It is intended to avoid any connotation of “third-rate” and instead to point to the poverty and size of the Third World. In practice its use is mainly associated with Western discussion of non-Western theologies, and the increase in evangelical missionaries from the continents of Africa, Asia, and Latin America.

“Two-Thirds World” has been in greater use since 1982, but it is not universally preferred. While the Ecumenical Association of Third-World Theologians (EATWOT) is a representative group that continues to own “Third World” as a self-designation, others are hesitant about either term. Both relate to common experiences of colonialism, poverty, and Christianity as a minority religion, usually in a multireligious context. That history needs to be explored comparatively and from the inside. However, it is not surprising that in particular countries, nationality and local culture are stronger influences on Christian identity. Nobody sees themselves as primarily “Two-Thirds World.” At most they see this as a designation they share with others over against the West. The features that “Two-Thirds World” and “Third World” highlight are becoming less valid as points of commonality and differentiation. Increasingly poverty, riches, and world religions are global realities. Indigenous peoples and regional minorities have Third World/Two-Thirds World experiences with First World countries. Western theologies are now recognized as local enculturated theologies with the same processes of formation as theologies of the “Two-Thirds World.”
Two-Thirds World

Christian mission as a characteristically Western activity refers only to a limited period of history, and even then it was only partially true. “Third World” and “Two-Thirds World” will remain useful while Western Christians adjust to changing global realities and Non-Western Christians discover what they can learn from one another. They are as necessary as the term “Western” to discuss important features of a recent era, but they are just as inadequate.

JOHN ROXBOROUGH

Two-Covenant Theory. This theory contends that because God made an everlasting covenant with Abraham and the patriarchs (Gen. 18:19, etc.) and ratified it with all Israelites at Sinai, and because Jesus made a second covenant with the Gentile world in mind, his gospel should be theologically understood as intended for non-Jews only. This means that Judaism should be regarded by the followers of Jesus, whether Jews or Gentiles, as a divinely guided religion that is parallel to Christianity, “neither superseded by it, nor fulfilled within it” (Myers, 1990). This perspective allegedly has validity even though it is readily granted that the New Testament gives no endorsement to this radical reconceptualization of the significance of the new covenant instituted by Jesus in fulfillment of the prophecy made by Jeremiah (31:31–34). Hans Joachim Schoeps is often quoted in its support: “The continuous existence of Israel almost 2000 years post Christum natum, still undisturbed in its consciousness of being God’s covenant people, is testimony that the old covenant has not been abrogated, that as the covenant of Israel it continues to exist alongside the wider human covenant of the Christian Church” (1961, 256, 7). Evangelicals rejoice that the Jewish people continue to exist due to God’s faithfulness (Jer. 31:35–37), despite all efforts to destroy them. This is the great fact that makes certain the coming of their Golden Age. Then, reunited to Jesus the Messiah, they shall be as “life from the dead” to the Gentile nations (Rom. 11:1-16, 25-36).

According to this theory Jews do not now need to believe in Jesus in order to be saved (despite the Jewish witness before the Sanhedrin to the exact opposite in Acts 4:12). The evangelization of the Jewish people is unwarranted and should cease. Jewish religious leaders should be heeded when they contend that the hostility between Christianity and Judaism generated over the centuries by the church’s persistent efforts to evangelize their people should give way to mutual acceptance and friendly religious dialogue between their separate religious communities.

In this connection the words of Franz Rosenzweig (1886–1929), an Austrian Jewish philosopher, are often quoted: “We are wholly agreed as to what Christ and his church mean to the world: no one can reach the Father save through him. But the situation is quite different from one who does not have to reach the Father because he is already with him. And this is true of the people of Israel (though not of individual Jews)” (Glatzer, 1953).

The probability is that Rosenzweig’s words would have never gained their widespread credence had he not been just about the first Jewish scholar to speak appreciatively of Christianity, the Christian church, and her significant success in world mission. In his famous book, The Star of Redemption, Rosenzweig contends that Jews are born Jews, born into the faith community instituted between God and Israel at Sinai. By this natural phenomenon, they do not have to undergo any form of spiritual rebirth. In contrast, since no Gentiles are born Christians, a rebirth is essential if they desire to become spiritual children of Abraham (Rom. 4:9–12). Inevitably, Rosenzweig’s position generated much debate, pro and con in Jewry. Arthur A. Cohen argued that this “heady doctrine—provides the Jew at last with a means of explaining to the Christian, in essentially Christian terms, why it is that the promise of Jesus to the Jews isn’t really interesting. Jews do not need redemption in the same way as Christians. Eternal life, as the Sabbath liturgy affirms, is already planted in our midst” (1971, 210).

Mainline Protestantism largely endorses the two-covenant theory. But this has not always been the case. In 1948 when the World Council of Churches convened its first international assembly, it was agreed that despite the tragedy of Auschwitz and the failure of churches worldwide to protest the German destruction of European Jewry (1939–45), the Word of God must be upheld: “The fulfillment of the church’s commission requires that we include the Jewish people in our evangelistic task” (WCC Publications, Document 1). By 1988 the drift from obedience to Scripture had gained such momentum that the WCC openly suggested to its member churches that “the next step may be to proscribe all proselytism of Jews on the theological ground that it is rejection of Israel’s valid covenant with God” (1988, 186). Forgotten is Jesus’ admonition to Nicodemus, “a ruler of the Jews,” that no one can see, much less enter the Kingdom of God unless he is born anew (John 3:1–21).

Evangelicals readily agree with Axel Torm, the former chairman of the Danish Israel Mission, who stated: “In earlier times the church downgraded Judaism in order to exalt Christ. It was a sin that the church committed. Today, people downgrade Christ in order to exalt Judaism. Is that better?” (quoted by Kjaer-Hansen, 1994, 81).

ARTHUR F. GLASSER

Uchimura, Kanzō (1861–1930). Japanese evangelist, Christian thinker, and social critic. Uchimura’s career can be summed up as an ellipse with the foci of “2 Js, Jesus and Japan.” Born in a warrior family and reared in Confucianism, he became a Christian while studying at the Sapporo Agricultural School. After briefly serving the Japanese State he left for the United States in 1884, and studied at Amherst College where he experienced conversion, but his short stay at seminary ended in disillusionment with institutional Christianity. His autobiographical account, “How I Became a Christian” (1885), detailed his life until his return to Japan in 1888. Two later incidents seemed to indicate that he was an outsider to both mainline Christianity and the State and foretold the unique development of his “Christ-nationalism.” One was his resignation in 1888 from a mission-school over the issue of evaluating the Japanese (vis-à-vis Christian) virtues, and the other was his forced resignation from a public school when he questioned the Emperor’s divinity in 1891. Throughout his turbulent and prophet-like life, he was associated with such movements as weekly Bible lectures, adventism, and Mukyokai (NON-CHURCH MOVEMENT) as well as Christian pacifism and social reforms. The missiological question he posed, namely, relating Christianity and Japan, remains valid today.

Uemura, Masahisa (1858–1925). Japanese church planter and mission advocate. Uemura, like many of the other early Christian leaders in Japan, grew up in a family which had relatively high status in the government which was deposed in the Meiji Restoration of 1868. Finding their old world shattered and their families almost destitute, some of these young men looked to non-traditional sources for education and a new worldview. Uemura studied with missionaries James Ballagh and S. R. Brown, was baptized in 1873, and became a member of Japan’s first Protestant congregation in Yokohama. In 1877 he entered seminary, was ordained in 1879, and began a new congregation in his home neighborhood in Tokyo, the first congregation in Japan begun by a Japanese without missionary help. Uemura insisted throughout his life that the church in Japan must be independent of both foreign aid and foreign control.

Uemura’s work and faith were located entirely in the classically orthodox Presbyterian/Reformed tradition, particularly in his emphasis on the person and work of Christ and on the church as the body of Christ. In 1886 he established what is now known as the Fujimicho Church which reached 1,600 members, one of the largest congregations in Japan. As a church leader Uemura actively promoted Japanese Christian mission activity in Taiwan and on the Asian mainland. In addition to pastoring, Uemura taught in the theology department of Meiji Gakuin University until he began an independent seminary in 1904. He was on the committee for translating the Old Testament and also was known as a gifted translator of hymns. He published a number of journals and his complete works run to eight volumes. He is best known, however, as a gifted preacher and church builder, one of the greatest leaders of the Church of Christ in Japan (Nihon Kirisuto Kyokai).

Uganda (Est. 2000 pop.: 24,618,000; 241,038 sq. km. [93,065 sq. mi.]). Having fulfilled his primary quest in finding David Livingstone, Henry Stanley traveled northwards to Uganda and met Kabaka (King) Mutesa I of the Buganda in 1874. Mutesa had become a Muslim in 1854, but Stanley convinced Mutesa to profess Christ and to request that Christian teachers be sent from Britain and teach his people about Christianity.
Stanley wrote a passionate appeal (Van Rheenen, 1976, 16) published in the London Daily Telegraph which was widely read. Eventually the appeal and a resulting anonymous donation resulted in eight volunteers for the mission to Uganda. Only two, Alexander MacKay and C. T. Wilson, managed to reach their destination, the rest dying en route.

Mutesa's conversion and character eventually proved to be dubious, and he began to request guns rather than teaching. Even so Wilson and MacKay's influence grew, eventually arousing Muslim opposition. A further complicating factor was the arrival of French Catholics in March of 1879. Protestants, Catholics, and Muslims vied for Mutesa's approval, and he played them off against each other.

After his death in 1884, Mutesa was succeeded by his inexperienced eighteen-year-old son, Mwanga, who reverted to traditional religion and began persecuting Christians, eventually killing more than 200. Even so, Mackay toiled on until 1890, when he died of overwork. The same year, Mwanga, who reverted to traditional religion and was the arrival of French Catholics in March of 1879. Protestants, Catholics, and Muslims vied for Mutesa's approval, and he played them off against each other.

Another key missionary in the early period was George Pilkington, a brilliant linguist remembered for his work (together with E. C. Gordon and W. A. Crabtree) in the translation of the Bible into Luganda. Pilkington believed that Bible reading was foundational to true conversion to Christianity: "The power to read the Bible is the key to the Kingdom of God. With the exception of one case, I have never known anyone profess Christ who could not read" (Harford-Battersby, 1898, 256). Pilkington was also a firm believer in and advocate of indigenous missions. "The natives are more qualified to evangelize than we missionaries are," he said. "The evangelization of Africa must be carried out by Africans ..." (Ibid.).

Perhaps nothing has had greater impact on the Ugandan church than the East African Revival. Its origins can be traced to two men: Joe Church, young British medical doctor and a missionary at Gahini, Rwanda; and Simeon Nsibambi, a health inspector. Together these two studied their Bibles, prayed, and confessed their sins for three days. After this they went their separate ways and God used them to begin the revival which spread throughout Uganda, Kenya, and Tanzania.

While other mission groups have worked to evangelize Uganda, none have been as successful as the Anglicans and Catholics. The Seventh-Day Adventists (SDA) began their work in 1926 and concentrated other efforts among the Buganda and BaaKonjo. The Southern Baptists entered in 1954, concentrating their efforts in the rural areas of eastern Uganda, among the Bagisu, Teso, and other areas where the Anglicans and Catholics were weakest. The Conservative Baptists went to Uganda in 1961 when the Congolese Catholics and Muslims vied for Mutesa's approval, and he played them off against each other.

After his death in 1884, Mutesa was succeeded by his inexperienced eighteen-year-old son, Mwanga, who reverted to traditional religion and began persecuting Christians, eventually killing more than 200. Even so, Mackay toiled on until 1890, when he died of overwork. The same year, Mwanga, who reverted to traditional religion and was the arrival of French Catholics in March of 1879. Protestants, Catholics, and Muslims vied for Mutesa's approval, and he played them off against each other.

Another key missionary in the early period was George Pilkington, a brilliant linguist remembered for his work (together with E. C. Gordon and W. A. Crabtree) in the translation of the Bible into Luganda. Pilkington believed that Bible reading was foundational to true conversion to Christianity: "The power to read the Bible is the key to the Kingdom of God. With the exception of one case, I have never known anyone profess Christ who could not read" (Harford-Battersby, 1898, 256). Pilkington was also a firm believer in and advocate of indigenous missions. "The natives are more qualified to evangelize than we missionaries are," he said. "The evangelization of Africa must be carried out by Africans ..." (Ibid.).

Perhaps nothing has had greater impact on the Ugandan church than the East African Revival. Its origins can be traced to two men: Joe Church, young British medical doctor and a missionary at Gahini, Rwanda; and Simeon Nsibambi, a health inspector. Together these two studied their Bibles, prayed, and confessed their sins for three days. After this they went their separate ways and God used them to begin the revival which spread throughout Uganda, Kenya, and Tanzania.

While other mission groups have worked to evangelize Uganda, none have been as successful as the Anglicans and Catholics. The Seventh-Day Adventists (SDA) began their work in 1926 and concentrated other efforts among the Buganda and BaaKonjo. The Southern Baptists entered in 1954, concentrating their efforts in the rural areas of eastern Uganda, among the Bagisu, Teso, and other areas where the Anglicans and Catholics were weakest. The Conservative Baptists went to Uganda in 1961 when the Congolese Catholics and Muslims vied for Mutesa's approval, and he played them off against each other.

Another key missionary in the early period was George Pilkington, a brilliant linguist remembered for his work (together with E. C. Gordon and W. A. Crabtree) in the translation of the Bible into Luganda. Pilkington believed that Bible reading was foundational to true conversion to Christianity: "The power to read the Bible is the key to the Kingdom of God. With the exception of one case, I have never known anyone profess Christ who could not read" (Harford-Battersby, 1898, 256). Pilkington was also a firm believer in and advocate of indigenous missions. "The natives are more qualified to evangelize than we missionaries are," he said. "The evangelization of Africa must be carried out by Africans ..." (Ibid.).

Perhaps nothing has had greater impact on the Ugandan church than the East African Revival. Its origins can be traced to two men: Joe Church, young British medical doctor and a missionary at Gahini, Rwanda; and Simeon Nsibambi, a health inspector. Together these two studied their Bibles, prayed, and confessed their sins for three days. After this they went their separate ways and God used them to begin the revival which spread throughout Uganda, Kenya, and Tanzania.

While other mission groups have worked to evangelize Uganda, none have been as successful as the Anglicans and Catholics. The Seventh-Day Adventists (SDA) began their work in 1926 and concentrated other efforts among the Buganda and BaaKonjo. The Southern Baptists entered in 1954, concentrating their efforts in the rural areas of eastern Uganda, among the Bagisu, Teso, and other areas where the Anglicans and Catholics were weakest. The Conservative Baptists went to Uganda in 1961 when the Congolese Catholics and Muslims vied for Mutesa's approval, and he played them off against each other.

Another key missionary in the early period was George Pilkington, a brilliant linguist remembered for his work (together with E. C. Gordon and W. A. Crabtree) in the translation of the Bible into Luganda. Pilkington believed that Bible reading was foundational to true conversion to Christianity: "The power to read the Bible is the key to the Kingdom of God. With the exception of one case, I have never known anyone profess Christ who could not read" (Harford-Battersby, 1898, 256). Pilkington was also a firm believer in and advocate of indigenous missions. "The natives are more qualified to evangelize than we missionaries are," he said. "The evangelization of Africa must be carried out by Africans ..." (Ibid.).

Perhaps nothing has had greater impact on the Ugandan church than the East African Revival. Its origins can be traced to two men: Joe Church, young British medical doctor and a missionary at Gahini, Rwanda; and Simeon Nsibambi, a health inspector. Together these two studied their Bibles, prayed, and confessed their sins for three days. After this they went their separate ways and God used them to begin the revival which spread throughout Uganda, Kenya, and Tanzania.

While other mission groups have worked to evangelize Uganda, none have been as successful as the Anglicans and Catholics. The Seventh-Day Adventists (SDA) began their work in 1926 and concentrated other efforts among the Buganda and BaaKonjo. The Southern Baptists entered in 1954, concentrating their efforts in the rural areas of eastern Uganda, among the Bagisu, Teso, and other areas where the Anglicans and Catholics were weakest. The Conservative Baptists went to Uganda in 1961 when the Congolese Catholics and Muslims vied for Mutesa's approval, and he played them off against each other.

Another key missionary in the early period was George Pilkington, a brilliant linguist remembered for his work (together with E. C. Gordon and W. A. Crabtree) in the translation of the Bible into Luganda. Pilkington believed that Bible reading was foundational to true conversion to Christianity: "The power to read the Bible is the key to the Kingdom of God. With the exception of one case, I have never known anyone profess Christ who could not read" (Harford-Battersby, 1898, 256). Pilkington was also a firm believer in and advocate of indigenous missions. "The natives are more qualified to evangelize than we missionaries are," he said. "The evangelization of Africa must be carried out by Africans ..." (Ibid.).

Perhaps nothing has had greater impact on the Ugandan church than the East African Revival. Its origins can be traced to two men: Joe Church, young British medical doctor and a missionary at Gahini, Rwanda; and Simeon Nsibambi, a health inspector. Together these two studied their Bibles, prayed, and confessed their sins for three days. After this they went their separate ways and God used them to begin the revival which spread throughout Uganda, Kenya, and Tanzania.

While other mission groups have worked to evangelize Uganda, none have been as successful as the Anglicans and Catholics. The Seventh-Day Adventists (SDA) began their work in 1926 and concentrated other efforts among the Buganda and BaaKonjo. The Southern Baptists entered in 1954, concentrating their efforts in the rural areas of eastern Uganda, among the Bagisu, Teso, and other areas where the Anglicans and Catholics were weakest. The Conservative Baptists went to Uganda in 1961 when the Congolese Catholics and Muslims vied for Mutesa's approval, and he played them off against each other.
Ukraine

the "Bible belt" of the former Soviet Union; evangelical Christianity is stronger there than in any of the other ex-Soviet republics, making up at least 3 percent of the population. Ukraine enjoys full religious liberty, churches are growing, and a large number of indigenous mission societies have sprung up there.

RAYMOND P. PRIGODICH

SEE ALSO Commonwealth of Independent States.

Ulfilas (c. 311–82). Early missionary to Germany; "Apostle to the Goths." A Cappadocian captured by the Germanic tribe that posed a constant threat to the Roman Empire, he had been brought up by them beyond the Danube. There was evidently a sizable Christian community among the barbarians, and Ulfilas was consecrated bishop by Eusebius of Nicomedia, whose Arian views he had espoused. He worked initially among the Goths of what is now Romania, many of whom turned to Christianity. Others resisted, seeing in the Christian missionary a device to bring them under Roman domination. After seven years Ulfilas in 348 obtained permission for himself and his converts to settle south of the Danube, and there he continued his work until his death.

His great monument, after creating an alphabet, is his Gothic translation of the Bible, the oldest written work in a Germanic language. It is said he omitted the books of Samuel and Kings to prevent the Goths' military appetite being further whetted by bloodthirsty narratives. More likely his translation was incomplete when he died, and that he had postponed parts of Scripture he regarded as least important for inculcating Christian behavior in his flock. His Arianism was later modified in a more orthodox direction, probably due to the influence of Emperor Theodosius the Great.

Many of his translations of the Gospels survive with the Pauline epistles and fragments of Nehemiah.

J. D. DOUGLAS

Underwood, Horace G. (1859–1916). English missionary educator in Korea. Underwood was born in London, England, though his family immigrated to the United States in 1872 when he was thirteen. He graduated from New York University in 1881 and from Dutch Reformed Theological Seminary in New Brunswick, New Jersey, in 1884. Underwood was commissioned as a single young missionary by the Northern Presbyterian Church and sent to Korea, landing in Inchon on April 5, 1885. He was the first Presbyterian clergyman to enter Korea as a missionary. After assisting a medical missionary for a short time, he opened an orphanage for boys in Chong Dong in 1886 which later developed into the Kyong Shin Boys High School.

In 1887 Underwood organized the first Protestant church in Korea with 14 charter members. A tireless evangelist who itinerated widely, he was also deeply engaged in literacy work and in the translation of the Scriptures with other missionary colleagues.

At the First General Assembly of the Korean Presbyterian Church in 1912, Underwood was elected the moderator. In 1915 he founded Choson Christian College (now Yonsei University), where he served as president until his death in 1916. After his death, his son, Horace Horton Underwood, succeeded his father as president of the college. Today the third and fourth generations of the Underwood family carry on a faithful missionary heritage in Korea. The Underwood family is one of the most widely known and most distinguished Presbyterian missionary families in Korea.

BONG RIN RO

Un evangelized. The large segment of the world's population that lives without a viable witness of the gospel or a valid opportunity to accept or reject Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior. They have never heard the gospel with sufficient cultural relevance to allow them an informed response to Christ. The unevangelized are those who do not know or hear about Christ; who do not have an indigenous church with the resources to reach them; who do not have meaningful contacts with Christians; who do not have the Bible available to them; who live isolated from the gospel because of cultural, geographical, political, or linguistic barriers; and who will not be evangelized unless someone is sent to cross those barriers with the gospel. Some distinguish between evangelized and unevangelized people groups by insisting that a people group is evangelized when it has an indigenous church with the resources to evangelize the group without outside (cross-cultural) assistance.

Other related terms include "the lost" (those outside of Christ, separated from God, and living in spiritual darkness), "heathen" (an older term for those outside Christ, especially in non-Christian countries), "hidden peoples" (those who live places where they are unseen and unreached by Christians. In recent years, one of the terms most commonly used in the context of the unevangelized is “unreached peoples”—ethnolinguistic groups with a significant group identity and affinity which do not have their own indigenous witness or church and in which the majority of the members are unreached. The Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization uses a scale of terms to identify unreached peoples. The scale includes “hidden people” (no known Christians within the group), “initially reached” (less than one percent of the group are Christians), “minimally reached” (one to 10 percent of the group are Christians), “possibly reached” (10 percent to 20 percent of the group are Christians), and “reached” (over 20 percent of the group are Christians).

Unreached people groups became a serious focus of mission strategy with Ralph Winter’s address, “The Highest Priority—Cross-Cultural Evangelism,” presented at the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization (1974). Winter challenged the notion that the gospel had been preached to all the world and drew attention to hidden or unreached peoples who are not culturally near to any Christians.

Winter asserted that these peoples can be reached only by a specialized cross-cultural evangelism. This innovation in thinking about the world in terms of unreached peoples and defining the unfinished task of missions as reaching the unreached profoundly impacted both the concept of missions and strategies of missions (see also Missionary Task, The). It infused the missionary enterprise with a renewed sense of purpose and a new spirit of urgency.

Research organizations such as the U.S. Center for World Missions and World Vision’s Mission Advanced Research Center (MARC) with its Unreached People Database were formed for the express purpose of identifying and mapping unreached people groups and motivating a movement of Great Commission agencies, churches, and individuals to focus on reaching the unreached. Organizations such as the AD 2000 and Beyond Movement emerged with the vision of reaching all the people groups of the world as soon as possible. Major missions agencies added divisions or components to focus on the unreached and to develop creative approaches to penetrate them with the gospel. Greater cooperation has resulted between Great Commission missions agencies and organizations in the targeting of specific people groups (see also Peoples, People Groups).

The estimate of the number of unreached people groups varies with the criteria used to identify them. In his Lausanne message, Winter spoke of 16,750 such groups. This number has often been quoted. Patrick Johnstone, compiler of Operation World, projects the number as approximately 12,000. Regardless of the different estimates, seeing the world in terms of unreached people groups accentuates the magnitude of the unfinished task of world evangelization.

There are general implications of the unreached peoples approach to missions strategy. It helps clarify the demands of world evangelization. It moves the focus of missions away from the geographic borders of nation-states. A church may be planted in a nation but not be indigenous to all the peoples of that nation. People groups transcend the borders of nations, and multiple groups live within a nation. It is reasonable, therefore, to see the task of world evangelization not as reaching nations but as reaching those unreached people groups wherein individuals have their primary identity.

The unreached peoples approach helps target those specific groups that are still to be evangelized. The concept of the 10/40 Window, for example, has helped focus personnel, planning, and praying on that area of the world where the majority of the unreached live.

The unreached peoples approach helps communicate that the goal of world evangelization is achievable. The number of people groups is not infinite. The challenge is not to win every individual. It is instead to plant indigenous churches within each people group which, in turn, are able to evangelize the group. Thus, this approach provides a standard to measure progress in the task.

The unreached peoples approach underscores the growing need for specialized cross-cultural missionaries. The unreached peoples will not hear the gospel or have a church unless such workers penetrate their group with the gospel. A majority of the unreached live in either closed or creative access countries. Traditional missionaries cannot gain entry in most of these situations. To reach them requires a force of missionaries with specialized training and specialized skills that are both relevant and necessary to the people group and will provide the means for residency (see also Tent-Making Mission).

The unreached people approach has stimulated strategic innovations in missions planning and methods for accomplishing world evangelization. Among these are creative access strategies, the nonresidential missionary, targeting of people clusters, missionary specialists who utilize a vocation to establish residence, the increased number of Third World missionaries comprising the global missionary force (see Non-Western Mission Boards and Societies), culturally sensitive models of church planting, specialized missionary training, reaching students and other members of particular groups abroad and training them to return to evangelize their group (see Student Mission Work), utilizing development projects as points of entry and bridges to evangelism, and coordination and cooperation among Great Commission organizations to maximize spiritual, human, financial, and technical resources.
Unevangelized

DONALD R. DUNAVANT

SEE ALSO Reached and Unreached Mission Fields.

Union Missionary Convention (New York Missionary Conference, 1854). Union Missionary Convention, held on May 4–5, 1854, at the Broadway Tabernacle in New York City. While touring the United States in 1854, ALEXANDER DUFF, missionary to Calcutta, India, gave an address in February in Philadelphia on the need to recruit more missionaries. Leaders of evangelical churches, inspired by his missionary vision and prompted by layman George H. Stuart of Philadelphia, resolved to hold a “general missionary conference” three months later in May. Two committees, one in New York and the other in Philadelphia, planned the Union Missionary Convention to promote unity among Protestants to advance the cause of missions. One hundred and forty-two persons registered for the convention, including such notables as RUFUS ANDERSON, Nathan Bangs, and William E. Dodge. The list does not mention the names of any women.

Duff gave the major speech of the convention, a stirring plea for modern missions. Eight questions were placed before the convention, but time limited the discussions to six. In response, six major resolutions passed with five being offered by Duff, centering on the need to convert the world to Christ; use all available means to evangelize; concentrate personnel in fields where non-Christian religions had long prevailed; avoid duplication of efforts through COMITY arrangements; and keep before church members and ministers the importance of the missionary calling. Seminaries were encouraged to offer courses in missions and evangelism. The sixth motion proposed by N. Murray won approval for the planning of another missionary convention in New York City in 1855. The Union Missionary Convention anticipated later ecumenical gatherings which dealt with varying issues facing missionaries and mission agencies. The spiritual unity and concern to evangelize the world demonstrated by the Convention’s actions reflected the evangelical unity underlying the nineteenth-century mission movement.

GARY B. MCGEE

Uniqueness of Christ. Many discussions about the significance of Jesus Christ within the context of world religions virtually cut Jesus off from his historical and scriptural roots and speak of him as the founder of a new religion, whereas certainly Jesus had no intention of launching another “religion” as such. The coming of Jesus was prepared for through God’s dealings with Israel and their Scriptures. It was from the Hebrew Bible that Jesus drew his identity and his motivating mission. Two major unique aspects of Old Testament revelation combined in the uniqueness of Christ: the uniqueness of Israel and the uniqueness of Yahweh. Both lie at the heart of a biblical understanding of mission (see also OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY OF MISSION).

The Uniqueness of Israel. The Bible presents God’s redemptive answer to the human problem (comprehensively portrayed in Gen. 1–11) through the call of Abraham and the creation of Israel as God’s people. God’s covenant with Abraham was the beginning of God’s mission to the nations. The New Testament, from Matthew’s opening genealogy, affirms that Jesus completed what God had already begun to work out through Israel. The mission of Jesus has to be understood against the background of a historical, particular people (see also JESUS AND MISSION). His uniqueness is linked to theirs. The Hebrew Bible is clear that God’s action in and through Israel was unique. This does not mean that God was in no way involved in the histories of other nations. On the contrary, Israel boldly claimed that Yahweh was sovereign over all nations (e.g., Amos 9:7; Deut. 2:20–23; Exod. 9:13–16; Isa. 10:5–19; Jer. 27:5–7; Isa. 44:28–45:13). It does mean that only in Israel did God work within the terms of a covenant of redemption, initiated and sustained by his grace (e.g., Amos 3:2; Deut. 4:32–34; Ps. 147:19f.; Isa. 43:8–13; Exod. 19:5–6; 20:26; Num. 23:9; Deut. 7:6). Israel only existed because of God’s desire to redeem people from every nation. While God has every nation in view in his redemptive purpose, in no other nation did he act as he did in Israel, for the sake of the nations. No other nation experienced what Israel did of God’s revelation and redemption.

The New Testament presents Jesus as the Messiah, Jesus the Christ. And the Messiah “was” Israel. That is, he represented and personified Israel. The Messiah was the completion of all that for which Israel had been placed in the world—God’s self-revelation and his work of human redemption. For this reason, Jesus shares in the uniqueness of Israel; indeed he was the point and goal of it. What God had been doing through no other nation he now completed through no other person than the Messiah, Jesus of Nazareth. The paradox is that precisely through the narrowing down of his redemptive work to the unique particularity of the single man, Jesus, God opened the way to the universalizing of his redemptive grace to all nations, which was his purpose from the beginning. It was this connection between the “mystery” of Israel’s existence for the nations in the Old Testament and the significance of the gospel of Jesus’ messiahship that formed the basis of Paul’s mission theology in relation to the Gentiles (Gal. 3:14, 26–29; Eph. 2:11–13; 3:4–6). The fulfillment of Israel’s historical particularity in Jesus was at the same time the fulfillment of Israel’s eschatological universality. In this way the uniqueness of Christ is inseparable from the mission of God’s people.

The Uniqueness of Yahweh. There can be no more powerful affirmation in the Old Testament than the claim that Yahweh alone is truly and uniquely God (e.g., Deut. 4:32–40). This monotheistic thrust was not simply the singularity of deity, but rather sought to define the one God in terms of the nature, character, and actions of Yahweh (e.g., Isa. 40:12–31; 43:10–12; 45:5, 22–24). Yahweh is unique in character, and deity.

An important ingredient in Old Testament Israel’s eschatology was the conviction that Yahweh would come bringing both redemption and judgment. Several of these texts were applied by Jesus to himself, or to the circumstances surrounding his ministry (e.g., Isa. 35:4ff.; Matt. 11:4–6; Ezek. 34; John 10:11, 14; Matt. 22:41–46; Mal. 2:1; 4:5; Matt. 11:14). The implication was that, in the person of Jesus, Yahweh had indeed come, as the birth title “Emmanuel” also signified, to inaugurate the new age of his salvation and reign.

Similarly, soon after the death and resurrection of Jesus we find the early church referring to him and addressing him in terms which had previously been applied only to Yahweh in their Scriptures. They called him Lord, the Greek word Kyrios being the one regularly used in the Greek version of the Old Testament for the divine name Yahweh. They “called on his name” in worship and prayer (cf., Ps. 116:12ff., 17). Stephen saw Jesus standing at the right hand of God sharing in his divine glory (Acts 7:55). Paul transferred the saving name of Yahweh to Jesus in his evangelism (Acts 16:31; cf. Joel 2:32; Rom. 10:13). Possibly his earliest letter, 1 Thessalonians, Paul speaks of Jesus in remarkable ways, given that it was written within about a decade of the crucifixion and that the Thessalonians obviously accepted the claims as basic elements in their new faith. He speaks of “the Lord Jesus Christ” in the same breath as “God the Father” (1:1, 3). He addresses prayer to both together (3:11–13). Jesus is “God’s Son,” who will come to bring in the final act of judgment and salvation (1:10). “The Day of the Lord (Yahweh)” (e.g., Joel 1:15; 2:11, 28–32; 3:14 etc.) has been transformed, in the light of the expected coming of Jesus, into “the Day of the Lord Jesus” (4:16–5:2).

The heartbeat of Old Testament monotheism can also be felt in the way Paul expanded the credal shema of Deuteronomy 6:4–5 into a declaration of the uniqueness of Jesus in relation to the world of Greco-Roman polytheism in 1 Corinthians 8, and in the way Peter converted the Deuteronomic affirmation that Yahweh is God “and there is no other” (Deut. 4:35–39), into the exclusive claim that salvation was to be found in the name of Jesus, and in “no other name” (Acts 4:12).

Possibly the most remarkable identification of Jesus with Yahweh comes in Philippians 2:5–11, probably part of an early Christian hymn which Paul incorporates here to make his point. Jesus has been given “the name above every name” (v. 9)—which in the light of the Hebrew Scriptures could only mean the name of Yahweh. Verse 10 then clinches this affirmation by applying to Jesus words taken from Isaiah 45:22f., which were originally spoken by Yahweh about himself, declaring his uniqueness as God and his unique ability to save. The uniqueness of Jesus is thus founded unmistakably on the uniqueness of Yahweh, and specifically to his action in salvation. It thus has a direct connection with the central dynamic of Christian mission.

In Jesus, then, the uniqueness of Israel and the uniqueness of Yahweh flow together, for he embodied the one and incarnated the other, climactically fulfilling the mission of both.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

L. Hurtado, One Lord, One God: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism; C. J. H. Wright, Knowing Jesus through the Old Testament; idem, Thinking Clearly about the Uniqueness of Jesus; N. T. Wright, Who was Jesus?

United Arab Emirates

(Est. 2000 pop.: 2,107,000; 83,600 sq. km. [32,278 sq. mi.]) Home to no indigenous Christian community after the Arab conquest of the seventh century, Abu Dhabi became headquarters of the Roman Catholic vicariate of Arabia in 1974, which serves immigrant Eastern rite Catholics (Maronites, Melkites, Chaldeans, and others) attracted there by development of the region’s oil fields. Various Orthodox and non-Chalcedonian Christians, including Armenians and Indian Mar Thomists, also work in the form of the Christian community of the United Arab Emirates and other Persian Gulf principalities. At the time of writing, exact figures of their strength are unavailable. Christians may number over 150,000, or are estimated around 8 percent of the 2.1 million people of the United Arab Emirates.

Until April 1975, the United Arab Emirates permitted the building of churches. Authorities welcomed personal visits by Western missionaries of various traditions. Christians worked openly and freely. In April 1975, however, the sheikdoms forbade any further proselytizing activity by non-Muslims among Muslims. Christians exercise influence covertly, through two Catholic schools, or by Christian broadcasts in Arabic heard over international stations.

United Kingdom (Est. 2000 pop.: 59,022,000; 244,100 sq. km. [94,247 sq. mi.]). The origins of Christianity in the British Isles are not clearly identified: suffice it to say that missionary endeavor had established a Celtic church by the second, or at the latest, the third century. By the fourth century it was well enough established to send delegates to the Synod of Arles (314), though there is some evidence that in these early years Christianity was a religion of the poor, rather than of the army or wealthier or better-organized parts of the population. In the fifth century, that Christian Celtic culture was pushed to the extremities of the British Isles by Saxon invasions, where it was maintained, isolated from continental influences, not least through the endeavor, in the late sixth and early seventh centuries, of monks of the caliber of Columba and Aidan, and their followers. This isolation meant that when Augustine was sent from Rome in 596 to reestablish the English church, there was a difference in emphasis between the churchmanship that he brought from Rome and the spirituality of the old Celtic Christians in the north and the west, though an accommodation was achieved at Whitby in 664. By the beginning of the next century, Britain was sending missionaries to Europe, among the most famous of whom was the Devon monk, Boniface, whose missionary endeavors extended as far east as Thuringia and Bavaria. Until the time of Wycliffe, the Scriptures were only partially available in English but the Wycliffite reforms stimulated the production of an English text even if it was not approved by the official church. Subsequently it became one of the achievements of the Renaissance to nurture critical awareness of the documents that lay behind the Vulgate, and, from those improved sources, to secure those reliable vernacular translations which did so much to encourage the work of the Reformation. Thus the importance of Miles Coverdale, who in 1535 produced on the Continent the first complete English Bible. His predecessor, William Tyndale, produced an English New Testament in 1526 but never published the whole Bible before his early death in exile in 1536. Surprisingly the renewed biblical scholarship of the Reformation did not immediately lead to renewed missionary activity from the new reformed churches: some churches were too busy establishing their new identity as over against the claims of the Counter-Reformation. Elsewhere an exaggerated Calvinism paralyzed the church’s outreach. At the end of the seventeenth century, Thomas Bray was influential in founding both the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (1698), part of whose function was to disperse religious literature overseas. Bray also founded the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (1701), which, though partly focused on a ministry among expatriates, provided for evangelizing the non-Christian races of the world, a task taken up some thirty years later by the Moravians.

At the end of the eighteenth century, the Evangelical Revival began to produce a new concern for overseas missions. In 1783 Thomas Coke, a close associate of John Wesley, published his Plan of the Society for the Establishment of Missions among the Heathen, nine years before William Carey’s An Enquiry into the Obligations of Christians, to use Means for the Conversion of the Heathen, which led to the founding that same year of the Baptist Missionary Society (1792), the first of the new evangelical societies, followed in 1795 by the founding of the London Missionary Society. Originally called simply The Mission Society, it was initially a pan-evangelical initiative though it subsequently became de facto a Congregational agency, as other denominations founded their own societies. Four years later; in 1799, what was to become the Church Missionary Society was founded. Later came the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society (1818). Not until 1824 did the Church of Scotland begin to undertake work on its own account.

Typical of the new missionary theology which emerged in the 1780s was Andrew Fuller’s The Gospel Worthy of All Acceptation (1781–85), which translated into an English context some of the new thinking about classical Calvinism that was circulating in North America from the pen of Jonathan Edwards. Fuller’s work sought to correct, where it existed, that hyper-Calvinism which Joseph Ivimey cruelly depicted as the “non-application, non-invitation system,” when preachers, paralyzed by the idea of God’s sovereign determination of the numbers of the elect, feared to preach seeking a human response to the gospel message. Edward Williams, twenty years later, was to serve a similar purpose for Congregationalists. This new understanding of God’s purposes rather than the increased English knowledge of Africa, Asia, and the Pacific explains the timing of the founding of the modern missionary movement, putting it in a wider theological context than just a spin off from the abolition movement. Thus it provoked an interest in domestic as much as overseas missions. The two together were the fruit of a prayerful search among evangelical dissenters in the 1780s for an outpouring of the gifts of the Holy Spirit. Thus the missionary societies should not be separated from the founding of the great interdenominational adventures such as the Religious Tract Society (1799), the British and Foreign Bible Society (1804), and the London City Mission (1835).

By the 1830s the missionary idea had become nationalized into the view that Britain was a Christian nation which, in the context of her increasing power worldwide, imposed upon her the responsibilities of taking the Christian faith to all nations. Such mission endeavor was not at the behest of imperial pro-consuls but very often despite them because they feared that missionary enthusiasm would upset an easy tolerance of other living faiths and their religious practices. Thus the British Baptists in India initially had to seek Danish patronage because of the hostility of the East India Company. It was not until after the First World War that the imperial government came to realize that it was to extend educational opportunities within the empire then mission agencies offered the most economical possibilities. Thus it came to be that an association developed between British missions and an emerging educated elite that soon began to speak in nationalist tones.

For the first thirty years of the great Victorian era of missions, new developments in missionary strategy generally came by way of denominational initiatives. HUDSON TAYLOR’S founding of the CHINA INLAND MISSION in 1865 again proposed an interdenominational mission adventure. In so doing he developed the prototype of modern FAITH MISSION, not directly soliciting funds from supporters, investing control of mission operations in the decision making of missionaries in the field, and encouraging missionaries to identify with those to whom they ministered in dress and culture.

In 1846 international cooperation found an instrument for its nurture through the establishment of the Evangelical Alliance, an alliance of individual Christians rather than of churches. Even this body found it difficult to reconcile their differences over slave-holding and it was not until 1867 that an American branch was established. Two years prior to the establishing of the Evangelical Alliance, George Williams had begun what became the YMCA, an international organization for evangelism among young men. Lay, interdenominational, and international it, like the Evangelical Alliance, sought to bring together Christians of different traditions. A third initiative in this era was the founding in 1886 of the Student Volunteer Missionary Union, under whose influence many of the ablest young people offered themselves for service overseas, under the urgent slogan “The evangelization of the world in this generation.” Both their missionary vocation and their university experience argued against the denominational straitjacket that had emerged in Victorian England. To surmount such barriers, in the interests of global mission, the Edinburgh WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE was convened. Whatever their meanings in Europe and North America, most denominational differences meant little or nothing in the South, and served only to impede the effective implementation of missionary strategies worldwide. Thus the missionary agenda gave birth to the ecumenical agenda.

John H. Y. Briggs

See also Scotland.

United States of America (Est. 2000 pop.: 275,119,000; 9,363,520 sq. km. [3,615,255 sq. mi.]). Missionary activity to North America, before and after the American Revolution, cannot be separated from attempts at conquest and then the many waves of immigration, first from Europe, later from other continents.

The earliest activity was by various Roman Catholic orders. They engaged in mission from Florida to California, sponsored at first by the governments of Spain and France. Three Spanish Franciscans, accompanying a military expedition, entered the American Southwest in 1540, remaining when the soldiers left in 1542. At least one was martyred, the others were never heard from again. Spanish Dominicans and Jesuits worked among Native Americans in Florida later in the century, while French priests moved into what is now New York State and down into the Mississippi valley in the eighteenth century. A number of them were tortured and martyred. In the later half of the eighteenth century JUNÍPERO SERRA established a chain of missions in California, which led to the baptism of 100,000 native people. English Jesuits entered the colony of Maryland in 1634, working with Native Americans as well as English immigrants. Roman Catholic missionary activity continued through the succeeding centuries, directed both toward immigrants and Native American groups farther west.

Robert Hunt, pastor of the first Jamestown colony in 1606, went to minister to the colonists and to win “savages” to Christ. His successor, Alexander Whitaker, who baptized Pocahontas, wrote in 1613 that they were planting the kingdom of God in the New World. Money was raised in England to establish a college to educate Native American youth in the Christian faith but the massacre of 1622, which killed 382 settlers, put an end to such attempts in Virginia.

In New England one aspect of the “Errand into the Wilderness” was to evangelize the “Indians.” The charters of the Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay colonies both called for the conversion of the United States of America

“savages” and in 1636 a law was passed calling for the preaching of the gospel to them. John Eliot, a Cambridge graduate, arrived in Boston in 1631, going to Roxbury as teacher in 1632, where he stayed until his death in 1690. He preached his first sermon in the Algonquin language in 1646, in 1653 he published a catechism, the first book printed in a North American language, and in 1663, the entire Bible was published. The first “Indian” church was established in 1660.

Four generations of the Mayhew family worked on Martha’s Vineyard, beginning in 1646 and the Gospel of John and the Psalms were translated into the local language. By 1674 there were 1,800 native Christians on the island and 2,000 on the mainland, several having been ordained as pastors. Much of this work was destroyed in King Philip’s War.

Johan Campanius, a Swedish Lutheran, worked among settlers and Native Americans on the lower Delaware River, beginning in 1643. He learned the local language, translated Luther’s Small Catechism, and formed a congregation.

The Anglican Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG), established by Thomas Bray in 1701, was active in North America up to the American Revolution. By 1785, when virtually all its personnel left, it had employed 310 ordained missionaries in North America. John and Charles Wesley served under the SPG briefly in Georgia. Its missionaries worked with immigrants, seeking to win them to strict Anglicanism, as well as with Native Americans and with Negroes. In 1741, the Rector in Albany reported he had 500 “Indians” under his care, and that year the SPG counted sixteen missionaries working among Native Americans and Negroes in New York. Despite the opposition of slaveholders, the Society established four schools for Negroes. Although there was less work among slaves than Native Americans, the Presbyterian, Samuel Davies, also preached to Negroes and admitted them to communicant membership in his church in Virginia.

Perhaps the most impressive work with Native Americans was done by Moravians. While Count Zinzendorf ministered to German and other immigrants, seeking to bring unity to the divided churches, Christian Henry Rauch began work in New York in 1740, but was forced to take his flock to an area near Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, where the community of Gnadenhutten was established with 500 believers. After almost all of them, including the missionaries, were massacred in 1755, the mission settled in what is now Ohio, where a large number were won to the Faith.

The First Great Awakening brought new missionary efforts. John Sargent established a mission at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, in 1734, later to be occupied by Jonathan Edwards. Eleazer Wheelock founded an “Indian” school at Lebanon, Connecticut, which became Dartmouth College (see Occam, Samson), while the ministry of David Brainerd from 1744 to 1747 is well known and would become a catalyst for the worldwide missionary movement.

Another category of mission activity was directed toward the European immigrants, mainly by the more vital branches of their mother churches in Europe. Francis Makemie formed a Presbyterian church in Snow Hill, Maryland, in 1684 and worked for religious liberty. John Boehm began to minister to German Reformed colonists in 1720, Michael Schlatter to the Swiss in 1746, and Henry Muhlenberg came from Pietist Halle in 1742 to organize Lutheran churches among German settlers. The Quakers, ardently missionary in their first generation, ministered mainly to English colonists but were early leaders in the movement against slavery.

John Wesley sent a number of preachers to North America but most left when the Revolution began. Francis Asbury, who became their best known early leader, remained, and led the Methodists as they ministered effectively to newly arrived immigrants seeking land, especially across the Southeast. Their flexible style of leadership selection and training, their evangelistic zeal, and their constant travel combined to make them the largest American Protestant church by 1850. Their membership included large numbers of Black slaves and a smaller number of Native Americans.

Mission to the United States today is coming from former “mission fields” as churches from Asia, Latin America, and, to a lesser extent, Africa, send personnel to minister to immigrants who have come here. The largest group are the Koreans, who have established at least three thousand churches in the United States, and in some cases are beginning to reach out to non-Koreans. The effectiveness of their work is seen in the fact that while 25 percent of the population in Korea is Christian, it is estimated that between 65 percent and 75 percent of Koreans in the United States are Christians. Other groups come from Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Singapore. From the Philippines the newer churches are primarily involved in mission rather than the more traditional church extension. Among them are the charismatic Bread of Life Church, and the Iglesia Ni Cristo, a rapidly growing group with Arian Christology. Some Pentecostal as well as “mainline” groups from Latin America send missionaries to work with Spanish and Portuguese speakers. The Universal Church of the Kingdom of God, which originated in Brazil, has planted a number of churches among Hispanics in the United States. And the Nigerian Evangelical Church of West Africa, originally established by
United States Mission Boards and Societies

Intercultural mission activities supported by church groups in the United States were already underway among Native Americans in the late 1700s. The first organization established in the United States for overseas mission work was initiated in 1810 by the General Association of Congregational Churches in Massachusetts and was called the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM). This action was taken, not without some misgivings, in response to a petition presented by several students, including Samuel J. Mills, Adoniram Judson, and Luther Rice, from Andover Seminary. These and several other students also volunteered to be ABCFM’s first missionaries.

In 1816 the first specialized service mission agency not part of a denomination, The American Bible Society, was formed. It united several local societies by pastors and laymen representing several denominations “to disseminate the Gospel of Christ throughout the habitable world.” Most of the organizations in this period, however, were denominational, with the Methodists (1820), Episcopalians (1821), Dutch Reformed (1823), Presbyterians (1837), and others mounting overseas mission efforts. The missionaries of these agencies usually worked in the coastal areas.

During this early period “auxiliaries” began to be formed by women to supplement financially and in other ways encourage missionaries. Initially only married women, whose primary duty was to be that of a “missionary wife,” were sent out. But by 1835 the Baptists had sent three single women missionaries to Burma. However, after one of them died of jungle fever in less than eighteen months, the board was reluctant to send more single women. In 1861 the Woman’s Union Missionary Society was founded. Its board consisted of women from several evangelical denominations and its focus was sending single women to be missionaries among women. Following this, separate women’s boards were organized by many denominations and in less than thirty years women constituted 60% of the missionary force.

By the 1880s new agencies came on the scene desiring to go beyond the more accessible coastal regions to reach those who had not yet heard. For example, the U.S. branch of the China Inland Mission (now OMF International) followed its British counterpart in focusing on the inland territories of China. The movement that became the Christian and Missionary Alliance sent out over three hundred workers within a five-year period to regions without churches. Many missions started in the later 1800s were not related to a single denomination but drew personnel and support from churches of different denominations.

In 1886 Dwight L. Moody conducted a month-long Bible study for 251 students from 89 colleges. The gathering was organized by Luther Wishard, the national secretary of the YMCA who possessed a world vision. From that conference grew the Student Volunteer Movement (SVM) which began asking college students to sign a declaration card stating “It is my purpose, if God permit, to become a foreign missionary.” By 1891, the year of the SVM’s first national student missionary convention, 321 had responded and sailed overseas.

In the early 1900s there was a renewed emphasis on the work of the Holy Spirit by Pentecostal and other believers. In 1914 the General Council of the Assemblies of God was organized with one of the purposes being a united effort for world evangelism. By 1918 there were 73 overseas missionaries on the roster of the General Council. They and other Pentecostal mission agencies continued to grow and had a significant impact in Latin America and other areas.

The first Roman Catholic organization in the United States to send missionaries overseas was founded in 1911 in Maryknoll, New York. Prior to that the United States was regarded as a receiving mission field by the Roman Catholic Church and attention was focused on providing churches for recently immigrated Catholics from Europe. The Orthodox Christian Mission Center, the official mission and evangelism agency of all Canonical Orthodox churches in North America, was established in 1994. Prior to that some missionaries had been sent by individual Orthodox bodies.

In 1934 an additional dimension in missions led to the formation of the Wycliffe Bible Translators. This specialized service mission agency was co-founded by W. Cameron Townsend, whose earlier experiences in Latin America had convinced him that the Bible needed to be translated into the vernacular languages spoken by the tribal groups to overcome language barriers. At the same time missionaries, such as Donald McGavran in India, recognized that social barriers also needed to be seriously considered for suc-
United States Mission Boards and Societies

Successful evangelism and church planting to take place. This set the stage for viewing world evangelization in terms of ethnolinguistic peoples and sociologically defined people groups (see Peoples, People Groups).

At the end of World War II in 1945, mission boards and societies remobilized. Also new forms of missionary and mission support organizations appeared. Recruitment at the college student level was again a significant factor. As the SVM turned inward, an ongoing student mission convention was organized by the InterVarsity Christian Fellowship under the direction of J. Christy Wilson Sr. in 1946. Student ministries of Campus Crusade for Christ, The Navigators, and others also presented the challenge of world evangelization. This resulted in thousands becoming missionaries.

In 1974, the people group approach became widely known after the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization. There an Unreached Peoples Directory was made available as a start in the needed worldwide research and a plenary presentation called for continuing the transition to an unreached peoples approach.

In the late 1990s the long-term Protestant mission force sent overseas by U.S. boards and agencies stands at a little over 33,000 men and women. Short-term personnel serving terms of 1 to 4 years is around 6,500. With the opening of Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, personnel involved in short-term service of less than a year grew dramatically to over 63,000 by 1996.

John A. Siewert

Unity. The subject of Christian unity immediately evokes several basic questions: “With whom?” “By whom?” and “For whom?” In response, the meaning of Christian unity can be stated in objective terms as a foundational New Testament truth. It is first and foremost an understanding about Christ and salvation. Second, it is an attitude of belonging, respect, and fellowship. Third, it is an action that expresses union with Christ and with others of his body. Succinctly, biblical Christian unity is a supernatural reality based on the ontological truth of the union of believers with Christ. Since all true believers have been united to Christ through the new birth, they have likewise been united to one another as members of his body, the church.

The outstanding or implications of Christian unity are expressed in a variety of New Testament references. In John’s Gospel, Christ speaks of believers being one, as the Father and the Son are one. In 1 Corinthians, Paul likens the unity of the human body to the unity of Christians. Again, in Ephesians, he speaks of the true unity of Christians as a reflection of the unity of the Holy Trinity. Each of these descriptions is linked with a causal clause, which shows a consistent call for visible evidence of the spiritual reality of union with Christ for the purpose of witness and outreach. The reality of Christian unity is a fundamental spiritual truth, tied together with the foundational purpose of the church’s mission in the world.

What does the absence of reference to organizational or ecclesiastical forms in the New Testament texts indicate about unity? Surely, it eliminates any basis for dogmatic imposition of structures. At the same time, all Christians are called to make the practical expression of Christian unity a high priority, or suffer the consequences of ineffective witness and outreach.

Daryl Platt

Universalism. Universalism proposes that salvation is universal in its nature and scope; salvation is not only available to all, it is applicable to all and ultimately will be realized by all. Thus, universalism does not divide the human race into two groups, the saved and the lost. Instead, in various ways it maintains that all will be actually saved. Among the advocates of universalism there are great differences both in their conceptualization of the doctrine and in the degree of their dogmatism. The common denominator shared by all universalists is the belief that in the end all humans will be saved. This premise is based primarily on the goodness and sovereignty of God’s love. Universalists, following the logic of God’s omnipotent love, argue that since God is love, he saves people, and since God is omnipotent love, he will necessarily save all people.

The history of universalism is complex because it is interconnected with other theological issues such as the nature of God, the relationship between his love and justice, the deity of Christ, the nature of the atonement, the authority of the Bible, eternal punishment, and predestination and free will.

In the early church, universalism appeared in the Greek East. The most influential proponent of apokatastasis (universalism) was Origen. With his Platonic logic and allegorical hermeneutical method, he maintained that all intelligent beings (humans, angels, and devils) were created good and equal and with a free will. Those who sinned were restored to God by a process of discipline and punishment that could continue after death. To Origen, punishment was remedial; given unlimited time, it would result in all souls being united to God, including Satan and the devils.
Origen’s universalism was condemned at the Council of Constantinople in 543. While advocates of universalism are found throughout church history, it was not until the nineteenth and twentieth centuries that the doctrine found wide acceptance and popularity among liberal and neo-orthodox theologians. During the nineteenth century Darwinian evolution provided the worldview for some universalists to envision the soul’s upward progress toward God.

The nineteenth-century German theologian F. D. E. Schleiermacher constructed his universalism on predestination and the all-determining will of God. In contrast to double predestination (some humans elected to salvation and others to lostness), Schleiermacher asserted that all people are elected to salvation in Christ and that the purposes and omnipotence of God cannot fail. In nineteenth-century England a less dogmatic universalism appeared with an uneasiness about Hell, a conditional mortality, and a “wider hope” for universal salvation.

A more dogmatic universalism took root during the twentieth century. C. H. Dodd constructed his universalism from the Bible based on the idea of development in the thought of Paul in Scripture. He concluded that the mercy of God will be as universally effective as sin has been. John A. T. Robinson asserted that hell is the existential reality of humans challenged by the gospel (judgment is the only way in which sinful persons can hear grace) and that universal salvation is the reality which God wills. For Robinson universalism was a necessity because of God’s omnipotent love. Any final judgment would be a frustration of God’s purposes and love. Robinson overcame the difficulty of human freedom with a paradigm of freedom being freely overcome and constrained by divine love.

Since the 1970s, the locus of universalism has been the plurality of religions. Advocated by such theologians as John Hick and Paul Knitter, pluralism denies the exclusiveness or even the superiority of Christianity over other religions. The pluralist insists, on the basis of historical relativism, that the various religions are attempts to conceptualize the Mystery. Thus, God reveals himself to some degree and provides salvation through the different religions of the world.

There are several important missiological implications of universalism and its alternative views of annihilation, conditional immortality, postmortem salvation, pluralism, and inclusivism. First, universalism redefines the meaning of missions. If all ultimately will be saved and lostness is merely an existential situation, then the only purpose of missions is to better the lives of people in this world and not to affect their destiny in the world to come. In contrast, the impetus of evangelical missions is rooted in the belief in life after death, the judgment of all people, and the eternity of heaven and hell.

Second, universalism alters the message of missions. In the universalist construct all exclusive language, in which truth claims are asserted about the uniqueness of Christ or the soteriological necessity of faith in Christ, is regarded as arrogant and divisive in relationship to other faiths. In place of the proclamation of the normativeness and finality of Christ, universalism promotes dialogue with other faiths that both acknowledges their legitimacy and affirms that love embraces all peoples of all times. While acknowledging the place of dialogue and respect, evangelical missions insists on a biblically rooted Christology and the attendant confession of the supremacy of Christ in salvation.

Third, universalism strikes at the heart of the urgency of missions. If explicit knowledge about the person and work of Christ and personal faith in Christ as a definitive decision in this life are not necessary for salvation, then the pressing motivation to take the gospel to all the world is eliminated. Evangelical missions, however, maintains that the proclamation of the unique gospel of Jesus Christ is the only means whereby people can be saved.

Fourth, universalism begs the question of the unreached multitudes of the world. If all will be saved then there is no imperative to take the gospel to those who have never heard the Good News. In contradistinction, evangelical missions is compelled by the conviction that the only hope of the unevangelized is through a viable witness of the gospel.

Donald R. Dunavant

See also Justice of God, Judgment, Love of God, and Mercy of God.

Universality of Mission. The universality of mission is the mandate of mission that the gospel be proclaimed to all the peoples of the world. It includes providing all peoples with the opportunity to hear with understanding the message of salvation found only in Jesus Christ, the opportunity to accept or reject him as Lord and Savior, and the opportunity to serve him in the fellowship of a church.

The impetus of the universality of mission arises from the nature of the gospel itself. The universality of the gospel, in turn, is inextricably linked to its uniqueness, a uniqueness found in its christology (see also Uniqueness of Christ). The incarnation, crucifixion, and resurrection of Jesus is the message of the presence of the eternal God providing in Christ the only way of salvation for all those living in spiritual darkness and death. The biblical witness is that “God was pleased to have all his fullness dwell in him [Jesus], and through him to reconcile to himself all things whether things on earth or things in heaven, by making peace through his blood, shed on the cross” (Col. 1:19–20). It is only in this unique gospel of Jesus Christ that the world is confronted with the reality of the redemption of God. Thus, the gospel is for all the world because it is about all the world. It alone reveals the alienation of all humans from God and the hope of their reconciliation to God.
Universality of Mission

The religious pluralist objects that such a particular and exclusive claim of salvation in Christ is a barrier to genuine relationship with those of other faiths (see pluralism and universalism). But if the uniqueness of the gospel is denied, how is one to affirm God's intention to provide the means of salvation for the world and the historical event that actualized salvation? It is the uniqueness of the gospel that requires that all the peoples of the world hear the content and condition of God's provision of salvation in Christ and be given the opportunity to believe in Jesus. Thus it is out of the unique message of the gospel that the necessity, urgency, obligation, and self-sacrifice of global mission emerge in their fullest implications (see also Missionary Task, The).

Further, in the Great Commission, the Lord Jesus commands the universal dissemination of the gospel. Matthew 28:18–20, Mark 15:16, Luke 24:46–47, and Acts 1:8 restate the intent of the commission in different words with the same effect—the gospel is to go to “all nations,” “all the world,” “all the nations,” and to “the uttermost parts of the earth.” In the Matthew passage Jesus prefaces his commission with the assertion of his absolute authority in heaven and on earth. To fail to take the gospel to all the world is tantamount to disobedience to the lordship of Christ.

The Matthew passage also provides added dimension to the scope of the commission. Donald McGavran proposed that “all nations” (panta ta ethne) refers to all the peoples of the world; that is, all humanity, all who live on earth, all the ethnolinguistic groups of the world (see also peoples, people groups). The mandate of the Great Commission is to make disciples in all the world through evangelism, church planting, and instruction.

The importance of every individual, moreover, is related to the universality of mission. John 3:16 clearly declares God's intent that the message of his loving provision of salvation be universally communicated. “For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life.” Each person, as a special creation of God, deserves the occasion to have his or her spiritual need and hunger met by God's redemptive love.

The universality of mission also has eschatological implications. Our Lord appears to link global evangelization with his return (see also Millennial Thought and Mission). In Matthew 24:14 he declares, “And this gospel of the kingdom will be preached in the whole world as a testimony to all nations, and then the end will come.” In Revelation 5:9 praise is ascribed to the enthroned Lord Jesus because with his blood he bought people “for God from every tribe and language and people and nation.”

The ultimate impetus of the universality of mission is the glory of God. That is, global mission is driven by God's intention to redeem to himself a people to love and praise him out of all the nations and people groups of the world (see also worship).

Donald R. Dunavant

Unreached Peoples. See peoples, people groups.

Uppsala Assembly (1968). See World Council of Churches Assemblies.

Urban Churches. The apostle Paul, as he journeyed from city to city to help start new churches, clearly understood the importance of reaching cities. Cities are centers of power and influence spreads from the city outward. If the gospel took hold in the cities, it would naturally spread to areas surrounding the cities.

The Reformation also was an urban movement. It began in the cities of Europe and was established there, only later moving to the countryside. Despite this early urban history, the church today is handicapped by an anti-urban bias that has been very difficult to reverse. While the world is urbanizing at a very rapid rate, the church has been slow to respond. Two exceptions in the United States are the African American Churches and the Roman Catholic Church. Both these churches have been far more at home in the city than the Anglo Protestant Church. Mission movements that have originated with the latter churches have exported this anti-urban bias to other continents, even while thousands flock daily to the cities of the Southern world. Thus while cities continue to grow, the percentage of Christians in these cities continues to decrease.

Many challenges face the urban church if the church is to be taken seriously in the urban world at the end of the twentieth century. Old wineskins will need to give way to new ones. Although there are many different forms of the church in the city, clearly they must be forms that break with traditional ways of being church. Many rural-oriented groups that begin work in the cities start by planting essentially rural churches in the city. While these churches may be successful with recent migrants to the city...
whose worldview was formed in villages and nonurban areas, these rural models do not work for those who have lived in the city for many years.

One question often raised is whether these newcomers to the city are more open to the gospel, or whether the city instead has a secularizing effect. Evidence can be found for both views. Moving to the city begins the breakdown of traditional worldviews, thus people are more open to new ideas, including Christianity. Others come to the cities having been active in local churches, yet are lost to the church because of the drive to survive or the lure of consumerism. Materialism easily becomes the new religion. In either case, the church does well to respond quickly to reach out to recent migrants whose needs are great at all levels.

To become truly rooted in urban soil, the church must contextualize to the urban way of life. One prominent characteristic of that way of life is diversity. While churches may still choose to target certain populations, the church must realize that many true urbanites value this diversity of cultures, classes, backgrounds, and sexual orientations. This diversity can even be seen within the same immigrant group. The needs of the youth raised in the city are often very different from those of their parents. Korean churches in Los Angeles have services and youth programs in English as they attempt to keep their youth in the church.

Since many urban people consider the church irrelevant or foreign to their lives, another challenge of the church in the city is the mission of the church beyond the walls of the church building. If people will not come to the church, the church must find ways to go to where people are. This may be in homes, but it may also mean taking the church to public places where life is lived for many urbanites. The church does not live only for itself but to be a witness to the reign of God. This witness needs to take place both within the church and in the public sphere.

Although not all churches in the city are poor churches (despite stereotypes to the contrary), the church in the city needs to take seriously the plight of the poor. Whether they live in inner cities or squatter settlements on the edges of the cities of the Southern world, the systems of the city easily exploit the poor and the powerless. Yet poverty is not only a problem for the poor but also for the affluent. Despite efforts to scapegoat inner cities as problems, these areas are reflections of larger societal problems that affect everyone. Although they are very difficult to achieve, creative, non-paternalistic partnerships are needed between affluent and poorer churches that will lead to mutual understanding and transformation.

Other characteristics of cities also provide challenges—rapid change, increasing consumerism, the spirit of individualism, the systemic nature of the city. While one church might be overwhelmed by such challenges, urban churches are realizing the value of networking. Around the world church leaders are gathering in prayer networks to work together and encourage each other. They are realizing that the city is the place God wants to grow his church and demonstrate his transforming power in the lives of people and their communities.

Jude Tiernstra Watson

Urbana Missions Conferences

In 1945 the InterVarsity Christian Fellowship (IVCF) and the Student Foreign Missions Fellowship (SFMF) merged, and SFMF became the missions department of IVCF. In the aftermath of World War II it was decided to experiment with a student missions conference. Thus in December 1946 IVCF/SFMF sponsored a conference at the University of Toronto that was attended by 575 students from across Canada and the United States. The response was overwhelmingly positive. So IVCF/SFMF decided to hold another convention in a more geographically central location.

In 1948 a second convention was held at the University of Illinois in the city of Urbana. This time nearly 1,300 students attended. It was so successful that it was decided to give every college student at least one opportunity to attend. Thus conventions have been held triennially from December 27 to 31 at Urbana. At Urbana 1976 the capacity of 17,000 seats in Assembly Hall at the University of Illinois was reached, and IVCF had to turn away students for the first time. Since then, most of the conventions have been filled to capacity. Today IVCF accepts up to 19,000 students, using closed-circuit television in other campus locations.

The purposes of the convention traditionally have been fourfold: (1) to present the biblical basis of world missions, helping students to understand what the Bible says about God’s concern and plan for the world; (2) to present the contemporary situation, exposing students to what God is doing in world missions and what remains to be done; (3) to challenge students to respond to God’s claims on their lives, to commit themselves to whatever he wishes for them in fulfilling the Great Commission; and (4) to challenge students to return to their campuses and share the vision for world missions that God has given Urbanization. Wandering Cain's move to a city (Gen. 4:17) and the call for volunteers to live in a rebuilt Jerusalem (Neh. 11:1–2) point to urbanization's most familiar side: the process of people migrating to cities and the growth of those centers of power. Often associated with that definition is still another dimension—the impact of the city on humanity.

Changes in Research. Past discussions in Sociology and cultural Anthropology have placed emphasis on the target of urbanization, the city as a place of population density, size, and social heterogeneity. Propelling these studies was an anti-urban bias that argued urbanization led to stress, estrangement, dislocation, and anomie (Gullick, 1989, 5–20).

This static, deterministic path has not helped missions; it has reinforced stereotypes of the church's often negative view of the city. Urbanization as a common grace provision of God loses its remedial role in human and social change.

All this is changing. Current urban research still recognizes that population size and density are common to virtually all definitions of the city. But scholarship is also recognizing that such criteria are minimal and threshold in nature, not all-or-nothing characteristics. Attention is turning from the city as place to the city (and to urbanization) as process. Other dimensions—religious, institutional, social, cultural, behavioral—must also be examined.

Alongside this shift is coming new attention to urban mission. In the wake of massive global urbanization since World War II the church is seeing the process as a "bridge of God" and the city as the stage for evangelization in the twenty-first century. Research and strategy planning are speaking of "gateway cities." New holistic partnerships of church planting, evangelism, and social transformation are being formed (Conn, 1997, 25–34, 193–202).

Missions and History's Urban Waves. The church's awareness of the city is not a recent development in world history. Missions has made use of each of the three great waves of urbanization that have preceded ours. In the first wave the city as the symbol of civilization shifted from its place as a religious shrine to a city-state to a military and socio-political center. And in the midst of the Greco-Roman world that was its climax the church was born. Along the roads that led to Rome, the church, following Paul and the early Christian community, carried the gospel to the far corners of the empire.

By the middle of the third century seven missionary bishops had been sent to cities in Gaul (including Paris). In southern Italy there were over a hundred bishoprics, all centered in cities. One hundred years after it became a licensed religion of the empire in A.D. 313, it numbered 1,200 bishops in the urban centers of North Africa. The church's urban orientation had transformed the Latin term paganus, originally meaning rural dweller, into the word used to describe the unbeliever.

With the decline of the empire, the impact of barbarian invasions, and an expanding Islam, once great western cities became isolated hamlets and autonomous villages. From the fifth to the eleventh centuries the urban world reverted to a rural mosaic. And the church in its administration and architecture became the preserver of Rome's urban political past in its borrowed patterns of parish and diocese (Mumford, 1961, 265–66).

God and gold introduced the second great urban wave as it did the third. Cities found new identities as permanent marketplaces; commerce became urbanization's new partner. The Crusades (1096–1291) were more than holy wars; they expanded trade routes linking Europe and the Middle East. The bubonic plague of the fourteenth century struck a devastating blow to urbanization but Europe recovered. By 1500 the continent numbered 154 cities each with at least 10,000 inhabitants. By 1800 there were 364 such cities.
Increasingly shaping this new movement of urbanization was the Renaissance mentality of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Medieval ideals of Christian knight and Christian prince were replaced. The institutional church was marginalized. Cities were seeing Christianity, represented by its clergy, more and more tied to another world, outsiders to the city.

Interrupting this time of urban transition came the REFORMATION. Under leaders like Martin Luther, Menno Simons, and John Calvin its urban impact was widespread. Fifty of the sixty-five imperial cities subject to the emperor officially recognized the Reformation either permanently or periodically. Of Germany’s almost 200 cities with populations exceeding 1,000 most witnessed Protestant movements. Geneva under Calvin became the Jerusalem of Europe. Its impact stretched far and wide.

Ultimately the Reformation remained a parenthesis. It had hoped the city would be the urban exhibition of God’s righteousness in Christ. But it could not stop the growing Renaissance emphasis on the SECULARIZATION of the city. The urban citizen transformed the Reformation call to the obedience of faith into freedom from religious superstition and nominalist uncertainty. A new ethic of urban service arose outside the institutional church.

The third great urban wave centered in the machine and the Industrial Revolution. The city turned for its symbol from the temple, the castle, and the marketplace to the factory.

Europe’s colonial expansion and “new world discoveries” prefaced that revolution with previews of future urban patterns. Greed bypassed the indigenous cities of Africa, Asia, and Latin America to found colonial port cities as collection points for gathered wealth and natural resources. European racism harvested Africa’s “black gold” of slaves from those same ports. Christian missions used those urban paths opened by COLONIALISM, promoting a growing pattern of “civilizing and Christianizing.”

Industrialization in Europe, following the fatigue of the Napoleonic wars, gave a renewed lease on life to global expansionism and internal urbanization. England led the way. By 1790–1810 it was “the workshop of the world.” London, followed by Liverpool and Manchester, grew from nearly 900,000 in 1800 to nearly 3 million in 1861.

The emerging United States turned quickly to industrialization. And urbanization followed (Conn, 1994, 49–58). In the one hundred years between 1790 and 1890 its total population grew sixteenfold and its urban population 139-fold. By contrast, the non-Anglo-Saxon world remained basically rural.

Soon colonialism shifted to a territorial form as it sought for political, social, and economic leverage. And Protestant missions, fed by the GREAT AWAKENINGS and the Anglo-Saxon power base of the “industrial age,” turned the nineteenth-century global expansion of Western powers into the “Great Century” of church growth.

By 1900, the number of urban Christians totaled 159,600,000 (Barrett, 1997, 25). But they were located largely in the cities of Europe and North America. Missionary strategy had focused wisely on the rural world that still made up the vast bulk of global population. As it did, the West was becoming overwhelmed by urban poverty and immigrant needs; a strong anti-urban spirit began to emerge, fed by Anglo ethnocentrism (Lees, 1985).

Missions and the Fourth Urban Wave. Since World War II massive urban growth has shifted into high gear everywhere except North America and Europe. The number of city dwellers in 1985 was twice as great as the entire population of the world in 1800 (Abu-Lughod, 1991, 53). Africa’s urbanization rate is the most rapid. Its urban population, 7 percent in 1920, more than quadrupled in 1980. Asia’s urban population will likely hit 40 percent by 2000, a 665 percent growth over 1920. Seventy-four percent of Latin American and Caribbean populations lived in urban areas by 1997.

A unique feature of this urban wave is the trend toward ever-larger urban agglomerations. In 1900 there were 18 cities in the world with populations over one million; thirteen were in Europe and North America. At the turn of the twenty-first century, that figure will surpass 354. And 236 of the total will be found in developing countries (Barrett, 1986, 47). In 1991 there were 14 so-called mega-cities (exceeding 10 million inhabitants). Their number is expected to double by 2015, when most of them will be in developing countries. By contrast, the large cities of the West (London, New York, Paris) are not expecting much growth. The world’s urban center of gravity is moving from the northern to the southern hemisphere.

Two realities of great significance for the future of the Christian mission are emerging out of this shift. First, the growth of the cities in non-Christian or anti-Christian countries, combined with the erosion of the church in the northern hemisphere, is multiplying the non-Christian urban population. In 1900 the world greeted 5,200 new non-Christian urban dwellers per day; by 1997, that figure had reached 127,000 (Barrett, 1997, 25). Out of the ten largest cities in the world in 1995, seven are located in countries with only minimal Christian impact. Increasingly, to speak of those outside of Christ is to speak of the urban dweller.

And, second, to speak increasingly of the urban lost is to speak of the poor. It is estimated that half the urban population in the southern hemisphere live in slums or shantytowns. In the year 2000, 33.6 percent of the world will be in cities in less developed regions. Forty percent of that number will be squatters (846 million). The last frontier of urban evangelism and ministry has become the “unmissionaried” urban poor (Conn 1997, 159).
Urbanization

Harvie M. Conn

See also Urban Churches.

Uruguay (Est. 2000 pop.: 3,274,000; 177,414 sq. km. [68,500 sq. mi.]). Uruguay is a small republic on the southeast coast of South America, bordered by Brazil on the north and Argentina on the south and west. Uruguay is noted for its temperate climate, rolling grassy hills, and vacation beaches along the Atlantic coast. Its population is predominantly European (Spanish and Italian) with no extant pure indigenous peoples. Spanish is the official language and the literacy rate is 95 percent. Forty percent of Uruguayan exports come from stock raising, which is the principal agricultural activity although only 8 percent of the population lives in rural areas. There is a two-party political system that maintains the long-standing advanced social welfare programs. The first European discoverer came in 1516 and the first permanent settlement was established in 1624. In 1726 the Spanish forced the Portuguese out and founded Montevideo, which is now the nation’s capital.

Uruguay became independent in 1828 after obtaining freedom from Spain and shaking off years of subjection to Brazil. After a decline in the widespread benefits of a welfare state, there was an unfortunate eleven-year experiment (1973–84) with military governments. At the end, massive social unrest returned the country to two-party civilian rule.

The nineteenth-century Uruguayan patriot, Jose Artigas, set the tone for the Uruguayan society when he said that “We can expect nothing except from ourselves.” In 1918 the government legislated a strict separation of church and state.

Uruguay is one of the most secularized societies in Latin America where, for example, Christmas is celebrated as Family Day and Easter Holy Week is called Tourism Week. This society has witnessed the results of secularization, with two out of every three marriages resulting in divorce and reputedly Latin America’s highest abortion rate. A Gallup Poll in the 1980s revealed that 37 percent of the population claimed to be atheist. While the government does nothing to promote religion, it does nothing to inhibit it, resulting in complete freedom and a general indifference to religion especially among the well-educated.

About 60 percent of Uruguayans are registered as Roman Catholics, but those who are practicing their religion are more likely 20 percent. Those who call themselves Protestants total less than 4 percent (church members: 47,000 in 72 denominations). Members of evangelical churches are slightly over 2 percent (32,000). Sectarianism is one of the problems faced by the churches of Uruguay. The latest figures indicate there are over 200 foreign missionaries in the country. The number of Mormon church members is roughly 50 percent more than that of evangelical churches. Other marginal Christian churches show as much growth as or more than the evangelicals. There is a large influx of Brazilian spiritists (over 200,000 in the capital), who have more centers in the country than there are Protestant churches. There are about 20 seminaries and Bible schools for Christian leaders. The largest Protestant denomination is the Assemblies of God. Since its initiation in 1946, the Assemblies have grown to 63 churches with a large number of outstations for a total of 6,500 members. At the end of 1995 the Assemblies’ field director reported that although revival had reached other nations in the region, “Uruguay remains resistant.” Uruguay has the notoriety of being labeled the “cemetery of missions.”

David Spruance

Uzbekistan (Est. 2000 pop.: 25,383,000; 447,400 sq. km. [172,741 sq. mi.]). Uzbekistan is the most densely populated of the Central Asian republics of the former Soviet Union. At least 83 percent of the population is of Turkic stock, with ethnic Uzbeks alone making up about 70 percent. Roughly two-thirds of the population is officially Sunni Muslim, although most practice a strongly animistic variety of folk Islam. Uzbekistan is considered to be the Islamic heartland of ex-Soviet Central Asia, and Muslim missionaries from abroad have been very active in strengthening Islam there. Evangelical Christians are few, making up less than 0.25 percent of the population, most being ethnic Slavs or Koreans; few Uzbeks have come to Christ. Although the government has banned all missionary activities, creative efforts are being carried out by a number of Christian organizations.

Raymond P. Prigodich

See also Commonwealth of Independent States.
Vajrayana (Tibetan) Buddhism. Introduced to Tibet from India in the eighth century, MAHAYANA BUDDHISM of the Vajrayana (Tantric) tradition, in combination with Bon, the indigenous religious tradition of Tibet which was highly animistic and shaministic, has exerted great influence upon subsequent Tibetan life and culture.

In common with other forms of Buddhism, Tibetan Buddhism seeks release from the suffering inherent in the ongoing cycle of rebirths (samsara). Liberation from rebirth—nirvana—is to be found in a confluence of proper insight into the nature of ultimate reality, emptiness (sunyata). This comes only through rigorous discipline of the psychic faculties, and reliance upon the compassion of bodhisattvas, who although themselves liberated from rebirth have delayed nirvana so as to assist others. The influence of Tantrism can be seen in its adoption of sexual imagery as symbolic of metaphysical truths (including the notion that sexual union can be a way of experiencing the non-duality of ultimate reality, or Emptiness) and the use of esoteric magical formulas for releasing unusual powers. Tibetan Buddhism also provides one of the most intellectually sophisticated philosophical and psychological traditions in Buddhism.

There are four major schools of Tibetan Buddhism—the Nyingmapa, the Kargyupa, the Sakya, and the Gelugpa. Special monks, or lamas (“one who is superior”), provide leadership within the monastic community and are regarded as reincarnations of previous lamas. The Dalai Lama (currently Tenzin Gyatso) is traditionally the head of the Gelugpa school, and was originally regarded as an incarnation of the bodhisattva of compassion, Avalokita. Whereas prior to Chinese occupation of Tibet in 1951 there were about six thousand monasteries and a monkhood comprising one-fifth of the male population, after 1959 virtually all of Tibet’s monasteries were destroyed and the monks exiled or executed. The Dalai Lama was forced into exile in India. Religious activity in Tibet remains under strict control by the Chinese authorities.

Although the primary significance of Tibetan Buddhism lies in its cultural and religious impact upon the Tibetan people, many of whom are now in exile in India and Nepal, it is significant that Tibetan Buddhism has attracted a considerable following among artists and intellectuals in the West. This is due not simply to its sophisticated metaphysics but also to the enormously attractive personality of the Dalai Lama, who has become a highly visible symbol of peace and tolerence in a world of deep divisions. The Dalai Lama was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1989.

HAROLD A. NETLAND

Bibliography. H. V. Guenther, Tibetan Buddhism in Western Perspective; T. Gytaso, Freedom in Exile; H. Hoffman, The Religions of Tibet; G. Tucci, The Religions of Tibet.

Valignano, Alessandro (1539–1606). Italian missionary to Asia. Valignano, an Italian Jesuit, was the Jesuit Visitor to the East, in charge of all Jesuit missionaries in East Asia. After spending some time in what is now India, Indonesia, and Malaysia, Valignano concentrated upon Japan and China. He was the dominant figure in Jesuit missions in Asia during the last quarter of the sixteenth century.

In an era of Christian missions characterized by insensitivity to local cultures, Valignano crafted and implemented a missions policy that encouraged adaptation to Japanese and Chinese cultures. Valignano insisted that missionaries to Japan master the language and observe local customs. He promoted training of the Japanese for the priesthood, established theological training centers for the Japanese, facilitated the translation of Christian writings into Japanese, and wrote the Japanese Catechism of Christian Faith, a work in theology and apologetics that interacts with Buddhism.

Valignano’s missions policy was also implemented in China with remarkable success by Matteo Ricci, but was later opposed by Franciscans and Dominicans who attacked it for al-
Valignano, Alessandro

...and religious influences. After an extended controversy, Rome ruled against the Valignano-Ricci approach in 1715. Valignano's general approach has been vindicated by twentieth-century missiology in its emphasis on proper CONTEXTUALIZATION of the gospel.

Harold A. Netland

Van der Kemp, Johannes Theodorus (1747–1811). Dutch missionary in South Africa. Born in Rotterdam and son of a theology professor, he became an army officer but gave up his commission when he married a working-class woman in 1780. He went to Edinburgh, obtained a medical degree in 1782, and published a well-regarded philosophical work. In 1791 he had an evangelically conversion experience after the accidental death of his wife and daughter, and became interested in missionary service. He joined the LMS and helped found a sister society in his native land, the Netherlands Missionary Society. He arrived in Cape Town in 1799 with four other LMS pioneers, helped found a South African Missionary Society, and began working among the Khoi Khoi. His successes among the Khoi in the Graaff-Reinet region and efforts to establish a Xhosa mission gained him the animosity of the white settlers. In 1803 he established the missionary settlement at Bethelsdorp, which whites derisively labeled a “Hottentot heaven.” His marriage to a Madagascar slave girl further alienated him from the whites. He campaigned for just treatment of the Khoi and mixed race people and increasingly identified himself with the Africans and their culture. Although he maintained a strict ecclesiastical order and chose church members carefully, the Xhosa saw him as different from the other Europeans. He died in Cape Town in 1811.

Ulrich van der Heyden

Vancouver Assembly (1983). The Sixth Assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES met in Vancouver, Canada, on the campus of the University of British Columbia. Under the theme of “Jesus Christ—the Life of the World,” 847 delegates representing 301 member churches gathered from July 24 to August 10, 1983.

Broad representation marked the Vancouver Assembly. Almost half of the voting delegates were laypersons, nearly a third were women, and more than a tenth were under the age of thirty. Up to 4,500 persons a day participated in assembly activities in one way or another.

Issue groups addressed eight areas of concern: witnessing in a divided world; taking steps toward unity; moving toward participation; healing and sharing life in community; confronting threats to peace and survival; struggling for justice and human dignity; learning in community; and communicating credibly.

Worship reflected conclusions contained in a text on baptism, Eucharist, and ministry formulated by the Faith and Order Commission in its 1982 meeting in Lima, Peru.

In affirming life in response to the threats posed by the forces of death, Vancouver called for engagement in the struggle for justice, peace, and ecological integrity as integral to the faith of the church. An all-night vigil was held to mark the atomic bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

Missiologically, Vancouver exhibited a Christocentric emphasis coupled with a keen awareness of the social, cultural, and religious context of witness. For the first time in the history of the WCC, representatives of religious faiths other than Christianity addressed the assembly. This appeared to some to soften the exclusiveness of Christ’s claims and seemed incongruent with the 1982 COMMISSION ON WORLD MISSION AND EVANGELISM (CWME) document, “Mission and Evangelism: An Ecumenical Affirmation.”

Some evangelicals, encouraged by what they perceived to be a vigorous trinitarian theology, a stronger scriptural focus, and increased emphasis on supernatural life in Christ, signed an open letter urging fellow evangelicals to engage actively in the ecumenical process. However, others remained unconvinced due to what they perceived as the acceleration of tendencies toward SYNCRETISM as well as the low priority Vancouver appeared to place on evangelistic activity and pioneer church planting among non-Christian populations.

Ken Mulholland

See also World Council of Churches Assemblies.

Vanuatu (Est. 2000 pop.: 192,000; 12,189 sq. km. [4,706 sq. mi.]). Vanuatu is an island chain in the southwest Pacific Ocean. Detribalized Vanuatuans are the largest group, but represent less than 14 percent of the population. There are at least an additional 120 peoples in the island chain. Nearly 95 percent have become Christians since the mid-nineteenth century when the gospel was first introduced by Presbyterians and Anglicans. The former are the largest denomination today with over 50,000 members. Apart from evangeli-
Vatican City. See Holy See.

Vedanta Hinduism. The term "Vedanta Hinduism" (literally "end of the Vedas") refers to several related systems of Hindu philosophy that can also be classified as theology, for they are based on exegesis of the Upanishads (sacred scriptures also known as Vedanta because they conclude the Vedas). Vedanta is sometimes called Uttara Mimamsa ("Further Enquiry") because it was linked to and succeeded Mimamsa, another of the six classical schools of thought. The formative text is the Brahma Sutra of Badarayana, who in the second century B.C. attempted a synthesis of Upanishadic theologies by investigating the nature of Brahman as the source of creation, the goal of enquiry, and the focus of worship. His ideas were further developed by Bhartṛhari, who saw Brahman as the first principle embodied in the Divine Word (Om). All things have being because of their being named by God, a belief also found in Platonist philosophy and the medieval Christian theology of nominalism. This teaching led to Vedantism.

The most important Vedantic traditions are Advaita ("nondualist") Vedanta, first expounded in about the fifth century A.D. by Gaudapada, from whom the greatest Indian philosopher, Sankara, derived his inspiration; the Visistadvaita ("qualified nondualist") Vedanta of Ramanuja (d. 1137); and the Dvaita ("dualist") Vedanta of Madhva (thirteenth century A.D.).

Sankara (c. 788–820), a Nambudiri Brahman from Kerala, who composed popular devotional songs in Sanskrit, not only provided the intellectual framework for a rebuttal of Buddhism by his teaching, but also created the first Hindu order of monks. He taught absolute Monism—there is only one reality, Brahman (God); thus all distinctions and subject-object divisions are illusory. Utterly transcendent and beyond all worlds, Brahman, the Supreme Being, is nevertheless the ground of all being because the Atman ("breath") in human beings, and indeed in all transient beings, is identical with him. Hence the many are in fact One. The individual self (jiva) is a combination of Atman, which is based on pure consciousness, and transient individuality. When, like a dreamer awaking from sleep, one realizes one's essential identity with Brahman (the Upanishadic cry "Thou art That!"); one attains the experience of satchitananda ("existence, knowledge, bliss") and hence liberation from the cycle of rebirth. Yet the phenomenological world is real enough for those still asleep. While Brahman is essentially without attributes (nirguna), in the world of conventional limited reality he is a personal Creator, like a potter making pots, and therefore has attributes (saguna).

Ramanuja felt that Sankara was too selective with the texts and that there were serious philosophical flaws in his system as well. Despite the nonduality in the Upanishads—the Oneness of God, the atmans, and the world—the multiplicity of the world is nevertheless real; it is not, as Sankara maintained, an illusion superimposed on the true order of things. The world is real because nature and souls are evolved from Brahman, who is the "soul" of the world, his "body." The world is a mode of God, who is in no way affected by its imperfections. The human spirit comes into the world as a consequence of turning away from God. Ramanuja also criticized the Advaita view of illusion and ignorance, which are not identical at all. And because Brahman has attributes (saguna), Ramanuja could develop a meaningful theism as the basis of bhakti marga, liberation by way of loving devotion through the grace of God. Madhva taught a dualist system closer to Christian Theism.

Significantly, these systems of thought inspired the movement known as neo-Hinduism or neo-Vedantism and the philosophy of modern leaders such as Vivekananda (1863–1902), founder of the Ramakrishna Mission and the Vedanta Society of the West; Aurobindo Ghose (1872–1950), who attempted to reconcile religion and science; and Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan (1888–1975), educator and president of the Republic of India.

A number of Christian thinkers such as Abhishiktananda, Bede Griffiths, John Hick, Raimundo Panikkar, and Keith Ward have explored points of congruence between Vedanta philosophy and Christian theism. In spite of some similarities, for example, with Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, there are also important differences between Vedanta philosophy and Christian theism, especially with regard to the ontological relationship of God and creation, human history and the future destiny of the individual soul, and the nature of divine intervention in a wayward creation. Yet Ramanuja's exposition of the love of God, derived from the concluding chapters of the Bhagavad Gītā, provides a bridge to the Christian understanding of God's love and grace as well as human unworthiness and failure.

E. M. Jackson

See also Hinduism.

Venezuela (Est. 2000 pop.: 24,170,000; 912,050 sq. km. [352,143 sq. mi.]). Venezuela became an independent nation in 1821 but was not free of rule by dictators until 1958 when it joined the free world with its own democratic experiment. The unparalleled rise in oil prices beginning in 1973 made Venezuela one of the richest countries in South America, but because of the AAA credit rating their oil reserves guaranteed, the country began borrowing additional money to launch itself into the modern world within one generation. When the price of oil began to drop back in 1983, Venezuela suddenly found itself facing interest payments that were disproportionately high, creating a budget crisis which led to devaluation of the local currency and the beginning of an inflationary spiral. Continued government corruption has hampered attempts to halt the economic slide.

Culturally, Venezuela is a collective society (Hofstede, 1984). Seen from the inside by a Venezuelan, belonging to a group is far more important than achieving personal independence. In contrast to an individualistic society, Venezuelans are parts of a whole, not whole parts (Hiebert, 1991). This does not deny individuality, but individuality is most likely to be expressed by trying to change status in the group to which a person belongs, not by achieving independence from the group.

The positive side of this is that people find support and help from other members of their group. The negative side can lead to racism, nationalism, and what Venezuelans are fond of describing as facilismo or "easyism." Just as a child in a family should not be expected to work in order to earn his or her place at the table, so the Venezuelan expects to share in the resources of the country to which he or she belongs without having to work for it. The oil bonanza converted this belief into reality for many Venezuelans, often destroying initiative and productivity.

This cultural trait has many implications for mission in Venezuela. First, the Venezuelan sense of group identity is probably much closer to what Paul described in Romans and Ephesians as a spiritual Body rather than churches that are seen only as composed of individuals who have decided to gather in the same place on Sunday morning for worship without necessarily celebrating relationship. Missionaries need to be willing to create new church patterns which promote relationships rather than simple attendance at church programs.

Second, missionaries would do well to become accepted in the Venezuelan collectives that already exist, rather than immediately expecting Venezuelans to want to join them in a new collective. In the cities, a good way for missionaries to do this would be through secular employment, where they would spend enough time with Venezuelans in their work collectively for natural emotional affinity to rise.

Third, the Venezuelan church must constantly guard against legalism, a natural result of socio-centric reasoning true of most collective cultures. Because of the desire to be appreciated and esteemed by those in one's group, the Venezuelan will intuitively grasp what pleases or displeases others. This can quickly lead to legalism if those in leadership insist on patterns of behavior instead of Spirit-directed transformation.

CHARLES A. DAVIS

Veniaminov, Innocent (1797–1878). Russian Orthodox missionary to Siberia and Alaska and founder of the Russian Orthodox Mission Society. Innocent Veniaminov established a legacy unmatched by any other missionary figure in Russian history. He worked for forty-five years as missionary priest and bishop in Alaska and Eastern Siberia, translated the Bible and liturgical services into Aleut and Thlingit, founded the Russian Orthodox Mission Society, and became metropolitan of the church in Russia.

Innocent was born in a small village of Siberia. As a married priest, he journeyed with his family to the new lands of Alaska in 1823. Early on he mastered and created an alphabet for the Fox-Aleut language. His Aleut catechetical book, Indication of the Way into the Kingdom of Heaven, became a classic and was translated into Russian and Slavonic, going through forty-seven printings. This book sparked spiritual renewal and missionary awareness in Russia. After ten years among the Aleuts, Innocent repeated the same effort of new translations among the Thlingit Indians.

In 1839, after the tragic death of his wife, Innocent was elevated as bishop of Kamchatka, the Kuril and Aleutian Islands. He served as a missionary bishop for the following twenty-seven years in this diocese; and three new ones later created in eastern Siberia.

In 1868, Innocent became metropolitan of Moscow and achieved a lifelong dream of founding the Russian Orthodox Mission Society. Over the following decades, this Society sent hundreds of missionaries throughout Siberia, Alaska, Japan, China, and Korea.

LUKE A. VERONIS

Venn, Henry (1796–1873). English missions administrator and theorist. He was born in Clapham, where his father, John, was rector of Clapham parish, active in the Clapham Sect and a founder of the Church Missionary Society (CMS, 1799). Educated at Queens’ College, Cambridge (M.A., B.D.), Venn served parishes at Hull and Upper Holloway, London. He became honorary clerical secretary of the CMS in 1841, serving until 1872. Together with Rufus Anderson, Venn is recognized for his contribution to the theory of mission with the concept of the “threesselfs” and the “Indigenous Church.” Venn also lobbied the British government on colonial policies (curbing slave trade, vernacular education, trade) and worked to accommodate the Anglican Church’s archaic episcopal system to the needs of the growing churches throughout the world. As a leading evangelical he sought to moderate trends such as the millennial views that gained popularity after 1830 while resisting Anglo-Catholic and Broad Church influences. But mission was his main preoccupation. A prodigious worker, he conducted correspondence with hundreds of missionaries all over the world, drafted scores of policy statements, and was the dominant influence in the work of the CMS, the largest British society, for a generation.

WILHILM R. SHENK

Verbeck, Guido Fridolin (1830–98). Dutch-born American pioneer missionary educator and statesman in Japan. Born in a staunch Moravian family in Zeist, Holland, Verbeck came to Christ early in life. Trained as an engineer at Utrecht, he emigrated to the United States at the age of 23. While ill, he promised to become a missionary if God intervened. Once he was restored to health, he attended Auburn Seminary and then accepted a call with the Reformed Church of America. He arrived in Nagasaki on November 7, 1858.

At that time Japan was closed to outsiders, and Nagasaki was the only port accessible. Verbeck began teaching English (using the Bible and the Constitution of the United States as his texts) and started a small Bible study. Working diligently on understanding the language and the culture, he was careful in sharing his faith, seeing posted everywhere the official edicts against Christianity. The first two converts did not come until 1866.

Verbeck developed a sterling reputation among the Japanese. Over the course of his career he worked as a teacher, preacher, statesman, and Bible translator. He played a significant role in founding what later became the Imperial University of Japan, and helped the Japanese develop relationships with the rest of the world. He was also instrumental in removing the ban on Christianity in Japan (1873). The Japanese emperor recognized his services by bestowing on him the decoration of the third class of the Order of the Rising Sun.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Verkuyl, Johannes (1908– ). Dutch Reformed missiologist and missionary in Indonesia. Verkuyl was born into a Calvinist farm family. While he studied at the Free University of Amsterdam he was influenced by Johan Bavinck, Hendrik Kraemer and W. A. Visser ’t Hooft and Verkuyl, Johannes

pastored Indonesian university students in the Netherlands before going to Indonesia as a missionary in 1939.

Interned in a Japanese prison camp in 1942, Verkuyl continued his missionary work as a prisoner until the end of World War II. He lived in Jakarta from 1945 to 1963, where his mission service included reconciliation ministry in the conflict between the Netherlands and Indonesia, teaching social ethics in an interdenominational seminary, and writing extensively in Indonesian on the processes of nation- and church-building in the new state.

Verkuyl returned to the Netherlands in 1963 and served several years as general secretary of the Netherlands Missionary Council and president of the Interchurch Coordinating Committee for Development Projects. From 1968 until his retirement in 1978, he was professor of missiology and evangelism at the Free University of Amsterdam. Along with his teaching and writing, Verkuyl worked closely with Beyers Naudé and others in the South African Council of Churches and similar organizations in other countries involved in the struggle for socioeconomic, political, and racial justice.

Known best for his magnum opus, Contemporary Missiology: An Introduction (1978), a foundational textbook in the field, Verkuyl’s contribution in the 1970s and 1980s to a wholistic, ecumenical, kingdom-oriented, sociopolitically transformational and deeply evangelical missiology cannot be underestimated. He was the mentor of Orlando Costas.

CHARLES VAN ENGEN AND NANCY THOMAS

Vicelin of Oldenburg (c. 1090–1154). German missionary to the Wends. Educated in Germany and France, Vicelin responded to a call to reach the Slavs to the east for Christ and was commissioned to the work in 1125 by Adalbert of Bremen. The military and political successes and failures of the Germans in subduing the Wend population were reflected throughout Vicelin's ministry. His initial successes during a peaceful period were all but wiped out in a Wend uprising in 1137 in which the monasteries and churches were burned and all missionaries expelled. The Germans eventually regained control, and reestablished abandoned posts. However, the disastrous German crusades against the Wends in 1147 once again set back Vicelin's work. Even though the culmination of his career was his appointment as bishop of Oldenburg in 1149, due to continuing Wend unrest, he was never able to settle permanently. He died in 1154 after a long illness including two years of paralysis.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

Bibliography. G. F. MacLear, Apostles of Mediæval Europe; ODCC; R. H. Schmandt, NCE, 14:643.

Vietnam (Est. 2000 pop.: 82,648,000; 331,689 sq. km. [128,065 sq. mi.]). Located on the Indochinese peninsula, it is estimated that Vietnam is 9.8 percent Christian. Less than one percent of the total population is evangelical. In A.D. 939 the Vietnamese overthrew the Chinese, who had dominated the region from 111 B.C. The blending of Buddhism, Confucianism, and Taoism instilled during the Chinese period still marks the religious orientation of the country.

The first missionaries were Catholic Franciscans sent from the Philippines in the 1580s. The most important early missionary, however, was Alexander de Rhodes, who arrived in Vietnam in 1626 after spending time in Japan and Macao. He was instrumental in giving the Vietnamese people their written language. By developing friendly relations with the imperial court, he was successful in developing an independent church early in his work. Despite the rise of persecution in 1645, by 1639 there were as many as 130,000 followers. The first Catholic priests were ordained in 1668. Continuing, sporadic persecutions eventually resulted in French intervention and imposition of religious liberty in 1882. Two years later the country was declared a French protectorate. It was estimated in 1980 that the persecutions had resulted in 130,000 Catholic martyrs during Vietnam’s history.

Protestant missionary recruiting efforts began in the late 1890s through the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE (CMA). Though two missionaries visited in 1895, it was not until 1911 that the French authorities granted permission for Protestant missionary activity and Robert Jaffray arrived as the first long-term Protestant missionary to Vietnam. In 1921, the Tourane Bible School was established to train indigenous workers, and in 1927 the Evangelical Church of Vietnam (ECVN) was granted autonomy. By 1940, there were 123 local congregations, 86 of which were fully self-supporting. All of them were self-supporting by the end of World War II.

Shortly after World War II, Ho Chi Minh led the Vietnamese to independence. In 1954, the country split in two, with Communists controlling the North and Americans the South. This brought an influx of American missionaries to South Vietnam and the migration of over five hundred thousand Christian (both Catholic and Protestant) refugees from North Vietnam. The Vietnam War, beginning in 1959 and escalating through the 1960s, devastated the country. The ECVN, which had previously focused solely on
Vladimir

Vladimir (956–1015). Russian prince responsible for the founding of Russian Orthodox Christianity. Vladimir came to be known as the Constantine of Russia for his Christianization of Russia. The details of Vladimir’s conversion are shrouded in legend. Some accounts paint the prince as a saint who led his nation into righteousness while other accounts tell of Vladimir’s sordid past and his own need for conversion before he could lead his people out of darkness into light.
Vladimir

Before his conversion, he killed his brother, Jaropolk, and then had a son by Jaropolk’s widow, whom he took as one of his hundreds of wives. He also maintained hundreds of concubines.

After listening to the testimonies of Muslims, Roman Catholics, Jews, and Greek Orthodox Christians in 986, Vladimir sent his nobles to see how each of these religions worshiped. The legendary report from St. Sophia’s Cathedral in Constantinople: “We knew not whether we were in heaven or on earth for there is not a similar sight upon earth, nor is there such beauty,” convinced Vladimir to be baptized into the Greek Orthodox Church.

In 988 Vladimir was baptized as well as the nation at his command. Though the details of Vladimir’s conversion from paganism to Christianity are subjectively recorded and his motives less than pure, on Vladimir’s decision God has built his church in Russia.

Voetius, Gisbert (1589–1676). Dutch professor of theology and Oriental languages; early missiological thinker. Voetius was an active member of the Synod of Dort (1617–19), chief proponent of Calvinistic orthodoxy, and the most influential Dutch theologian of the seventeenth century. At the same time, he was one of the spokesmen of the emerging mission-oriented Reformed pietism in the Netherlands and had personal contacts with English Puritans. His book Disputations on Atheism (1639) and other books against philosophies of his time show him to be an evangelist to the well educated. Voetius is also the founder of the comparative study of religions for missionary purposes. Nearly all his books and tracts contain long sections on missions, which do not appeal and call to mission work but discuss all major problems of missions scientifically as a fourth part of systematic theology Theologica elenctica beside exegetical, dogmatic, and practical theology. Thus Voetius designed the first comprehensive mission theology written by a Protestant. He was well-read in Catholic mission literature. Following a distinction made in Reformed ethics, Voetius combines double predestination as God’s absolute will with the conviction that God’s moral will is world missions under biblical promises.

Volunteer, Volunteerism in Mission. Voluntary association with or participation in the missionary activity of the church, Christians choosing on their own to become involved in intercultural missionary outreach.

Biblical Background. In the Old Testament, the renewal of the Mosaic covenant at Shechem under Joshua was an early demonstration of collective voluntarism (Josh. 24:1–4). Other examples include the prayer association of the Nazarites and the Jews organized by Nehemiah to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem.

In the New Testament, Jesus invited people to follow him, signifying a willing commitment. The basic ethic of Jesus’ ministry was based on a willing, voluntary response and service. Discipleship, in essence, was an act of one’s own choosing. The cost of discipleship was a voluntary commitment (Luke 9:23; 12:32ff.). In his encouragement to prayer, Jesus again taught a voluntary principle: “Ask . . . seek . . . knock . . .” (Matt. 7:7).

The early church of the first century expanded through the voluntary acts of the disciples and apostles. The apostles followed a voluntary pattern, including the economic support of the community (Act 2:37–47). The concept of doing loving acts (charity) for others in the early church soon evolved into a more formal structure of good works in the imperial church.

The Emerging Theological Basis of Christian Voluntarism. During the period of medieval monasticism, Christians practiced voluntarism on a highly intense level. Thomas Aquinas (1226–74) provided a theological rationale for such effort by defining charity as “the mother of all virtues” because “it initiates the action of other virtues by charging them with life.” Francis of Assisi (1181–1226) and his followers serve as one of the great examples of this newly found collective Christian activism that catalyzed change in society.

The Launching of a New Era. Two important roots link the eighteenth-century religious awakenings and the rise of religious voluntarism. First, the GREAT AWAKENINGS in North America unleashed spiritual forces among large numbers of common people in the colonies. The mass meetings of George Whitefield (1714–70) attracted thousands to his sermons of evangelism and discipleship, and led to the establishment of orphanages, academies, and pro-revival churches. Similarly, Jonathan Edwards (1703–58) is connected with the English Prayer Call movement and other renewal forces in the colonies, and unleashed spiritual energy that led naturally to tangible forms of Christian service, typically in the form of new voluntary associations.

The Wesleyan movement was the second impetus that led Methodism to create numerous avenues of Christian service for its followers. John Wesley pioneered outdoor preaching and itinerant evangelism, and modeled a burden for the working classes and underprivileged.

By the 1780s the basic voluntary paradigms were in place. The catalyst that ignited the general cultural outbreak of voluntarism was William Carey, who pioneered a strategy whereby large numbers of people with modest resources could be involved in the work of missions.

The Evangelical Century. The voluntary association was the primary vehicle for the growth of the evangelical movement during the nineteenth century. Four emphases marked evangelical voluntarism in the latter half of the century: the holiness movement, the conservative/liberal debate, evangelistic missions in the empire, and humanitarian concerns. The perfectionist theology of Charles G. Finney (1792–1875) had a direct influence on the holiness tradition in Britain as well, and found institutional expression in several kinds of voluntary associations such as the Keswick Convention (1875). Various voluntary associations also grew up in response to the challenge to biblical authority from liberal theologians. In universities and among the churches, missionary and study societies, such as the Intercollegiate Christian Union (1877) and the Bible League (1892), grew up in support of the new evangelical concerns. The expansion of the British Empire provided a further field of interest for Victorian evangelicals. In India, a dozen associations were formed between 1848 and 1876, with at least ten more formed in China.

North American Developments. The earliest forms of voluntarism in the United States were denominational, and this was followed by cooperation among the denominations. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was formed in 1813 and became the parent of all the cooperative voluntary mission associations at the national level.

The positive experience of churches with voluntary associations quickly lent itself to other forms of Christian endeavor. During and after the Civil War Christian voluntarism was especially concerned with the American South, fostering education societies, missionary bodies, and literacy bands. American cities also provided a fruitful arena for a variety of voluntary ministries dealing with housing shortages, poor sanitation, inadequate schools, crime, and unemployment. No other area of voluntary expansion better illustrates the pulse beat of American religious life in the late nineteenth century than women's work. Over two dozen associations of women for missions were formed to send women to mission work at home and abroad.

New Directions for a New Century. The twentieth century witnessed ecumenical voluntarism, particularly in the area of student missions. In 1886, the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign missions was formed and spread quickly to Britain and Europe. Out of this emerged Intervarsity in the United States in 1941. Similar to Intervarsity are the Navigators (1943), Youth for Christ (1930), Pioneer Clubs (1939), Young Life (1941), and Campus Crusade for Christ (1951).

In the later decades of the twentieth century new forms of religious voluntarism have arisen in the United States. One type is related to translating a religious perspective into political activism: the National Association of Religious Broadcasters and the Moral Majority. Another form is the organizational network centered on mass evangelism. Both radio and television evangelists have established vast networks of voluntary “prayer partners” and supporters.

The turn of the century calls the future of voluntarism into question. Does global change and increasing complexity threaten voluntarism as the primary means of doing Christian mission? Is voluntarism declining in the West as some suggest? What about the generation of aging Baby Boomers nearing retirement? Will they step into the gap as second-career mission volunteers? Will voluntarism spread from the West to the emerging churches in the majority world who venture to missions frontiers? Historians summarize the enduring values of Christian voluntarism as empowerment for groups of people, experimental spontaneity to respond to needs as they arise, the creation of new leadership, and its singularity of purpose—various types of Christian mission. To the extent that voluntarism continues as a values-driven movement it will survive.
Waddell, Hope Masterton (1804–95). Irish missionary to Jamaica and Nigeria. Called to missionary service in 1822, and ordained by the United Succession Church, Waddell was sent to Jamaica by the Scottish Missionary Society in 1829. Together with other USC ministers, Waddell organized a presbytery in Jamaica in 1836. Within a few years an opportunity to minister among freed slaves arose, and the missionaries were galvanized into action. By 1841 the presbytery began discussing sending its own missionaries to West Africa. A letter from Calabar (Nigeria) sent to the Church of Scotland requesting missionaries was forwarded to the Jamaican church in 1843. By September of the following year, a mission society was formed. Reliant on Jamaican funding, Waddell was sent to Scotland to raise any additional funds he could secure. He arrived in Calabar (on the coast of the east side of Nigeria) in 1846 with five Jamaican companions. They established a school and began translation, preaching, and teaching. His strong authoritarian attitude eventually led in 1854 to the Mission Council forcing his resignation, after which he traveled inland to continue his own work among the Efik. In spite of his method of strong attacks against local customs he found repulsive, Waddell was still able to gain a hearing and win people to Christ. By 1858 ill health forced his return to Ireland, where he wrote of his experiences and was active in a missionary church.

A. Scott Moreau

Wagner, Charles Peter (1930–). American missiologist, Church Growth Movement leader, and missionary to Bolivia. Educated at Rutgers University, Fuller Theological Seminary, and the University of Southern California, he served three missionary terms totaling sixteen years in Bolivia. It was there that Wagner began reading church growth works by Donald A. McGavran that prompted him to return to the United States to study under McGavran. Wagner took McGavran’s missiological concepts in India and applied them to the American church. Whereas McGavran is considered the father of the Church Growth Movement, Wagner would be rightly called the father of the American Church Growth Movement.

The American missiological impact of Wagner can be discerned in many ways. He has written some forty books, many of which have become classics in the field of American church growth. He has taught church growth to nearly two thousand pastors and denominational executives through the Fuller Seminary Doctor of Ministry program. Wagner was also the founding president of the North American Society for Church Growth (now the American Society for Church Growth) in 1984.

Wagner returned to his alma mater, Fuller Seminary, in 1971 to become a full-time faculty member. He continues to serve today as the Donald A. McGavran Professor of Church Growth. His most recent emphases in church growth have been spiritual warfare, the prayer movement, and postdenominational structures.

Thom S. Rainer

Wake Island. See Micronesia.

Wales. See United Kingdom.

Wallis (Uvea) and Futuna (French Overseas Territory) (Est. 2000 pop.: 15,000; 274 sq. km. [106 sq. mi.]). Two islands 125 miles apart with Futuna 150 miles northeast of Fiji. They were settled respectively by Tongans and Samoans. Protectorate agreements were signed on behalf of France in 1842 with local chiefs but these were not ratified until 1887, and together Wallis and Futuna became an overseas territory of France in 1961. All of the islanders are Roman Catholics.

Allan K. Davidson

See also Polynesia.

Walls, Andrew Finlay (1928–). Scottish Methodist historian of mission. He was educated at Exeter College, Oxford (M.A., B.Litt.; hon. D.D., Aberdeen, 1993). Walls taught theology in Sierra Leone (1957–62) and Nigeria (1962–65) and was then appointed lecturer in church history at Aberdeen University. He founded the Department of Religious Studies (1970) and drew a growing number of research students from Africa, Asia, and the Americas. All the while Walls continued to write seminal essays that reinterpreted the historical and ecclesiological significance of mission, the indigenizing principle, Christianity’s changing center of gravity from north to south, new religious movements, and Africa’s place in Christian history.

Walls challenged the insularity of the Western theological academy and its failure to take account of the growing Christian reality that extended beyond historical Christendom. He was founding editor of Bulletin of the Society for African Church History and Journal of Religion in Africa. In 1986 Walls relocated the Centre for the Study of Christianity in the Non-Western World to Edinburgh University. He retired as director in 1995, continuing as honorary professor and curator of the Centre’s collections. In recognition of his numerous contributions to academic and public life, Walls was named to the Order of the British Empire (OBE) in 1987.

Wilbert R. Shenk

Wang, Leland (1898–1975). Chinese evangelist and founder of Chinese Foreign Missionary Union. Born in Fuzhow, China, he was led to Christ by his wife in 1920. Obedient to the Bible and sensing a call to ministry, Wang left his Navy career as a gunboat officer in 1921. He rented a hall in his native Fuzhow and began ringing a handbell to draw a crowd.

In 1928 he formed the Chinese Foreign Missionary Union, committed to the task of evangelism and mission endeavor to the scattered Chinese in the South Seas of Asia. From the 1940s to the 1960s Wang extended his preaching ministry to the United States, Canada, Europe, and the Middle East. He evangelized the Chinese diaspora and stirred Western Christians in holy living and ardent outreach to Asia. Wang received the Doctor of Divinity degree from Wheaton College in recognition of his labors on behalf of Christ.

His mission board, consisting at one time of twenty-six Chinese nationals working in thirteen mission stations and countries, was the first of its kind. Its breadth was amazing; its focus on church planting and pastoral training was unique at the time.

Wang, often referred to as the Moody of China, established his life and mission on the Scriptures. He lived by a self-imposed rule, “No Bible, no breakfast.” He read the Old Testament through once a year, the New Testament twice a year, and the Psalms and Proverbs once a month.

Hoover Wong

Wang, Thomas Yung-hsin (1925– ). Chinese evangelist and international missions leader. Wang was born into a Christian home in Beijing. He was converted under the ministry of evangelist John Sung in 1936, and joined the Christian Tabernacle in Beijing pastored by Wang Mingdao. He served as a liaison officer between China and the U.S. Navy in Saipan Islands (1946–48), and worked for the Civil Air Transport in Hong Kong (1949–52), before attending the Presbyterian seminary in Tainan, Taiwan (1955–57). After a year of itinerant preaching in Europe (1957–58), he received training at Central Bible Institute in the United States (1959–60). He started the Chinese Christian Mission in Detroit in 1961, evangelizing the Chinese through preaching, literature, and the media. At the Urbana Student Missionary Convention (1960) he launched the North America Congress of Chinese Evangelicals, which convened December 1972. At the Lausanne Congress (1974) he led in the launching of the Chinese Congress on World Evangelism, which convened in Hong Kong in 1976. He served the Chinese Coordination Center of World Evangelism (1976–79) and the Lausanne Committee on World Evangelization (1987–89), being the director of the Lausanne Congress II in Manila, 1989. Since 1989 he has led the AD 2000 and Beyond Movement and the Great Commission Center, pioneering preaching and church planting in the former Soviet Union and elsewhere.

Samuel Ling

Ward, William (1769–1823). English pioneer missionary to India. Ward was an enterprising young Englishman who developed interesting professional skills before becoming a leader of the British Baptist mission in pre-Victorian India. In Bengal, he served with distinction as a peacemaker, personnel manager, pastoral counselor, and budding missiologist.

Born in Derbyshire, he was apprenticed to a printer who edited The Derby Mercury, a regional weekly newspaper. After functioning as a social and political commentator in the English Midlands during Europe’s revolutionary years (1789–97), he decided to train for full-time Christian ministry among England’s Particular Baptists. While studying in Yorkshire under John Fawcett, he was discovered by his denomination’s mission, later known as the Baptist Missionary Society. It needed a missionary printer in Bengal. Ward responded to its invitation to service in the spirit of Matthew 28:18–20. He was set apart for the work of a Christian missionary in Olney in May 1799. As one of a group of mission recruits, he sailed into the Hooghly estuary near Calcutta early in October 1799, only to run into a storm of official indignation from the British East India Company. To escape it, the would-be-missionaries fled for refuge upriver to a Danish settlement that served as a haven for Europeans anxious to evade the British law as known in Serampore.
Ward, William

Ward became indispensable to the Serampore Mission between 1800 and 1823 as practical administrator, printing press manager, irenic trouble-shooter, mentor to indigenous evangelists, and cross-cultural counselor. One of William Carey’s closest colleagues, he produced Serampore’s strategic “Form of Agreement” (1805), a classic on Hindu mythology, and various missiological documents. After returning from a two-year furlough in Britain and North America (1819–21), he died suddenly from cholera near Calcutta. He was survived by his wife, Mary, herself already a one-time widow, and two daughters.

See also Serampore Trio.

Warneck, Gustav (1834–1910). German missiologist and first mission professor. Though he was not the first German missiologist, Warneck is called the “Father of German missiology” because he held the first chair of missions at a German university (Halle, 1896), wrote the first comprehensive German theology of missions (Gotha, 1892–1903), and even influenced strongly nascent German Catholic academic missiology (see Joseph Schmidlin). Born in Naumburg, Warneck studied theology, but weak health prevented him from becoming a missionary. He became an inspector for the Rhenish Mission, then parish minister. Together with devoted colleagues like Grundemann, Christlieb, and Zahn, he developed missiology by publishing the Allgemeine Missionszeitschrift (1874) and by starting Missionskonferenzen for the study of missions (1897). He furthered cooperation between missions through the Continental Mission Conferences (1866) and the German Missions-Ausschuss (1885). Warneck, much indebted to the Great Awakening and even to the Holiness Revival (Brighton, 1875), took the Volkshirche (folk-church, territorial church) as the goal of all missionary work (though it would start with individual conversions). Although Warneck actively opposed the early Faith Missions, not appreciating their ecclesiology and arguing that they would further split an already fragmented German mission landscape, he is today respected by many evangelical missiologists.

KLAUS FIEDLER

Bibliography. G. Warneck, Gustav, Outline of the History of Protestant Missions; idem, Modern Missions and Culture: Their Mutual Relations.

Warren, Max Alexander Cunningham (1904–77). Irish ecumenist and missionary statesman. Warren was born in Dun Laoghaire, Ireland, while his parents were on furlough from India. He was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge (M.A.), after which he spent a short term in Nigeria. He was awarded honorary doctorates by various universities, including Glasgow (D.D., 1963). He was appointed a canon of Westminster in 1963. Warren became secretary of CMS during World War II and served from 1942 to 1963. His keen insight into the rapidly changing sociopolitical relationships and their implications for missions quickly won respect. In addition to some thirty books, Warren exerted wide influence through the 232 issues of the CMS Newsletter that he wrote during his tenure, treating a wide range of contemporary missiological themes. Warren sought to help missions adapt to the new situation. In retirement he wrote two important historical interpretations of the modern missionary movement: The Missionary Movement from Britain in Modern History (1965) and Social History and Christian Mission (1967). An Anglican evangelical, Warren was prominent in the International Missionary Council. He opposed integration of the IMC with the World Council of Churches (formally approved at New Delhi in 1961) on grounds this would result in the eclipse of mission.

WILBERT R. SHENK

Wars. War is one of the great social problems, along with poverty and racism, with which the missionary movement has had to struggle. It is difficult to formulate the Christian position on war because of the problem of harmonizing the Old Testament with the New Testament and the difficulty of applying the teachings of Jesus to society. In the Old Testament, many passages endorse armed conflict, such as Deuteronomy 7 and 20 and the war narratives of Joshua, Judges, and Samuel. Although these are used by some Christians to justify their participation in war, others point out that Israel was a theocratic state, and that in New Testament times there is no state where God is king, but he deals with humanity through an international body, the church. Another problem arises, however, over the directions that Jesus gave to his followers. He seems to indicate that they be nonviolent, in such statements as “But I tell you, do not resist an evil person. If someone strikes you on the right cheek, turn to him the other also” (Matt. 5:39) and “But I tell you, love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you” (Matt. 5:44). Because Christians are citizens of national states in addition to being members of the church, it has seemed to most of them that these words should be interpreted in a way that allows them to fight for their country. In an attempt to apply these Scriptures to world affairs, Christians have responded in a variety of ways, ranging from nonviolent pacifism to advocating a just war theory. The early church, certain Christian humanists, and the majority of Anabaptists have taken a nonresistant or pacifist stance (see PACIFIST THEOLOGY). The majority, however, have followed Augustine and claimed that certain wars are just. Denominations, including the Church of the Brethren, Quakers, and Mennonites, maintain a position of nonresistance, but the larger groups such as Lutherans, Presbyterians, Baptists, Roman Catholics, Methodists, and Reformed adhere to the just war interpretation. In certain rare instances Christians have even supported crusades. The medieval popes urged such action against the Turks, and in the twelfth century some Christians have maintained such an attitude toward Communists.

During the nineteenth century, from the defeat of Napoleon to the outbreak of World War I, there was a global expansion of Western Christian missionary efforts accompanying European imperialism and colonialism. These later movements depended on superior military power. Western Europe since medieval times had been the world leader in technology and now this skill was applied more completely to warfare. Challenged by the Napoleonic victories, a Prussian military instructor, Karl von Clausewitz, articulated the theory of “total war.” He believed that it is necessary to push conflict to its “utmost bounds” in order to win. At the time he expressed these ideas the Industrial Revolution began increasing the power of armaments so that an enemy could be totally defeated in a manner never before possible.

Christians in the nineteenth century responded to the danger caused by new armaments by encouraging international cooperation and humanitarian endeavors. These attempts led to international gatherings, including the Hague Conferences of 1899 and 1907. But the forces that worked toward harmony and peace failed, and with World War I Clausewitz’s view moved closer to reality. The two sides used mines, machine guns, poison gas, submarines, and aerial bombardment, thus taking the conflict to land, sea, and air. The churches supported the war. The rhetoric of leaders such as Woodrow Wilson made them feel that they were involved in a crusade to help humankind.

On the eve of World War I, thousands of missionaries were serving all over the world. During the nineteenth century numerous missionary societies had been founded in Europe and North America, many of which encouraged an interdenominational approach. Although the differences among the sending churches might be great, these did not seem so important on the mission field, because workers possessed the common purpose of preaching the gospel to people of other faiths. World War I had an enormous impact on this international Christian enterprise. Mission properties were seized and hundreds of workers were forced to leave the field and did not return. More serious than these physical losses was the spiritual damage done to the entire Protestant missionary movement. The conflict demonstrated that the ultimate loyalty of most of those who preached the gospel was not to Christ and his church but to the nation-state. The war also shattered the postmillennial hopes of the Anglo-American missionary enterprise. Although some of this optimism continued in the postwar years and led to the founding of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the dynamic force in international outreach shifted to the conservative evangelical groups that followed a more individualistic approach to missions. These organizations, mostly premillennial, had little interest in promoting Christian unity or extending Christian culture to other parts of the world.

The damage done to the missionary cause by World War I included a change in the attitude of non-Western populations toward the Christian cause. In many instances missionaries had brought to such people modern medicine, peace among warring tribes, the abolition of the slave trade, and justice for those who were too weak to secure it for themselves. But now the European claims to a monopoly of religious truth and civilization were shattered as they waged what amounted to a civil war that left them bankrupt economically and spiritually. In World War I for the first time many Indian, African, and Japanese troops fought very effectively against the white men. The natural consequence of this was the awakening of nationalism among the peoples of Asia and Africa. This reaction was furthered by World War II. Although nationalism can be a positive force, it often becomes a narrow, arrogant intolerance toward members of other groups. This hurt the missionary movement in the many instances where it could not adjust to an indigenous church organization and ministry.
Wars

World War II, however, had many positive effects on the North American church and this encouraged missionary outreach. Many of those involved in the armed services experienced "fox-hole religion" and returned with the gospel to the places where they had fought. They also stirred the churches to give to missions, used new methods such as aeronautical technology, and founded interdenominational mission groups such as the Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship that recruited and sent out missionaries. With the end of the Cold War and the resulting reduction of global tension, perhaps armed conflict will become a more isolated phenomenon as it was during the nineteenth-century period of missionary expansion.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

Bibliography

Waterston, Jane Elizabeth (1843–1932). Scottish missionary doctor to South Africa and Malawi. Born in a comfortable home, with affiliations to the Free Church of Scotland, and educated in Scotland, she sailed in 1867 to South Africa to take charge of the girls’ school at Lovedale, in Kaffraria. She spent eighteen months learning Xhosa and then worked at Lovedale until 1873, gaining a reputation of being hard-working and enterprising. She then returned to Europe and studied medicine in Dublin, qualifying in 1879. The Free Church of Scotland Mission appointed her to Blantyre, Nyasaland (Malawi). Finding insufficient work there, she went back to Lovedale in 1880, but in an unofficial capacity. Here she had plenty of medical work, but finances were always precarious. In 1883, in order to help her family in financial difficulties (since the Free Church Mission would not accept her as a salaried missionary), she was obliged to take a better-paying position so that she could help them. She left Lovedale to practice in Cape Town as South Africa’s first woman doctor.

Initially her way was difficult, but she soon built up a large and successful practice, winning respect and affection. She took a lead in public service enterprises, especially in providing better maternity services for women, and in medical work for the poor, including migrant laborers from the Transkei. During the Second Anglo-Boer War she was active in organizing relief for refugees. In her later years she received public appreciation for her years of service, and the example she had set for other women.

JOCelyn MURRAY

Wealth and Poverty. One of the great social problems that faces those who would bear witness to the Christian faith in a global manner is that of distributive justice. There is an extreme divergence between the rich and poor of today’s world, a contrast often described in terms of the North–South divide. Experts in demographics estimate that early in the third millennium, the world’s population will be 6.3 billion, and by 2025 it may reach 8.5 billion. Moreover, 95 percent of the global population growth over this period will be in the developing countries of Latin America, Africa, and Asia. By 2025, Mexico will have replaced Japan as one of the ten most populous countries on the earth, and Nigeria’s population will exceed that of the United States.

Despite progress made in economic growth, public health, and literacy in the third world, at least 800 million live in “absolute poverty.” This is defined as a condition of life where malnutrition, illiteracy, disease, squalid housing, high infant mortality, and low life expectancy are beyond any reasonable definition of human decency. The stark reality is that the North (including Eastern Europe) has a quarter of the world’s population and 80 percent of its income, while in the South (including China) three-quarters of the world’s people live on one-fifth of its income. Also, approximately 90 percent of the global manufacturing industry is in the North. While the quality of life in the North rises steadily, in the South every two seconds a child dies of hunger and disease.

Still the contrast between wealth and poverty does not correspond exactly with the North–South division. Many OPEC countries are rich, while poverty is found in North America and Europe. In the United States 14 percent of people and 30 percent of children are beneath the poverty line. In Britain over 10 percent live below the legal definition of poverty, and another 10 percent to 15 percent are close to this point. A great disparity between wealth and poverty is found not only between nations but also within them.

On the other hand, one-fifth of the world’s population lives in relative affluence and consumes approximately four-fifths of the world’s income. Moreover, according to a recent World Bank report, the “total disbursements” from the wealthy nations to the Third World amounted to $92 billion, a figure less than 10% of the worldwide expenditures on armaments; but this was more than offset by the “total debt service” of $142 billion. The result was a negative transfer of some $50 billion from the third world to the developed countries. This disparity between wealth and poverty is a social injustice so grievous that Christians dare not ignore it.

God has provided enough resources in the earth to meet the needs of all. Usually it is not the fault of the poor themselves, since for the most part they were born into poverty. Christians use the complexities of economics as an excuse to do nothing. However, God’s people need to dedicate themselves not only to verbal evangelism but also to relieving human need as part of sharing the good news (Luke 4:18–21), both at home and to the ends of the earth.

This explains why Christians in the two-thirds world place issues of poverty and economic development at the top of their theological agendas. Some Christians in the North have difficulty understanding why “liberation” is so central to the thinking of their counterparts in Latin America, Africa, and Asia, but they have never faced the stark, dehumanizing reality of grinding poverty (see also Liberation Theologies).

The Western missionary movement reflects an affluence that has developed as a result of the threefold revolution that has given Europe and North America a standard of living that is the envy of the world (see also Missionary Affluence). Since the sixteenth-century the scientific, industrial, and political revolution has unleashed an avalanche of material goods that has raised the West from poverty. Most of the world has not shared in this achievement. When missionaries from the West went to preach and minister to other lands in the nineteenth century, they often believed that God favored them materially and scientifically so that they could overawe the heathen. As recently as the 1970s a missionary could observe that “Economic power is still the most crucial power factor in the western missionary movement. It is still the most important way that the Western missionary expresses his concept of what it means to preach the gospel” (Bernard Quick). The fact that most Protestant missionaries serve in some part of Africa, Latin America, or Oceania, those parts of the world where most of the poor reside, indicates that missionaries are economically superior in the social contexts of their ministry.

There have always been a few individuals who have pointed out that Western missionaries can take for granted a level of material security, lifestyle, and future options that are beyond the wildest dreams of the people among whom they work. As the twentieth century progressed others joined in calling attention to the unforeseen and unwelcome effects of this economic disparity. At the Tambaran Conference (1938) a report was presented that clearly showed the dilemma between the comparatively “wealthy” missionaries and the “poor” people to whom they ministered. By the very nature of the situation missionaries were looked upon as the representatives of a wealthy and powerful civilization who introduced a new standard of economic values. The people that they served looked upon them not as proclaimers of a new faith, but as sources of potential economic gain. The problem of the personal affluence of Western missionaries when compared to the indigenous peoples was spelled out more explicitly in books such as Ventures in Simple Living (1933) and Living as Comrades (1950) written by Daniel Johnson Fleming, professor of missions at Union Theological Seminary (N.Y.). Writers like Fleming pointed out that the wealth of the West obscured the message of Christ, and led to feelings of helplessness and inferiority on the part of those to whom the missionaries ministered.

However, the problem of global economic disparity was once again obscured in the post–World War II period, when the North American missionary rank increased from less than 19,000 in 1953 to over 39,000 in 1985. These new missionaries were mostly from evangelical missionary groups who tended to neglect the work of the denominational agencies and focused on personal conversion, often ignoring economic and material problems.

Yet the work of authors such as Viv Grigg and Jonathan Bonk as well as a number of contributors to the Evangelical Missions Quarterly and Missiology focused attention on the obstacle to Christian witness inherent in the issues of wealth and poverty. Many of these writers counsel Christians in the more developed lands to share their material means with others. This can be done by supporting public and private efforts to aid the poor, by scaling down their standard of living, and by working for the empowerment of those who do not have the ability to represent themselves.

Robert G. Clouse

See also Option for the Poor.

Webb, Mary (1779–1861). American founder of the Boston Female Society for Missionary Purposes. Born in Boston, Mary Webb contracted a childhood illness that left her a paraplegic at age five. Confined to a wheelchair in a society that disregarded the disabled, she determined not to be incapacitated by her handicap. Baptized at age nineteen, she joined a Baptist church pastored by Thomas C. Baldwin. At his urging, she organized seven Baptist and six Congregationalist women into the Boston Female Society for Missionary Purposes. This organization was revolutionary in that women assumed leadership. In addition, it crossed denominational bounds at a time when most shunned ecumenical activity; and, while emphasizing evangelism, it encouraged humanitarian ministry.

During her fifty years of service as secretary-treasurer, Webb’s enthusiasm and influence spawned similar organizations, including the Female Cent Society (1803), the Children’s Cent Society (1812), the Corban Society (1811), the Fragment Society (1812), as well groups that ministered to ethnic minorities and prostitutes. Her voluminous correspondence promoted cooperation and communication between women’s missionary societies. This was difficult at best in an era characterized by strong denominational bounds; the women eventually separated to support their own denominations. Remembered as a visionary founder and social activist, Mary Webb died at age eighty-two of breast cancer.

GARY LAMB

WEC International. Worldwide Evangelization for Christ (formerly Worldwide Evangelization Crusade), WEC International was founded by C. T. Studd in Britain in 1913. Studd was one of the “Cambridge Seven” who went out to China with the China Inland Mission in 1885. He also played a significant role in the development of the Student Volunteer Movement. An interdenominational faith mission, WEC International has a primary focus on pioneer evangelism and church planting and in 1996 had 1,693 workers of 42 nationalities serving in 63 countries. There are an estimated 500,000 affiliated with WEC-related or founded churches today.

History. WEC was one of the later pioneer missions targeting the inland areas of unevangelized continents. Beginning as the Heart of Africa Mission in northeast Zaire, it extended to Amazonia in 1922, Arabia in 1924, and Central Asia in 1926. Studd’s brusque actions, bold language, radicalism, and uncompromising dedication together with a breakdown of relationships with the Home Council almost led to the demise of the mission around the time of his death in 1931. Yet the principles and vision he imparted became the foundation for later fruitfulness.

Norman Grubb, Studd’s son-in-law, rebuilt WEC with a distinctive structure and leadership principles which gave a high degree of flexibility and initiative to fields. Grubb was earlier instrumental in founding the Inter-Varsity Fellowship. By 1953 WEC had 550 workers in 24 countries. During Grubb’s leadership the mission became more international with sending bases in North America, Australasia, South Africa, and Europe.

The emphasis on the least evangelized continues to be maintained. By 1996 nearly 70 percent of WEC’s front-line personnel were in countries in the 10/40 Window area with 63 percent serving Muslim, Hindu, and Buddhist peoples. These efforts required innovative methods and structures for residence and ministry.

Principles. WEC’s foundational spiritual principles are known as the Four Pillars—faith, sacrifice, holiness, and fellowship. In terms of structure, fields and sending bases are self-governing. Wider issues are handled in fellowship with all relevant teams. The ultimate governing body in WEC is the Leaders Council comprised of all field, regional, and international leaders. All leaders are accountable to those they lead. After seeking God, decision-making is by consensus, including all those implicated in the decision. Women are eligible for leadership positions and couples are appointed together to leadership. In terms of faith, members seek to come to a common mind concerning God’s will and then to act, trusting God for the supply of personnel, enablement, and finances. In terms of commitment to work with others, through partnership with churches and other agencies in the body of Christ, WEC seeks to effectively work for the completion of the task of world evangelization. The ministry of the book Operation World to the whole body of Christ is an example of this commitment. Finally, in terms of internationalization, WEC is committed to be international and multicultural. The rapid increase of non-Westerners to 15 percent of the front-line missionaries has been the result, with an increasing number of sending bases in Latin America, Asia and Africa.

PATRICK J. JOHNSTONE

Wesley’s own missionary experience, before his evangelical conversion, involved two frustrating years in America as a chaplain in Georgia. After his return to England his heart was “strangely warmed” on May 24, 1738. The fire spread through his preaching and that of numerous workers Wesley sent across Britain, Ireland, the Theology.

Wesleyan/Holiness Missions. Wesleyan/Holiness missions are those missions that took place initially on the revivalistic edges of the Methodist Episcopal Church and within the contexts of the denominations that grew out of that church with “personal and social holiness” as major themes as articulated by John Wesley; many groups became Pentecostal after 1906 and are known as Wesleyan, Holiness, or “Sanctified” Pentecostal Churches. There are three primary methods of mission work: (1) mission based on the itineracy model of John Wesley; (2) the “Board” method of mission modeled on the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions (ABCFM); and, (3) “self-supporting missions” on the basis of ideas developed by William Taylor. The Wesleyan/Holiness denominations began to develop during the 1840s and now number in the hundreds, most of which have their own mission agencies on one of the above models and their own spheres of influence around the world among the approximately 12 million Wesleyan/Holiness believers worldwide, about half of which are associated with the Salvation Army. An important part of the story of Wesleyan/Holiness missions is the role of women in establishing, supporting, and serving in mission.

Early History. The initial missions which may be described as “Holiness” were of the “itineracy model.” Primary among these were the peripatetic labors of Lorenzo Dow in the U.S. and his trips to England, beginning in 1805, which resulted in the creation of the Primitive Methodist Church. He was part of that “Errand of the World” through which the Americans wished to transform the church in the “Old World.” During the antebellum period much missionary fervor was devoted to the westward expansion of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Holiness revivalistic Methodists signed on as missionaries to the Native Americans and were sent to Oregon and California; others joined the American Missionary Association or were sent by the Wesleyan Methodist Church to the American South. The Methodist Episcopal Church Missionary Society was founded in 1819 in New York on the model of the ABCFM. Many of the early recruits of the society were from the Holiness or revivalistic movements of Methodism. The same is true for the Evangelical Association (later EUB), which eventually merged into the United Methodist Church active in German-speaking Europe, Africa, and Latin America.

William Taylor was the second Methodist Episcopal Church missionary to California (1849–56), sent by the bishops and not by the Missionary Society. He would develop the “self-supporting” or “Pauline” missions theory and would be instrumental in the global development of Methodism, the Holiness Movement, and later, Pentecostalism (see Pentecostal Missions). Other important independent mission work was carried on (1840–47) by James Caughey in Canada and England, Walter and Phoebe Palmer in the British Isles (1860–65) as well as non-Methodists who were self-consciously Wesleyan/Holiness, including Charles Finney, Asa Mahan, William Boardman, and Robert and Hannah Whitall Smith, who spent time in England or on the Continent.

In Britain the efforts resulted in the Brighton Conventions. Many converts from these conventions would merge into the Church of the Nazarene. In Germany the Gemeinschaftsbewegung (1888) was organized out of the earlier Heiligungsbewegung: the Swedish Holiness Union was organized in 1885.

Denominational Missions. The Wesleyan/Holiness denominational board was that of the Wesleyan Methodist Church (WM, 1862) which, beginning in Sierra Leone (1889), established an important presence in Colombia, Japan, Haiti, Puerto Rico, Honduras, Mexico, the Philippines. It was through the Pilgrim Holiness (PH) Church that Charles E. and Lettie B. Cowman were appointed missionaries to Japan. The Cowmans withdrew to found the independent Oriental Missionary Society, now OMS International. The PH-WM merger produced the Wesleyan Church mission program, which is now located in Indianapolis, Indiana.

The second denominational Wesleyan/Holiness mission effort was by the Salvation Army (1878) founded by William Booth and his wife Catherine. The Booths had been forced to leave the Methodist churches in England to work with the poor and to enable Catherine Booth to have a ministry as a woman. Because of this experience, women have full ministerial and leadership roles in the Salvation Army and the ministry to the poor continues to be the focus of the organization. Beginning in the U.S., and continuing in Europe and the rest of the world, the Salvation Army has become a global church. Its periodical, War Cry is published in forty-three languages. The international headquarters are in London.

Bibliography. R. E. Coleman, Nothing to Do but Save Souls; H. A. Snyder, The Radical Wesley and Patterns for Church Renewal; R. G. Tuttle, John Wesley: His Life and Theology.

The Christian and Missionary Alliance, founded by A. B. Simpson (1887), was intended to expedite missionary activity. He maintained close contacts with the Free Methodists and Vanguard missionaries as well as the William Taylor missionaries in Latin America. The motto of the Fourfold Gospel, that is “Christ our Savior, Sanctifier, Healer, and Coming King,” summarized the Holiness theological vision. The Alliance quickly established missions in India, China, Taiwan, Japan, the Philippines, Vietnam, Cambodia, Thailand, Indonesia, Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Equador, Peru, Puerto Rico, Brazil, Congo, and the Ivory Coast as well as in Europe. The denomination supports several educational institutions. The international headquarters are in Colorado Springs, Colorado.

The Free Methodist Church organized a mission board in 1881 after initially encouraging mission on the Taylor model. Beginning with India, the Free Methodist Church has had significant success in Central Africa (where it merged with the [Pentecostal] Congo Gospel Mission), Japan, Brazil, the Philippines, Egypt, Mozambique, South Africa, and Paraguay. Many of these areas have become independent or quasi-independent churches in “fellowship” with the North American churches. Missionaries who made major contributions and are either the authors or subjects of numerous books include E. F. Ward (India), Jacob DeShazer, Paul Kakihara, and Frank Kline. The international headquarters of the Free Methodist Church is in Indianapolis, Indiana.

The Church of the Nazarene mission program began with the effort of Hiram Reynolds while he served in one of the constituent denominations of the Church of the Nazarene, the Association of Pentecostal Churches in America. This began (1896) as a “self-supporting” mission project but soon evolved to the ABCFM model. When the denomination was nationally established in 1908, Reynolds became the mission leader of the denomination. The major areas of influence were in India, South Africa, Swaziland, Korea, Latin America, Brazil, and China, including the overseas Chinese. The denomination merged with groups in Britain, Switzerland, and Germany to establish a European presence. The Church of the Nazarene is the third largest global Wesleyan/Holiness denomination. Its international headquarters is in Kansas City, Missouri.

Founded in the 1880s, the Church of God (Anderson) already had congregations in seventeen countries when the mission board was established in 1909. These included Germany, England, Russia, Latvia, Switzerland, Sweden, and Denmark. Extensive and successful efforts were made in Mexico, India, and Kenya. Numerous periodicals have been published in different languages, which together with the very important Church of God Missions chronicle the mission efforts, policies, and personnel. The international headquarters of this agency is in Anderson, Indiana.

The Church of God in Christ organized a mission department in 1926 although the denomination had been sending missionaries for decades. The primary focus of mission have been Europe, Africa, the Caribbean, and Brazil. Special attention has been given to cooperating with indigenous churches of the African diaspora. The headquarters of the mission is in Memphis, Tennessee.

Also beginning in 1926, the Church of God (Cleveland) consolidated a mission program active since 1910 into a mission board. Mission was undertaken initially on the William Taylor model. This entrepreneurial style especially suited J. H. Ingram, who was responsible for establishing churches and recruiting missionaries for Bermuda, Mexico, Guatemala, Costa Rica, and Panama. From this beginning the Church of God (Cleveland) has spread throughout Europe, Asia, Africa, and Latin America. It maintains a number of educational institutions. This second largest global Wesleyan/Holiness denomination has transformed itself into a “democratic” church with the majority of the members outside North America. This has moved the “board” model back to an understanding of mission and ecclesiology more like that of Taylor.

Independent Mission Agencies. In addition to OMS International, three additional independent mission agencies were particularly important. The first was the Vanguard Mission, St. Louis, composed primarily of Free Methodist adherents of “self-supporting” missions of which the primary organizer and theorist was ANNA ABRAMS. The Vanguard mission, which included a mission training school, a transit and building fund to assist missionaries, and a monthly mission magazine, maintained close connections with the Pentecostal bands.

The Pentecostal Bands were founded by Free Methodist Vivian Dake (1882). These adapted the methods of William Taylor to evangelism initially in North America, and then throughout the world. Small groups were sent out to do evangelism, organize congregations, and then move on. After an evangelistic trip through Europe, Dake died in Africa (1892). The Bands were expelled from the Free Methodist Church (1896) and organized as Pentecostal Bands of the World with missions in at least ten countries and evangelistic efforts in several more. These merged with the Wesleyan Methodist Church in 1958.

The National Association for the Promotion of Holiness created the National Holiness Missionary Society (now World Gospel Mission) in 1910. The initial efforts of this society were focused on China, led by Cecil Troxel. After the foreign missionaries were expelled from China, the group expanded, first into India and then into other areas. It also serves smaller Wesleyan/Holiness denominations as a mission service agency. It supports theological education efforts in Colombia, Brazil, Japan, and India. It maintains an international headquarters in Marion, Indiana.

Other Mission Sending Agencies. Among the Wesleyan/Holiness and Holiness/Pentecostal Churches with active mission programs not discussed above are: Africa Evangelistic Band, Bethel Mission of China, Bible Methodist Missions, Bolivian Friends Holiness Mission, Brethren in Christ Mission, Church of Christ (Holiness), Church of God (Holiness), Church of God (Seventh Day), Church of God in Christ, Church of God of Prophecy, Churches of Christ in Christian Union, Congregational Holiness Church, Congregational Methodist Church, Emanuel Association, Emanuel Bible College, Emanuel Holiness Church, Evangelical Bible Mission, Evangelical Friends Association, Evangelical Methodist Church, Evangelical Faith Missions, Fire Baptized Holiness Church, Friends Africa Gospel Mission, Great Commission Crusades (Haiti), Immanuel Gospel Mission, Immanueler Sogo Dendo Dan, India Evangelistic Association, Japan Holiness Church, Korean Holiness Church, Metropolitan Church Association, Mission Society for United Methodists, Missionary Church, Nihon Nakaren Kyodan, Nippon Jiizu Mesojisuto Kyodan, Peniel Missions, Pentecostal Holiness Church, Pillar of Fire, Swedish Holiness Union, Union Bible Seminary, United Brethren in Christ, Voice of China and Asia, World Gospel Crusades, World-Wide Missions, and Zainichi Beikoku Uesureyan Mesojisuto Senkyodan.

Whately, Mary Louisa

Whately, Mary Louisa (1824–89). Irish missionary to Egypt. Born into the family of the archbishop of Dublin, she was early on attracted to a ministry among the poor because of her father's work in establishing a school for them. This desire was fostered during the Irish famine of 1846–51, and she began to visit the poor and work with the Irish Church Mission. The Whately family also opened their home to Italian refugees fleeing from the Crimean War. Whately's commitment to cross-cultural missions did not come until she visited Cairo for medical reasons. While in Egypt, she was greatly troubled by the large number of children selling water without knowing the source of living water.
Whately, Mary Louisa

A second trip to Egypt in 1860 cemented her determination to remain in Egypt, where she started a school to teach women basic skills such as sewing and reading. Circumstances forced her to go back to Ireland for two years before she was able to return to Egypt and reopen the school. This time she was able to stay, and the school began to accept men and women who were destitute. For the next twenty-seven years, in addition to her school, she was deeply involved in village evangelism, traveling along the Nile, and distributing Bibles to literate people she met in the villages. She became ill in March 1889 while on one of her trips, and died after returning to Cairo.

Penny Gushiken

Wheaton '83. Sponsored by the WORLD EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP and held as a continuation of the work done in the WHEATON CONGRESS (1966), the BERLIN CONGRESS (1966), the LAUSANNE CONGRESS (1974), the PATAYA CONSULTATION (1980), and the GRAND RAPIDS CONSULTATION (1982), Wheaton '83 gathered 336 participants from 59 nations, with 60 percent coming from the non-Western world. The Consultation's theme was "I will build my Church," with each element in the agenda stressing the role of the local church as the central expression of God's kingdom in the world. There were three tracks within the consultation, with the following foci: (1) the biblical nature of the church and its mission; (2) the nature and mission of the church in new frontiers; (3) the nature of mission as involving both evangelism and social concerns.

Wheaton '83 continued the discussion with evangelical ranks on the nature of mission and the roles of evangelism and discipleship within mission. Within that debate, the tenor at Wheaton '83 was the recognition that alleviating poverty, bringing justice and transforming people and societies are all part of MISSION DEI.

A. Scott Moreau

Wheaton Congress 1966. See CONGRESS ON THE CHURCH'S WORLDWIDE MISSION.

Wheaton Declaration. See CONGRESS ON THE CHURCH'S WORLDWIDE MISSION.

White, John (1866–1933). English missionary to Zimbabwe. Born as the oldest son in an English farming family of seven children, White came to Christ at age sixteen. Sensing a call to foreign ministry early in life, he attended Didsbury College in Manchester, where his call to Africa was confirmed. He arrived in South Africa in 1888, but suffered a nervous breakdown after two years of work there. In 1894, after delays due to politi-and John Wesley had a difficult conflict over leys endured to the end, even though Whitefield
in the Soul of Man.
His friendship with the Wes-Charles Wesley gave him, entitled crowds of 20,000 people.

Whitefield could project his voice clearly simply in a black gown, and standing on a table
Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and America. Dressed
was constantly on the move throughout England, he had preached more than 18,000 sermons. He
one. When he died at fifty-six it is estimated that Whitefield began preaching at the age of twenty-and missionary to the United States. George
Whitefield, George

Whitefield was all life, fire, wing and force."

Other men seem to be only half alive but White-caused Spurgeon to say, "Whitefield was alive.
poor. His frequent appearances in America
Georgia. On the first journey to Georgia in 1737
like the Wesleys, he did missionary work in

Whitefield was converted through a book that
Whitefield was all life, fire, wing and force."

Whitefield, George (1714–70). British evangelist and missionary to the United States. George Whitefield began preaching at the age of twenty-
one. When he died at fifty-six it is estimated that he had preached more than 18,000 sermons. He was constantly on the move throughout England,
Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and America. Dressed
simply in a black gown, and standing on a table or hill Whitefield could project his voice clearly to crowds of 20,000 people.

Whitefield was converted through a book that
Charles Wesley gave him, entitled The Life of God in the Soul of Man. His friendship with the Wes-leys endured to the end, even though Whitefield
and John Wesley had a difficult conflict over predestination and free grace. John Wesley preached the funeral sermon for Whitefield in London.

Whitefield made his first journey to America when he was only twenty-three years old. Much like the Wesleys, he did missionary work in Georgia. On the first journey to Georgia in 1737
he took 300 pounds Sterling to distribute to the poor. His frequent appearances in America
caused Spurgeon to say, "Whitefield was alive.
Other men seem to be only half alive but Whitefield was all life, fire, wing and force."

Wholistic Mission

Though always an Anglican, Whitefield became very interdenominational. His unwavering insistence on conversion, his evangelizing across cultural boundaries, his deep concern for the poor, prisoners, and orphans are among Whitefield’s contributions to missions.

DEAN S. GILLILAND

Bibliography. George Whitefield’s Journals; J. P. Gledstone, George Whitefield, M.A., Field Preacher; S. C.
Henry, George Whitefield: Wayfaring Witness.

Whitman, Leroy Frederick (1904–92). American pioneer missionary in Jordan. Born in the Congo, Jordan lived for a brief four years on Martha’s Vineyard before studying in boarding school and Bible school in England. He arrived in Jerusalem in 1925 and only visited the United States two or three times in the next sixty-seven years. After brief associations with WEC and the Bible Evangelistic Mission, in 1927 he began working alone and for the rest of his life he lived frugally, often supported by sporadic gifts of Arab believers.

When he arrived on the east bank in the land
of Transjordan from Jerusalem in 1926, there were almost no known evangelical believers.
Through his pioneering efforts when he died in 1992 there were over forty churches and thousands of believers. In addition camps, schools, bookstores, and a seminary were being run by Jordanian believers. Not only was he instrumental in opening the barren desert kingdom to the gospel, but he gave constant encouragement and guidance to the five recognized evangelical groups now working there. God also used him in the north Palestine revival, in Lebanon, Syria,

Iraq, Kuwait, and the Gulf states.

He stressed the importance of the local church
and insisted that a church could function without the presence of an ordained clergy. He introduced the “magic lantern,” films, Bible distribution and house meetings. He and Dora, his British wife for 59 years, founded the only evangelical relief society to deal with the repeated
waves of refugees pouring into the country. Peoples were frugally, often supported by sporadic gifts of Arab believers.

When he arrived on the east bank in the land
of Transjordan from Jerusalem in 1926, there were almost no known evangelical believers.
Through his pioneering efforts when he died in 1992 there were over forty churches and thousands of believers. In addition camps, schools,
bookstores, and a seminary were being run by Jordanian believers. Not only was he instrumental in opening the barren desert kingdom to the gospel, but he gave constant encouragement and guidance to the five recognized evangelical groups now working there. God also used him in the north Palestine revival, in Lebanon, Syria,
Iraq, Kuwait, and the Gulf states.

He stressed the importance of the local church
and insisted that a church could function without the presence of an ordained clergy. He introduced the “magic lantern,” films, Bible distribution and house meetings. He and Dora, his British wife for 59 years, founded the only evangelical relief society to deal with the repeated
waves of refugees pouring into the country. Peoples were frugally, often supported by sporadic gifts of Arab believers.

When he arrived on the east bank in the land
of Transjordan from Jerusalem in 1926, there were almost no known evangelical believers.
Through his pioneering efforts when he died in 1992 there were over forty churches and thousands of believers. In addition camps, schools,
bookstores, and a seminary were being run by Jordanian believers. Not only was he instrumental in opening the barren desert kingdom to the gospel, but he gave constant encouragement and guidance to the five recognized evangelical groups now working there. God also used him in the north Palestine revival, in Lebanon, Syria,
Iraq, Kuwait, and the Gulf states.

He stressed the importance of the local church
and insisted that a church could function without the presence of an ordained clergy. He introduced the “magic lantern,” films, Bible distribution and house meetings. He and Dora, his British wife for 59 years, founded the only evangelical relief society to deal with the repeated
waves of refugees pouring into the country. Peoples were frugally, often supported by sporadic gifts of Arab believers.
Wicca, Wiccan

Wicca, Wiccan. A highly diversified group of worshipers of the Mother Goddess. They are followers of ideas popularized by Gerald Gardner, who, inspired by the arguments of Margaret Murray, taught that before Christianity there was an old religion that focused on issues of fertility and magical control over nature. Gardner blended selected elements of this supposed old fertility religion with the spiritualism and magic of Aleister Crowley to create a new nature-oriented faith.

Followers may refer to themselves as “witches” (depending on the group and, in some cases, only among themselves). They worship the Great Mother Goddess, sometimes identified as Diana, Isis, or Demeter; and celebrate the natural cycle of the seasons. Professing to do no evil, they claim to practice magic solely for good. They believe the effects of magic return threefold on the person who works it, including evil for those who depart from their creed. They have a deep love for nature and natural things and therefore a parallel interest in ecology, natural foods, and alternative healing practices.

While Wiccans worship in small “covens” they may choose to associate with a larger national organization such as the Church of Circle Wicca, the Covenant of the Goddess, the Georgian Wiccan, Wiccan.

Gardner's work created a powerful English Christian tradition with an eventual worldwide impact. Willfrid and Theodore ran into conflict again and again over the next twenty years. Theodore succeeded in achieving functional unity of the two traditions employing “contextualized” insights. His work created a powerful English Christian mission to the Pacific Islands. John and his wife Mary were commissioned by the London Missionary Society in 1816. Arriving on the island of Eimeo, they studied the Tahitian language and taught the gospel to a responsive people. At the invitation of the king, Williams sailed to Raiatea, where he built a cathedral, established a legal code, improved agricultural practices from the outside world. Williams and Liggins were the first Protestant missionaries in Japan. In 1866 Williams was made bishop of both China and Japan for the Episcopal Church. In 1874 another bishop was assigned to China and Williams continued as bishop of Japan until 1889. Williams continued to be active in missionary work in Japan until 1908, when he returned to America.

Williams was active in a variety of ministries in Japan, including evangelism (the first convert was baptized in 1866), education, and translation. He constructed the first Protestant church building in Japan, founded Rikkyo University and St. Luke's Hospital in Tokyo, and translated the Book of Common Prayer into Japanese. He was widely respected by Japanese and missionaries alike, not only for his accomplishments as a pioneer missionary but also for his pious and unpretentious manner.

Harold A. Netland

Channing Moore Williams (1829–1910). American pioneer missionary to China and Japan. Born in Richmond, Virginia, Williams completed his theological studies in 1855 and sailed for Shanghai, China, as a missionary under the Mission Board of the American Episcopal Church. Early in 1859 Williams and a colleague, John Liggins, were reassigned to begin mission work in Japan, which had just opened up to foreigners after two centuries of self-imposed isolation. Williams and Liggins were the first Protestant missionaries in Japan. In 1866 Williams was made bishop of both China and Japan for the Episcopal Church. In 1874 another bishop was assigned to China and Williams continued as bishop of Japan until 1889. Williams continued to be active in missionary work in Japan until 1908, when he returned to America.

Williams was active in a variety of ministries in Japan, including evangelism (the first convert was baptized in 1866), education, and translation. He constructed the first Protestant church building in Japan, founded Rikkyo University and St. Luke's Hospital in Tokyo, and translated the Book of Common Prayer into Japanese. He was widely respected by Japanese and missionaries alike, not only for his accomplishments as a pioneer missionary but also for his pious and unpretentious manner.

A. Netland

Channing Moore Williams (1829–1910). American pioneer missionary to China and Japan. Born in Richmond, Virginia, Williams completed his theological studies in 1855 and sailed for Shanghai, China, as a missionary under the Mission Board of the American Episcopal Church. Early in 1859 Williams and a colleague, John Liggins, were reassigned to begin mission work in Japan, which had just opened up to foreigners after two centuries of self-imposed isolation. Williams and Liggins were the first Protestant missionaries in Japan. In 1866 Williams was made bishop of both China and Japan for the Episcopal Church. In 1874 another bishop was assigned to China and Williams continued as bishop of Japan until 1889. Williams continued to be active in missionary work in Japan until 1908, when he returned to America.

Williams was active in a variety of ministries in Japan, including evangelism (the first convert was baptized in 1866), education, and translation. He constructed the first Protestant church building in Japan, founded Rikkyo University and St. Luke's Hospital in Tokyo, and translated the Book of Common Prayer into Japanese. He was widely respected by Japanese and missionaries alike, not only for his accomplishments as a pioneer missionary but also for his pious and unpretentious manner.

Harold A. Netland

Simpson's concern for the unchurched led him to form an indigenous missionary association dedicated to reaching the Pacific Islands. Accompanied by local missionaries, Simpson sailed to other islands, including Rarotonga and the Solomon Islands, where the impact of the gospel again transformed the people. In assessing the work Simpson said, "There is not an island of importance within two thousand miles of Tahiti to which the glad tidings of salvation have not been conveyed." After a furlough in England, Williams and a group of missionaries from Samoa and Tonga decided to reach the people toward the west. It was on their arrival in Erromanga, New Hebrides, that Williams, the "Apostle to Polynesia," and other missionaries were martyred on November 20, 1839.

DOUGLAS McCONNELL

Bibliography. J. Gutch, Beyond the Reefs: The Life of John Williams, Missionary.

Willingen Conference

(700–786). English pioneer missionary in Germany. Like Boniface, and perhaps a relative of his, Willibald did not hail from Northumbria, but did become another Anglo-Saxon missionary resource, spending time in the Eastern Mediterranean, and then ten years at the original center of the Benedictine tradition, Monte Cassino, before being sent by the pope as a missionary bishop to Germany to carry on the splendid record of English missionaries in northern Europe. The leaders in Rome may have clearly sensed the strategic value of people with Anglo-Saxon background being missionaries to their linguistic cousins in the Germanic area. The English languages and dialects at this point in history had not yet suffered the extensive Latinization that began to occur when William the Conqueror took over England three hundred years later.

This moment of history allowed the extensive scholarly and literary tradition of the Celtic Christians to be influentially cross-pollinated by Christianized Germanic Anglo-Saxons in England and by the Germanic tribal societies on the Continent during a critically significant window of time just prior to the massive upheaval that would soon be initiated by yet another invading power. While earlier pagan Anglo-Saxons had invaded a settled, literate Romano-Celtic society, now, pagan Scandinavians would be invading a literate and strongly Christian Anglo-Saxon society—laced with outstanding scholars—a social force which in timely fashion had already contributed hugely to the survival of the faith in Europe.

RALPH D. WINTER

Willingen Conference (1952). Located in Germany, Willingen was the site of the second-to-last World Missionary Conference of the International Missionary Council (IMC). One hundred ninety delegates met from June 5 to 17, 1952, to consider the theme "The Missionary Obligation of the Church" in light of the emerging realities of the postwar world.

Although missions had established beachheads worldwide, the rise of nationalism, the loss of China to communism, the resurgence of non-Christian religions, and the emergence of the World Council of Churches posed new challenges. Thus, delegates sought to examine the theological foundation of mission and to reformulate mission policy.

Willingen located the source of mission not in the church, but in the nature of the Triune God. However, as a result of the emphasis on the activity of God in all of history, disagreement as to the precise relationship of the church to its mission and to the Kingdom of God characterized much of the proceedings.

Continuing in the tradition of the Whitby Conference (1947), Willingen affirmed the concept of Partnership in obedience, but interpreted it in such a way that unity among the churches appeared to receive higher priority than the unevangelized world.

RALPH D. WINTER
Willingen Conference

By defining the missionary obligation of the church as the proclamation of Christ's reign on the part of every believer in every moment and every situation of human life, Willingen generated much subsequent reflection and debate about the missionary nature of the church.

KEN MUIRHEAD

Bibliography. N. Goodall, ed., The Church under the Cross.

Wilson was ordained into the ministry of the Presbyterian Church in 1918 and served as an evangelistic missionary with the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions from 1919 to 1939 in Tabriz, Iran. From 1921 to 1923 he was chairman of the Near East Relief Committee for Persia and from 1937 to 1940 chairman of the Near East Christian Council.

Wilson returned to the United States in 1939, having accepted a position at Princeton Theological Seminary, where from 1941 to 1961 he was director of field work and associate professor of ecumenics. From 1942 to 1956 he was also the director of the Princeton Institute of Theology. He pioneered the development of field work in seminaries and was editor of the first basic text on the subject of Ministers in Training (1957). He also authored several books and tracts in Persian; articles and books in English, including Apostle to Islam, a biography of Samuel Zwemer; and the missionary column in The Presbyterian from 1935 to 1948.

PATRICK SUKKHEAD

Wilson, John Leighton (1809–75). American missionary to Liberia and mission executive. Born in Sumter County, South Carolina, he was educated at Union College, Schenectady, New York (1827–29), and, after a year of teaching, at Columbia Theological Seminary, South Carolina (1830–33). He was ordained by Harmony Presbytery, 1833, and he and his wife were sent by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions to Cape Palmas, Liberia (1834–42). He wrote grammars, dictionaries, and translations of Scripture. One of his pamphlets published in England helped end the slave trade on the western coast of Africa. He was a missions secretary in New York City (1853–60), editor, and author of the encyclopedic Western Africa: Its History, Condition and Prospects (1854). Lafayette College, Pennsylvania, gave him a D.D. (1854). When the Civil War began he became the Foreign Missions Secretary of the Southern Presbyterian Church (1861–85) and, for a while, the Home Missions Secretary (1863–82). In 1876 his office was transferred from Columbia, South Carolina, to Baltimore. He died in retirement at his South Carolina home. Highly respected for his wisdom, humility, evangelistic spirit, and administrative skill, he led the Southern Presbyterians missions enterprise from their beginning in 1861 and helped give them the strong missions emphasis that marked the years of their separate existence.

ALBERT H. FREUND JR.

Wilson, Margaret Bayne (1795–1835). Scottish missionary to India. Born in Greenock, Scotland, she received a quality education and dedicated herself to teaching Sunday school and working with the Female Benevolent Society of Scotland. She became acquainted with John Wilson, a man nine years her junior, who aspired to work in India as a missionary. They were married on August 12, 1828, and left for India a few weeks later.

The Wilsons spent one year in language training and arrived in Bombay in 1829. Wilson quickly discovered that girls were considered intellectually inferior and unworthy of education. She was determined to challenge this notion and within six months of her arrival, organized six schools for girls from lower-caste families. She handled the administration of the schools, trained teachers, and wrote many textbooks. She eventually opened the first boarding school for girls in western India.

Wilson persuaded her sisters, Hay and Anna, to join her in India. She was convinced that the presence of capable females would provide beneficial role models for the Indian women. After only a few years her health began to fail and she died in Bombay. Her sisters continued her work. Inspired by her effort, the Edinburgh Association of Ladies for the Advancement of Female Education in India was formed in 1837. Wilson had succeeded in demonstrating that Indian girls could be educated and that women could contribute substantially to the mission effort.

KENNETH D. GILL

Bibliography. E. G. K. Hewat, Christ and Western India; D. P. Thomson, Women of the Scottish Church; J. Wilson, A Memoir of Mrs. Margaret Wilson.

Wilson, Mary Ann (Cooke) (1784–1868). English missionary educator in India. Born in England, Mary Ann Cooke had worked as a governess before going in 1820 to Calcutta under the British Foreign Schools Society. When their funds failed she was taken up by the Church Missionary Society (1822), and in 1823 she married a CMS missionary, Isaac Wilson. She founded and built up a school for girls, and her initiatives led to the founding, in England, of the Society for Promoting Female Education in the East (SPFEE) (1834). Widowed in 1828, she continued her work for Indian girls during and after her marriage. During a time of famine she established a female orphanage at Agarpura, north of Calcutta. She even won praise from Bishop Daniel Wilson of Calcutta, but became dissatisfied with the support she received, and after encountering the Brethren evangelist, Anthony Norris Groves, she left the Church of England in 1842. CMS continued to run the Agarpura institution.

Wilson appears to have then left India and to have taught in the Middle East, but she continued to encourage other women to set up Christian schools in India, through articles in the SPFEE’s magazine. Truly a missionary pioneer, it was many years before any other woman served for any length of time, and she proved the usefulness of women’s work in the Indian context.

Jocelyn Murray

Winter, Ralph D. (1924– ). American missiological thinker and missionary to Guatemala. One of the most innovative missiological thinkers of the twentieth century, Winter served from 1956 to 1966 as a Presbyterian missionary to the Mam Indians of Guatemala following the completion of his education at Cal Tech (B.S.), Columbia (M.A.), Cornell (Ph.D.), and Princeton (B.D.).

While in Guatemala, Winter was one of those instrumental in launching the Theological Education by Extension movement throughout Latin America. Traveling widely, he disseminated extension concepts and helped forge a continental network of extension educators. His work Theological Education by Extension provided historical perspective and practical guidelines for the movement.

Called to the School of World Mission of Fuller Theological Seminary, Winter taught in the areas of history and leadership training. In 1968, he and his wife Roberta founded the William Carey Library to publish missionary literature. In 1972, he helped establish the American Society of Missiology and later the International Society of Frontier Missiology. His 1974 address to the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization helped awaken the global church to the presence of people groups beyond the reach of established churches and mission efforts (see Unreached Peoples). In 1976, he and his wife founded the United States Center for World Mission and in 1977 the William Carey International University to provide for and coordinate thinking, training, and services needed to establish Christian movements among the remaining unreached people groups.

Ken Mulholland

Witchcraft and Sorcery. Most of the peoples of the world assume that spiritual power can be directed toward others with the express aim of harming them. We label such concepts witchcraft and sorcery. Though technically sorcery is conscious and deliberate, while witchcraft is considered to be unconscious, the term “witchcraft” is commonly used to cover both conscious and unconscious malevolent spiritual activity done by specialists.

Shamans, diviners, and other purveyors of spiritual power are regularly sought by people who feel they have been wronged to conduct rituals designed to harm those against whom they wish to take revenge. In addition, the spirits of witches are believed to leave their bodies at night to go to other people and places to cause harm, often to the innocent.

In many societies it is assumed that illness, accident, and death are never natural occurrences. Commonly, then, it is assumed that when a person dies, becomes ill, or has an accident it is the result of witchcraft (including sorcery). It is then the task of a diviner or a “witch doctor” to ascertain who has caused the death and why. Various forms of divination and ordeal are used to identify the culprit. People often wear charms to protect themselves against witchcraft.

The fear of witchcraft is a major factor in most societies and an important concern of many churches and witch-finding organizations. Since witches are supposed to harm people unconsciously, those accused by such groups are often quite unaware of their supposed guilt.

A common form of witchcraft is the evil eye. This is the belief that some people, whether consciously or unconsciously, can direct evil power toward others, especially children, simply by looking at them. Looks plus compliments directed toward children are considered especially dangerous. Parents will, therefore, make their children less attractive to avoid drawing attention from those believed to have the evil eye.

Missionaries who ignore or summarily dismiss witchcraft and sorcery beliefs and practices often drive them underground. The practices and beliefs do not change; they are only removed from public scrutiny. Missionaries must find sensitive ways to understand and deal not only with the beliefs and practices, but with the functions such beliefs and practices serve within the societies in which they are found.
Witchcraft and Sorcery

Charles H. Kraft

Witchdoctor. See Shaman, Shamanism.

Witness. A witness is one who bears testimony about a person, place, or event. While the modern term frequently is associated with seeing (e.g., an eyewitness), the underlying Hebrew and Greek terms focus more on testifying than on observing. Throughout the Bible the term is used in forensic contexts to indicate one who is able to explain what has happened due to personal experience of an event or issues related to the event being investigated. The purpose of such testimony is to establish truth so that appropriate judgment may be determined. To do so, however, two or more independent witnesses were necessary to establish accusations against the accused (Deut. 19:15). Bearing false witness against someone was forbidden (Exod. 20:16), and punishable by giving the false witness the punishment due the accused (Deut. 19:16–21).

In addition to the legal concept, a witness may authenticate accounts of an event or meaning outside of legal proceedings. Paul, for example, calls God himself as a witness of Paul’s commitment to pray for the Christians in Rome (Rom. 1:9). The Spirit also bears witness with our spirit that we belong to God (Rom. 8:16).

The term also develops a nonlegal but technical sense of bearing testimony about Christ. John the Baptist bore such a testimony (John 1:7, 15). The word signifies lifestyle and verbal testimony about Christ before non-Christians in the hope of persuading them to respond to the gospel. (Acts 1:8). Jesus promised the power of the Spirit for such witness and in Acts 4:33 the apostles showed the fulfillment of Jesus’ promise. In Paul’s vision, Jesus encouraged Paul that he would bear witness of Christ in Rome just as he promised to do in Jerusalem (Acts 23:11).

Contemporary Issues. In many evangelical circles, witnessing refers to the act of evangelism. Typically it is used of verbal proclamation of the gospel and may be divorced from lifestyle.

Lifestyle witness (see also Lifestyle Evangelism) refers more specifically to our testimony to the truth through the concrete way we live. If detached from some type of truth proclamation (verbal, written, etc.), however, lifestyle witness will inevitably be read through the worldview of the observer (see also Presence Evangelism). In cross-cultural settings, the observers’ worldviews may have little or no Christian orientation, and the lifestyle they see will be interpreted in categories that make sense to the observers rather than to the witness. While it is true that our lives bear witness for good or ill, lifestyles without corresponding sensitive and appropriate explanation to the receptor will always be read in light of the receptor’s categories.

In ecumenical circles, witness refers to “the total evangelizing presence and manifestation of the church” (Bria, 1067), and is all that the church is and does. Common witness was popularized in ecumenical circles from the 1970s, and refers to the joint witness of the universal church in all of its efforts. It was built on the theological reflection that no single church fully manifests Christ to the world; it takes a universal effort to achieve such global witness. Particular attention in this understanding is given to cooperative efforts which display unity in mission, however imperfect they may be. Such efforts stand as a witness before the world of our unity in Christ and God’s love for humankind. Common witness is broader than just cooperative efforts, however. It is also reflected when we live lives which honor our Christian commitments and display an accepting, ecumenical attitude toward Christians who are from different ecclesiological backgrounds.

A. Scott Moreau

Women in Mission. Women have a long history of responding to God’s desire to use them in carrying out his purposes on earth. From Miriam, the sister of Moses (Exod. 15:20; Micah 6:4), Deborah, a judge chosen by God to rule (Judg. 45), and Huldah, a prophet carrying God’s message (2 Kings 22:14–20; 2 Chron. 34:11–33) to Catherine Booth of the Salvation Army, MOTHER TERESA in her ministry to the poor of India, and ELISABETH ELLIOT, the great missionary writer, God has chosen and empowered women to do his bidding through the ages.

In Jesus’ day, women traveled from town to village with Jesus and the disciples, helping support them out of their own means (Luke 8:13). They remembered Jesus’ words concerning his death and resurrection and were ready for their first assignment of telling the disciples the Good News that Jesus had risen from the dead.

In the early church, women were active in the mission of the church. In Philippi, the Lord opened Lydia’s heart in response to Paul’s words and, after she and her household were baptized, she opened her home for believers to meet and grow in their faith (Acts 16:1415, 40). Priscilla was used by God to touch people in at least three different nations: Rome, Greece, and Asia Minor (Rom. 16:35; 2 Tim. 4:19). Priscilla's name is usually listed before her husband's in the biblical record and, since this is not common for that day, it most probably indicates her importance in the minds of the New Testament writers and her prominence in the church.
Women in Mission

Many women were martyred for their love for Jesus in the first two centuries of Christianity. Santa Lucia of Sicily, who lived about a.d. 300, was involved in Christian charitable work. After marrying a wealthy nobleman, she was ordered to stop giving to the poor; she refused and was sent to jail. There she was persecuted and condemned to death. Melania, coming from a wealthy family in Rome with estates all around the Mediterranean, used her resources to give to the poor and build monasteries and churches for both men and women in Africa and in Jerusalem. Her missionary journeys started as she fled from Rome during the invasion by the Goths in a.d. 410. As a refugee, she and many other women played an important role in this great missionary movement. Some women were taken as hostages to northern Europe, where they later married their captors and evangelized them (Malcolm, 1982, 99–100). Clare, who lived and worked in the early thirteenth century, was a reformer where Christianity had forgotten the poor. She founded the Franciscan order of barefoot nuns in Italy (ibid., p. 104). Women who chose to remain single served God through living the cloistered life and were given the opportunity through the accepted ecclesiastical framework to proclaim the gospel.

In the Catholic tradition, priests, bishops, and nuns built churches and hospitals and founded schools and orphanages to establish the faith. Women who experienced a call to mission first had to join a celibate religious order. Catholic mothers were to have families as their primary responsibility. Not until the mid-twentieth century could lay women freely participate in official foreign missions with the full sanction of the Church. Catholic sisters were the first trained nurses in the United States. They nursed the wounded during the Revolutionary War and founded some of the first American hospitals for the poor in the early nineteenth century. Mother Mary Joseph in the 1920s founded the Maryknoll Sisters, who focused on direct evangelism, seeing themselves fully participating in the church's apostolic work. Six of the Maryknoll Sisters went to China as missionaries in 1921.

The Protestant Reformation in the sixteenth century brought about changes in the role of women in Christianity. The Reformers reemphasized that women's role is in the home and supportive of men. Arthur Glasser writes: "The reformers also subjected women to the confining perspective that their only recognized vocation was marriage. With the dissolution of the nunneries women lost their last chance of churchly service outside the narrow circle of husband, home and children" (1979, 91). Within Protestantism the problem then arose as to whether women had the right to respond to the promptings of the Holy Spirit to proclaim the Word of God.

Ruth Tucker emphasizes that because women were restricted in serving in leadership within the institutional church, they were attracted to responding to serving God in mission work, where the limitations were less restrictive (1988, 9). This was due to the fact that mission leaders focused on reaching a lost world for Christ. Though male leadership within the church has limited how women can use their God-given gifts at home, the urgency of fulfilling the Great Commission has required all available assistance.

In the early days of the Protestant mission advance, most women who went to the field were wives of missionaries. Many men even began looking for a wife to accompany them after they were appointed as missionaries. Women often felt a deep commitment to missions, but were required to marry before they could fulfill their own missionary calling. Discerning male missionaries recognized that contact with women in most non-Western societies was impossible. So it was that the missionary wives not only managed the home and children but developed programs to reach local women and girls. Ann Judson, wife of Adoniram, demonstrated how wives not only cared for the family and ran a household in a foreign country, but developed their own ministry as well. Ann ran a small school for girls, did evangelistic work with the women, was a pioneer Bible translator in two languages, and was the leading female missionary author of the early nineteenth century. Her letters and journals of their work with the Burmese inspired many in the homeland to support missions and consider missions as a vocation.

Single women were first sent to the field to care for missionaries' children and serve alongside the missionary family. Little by little as opportunities arose, single women missionaries began to supervise women's schools for nationals (Beaver, 1980, 59–86). Quietly they helped reach out to the local women who were secluded from society. In 1827, Cynthia Farrar responded to a field request from India for a single woman to supervise the schools for national girls that had been started by the mission and was appointed by the American Board, the first unmarried woman sent overseas as an assistant missionary by any American agency. In 1839, Eliza Agnew went to Ceylon to serve as principal at an established boarding school for girls. She held that post until she retired forty years later. Many of her students became Christians. She endeared herself to her students and visited former students in their homes.
Women in Mission

By 1837, when it became recognized by evangelical missions that female missionaries needed a more advanced level of training, Mount Holyoke Female Seminary was founded by Mary Lyon. The five basic areas of education included: (1) religious, (2) benevolence, (3) intellectual, (4) health, and (5) service. Students at the seminary were guided to develop a spirituality of self-sacrifice for the sake of the gospel and others. By 1887, Mount Holyoke had sent out 175 foreign missionaries to eighteen countries (Robert, 1996, 93–104). Soon graduates from Mount Holyoke were involved in starting similar training schools for women in many parts of the world.

The Civil War in the United States became a catalyst for change in women’s role. Women were mobilized into benevolent activity on behalf of the soldiers. The death of the largest number of men in American history created an entire generation of single women. Since denominational mission boards were still dragging their feet on sending single women to the field and the supply of committed women was greater than ever, the Women’s Missionary Movement was born. The first women’s sending board was the Women’s Union Missionary Society, an interdenominational board founded by SARAH DOREMUS in 1861. In quick succession, women of many denominational boards founded their own female missionary organizations.

A. B. SIMPSON, founder of the Christian and Missionary Alliance in 1887, held and promoted an open policy for women in ministry. He saw the issue as “one which God has already settled, not only in His Word, but in His providence, by the seal which He is placing in this very day, in every part of the world, upon the public work of consecrated Christian women” (Tucker and Leifeld, 1987, 287–88). When criticized for his views, he strongly suggested, “Let the Lord manage the women. He can do better than you, and you turn your batteries against the common enemy” (ibid., 288). This mission, along with many other Faith Missions in their zeal to reach the unreached and focus wholly on evangelism, attracted women who were usually restricted from regular theological education and ordination, but who felt strong calls to ministry and service and were willing to live in poverty and insecurity for the sake of the gospel. For the task of world evangelization, the whole church was mobilized and women were welcomed to serve as evangelists.

By 1900, over forty denominational women’s societies existed, with over 3 million active women raising funds to build hospitals and schools around the world, paying the salaries of indigenhuman needs (1996, xviii; see Holistic Mission). Women in mission have shown a deep commitment to and concern for women and children. Education, medical work, and struggles against foot binding, child marriage, female infanticide, and oppressive social, religious, and economic structures were commonly the focuses of their work. With their holistic approach to missions, women were committed to healing. Thus Medical Missions were dominated by women for many years. Women have been permitted great latitude in Christian ministry with their work ranging from Evangelism and Church Planting to Bible Translation and teaching in seminaries. Since women were less involved in denominational activities and more focused on human need, it was easier for them to be ecumenically-minded and risk cooperation for common purposes. Women therefore often took the lead in founding ecumenical mission organizations.

MARGUERITE KRAFT

SEE ALSO Gender Roles and Third World Women.

Women's Missionary Societies. See Women in Mission.

World Congress on Evangelism (Berlin, 1966). An international gathering of evangelicals to promote the cause of missions, the Berlin congress had its roots in a burden Billy Graham had over the worldwide lack of clarity and agreement on evangelism. It was the decision of the staff of Christianity Today to celebrate their tenth anniversary by dealing with this burden. They invited 1,200 delegates from virtually all Protestant denominations in a hundred countries, as well as Roman Catholic and Jewish observers, to participate in a ten-day congress under the rubric “One Race, One Gospel, One Task.” The response was positive, and delegates came from the oldest Christian church (the first-century Mar Thoma Syrian of India) and from the beginnings of the Auca church whose members a few years before had participated in the slaying of evangelical missionaries in Ecuador. With the precedent of the 1910 World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh, where approximately the same number (1,206) of delegates pledged to carry to completion the evangelization of the world, the Berlin Congress called the leaders of the World Council of Churches to rekindle the dynamic zeal for world evangelization that had characterized Edinburgh fifty-six years previously.

World Consultation on World Evangelization

Plenary sessions were devoted to reaffirming the divine authority and theological justification for world evangelization as well as exposing the internal hindrances and external obstacles standing in the way of its achievement. Serious attention was also given to reviewing how the biblical methods of evangelism could be adapted to the various situations facing churches throughout the world. Finally, “acting voluntarily, personally, and in wholesome unity, without committing their churches,” the delegates pledged “to bring the Word of Salvation to the human race in this generation, by every means God has given to the mind and will of men.” There were complaints that the congress failed to arrive at consensus on crucial issues such as the relation of Evangelism and Social Responsibility. But it did define clearly the biblical nature of evangelism and was later seen as an essential step in the movement of evangelicals worldwide to the launching of the Lausanne Congress for World Evangelization in 1974.

ARTHUR F. GLASSER

World Consultation on World Evangelization (Pattaya 1980). Held June 16–27 in Pattaya, Thailand, this Lausanne Committee on World Evangelization sponsored consultation gathered almost nine hundred people from around the world to consider strategic issues of reaching the unreached. Chaired by Leighton Ford and directed by David Howard, Pattaya’s primary focus was the seventeen miniconsultations included within the conference. Pattaya’s five goals included: “1) to seek fresh vision and power for the task Christ has given to his church until he comes; 2) to assess the state of world evangelization, its progress and hindrances; 3) to complete an extended study program on theological and strategic issues related to world evangelization and to share the results; 4) to develop specific evangelistic strategies related to different unreached people groups; and 5) to review the mandate of the LCWE” (Scott, 1981, 60–61). While a larger statement was produced (“The Thailand Statement”), most of the consultations produced more voluminous reports, which became Lausanne Occasional Papers and were published separately. Organized to advocate a people group approach to mission strategy (see Peoples, People Groups), Pattaya exhibited the lack of unanimity over the concept of “people” found within evangelicalism at that time in that the consultations were focused on religious, ideological, or socioeconomic distinctions rather than ethnolinguistic ones.
World Consultation on World Evangelization

While Pattaya did have good representation of non-Western participants, the lack of women in positions of prominence was evident and a point of contention for some in attendance (see Sand). Coming within a month of the WCC-sponsored MELBOURNE CONFERENCE (1980), if nothing else Pattaya highlighted the difference between the evangelical and the ecumenical orientation to the missionary task (see Bosch). Pattaya focused on evangelizing unreached peoples, while Melbourne focused on the establishment of the KINGDOM OF GOD through acts of justice and liberation.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

World Council of Churches (WCC). The rise of the WCC may be seen historically through the ecumenical conferences of the twentieth century. From the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE (Edinburgh, 1910) three streams of the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT developed. The first stream, the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL (IMC), whose roots can be traced directly to Edinburgh, was officially formed in 1921. The second stream, the Faith and Order Movement, came from the vision of cooperation generated at Edinburgh and held its first conference at Lausanne in 1927. The third stream, the Life and Work Movement, came largely as a result of the work of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship and held its pioneering conference in Geneva in 1925. The last two streams merged when delegates from 147 churches and denominations constituted the WCC at the AMSTERDAM ASSEMBLY in 1948. After much debate during the 1950s, the IMC was merged into the WCC at the NEW DELHI ASSEMBLY in 1961.

The WCC is composed of over 330 member churches and denominations from more than 120 countries and a broad variety of ecclesiastical traditions. More than two-thirds of those members are from the non-Western world. Since its inception the WCC has convened world assemblies at intervals of roughly seven years (see WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES ASSEMBLIES). In addition to the assemblies, the three streams of the ecumenical movement (and more recently their related WCC program units) have held numerous conferences (see also WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES CONFERENCES).

All member churches agree to hold to the basics of the WCC: “The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Savior according to the Scriptures and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.” This statement is not intended to be a confession of faith, but a framework of convictions that all members share.

Over the years many evangelicals, a number of whom have been active within the WCC, have raised several issues of concern. The four most significant are (1) a perceived lack of commitment to full biblical authority, (2) an undue influence of PLURALISM, as seen in the implicit UNIVERSALISM and lack of commitment to the traditional understanding of evangelism, (3) social and political biases and agendas that have tended to exclude emphasis on personal salvation, and (4) linguistic imprecision in WCC documents, allowing an unacceptably broad range of interpretation. Accordingly, evangelical opinion has been divided over cooperation with the WCC. Some people and organizations participate fully, hoping to steer it in a more biblical direction. Some organizations maintain a working relationship with the WCC but not official membership. Finally, many evangelical individuals and organizations advocate separation from the WCC altogether. Attempts have been made by both the WCC and a variety of evangelicals to find common ground, but the concerns run so deep that at present the prospect of widespread cooperation of evangelicals with the WCC remains remote.

A. SCOTT MOREAU

World Council of Churches Assemblies. At the AMSTERDAM ASSEMBLY in 1948 the WCC came into being as a nonlegislative fellowship of churches united by their commitment to a common confession of “our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Savior.” The assembly itself is the WCC’s principal authority; a central committee representing the member churches proportionately meets twice annually.

The theme selected for the First Assembly was “Man’s Disorder and God’s Design.” Since this was directly related to the mission concern of the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL (IMC), many were encouraged that the WCC agreed that evangelism must be on the constant imperative for all Christians, and that the struggle to express the unity of Christians for the sake of effective witness must continue. It unconditionally affirmed:
“All of our churches stand under the commission of our common Lord: ‘Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature.’” Even so, two of Amsterdam’s key perspectives aroused a measure of concern within IMC circles: (1) the older pattern of missionary activity identified with mission agencies was coming to an end; and (2) participating churches should awaken to their societal responsibilities and the ways in which lay ministries might be stimulated and augmented to this end.

The Second WCC Assembly was convened at Evanston, Illinois (1954), with the theme “Christ, the Hope of the World.” The theme’s eschatological implications stirred up a measure of public discussion, particularly among Jewish leaders who had earlier reacted against Amsterdam’s call to the churches to engage in Jewish evangelism. The attention called to “the hope of Israel” (Rom. 9–11) provoked discord. In the end political as well as theological considerations forced the issue to be dropped. In addition, given the ferment generated at Amsterdam that the function of mission agencies should be carried out centrally by the church in mission, at Evanston the legitimacy of the IMC was inevitably questioned. Should not the IMC with its regional church councils seek merger with the WCC? As for evangelism, Evanston enlarged the call to dialogue with people of other faiths. This was regarded as more congenial to the spirit of the age than was recourse to “outdated, conversionary forms of evangelistic mission.”

The Third WCC Assembly took place in New Delhi (1961) with the theme “Jesus Christ, the Light of the World.” Agreeing that the IMC had become redundant, WCC leaders welcomed the petition from the IMC ACCRA CONFERENCE (1958) seeking merger with the WCC. This request was heralded as the only way to bring the concerns of mission and unity to the heart of the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT. Evangelicals reacted with much misgiving. They contended that the witness of church history is virtually unanimous in demonstrating that church leaders invariably were so preoccupied with maintaining present structures that they rarely had the interest, energy, and time to launch frontier mission efforts. Even so, the WCC-IMC merger was enthusiastically welcomed, though it marked the beginning of the eclipse of missionary outreach in the WCC.

New Delhi should be particularly remembered for adopting a solid biblical basis to define itself: “The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Savior according to the Scriptures and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.” This promotion of the Trinity coupled with the ferment generated by the view of Jesus as “the Light of the World” meant that henceforth the WCC would be caught up in exploring the implications of his uniqueness, especially as the ecumenical movement seemed to be entering ever more directly into the context of non-Christian religions. A hopeful addition to the growing WCC interest in the THEOLOGY OF MISSION was the call for a trinitarian basis that could be related to all aspects of the church’s focus on mission, service, and unity. But there was a growing tendency to use “mission” to represent everything the churches were called upon to do in the world, a tendency promoted by the slogan “The Church Is Mission” (see also MISSION AND MISSIONS). The inevitable result was further devaluation of the traditional understanding of the specific evangelistic role of missionaries and mission societies.

The Fourth Assembly at Uppsala (1968) marked the beginning of widespread evangelical disenchchantment with the direction of the WCC. Although the theme was eschatological, “Behold, I Make All Things New!” this dimension was not given primary focus. Actually, preassembly documents provoked such concern among evangelicals that DONALD A. MCGRAN›R raised the question, “Will Uppsala Betray the Two Billion?” He reflected the heightened sense of impatience among many evangelicals over the efforts of some WCC leaders to reconceptualize the Christian mission. The evangelicals determined to defend mission as biblically defined. Two major conferences in 1966 (the CONGRESS ON THE CHURCH’S WORLDWIDE MISSION IN WHEATON and the WORLD CONGRESS ON EVANGELISM IN BERLIN) reflected their impatience and spelled out their concern. Both gatherings not only reflected the dramatic growth of evangelicals and charismatics throughout the postwar world, but produced documents marking the end of passivity regarding the WCC. Whereas they agreed that many of the concerns discussed at Uppsala were valid and worthy of serious attention, they were troubled when an undefined “Christian Presence” and interreligious dialogue, not gospel proclamation, were heralded as the means of lifting up “humanization” as the goal of mission. This imprecision of language and absence of biblical categories provoked concern as to the direction of the WCC. Its truncated call to social and political activism needed to be supplemented with the Berlin document “One Race, One Gospel, One Task” and with the biblical urgency behind Wheaton’s reaffirmation of the watchword of the SVM.

The Fifth Assembly was convened at Nairobi in 1975 with the theme “Jesus Frees and Unites.” The delegates had been greatly influenced by two conciliar gatherings of significance: the Geneva Conference on Church and Society (1966), which sought to define a “Christian response to the challenges of revolutionary changes in our time”; and the Commission on World Mission and Evangelisn's Bangkok Conference (1973), with its stress on celebrating salvation rather than seeking agreement on its meaning. The thesis that all peoples were already one in the cosmic Christ, thus denying any frontier between church and world—the frontier biblically crossed in mission—made mission redundant. Accordingly, WCC's emphasis on Dialogue with representatives of other living faiths was intensified. Although prominent evangelical leaders participated in Nairobi's discussions and their contributions were respected, Nairobi is remembered for its earnest call for the visible unity of all Christians, but provided no definition of the factors uniting them. It advanced two separate definitions of evangelism (biblical and existential), but seemed reluctant to grant Scripture the determinative role in defining the mission of God's people in the world. Nairobi divided evangelicals. Some (Peter Beyerhaus) said that the parting of the ways had taken place with the conciliar movement. Others noted Nairobi's use of the covenant that arose from the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelism (1974).
World Council of Churches Assemblies

The many evangelicals who attended the Sixth WCC Assembly at Vancouver (1983) were filled with hope. This had been generated by the release in 1982 of the long-awaited “Mission and Evangelism—An Ecumenical Affirmation.” Evangelical counsel had been widely sought in its preparation, and many expected it would be openly related to the assembly theme “Jesus Christ—the Life of the World.” Strangely, no speaker referred to it. The focus was on the familiar issues of Christian unity, evangelism, and what was described as “world affairs in ecumenical perspective.” WCC pronouncements on the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and on Marxist oppression in Central America were so selective in their indignation that many voices in the religious and secular press were outraged. Was liberation theology still the council's reigning doctrine for church and society? Was the WCC controlled by the political and theological left? Despite these aberrations Vancouver gave evidence of vigorous evangelical currents within its worship and prayer; its biblical expositions, and trinitarian theology. The emphasis on sin as causing social alienation, was accompanied by emphasis on sin as spiritual alienation from God. During the assembly about two hundred evangelicals caucused from time to time and eventually produced a statement encouraging evangelicals worldwide to add their prayers and gifts to the process of working for the renewal of the people of God.

The Seventh WCC Assembly was convened at Canberra (1991) with a prayer as its theme: “Come, Holy Spirit—Renew the Whole Creation.” This was appropriate. Many of the delegates feared that the war in the Persian Gulf would dominate discussion; others feared that the issue of the suffering people in the Middle East would not be adequately addressed. All agreed, however, to expressing the council's concern with a peace march through Canberra followed by a prayer vigil and liturgical celebration. Only then did the assembly feel free to deal with its crowded agenda. Unfortunately, not much time was given to serious discussion of the Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry document (BEM) that had been years in preparation as well as enthusiastically heralded at Vancouver as the greatest achievement of the Faith and Order Commission. Time also prevented reviewing in detail “Mission in Christ's Way,” a document from the San Antonio Conference (1989).

The Gulf war did not dominate the assembly. Rather, the convention was unexpectedly set on fire by the issue of Syncretism, given prominence by Chung Hyun Hyung of Ewha Women's University in Seoul. Reflecting Korean folk culture, she developed an innovative presentation with music, dance, and symbols, invoking the spirits of the dead in such a way as to magnify the spirit world and largely ignore all biblical categories. The presentation drew both a standing ovation and severe condemnation of syncretism and paganism.

Needless to say, Canberra (1991) marked a decisive turning point in the history of the WCC and the ecumenical movement as a whole. In the years that followed, serious concern grew among orthodox churches as to whether further association would be congenial with their theological heritage. The desire of evangelicals to continue to serve began to diminish. Financial considerations forced drastic reduction in budget and staff. Questions were raised as to the future of the WCC. The adoption of the landmark document “Mission and Evangelism: An Ecumenical Affirmation” at the Salvador Conference (1996) demonstrated that mission, unity, and service continue to command WCC attention and response. But uncertainty surrounded prospects for future assemblies.

Artur F. Glasser

World Council of Churches Conferences. The usual starting point in discussions of Conferences that played a critical part in the development of the ecumenical movement is the great Edinburgh World Missionary Conference of 1910, which revealed how closely related were the subjects of the mission and the unity (disunity) of the church. After Edinburgh there developed two principal strands in the ecumenical movement. Life and Work conferences were held at Stockholm (1925) and Oxford (1937), while Faith and Order conferences were held at Lausanne (1927) and Edinburgh (1937). A third strand was that of the International Missionary Council, which was formally constituted in 1921 and held conferences at Jerusalem (1928), Tambaram (1938), Whitby (1947), Willingen (1952), and Accra (1958).

All three streams continued to organize conferences after the founding of the World Council of Churches in 1948, and indeed other ecumenical focuses were added. A major methodology for advancing the concerns of this worldwide body has been the convoking of conferences that have proper representation by region, confession, and status. Prepared for by well-worked-out study programs, these conferences seek to produce consensus documents.

The Faith and Order conferences have searched for unity, though not uniformity, in church life. For example, in 1952 the so-called Lund principle was accepted: the churches would seek to act together on all matters except those on which deep differences of conviction compelled them to act separately. At Louvain (1971), Accra (1974), and Bangalore (1978) the emphasis was not on analyzing past differences, but defining the hope at the center of Christian witness and discipleship. The Lima conference of 1982 addressed the relationship between the historic theologies of East and West and the newer contextual theologies of the south. It also sent to the churches the text Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry to find out how far they could make common affirmations in these areas. On the basis of an emerging consensus the conference also offered to the churches the “Lima liturgy,” a eucharistic service for use by the churches as they wished, especially on ecumenical occasions. More recently Faith and Order conferences have been concerned with the interrelationship between ecclesiology and ethics (an attempt to bring together the old dichotomy between Faith and Order and Life and Work). The conference at Compostela in 1993 focused on koinonia as a gift and calling as a way of advancing unity.

The thrust of the conferences concerned with Inter-church Aid, Development, and Diakonia has been to eschew all forms of paternalism in favor of developing genuine partnerships of mutual respect. Churches have also been encouraged to consider their responsibilities not simply in terms of relief, but increasingly in terms of nurturing and enabling development. The confidence of the 1960s that development was the solution to the economic problems of the Two-Thirds World had become less certain by the 1980s. A conference at El Escorial in Spain in 1987 reinforced the need for the ecumenical sharing of resources, not simply in terms of economic wealth, but of spirituality, faith, and testimony to faithfulness in suffering.

The World Conference on Church and Society convoked in Geneva in 1966 provided the first opportunity for ecumenical leaders representing all the regions of the world to give comprehensive consideration to the social and political context of Christian witness. Because that context was in a state of dynamic flux, the subject of Christian attitudes to the ambiguities of revolution was placed on the ecumenical agenda. Following Geneva, conferences at Bucharest (1974) and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (1979) considered the social significance of advancing scientific knowledge and technological competence, both of which were seen at that time as developments to be welcomed. There were, however, warnings that unequal access to technological power could be an instrument of injustice. Moreover, consumption of unrenewable resources, the pollution of seas and skies, and the creation of the greenhouse effect appeared to put ecology and life itself at risk. Hence the MIT theme “Faith, Science and the Future” in turn led the WCC to its emphasis upon “Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation.” Behind this lies the belief that issues of justice, war and peace, especially in their nuclear dimension, and ecology all belong together. The interrelationship was most fully explored in the world convocation at Seoul in 1990.

JOHN H. Y. BRIGGS

World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF). The first half of the nineteenth century saw a growing desire among evangelical Christians in Europe, North America, and elsewhere for some visible expression of unity within the body of Christ. During the 1840s several consultations were held, primarily in Great Britain, to consider how best to pursue this vision. As a result, in August 1846, eight hundred Christian leaders gathered in London and formed the Evangelical Alliance. The establishment of an organization for the purpose of expressing unity among Christians belonging to different churches was an innovation in church history. Its goal was to be worldwide in scope.

However, the worldwide vision founded over the issue of slavery. England had abolished slavery following the noble work of evangelical statesmen such as William Wilberforce (see Abolition), so its delegates adamantly opposed admitting slaveholders to an evangelical alliance. Most North American delegates agreed. However, the social situation in the United States was such that some southern Christians still held slaves, and a few even tried to justify the practice on biblical grounds. Consequently, no consensus was reached for a worldwide fellowship. This would have to wait for another century. In the meantime evangelical alliances, loosely knit together in fellowship but with no organizational ties, were formed in many countries.
World Evangelical Fellowship

Following World War II a renewed desire for a visible expression of unity among evangelicals led again to a series of consultations both in Europe and in North America. In August 1951, leaders of the Evangelical Alliance of Great Britain and of the newly formed National Association of Evangelicals (U.S.) met with delegates from twenty-one countries near Zeist, Holland. After a week of fellowship, prayer, and careful consideration, they formed the World Evangelical Fellowship. Key leaders were Sir Arthur Smith, Roy Cattell, and A. J. Dain of the United Kingdom, and Harold J. Ockenga and J. Elwin Wright of the United States.

The purposes of the WEF were expressed in three phrases taken from Philippians 1: “fellowship in the gospel” (v. 5), “defense and confirmation of the gospel” (v. 7), and “furtherance of the gospel” (v. 12). The desire was to unite Christians around the world in true fellowship, in defending the gospel against constant attacks, and in mission outreach to those without the gospel. Following the example set since 1846 by the Evangelical Alliance of Great Britain, the WEF emphasized spiritual unity, an annual week of prayer, encouragement and help to Christians suffering persecution, and revival. A doctrinal statement was agreed upon, which has never been altered.

Gilbert Kirby of the United Kingdom, who was general secretary from 1966 to 1970, coined a phrase that expresses well the ministry of the WEF, “Spiritual Unity in Action.” To implement this goal the WEF has formed various commissions composed of men and women from around the world: Theological Commission, Missions Commission, Communications Commission, Commission on Women’s Concerns, Religious Liberty Commission, Youth Commission, Commission on Church Renewal, International Council for Evangelical Theological Education, and International Relief and Development Alliance. The WEF has also taken an active role in leadership training, especially in developing countries. Its Leadership Development Institute has held training sessions throughout the world.

The WEF has two types of membership. Full members are the regional and national evangelical fellowships or alliances from more than 115 countries of the world. They are composed of the local churches, denominations, and evangelical agencies in each country. Associate membership is open to denominations, mission agencies, and parachurch agencies. The WEF is governed by the International Council, which is composed of men and women representing each region of the world and elected by the General Assembly, which is held every four to six years. Delegates to the General Assembly are elected by the full members. The International Council appoints the international director.

From its founding in 1951 all of the international directors (previously called the general secretary or general director) of the WEF were from the United Kingdom, Canada, or the United States; likewise, the international office was located in Europe or the United States. But in 1987 the WEF took a major step by moving the international headquarters to Singapore. This move helped greatly to change the mistaken image that the WEF was a Western organization. In 1992 a further significant step was taken at the General Assembly in Manila, when Augustin (Jun) Vencer of the Philippines was installed as the first non-Western international director.

In its desire for Christian unity the WEF has attempted to work closely with other international evangelical movements. When the International Consultation on World Evangelization was held in Lausanne in 1974, the WEF requested that, in the interests of evangelical unity, no new international body be formed, but that the WEF by made responsible for following up the vision of that conference. Although this request was not granted, the WEF has worked closely with the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization that grew out of the 1974 meeting (see Lausanne Movement). The AD 2000 and Beyond Movement and DAWN (Discipling A Whole Nation) are both associate members of the WEF.

The WEF has set a goal that an evangelical alliance or fellowship be formed in every country of the world and linked with other such bodies through membership in the WEF. This vision, first proposed in 1846 and renewed and expanded in 1951 is stronger today than ever before, as the WEF seeks to help the church reach the world for Jesus Christ.

David M. Howard

Bibliography. H. Fuller, People of the Mandate; D. M. Howard, The Dream That Would Not Die.

World Gospel Mission. Founded in 1919 by the National Association for the Promotion of Holiness (now the National Holiness Association) as the Missionary Bureau of the National Association for the Promotion of Holiness, WGM was developed as an interdenominational organization in the Wesleyan-Armenian tradition. The first field of service was Shantung province in northern China (1910). Today there are over 330 missionaries from more than 20 denominations serving in more than 20 fields, including Kenya (1929), India (1937), Burundi (1939), Bolivia.
World Missionary Conference (Edinburgh, 1910). The World Missionary Conference held in Edinburgh in 1910 was one of those pivotal events whose significance is more clearly seen in its impact on subsequent events. It was a watershed event, building on a long series of missionary antecedents, and it stimulated a confluence of influences that greatly affected Christian expansion and ecumenicity. It was the outgrowth of earlier gatherings through which Protestants had been uniting in their purpose to give the gospel to the world (New York, 1854; Liverpool, 1860; London, 1888; and New York, 1900). Its various movements—pietism, revivalism, volunteerism—came together and were given a fresh impetus.

Edinburgh became the capstone of previous missionary conferences, but also the foundation stone of the modern Protestant ecumenical movement. Here the International Missionary Council (IMC) was born, and the movement which was to give birth to the World Council of Churches was initiated.

The Conference was composed of official representatives of missionary societies and denominations. Not all missionary societies were invited; only those operating among non-Christian peoples. This brought an ecclesiastical comprehensiveness to the Conference. Earlier meetings had been made up of those groups from the Evangelical Awakenings who themselves explicitly as nonreligious or atheistic significant numbers of people began to identify particularly in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, characteristic included a religious dimension. It is a remarkable fact of human history that cultures worldwide have characteristically included a religious dimension. With the emergence of the modern era, particularly in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, significant numbers of people began to identify themselves explicitly as nonreligious or atheistic (see Atheism, Secularization, and Secularism); but even so the vast majority of peoples continue today to adhere to religious traditions of one kind or another. But people in various cultures have not all been religious in the same ways. As far back as recorded history takes us, our world has been characterized by diversity in religious beliefs and practices.

Categorizing Religious Traditions. In order to understand the many diverse ways in which people are religious it is helpful to group together World Religions on the program. Some were named to the Continuation Committee.

Edinburgh 1910 was the training ground for many of the future leaders of the missionary-ecumenical movement. J. R. Mott, Joseph Oldham, Charles Brent, and V. S. Azariah head a long list of outstanding churchmen, theologians, and lay leaders who continued the spirit of Edinburgh. J. R. Mott was made chairman of Edinburgh 1910's Continuation Committee.

Three movements emanated from the work of the Continuation Committee of Edinburgh 1910. First and foremost was the organization of the International Missionary Council (IMC) in 1921, which continued the original purpose of Edinburgh 1910. It sponsored significant missionary conferences in Jerusalem 1928, Madras 1938, Whitby 1947, Willingen 1952, and Ghana 1958, before becoming a department of the WCC in 1961.

The other two movements were the Life and Work Movement (Stockholm 1925) and the Faith and Order Movement (Lausanne 1927). Both held second conferences in 1937. After much discussion, both Conferences approved plans for the formation of a World Council of Churches (WCC), organized in Amsterdam in 1948. The central missionary motif of Edinburgh 1910 is seen today in a myriad of evangelical missions associations and movements, such as the World Evangelical Fellowship, the Lausanne Movement, and the Evangelical Fellowship of Mission Agencies.
World Religions

traditions which have significant characteristics in common. In this way we come to have broad categories of traditions which are linked together under labels such as Hinduism, Buddhism, Islam, Christianity, and so on. It is best to think of each of these not simply as a single homogenous religious tradition but as a broad family of distinctive traditions which nevertheless share certain essential elements. Thus, Hinduism, for example, is not one clearly defined tradition but rather an enormous family of sometimes remarkably different traditions. But in spite of the great variety among Hindu traditions, there are certain commonalities which bind them together, such as recognition of the authority of the Vedas and belief in Reincarnation.

In the modern era, with the beginnings of the disciplines of cultural Anthropology and Comparative Religion, it became common to think in terms of several major religious traditions which were identified as "world religions." It is helpful here to distinguish various kinds of religions. Terry Muck has distinguished among indigenous religions, world religions, and modern religions. Indigenous religions are the religions of the tribes and nations that occupied most lands before the impact of modern nationalism. Native American religious traditions and African Traditional Religions are examples of this category.

World religions are those religions, many of which arose sometime around the fifth century B.C., which emphasize the individual's or group's standing before the gods or the transcendent, and which focus upon attainment of a better set of conditions beyond this present world. World religions are also generally those broad families of traditions which have established themselves through their acceptance by large numbers of people over a long period of time in a variety of geographical areas. Hinduism, Buddhism, Islam, and Christianity thus are clearly world religions. Somewhat more problematic are religions such as Judaism or Shinto, which although clearly meeting some of the above criteria nevertheless are closely linked to a particular people (the Jews and the Japanese respectively) and thus are not widely accepted by different ethnic and cultural groups. Or we might think of world religions as those religions which have spread worldwide through deliberate and aggressive missionary endeavors. On this criterion Christianity, Buddhism, and Islam are clearly world religions but Hinduism, which traditionally has not had an aggressive missionary agenda, might not be. Generally, however, world religions do make at least implicit claims to universal validity, so that Buddhism, for example, does not regard itself as simply one religious perspective among others but holds that in a significant sense it is "privileged" or normative in its understanding of the human predicament and the path to liberation from this predicament.

Finally, there are the modern religions, or those religions which emerged in times of particular social and intellectual upheaval during the past several centuries. Baha’i, Theosophy, Christian Science, the New Age Movement, and the many New Religious Movements are examples of such modern religions. Although many of these movements and traditions are having a significant impact upon people worldwide, they have not yet established themselves in the above sense as genuinely world religions. The one modern religion which is perhaps closest to being recognized as a world religion is Mormonism (see Mormons).

There are other ways in which religions can be classified as well. We might distinguish between those religions which include belief in an eternal sovereign Creator who has created everything else that exists (Judaism, Christianity, and Islam) and those which do not (Buddhism); or between those which base their religious claims upon the authority of a divine revelation (Islam, Christianity) and those which do not (Buddhism). Another useful distinction is that between "high religion" and Folk Religion. High or formal religion refers to the religious beliefs, practices, and institutions of the "orthodox" tradition, the religious elite or intellectuals, the authority figures within the particular religion. Folk religion, by contrast, refers to the set of beliefs, practices, and values of the common people, most of whom have little knowledge of the specialized doctrines and history of their own traditions. On the folk level one often encounters practices and beliefs which are inconsistent with the official teachings of the formal religion, but which have become widely accepted on the popular level. Folk religious practices are often highly syncretistic, combining elements from several distinct religious traditions (see Syncretism).

Finally, mention must be made of the problem of definition in studying religion (see Religion). It has been notoriously difficult to provide a single definition of religion which adequately encompasses all of the relevant phenomena. Sometimes it is difficult to know just what is religious and what is not. Secular Humanism and Marxism, for example, share many features of the world religions although they are explicitly atheistic and claim not to be religious. But belief in God by itself cannot be a criterion for being religious since some major traditions in Buddhism, Hinduism, and Jainism are also atheistic. Nevertheless, secular humanism and Marxism are generally not included among the religions.

The Study of World Religions. Given the intimate relationship between religion and culture, if we are to understand the various peoples and cultures of the world we must have some grasp of major religions such as Hinduism, Buddhism,
Jainism, Islam, Shinto, and Judaism. The student today has unprecedented access to the basic tools for the study of religions. The past century has seen the development of several distinct disciplines—such as the PHENOMENOLOGY OF RELIGION, ANTHROPOLOGY OF RELIGION, COMPARATIVE RELIGION, SOCIOLOGY OF RELIGION, and PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION—which can be very helpful in understanding other religions. Most of the sacred scriptures of the major religions are available in European languages. Most universities have departments which offer programs of study focusing upon one or more of the religions.

It is tempting for Christians studying other religions to concentrate solely upon the doctrines or beliefs of the religions. While this clearly is a significant element, it is by no means the only aspect of religion. A more adequate understanding of the nature of religion and its impact upon culture and individuals is obtained by considering religion as a multidimensional set of phenomena. Ninian Smart, for example, has suggested seven distinct dimensions for understanding religion. First is the ritual dimension, which includes the many rites, ceremonies, and institutions which are used in a carefully prescribed manner by the believers. Religious services, prayers, sacrifices, and baptisms can be examples of this dimension. The experiential dimension refers to that aspect of the religious tradition in which the believer actively participates in the various rites and appropriates for oneself the relationship with the divine or transcendent. The narrative dimension includes the prominent place that sacred stories and narratives play within a tradition. The doctrinal or philosophical dimension involves the attempts by intellectuals within a tradition to clarify, integrate, and systematize central beliefs of that tradition. The ethical dimension addresses the moral values and precepts which are to guide the religious community in its relationship with the transcendent realm, while the social or institutional dimension goes beyond the ethical to include the broader expectations which guide social relationships as well as the structures and institutions for the community. The social or institutional dimension tends to express itself in certain visible forms in the material dimension, as for example, in certain buildings (temples, mosques, churches) works of art, and icons.

A Theology of Religion. The Christian missionary of course should not be content merely with studying and understanding other religions on a phenomenological level. It is essential that one have an adequate THEOLOGY OF RELIGIONS which is shaped by the teachings of Scripture. While elements of truth and value in other traditions can be affirmed, a biblical perspective will also insist that God’s special revelation of himself is not available equally through all religions but is to be found exclusively in the Old and New Testaments. Furthermore, Scripture does not allow for the perspective that the major religions are all equally legitimate alternative paths to God but rather insists that there is only one sovereign God and that all persons are to repent and come into a saving relationship with God through Jesus Christ alone (see RELIGIOUS PLURALISM and UNIQUENESS OF CHRIST). In faithful obedience to their Lord, Christians are to share the gospel of salvation through Christ with devout adherents of other religions.

It is significant that in spite of centuries of missionary effort, with a few notable exceptions, the Christian church has experienced little growth in cultures dominated by Islam, Hinduism, or Buddhism. Peoples shaped by the WORLDVIEWS of these three religions have proven to be remarkable resistant to the gospel. Perhaps part of what is needed in the coming decades is a much more serious engagement with the sophisticated worldviews underlying these religious traditions and more creative ways of expressing the gospel in these very challenging contexts.

Harold A. Netland

SEE ALSO Religious Typologies.

The major difference between the two parliaments was not simply in the number who attended. It was in the number of different religious faiths represented. At the 1993 parliament, Native Americans received the most enthusiastic response of any group at the opening ceremony. They were not invited in 1893. Likewise, the Baha’is were not represented in 1893. Islam had one representative in 1893, Mohammed Webb, a former U.S. ambassador to the Philippines who had been a Presbyterian before he converted to Islam. No Sikhs were at the 1893 parliament. Wiccans were highly visible in 1993, but not in 1893. Two hundred representatives of pagan groups attended. The 1993 gathering showed that religious pluralism is now a major factor of life in the United States, compared to 1893.

Also absent in 1893 were the Anglicans, who disapproved of the parliament because “the World's Parliaments of Religions

Christian religion is the one religion.” However, if this was not an issue for the Anglicans who participated in 1993, it was for a number of evangelical church leaders, theologians, and scholars, who refused parliament invitations to give papers. In 1893, Chicago evangelist Dwight L. Moody strongly protested the parliament, but in 1993 public protests were limited to a number of fringe groups.

The 1993 parliament was not sponsored by any interfaith organization, but was a grassroots movement led by a dozen Chicago Bahai’s, Buddhists, Hindus, and Zoroastrians. They were later joined by influential Roman Catholics and Protestants. The parliament’s purpose was to promote religious understanding and cooperation, and to develop interfaith groups and programs for the twenty-first century. The program was built around sixteen plenary meetings and 750 seminars, led by speakers from all major and minor world religions—125 groups and organizations. However, David Ramage, chair of the parliament, said he was disappointed that both liberal and evangelical Protestants ignored it. The Orthodox came and left, as did the Jews.

No one cultural group can claim to have the correct worldview; rather, each group’s worldview stands on its own. Consequently, we can only speak of particular worldviews such as those of the Amish, Navaho, Sioux, or Maasai societies.

A definition that satisfies both of these approaches is that of Nash (1992): “A worldview, then, is a conceptual scheme by which we consciously or unconsciously place or fit everything we believe in and by which we interpret and judge reality.” Nevertheless, the philosophical/theological and cultural/societal traditions differ substantially in what they include in the concept of worldview and in how they apply it.

Worldview as a Corrective Concept. Those who adopt theological approaches begin with a single, unifying principle which structures the rest of the worldview. Nash (1992) reduces the principle to a single statement: “Human beings and the universe in which they reside are the creation of the God who has revealed himself in [the Christian] Scripture.” Working out a single principle, however, results in a “whole range of systematic theology” (Holmes).

Evangelical theologians generally present the Christian worldview as a systematic theology for the defense of the Christian faith or as an instrument to confront and dismantle opposing worldviews. In so doing they use philosophical and logical argumentation, and their approach is more corrective than interpretive. Those who adopt such an approach regard the contextualization of the gospel as a method for discovering the weaknesses of opposing worldviews and convincing their proponents of the superiority of the Christian faith.

Worldview as an Interpretive Concept. On the other hand, many evangelical Christian missionaries who adopt cultural approaches begin with both the Bible and the language and culture of the people they wish to reach. Because a command of the language is the key to understanding a worldview, they learn the language, how the people use the language to categorize the things they regard as important, and how they use it to interpret their life experiences. Thus their approach is more interpretive than corrective. They regard the contextualization of the gospel as an expression of the Christian faith through culturally appropriate concepts which are compatible with biblical truth. Accordingly, they speak of societal worldviews which have a Christian basis: thus American Christian, Navaho Christian, Maasai Christian or Zulu Christian worldviews. When, however, such Christian societal worldviews express biblical truth with categories which are unusual in comparison to those of the Overview of Worldview. A worldview may be thought of as having four integrated components: words, categories, patterned life experiences (i.e., schemas), and themes. Each of these contributes to the distinctiveness of a worldview and to how that worldview governs people as they live out their lives.

People generally do not think about their worldview; in fact most assume that peoples of other cultures think and reason in much the same way (see Ethnocentrism). However, when they encounter another worldview with different assumptions and values they become aware of worldview differences.

To illustrate how a worldview integrates various concepts, we will consider some aspects of the worldview of the Selepet people of Papua New Guinea, a worldview which is radically different from those of Western societies, but which is typical of Melanesian societies. The Selepet people use the word tosa for a wide range of behavior. If a person steals someone's chicken, she or he acquires a tosa, which may be translated as “sin.” To become free of the tosa requires that she or he give something of equivalent value to the chicken's owner. This item is known as a matnge and serves as restitution. A person may also acquire a tosa by destroying another person's property or physically abusing a person. The offender may remove the tosa with a matnge which serves as compensation. Or the offended party may exact their own matnge by an act of vengeance or by a demand for retributive punishment. To borrow something also incurs a tosa, and the repayment serves as the matnge. Finally, the acceptance of a gift incurs a tosa, which is best translated as “obligation,” because one is obliged to give something of equivalent value to the giver. What unifies all these examples is a dominant Selepet worldview theme that people have to maintain balance and harmony in their interpersonal relationships. Every tosa creates an imbalance which has to be rectified by a matnge.

If Melanesian Christians were to use their concept of sin to evaluate contemporary American culture, they would regard the development of the social security system and individual retirement accounts as fundamentally unchristian remedies for the elderly having to face retirement without family support. Moreover, they would strongly condemn the removal of the elderly from the family to nursing homes.

Many Western theologies emphasize that salvation is attained through repentance and faith (Acts 20:21) and maintained by an ongoing faith (Acts 13:43; Phil. 2:12). In many Melanesian worldviews, however, the concept of repentance is minimized. Rather, the process of salvation is seen to involve the giving of one's allegiance (John 1:12 NEB) which leads to reconciliation (Rom. 5:10; Col. 1:20) and adoption (Eph. 1:5), and is maintained by harmonious relationships (Eph. 4:30; Heb. 12:14). It is important to recognize that the Melanesian concept of sin and salvation can be consistent with biblical truth. Giving their allegiance to God results in their being adopted and entails that they stop doing those things which would harm that relationship. Thus, they repent even though they do not acknowledge it as such.

Worldview and Morality. The categories which a society creates are relevant to questions of morality. For example, Americans buy matches and regard them as personal property. Anyone who takes another person's matches is guilty of petty theft. However, in some technologically primitive societies fire belongs to everyone, just like water and air. So members of those societies may feel free to help themselves to an American's matches. Just because technology has captured fire, placed it on the end of a stick, and made it available for marketing does not remove matches from their category of things which belong to everyone, things not subject to being stolen. Rather, anyone who claims exclusive rights by withholding such a basic human resource as fire is regarded as morally deviant and exhibiting unchristian behavior.

In conclusion, it is important to recognize that the worldviews of different cultural groups need not be regarded as in opposition to a Christian worldview; rather they can become vehicles to express biblical truth just as did the classical Hebrew and Greek worldviews.

Ken A. McElhanon

Worldwide Evangelization Crusade

Worldwide Evangelization Crusade. See WEC International.

Worship. Today as throughout history, worship and mission are linked inextricably together; for God propels his mission through the drawing of worshipers to himself. God's call to worship him empowers us to respond with his passion to do mission. Thus, worship ignites mission; it is God's divine call-and-response strategy.

Indeed, the Scriptures resound with his global call to worship via mission. The prophet Isaiah, for example, responding in the midst of worship, takes up the call to go (Isa. 6:1–8). Likewise, the Samaritan woman encounters Jesus Christ, the incarnate God. He discloses that the Father is seeking authentic worshipers, people in relationship with him. The woman responds by immediately calling others to come see the man who told her everything she had done (John 4:26). Finally, the greatest call-and-response pattern surfaces when the disciples meet with the resurrected Jesus just before his ascension (Matt. 28:16ff.). Finally recognizing Jesus' true identity, they fall down and worship him. In the context of worship, Jesus gives his crowning imperative, the Great Commission (Matt. 28:17–20). The missionary mandate flows out of an intimate relationship with God generated in worship. God's propelling call to go into all the world becomes our response of commitment and allegiance to him. We join him in his passion to call worshipers to himself.

Wherever we have seen meaningful, authentic worship, the church has experienced a new missions thrust. Yet, a radical separation of worship from mission has dominated mission methodologies. Donald MacGavran once claimed, "Worship...is good; but worship is worship. It is not evangelism" (1965, 455). The typical practice has been to call people to a saving faith in Jesus Christ with worship being a resultant by-product. While ignoring God's primary call to worship, missiologists have, however, recognized the need for relevant Christian worship to nurture a Christian movement. Thus, the model of "evangelism-before-worship" has dominated evangelical mission strategies.

Yet God's call to worship him is currently sweeping around the world in great, new revolutionary ways. Along with new openness to new forms and patterns of worship, there is greater recognition of the intimate relationship between worship and mission. Such winds of worship empowering mission have been building over the past few decades in relation to renewal movements. In 1939, for example, the Methodist Episcopal Church published a small manual, A Book of Worship for Village Churches, for the "great army of Christian pastors, teachers, and laymen who are leading the toiling villagers of India through worship to the feet of Christ" (Ziegler, 1939, 7). The manual resulted from a desire to see the church in India take root in its own soil in tandem with the vast treasures of two thousand years of Christian heritage. Research revealed that where dynamic worship was practiced, changed lives and growing churches resulted. On the other hand, weak, stagnant and ineffective churches existed where worship of God in Christ was neglected (ibid., 5).

More recently, as renewal movements grow in their experience with God, God calls them into mission. The common strategic link of each of these groups is their focus on worship with evangelism as the inclusive by-product: the "worship-propels-mission" model. French Benedictine monks, for example, have entered Senegal with the goal of creating a model of contextualized worship drawn from cultural musical traditions. They have adapted African drums and the twenty-one-string Kora harp to attract Muslims to Christ. Likewise, the Taizé Movement from France is growing through the development of contemplative, worship forms. Facilitated by the burgeoning impact of electronic media and new musical forms worldwide, the growth of a Worship and Praise Movement, originating from such streams as the Jesus People Movement through Marantha! Music and the Vineyard Movement, is forging an openness to new, global worship forms.

Among the most exciting developments are the new mission forces from Asia, Africa, and Latin America. Their distinctive approaches commonly revolve around worship. In Kenya, one of the most dynamic examples of church growth is found at the Nairobi Chapel. The Chapel basing much of its strategy on the development of meaningful worship (especially music) for effectively communicating the gospel to a predominantly university-student based church (Long). The vision does not stop with Kenya; they are reaching out to neighboring Tanzania. In West Africa, Senufo Christians of Cote d'Ivoire are reaching out to their neighbors through their distinctive worship form—song, dance, and drama (King). Christian Inca Indians from Peru are reaching out to Native Americans of North America. Through their deeper understanding of more culturally relevant worship forms, Inca Christians are preaching through the use of Indian storytelling styles. Asians are going to other Asians; Koreans to the Philippines and American Filipinos to Japan. In one case, Taiwans' Hosanna Ministries partnered with the Korean Tyrannus Team in initiating a series of Worship and Praise activities in 1989. This partnership brought forth a movement of renewal in Taiwan where unbelievers came to Christ and believers dedicated themselves to missions (Wong). They discovered "an intimate reladitionship between worship and mission” (1993, 3).
Worship propelled both evangelism and commitment to do more mission.

With the growing surge of worship empowering mission, we must keep five factors in mind in order to achieve a lasting impact for the kingdom. First, worship must remain worship: we must, above all, seek encounter with God. Worship services should not serve as functional substitutes for evangelism. Rather, we must seek authenticity of interaction with God and developing relationship with him. Genuine worship of the Creator will attract and confront those who long to enter into the kingdom. Likewise, evangelistic programs must pursue evangelism. The two, worship and mission, must remain distinct, yet work hand-in-hand.

Second, we must allow God to transform and make anew his original creation. Contextualization of the gospel is not an option, but an imperative. Throughout the Scriptures and history, we see people worshipping God in ways that were formerly heathen but then transformed with radically new meaning. Service order, length, language, symbolism, prayer forms, songs, dance, bowing, speeches, Scripture reading, and artifacts must be captured to nurture believers and bring the peoples of the world into relationship with the living God.

Third, we are to pursue diversity within the unity of the body of Christ (Eph. 2; 1 Cor. 12): “Diversity (of worship forms) seems to coincide with the periods of effective mission efforts” (Muench, 1981, 104). Foundational mission goals must seek to make Christ understood and known within their own context. The Celtic church, for example, known as a strong mission church, encouraged each tribal group to develop its own worship service pattern. Likewise, worship patterns and forms must vary according to the cultural contexts—including multicultural settings. In order to know God intimately, peoples from differing contexts require the freedom to interact with him through relevant worship forms.

Fourth, there is a great need for research toward developing appropriate worship. We must allow dynamic worship to grow and change as relationship with God deepens. Worship forms are shaped by and reflect our relationship with God via appropriate, expressive cultural forms. There is great need for openness in pursuing, experimenting, exchanging, and documenting experiences in worship. Needed topics of research should include biblical models of worship that seek precedents for adapting cultural forms, comparative philosophical thought forms, historical models of worship from the Christian movement, uses and meaning of ritual (anthropology), verbal and non-verbal symbols (communication), and comparative cultural worship patterns.

Finally, we must train for worship and worship leading. In keeping with “spirit and truth” worship (John 4:23), missionaries must first of all be worshipers of the living God. Then they are empowered to take up God’s passionate call to bring all peoples to worship him. Besides studying the nature of worship and the numerous patterns and forms that worship can embody, we must train people to lead worship and stimulate meaningful worship cross-culturally. Training for worship must become a major component in the formation of missionaries.

Authentic Christian worship brings people to encounter Jesus Christ. As one looks to God, God reveals his vision to us. We respond to his call. Thus, worship propels and empowers mission. Ultimately, God calls us to participate in achieving God’s vision as enunciated by the Psalmist: “All the nations you have made will come and worship before you, O Lord; they will bring glory to your name” (Ps. 86:9).

ROBERTA R. KING

Wrath of God. The word “wrath” occurs in over two hundred places in the Bible and the concept is implied in many more. The overwhelming majority of these refer the attitude, activity, or response of God to human sin. Wrath is the continuing reaction of the holy, pure, sovereign, personal God to anything which offends his moral nature and kingly rights. This includes rejection by the offender of his person, rule, will, and affronts to his holy being, whether it be conscious and direct or subconscious and indirect.

In Scripture God’s wrath may be the threat of coming punishment and doom or of present or future judgment. In the absolute sense it is a synonym for eternal separation from God and punishment in HELL. Divine wrath may be directed toward a group or an individual. Those who do not acknowledge God, the HEATHEN, are under the wrath of God and will feel its full fury. God’s people who turn away from him or refuse to live according to his will and law are also objects of his wrath. This is the primary way the term is used of Israel in the Old Testament. In the case of God’s people there is the call to repent so that wrath may be averted and restitution offered.
Wrath of God

when the time of punishment is completed. The Old Testament also stresses that God is "merciful and gracious, slow to anger and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness" (Ps. 86:15; 103:8; 145:8).

The precise phrase "wrath of God" appears only in the New Testament. Because the righteous visitation of wrath is a prerogative of divine sovereignty, God's people are not to avenge themselves (Rom. 12:19). Other references to the "wrath of God" fall into a number of categories. (1) It is the lot of those who reject Jesus Christ and refuse to obey God's will revealed in him. In John 3:36 the wrath of God is the opposite of having eternal life through believing in the Son and rests on those who do not obey the Son. Paul says wrath is being revealed against "all ungodliness and wickedness of men who . . . suppress the truth" (Rom. 1:18). He also insists that it comes "upon the sons of disobedience" who live immoral, frivolous, materialistic, idolatrous, ungodly lives (Eph. 5:6; Col. 3:6). (2) It is from wrath that we are saved in Christ. As Paul affirms, we are "justified by his blood, saved by him from the wrath of God" (Rom. 5:9). (3) The outpouring of the wrath of God is a central focus of the visions of judgment in Revelation (14:9; 15:1; 16:1; 19:15) and people seek refuge from it (6:16).

The Greek word hilastērion, translated "propitiation" in such passages as Romans 3:25 in the KJV and NASB, has a direct relation to "wrath." It refers to the sacrifice offered to appease the wrath of an offended deity. Either because propitiation is a word unfamiliar to moderns or because of a desire to dissociate the Judeo-Christian God with the vengeful, often irrational wrath of deities in pagan religions, most twentieth-century translations use some other rendering, such as "expiation" or "sacrifice of atonement." God is certainly not a vengeful, capricious being but wrath is his proper, just response to sin. However hilastērion and related terms are handled, one must not lose sight of the fact that Paul asserts that through the blood of Jesus God's wrath (note the occurrence of the term in the preceding context; Rom. 1:18; 2:5; 8: 3:5) is real but turned aside by God's grace received by faith.

The fact of God's wrath has often been a motivation for evangelism and mission. The threat of and warning against it is a frequent, legitimate part of the Christian message aimed at winning converts. It is also one of the appropriate stimuli for Christian behavior. It is, however, dangerous to sensationalize, dramatize, or overly emphasize wrath for it is only a part of God's nature. The prophet Habakkuk sought a balance when he cried, "In wrath remember mercy" (3:2).

Jonathan Edwards' sermon, "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God," is sometimes cited as an example of extreme scare tactics. Edwards' concern was to show that although sinners do stand in danger of God's wrath, they are in the hands of one who is also compassionate, merciful, and loving to the repentant.

The heart of the Christian message is that God, against whom sin has been committed, rightly responds in wrath. His justice demands proper punishment for wrongdoers. However, God in love, mercy, and grace has, in Christ, acted to both satisfy his justice (Rom. 3:26) and to make forgiveness and salvation available in Christ. This is the balanced and correct impetus and message of the missionary enterprise.

J. Julius Scott, Jr.

See also Annihilation and Judgment.

Wycliffe Bible Translators, International. Founded in 1934 by L. L. Legters and William Cameron Townsend, Wycliffe Bible Translators (WBT) is a multinational organization dedicated to enabling all of the world's people to discover that God speaks their language. The founders envisioned making God's Word available through vernacular translations. WBT teams from over twenty nations have provided Scripture in over twelve hundred languages in seventy different nations.

Maintaining the founder's vision in the face of present-day sociopolitical and economic constraints has required new directions and strategies. Of central focus is the shift from serving as primary, pioneer translators to training national translators and consulting. Accordingly, the term "international" has been added to the organization's name (WBTI). Nationals trained in translation principles can build on their own linguistic and cultural heritage. Working in combination with consultants who have expertise in the source text enables them to provide Scripture for their own people. In partnership with missions, churches, and national entities, WBTI is continuing to adjust its training programs at all levels to meet field needs and to expand literacy and community-development projects. This has resulted in establishing national Bible translation organizations as well as mobilizing national churches to support and encourage translators. Once available, translations are used for evangelism and church growth.

To bring God's Word into the more than two thousand minority languages still in need of Scripture, Wycliffe, in conjunction with the Summer Institute of Linguistics (SIL), presently maintains training programs around the world. In cooperation with the Bible societies, missions and churches, increasing numbers of Wycliffe personnel are being assigned to work primarily in the areas of training and consultation. They assist missions and other translation organizations by providing a wealth of resources such as the Ethnologue (detailed linguistic, sociocultural, and spiritual data on each of the recorded languages of the world), The Translator’s Workplace (a CD-ROM containing various translation materials and aids—journal articles, the biblical texts in Hebrew and Greek, and translations in twenty primary languages), Lingua Links (a computer database for anthropological, linguistic, and literacy research), and a plethora of technical, semitechnical, and popular books and articles. The development of aids for national translators is an increasing priority, as is partnership with colleges and seminaries that can help consultants to gain expertise in the source languages and biblical background. So while the founders’ vision remains, the methods and means of realizing that vision have changed dramatically. WBTI continues to seek creative partnerships within the framework of their mission statement—communicating God’s Word in “other words.”

R. DANIEL SHAW

Bibliography. W. C. Townsend and R. S. Pittman, Remember All the Way.

Wynfrith of Crediton. See Boniface.
Xavier, Francis (1506–52). Spanish pioneer missionary in India and Japan. Born in a noble family of northern Spain, Xavier studied philosophy and theology in Paris, where he came under the influence of Ignatius Loyola and became a co-founder of the Society of Jesus in 1534. As the Society was approved by Pope Paul III in 1540, Xavier, a papal nuncio in the East and protected by the Portuguese king, embarked for Goa, India. His work in the Portuguese Indies (1542–49) resulted in establishing the mission apparatus and baptizing the natives up to an estimated 30,000 in Southern India. Through an encounter with a Japanese called Anjiro in Malacca, he fostered a vision for Japan and landed there in 1549. Two years of activity among "the best people yet discovered" marked a decisive entry of Christianity and counted 2,000 Christians. After returning briefly to India, he tried to enter China but died of fever on Sancian Island, off the Chinese coast.

Xavier pioneered modern missionary methods by advocating the study of the indigenous religions, customs, and languages, the use of educated national collaborators, and continuing pastoral care.

TADAOKA MARUYAMA

Xavier, Jerome (1549–1617). Spanish Catholic missionary to India. Born in Spain, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1568, and at that time adopted the name of his famous great-uncle, Francis Xavier. He arrived in India in 1581, serving first as rector of the college at Bassein and from 1586 at the college of Cochin.

Although initially Muslim, the Mogul emperor Akbar became disillusioned with Islam and adopted a tolerant and syncretistic approach to religions. He invited Jesuit missionaries to his court and gave some encouragement to the Christian faith. In 1594 Xavier was chosen to lead the third Jesuit mission to the Mogul court, arriving in Lahore in 1595. Xavier was to remain there almost continuously until 1615, at which time he returned to Goa, where he was given charge of the college of St. Paul. He died in 1617 in a tragic fire at the college.

Xavier's missiological approach was characterized by: (1) a careful study of the Persian language as well as the major religions of the empire, Islam and Hinduism; (2) sensitive adaptation to local religious and cultural distinctives; (3) an attempt to produce Christian literature in Persian; (4) extensive use of the liturgical ceremonies of the church to communicate Christian themes; and (5) use of rational argumentation for the truth of Christianity in dispute with Muslims. Xavier thus falls within the tradition of missionary apologists of the late Middle Ages. His most significant work is the Fuente de Vida [Fount of Life], an apologetic work comparing the gospel of Jesus Christ with Islam and Hinduism.

HAROLD A. NETLAND

Yannoulatos, Anastasios (1929– ). Greek Orthodox missiologist and missions promoter. Born in Piraeus, Greece, as a young man he joined a spiritual renewal movement of the Church of Greece. In the late 1950s, he and several young theologians called for Orthodox churches worldwide to rediscover their great missionary tradition. In 1960, he founded the inter-Orthodox mission center “Poreftenthes.”

Following a bout with malaria, Yannoulatos was advised to abandon his desire to become an overseas missionary. Instead he pursued studies in missiology and world religions. In 1972, the University of Athens elected him professor of the history of religions. He established a center for missionary studies, which led to an eventual chair of missiology in 1976. His written work includes nine scholarly books, five catechetical books, over sixty treatises (fifty in foreign languages), and more than eighty articles.

Within ecumenical circles, Yannoulatos became the first Orthodox missiologist to serve as moderator of CWME from 1984 to 1991. From 1980 to 1991, Yannoulatos served as archbishop of East Africa, founding and running the only Orthodox seminary in Africa. In 1991, he was elected archbishop of Albania with the task of rebuilding a church devastated by atheistic rule.

Yemen (Est. 2000 pop.: 17,051,000; 527,968 sq. km [203,848 sq. mi.]). Early in Christian history, Nestorian missionaries evangelized North Yemen. A flourishing church suffered under Muslim rule. Home to no indigenous Christian community after the Arab conquest of the seventh century, Aden came under British control in 1839. Opening of the Suez Canal in 1869 highlighted the strategic importance of the area. Anglican chaplains began to serve the British community, followed by other Protestants. Perhaps the most important North American missionary to Muslims in this century, Samuel Zwemer (1867–1952), of the Dutch Reformed Church in the United States, and his wife Amy Wilkes visited Aden in 1890 under auspices of the Arabian Mission. As for the Catholic Church, a Servite priest visited in 1841. This led to creation of the prefecture of Aden in 1854. From 1889 until 1974, a vicariate covering all of the Arabian Peninsula was headquartered there.

Over the past century, the area’s strategic setting has attracted large numbers of Christian immigrants to North and South Yemen, notably Indian Mar Thomist Christians and, more recently, Palestinian Christians. Eastern rite Catholics (Maronites, Melkites, Chaldeans, and others) compose the largest single Christian community, followed by various Orthodox bodies and non-Chalcedonian Christians. At the time of writing, exact figures of their strength are unavailable; Christians number only a tiny percentage of Yemen’s 17 million people.

Civil war during the 1960s, followed by creation of a Marxist state in South Yemen, led to expulsion of all missionaries. Christians exercise influence through educational and medical work, or by Christian broadcasts in Arabic heard over international stations.

Yoga. A word derived from the Sanskrit yuj (“to control, to yoke”) and cognate with the English word “yoke,” yoga denotes a religious discipline or disciplines. By restraining one’s mind and senses and focusing on a single point within, consciousness can be transformed, impurities such as greed or hate eradicated, and liberation of the soul attained. Adepts are called yogis, and their powers of concentration seem to give them the ability to defy the laws of nature and to cast spells. Yoga is in fact a very ancient tradition found in Hinduism, Jainism, and Buddhism, thus clearly antedating the evolution of separate world faiths. Iconographic evidence suggests a possible origin in the Indus Valley civilization of 2500–1500 B.C.
Yoga

By the time of its classical formulation in the Yogasutras of Patanjali (who may be the Sanskrit grammarian of that name), yoga was evolving into one of the six orthodox schools of Hindu philosophical thought. Patanjali, who has been variously placed anywhere from the second century B.C. to the fifth century A.D., describes yoga as the cessation of mental fluctuation, a state of mind to be achieved not only by meditation, but also by a strictly moral life, control of one’s bodily appetites, and posture. In his system, popularly known as Raja Yoga ("the best" or "royal" yoga), the pupil is taught to distinguish between ordinary awareness (Citta) and consciousness (Purusha) so that the latter, the essential self, can be released. The practical implications become clear when one reads the Bhagavad Gita ("The Song of the Lord"), where through Krishna’s teaching him yoga Arjuna is enabled to resolve his ethical dilemma of pursuing his dharma ("religious duty") at the cost of his cousins’ lives. It is Shiva, however, who is depicted as a yogi and emulated as such by devotees. The Bhagavad Gita in Sanskrit and in translation is enormously popular with all classes of Hindus, since they find in it a practical spirituality for everyday life. Yoga can also be assimilated to the Vedantic concept of a totally abstract divine principle to be sought through meditation.

In the Middle Ages more esoteric forms such as Hatha Yoga and Laya Yoga were developed. In the former the objective is to release kundalini ("the coiled one") believed to be a serpent sleeping at the base of the spine. This special force, which then rises through the cakras (mystical energy points in the body) to the brain, is sometimes identified with the goddess (devi) of Sakti Hinduism, who is said to seek her lord Shiva thus. Laya ("dissolution") techniques aim at the obliteration of individual awareness and personality prior to samadhi, the blissful absorption into the divine that all yogis seek.

Since the 1960s, yoga has been immensely popular in the West. This is not surprising because in India it has always been a layperson’s self-help spirituality, though a teacher is advisable. Yoga is seen as beneficial to one’s health, alleviating not just stress and angst, but heart conditions and hypertension as well, though the secularized Western version is of limited efficacy. Spiritual teachers from Asia have created organizations to propagate their particular disciplines, while some Christian theologians such as P. Chenchiah (1886–1959), a Madras lawyer, advocate a “Christian yoga” as a means of spiritual growth and authentic expression of Asian Christianity. For others, yoga is so closely identified with Hindu, Buddhist, or Jain assumptions that utilizing its techniques is inherently problematic.

ELEONOR M. JACKSON

Young, Florence S. H. (1856–1940). New Zealand missionary to China and the Solomon Islands. Young was born in Motueka, in the Nelson province of the British Colony of New Zealand on October 10, 1856, the daughter of a former judge in the Bombay Presidency of the East India Company with aristocratic connections in England.

In 1882 she began a Bible class for Kanaks (indentured laborers from the Solomon Islands) working on the plantation. Out of this grew the Queensland Kanaka Mission. In 1890 she heard Hudson Taylor speak in Sydney and volunteered to work with China Inland Mission, serving in China for two terms. Meanwhile the Kanak Mission grew until it had eleven stations in Australia and nineteen European missionaries and one hundred indigenous teachers. In 1904 the Australian government introduced the White Australian policy which forced the Kanaks home, and so a branch of the mission was begun in the Solomons, and Young was asked to superintend the work. She established contacts with key converts of the previous era who had already begun Christian work in the islands. Annual trips to the Solomons enabled her to support an extensive indigenous work. A person of intense enthusiasm and spiritual conviction, she ran the mission firmly as Superintendent and Treasurer, working closely with her nephew-in-law, Northcote Deck. She died on May 28, 1940, directing the mission to the end. Out of it grew the South Seas Evangelical Church which has profoundly shaped the culture of Melanesia.

PETER LINEHAM

Yugoslavia (Est. 2000 pop.: 10,696,000; 102,173 sq. km. [39,449 sq. mi.]). The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia is a Balkan country in southeastern Europe stretching from the Adriatic Sea to the Danube River. It is comprised of the federal republics of Serbia and Montenegro. Sixty-two percent of the population is Serb, 17 percent Albanian, 4 percent Hungarian, and 4 percent Montenegrin. Nearly 70 percent of the population consider themselves Christians, with Orthodox Christians making up the largest percentage (63.7%). Muslims account for over 16 percent of the population, most of these being Albanians. Evangelicals have nearly tripled since 1970 (66,000 to 182,000). The largest of these are the Slovak Evangelical Christian Church, the Reformed Christian Church, and the Gypsy Evangelical Movement. Evangelical outreach has intensified since the collapse of communism. Of special concern to evangelicals is the Serbian province of Kosovo, which (prior to the events of 1999 was) 90 percent Albanian with a very small Christian presence. The flaring of ethnic tensions, resulting NATO campaign, and population displacements ensured that this will be a sensitive and needy region for the foreseeable future.

TODD M. JOHNSON

Yun, Chi-ho (1865–1945). Korean Christian educator and church leader. Yun Chi-Ho was the first convert of the Southern Methodist Missions’ ministry in Korea and the first theological student from Korea studying in the United States. He spent two years (1881–83) in Japan studying theology and English, and returned to Korea as the interpreter of the American envoy to Korea, L. H. Foote. During the political upheaval in 1884, Hun Chi-Ho left Korea for China and spent the next three and a half years in Shanghai, where he studied theology at the China-West Institute which was run by the Southern Methodist Missions in the United States. In 1887 he received baptism and became the first Korean Methodist member.

After studies at Vanderbilt and Emory Universities he returned to Shanghai in 1893 to teach English literature at the China-West Institute. While there, he held a number of important government and social positions.

He was a renowned Christian educator. In 1906 he became the founder and principal of the Korean American Study Institute in Kaesong. After three years in prison for his opposition to Japanese colonialism in 1911, he continued to be principal of the Institute under the new name of Songdo High School. He became the director of Korean Sunday School Association in 1908, worked as General Secretary of the Korean YMCA (1916–20) and president of Yonhui Technical School (1941–42). He is well remembered as a distinguished Christian educator and a strong promoter of the Korean Methodist Church.

Bibliography. A. D. Clark, A History of the Church in Korea.
Zaire. See Democratic Republic of Congo.

Zambia. (Est. 2000 pop.: 10,754,000; 752,618 sq. km. [290,586 sq. mi.]). The history of Protestant missions in Zambia began with the arrival of David Livingstone in 1851. Frederick Arnot, who had been a playmate of Livingstone’s children, attempted work in Barotseland but after eighteen months of frustration moved on to Angola, where he is credited with beginning the Brethren’s great mission endeavor in that country.

Frances Coillard of the Paris Missionary Society who had been motivated by Robert Moffat led the first successful mission work in Zambia. In 1883, along with some Basotho evangelists, he built the first permanent missionary effort in northern Rhodesia. Within a twenty-year period the London Missionary Society, the Primitive Methodists, Plymouth Brethren (Arnot returned to greater success among the Lunda people), and Dutch Reformed Church Mission for the Orange Free State established works in various parts of the country.

One does not have to read between the lines to note the underlying assumption of European superiority. Robert I. Rotberg is one of many historians to reference several recorded instances which he is quick to conclude did not substantively slow the spread of mission work. It is not surprising to find the primary method of evangelism was to improve the lot of the “native” population through schools, hospitals, and clinics. By 1924 the Missionary Conference of northern Rhodesia reported less than 18,000 baptisms in a population of 1.5 million.

By the mid-1960s, however, many of the missions had begun to train and encourage national involvement in evangelistic activities, if not in organizational leadership. Nevertheless many of the country’s national leaders, though educated in mission schools, left the mainline churches for the popular, African-run, separatist churches. The prominence of the church was not to be reestablished until the election of Fredrick Chiluba as president of October 1991. Though filled with intrigue, Chiluba’s term has seen the rise of evangelistic activity. Declaring Zambia to be a Christian nation he stated in a 1995 Christianity Today article, “Where the Lord is there is unity. We are beginning to see order in our country.”

Today there is a growing cooperation between missionary societies and churches as the church in Zambia goes through this time of transition. While the African Initiated Church Movement continues to grow at the rate of 50 churches per year, the evangelical mission initiated churches now are adding some 350 churches annually. Unfortunately, even at this rate the church member-to-population ratio will decline from 24 percent to 22 percent by the year 2000.

Zambian Christians are faced with the challenge of AIDS (Zambia is one of the hardest hit by this epidemic) on the one hand and Islam on the other. Whether the push to get a Bible into the hands of every Zambian by President Chiluba will prove a turning point in either of these challenges will depend on the energy of the existing churches and their willingness to work together.

Sherman S. Pemberton

Zamora, Nicolas (1875–1914). First Philippine ordained Protestant minister. Nicolas Zamora, one of three sons of Paulino Zamora, an outspoken critic of Spanish clerics, followed the family pattern of independence from Spanish and missionary domination. Nicolas followed the lead of his great uncle, Father Jacinto Zamora, who was executed in 1872 after being accused, probably falsely, of complicity in the Cavite Revolt.

Nicolas, the first Filipino ordained Protestant minister, led the division from the Evangelical Methodist Church in 1909 that resulted in the La Iglesia Evangelica Methodista en las Islas Filipinas (IEMELIP). A leading nationalist and critic of Western missionaries, he sought self-identity and independence for Filipino ministers. He resisted the paternalism of the missionaries and their failure to acknowledge Filipino capabilities.

Following the heels of the Aurora schism, Zamora's revolt became the most traumatic and influential of the Methodist encounters in the early 1900s. His movement exerted considerable influence, not only in the Methodist but in the Presbyterian churches as well.

Zamora was resisted and criticized by missionaries, who cited his ambition and supposed financial indiscretions. In spite of the missionary resistance, Zamora's life and teachings significantly influenced the independent efforts of Filipino churches.

Ziaenana Bible and Medical Missions. See INTERSERVE.

Ziegenbalg, Bartholomaeus

The idea of sudden awakening was first developed by Seng-chao (384–414) and Tao-sheng (360–434). However, it was Bodhidharma, a missionary from India, who emphasized the discipline of meditation as opposed to discourse on Buddhist scriptures. He did not meet with great success. It was Hui-neng (638–713), the Sixth patriarch, who brought Zen to prominence in China, and the 7th and 8th Century was the Golden Age. The flowering of Zen in Japan was brought about by the great Zen Master Dogen (1200–1253). It was he who made zazen (meditation with the right posture, sitting upright with legs crossed) the key to enlightenment.

Zen Buddhists believe that enlightenment does not depend on words and letters (scriptures). It comes when an insight points directly at a person's own nature. The deepest truth lies in the principle of identity. All dharmas have no reality of their own. All find their true nature in their unity and identity with the Absolute, which is Buddha. All differentiations have therefore to be recognized as illusion due to ignorance. All categories associated with differentiation are empty. Thus logic and knowledge built on differentiation and categories are all futile. The distinctions between the self and the world, subject and object are all misconceptions. All these must be transcended. Thus Zen is the art of attaining the wisdom of unknowing.

To achieve this, one has to practice contemplation in such a way as to expose the futility of concepts and thoughts, until one's mind becomes a clear mirror reflecting nothing but the Absolute. At that moment, not only are objects "melted" into the Void, even one's personal consciousness loses its own identity as it unifies with the Absolute Mind. The rejection of concepts is total, even the concept of nirvana or the concept of Buddha.

To facilitate illumination, a student of Zen is often confronted with riddles and paradoxical questions (koans), until all preconceptions or understandings are cleared, and he or she is able to concentrate on the really real. By a sudden intuitive grasp, enlightenment can be achieved. In Japan, zazen was taught by Dogen as absolutely essential to the attainment of illumination. In zazen, one thinks of nonthinking, liberating oneself from all attachment to what seems to have differentiated identities. Then the world would reveal itself as the infinite world of Buddha, including one's self.

Zenana Bible and Medical Missions. See INTERSERVE.
Ziegenbalg, Bartholomaeus

deacon by the secretary of the Copenhagen Missionary Society, Ziegenbalg was dependent upon support from churches and friends. Having married during his European furlough (1714–16), he became the father of two sons and died in 1719 in Tranquebar.

ROLF HILLE

Zimbabwe. (Est. 2000 pop.: 12,514,000; 390,759 sq. km. [150,872 sq. mi.]). Before the occupation of the country that was to become Zimbabwe by the British South Africa Company (BSAC) in 1890, missionaries of various Christian denominations had been active in the area. Jesuits had come to Mashonaland through Mozambique in the sixteenth century. African and mixed race evangelists from South Africa had come independently to Mashonaland in the mid-nineteenth century, and both the London Missionary Society (1859) and Jesuit missionaries (1879) initiated evangelistic work in Matabeleland.

With the BSAC occupation, Roman Catholic, Church of England, and Wesleyan Methodist missionaries established churches and schools throughout southern Rhodesia during Company rule (1890–1923) and colonial (1923–65) rule. Other Christian missions groups concentrated their efforts in particular regions of the country: the London Missionary Society in Matabeleland, Dutch Reformed Church missionaries in the southeast, and American Methodist missionaries in Manicaland in the northeast. Beyond these main missionary bodies there was an increasing proliferation of groups undertaking Christian mission work throughout the remainder of the twentieth century.

Most agencies used development institutions as their primary strategy. Both the Colonial and Smith governments were at first eager and later willing to delegate educational and health responsibilities for rural areas to mission agencies. They often allocated per capita funding to those willing to build and maintain schools and medical facilities as long as they followed government curriculum and regulations. By 1973 most mission agencies had abandoned this practice in place of nationalization. Many of the mission schools and hospitals remain, though now under national leadership.

Christian missions worked in partnership (though at times an uneasy one) with the white settler government during colonial times. The settler government’s Unilateral Declaration of Independence in 1965 to avoid movement toward African political rights, and the subsequent campaign and war for independence fought by African nationalist groups, forced missionaries to reconsider their role in the country and how they were carrying out mission. The war years of the 1970s were also lean years for the churches. Many missionaries left for other fields or went home, leaving the national leadership to pick up the slack, which they did admirably.

National evangelistic crusades such as the New Life For All Campaign helped create a sense of unity among the churches and add over two thousand congregations in those difficult years. Independence was expected to bring mission work to a halt due to the Marxist orientation of Prime Minister Mugabe. However, the churches saw the almost unprecedented government requirement that all children receive religious education along with the Marxist indoctrination as a challenge. Teachers were raised up from all denominations to teach the religious studies classes. An interdenominational council designed the first curriculum. The unity fostered during the war years carried into the next decade. Over twenty three seminaries and countless Christian printing shops have sprung up to continue the focus on leadership training and discipleship. According to the World Churches Handbook the Trinitarian churches (excluding Roman Catholic and indigenous churches) grew by over three thousand congregations in the decade following independence and are expected to double that growth by the year 2000.

Christian churches in Zimbabwe today, directed primarily by national leaders, exhibit considerable strength in numbers of congregations and members, as well as in sociocultural and educational influence. While the need for missionaries is reduced some of the major agencies are supporting national leadership in targeting neighboring people groups not yet churched. One example of this is the partnership of Central Africa Mission with the Christian Churches/Churches of Christ targeting the Shangaan in south central Mozambique.

SHERMAN S. PEMBERTON

Zinzendorf, Nikolaus Ludwig von (1700–1760). German father of Moravian missions. Nikolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf was a German Lutheran nobleman who, strongly influenced by the Pietistic movement, became the father of the eighteenth-century Moravian missionary movement. When he permitted a group of refugees from Moravia to settle on his estate in Saxony in 1722, he had no inkling that from them the gospel would spread to Greenland, the West Indies, North America, Central America, and Africa.

The movement began with a unique outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Herrnhut in 1727.
Zinzendorf's own missionary passion and vision melded with that of the Moravians. From initial benefactor he became the visionary, practical helper through his court connections, traveling missionary, and the second bishop of the Moravian church. All the while he maintained the intense personal piety and enthusiasm that grew out of his childhood faith. He was determined to cling to the doctrine of redemption by the blood of Christ, and to lay the atonement as the foundation of all other truth. His devotion flamed into missionary passion when he met a West Indian Christian servant, Anthony Ulrich, at the Danish court. His pleas for help ultimately were heard by the Moravians. Under Zinzendorf's leadership, they sent out their first missionaries in 1732.

Bibliography. J. R. Weinlick, Count Zinzendorf; J. R. Weinlick and A. Frank, The Moravian Church Through the Ages.

Zionism. A hill within Jerusalem, the ancient capital of Israel, Zion came to represent the temple, all Jerusalem, and even the entire Jewish people in their homeland. During their first scattering following the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem (587 B.C.), Jews began to longingly remember the land in their prayers. When Herod's temple was destroyed (A.D. 70) and the Jews were later driven out of Jerusalem (A.D. 135), concern grew whether they would ever return.

The early nineteenth century witnessed the awakening of modern nationalism. At first this had little impact on Jewry as many identified with European national aspirations. However, with the increase in anti-Semitism, initial ideas of modern Jewish nationalism developed as some Orthodox Jews left Europe and settled in unoccupied parts of Palestine.

In 1886 Theodor Herzl, a Viennese journalist, wrote The Jewish State, which provided a platform for a new political movement that he called Zionism. Herzl's contention that the Jewish people needed a homeland was largely secular. Many of those at the First International Zionist Congress (1897) in Basel were adamantly secular and opposed to making Judaism the basis for Zionism ideology.

During World War I, Arthur J. Balfour, the British foreign minister, publicly expressed the gratitude of his government for Jewish military and scientific assistance. An official release declared that the government viewed with favor the establishment of a national home for the Jewish people in Palestine and would make efforts toward that end. Arabs were virtually powerless to oppose England, which had been granted the mandate for Palestine.

After World War II and the Holocaust, Jewish survivors poured into Palestine. England, tired of the expense of maintaining the mandate, withdrew. The United Nations assumed responsibility. On the day following the end of the British mandate, the plan for a Jewish and an Arab state was rejected by the Arabs, but accepted by the Jews. So on May 15, 1948, the state of Israel was born. Over the next twenty-five years five wars were fought between Israelis and Arabs. In 1975, under Arab influence, the United Nations declared Zionism to be a form of racism. Even though Israel has proved to be a disappointment to many, and the majority of Jews throughout the world do not want to return, it has to be noted that Judaism, the Jewish people, and the land now belong together.

Zionism, African Church. Of significance to missiologists is a form of Zionism that characterizes a church movement in South Africa. The term “Zion” was introduced to the context by missionaries from the Pentecostal apocalyptic church of Zion, Illinois. In this case the term does not refer to the literal mountain in Israel, but is a symbolic title for eternal life with Christ in a heavenly home. Especially during the apartheid era, it served as a rallying point for Africans who desired to secure their Christian identity despite the politically and socially oppressive environment. With several thousand registered churches and several million followers, the Zionists form the largest church movement in South Africa (see also African Initiated Church Movement).

Zoroastrian, Zoroastrianism. Around 1300 B.C. a man named Zarathushtra (Zoroaster) is believed to have taught a new religion to the Aryan people settled in what is now Iran. Its doctrines changed over centuries during which the people faced conquest by the Greeks, the spread of Christianity, and later the Arab conquest and Islam. In the ninth century A.D. some Zoroastrians sailed east in search of religious freedom, and settled in Gujarat where they were to become the Parsis. Today there are only a few small communities in Iran that are Zoroastrian (c. 30,000); the main traditions have passed to the influential Parsi communities in India and Pakistan (c. 100,000).

The original teaching of Zarathushtra is found in the Gathas (“hymns”) that are attributed to him and preserved in a diverse collection of writings called the Avesta (fourth to sixth century...
Zoroastrian, Zoroastrianism

A.D.). The primary innovation of Zarathushtra, which set his teaching apart from that of other Indo-European peoples of his time, was his emphasis on MONOTHEISM and a radical DUALISM. Ahura Mazda, the creator of heaven and earth, was good and just, but not all-powerful. He had an adversary, Angra Mainyu (the evil spirit), who was likewise uncreated. Ahura Mazda created the world as a battleground where they could meet. Human beings are therefore at the center of this struggle, and it is their duty to care for the God of creation and fight evil in all its forms. The PROBLEM OF EVIL and suffering is basic to Zoroastrian thought.

Zoroastrian cosmology focuses on three major events: the creation of the world, the revelation of good religion, and the final transfiguration. The ultimate aim of all virtuous striving is to bring about the salvation of the world. The last days will be marked by increasing suffering, and then the world savior will come in glory. A later tradition says that he is to be born of a virgin impregnated by the sperm of Zarathushtra while she bathed in a lake where it had been deposited and miraculously preserved. There will be a great battle between good and evil, ending in victory for the good. The bodies of those who died earlier will be resurrected and united with their souls, and the last judgment will take place. The kingdom of Ahura Mazda will then be established on earth.

A Zoroastrian has the duty to pray five times daily (at dawn, sunrise, noon, sunset, and midnight) in the presence of fire. In about 400 B.C., an ever-burning fire seems to have been instituted into the temple cult. There are three grades of fires: farabay, the fire of the priests; gushnaspa, the fire of the warriors; and burzen mihr, the fire of farmers. The symbolic role of fire led to the misconception, especially by Muslims, that the Zoroastrians were fire worshipers.

Boys and girls are initiated into the Zoroastrian community by being invested with a sacred shirt and cord. This usually takes place between the ages of seven and nine among the Parsis, and twelve and fifteen among the Iranians. On that day the young person bathes, drinks a consecrated liquid for inward cleansing, and puts on the sacred shirt. The priest then performs a simple ceremony, and the relatives dress the initiate in new clothes and give gifts. Ceremonies at death are equally important. The body is given into the charge of professionals, who wrap it in a cotton shroud and carry it on an iron bier to a stone tower. The polluting flesh is quickly eaten by vultures, and the bones bleached in the sun. Prayers are made for the deceased on the fourth day, and regularly during the following year.

Zoroastrians do not proselytize. They favor marriage between cousins, with the result that they form close communities. From the ninth century the community in Iran has been separated from that in India, consequently, the teaching and ritual of the two groups differ. Although small in number, the Parsis have become an influential and wealthy community in India.

David Burnett

Zwemer, Samuel Marinus (1867–1952). American missionary to the Middle East. Born in Michigan of Dutch immigrant parents, he graduated from Hope College and New Brunswick Seminary before ordination by the Reformed Church in America. In 1890 he launched with James Cantine the Arabian Mission, working in a number of locations in Iraq and the Arabian Peninsula. From 1912 to 1928 he was based in Cairo, traveling extensively throughout the entire Muslim world. From 1929 until his retirement at the age of seventy-one he served as professor of the history of religion and Christian mission at Princeton Seminary. He continued an active schedule of writing and speaking right up to his death at age eighty-four.

A man of remarkable range and energy, Zwemer contributed to the missionary effort among Muslims and the wider Protestant missionary movement. In addition to his pioneering work in Arabia he was both scholar and motivator. His writings on Islamics ranged from historical studies to anthropological fieldwork on popular Islam; he founded and edited for thirty-seven years the important journal, The Moslem World. Along with academic writing he produced a variety of evangelistic, theological, and devotional literature. He played a leading role in international conferences devoted to Muslim evangelization, gathering and disseminating information and encouraging workers to increased effort. He richly deserved the title attributed to him as the Apostle to Islam.

Timothy Warda

This outline has been purposefully limited to three levels to avoid “a micro-organizational orientation” for the Dictionary. Many articles are listed in more than one area. Therefore, inclusion of an article under a certain area does not mean that the article’s sole focus is on that area. Instead it means that at least one major focus in the article is of significance for the particular area under which the article is listed. Each set of articles at the third level is listed under the major heading alphabetically rather than logically. Italicized headings indicate logical division which are not actual articles; otherwise every entry (including headings) indicates an article.

1. History of Mission
   1.1 Selected articles on missions topics covering eras prior to A.D. 1792
       1.101 Anabaptist Missions
       1.102 Celtic Missionary Movement
       1.103 Counter-Reformation, The 1.104 Crusades, The
       1.105 Enlightenment
       1.106 Moravian Missions
       1.107 Nestorian Missions
       1.108 Monastic Movement
       1.109 Pietism
       1.110 Reformation and Mission, The
       1.111 Women in Mission
   1.2 Selected articles dealing with the Great Century era (A.D. 1792–1910)
       1.201 Abolitionist Movement
       1.203 Clapham Sect
       1.204 Colonialism and Missions
       1.205 Comity
       1.206 Ecumenical Missionary Conference (New York, 1900)
       1.207 Faith Missions
       1.208 Great Awakenings
       1.209 Great Century of Missions (A.D. 1792–1910)
       1.210 Haystack Meeting
       1.211 Keswick Convention
       1.212 Liverpool Missionary Conference (1860)
       1.213 Nevius Method
       1.214 Paternalism
       1.215 Pietism
       1.216 Revival, Revivals
       1.217 Serampore Trio
       1.218 Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions (SVM)
       1.219 Union Missionary Convention (New York Missionary Conference [1854])
       1.220 Women in Mission
       1.221 World Missionary Conference (Edinburgh, 1910)
       1.222 World’s Parliaments of Religions (1893 and 1993)
   1.3 Articles related to the contemporary Ecumenical movement (see also several of the articles listed under 5.13, 5.14, and 5.15 below)
       1.301 Accra Conference (1958)
1.302 Amsterdam Assembly (1948)
1.303 Bangkok Conference (1973)
1.304 Commission on World Mission and Evangelism
1.305 Dialogue
1.306 Ecumenical Movement
1.307 Foreign Missions Inquiry, Layman's
1.308 International Missionary Council (IMC)
1.309 Jerusalem Conference (1928)
1.310 Kairos Document
1.311 Melbourne Conference (1980)
1.312 Mexico City Conference (1963)
1.313 Missio Dei
1.314 Moratorium
1.315 New Delhi Assembly (1961)
1.316 Option for the Poor
1.317 World's Parliaments of Religions (1893 and 1993)
1.318 Praxis
1.319 Presence Evangelism
1.320 Salvador Conference (1996)
1.321 San Antonio Conference (1989)
1.322 Sanctuary Movement
1.323 Tambaram Conference (1938)
1.324 Third World Women
1.325 Vancouver Assembly (1983)
1.326 Whitby Conference (1947)
1.327 Willingen Conference (1952)
1.328 Women in Mission
1.329 World Council of Churches Conferences
1.330 World Council of Churches Assemblies
1.331 World Council of Churches
1.332 World Missionary Conference (Edinburgh, 1910)

1.4 Articles related to the contemporary Evangelical movement (see also 1.2. above, and 1.6. below)

1.401 Australian Evangelical Alliance
1.402 Chinese House Church Movement
1.403 Church Growth Movement
1.404 COMIBAM
1.405 Congress on the Church's Worldwide Mission (Wheaton Congress, 1966)
1.406 Consultation on the Relationship between Evangelism and Social Responsibility (Grand Rapids, 1982)
1.407 Evangelical Fellowship of Mission Agencies (EFMA)
1.408 Evangelical Missionary Alliance (EMA)
1.409 Evangelical Missions Conferences
1.410 Evangelical Movement
1.411 Frankfurt Declaration on the Fundamental Crisis in Christian Mission
1.412 Global Consultations of World Evangelization (GCOWE '95 and GCOWE '97)
1.413 International Conference for Itinerant Evangelists (Amsterdam, 1983)
1.414 Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association (IFMA)
1.415 Lausanne Congress on World Evangelism (1974)
1.416 Lausanne Congress II on World Evangelism (Manila, 1989)
1.417 Lausanne Movement
1.418 Mission and Missions
1.419 New Apostolic Reformation Missions
1.420 Panama Congress (1916)
1.421 Pentecostal Movement
1.422 Third World Women
1.423 Urbana Mission Conferences
1.424 Women in Mission
1.425 World Congress on Evangelism (Berlin Congress, 1966)
1.426 World Consultation on World Evangelization (Pattaya, 1980)
1.427 World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF)
1.428 World Missionary Conference (Edinburgh, 1910)

1.5 Articles on selected denominational “families”
1.501 Anabaptist Missions
1.502 Adventist Missions
1.503 Anglican Missions
1.504 Baptist Missions
1.505 Brethren Missions
1.506 Charismatic Missions
1.507 Christian and Missionary Alliance Missions
1.508 Christian Church Missions
1.509 Friends’ (Quakers) Missions
1.510 Fundamentalist Denominational Missions
1.511 Lutheran Missions
1.512 Mennonite Missions
1.513 Methodist Missions
1.514 Moravian Missions
1.515 Orthodox Mission Movements
1.516 Pentecostal Missions
1.517 Presbyterian Missions
1.518 Reformed Missions
1.519 Roman Catholic Missions
1.520 Salvation Army
1.521 Second Vatican Council (1962–1965)
1.522 Wesleyan/Holiness Missions

1.6 Independent Non-Denominational Mission Agencies
1.601 Africa Evangelical Fellowship
1.602 Africa Inland Mission, International (AIM)
1.603 American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM)
1.604 Baptist Missionary Society (BMS)
1.605 Basel Mission
1.606 Berlin Missionary Society
1.607 Bible Societies
1.608 Church Mission Society (CMS)
1.609 Council for World Mission (CWM; formerly The London Missionary Society)
1.610 Danish-Halle Mission
1.611 Faith Missions
1.612 Friends Missionary Prayer Band (FMPB)
1.613 Indian Evangelical Mission (IEM)
1.614 International Fellowship of Evangelical Students (IFES)
1.615 Interserve
1.616 New Tribes
1.617 OMS International
1.618 Overseas Missionary Fellowship (OMF)
1.619 Parachurch Agencies and Mission
1.620 Paris Evangelical Mission Society
1.621 Rhenish Mission Society
1.622 Society for International Ministries (SIM)
1.623 Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG)
1.624 Southern Baptist Convention, IMB
1.625 The Evangelical Alliance Mission (TEAM)
1.626 WEC International
1.627 Wycliffe Bible Translators, International

1.7 Selected articles on continental, regional, or national mission boards and societies (for scholarly mission groups and societies, see under 2.1)
1.701 African Mission Boards and Societies
1.702 Asian Mission Boards and Societies
1.703 Australian Mission Boards and Societies
1.704 Brazilian Mission Boards and Societies
1.705 Canadian Mission Boards and Societies
1.706 Chinese Mission Boards and Societies
EDWM Master Outline

1.707 Danish Mission Boards and Societies
1.708 Dutch Mission Boards and Societies
1.709 English Mission Boards and Societies
1.710 Finnish Mission Boards and Societies
1.711 French Mission Boards and Societies
1.712 Ghanaian Mission Boards and Societies
1.713 German Mission Boards and Societies
1.714 Indian Mission Boards and Societies
1.715 Japanese Mission Boards and Societies
1.716 Korean Mission Boards and Societies
1.717 Latin American Mission Boards and Societies
1.718 Myanmar Mission Boards and Societies
1.719 New Zealand Mission Boards and Societies
1.720 Nigerian Mission Boards and Societies
1.721 Non-Western Mission Boards and Societies
1.722 Philippine Mission Boards and Societies
1.723 Scottish Mission Boards and Societies
1.724 Swedish Mission Boards and Societies
1.725 Swiss Mission Boards and Societies
1.726 United States Mission Boards and Societies

2. Missiology
   2.1 Selected articles on academics, academic societies, research, and tools
      2.101 Academic Associations of Mission
      2.102 American Society for Church Growth
      2.103 American Society of Missiology
      2.104 Association of Professors of Mission
      2.105 Bachelor's Degrees in Mission
      2.106 Biographies of Missionaries
      2.107 Cross-Cultural Research
      2.108 Degrees in Mission and Missiology
      2.109 Dictionaries of Mission(s)
      2.110 Directories of Missions
      2.111 Doctoral Degrees in Missiology
      2.112 Ethnographic Research
      2.113 Ethnography
      2.114 Evangelical Missiological Society (EMS)
      2.115 German Society for Missiology
      2.116 The Gospel and Our Culture Network
      2.117 Information Technology
      2.118 International Association for Mission Studies (IAMS)
      2.119 Intertestamental Studies
      2.120 Journals of Mission and Missiology
      2.121 Master's Degrees in Missions and Missiology
      2.122 Missiology
      2.123 Missiometrics
      2.124 Mission Atlases
      2.125 Mission Libraries
      2.126 Qualitative Research
      2.127 Quantitative Missiology
      2.128 Research
   2.2 Selected articles on missiological theory
      2.201 Accommodation
      2.202 Bridges of God
      2.203 Controversies in Contemporary Evangelical Mission
      2.204 Cultural Conversion
      2.205 Dialogue
      2.206 Engel Scale
      2.207 Evangelism and Social Responsibility
      2.208 Evangelization, Measurement of
      2.209 Extent of Missionary Identification
      2.210 Fads in Mission
2.211 Flaw of the Excluded Middle
2.212 Foreign Financing of Indigenous Workers
2.213 Fraternal Workers
2.214 Globalization
2.215 Gospel and Culture
2.216 Holistic Mission
2.217 Homogenous Unit Principle
2.218 Incarnational Mission
2.219 Inculturation
2.220 Indigenization
2.221 Indigenous Churches
2.222 Liberation
2.223 Lifestyle Evangelism
2.224 Missio Dei
2.225 Mission and Missions
2.226 Mission on Six Continents
2.227 Mission Theory
2.228 Missionary Call, The
2.229 Missionary Task, The
2.230 New Covenant
2.231 Moratorium
2.232 Option for the Poor
2.233 Partnership
2.234 Peoples, People Groups
2.235 People Movements
2.236 Polygamy and Church Membership
2.237 Power Ministries
2.238 Proselytism
2.239 Reached and Unreached Mission Fields
2.240 Receptivity
2.241 Redemption and Lift
2.242 Redemptive Analogies
2.243 Sabbath Observance
2.244 Sociological Barriers
2.245 Sodality and Modality
2.246 Spiritual Warfare
2.247 Volunteerism in Mission

2.3 Selected articles on missionary strategies, tools, and practice (see also 3.4)
2.301 10/40 Window
2.302 Adopt-A-People
2.303 Bible Translation
2.304 Biblical Education by Extension
2.305 Bonding
2.306 Church Planting
2.307 Colportage
2.308 Comity
2.309 Contextualization
2.310 Creative Access Countries
2.311 Cross-Cultural Research
2.312 Crusade Evangelism
2.313 Discipling a Whole Nation (DAWN)
2.314 Educational Mission Work
2.315 Extent of Missionary Identification
2.316 Financing Missions
2.317 Foreign Financing of Indigenous Workers
2.318 Friendship Evangelism
2.319 Indigenization
2.320 Indigenous Churches
2.321 Information Technology
2.322 Itinerant Mission
2.323 Jesus Film
EDWM Master Outline

2.324 Literacy, Literature Mission Work
2.325 March for Jesus
2.326 Media
2.327 Nevis Method
2.328 Non-Residential Missionary
2.329 Pioneer Mission Work
2.330 Power Encounter
2.331 Pre-evangelism
2.332 Radio Mission Work
2.333 Saturation Church Planting
2.334 Short-term Missions
2.335 Small Groups
2.336 Smuggling
2.337 Storytelling
2.338 Strategies in Mission
2.339 Teaching English to Speakers of Other Languages (TESOL)
2.340 Teams in Mission
2.341 Tent-making Mission
2.342 Theological Education by Extension (TEE)
2.343 Theological Education in Non-Western Contexts
2.344 Training of Missionaries
2.345 Urban Churches
2.346 Village Evangelism

3. Practical Missiology

3.1 Selected articles on administrating the task
3.101 Attrition
3.102 Burnout
3.103 Candidate Selection
3.104 Church/Mission Relations
3.105 Comity
3.106 Contingency Plans
3.107 Counseling of Missionaries
3.108 Dropout
3.109 Fund Raising
3.110 Information Technology
3.111 Interagency Cooperation
3.112 Leadership
3.113 Member Care in Missions
3.114 Management
3.115 Morale
3.116 Mission Headquarters
3.117 Planning
3.118 Promotion of Mission
3.119 Secondment
3.120 Volunteerism in Mission

3.2 Selected articles on missionary life
3.201 Adjustment to the Field
3.202 Bonding
3.203 Candidacy
3.204 Church Missions Conferences
3.205 Church and State
3.206 Commitment
3.207 Creative Access Countries
3.208 Deputation
3.209 Divorce
3.210 Evangelist
3.211 Extent of Missionary Identification
3.212 Family Life of the Missionary
3.213 Field Appointment
3.214 Field Responsibilities
3.215 Furlough
3.216 Health, Health Care
3.217 Home Schooling
3.218 Household Responsibilities
3.219 In-service Education
3.220 Language School
3.221 Marriage, Marriage Practices
3.222 Martyrdom
3.223 Member Care in Missions
3.224 Missionary
3.225 Missionary Affluence
3.226 Missionary Children
3.227 Motive, Motivation
3.228 Pastoral Counseling
3.229 Persecution
3.230 Personal/Family Responsibilities
3.231 Qualifications for the Missionary
3.232 Reverse Culture Shock
3.233 Single Missionary
3.234 Terrorism
3.235 Third Culture Kids (TCKs)
3.236 Training of Missionaries

3.3 Selected articles on cross-cultural ministry
3.301 Apologetics
3.302 Bible Translation
3.303 Child Evangelism
3.304 Christian Walk and Work in Mission
3.305 Church Development
3.306 Church Planting
3.307 Cross-Cultural Counseling
3.308 Cross-Cultural Evangelism
3.309 Cross-Cultural Ministry
3.310 Crusade Evangelism
3.311 Disciple, Discipleship
3.312 Extent of Missionary Identification
3.313 Evangelism
3.314 Evangelist
3.315 Friendship Evangelism
3.316 Homiletics
3.317 Indigenization
3.318 Indigenous Churches
3.319 Invitation
3.320 Lifestyle Evangelism
3.321 Partnership
3.322 Pastoral Counseling
3.323 Pre-evangelism
3.324 Presence Evangelism
3.325 Proclamation Evangelism
3.326 Spiritual Formation
3.327 Television Evangelism
3.328 Village Evangelism
3.329 Witness

3.4 Selected articles on types of missionary work and emphasis (see also 2.3 above)
3.401 AIDS and Mission
3.402 Agricultural Missions
3.403 Aviation Mission Work
3.404 Bible Translation
3.405 Biblical Education by Extension
3.406 Camping
3.407 Child Evangelism
3.408 Church Development
3.409 Church Planting
EDWM Master Outline

3.410 Colportage
3.411 Disaster Response
3.412 Educational Mission Work
3.413 Friendship Evangelism
3.414 Holistic Mission
3.415 Home Missions
3.416 Jewish Missions
3.417 Leprosy Mission Work
3.418 Literacy, Literature Mission Work
3.419 March for Jesus
3.420 Medical Mission Work
3.421 Mission Schools
3.422 Muslim Mission Work
3.423 Orphanage Work in Christian Missions
3.424 Pioneer Mission Work
3.425 Prison Mission Work
3.426 Short-term Missions
3.427 Student Mission Work
3.428 Radio Mission Work
3.429 Refugee Mission Work
3.430 Relief Work
3.431 Tent-Making Mission
3.432 Teaching English to Speakers of Other Languages (TESOL)
3.433 Television Evangelism
3.434 Theological Education by Extension (TEE)

4. Social Sciences

4.1 Selected Articles in Anthropology
4.101 Anthropology of Religion
4.102 Behavior Patterns
4.103 Biculturalism
4.104 Cross-Cultural Research
4.105 Culture
4.106 Culture Learning
4.107 Decision Making
4.108 Enculturation
4.109 Ethnographic Research
4.110 Ethnography
4.111 Ethnomusicology
4.112 Individualism and Collectivism
4.113 Intercultural Competency
4.114 Kinship
4.115 Worldview

4.2 Communication
4.201 Art
4.202 Intercultural Communication
4.203 Interpersonal Communication
4.204 Mass Communication
4.205 Media
4.206 Radio Mission Work
4.207 Television Evangelism
4.208 Storytelling

4.3 Economics
4.301 Bribery
4.302 Communism/Marxism
4.303 Consumerism
4.304 Debt
4.305 Dependency
4.306 Development
4.307 Missionary Affluence
4.308 Money
4.309 Transformational Development
4.310 Wealth and Poverty

4.4 Educational Mission Work
4.401 Accreditation
4.402 Biblical Education by Extension
4.403 Illiteracy
4.404 International Council for Evangelical Theological Education (ICETE)
4.405 Learning Theories
4.406 Literacy, Literature Mission Work
4.407 Mission Schools
4.408 Theological Education by Extension (TEE)

4.5 Linguistics, Linguistic Theory
4.501 Bible Translation
4.502 Dynamic Equivalence
4.503 Language
4.504 Language School
4.505 Second Language Acquisition
4.506 Sociolinguistics
4.507 Symbol, Symbolism
4.508 Translatability
4.509 Translation
4.510 Translation Theory

4.6 Modernization
4.601 Ecology, Ecological Movement
4.602 Environment
4.603 Marginal, Marginalization
4.604 Modernity
4.605 Pluralism
4.606 Postmodernism
4.607 Secularist, Secularism
4.608 Secularization
4.609 Terrorism
4.610 Third World
4.611 Two-Thirds World
4.612 Urban Churches
4.613 Urbanization

4.7 Politics
4.701 Church and State
4.702 Human Rights
4.703 Hunger
4.704 Ideologies
4.705 Land, Land Reform, Land Rights
4.706 Law, Legal Thought
4.707 Liberation
4.708 Martyrdom
4.709 Nation, Nation-Building, Nationalism
4.710 Paternalism
4.711 Political Elections
4.713 Religious Freedom
4.714 Revolution
4.715 Terrorism
4.716 Totalitarianism
4.717 Wars
4.718 Wealth and Poverty
4.719 Zionism

4.8 Psychology
4.801 Bonding
4.802 Counseling of Missionaries
4.803 Cross-Cultural Counseling
4.804 Culture Shock
4.805 Extent of Missionary Identification
EDWM Master Outline

4.806 Guilt
4.807 Learning Theories
4.808 Moral Development
4.809 Pastoral Counseling
4.810 Reverse Culture Shock
4.811 Shame
4.812 Spiritual Formation

4.9 Science and Missions

4.10 Sociology
4.1001 Alienation
4.1002 Anomie
4.1003 Association, Socio-Anthropology of 4.1004 Bonding
4.1005 Caste
4.1006 Diaspora(s)
4.1007 Enculturation
4.1008 Ethnicity
4.1009 Ethnocentrism
4.1010 Gender Roles
4.1011 Institutionalization
4.1012 Leadership
4.1013 Leadership Theory
4.1014 Marriage, Marriage Practices
4.1015 Migration
4.1016 Minority, Minority Populations
4.1017 Paternalism
4.1018 Persecution
4.1020 Race Relations
4.1021 Reconciliation
4.1022 Sociological Barriers
4.1023 Sociology of Music
4.1024 Sodality of Music
4.1025 Status and Role
4.1026 Third World
4.1027 Two-Thirds World
4.1028 Zionism

5. Theology of Mission
5.1 Bible
5.101 Abrahamic Covenant
5.102 Apostle, Apostles
5.103 Babel
5.104 Biblical Criticism and Mission
5.105 Biblical Theology of Mission
5.106 Creation
5.107 Inerrancy
5.108 Jesus and Mission
5.109 Jonah
5.110 New Testament Theology of Mission
5.111 Old Testament Prophets
5.112 Old Testament Theology of Mission
5.113 Paul and Mission
5.114 Pentateuch, Mission in the
5.115 Religious Scriptures
5.116 Revelation, General
5.117 Truth
5.118 Two-Covenant Theory

5.2 Christology
5.201 Atonement
5.202 Christ and Culture
5.203 Christological Controversies
5.204 Great Commandment
5.205 Great Commission
5.206 Incarnational Mission
5.207 Resurrection of Christ
5.208 Uniqueness of Christ

5.3 Church
5.301 Church Discipline
5.302 Church Polity
5.303 Leadership
5.304 Pastoral Responsibilities
5.305 Priesthood of Believers
5.306 Sacraments/Ordinance
5.307 Stewardship

5.4 Eschatology
5.401 Amillennialism
5.402 Annihilationism
5.403 Death
5.404 End Times
5.405 Hell
5.406 Hope
5.407 Judgment
5.408 Kingdom of God
5.409 Millennial Thought
5.410 Parousia
5.411 Postmillennialism
5.412 Premillennialism
5.413 Worship
5.414 Wrath of God

5.5 Ethics
5.501 Bribery
5.502 Church and State
5.503 Debt
5.504 Divorce
5.505 Human Rights
5.506 Hunger
5.507 Justice of God
5.508 Kingdom of God
5.509 Liberation
5.510 Love of God
5.511 Mercy of God
5.512 Missionary Affluence
5.513 Problem of Evil and Mission, The
5.514 Sexual Mores
5.515 Smuggling
5.516 Suffering
5.517 Stewardship
5.518 Tithe, Tithing
5.519 Wealth and Poverty
5.520 Wrath of God

5.6 God
5.601 Divine Attributes of God
5.602 Divine Deliverance
5.603 Divine Election
5.604 Divine Initiative
5.605 Grace of God
5.606 Immanence of God
5.607 Immutability of God
5.608 Justice of God
5.609 Kingdom of God
5.610 Love of God
5.611 Mercy of God

EDWM Master Outline
EDWM Master Outline

5.612 Missio Dei
5.613 Omnipresence of God
5.614 Omniscience of God
5.615 Problem of Evil and Mission, The
5.616 Sovereignty of God
5.617 Transcendence of God
5.618 Trinity
5.619 Wrath of God
5.620 Providence of God

5.7 Holy Spirit
5.701 Anointing
5.702 Dreams and Visions
5.703 Elenetics
5.704 Fruit of the Spirit
5.705 Gifts of the Spirit
5.706 Miracles in Mission
5.707 Power Encounter
5.708 Power Ministries
5.709 Signs and Wonders

5.8 Humankind, Doctrine of 5.801 Conscience
5.802 Depravity of Humankind
5.803 Fall of Humankind, The
5.804 Image of God
5.805 Human Rights
5.806 Person, Personhood
5.807 Priesthood of Believers

5.9 Salvation
5.901 Assurance of Salvation
5.902 Baptism
5.903 Confession
5.904 Conversion
5.905 Divine Election
5.906 Eternal Life
5.907 Eternal Security
5.908 Forgiveness of Sins
5.909 Gospel, The
5.910 Justification
5.911 Liberation
5.912 Peace with God
5.913 Profession of Faith
5.914 Reconciliation
5.915 Repentance
5.916 Sacrifice

5.10 Sin
5.1001 Apostasy
5.1002 Blasphemy
5.1003 Confession
5.1004 Corruption
5.1005 Depravity of Humankind
5.1006 Doubt
5.1007 Elenetics
5.1008 Fall of Humankind, The
5.1009 Guilt
5.1010 Idolatry
5.1011 Shame

5.11 Spiritual Warfare
5.1101 Curse, Curses
5.1102 Demon, Demonization
5.1103 Gifts of the Spirit
5.1104 Miracles in Mission
5.1105 Possession Phenomena
5.1106 Power Encounter
5.1107 Power Ministries
5.1108 Powers, The
5.1109 Satan
5.1110 Satanist, Satanism
5.1111 Signs and Wonders
5.1112 Territorial Spirits
5.12 Spirituality
5.1201 Commitment
5.1202 Confession
5.1203 Fruit of the Spirit
5.1204 Gifts of the Spirit
5.1205 Holiness
5.1206 Honesty
5.1207 Hope
5.1208 Love
5.1209 Joy
5.1210 Motive, Motivation
5.1211 Obedience
5.1212 Peace
5.1213 Prayer
5.1214 Shalom
5.1215 Spiritual Formation
5.1216 Suffering
5.1217 Unity
5.1218 Worship
5.13 Theological Method
5.1301 Accommodation
5.1302 Adaptation
5.1303 Contextualization
5.1304 Ethnotheologies
5.1305 Exegesis
5.1306 Hermeneutics
5.1307 Inculturation
5.1308 Indigenization
5.1309 Systematic Theology
5.1310 Theological Systems
5.1311 Translatability
5.1312 Syncretism
5.14 Theological Systems
5.1401 African Theology
5.1402 Arminian Theology
5.1403 Asian Theologies
5.1404 Black Theologies
5.1405 Calvinism
5.1406 Dispensationalism
5.1407 Ethnotheologies
5.1408 Evangelical Theology
5.1409 Feminist Theologies
5.1410 Hispanic Evangelical Theologies
5.1411 Liberal Theology
5.1412 Liberation Theologies Missiology
5.1413 Minjung Theology
5.1414 Neo-Orthodox Theology
5.1415 Orthodox Theology of Mission
5.1416 Pacifist Theology
5.1417 Political Theologies
5.1418 Theological Method
5.15 Theology of Mission
5.1501 Ambassador of God
EDWM Master Outline

5.1502 Christ and Culture
5.1503 Christian Walk and Work in Mission
5.1504 Church/Mission Relations
5.1505 Cultural Mandate
5.1506 Divine Initiative
5.1507 Evangelical Theology
5.1508 Evangelism and Social Responsibility
5.1509 Evangelist
5.1510 Gospel, The
5.1511 Gospel and Culture
5.1512 Great Commandment
5.1513 Great Commission
5.1514 Heathen, The 5.1515 Holism, Biblical
5.1516 Holistic Mission
5.1517 Incarnational Mission
5.1518 Israel's Role
5.1519 Jesus and Mission
5.1520 Justice of God
5.1521 Kingdom of God
5.1522 Liberation
5.1523 Martyrdom
5.1524 Miracles in Mission
5.1525 Mission and Missions
5.1526 Missionary Call, The
5.1527 Missionary Task, The
5.1528 Missio Dei
5.1529 Mission and Missions
5.1530 Moratorium
5.1531 Motive, Motivation
5.1532 New Covenant
5.1533 New Testament Theology of Mission
5.1534 Old Testament Theology of Mission
5.1535 Option for the Poor
5.1536 Paul and Mission
5.1537 Power, Theology of
5.1538 Praxis
5.1539 Presence Evangelism
5.1540 Proclamation Evangelism
5.1541 Proselytism
5.1542 Shalom
5.1543 Theology of Religions
5.1544 Unevangelized
5.1545 Uniqueness of Christ
5.1546 Universality of Mission
5.1547 Witness
5.1548 Worship

6. World Religions
6.1 Belief Systems
   6.101 Atheism
   6.102 Agnosticism
   6.103 Belief Systems
   6.104 Communism/Marxism
   6.105 Deism
   6.106 Dualism
   6.107 Henotheism
   6.108 Ideologies
   6.109 Monism
   6.110 Monotheism
   6.111 Polytheism
6.12 Panentheism
6.13 Pantheism
6.14 Relativist, Relativism
6.15 Secularist, Secularism
6.16 Socialist, Socialism
6.17 Universalism

6.2 Selected articles on new religious movements
6.201 African Initiated Church Movement
6.202 Asian New Religious Movements
6.203 Black Muslims
6.204 Cargo Cults
6.205 Hindu New Religious Movements
6.206 Islamic New Religious Movements
6.207 Japanese New Religious Movements
6.208 Jehovah’s Witnesses
6.209 Kardecism
6.210 Latin American New Religious Movements
6.211 Mormons
6.212 Neopagan, Neopaganism
6.213 New Age Movement
6.214 New Religious Movements (NeRMs)
6.215 Non-Church Movement (Japan)
6.216 North American New Religious Movements
6.217 Prophetic and Identity Movements
6.218 Renewal Movements
6.219 Three-Self Movement (China)
6.220 Wicca, Wiccan
6.221 Zionism, African Church

6.3 Selected articles on the study of religions
6.301 Anthropology of Religion
6.302 Comparative Religion
6.303 Phenomenology of Religion
6.304 Philosophy of Religion
6.305 Psychology of Religion
6.306 Religion
6.307 Religious Typologies
6.308 Sociology of Religion
6.309 Theology of Religions
6.310 World’s Parliaments of Religions (1893 and 1993)

6.4 Selected articles on the world’s religions
6.401 Aboriginal Religions
6.402 African Traditional Religions
6.403 Astrology
6.404 Baha’i
6.405 Buddhist, Buddhism
6.406 Confucianism
6.407 Folk Religions
6.408 Fundamentalisms
6.409 Hindu, Hinduism
6.410 Indigenous American Religions
6.411 Islam, Muslim
6.412 Jain, Jainism
6.413 Jew, Judaism
6.414 Jewish Missions
6.415 Mahayana Buddhism
6.416 Muslim Mission Work
6.417 Neopagan, Neopaganism
6.418 Occultist, Occultism
6.419 Primal Religions
EDWM Master Outline

6.420 Pure Land Buddhism
6.421 Satanist, Satanism
6.422 Shi’ite, Shi’ism
6.423 Shinto
6.424 Sikh, Sikhism
6.425 Sufi, Sufism
6.426 Sunni, Sunnism
6.427 Taoist, Taoism
6.428 Theravada Buddhism
6.429 Totem, Totemism
6.430 Vajrayana (Tibetan) Buddhism
6.431 Vedanta Hinduism
6.432 Wicca, Wiccan
6.433 Yoga
6.434 Zen Buddhism
6.435 Zoroastrian, Zoroastrianism

6.5 Selected articles on issues within and across in world’s religions

6.501 Ancestral Beliefs and Practices
6.502 Animism
6.503 Asceticism
6.504 Christo-Paganism
6.505 Cosmology
6.506 Cults, Cultism
6.507 Cultural Conversion
6.508 Curse, Curses
6.509 Death Rites
6.510 Divination, Diviner
6.511 Exorcism
6.512 Festivals, Religious
6.513 Folklore
6.514 Gods and Goddesses
6.515 Guru
6.516 Human Condition in World Religions
6.517 Initiation Rites
6.518 Liminal, Liminality
6.519 Magic, Magick, Magical Beliefs and Practices
6.520 Mystic, Mysticism
6.521 Myth, Mythology
6.522 Nominal, Nominal Christian
6.523 Pilgrimages
6.524 Possession Phenomena
6.525 Qur’an
6.526 Redemption in Other Faiths
6.527 Reincarnation and Transmigration
6.528 Religious Scriptures
6.529 Religious Ultimacy
6.530 Revelation, General
6.531 Rites of Passage
6.532 Ritual and Ceremony
6.533 Sacrifice in Other Faiths
6.534 Shaman, Shamanism
6.535 Soteriology in World Religions
6.536 Symbol, Symbolism
6.537 Syncretism
6.538 Taboo
6.539 Totem, Totemism
6.540 Truth
6.541 Uniqueness of Christ
6.542 Witchcraft and Sorcery
6.543 Zionism
Index

Abraham Mar Thoma, 28
Abrams, Anna, 28, 1012
Abrams, Minnie F., 29–30, 739
Acosta, José de, 33–34, 438, 633, 642, 749
Adalbert of Bremen, 34
Aedesius, 37, 322
Aggrey, J. E. Kwegyir, 48
Agnew, Eliza, 48, 1021
Aidan of Lindisfarne, 50, 984
Aitolos, Kosmas, 51
Aldersey, Mary Ann, 52
Allan, George, 53–54
Allen, Roland, 54, 194, 446, 484, 634, 642, 676, 726, 727, 739, 949
Anderson, Gerald H., 59, 635, 659, 949
Anderson, John, 60
Anderson, Rufus, 54, 55, 60, 183, 188, 194, 410, 483, 634, 642, 676, 726, 772, 960, 982, 999
Andrews, Charles Freer, 60–61
Ansgar, 65–66
Argue, Andrew Harvey, 76
Armstrong, Annie Walker, 78
Arnott, Frederick Stanley, 62, 78, 239, 1042
Aroolappen, John Christian, 78–79, 417, 525
Arthington, Robert, 79–80, 110
Asbury, Francis, 80, 207, 986
Augustine of Canterbury, 95, 170, 644, 734, 943
Augustine of Hippo, 95, 176, 215, 440
Aylward, Gladys, 101
Azariah, Vedanayakam Samuel, 101–2, 181, 734, 1029
Baba, Panya, 44, 103, 690, 887
Baedeker, Friedrich Wilhelm, 104–5
Baker, Amelia Dorothea, 106
Baldwin, Mary Briscoe, 106–7
Barclay, Thomas, 114
Barth, Christian Gottlob, 114
Bavinck, Johan Herman, 115, 307, 321, 815, 949, 999
Bayne, Margaret. See Wilson, Margaret Bayne
Beach, Harlan Page, 115, 561
Beaver, Robert Pierce, 90, 115–16, 212, 745, 1022
Bell, Lemuel Nelson, 118
Bender, Carl Jacob, 118–19
Bentzen, Annie Skau, 120
Beyerhaus, Peter, 120, 371, 563, 1026
Bhengu, Nicholas Bhekinkosi Hepworth, 120
Bill, Samuel Alexander, 132, 504
Bingham, Hiram, 132, 160, 543, 886
Bingham, Rowland Victory, 41, 132–33, 690, 916
Birinus, 133
Bishop Abraham. See Abraham Mar Thoma
Bishop, Isabella Bird, 134
Bliss, Daniel, 136
Blyden, Edward Wilmot, 136, 576
Bompas, William Carpenter, 137–38
Boniface, 138–39, 170, 195, 330, 370, 388, 441, 676, 875, 984, 1017
Boone, William James, 139
Booth, Evangeline Cory, 139
Booth, Joseph, 139, 592
Booth, William, 139, 140, 205, 408, 850, 884, 1011
Bosch, David (Jacobus), 31, 140, 643, 815, 898, 950
Braden, Charles Samuel, 141–42
Brainerd, David, 142, 301, 305, 395, 407, 444, 602, 814, 913, 986
Bridgman, Eliza Jane Gillett, 147
Bright, William, 147, 346, 519, 539
Brother Andrew, 147–48, 884, 938
Brown, Edith, 148
Buchan, Frank Nathan Daniel, 148
Bulu, Joeli, 151
Burns, William Chalmers, 152
Butler, Fanny Jane, 153
Cable, (Alice) Mildred, 154
Cabrini, Frances Xavier, 154
Calverley, Edwin Elliott, 154–55
Camara, Helder Pessao, 156
Carey, Lott, 162, 576
Carey, Maude. See Cary, Maude
Cargill, Margaret, 163
Carmichael, Amy Wilson, 168, 504, 537
Carver, William Owen, 168
Cary, Maude, 168–69
Casalis, Eugene, 169, 724
Castro, Emilio, 170, 213, 438, 614
Ch‘eng, Ching-yi, 171–72
Chalmers, James, 172, 565
Chamberlain, Jacob, 172–73
Chambers, Oswald, 173
Chapman, J. Wilbur, 173, 247–48
Charles, Pierre, 176, 634, 839
Chesnut, Eleanor, 176, 916
Chi-Qang, 176
Chitambar, Jashwaut Rao, 181
Cho, (David) Paul Yonggi, 181–82
Christlieb, Theodor, 188, 1006
Clark, Charles Allen, 205–6
Clough, John Everett, 206
Codrington, Robert Henry, 184, 206
Coillard, Francois, 207, 724, 1042
Coke, Thomas, 88, 207, 984
Columba of Iona, 50, 170, 195, 211, 503, 693, 859, 984, 1017
Index

Columbanus, 170, 195, 211, 330, 370, 384, 388, 503
Constantine. See Cyril
Coppin, Fanny Jackson, 232–33
Coppock, Grace Lydia, 233
Costas, Orlando E., 234–35, 642, 950, 1000
Cragg, Albert Kenneth, 238–39, 274
Crawford, Daniel, 239
Crawford, Isabel Alice Hartley, 239
Crowther, Samuel Adjai, 39, 201, 246–47, 690, 692, 875
Cyril, 259, 330, 442, 619, 654, 713
Das, Rajendra Chandra, 261
De Nobili, Robert. See de Nobili, Robert
Devanandan, Paul David, 271–72
Deyneka, Peter, Sr., 273–74
Dober, (Johann) Leonhard, 288, 660
Doke, Clement Martyn, 289, 898
Doremus, Sarah, 290, 1022
Duff, Alexander, 183, 293–94, 301, 304, 445, 589, 634, 772, 860, 982
Egede, Hans Povelsön, 305
Elliot, John, 160, 183, 308, 444, 772, 814, 820, 831, 845, 986
Elliot, Elisabeth Howard, 133, 308–9, 1020
Elliot, Philip James, 309
Emde, Johannes, 309
Evans, Helen E., 3
Evans, James, 347
Farrar, Cynthia, 355–56, 1021
Farrow, Lucy F., 356
Fearing, Maria, 356
Field, Adele Marion, 359, 880
Finkenbinder, Paul Edwin, 360
Finney, Charles Grandison, 247, 337, 361, 408, 746, 972, 1003, 1011
Fisk, Pliny, 362, 570
Fiske, Fidelia, 362
Fison, Lorimer, 362
Fjellstedt, Peter, 362–63
Flynn, John, 363–64
Forman, Charles W., 369
Forsyth, Christina nee Moir, 369
Francis, Mabel, 370
Francis of Assisi, 314, 370–71, 442, 598, 624, 1002
Franson, Fredrik, 371, 652, 920, 942
Fraser, Donald, 371–72
Freeman, Thomas Birch, 372–73, 390, 962
Freire, Paulo Reglus Neves, 273, 373, 568–69, 598
Freytag, Walter, 375, 389, 642, 949
Frumenius, 37, 38, 322, 378–79
Fuller, Andrew, 110, 379, 984
Fuller, Charles E., 379, 807
Gairdner, William Henry Temple, 383–84, 718
Gall, 211, 384
Gardiner, Allen Francis, 384–85
Geddie, John, 385
George, Eliza Davis, 386–87
Gib, Andrew, 180, 393
Gilmour, James, 393, 655
Glasser, Arthur F., 203, 223, 393, 815, 1021
Glegg, (Alexander) Lindsay, 394
Gloukharev, Makarius, 396, 443
Gobat, Maria, 396
Goforth, Jonathan, 400, 795
Goforth, Rosalind Bell Smith, 400–401, 795
Gordon, Adoniram Judson, 339, 401, 738, 756, 783
Gorham, Sarah, 401
Gossner, Johannes Evangelista, 404
Graul, Karl, 406, 634
Greene, Elizabeth "Betty", 101, 415
Greene, Mary Jane Forbes, 415
Gregg, Jessie, 416
Gregory the Illuminator, 416
Grenfell, George, 41, 416
Grenfell, Sir Wilfred Thomason, 416–17
Groves, Anthony Norris, 417
Grubb, Sir Kenneth George, 417
Grubb, Wilfred Barbrooke, 417–18
Guinness, Henry Grattan, 420–21
Gutierrez, Gustavo, 421, 598, 781
Gutmann, Bruno, 183, 421–22, 586
Gützlaff, Karl Friedrich August, 422, 445
Haining, Jane Mathisison, 423
Hamer, Lilian, 423–24
Han, Chul-la, 424
Han, Kyung-Chik, 424
Harris, William Wade, 41, 235, 390, 424–25, 576, 793, 916
Harvey, Esther Bragg, 425
Haygood, Laura Askey, 425
Heburn, James Curtis, 429–30, 513
Herman of Alaska, 430
Hesselgrave, David, 189, 281, 334, 432–33, 908
Hewat, Elizabeth G. K., 433
Heyling, Peter, 433
Hicks, Tommy, 433
Higinbottom, Sam, 434, 785
Hill, David, 434
Hinderer, Anna (Martin), 434
Hinz, Hansina, 437–38
Hocking, William Ernest, 366, 446, 572, 642
Hodges, Melvin Lyle, 194, 446, 484, 739
Hoekndijk, Johannes Christiaan, 446–47, 538, 572, 632, 642, 815
Hollenweger, Walter Jacob, 449
Honda, Koji, 456
Honda, Yoichi, 456
Hoover, James Matthew, 458
Hooever, Willis Collins, 458–59
Hoste, Dixon Edward, 459–60, 716
Howard, David Morris, 460, 1023
Huey, Mary Alice, 460–61
Hunt, John, 466
Hyde, John, 466
Ibiam (Sir Francis) Akanu, 467
Ignatius of Loyola, 238, 443, 469
Jackson, Sheldon, 511
Jaeschke, Heinrich Augustus, 511
Jaffray, Robert, 511–12, 1000
Javouhey, Anne Marie, 373, 515–16
Jessup, Henry Harris, 516–17
John, Griffith, 522
Index

Nommen, Ludwig Ingwer, 487, 694
Ntsikana, 700
Nuñez, Emilio Antonio, 438, 700
Nuttall, Enos, 700
Occom, Samson, 701
Oldham, Joseph Houldsworth, 210, 498, 516, 643, 709, 730
Padilla, Carlos René, 439, 563, 718
Padwick, Constance Evelyn, 718
Palau, Luis, 248, 346, 604, 719
Palmer, Phoebe Worrall, 337, 718–20, 740, 1011
Pantaenus, 346, 721
Papasarantopoulos, Chrysostom, 721
Parker, Peter, 55, 725
Parrish, Sarah Rebecca, 726
Paton, John Gibson, 300, 385, 703, 730
Paton, William, 730–31, 795
Patrick, 170, 195, 441, 503, 731
Patteson, John Coleridge, 206, 731
Paul, Kanakarayan Tiruselvam, 181, 734
Palau, Luis, 248, 346
Paulinus of York, 50, 734–35
Peabody, Lucy Whitehead
McGill Waterbury, 657, 735
Penman, David, 737
Perkins, Justin, 746
Peters, George W., 281, 389, 563, 750
Pfander, Karl Gottlieb, 624, 750–51
Pierson, Arthur Tappan, 43, 300, 339, 413, 537, 756, 783, 914
Pike, Eunice, 758
Pike, Kenneth Lee, 67, 580, 758–59
Pikington, George Lawrence, 41, 759, 979
Pollard, Samuel, 765–66
Posselt, Wilhelm, 771
Potter, Philip A., 213, 774
Prokhanov, Ivan Stepanovich, 792
Pudaite, Rochunga, 799
Quaque, Philip, 390, 804, 959
Ramabai, Pandita, 28, 808, 957
Reed, Mary, 96, 813
Ricci, Matteo, 32, 72, 79, 178, 182, 222, 238, 330–31, 443, 481, 588, 694, 834, 837
Richard, Timothy, 110, 834
Richter, Julius, 834–35
Ridderhof, Joy, 604, 835
Riggs, Mary Ann Clark Longley, 835
Riis, Andreas, 835–36
Roberts, W. Dayton, 836–37
Rodgers, James Burton, 837
Rouse, Ruth, 841–42
Ryung, Ju Sam, 843
Sanders, J. Oswald, 716, 852
Schaeffer, Francis, 314, 563, 855–56
Schereschewsky, Samuel Isaac Joseph, 856
Schmidlin, Josef, 634, 642, 859, 949
Schmidt, Georg, 39, 587, 660, 856–57, 897, 916
Schreuder, Hans Paludan Smith, 837
Schupp, Ernst, 388, 837
Schwartz, Christian Friedrich, 78, 261, 857–58
Scott, Peter Cameron, 40, 42–43, 860
Scudder, Ida Sophia, 611, 861
Sera, Juniper, 867, 985
Shedd, Russell Phillip, 871
Shellabear, William Girdlestone, 871
Simonton, Ashbel Green, 142, 784, 877
Simpson, Albert Benjamin, 160, 185, 339, 657, 738, 740, 783, 877, 1012, 1022
Singh, (Sadhu) Sundar, 61, 879
Sisson, Elizabeth, 880–81
Slosser, Mary (Mitchell), 41, 861, 880, 881
Small, Annie Hunter, 881
Smalley, William A., 66, 580, 882–83
Smith, Amanda Berry, 883
Smith, Edwin Williams, 66, 883
Smith, Nico, 883–84
Smith, Rodney (“Gipsey”), 884
Soga, Tivo, 894–95
Soltau, Henrietta Eliza, 895
Speer, Robert E., 300, 340, 537, 642, 720, 734, 756, 785, 901, 914
Steidel, Florence, 906
Stephen, 405, 439, 906
Stephen (king of Hungary), 906–7
Stephen of Perm, 443, 713, 907
Stevenson, Marion Scott, 907
Stewart, Louisa, 908–9
Stockton, Betsey, 909
Stott, John Robert Walmsley, 230, 274, 302, 339, 412, 413, 427, 439, 563, 909–10
Strachan, R. Kenneth, 910
Studd, Charles Thomas, 738, 912, 916, 1010
Suh Sang-Yun (So Saw), 917
Sunday, William Ashley (“Billy”), 173, 248, 917
Sundkler, Bengt, 917–18, 949
Sung, John, 918, 1005
Swain, Clara A., 410, 919
Szabó, Aladád, 926–27
Taylor, (James) Hudson, 52, 96, 300, 312, 331, 371, 408, 445, 458, 537, 634, 716, 760, 772, 795, 845, 895, 931, 942, 985
Taylor, John Vernon, 69, 201, 931–32
Taylor, Kenneth Nathaniel, 932
Taylor, William, 28, 634, 711, 932, 958, 1011
Tekla-Haymanot, 39, 936–37
Teng, Philip, 938–39
Theodore of Tarsus, 943
Thoburn, Isabella, 919, 958
Thoburn, James Mills, 300, 883, 958
Thomas, Madathilparampilli Mammen, 89, 958
Thompson, Elizabeth Maria Bowen, 958–59
Thompson, Muriwhenua, 959
Thompson, Thomas, 959
Tilak, Narayan Vaman, 960
Ting, Li-Mei, 960–61
Tippett, Alan R., 67, 69, 97, 184, 189, 484, 607, 743, 774, 961
Torrey, Reuben Archer, 247, 740, 963
Townsend, William Cameron, 580, 689, 745, 784, 795, 964, 987, 1036
Trasher, Lillian, 741, 969
Index

Trotman, Dawson E., 971
Trotter, Isabelle Lillias, 52, 971–72
Trumbull, David, 972
Tsubehena, John, 973
Tucker, Alfred Robert, 973, 979
Tucker, Charlotte, 974
Turner, Harold, 69, 403, 975

Uchimura, Kanzô, 695, 978
Uemura, Masahisa, 979
Ulfilas, 442, 875, 911, 980

Underwood, Horace G., 653, 917, 980

Valignano, Alessandro, 837, 995–96
Van der Kemp, Johannes Theodorus, 996
Veenstra, Johanna, 998
Veniaminov, Innocent, 444, 713–14, 998–99
Venn, Henry, 39, 54, 55, 183, 194, 201, 247, 312, 410, 483, 484, 634, 642, 676, 726, 727, 760, 772, 999

Verbeck, Guido Fridolin, 513, 999
Verkuyl, Johannes, 235, 641, 814, 815, 950, 999–1000
Vicelin of Oldenburg, 1000
Vladimir, 442, 713, 715, 842, 1001–2
Voetsius, Gisbert, 194, 633, 814, 949, 1002

Von Zinsendorf. See Zinzendorf, Nikolaus Ludwig von

Waddell, Hope Masterton, 1004
Wagner, Charles Peter, 55, 69, 199, 202, 455, 630, 742, 778, 1004
Walls, Andrew Finlay, 31, 640, 643, 1005
Wang, Leland, 180, 1005
Wang, Thomas Yung-hsin, 180, 1005

Ward, William, 110, 600, 603, 867, 1005–6
Warnecke, Gustav, 183, 188, 389, 585, 634, 642, 856, 949, 1006

Warren, Max Alexander Cunningham, 201, 312, 417, 499, 659, 949, 1006
Waterston, Jane Elizabeth, 1008
Webb, Mary, 1009
Wesley, John, 39, 80, 207, 247, 312, 313, 337, 407, 507, 529, 618, 661, 702, 717, 719, 723, 740, 820, 832, 888, 984, 986, 1002, 1010–11, 1015

Weston, Frank, 1013
Whately, Mary Louisa, 1013–14
White, John, 1014–15
Whitefield, George, 247, 300, 313, 337, 407, 702, 758, 832, 1002, 1015

Whitman, Leroy Frederick, 1015
Wilfrid, 50, 943, 1016, 1017
Williams, Channing Moore, 1016
Williams, John, 409, 613, 702, 767, 916, 1016–17
Willibald, 1017
Willibrod, 170, 195, 676, 1017
Wilson, J. Christy, Sr., 1018
Wilson, John Leighton, 1018
Wilson, Margaret Bayne, 1018
Wilson, Mary Ann (Cooke), 1018–19
Winter, Ralph D., 67, 205, 244, 351, 394, 414, 563, 642, 722, 745, 938, 944, 981, 1019

Xavier, Francis, 82, 238, 330, 443, 455, 487, 513, 694, 837, 1038
Xavier, Jerome, 1038
Yannoulator, Anastasios, 1039
Young, Florence S. H., 1040
Yun, Chi-ho, 1041

Zamora, Nicolas, 1042–43
Ziegenbalg, Bartholomaeus, 83, 260, 300, 444, 586, 757, 820, 1043–44

Zwemer, Samuel Marinus, 106, 477, 503, 549, 666, 756, 803, 815, 855, 914, 1039, 1046